

Theological Lexicon of the New Testament

by Ceslas SPICQ

From :

Preface

I have often been asked to bring together in one volume the NT word studies scattered throughout my previous works, especially in the commentaries. I could not simply collect them as they were, even filling in the references and bringing the bibliographies up to date. Still less could I think of producing an exhaustive work, a project so perfectly completed by the dictionaries of W. Bauer or Moulton-Milligan,¹ not to mention the grammars,² some of the articles in the Theologisches Wörterbuch of G. Kittel and G. Friedrich,³ and especially A. Deissmann's Licht vom Osten (Tübingen, 1923; ET Light from the Ancient East, New York, 1927), Bibelstudien, (Marburg, 1895) and Neue Bibelstudien (Marburg, 1897).

Not only do I study a restricted choice of words, but also my intention is theological. What interests me is not orthographic novelties, idioms, phonetics, or declensions, but the semantics and the religious and moral sense of the language of the NT.⁴ This language has its own rules and its own vocabulary. One cannot understand it except in light of the usages of the Greek language as it was spoken and written in the oikoumene of the first century, which is called "standard Koine," the popular language understood by the hearers and readers of the NT authors.⁵ That is why I have used many references—not only to the classical authors, but to the texts that are closest to the first century BC or AD. These references will undoubtedly be the most useful aspect of this work. Indeed, the many papyrological and epigraphical publications continually bring new findings.⁶ It is my goal to serve students of the Bible by placing conveniently at their disposal the fruit of my studies. "The person who knows the papyri a little meets at every turn in the NT, parallels of subject matter and form that allow him to gain a more vivid grasp of the words of Scripture."⁷

¹W. Bauer, Griechisch-deutsches Wörterbuch zu den Schriften des Neuen Testaments und der übrigen urchristlichen Literatur, 5th ed., Berlin, 1958 (English translation of the fourth edition by W. F. Arndt, F. W. Gingrich, A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature, Chicago, 1957; second edition, revised and augmented by F. W. Gingrich and F. W. Danker from W. Bauer's fifth edition, Chicago, 1979); J. H. Moulton, G. Milligan, The Vocabulary of the Greek Testament Illustrated from the Papyri and Other Non-Literary Sources, 2d ed., London, 1949; reprinted Grand Rapids, 1982. Cf. T. Nägeli, Der Wortschatz des Apostels Paulus, Göttingen, 1905 (still indispensable, although it needs to be brought up to date).

²Always useful will be E. Mayser, Grammatik der griechischen Papyri aus der Ptolemäerzeit, multiple volumes; Leipzig, 1906–1934; cf. E. Pax, “Probleme des neutestamentlichen Griechisch,” in Bib, 1972, pp. 557–564.

³Excellent translations are available: English by G. W. Bromiley, Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, Grand Rapids, 1964ff.; and Italian, by F. Mantagnini, G. Scarpatt, O. Soffritti, Grande Lessico del Nuovo Testamento, Brescia, 1965ff., and the articles published in French, in separate fascicles, under the title Dictionnaire biblique Gerhard Kittel, by Labor et Fides de Genève, under the signature of P. Reymond.

⁴Our model will be R. C. Trench, Synonyms, 12th ed., London, 1894. But, even though I group related words according to their root, I follow alphabetical order for the convenience of the reader, despite all of the criticism that has been directed against this method from a scientific point of view. Cf. the observations of G. Friedrich, “Das bisher noch fehlende Begriffslexikon zum Neuen Testament,” in NTS, vol. 19, 1973, pp. 127–152; idem, “Pre-History of the Theological Dictionary of the New Testament,” in R. E. Pitkin, Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, vol. 10, Grand Rapids, 1976, pp. 650–661.

⁵Cf. F. M. Abel, Grammaire du grec biblique, Paris, 1927, pp. v, xl; G. Thieme, Die Inschriften von Magnesia am Mäander und das Neue Testament; eine sprachgeschichtliche Studie, Göttingen, 1906; J. Rouffiac, Recherches sur les caractères du grec dans le Nouveau Testament d’après les Inscriptions de Priène, Paris, 1911; H. G. Meechem, Light from Ancient Letters, London, 1923; G. Milligan, Here and There Among the Papyri, London, 1923; idem, Selections from the Greek Papyri, Cambridge, 1927; D. Brooke, Private Letters Pagan and Christian, 2d ed., London, 1929; J. G. Winter, Life and Letters in the Papyri, Ann Arbor, 1933; E. Gabba, Iscrizioni greche e latine per lo studio della Bibbia, Turin, 1958; H. Thierfelder, Unbekannte antike Welt, Gütersloh, 1963; G. D. Kilpatrick, “Atticism and the Text of the Greek New Testament,” in Festschrift für Prof. J. Schmid, Regensburg, 1963, pp. 125–137; M. Guarducci, Epigrafia greca, Rome, vol. 2, 1969. R. Merkelbach, H. C. Youtie (“Der griechische Wortschatz und die Christen,” dans ZPE, vol. 18, 1975, pp. 101–154) have underlined the evolution of the meaning of words according to epochs, cultural conditions, and above all religion; cf. O. Mentevecchi, “Dal Paganesimo al Cristianesimo: aspetti dell’evoluzione della lingua greca nei papiri dell’Egitto,” in Aeg, 1957, pp. 41–59.

⁶Among the most important is a tomb inscription of Lower Egypt of the year 5 BC, which testifies that Arsinoè died in bringing forth her πρωτότοκοθ (cf. Luke 2:7. CII, n. 1510, 6; idem, “La signification du terme πρωτότοκοθ d'après une inscription juive," in Bib, 1930, pp. 373–390; C.Pap.Jud. III, 1510). Only in 1928 was there discovered in an inscription of Gerasa, dating from the time of Trajan, the verb ἑατρίζω, "to play at the theater" (SEG, vol. 7, 825, 18), which was until then known only from Heb 10:33; cf. H. J. Cadbury, ἑατρίζω No Longer a NT Hapax Legomenon," in ZNW, 1930, pp. 60–63, etc.

⁷U. Wilcken, "Der heutige Stand der Papyrusforschung," in Jahrbücher für das kl. Altertum, 1901, p. 688; cf. M. J. Lagrange, "A travers les Papyrus grecs," in Conférences de Saint Etienne 1909–1910, Paris, 1910, pp. 55–88; N. Turner, "Philology in New Testament Studies," in ExpT, vol. 71, 1960, pp. 104–107.

Translator's Preface

In 1978 the original two volumes of Ceslas Spicq's Notes de lexicographie néo-testamentaire were published by Editions Universitaires of Fribourg, Switzerland (in the series Orbis Biblicus et Orientalis), and by Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht of Göttingen. These were followed four years later by a third volume, incorporating both newer material on some of the words covered in the original two volumes and also a large number of new entries. In 1991, Editions Universitaires collaborated with Cerf (Paris) in a single-volume reissue of the three-volume set. The reissue had a new title (Lexique théologique du Nouveau Testament) and merged the articles of the third volume into alphabetical order with the first two volumes but was otherwise unchanged. Meanwhile, an Italian translation had been published as a supplement to the Italian version of the Kittel-Friedrich Theologisches Wörterbuch.¹

For reasons evident from the foregoing, in a certain number of instances the same word is treated in more than one article. We have followed the lead of the French one-volume edition in declining to omit or rearrange any of the material. Readers may find all the places a particular word is discussed by using the index of Greek words provided for this edition and the cross-references supplied at the beginnings of some articles.

English-language versions of Père Spicq's three-volume Agapè dans le Nouveau Testament (though without the notes) and of a couple of smaller works have been published. His solid reputation among North American scholars, however, rests largely on his biblical commentaries, especially those on Hebrews and the Pastoral Epistles, which have not been translated into English. As the preface to the first French edition notes, it is from the commentaries that Père Spicq culled the material that makes up the Theological Lexicon; he had been asked to bring together his painstaking word studies in a single collection. When informed that an English translation would be made, he expressed satisfaction that his work would thus be made available to the English-speaking world. We regret that Père Spicq did not live to see the publication of this translation.

The usefulness of Père Spicq's work for New Testament scholars should be evident. Nowadays graduate students are much more likely to have seminars in more recent methodological subdisciplines—various forms of sociological, literary, or ideological criticism—than in epigraphy, papyrology, or lexicography. Practitioners of most of the newer methodologies, however, note the continuing fundamental importance of basic historical-critical work; in most cases, their intention is not to obviate it but rather to note its limitations and build upon it. They will not be spending their own time sorting through the Fuad papyri or the Zeno archive, so they may be glad that Spicq and others have done it for them. This volume gives a summary of his findings plus references to hundreds of studies that today's biblical scholars might not easily find otherwise either because they were published in papyrological or epigraphical journals or Festschriften or else because they appeared too soon to be included in the computerized bibliographic databases upon which scholars increasingly rely.

Not only professional scholars in biblical studies and related fields, but also and especially pastors, teachers, and others interested in serious theological study of the Bible will profit from Spicq's work. In fact, Père Spicq's original preface points out that his primary interest was not in orthographical or grammatical details but in the religious or theological meaning of the words used in the biblical text. Obviously knowing some Greek is an advantage in using a work of this sort, but it is by no means an absolute requirement. For readers with little or no Greek, several conveniences have been supplied in the English version. In the main text, all of the Greek has been transliterated and where it seemed helpful translated as well. (The quotations in the footnotes, which are more likely to be helpful to scholars than to general readers, are printed in Greek characters.) Hebrew and Aramaic words are normally transliterated. The article titles are given in Greek characters, as in the original edition, but we have added transliterations; internal cross-references; cross-references to the Strong's word-numbering system used by Strong's Concordance and many other standard reference works; and English glosses.

It is important for readers to note that English glosses given with each article title are not original to Père Spicq; they have been added for the convenience of users of this work, especially those who do not know Greek. In a few odd cases a word or phrase has been lifted from Barclay Newman's *Concise Greek-English Dictionary of the New Testament*² or from LSJ, but in general the glosses are extracted or otherwise derived from the articles themselves. (This procedure was necessary because sometimes Spicq disagrees with the commonly given definitions.) The glosses are intended to indicate concisely (not necessarily exhaustively) the range of meanings discussed within the article; thus they do not pretend to lexicographic rigor and should not be used as free-standing definitions. For words of special theological importance, no effort was made to represent in the gloss the semantic richness fully discussed in the article. The reader should consult the article to see which definitions Père Spicq applies to actual NT texts.

For the convenience of scholars, abbreviations for the papyri and inscriptions, as well as for classical works, have been standardized. The various bibliographies and tables of abbreviations are original to this edition. (The completed tables were compared with those in the Italian edition as a way of checking for omissions.)

Readers who know some Greek should be aware that many irregular spellings—especially itacisms, but also others—will be encountered in quotations from the papyri and inscriptions. At times it was not obvious to me whether an odd spelling was original (and should thus be retained) or arose as a typographical error in the French edition. (Naturally, in a work of this complexity, especially since it was prepared in the days before personal computers made possible the elimination of human intervention between author's original notes and final published product, there were many typos, especially in the Greek and Hebrew fonts.) In a relatively small number of egregious cases, I checked the published edition of the papyrus or inscription in question, but time was not available to verify a significant percentage of the large numbers of such citations. When in doubt, I retained the spelling printed in the French edition. There are also dialectal spelling variations (most commonly, alpha instead of eta and xi instead of sigma) that will look like misspellings to readers unfamiliar with the main Greek dialects.

Spicq's studies draw on the whole classical and Hellenistic Greek literary corpus. He appears to have paid special attention to Jewish writers (Philo, Josephus) and later pagan writers (Plutarch). The special value of his work, however, is the extent to which it draws upon the nonliterary papyri and the inscriptions. Many readers will be to some extent familiar with the discovery of many new such sources over the past century and some of the lexicographic and grammatical work that has been done upon them (Deissmann, Moulton-Milligan, etc.).³ These papyri and inscriptions give us the language not as it was written by Plato five centuries before the birth of Christ but as it was used in everyday life by Greek and non-Greek peoples around the eastern Mediterranean during the early centuries of the spread of Christianity. Naturally, the language had changed. Readers of Spicq's articles will find many instances in which these nonliterary sources exemplify usages that make more sense of particular biblical passages than was possible before their discovery.

For readers who become interested in the social, economic, religious, and political institutions and circumstances constantly referred to in the papyri, various resources are available. Tarn and Griffith's *Hellenistic Civilization*⁴ is a recognized classic. An up-to-date and authoritative study of the Egyptian papyri from the third through the fifth centuries of the common era is Roger S. Bagnall's Egypt in Late Antiquity.⁵ Readers of Spicq may profitably consult Bagnall's appendices (on time, money and measures, and the nomes), brief glossary, and indexes for quick access to information on technical terms in the papyri. For the language of the papyri, readers may refer to the multivolume grammatical work of Francis Gignac.⁶ A relatively recent work that demonstrates the way in which the nonliterary sources can illuminate and revise our understanding of the world in which ancient Christianity spread, especially with regard to popular religious life, is Robin Lane Fox's Pagans and Christians.⁷ This latter work is mentioned by way of noting that although the papyri and inscriptions do not now generate the same excitement among students of the Bible that they did not so many decades ago, neither are they yet "old hat"; in some ways they are still a largely unmined treasure for the study of early Christianity. Spicq's work is one of the best available entrees to this material for readers interested in exploring the theological meaning of the words used in the New Testament.

¹*Note di lessicografia neotestamentaria*, edizione italiana a cura de Franco Luigi Viero (Brescia: Paideia Editrice, 1988).

²London: United Bible Societies, 1971.

³For titles and bibliographic information, see the general bibliography. Unfortunately Spicq did not have access to the formidable work of New Documents Illustrating Early Christianity, edited by G. H. R. Horsley (vols. 1–5) and Stephen Llewelyn (vol. 6) (The Ancient Documentary Research Centre: Macquarie University, 1981–). This work, which includes linguistic essays and reviews of recently published Greek papyri and inscriptions, is indispensable for advanced lexical studies.

⁴W. W. Tarn, Hellenistic Civilization, 3d ed. rev. by the author and G. T. Griffith (Cleveland: World, 1952); reprinted many times.

⁵Princeton: Princeton Univ. Press, 1993.

⁶*A Grammar of the Greek Papyri of the Roman and Byzantine Periods* (Milan: Istituto editoriale cisalpino-La goliardica, 1976–).

⁷San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1986.

ABBREVIATIONS: BIBLE, APOCRYPHA, PSEUDEPIGRAPHA, RABBINIC AND MISHNAIC WRITINGS, QUMRAN

A. OLD TESTAMENT

Gen Genesis
Exod Exodus
Lev Leviticus
Num Numbers
Deut Deuteronomy
Josh Joshua
Judg Judges
Ruth Ruth
1-2 Sam 1-2 Samuel
1-2 Kgs 1-2 Kings
1-2 Chr 1-2 Chronicles
Ezra Ezra
Neh Nehemiah
Esth Esther
Job Job
Ps Psalm(s)
Prov Proverbs
Eccl Ecclesiastes
Cant Canticles
Isa Isaiah
Jer Jeremiah
Lam Lamentations
Ezek Ezekiel
Dan Daniel
Hos Hosea
Joel Joel
Amos Amos
Obad Obadiah
Jonah Jonah
Mic Micah
Nah Nahum
Hab Habakkuk
Zeph Zephaniah Hag Haggai
Zech Zechariah
Mal Malachi

B. APOCRYPHA

Tob Tobit
Jdt Judith
Add Esth Additions to Esther
Wis Wisdom (Ecclesiasticus)
Sir Sirach
Bar Baruch
Ep Jer Epistle of Jeremiah
Pr Azar Prayer of Azariah
Sus Susanna
Bel Bel and the Dragon
1-2-3-4 Macc 1-2-3-4 Maccabees
1-2 Esdr 1-2 Esdras
Pr Man Prayer of Manasseh
4 Ezra 4 Ezra

C. NEW TESTAMENT

Matt Matthew Mark Mark
Luke Luke
John John
Acts Acts
Rom Romans
1-2 Cor 1-2 Corinthians Gal Galatians
Eph Ephesians
Phil Philippians
Col Colossians
1-2 Thess 1-2 Thessalonians
1-2 Tim 1-2 Timothy
Titus Titus
Phlm Philemon
Heb Hebrews
Jas James
1-2 Pet 1-2 Peter
1-2-3 John 1-2-3 John
Jude Jude
Rev Revelation

D. APOCRYPHAL AND PSEUDEPIGRAPHAL WORKS AND EARLY CHRISTIAN WRITINGS

Acts John Acts of John
Acts Paul Thec. Acts of Paul and Thecla
Acts Pet. Andr. Acts of Peter and Andrew Acts Phil. Acts of Philip
Acts Thom. Acts of Thomas
Adam and Eve Life of Adam and Eve
2 Apoc. Bar. Syriac Apocalypse of Baruch
3 Apoc. Bar. Greek Apocalypse of Baruch
Apoc. Mos. Apocalypse of Moses
Apoc. Paul Apocalypse of Paul
Apoc. Pet. Apocalypse of Peter
Asc. Isa. Ascension of Isaiah
As. Mos. Assumption of Moses
Barn. Epistle of Barnabas
1 Clem. First Clement
2 Clem. Second Clement
Ep. Arist. Letter of Aristeas
Did. Didache
Gos. 12 App. Gospel of the Twelve Apostles
Gos. Pet. Gospel of Peter
Gos. Thom. Gospel of Thomas
Herm. Man. Hermas, Mandate(s)
Herm. Sim. Hermas, Similitude(s)
Ign. Eph. Ignatius, Letter to the Ephesians
Ign. Magn. Ignatius, Letter to the Magnesians
Ign. Pol. Ignatius, Letter to Polycarp
Ign. Rom. Ignatius, Letter to the Romans
Ign. Smyrn. Ignatius, Letter to the Smyrnaeans
Ign. Trall. Ignatius, Letter to the Trallians
Jos. Asen. Joseph and Aseneth
Jub. Jubilees
Mart. Matt. Martyrdom of Matthew Mart. Paul Martyrdom of Paul
Mart. Pol. Martyrdom of Polycarp
Odes Sol. Odes of Solomon
Par. Jer. Paraleipomena of Jeremiah (= 4 Baruch)
Pol. Phil. Polycarp, Letter to the Philippians
Prot. Jas. Protevangelium of James
Ps.-Phocylides Sentences of Pseudo-Phocylides
Pss. Sol. Psalms of Solomon
Sent. Sextus Sentences of Sextus
Sib. Or. Sibylline Oracles
T. 12 Patr. Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs
T. Abr. Testament of Abraham
T. Asher Testament of Asher

T. Benj.	Testament of Benjamin
T. Dan	Testament of Dan
T. Gad	Testament of Gad
T. Issach.	Testament of Issachar
T. Job	Testament of Job
T. Jos.	Testament of Joseph
T. Jud.	Testament of Judah
T. Levi	Testament of Levi
T. Moses	Testament of Moses
T. Naph.	Testament of Naphtali
T. Reub.	Testament of Reuben
T. Sim.	Testament of Simeon
T. Sol.	Testament of Solomon
T. Zeb.	Testament of Zebulon

E. RABBINIC WRITINGS

m. = Mishna, t. = Tosepta, b. = Babylonian Talmud, y. = Jerusalem Talmud

'Abod. Zar. 'Aboda Zara
'Arak. 'Arakin
B. Qam. Baba Qamma
B. Bat. Baba Batra
Bek. Bekorot
Ber. Berakot
Besa Besa = Yom »ob
B. Mes. Baba Mesí'a
Dem. Demai
'Ed. 'Eduyyot
'Erub. 'Erubin
Git. Gittin
Īag. Īagiga
Īul. Īullin
Qidd. Qiddusin
Ketub. Ketubot
Kil. Kil'ayim
Ma'as. Ma'aserot
Mak. Makkot
Meg. Megilla
Menah. Menahot
Nazir Nazir
Nid. Niddah
Pe'a Pe'a

Pesah. Pesahim
Ros Has. Ros Hassana
sabb. sabbat
Sanh. Sanhedrin
seqal. seqalim
Sota Sota
Sukk. Sukka
Ta'an. Ta'anit
Tamid Tamid
Yoma Yoma = Kippurim

F. OTHER RABBINIC WORKS

'Abot R. Nat. 'Abot de Rabbi Nathan
Mek. Mekilta
Midr. Midras
Pesiq. R. Pesiqta Rabbati
Pirqe 'Abot Pirqe 'Abot
Pirqe R. El. Pirqe Rabbi Eliezer
Rab. Rabbah
Sem. Semahot
Sipre Sipre
Tanh. Midras Tanhuma
Tg. Ps.-J. Targum Pseudo-Jonathan

G. QUMRAN[†]

1Q27 1QMyst = Book of Mysteries = "The Triumph of Righteousness" in G. Vermes, The Dead Sea Scrolls in English.

1Q34 1QLitPra = Collection of Liturgical Prayers

1QH Thanksgiving Psalms (Hôdayôt) = "The Hymns" in G. Vermes, DSSE

1QM War Scroll (Milhamah) = "The War Rule" in G. Vermes, DSSE

1QpHab Pesher on Habakkuk = "Commentary on Habakkuk" in G. Vermes, DSSE

1QpMic Pesher on Micah = 1Q14 = "Commentary on Micah" in G. Vermes, DSSE

1QS Manual of Discipline = “Community Rule” in G. Vermes, DSSE

1QSa= 1Q28a = Rule for all the Congregation of Israel in the End of Days
= “The Messianic Rule” in G. Vermes, DSSE

1Qsb= 1Q28b = Collection of Blessings Uttered Over the Faithful, the High Priest, the Priests, the Prince of the Congregation

4QFlor = 4Q174 = “A Messianic Anthology” in G. Vermes, DSSE

4QM War Scroll portions from Cave 4

4QMilMik Words of Michael (Millê Mîka’el) = Words of the book which Michael addressed to the angels

4QpHos Pesher on Hosea = “Commentary on Hosea” in G. Vermes, DSSE

4QpNah Pesher on Nahum = “Commentary on Nahum” in G. Vermes, DSSE

4QpPs Pesher on Psalms = “Commentary on Psalm 37” in G. Vermes, DSSE

11QPsa Psalms Scroll

CD Cairo geniza text of the Damascus Rule

†For fuller information, see Joseph A. Fitzmeyer, The Dead Sea Scrolls: Major Publications and Tools for Study (rev. ed., Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1990).

ABBREVIATIONS: ANCIENT GREEK AND LATIN WRITERS

Achilles Tatius

Leuc. et Clit. Τὰ κατὰ Λευκίππην καὶ Κλειτοφῶντα (The Adventures of Leucippe and Cleitophon)

Aelian

NA De Natura Animalium
VH Varia Historia
Orat. Orationes
Orat. Rom. Oratio Romana

Aeneas Tacticus

Polior. Πολιορκητικά

Aeschines

Fals. Leg. De Falsa Legatione
In Ctes. Against Ctesiphon
In Tim. Against Timarchus

Aeschylus

Ag. Agamemnon
Cho. Choephoroi
Eum. Eumenides
Pers. Persae
PV Prometheus Vincetus (Prometheus Bound)
Sept. Septem contra Thebas (Seven Against Thebes)
Suppl. Supplices

Aesop

Fab. Fabulae

Albinus

Didask. Διδασκαλικός

Alciphron

Ep. Epistulae

Alexander of Aphrodisias

In Sens. In Librum de Sensu Commentarium
Mixt. De Mixtione
Pr. Problemata

Ambrose

In Luc. Commentary on Luke Off. De Officiis Ministrorum
Sacr. De Sacramentis

Anacreon

Od. Odes

Anaximenes

Rhet. ad Alex. Rhetorica ad Alexandrum (= Ars rhetorica)

Andocides

[C. Alcib.] Against Alcibiades
Myst. De Mysteriis

Andronicus

[Pass.] Περὶ παθῶ—ν (De Passionibus)

Anth. Pal.

Palatine Anthology

Anth. Plan.

Planudean Anthology

Antiphon (OCD 1)

1 Tetr. First Tetralogy
2 Tetr. Second Tetralogy
3 Tetr. Third Tetralogy
Murd. Her. Murder of Herodes

Antoninus Liberalis

Met. Metamorphoses

Apollodorus (OCD 6)

Bibl. Bibliotheca

Apollonius of Tyana

Ep. Epistulae

Apollonius Rhodius

Argon. Argonautica

Apollonius Sophista (OCD 13)

Lex. Lexicon Homericum

Appian

BCiv. Bella Civilia

Hisp. —Ιβηρική

Mith. Μιθριδάτειος

Praef. Praefatio

Apuleius

Met. Metamorphoses

Aratus

Phaen. Phaenomena

Archimedes

Aequil. Περὶ ἰσορροπιῶν (The Equilibriums of Planes)

Aren. Ψαμμίτης (The Sand-reckoner)

Eratosth. Πρὸς Ἐρατοσθένην ἔφοδος (To Eratosthenes on the Method of Mechanical Theorems)

Sph. Cyl. Περὶ σφαίρας καὶ κυλίνδρου (On the Sphere and the Cylinder)

Spir. Περὶ ἐλίκων (On Spirals)

Archytas of Tarentum

Antik. Περὶ ἀντικειμένων

Aretaeus

SA Περὶ αἰ—τιω—ν καὶ σημείων ὀξέων παθω—ν (Sign. Acut. Morb.)

SD Περὶ αἰ—τιω—ν καὶ σημείων χρονίων παθω—ν (Sign. Morb. Diuturn.)

Aristaenetus

Ep. Epistulae

Aristophanes

Ach. Acharnenses

Av. Aves (Birds)

Eccl. Ecclesiazusae

Eq. Equites (Knights)

Lys. Lysistrata

Nub. Nubes (Clouds)

Plut. Plutus

Ran. Ranae (Frogs)

Thesm. Thesmophoriazusae

Vesp. Vespae (Wasps)

Aristotle

An. Pr. Analytica Priora

Ath. Pol. —Αθηναίων πολιτεία (Constitution of Athens)

Cael. De Caelo

De An. De Anima

Eth. Eud. Ethica Eudemia

Eth. Nic. Ethica Nichomachea

Gen. An. De Generatione Animalium

Gen. Cor. De Generatione et Corruptione

HA Historia Animalium

MA De Motu Animalium

[Mag. Mor.] Magna Moralia

Mem. De Memoria

Metaph. Metaphysica

Mete. Meteorologica

[Mir. Ausc.] De Mirabilibus Auscultationibus

[Mund.] De Mundo

[Oec.] Oeconomica

Part. An. De Partibus Animalium

Ph. Physica

Poet. Poetica

Pol. Politica

[Pr.] Problemata

Rh. Rhetorica
[Rh. Al.] Rhetorica ad Alexandrum
Sens. De Sensu
Top. Topica

Arrian

Anab. Anabasis

Artapanus

De Jud. De Judaeis (in Eusebius)

Artemidorus Daldianus

Onir. Onirocriticus

Athanasius

Ep. Serap. Epistles to Serapion

Athenaeus

Deip. Δειπνοσοφιστάί

Athenagoras

Leg. Legatio pro Christianis

Augustine

Civ. De Civitate Dei
En. in Ps. Enarrationes in Psalmos
Op. Mon. De Opere Monachorum
Perf. Just. De Perfectione Justitiae Hominis
Serm. Sermones
Tract. in Ev. Joh. Tractatus in Ioannis Evangelium

Aulus Gellius

NA Noctes Atticae

Autolycus of Pitane

Risings Περὶ ἀνατολῶ—ν καὶ δύνσεων (Risings and Settings)

Babrius

Myth. Μυθίαμβοι Αἰ—σώπειοι

Bell. Afr.

Bellum Africum

Bion Adon.

—Αδώνιδος —Επιτάφιος (Lament for Adonis)
[Epith. Achil.] Epithalamium to Achilles and Deidamea

Caesar

BCiv. Bellum Civile
BGall. Bellum Gallicum

Callimachus

Aet. Aetia (in P.Oxy. 2079)
Epigr. Epigrammata
Hec. Hecale
Hymn. Hymns
Hymn. Ap. Hymn to Apollo
Hymn. Art. Hymn to Artemis

Callixenus

Alex. Peri Alexandreias

Can. App.

Apostolic Canons

Cato

Agr. De Agricultura

Cebes of Thebes

[Tabula] Κέβητος ἠβαίου Πίναξ

Cercidas

Mel. Meliambi

Chariton

Chaer. Chaereas and Callirhoe

Chio

Epist. Epistulae

Cicero

Att. Epistulae ad Atticum

Deiot. Pro Rege Deiotaro

Fam. Epistulae ad Familiares

Fat. De Fato

Fin. De Finibus

Flac. Pro Flacco

Leg. De Legibus

Leg. Man. Pro Lege Manilia (De Imperio Cn. Pompeii)

Lig. Pro Ligario

Marcell. Pro Marcello

Nat. D. De Natura Deorum

Off. De Officiis

Part. Or. Partitiones Oratoriae

Phil. Orationes Philippicae

Rep. De Republica

[Rhet. Her.] Rhetorica ad Herennium

Sen. De Senectute

Sull. Pro Sulla

Tusc. Tusculanae Disputationes

Verr. In Verrem

Clement of Alexandria

Paed. Paedagogus

Quis dives Quis dives salvetur?

Strom. Stromata

Codex Justin.

Codex Justinianus

Columella

Rust. De re rustica

Const. App.

Apostolic Constitutions

Cornutus

Theol. Graec. —Επιδρομή τω—ν κατὰ τὴν Ἑλληνικὴν ἑσολογίαν παραδεδομένων (=De Natura Deorum)

Corp. Herm.

Corpus Hermeticum

Cosmas Indicopleustes

Top. Christian Topography

Crates of Thebes

Ep. Epistulae

Cratinus

Dionysalex. Dionysalexandros

Demetrius Phalereus

[Eloc.] De Elocutione (Περὶ ε—ρμηνείας)

Demosthenes

C. Andr. Against Androtion

C. Apat. Against Apaturius

1–3 C. Aphob. Against Aphobus I–III

C. Aristocr. Against Aristocrates

1–2 C. Aristog. Against Aristogeiton I–II

C. Boeot. Against Boeotos I

C. Call. Against Callicles

C. Con. Against Conon
C. Dionys. Against Dionysodorus
C. Eub. Against Eubulides
C. Euerg. Against Evergus
C. Lacr. Against Lacritus
C. Leoch. Against Leochares
C. Lept. Against Leptines
C. Macart. Against Macartatus
C. Mid. Against Meidias
C. Naus. Against Nausimachus
[C. Neaer.] Against Neaera
C. Nicostr. Against Nicostratus
C. Olymp. Against Olympiodorus
1–2 C. Onet. Against Onetor I–II
C. Pant. Against Pantaenetus
C. Poly. Against Polycles
1–2 C. Steph. Against Stephanus I–II
C. Theocr. Against Theocrines
C. Tim. Against Timothes
C. Timocr. Against Timocrates
C. Zenoth. Against Zenothemis
Chers. On the Chersonese
Corona On the Crown
Cor. Trier. On the Trierarchic Crown
Embassy On the False Embassy
Fun. Orat. Funeral Oration
Halon. On the Halonnesus
1–3 Olynth. Olynthiac I–III
Org. Fin. On Organization
Peace On the Peace
P. Phorm. For Phormio
1–4 Philip. Philippic I–IV
Prooem. Prooemia (= Exordia)
Treaty Alex. On the Treaty with Alexander

Didymus

Trin. On the Trinity
Zech. Commentary on Zechariah

Dig.

Digesta

Dinarchus

C. Aristog. Against Aristogiton
C. Phil. Against Philocles

Dio Chrysostom

1 Mon. First Discourse, On Kingship
3 Mon. Third Discourse, On Kingship
Olymp. Olympic Discourse
Or. Discourse (See LCL for discourse numbers)

Dionysius of Halicarnassus

Amm. 1 Epistula ad Ammaeum 1
Comp. De Compositione Verborum
Dem. De Demosthene
Din. De Dinarcho
Is. De Isaeo
Orat. De Oratoribus Veteribus
Pomp. Epistula ad Pompeium
Rh. Ars Rhetorica
Th. De Thucydide

Dioscorides

Alex. Alexipharmaca
Mat. Med. De Materia Medica (also cited by author's name alone)

Duris of Samos

Hist. Historiae (in Athenaeus)

Epictetus

Diatr. Diatribai
Ench. Enchiridion

Epicurus

Epist. Epistulae
Her. Letter to Herodotus
Men. Letter to Menoecus
Nat. De Rerum Natura

Pyth. Letter to Pythocles
Sent. Sententiae

Epiphanius

Pan. Panarion (Refutation of All Heresies)

Etymol. Mag.

Etymologicum Magnum

Euclid

Elem. Elementa

Euripides

Alc. Alcestis

Andr. Andromache

Bacch. Bacchae

Cyc. Cyclops

Dict. Dictys

El. Electra

Hec. Hecuba

Hel. Helena

Heracl. Heraclidae

HF Hercules Furens

Hipp. Hippolytus

Hyps. Hypsipyle

IA Iphigenia Aulidensis

IT Iphigenia Taurica

Med. Medea

Or. Orestes

Phoen. Phoinissae

Rhes. Rhesus

Supp. Supplices

Tro. Troades

C. Marc. Against Marcellus

Eusebius

Dem. Evang. Demonstration of the Gospel

Hist. Eccl. Ecclesiastical History (also cited by author's name alone)

In Isa. Commentary on Isaiah

Mart. Palest. The Martyrs of Palestine
Praep. Evang. Preparation for the Gospel

Firmicus Maternus

Err. prof. rel. De errore profanarum religionum
Math. Mathesis

Fronto

Ep. ad M. Caes. Letter to Marcus Caesar

Gaius

Inst. Institutiones

Galen

Aliment. Comm. In Hippocratis De Alimento Commentarius
Anim. Pass. Περὶ ψυχῆς παθῶ—ν κτλ.
Comm. Hipp. Galen's Comment. I in Hippocratis lib. I Epidemiorum
De Plac. Hipp. et Plat. De Placitis Hippocratis et Platonis
De simpl. medicam. temp. De Simplicium Medicamentorum
Temperamentis
Def. Med. Definitiones Medicae
Med. Phil. Ὅτι ὁ ἄριστος ἰ—ατρὸς καὶ φιλόσοφος (= That the Best Physician is Also a Philosopher)
Remed. Parab. De Remediis Parabilibus

Geminus

Intro. to Astronomy Εἰ—σαγωγή εἰ—ς τὰ φαινόμενα (Introduction to Astronomy)

Gorgias

Hel. Helena

Gregory of Nazianzus

Ep. Epistulae
Or. Bas. Oratio in Laudem Basilii

Gregory of Nyssa

De Deitate De Deitate Filii et Spiritus Sancti

Gregory the Great

Moral. Expositio in Librum Iob, sive Moraliu Libri XXV

Heliodorus

Aeth. Aethiopica

Heraclitus

All. Allegoriae (Quaestiones Homericae)

Hero

Spir. Spiritalia (Pneumatica)

Herodian

Hist. Τῆς μετὰ Μάρκον βασιλείας ἱστορία

Hesiod

Op. Opera et Dies (Works and Days)

[Sc.] Scutum (Shield)

Th. Theogonia

Hierax

Met. Metamorphoses

Hippocrates

Acut. Περὶ διαίτης ὀξέων (De Ratione Victus in Morbis Acutis = Regimen in Acute Diseases)

Aff. Περὶ παθῶν (De Affectionibus = Affections)

Alim. Περὶ τροφῆς (De Alimento = Nutrition)

Aph. —Αφορισμοί (Aphorismata = Aphorisms)

Append. Spurious appendix to Acut.

Art. Περὶ τέχνης (De Arte = The Art)

Artic. Περὶ ἄρθρων [ε—μβολῆς] (De Articulis Reponendis = Joints)

Carn. Περὶ σαρκῶν (De Carne = Fleshes or Tissues)

Coac. Κωακαὶ προγνώσεις (Praenotiones Coacae = Coan Prognoses)
Decent. Περὶ εὐσχημοσύνης (De Habitu Decenti = Decorum)
Dent. Περὶ ὀδοντοφυΐης (De Dentitione = Teething)
Epid. —Επιδημῖαι (Epidemiae = Epidemics)
Fist. Περὶ συρίγγων (Fistulae)
Fract. Περὶ ἀγμω—ν (De Fracturis = Fractures)
Genit. Περὶ γονῆς ?
Int. Περὶ τω—ν ε—ντὸς παθω—ν (De Affectionibus Internis = Internal Affections)
Jusj. Ὅρκος (Jus Jurandum = The Oath)
Lex Νόμος (Lex = Decree)
Liqu. Περὶ ὑγρῶ—ν χρήσιος (De Liquidorum Usu = Use of Fluids)
Loc. Hom. Περὶ τόπων τω—ν κατὰ ἀνθρώπων (De Locis in Homine = Places in Man)
Medic. Περὶ ἰ—ητροῦ (De Medico = Physician)
Mochl. Μοχλικόν (Instruments of Reduction or Nature of Bones)
Morb. Περὶ νόσων (De Morbis = Diseases)
Morb. Sac. Περὶ ἰ—ερῆς νόσου (De Morbo Sacro = Sacred Disease)
Mul. Γυναικει—α (De Morbis Mulierum = Diseases of Women)
Nat. Hom. Περὶ φύσιος ἀνθρώπου (De Natura Hominis)
Nat. Mul. Περὶ γυναικείης φύσιος (De Natura Muliebri)
Nat. Puer. Περὶ φύσιος παιδίου (De Nature Pueri)
Oct. Περὶ ὀκταμήνου (De Octimestri Partu = Eight Month's Child)
Off. Κατ' ἰ—ητρεί—ον (De Officina Medici = In the Surgery)
Praec. Παραγγελῖαι (Praeceptiones = Precepts)
Prog. Προγνωστικόν (Prognostic)
Prorrh. Προρρητικόν (Prorhetic)
Septim. Περὶ ε—πταμήνου (De Septimestri Partu = Seven Month's Child)
Steril. Περὶ ἀφόρων (De Sterilitate = Sterile Women)
Vict. Περὶ διαίτης ὑγιεινῆς (De Ratione Victus Salubris = Regimen in Health); or Περὶ διαίτης (Regimen)
VM Περὶ ἀρχαίας ἰ—ητρικῆς (De Vetere Medicina = Ancient Medicine)

Hippolytus

Haer. Refutation of All Heresies
In Dan. Commentary on Daniel
Trad. ap. The Apostolic Tradition

Homer

[H. Aphr.] Hymn to Aphrodite

[H. Apol.] Hymn to Apollo
[H. Ares] Hymn to Ares
[H. Cast.] Hymn to Castor
[H. Demet.] Hymn to Demeter
[H. Diosc.] Hymn to the Dioscuri
[H. Hermes] Hymn to Hermes
[H. Pos.] Hymn to Poseidon
Il. Iliad
Od. Odyssey

Horace

Carm. Carmina
Epist. Epistulae
Epod. Epodi
Sat. Satirae

Hyginus

Poet. Astr. Poetica Astronomica

Hyperides

Ath. Adversus Athenogenem
Dem. Adversus Demosthenem
Eux. Pro Euxenippo
Lyc. Pro Lycophrone

Iamblichus

Agr. Letter to Agrippa (in Stobaeus)
Myst. De Mysteriis
Sophr. Letter concerning Prudence (in Stobaeus)
VP De Vita Pythagorica

Ignatius

[Ad Philip.] Letter to the Philippians

Irenaeus

Haer. Against Heresies

Isaeus

Philoct. On the Estate of Philoctemon

Isocrates

Ad Nic. To Nicocles
Aeginet. Aegineticus
Antid. Antidosis
Archid. Archidamus
Areop. Areopagiticus
Big. De Bigis (= On the Team of Horses)
Trapez. Trapeziticus (= On the Banker)
Bus. Busiris
C. Callim. Against Callimachus
De Pace On the Peace
[Demon.] To Demonicus
Ep. Epistulae
Evag. Evagoras
Hel. Helen
Nic. Nicocles
Panath. Panathenaicus
Paneg. Panegyricus
Phil. Philippus

Jerome

Epist. Epistulae
In Ep. ad Gal. In Epistolam Pauli ad Galatas
In Tit. In Epistolam Pauli ad Titum
Quaest. hebr. Quaestiones Hebraicae

John Chrysostom

Comp. reg. et mon. Comparatio regis et monachi
Ep. Theod. Letter to Theodore
Hom. Homilies
Sacerdot. De Sacerdotio

John Malalas

Chron. Chronography

John Philoponus

Comm. de An. In Aristotelis De Anima Libros Commentaria

Josephus

Ag. Apion Against Apion

Ant. Antiquities of the Jews

Life Life of Josephus

War The Jewish War

Justin

1 Apol. First Apology

2 Apol. Second Apology

Dial. Dialogue with Trypho

Justinian

Edict. Edicta

Nov. Novellae

Juvenal

Sat. Satirae

Lactantius

Mort. Pers. De Morte Persecutorum

Libanius

Autobiogr. Autobiography (Oration 1)

Longinus

[Subl.] Περὶ ὕψους (On the Sublime)

Longus

Daph. Daphnis and Chloe

Lucian

Alex. Alexander (Pseudomantis)

Am. Amores

Asin. Asinus (Lucius)
Bis Acc. Bis Accusatus
Cal. Calumniae Non Temere Credendum
Char. Charon
Demon. Demonax
Dial. D. Dialogi Deorum
Dial. Meret. Dialogi Meretricii
Dial. Mort. Dialogi Mortuorum
Dom. De Domo
Encom. Demosth. Demosthenous Encomium (= In Praise of Demosthenes)
Fug. Fugitivi
Gall. Gallus
Hermot. Hermotimus (De Sectis)
Icar. Icaromenippus
Im. Imagines
Ind. Adversus Indoctum
JConf. Juppiter Confutatus
JTr. Juppiter Tragoedus
Laps. Pro Lapsu inter Salutandum
Luct. De Luctu
Merc. Cond. De Mercede Conductis
Nav. Navigium
Nec. Necyomantia
Par. De Parasito
Peregr. De Morte Peregrini
Phal. Phalaris
[Philopatr.] Philopatris
Philops. Philopseudes
Pisc. Piscator
Pseudol. Pseudologista
Rh. Pr. Rhetorum praeceptor
Sacr. De Sacrificiis
Salt. De Saltatione
Scyth. Scytha
Somn. Somnium (Vita Luciani)
Symp. Symposium
Syr. D. De Syria Dea
Tim. Timon
Tox. Toxaris
Tyr. Tyrannicida
Ver. Hist. Vera Historia
Vit. Auct. Vitarum Auctio

Lycurgus

Leoc. Against Leocrates

Lysias

[Amat.] Amatorius
C. Agor. Against Agoratus
C. Andoc. Against Andocides
C. Leocr. Against Leocrates
C. Nicom. Against Nocomachus
C. Philo Against Philo
C. Sim. Against Simon
Def. Anon. For an Anonymous Defendant
Inval. For the Cripple
Mantith. Defense of Mantitheus

Macrobius

Sat. Saturnalia

Martial

Epigr. Epigrammaton Libri

Menander

Dysk. Dyskolos
Epit. Epitrepontes
Georg. Georgos
Mis. Misoumenos
Mon. Monostichoi
Phas. Phasma
Pk. Perikeiromene
Sam. Samia
Sik. Sikyonios
Thras. Thrasonidis

Menander of Laodicea

Epidict. Περὶ ἐπιδεικτικῶν

Methodius of Olympus

Symp. Symposium

Minucius Felix

Oct. Octavian

Mon. Anc.

Monumentum Ancyranum

Moschus

Eur. Europa

Nicander

Alex. Alexipharmaca

Ther. Theriaca

Nichomachus of Gerasa

Ar. Arithmetica Introductio

Nicolaus of Damascus

Hist. Univ. Universal History (in Athenaeus)

Vit. Caes. Vita Caesaris

Nonnus

Dion. Dionysiaca

Ocellus of Lucania

Nat. Περὶ τῆς τοῦ παντὸς φύσεως

Olympiodorus

In Mete. In Aristotelis Meteora Commentaria

Orac. Chald.

Chaldaean Oracles

Origen

Cels. Against Celsus
In Joh. Commentary on John
Is. Homilies on Isaiah Prayer On Prayer

Ovid

Am. Amores
Ars am. Ars amatoria
Fast. Fasti
Her. Heroides
Ib. Ibis
Met. Metamorphoses

Pappus

Coll. Collectio (Συναγωγή)

Paulus

Sent. Sententiae

Peripl. M. Rubr.

The Periplus of the Erythraean Sea

Persius

Sat. Satirae

Philo

Abraham On Abraham (De Abrahamo)
Alleg. Interp. Allegorical Interpretation (Legum Allegoriae)
[Bib. Antiq.]Biblical Antiquities
Change of Names On the Change of Names (Mut. nom.)
Cherub. On the Cherubim (De Cherubim)
Conf. Tongues On the Confusion of Tongues (De Confusione Linguarum)
Contemp. Life On the Contemplative Life (De Vita Contemplativa)
Creation On the Creation (De Opificio Mundi)
Decalogue On the Decalogue (De Decalogo)
Dreams On Dreams (De Somniis)
Drunkenness On Sobriety (De Ebrietate)

Etern. World On the Eternity of the World (De Aeternitate Mundi)
Flacc. Against Flaccus (In Flaccum)
Flight On Flight and Finding (De Fuga et Inventione)
Giants On the Giants (De Gigantibus)
Good Man Free Every Good Man Is Free (Quod Omnis Probus Liber Sit)
Heir Who Is the Heir (Quis Rerum Divinarum Heres)
Husbandry On Husbandry (De Agricultura)
Hypoth. Hypothetica (Apologia pro Iudaeis)
Joseph On Joseph (De Iosepho)
Migr. Abr. On the Migration of Abraham (De Migratione Abrahami)
Moses On the Life of Moses (De Vita Mosis)
Plant. On Noah's Work as a Planter (De Plantatione)
Post. Cain On the Posterity and Exile of Cain (De Posteritate Caini)
Prelim. Stud. On the Preliminary Studies (De Congressu Quaerendae Eruditionis Gratia)
Prov. On Providence (De Providentia)
Quest. Exod. Questions and Answers on Exodus (Quaestiones et Solutiones in Exodum)
Quest. Gen. Questions and Answers on Genesis (Quaestiones et Solutiones in Genesis)
Rewards On Rewards and Punishments (De Praemiis et Poenis)
Sacr. Abel and Cain On the Sacrifice of Abel and Cain (De Sacrificiis Abelis et Caini)
Sobr. On Sobriety (De Sobrietate)
Spec. Laws On the Special Laws (De Specialibus Legibus)
To Gaius On the Embassy to Gaius (De Legatione ad Gaium)
Unchang. God On the Unchangeableness of God (Quod Deus Immutabilis Sit)
Virtues On the Virtues (De Virtutibus)
Worse Attacks Better The Worse Attacks the Better (Quod Deterius Potiori Insidiari Solet)

Philodemus of Gadara

Adv. Soph. Adversus Sophistas
D. De Diis
Hom. De Bono Rege Secundum Homerum
Ir. De Ira
Lib. De Libertate Dicendi
Mort. De Morte
Mus. De Musica
Piet. De Pietate
Rh. Volumina Rhetorica
Sign. De Signis
Vit. De Vitiis X

Philostratus

Ep. Epistulae
Gym. De Gymnastica
Imag. Imagines
VA Vita Apollonii
VS Vitae Sophistarum

Photius

Lex. Lexicon

Pindar

Isthm. Isthmian Odes
Nem. Nemean Odes
Ol. Olympian Odes
Paeon. Paeanes
Pyth. Pythian Odes
Thren. Threnoi

Plato

[Alc. Maj.] Alcibiades Major
Ap. Apologia
[Ax.] Axiochus
Chrm. Charmides
Cra. Cratylus
[Def.] Definitiones
Ep. Epistulae (some authentic, some spurious)
[Epin.] Epinomis
Euthd. Euthydemus
Euthphr. Euthyphro
Grg. Gorgias
Hipparch. Hipparchus
Hp. Ma. Hippias Major
Hp. Mi. Hippias Minor
Lach. Laches
Leg. Leges
Menex. Menexenus
[Min.] Minos
Phd. Phaedo
Phdr. Phaedrus

Phlb. Philebus
Plt. Politicus (Statesman)
Prm. Parmenides
Prt. Protagoras
Resp. Respublica
Soph. Sophista
Symp. Symposium
Tht. Theaetetus
Tim. Timaeus

Plautus

Aul. Aulularia
Bacch. Bacchides
Mil. Glor. Miles Gloriosus
Mostell. Mostellaria
Poen. Poenulus
Pseud. Pseudolus
Trin. Trinummus
Truc. Truculentus

Pliny the Elder

HN Natural History

Pliny the Younger

Ep. Epistulae
Pan. Panegyricus

Plotinus

Enn. Enneades

Plutarch

Ad princ. iner. Ad Principem Ineruditum
Adv. Col. Adversus Colotem
Aem. Aemilius Paulus
Ages. Agesilaus
Agric. Agricola
Alc. Alcibiades
Alex. Alexander
Amat. Amatorius

[Amat. nar.] Amatoriae Narrationes
An ignis Aqua an Ignis Utilior
An seni An Seni Respublica Gerenda Sit
Ant. Antonius
An virt. doc. An Virtus Doceri Possit
An vitiositas An Vitiositas ad Infelicitatem Sufficiat
Apoph. lac. Apophthegmata Laconica
Arat. Aratus
Arist. Aristides
Art. Artaxerxes
Brut. Brutus
Caes. Caesar
Cam. Camillus
Cat. Mai. Cato the Elder
Cat. Min. Cato the Younger
C. Gracch. C. Gracchus
Cic. Cicero
Cim. Cimon
Cleom. Cleomenes
Con. praec. Coniugalia Praecepta
[Cons. ad Apoll.] Consolatio ad Apollonium
Cons. ux. Consolatio ad Uxorem
Conv. sept. sap. Septem Sapientium Convivium
Cor. Coriolanus
Crass. Crassus
De adul. et am. De Adulatore et Amico
De Alex. fort. De Alexandri Fortuna
De amic. mult. De Amicorum Multitudine
De am. prol. De Amore Prolis
De audiendo De Audiendo (= De Recta Ratione Audiendi)
De aud. poet. De Audiendis Poetis
De cohib. ira De Cohibenda Ira
De comm. not. De Communibus Notitiis Contra Stoicos
De cupid. divit. De Cupiditate Divitiarum
De curios. De Curiositate
De def. or. De Defectu Oraculorum
De E ap. Delph. De E apud Delphos
De esu carn. De Esu Carnium
De exil. De Exilio
De fac. De Facie in Orbe Lunae
De fort. De Fortuna
De fort. Rom. De Fortuna Romanorum
De frat. amor. De Fraternali Amore
De garr. De Garrulitate
De gen. De Genio Socratis

De glor. Ath. De Gloria Atheniensium
De inv. et ot. De Invidia et Otio
De Is. et Os. De Iside et Osiride
De laude De Laude Ipsius
[De lib. ed.]De Liberis Educandis
Dem. Demosthenes
Demetr. Demetrius
[De mus.] De Musica
[De plac. philos.] De Placita Philosophorum
De prim. frig. De Primo Frigido
De prof. in virt. De Profectibus in Virtute
De Pyth. or. De Pythiae Oraculis
De sera De Sera Numinis Vindicta
De sol. an. De Sollertia Animalium
De Stoic. rep. De Stoicorum Repugnantiis
De superst. De Superstitione
De tranq. anim. De Tranquillitate Animi
De trib. r. p. gen. De Tribus Rei Publicae Generibus
De tu. san. De Tuenda Sanitate Praecepta
De unius in rep. dom. De Unius in Republica Dominatione
De virt. et vit. De Virtute et Vitio
De virt. mor. De Virtute Morali
De vit. aere al. De Vitando Aere Alieno
De vit. et poes. Hom. De Vita et Poesi Homeri
De vit. pud. De Vitioso Pudore
Eum. Eumenes
Fab. Fabius
Flam. Flamininus
Luc. Lucullus
Lyc. Lycurgus
Lys. Lysander
Mar. Marius
Marc. Marcellus
Mor. Moralia
Mulier. virt. Mulierum Virtutes
Nic. Nicias
Num. Numa
Oth. Otho
Pel. Pelopidas
Per. Pericles
Phil. Philopoemen
Phoc. Phocion
Pomp. Pompey
Praec. ger. rei publ. Praecepta Gerendae Rei Publicae
Publ. Publicola

Pyrrh. Pyrrhus
Quaest. conv. Quaestionum Convivialum Libri IX
Quaest. nat. Quaestiones Naturales
Quaest. Plat. Quaestiones Platonicae
Quaest. Rom. Quaestiones Romanae
[Reg. et imp. apoph.] Regum et Imperatorum Apophthegmata
Rom. Romulus
Sert. Sertorius
Sol. Solon
Suav. viv. Non Posse Suaviter Vivi Secundum Epicurum
Sull. Sulla
Them. Themistocles
Thes. Theseus
Ti. Gracch. Tiberius Gracchus
Tim. Timoleon
[X orat.] Vitae decem oratorum

Polemo

Declam. Declamationes

Pollux

Onom. Onomasticon

Polyaenus

Strat. Strategemata

Porphyry

Abst. De Abstinencia
De antr. nymph. De Antro Nympharum
VP Vita Pythagorae

Proclus

Art. sacr. De Arte Sacra

Procopius

Aed. De Aedificiis
Goth. De Bello Gothico

Ps.-Clem. Hom.

Clementine Homilies

Ptolemy (the Gnostic)

Flor. Letter to Flora

Opt. Optica

Tetr. Tetrabiblos (—Αποτελεσματικά)

Quintilian

Inst. Instituto oratoria

Res gest. divi Aug.

Res gestae divi Augusti

Rufus of Ephesus Anat.

—Ανατομή

Rufus of Ephesus

Onom. Περὶ ὀνομασίας

Ren. Ves. De Renum et Vesicae Affectionibus

Sallust

Cat. Bellum Catalinae

Iug. Bellum Iugurthinum

Seneca

Ben. De Beneficiis

Clem. De Clementia

Dial. Dialogi

Ep. Epistulae Morales

Helv. Ad Helviam

Herc. Hercules [Furens]

Ira De Ira

Lucil. Ad Lucilium

Marc. Ad Marciam de Consolatione

Phdr. Phaedra

Polyb. Ad Polybium de Consolatione

QNat. Quaestiones Naturales
Tranq. De Tranquillitate Animi
Vit. Beat. De Vita Beata

Sextus Empiricus

Math. Adversus Mathematicos
Pyr. Πυρρώνειοι ὑποτυπώσεις (Outlines of Pyrrhonism)

Silius Italicus

Pun. Punica

Sophocles

Aj. Ajax
Ant. Antigone
El. Elektra
Ichn. Ichneutae
OC Oedipus Coloneus
OT Oedipus Tyrannus
Phil. Philoctetes
Trach. Trachiniae

Soranus

Gyn. Γυναικει—α

Statius

Silv. Silvae

Stobaeus

Ecl. —Εκλογαί
Flor. —Ανθολόγιον

Strattis

Lemn. Λημνομέδα

Suetonius

Aug. Divus Augustus

Calig. Gaius Caligula
Claud. Divus Claudius
Iul. Divus Iulius
Rhet. De Grammaticis et Rhetoribus
Tib. Tiberius
Tit. Divus Titus
Vit. Vitellius

Synesius

Epist. ad Paeonium Epistula ad Paeonium
Hymn. Hymni

Tacitus

Ann. Annales
Dial. Dialogus de Oratoribus
Germ. Germania
Hist. Historiae

Terence

Ad. Adelphoe
Eun. Eunuchus
Haut. Hautontimorumenos
Phorm. Phormio

Tertullian

Apol. Apology
Bapt. On Baptism
Coron. De Corona (On the Crown)
Marc. Against Marcion
Praescrip. Prescription of Heretics
Scap. To Scapula

Themistius

Or. Orations

Theocritus

Id. Idylls

Theodoret

Car. De Caritate

Hist. Eccl. Ecclesiastical History

Hist. Syr. Mon. History of the Monks of Syria

Theon of Alexandria

In Alm. Commentary on the Almagest

Theophilus

Ad Autol. Ad Autolyicum

Theophrastus

Caus. Pl. De Causis Plantarum

Char. Characteres (sometimes cited by author alone)

Hist. Pl. Historia Plantarum

Sens. De Sensu

Varro

Rust. De Re Rustica

Virgil

Aen. Aeneid

G. Georgics

Vitruvius

Arch. De Architectura

Xenophon of Ephesus

Ephes. Ephesiaca

Xenophon

Ages. Agesilaus

An. Anab.

Ap. Apologia Socratis

[Ath.] Respublica Atheniensium

Cyn. Cynegeticus
Cyr. Cyropaedia
Eq. De Equitande Ratione
Eq. Mag. De Equitum Magistro
Hell. Hellenica
Hier. Hiero
Lac. Respublica Lacedaemoniorum
Mem. Memorabilia
Oec. Oeconomicus
Symp. Symposium

Zeno

Sign. Περὶ σημείων

ABBREVIATIONS: PAPYRI AND OSTRACA

A. WORKS CITED BY AN ABBREVIATION*

Apokrimata Apokrimata: Decisions of Septimius Severus on Legal Matters.
Ed. W. L. Westermann and A. A. Schiller. New York, 1954. (= P.Col. VI)

Berichtigungsliste Berichtigungsliste der griechischen
Papyrusurkunden aus fgypten. Ed. F. Preisigke et al. Berlin, 1922-.

BGU Aegyptische Urkunden aus den Koniglichen (later Staatlichen) Museen zu Berlin, Griechische Urkunden. 15 vols. Berlin, 1895–1983.

Chrest.Mitt.L. Mitteis and U. Wilcken, Grundzuge und Chrestomathie der Papyruskunde I. Band, Historischer Teil, II. Halfte, Chrestomathie. Leipzig-Berlin, 1912.

Chrest.Wilck. L. Mitteis and U. Wilcken, Grundzuge und Chrestomathie der Papyruskunde II. Band, Juristischer Teil, II. Halfte, Chrestomathie.
Leipzig-Berlin, 1912.

CPR Corpus Papyrorum Raineri. 8 vols. Vienna, 1895–1983.

C.Ord.Ptol. Corpus des ordonnances des ptolemees. Ed. M.-Th. Lenger.
Brussels, 1964; 2d ed., 1980.

C.Pap.Jud. Corpus Papyrorum Judaicarum. 3 vols. Ed. V. A. Tcherikover.
Cambridge, Mass., 1957–1964.

C.P.Herm. Corpus Papyrorum Hermopolitanorum. Ed. C. Wessely. Leipzig, 1905. (= Stud.Pal. V)

Jur.Pap. Juristische Papyri. Ed. P. M. Meyer. Berlin, 1920.

MPER Mitteilungen aus der Sammlung der Papyrus Erzherzog Rainer. Ed. J. Karabacek. 6 vols. Vienna, 1887–1897.

MPER N.S. Mitteilungen aus der Papyrussammlung der Nationalbibliothek in Wien, Neue Serie. 14 vols. Vienna, 1932–1982.

O.Aberd. See P.Aberd.

O.Amst. Ostraka in Amsterdam Collections. Ed. R. S. Bagnall, P. J. Sijpesteijn, and K. A. Worp. Zutphen, 1976.

O.Bodl. Greek Ostraca in the Bodleian Library at Oxford and Various Other Collections. 3 vols. London, 1930–1964.

O.Bruss.Berl. Ostraka aus Brussel und Berlin. Ed. P. Viereck. Berlin-Leipzig, 1922.

O.Florida The Florida Ostraka: Documents from the Roman Army in Upper Egypt. Ed. R. S. Bagnall. Durham, N.C., 1976.

O.Joach. Die Prinz-Joachim-Ostraka. Ed. F. Preisigke and W. Spiegelberg. Strassburg, 1914.

O.Mich. Greek Ostraca in the University of Michigan Collection. I = Ed. L. Amundsen. Ann Arbor, 1935. II and III = see P.Mich. VI and VIII.

O.Ont.Mus. I = Death and Taxes: Ostraka in the Royal Ontario Museum I. Ed. A. E. Samuel et al. Toronto, 1971. II = Ostraka in the Royal Ontario Museum II. Ed. R. S. Bagnall and A. E. Samuel. Toronto, 1976.

O.Oslo Ostraca OsloÎnsia: Greek Ostraca in Norwegian Collections. Ed. L. Amundsen. Oslo, 1933.

O.Wilb. Les Ostraca grecs de la collection Charles-Edwin Wilbour au Musee de Brooklyn. Ed. C. Preaux. New York, 1935.

O.Wilck. Griechische Ostraka aus Aegypten und Nubien. 2 vols. Ed. U. Wilcken. Leipzig-Berlin, 1899. Reprint Amsterdam, 1970, with addenda.

Pap.Brux. Papyrologica Bruxellensia. 19 vols. Brussels, 1962–1980.

Pap.Colon. Papyrologica Coloniensia. 9 vols. Cologne/Opladen, 1964–1980.

Pap.Graec.Mag. Papyri Graecae Magicae. Ed. K. Preisendanz. 2 vols. Leipzig-Berlin, 1928–1931.

Pap.Lugd.Bat. Papyrologica Lugduno-Batava. 24 vols. Leiden, 1941–1983.

PSI Papyri greci e latine. 15 vols. Florence, 1912–1979.

P.Aberd. Catalogue of Greek and Latin Papyri and Ostraca in the Possession of the University of Aberdeen. Ed. E. G. Turner. Aberdeen, 1939.

P.Abinn. The Abinnaeus Archive: Papers of a Roman Officer in the Reign of Constantius II. Ed. H. I. Bell et al. Oxford, 1962.

P.Achm. Les Papyrus grecs d'Achmim a la Bibliotheque Nationale de Paris. Ed. P. Collart. Cairo, 1930.

P.AdL. The Adler Papyri. Greeks texts ed. E. N. Adler et al. Oxford, 1939.

P.Alex. Papyrus grecs du Musee Greco-Romain d'Alexandrie. Ed. A. Sawiderek and M. Vandoni. Warsaw, 1964.

P.Amh. The Amherst Papyri: Being an Account of the Greek Papyri in the Collection of the Right Hon. Lord Amherst of Hackney, F.S.A. at Didlington Hall, Norfolk. Ed. B. P. Grenfell and A. S. Hunt. 2 vols. London, 1900–1901.

P.Amst. Die Amsterdamer Papyri I. Ed. R. P. Salomons et al. Zutphen, 1980.

P.Ant. The Antinoopolis Papyri. 3 vols. London, 1950–1967.

P.Apoll. Papyrus grecs d'Apollonos Ano. Ed. R. Remondon. Cairo, 1953.

P.Athen. Papyri Societatis Archaeologicae Atheniensis. Ed. G. A. Petropoulos. Athens, 1939.

P.Bad. Veröffentlichungen aus den badischen Papyrus-Sammlungen. 6 vols. Heidelberg, 1923-.

P.Berl.Moller Griechische Papyri aus dem Berliner Museum. Ed. S. Moller. Goteborg, 1929.

P.Berl.Zill. Vierzehn Berliner griechische Papyri. Ed. H. Zilliacus. Helsingfors, 1941.

P.Bodm. Papyrus Bodmer. 26 vols. Cologny-Geneva, 1954–1969. XIV-XV = Evangelie de Luc chap. 3-24, Evangelie de Jean chap. 1-15. Ed. V. Martin and R. Kasser. 1961.

P.Bon. Papyri Bononienses. Ed. O. Montevecchi. Milan, 1953.

P.Bour. Les Papyrus Bouriant. Ed. P. Collart. Paris, 1926.

P.Brem. Die Bremer Papyri. Ed. U. Wilcken. Berlin, 1936.

P.Bru. Papyri Bruxellenses Graecae. Ed. G. Nachtergaeel. Brussels, 1974.

P.Cair.Goodsp. Greek Papyri from the Cairo Museum. Ed. E. J. Goodspeed. Chicago, 1902.

P.Cair.Isid. The Archive of Aurelius Isidorus in the Egyptian Museum Cairo, and the University of Michigan. Ed. A. E. R. Boak and H. C. Youtie. Ann Arbor, 1960.

P.Cair.Masp. Papyrus grecs d'époque byzantine, Catalogue general des antiquités égyptiennes du Musée du Caire. Ed. J. Maspero. 3 vols. Cairo, 1911–1916.

P.Cair.Mich. A Tax List from Karanis. Ed. H. Riad and J. C. Shelton. 2 parts. Bonn, 1976–1977.

P.Cair.Preis. Griechische Urkunden des Aegyptischen Museums zu Kairo. Ed. F. Preisigke. Strassburg, 1911.

P.Cair.Zen. Zenon Papyri: Catalogue general des antiquités égyptiennes du Musée du Caire. Ed. C. C. Edgar. 5 vols. Cairo, 1925–1940.

P.Catt. See Chrest.Mitt. 88 and 372 and SB I, 4284.

P.Charite Das Aurelia Charite Archiv. Ed. K. A. Worp. Zutphen, 1981.

P.Coll.Youtie Collectanea Papyrologica: Texts Published in Honor of H. C. Youtie. Ed. A. E. Hanson. 2 vols. Bonn, 1976.

P.Col. Columbia Papyri, Greek Series. 7 vols. New York, 1929–1954; Missoula, 1979.

P.Col.Zen. Zenon Papyri: Business Papers of the Third Century B.C. dealing with Palestine and Egypt. 2 vols. New York, 1934–1940. (= P.Col. III-IV)

P.Copenhagen See P.Haun.

P.Corn. Greek Papyri in the Library of Cornell University. Ed. W. L. Westermann and C. J. Kraemer, Jr. New York, 1926.

P.Dura The Excavations at Dura-Europus Conducted by Yale University and the French Academy of Inscriptions and Letters. Ed. C. B. Welles, R. O. Fink, and J. F. Gilliam. New Haven, 1959.

P.Edfou Fouilles Franco-Polonaises. 3 vols. Cairo, 1937–1950.

P.Egerton Fragments of an Unknown Gospel and Other Early Christian Papyri. Ed. H. I. Bell, and T. C. Skeat. London, 1935.

P.Eleph. Elephantine-Papyri. Ed. O. Rubensohn. Berlin, 1907.

P.Enteux. —Εντεύξεις: Requêtes et plaintes adressees au Roi d'...gypte au IIIe siecle avant J.-C. Ed. O. Gueraud. Cairo, 1931.

P.Erl. Die Papyri der Universitätsbibliothek Erlangen. Ed. W. Schubart. Leipzig, 1942.

P.Fam.Tebt. A Family Archive from Tebtunis. Ed. B. A. van Groningen. Leiden, 1950. (= Pap.Lugd.Bat. VI).

P.Fay. Fay_m Towns and Their Papyri. Ed. B. P. Grenfell, A. S. Hunt, and D. G. Hogarth. London, 1900.

P.Flor. Papiri greco-egizii, Papiri Fiorentini. 3 vols. Milan, 1906–1915.

- P.Fouad* Les Papyrus Fouad I. Ed. A. Bataille et al. Cairo, 1939.
- P.Freib.* Mitteilungen aus der Freiburger Papyrussammlung. 3 vols. Heidelberg, 1914–1927.
- P.Fuad I Univ.* Fuad I University Papyri. Ed. D. S. Crawford. Alexandria, 1949.
- P.Genova I* = Papiri dell'Universita di Genova I. Ed. M. Amelotti and L. Zingale Migliardi. Milan, 1974. II = Ed. L. Migliardi Zingale. Florence, 1980.
- P.Gen.* Les Papyrus de Geneve. Ed. J. Nicole. Geneva, 1896–1906.
- P.Giss.* Griechische Papyri im Museum des oberhessischen Geschichtsvereins zu Giessen. Ed. O. Eger, E. Kornemann, and P. M. Meyer. 3 parts. Leipzig/Berlin, 1910–1922.
- P.Giss.Univ.* Mitteilungen aus der Papyrussammlung der Giessener Universitätsbibliothek. 6 vols. Giessen, 1924–1938.
- P.Goodsp.* "A Group of Greek Papyrus Texts." Ed. E. J. Goodspeed. Classical Philology, vol. 1, 1906, pp. 167–173.
- P.Got.* Papyrus grecs de la Bibliotheque municipale de Gothembourg. Ed. H. Frisk. Gothenburg, 1929.
- P.Grad.* Griechische Papyri der Sammlung Gradenwitz. Ed. G. Plaumann. Heidelberg, 1914.
- P.Grenf.* I = An Alexandrian Erotic Fragment and Other Greek Papyri Chiefly Ptolemaic. Ed. B. P. Grenfell. Oxford, 1896. II = New Classical Fragments and Other Greek and Latin Papyri. Ed. B. P. Grenfell and A. S. Hunt. Oxford, 1897.
- P.Gron.* Papyri Groninganae: Griechische Papyri der Universitätsbibliothek zu Groningen nebst zwei Papyri der Universitätsbibliothek zu Amsterdam. Ed. A. G. Roos. Amsterdam, 1933.
- P.Gron.Amst.* = the two Amsterdam papyri in P.Gron.
- P.Gur.* Greek Papyri from Gurob. Ed. J. G. Smylky. Dublin, 1921.

P.Hal. Dikaionmata: Auszuge aus alexandrinischen Gesetzen und Verordnungen in einem Papyrus des Philologischen Seminars der Universitat Halle mit einem Anhang weiterer Papyri derselben Sammlung. Ed. by the Graeca Halensis. Berlin, 1913.

P.Hamb. I = Griechische Papyrusurkunden der Hamburger Staats- und Universitätsbibliothek I. 3 parts. Ed. P. M. Meyer. Leipzig-Berlin, 1911–1924. II = Griechische Papyri der Hamburger Staats- und Universitätsbibliothek mit einigen Stucken aus der Sammlung Hugo Ibscher. Ed. B. Snell et al. Hamburg, 1954. III = Griechische Papyri der Staats- und Universitätsbibliothek Hamburg. Ed. B. Kramer and D. Hagedorn. Bonn, 1984.

P.Harr. The Rendel Harris Papyri of Woodbrooke College, Birmingham. Ed. J. E. Powell. Cambridge, 1936.

P.Haun. Papyri Graecae Haunienses. I. Literarische Texte und ptolemäische Urkunden. Ed. T. Larsen. Copenhagen, 1942. II. Ed. A. Bulow-Jacobsen and S. Ebbesen. Bonn, 1981.

P.Haw. Hawara, Biahmu and Arsinoe. Ed. W. M. Flinders Petri. London, 1889.

P.Heid. Veröffentlichungen aus der Heidelberger Papyrussammlung. 8 vols. in 2 series. Heidelberg, 1905–1964.

P.Hercul. Herculanensium voluminum quae supersunt I-VI, VIII-XI. Naples, 1793–1855. Herculanensium voluminum quae supersunt collectio altera I-XI. Naples, 1862–1876. Fragmenta Herculanensia. Ed. W. Scott. Oxford, 1885. See Catalogo dei Papiri Ercolanesi. Ed. M. Gigante. Naples, 1979.

P.Herm. Papyri from Hermopolis and Other Documents of the Byzantine Period. Ed. B. R. Rees. London, 1964.

P.Hib. The Hibeh Papyri. 2 vols. London, 1906–1955.

P.Holm. Papyrus graecus Holmiensis: Recepte für Silber, Steine und Purpur. Ed. O. Lagercrantz. Uppsala-Leipzig, 1913.

P.Iand. Papyri Iandanae. Ed. C. Kalbfleisch and students. 8 vols. Leipzig, 1912–1938.

P.IFAO Papyrus grecs de l'Institut Francais d'Archeologie Orientale. Cairo. I = Ed. J. Schwartz. 1971. II = Ed. G. Wagner. 1971. III = Ed. J. Schwartz and G. Wagner. 1975.

P.Jena Jenaer Papyrus-Urkunden. Ed. F. Zucker and F. Schneider. Jena, 1926.

P.Kar.Goodsp. Papyri from Karanis. Ed. E. J. Goodspeed. Chicago, 1902.

P.Koln Kolner Papyri. Ed. B. Kramer et al. 4 vols. Cologne/Opladen, 1976–1982.

P.Kroll Eine ptolemaische Konigsurkunde. Ed. L. Koenen. Wiesbaden, 1957.

P.Laur. Dai Papiri della Biblioteca Medicea Laurenziana. Ed. R. Pintaudi and G. M. Browne. 5 vols. Florence, 1976–1984.

P.Leid. Papyri Graeci Musei Antiquarii Lugduni-Batavi. Ed. C. Leemans. 2 vols. Leiden, 1843–1885.

P.Leit. Leitourgia Papyri. Ed. N. Lewis. Philadelphia, 1963.

P.Lille Papyrus grecs. 2 vols. I = Lille, 1907–1928. II = Papyrus de Magdola. Ed. J. Lesquier. Lille, 1912.

P.Lips. Griechische Urkunden der Papyrussammlung zu Leipzig. Ed. L. Mitteis. Leipzig, 1906.

P.Lond. Greek Papyri in the British Museum. 7 vols. London, 1893–1974.

P.Lund Aus der Papyrussammlung der Universitätsbibliothek in Lund. 6 parts. Lund, 1934–1952.

P.Magd. Papyrus de Magdola. Ed. J. Lesquier. Lille, 1912. (= P.Lille II)

P.Mert. A Descriptive Catalogue of the Greek Papyri in the Collection of Wilfred Merton. 3 vols. 1948–1967.

P.Meyer Griechische Texte aus Aegypten. Ed. P. M. Meyer. 2 vols. Berlin, 1916.

P.Michael. Papyri Michaelidae, Being a Catalogue of Greek and Latin Papyri, Tablets and Ostraca in the Library of Mr G. A. Michailidis of Cairo. Ed. D. S. Crawford. Aberdeen, 1955.

P.Mich. Michigan Papyri. 15 vols. 1931–1982.

P.Mich.Zen. = P.Mich. I

P.Mil.Papiri Milanesi. Ed. A. Calderini. Milan, 1928. 2d ed., ed. S. Daris, 1967.

P.Mil.Vogl. 7 vols. Milan, 1937–1981. I = Papiri della R. Università di Milano. Ed. A. Vogliano. 1937.

P.Monac. Byzantinische Papyri in der Königlichen Hof- und Staatsbibliothek zu München. Ed. A. Heisenberg and L. Wenger.

P.Mur. Discoveries in the Judean Desert of Jordan. 6 vols. Oxford, 1955–1977. All citations in Spicq are from vol. II, Les Grottes de Murabba'at. Ed. P. Benoit, J. T. Milik, R. de Vaux. 1961.

P.Ness. Excavations at Nessana. Vols. II-III. Princeton, 1950–1958. All citations in Spicq are from vol. III, Non-Literary Papyri. Ed. C. J. Kraemer, Jr.

P.NYU Greek Papyri in the Collection of New York University. Ed. N. Lewis. Leiden, 1967.

P.Oslo Papyri Osloenses. Ed. S. Eitrem and L. Amundsen. 3 vols. Oslo, 1925–1936.

P.Oxf. Some Oxford Papyri. Ed. E. P. Wegener. Leiden, 1942–1948. (= Pap.Lugd.Bat. III A and III B)

P.Oxy. The Oxyrhynchus Papyri. 51 vols. London, 1898–1984.

P.Oxy.Hels. Fifty Oxyrhynchus Papyri. Ed. H. Zilliacus et al. Helsinki, 1979.

P.Panop. Urkunden aus Panopolis. Ed. L. C. Youtie, D. Hagedorn, and H. C. Youtie. Bonn, 1980.

P.Panop.Beatty Papyri from Panopolis in the Chester Beatty Library Dublin. Ed. T. C. Skeat. Dublin, 1964.

P.Paris Notices et textes des papyrus du Musée du Louvre et de la Bibliothèque Impériale. Ed. J. A. Letronne, W. Brunet de Presle, and E. Egger. Paris, 1865.

P.Petaus Das Archiv des Petaus. Ed. U. Hagedorn et al. Cologne/Opladen, 1969. (= Pap.Colon. IV)

P.Petr. The Flinders Petrie Papyri. Ed. J. P. Mahaffy and J. G. Smyly. 3 vols. Dublin, 1891–1905.

P.Phil. Papyrus de Philadelphie. Ed. J. Scherer. Cairo, 1947.

P.Princ. Papyri in the Princeton University Collections. 3 vols. 1931–1942.

P.Rein. 2 vols. I = Papyrus grecs et demotiques recueillis en Egypte. Ed. T. Reinach, W. Spiegelberg, and S. de Ricci. Paris, 1905. II = Les Papyrus Theodore Reinach. Ed. P. Collart. Cairo, 1940.

P.Rev. Revenue Laws of Ptolemy Philadelphus. B. P. Grenfell. Oxford, 1896. Reedited by J. Bingen, in Sammelbuch, Beiheft 1, Gottingen, 1952.

P.Ross.Georg. Papyri russischer und georgischer Sammlungen. 5 vols. Tiflis, 1925–1935.

P.Ryl. Catalogue of the Greek Papyri in the John Rylands Library. 4 vols. Manchester, 1911–1952.

P.Sakaon The Archive of Aurelius Sakaon: Papers of an Egyptian Farmer in the Last Century of Theadelphia. Ed. G. M. Parssoglou. Bonn, 1978.

P.Sarap. Les Archives de Sarapion et de ses fils: une exploitation agricole aux environs d'Hermoupolis Magna (de 90 a 133 p.C). Ed. J. Schwartz. Cairo, 1961.

P.Sorb. Papyrus de la Sorbonne I. Ed. H. Cadell. Paris, 1966.

P.Soterichos Das Archiv von Soterichos. Ed. S. Omar. Cologne/Opladen, 1979. (= Pap.Colon. VIII)

P.Stras. Griechische Papyrus der kaiserlichen Universitäts- und Landesbibliothek zu Strassburg. 8 vols. 1912–1980. (Beginning with III

1948, title is Papyrus grecs de la Bibliotheque Nationale et Universitaire de Strasbourg.)

P.Tebt. The Tebtunis Papyri. 4 vols. London, 1902–1976.

P.Tebt.Tait Papyri from Tebtunis in Egyptian and Greek. Ed. W. J. Tait. London, 1977.

P.Thead. Papyrus de Theadelphia. Ed. P. Jouguet. Paris, 1911.

P.Tor. “Papiri graeci Regii Taurinensis Musei Aegyptii,” in Reale Accademia de Torino, Classe di Scienze Morali, Storiche e Filologiche, Memorie, vol. 31, 1827, pp. 9-188 and vol. 33, 1829, pp. 1-80. Ed. A. Peyron.

P.Turner Papyri Greek and Egyptian edited by various hands in honour of Eric Gardner Turner on the occasion of his seventieth birthday. Ed. P. J. Parsons et al. London, 1981.

P.Vars. Papyri Varsovienses. Ed. G. Manteuffel, L. Zawadowski, and C. Rozenberg. Warsaw, 1935.

P.Vindob.Bosw. Einige Wiener Papyri. Ed. E. Boswinkel. Leiden, 1942. (= Pap.Lugd.Bat. II)

P.Vindob.Sal. Einige Wiener Papyri. Ed. R. P. Salomons. Amsterdam, 1976.

P.Vindob.Tandem Funfundrei_ig Wiener Papyri. Ed. P. J. Sijpesteijn and K. A. Worp. Zutphen, 1976.

P.Vindob.Worp Einige Wiener Papyri. Ed. K. A. Worp. Amsterdam, 1972.

P.Warr. The Warren Papyri. Ed. M. David, B. A. van Groningen, and J. C. van Oven. Leiden, 1941. (= Pap.Lugd.Bat. I)

P.Wash.Univ. Washington University Papyri I. Ed. V. B. Schuman. Missoula, 1980.

P.Wisc. The Wisconsin Papyri. Ed. P. J. Sijpesteijn. I = Leiden, 1967. II = Zutphen, 1977.

P.Wurzb. Mitteilungen aus der Wurzburger Papyrussammlung. Ed. U. Wilcken. Berlin, 1934.

P. Yale Yale Papyri in the Beinecke Rare Book and Manuscript Library. 2 vols. 1967–1985.

SB Sammelbuch griechischer Urkunden aus Aegypten. 14 vols. 1915–1983.

Sel. Pap. Select Papyri (Loeb Classical Library). Ed. A. S. Hunt and C. C. Edgar. 3 vols. London and Cambridge, Mass., 1932–1942.

Stud. Pal. Studien zur Palaeographie und Papyruskunde. Ed. C. Wessely. 23 vols. Leipzig, 1901–1924.

UPZ Urkunden der Ptolemaerzeit (altere Funde). Ed. U. Wilcken. 2 vols. Berlin-Leipzig, 1927–1957.

B. WORKS CITED BY AUTHOR AND TITLE (OR SHORTENED TITLE)

Austin, Comicorum Graecorum Fragmenta C. Austin. Comicorum Graecorum Fragmenta in Papyris Reperta. Berlin, 1973.

Bell, Jews and Christians in Egypt H. I. Bell. Jews and Christians in Egypt: The Jewish Troubles in Alexandria and the Athanasian Controversy. London, 1924. (= P.Lond. VI)

Hohlwein, Stratege du nome N. Hohlwein. Le Stratege du nome. Brussels, 1969. (= Pap.Brux. IX)

Mason, Greek Terms H. J. Mason. Greek Terms for Roman Institutions: A Lexicon and Analysis. American Studies in Papyrology XIII. Toronto, 1974.

Naldini, Cristianesimo in Egitto M. Naldini. Il Cristianesimo in Egitto: Lettere private nei papiri dei secoli II-IV. Florence, 1968.

Vanderlip, Four Greek Hymns V. F. Vanderlip. The Four Greek Hymns of Isidorus and the Cult of Isis. American Studies in Papyrology XII. Toronto, 1972.

Witkowski, Epistulae Privatae Graecae S. Witkowski. Epistulae privatae graecae quae in papyris aetatis Lagidarum servantur. 2d ed. Leipzig, 1911.

Youtie, Scriptiunculae H. C. Youtie. Scriptiunculae. 3 vols. Amsterdam, 1973–1975.

C. PUBLISHED PROCEEDINGS OF PAPHYROLOGICAL CONGRESSES

Proceedings IV Atti del IV Congresso Internazionale de Papirologia, Firenze, 28 aprile-2 maggio 1935 (Aegyptus, Serie scientifica 5). Milan, 1936.

Proceedings VIII Akten des VIII. Internationalen Kongresses fur Papyrologie, Wien 1955 (29 August-3 September). Vienna, 1956. (= MPER N.S. V)

Proceedings IX Proceedings of the IX International Congress of Papyrology, Oslo, 19-22 August 1958. Hertford, England, 1961.

Proceedings X Actes du Xe Congres International de Papyrologie, Varsovie-Cracovie, 3-9 septembre 1961. Warsaw, 1964.

Proceedings XI Atti dell'XI Congresso Internazionale di Papirologia, Milano, 2-8 settembre 1965. Milan, 1966.

Proceedings XII Proceedings of the Twelfth International Congress of Papyrology, Ann Arbor, 13-17 August 1968. Toronto, 1970.

Proceedings XIII Akten des XIII. Internationalen Papyrologenkongresses, Marburg/Lahn, 2-6 August 1971. Munich, 1974.

Proceedings XV Actes du XVe Congres International de Papyrologie, Brussels, 19 August-3 September 1977. Brussels, 1978. (= Pap. Brux. XVI-XIX)

*Abbreviations generally follow the standard in Checklist of Editions of Greek and Latin Papyri, Ostraca, and Tablets (4th ed.; BASP Supplements 7; Atlanta, 1992), ed. John F. Oates, Roger S. Bagnall, William H. Willis, and Klaas A. Worp. In some instances the abbreviations derive from the 3d edition (1985), which occasionally differs slightly. The Checklist is an invaluable resource for anyone interested in additional information. (For example, the Checklist gives the distribution of inventory references in the papyrological journals for publications from corpora partially published in the volumes cited here; and it tells where some of these have been reprinted.)

ABBREVIATIONS: INSCRIPTIONS

WORKS CITED BY AN ABBREVIATION

CIG Corpus Inscriptionum Graecarum. Ed. A. Boeckh. 4 vols. Berlin, 1828–1877.

CII Corpus Inscriptionum Iudaicarum. Ed. J. B. Frey. 2 vols. Rome, 1936–1952. Vol. 1 reprinted as Corpus of Jewish Inscriptions: Jewish Inscriptions from the Third Century B.C. to the Seventh Century A.D. New York, 1975.

CIL Corpus Inscriptionum Latinarum. Berlin, 1862–.

CIRB Corpus Inscriptionum Regni Bosporani (Korpus bosporskikh nadpisei). Moscow-Leningrad, 1965.

CIS Corpus Inscriptionum Semiticarum. Paris, 1881–.

Dittenberger, Or. Orientis Graeci Inscriptiones Selectae. Ed. W. Dittenberger. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1903–1905. Reprint Hildesheim-New York, 1970.

Dittenberger, Syl. Sylloge Inscriptionum Graecarum. Ed. W. Dittenberger. 4 vols. 3. Ed. Leipzig, 1915. Reprint Hildesheim-New York, 1982.

Fouilles de Delphes Fouilles de Delphes. Vol. 3, Epigraphie. Paris, 1902–.

GDI Sammlung der griechischen Dialektinschriften. Ed. F. Bechtel, H. Collitz, et al. 4 vols. in 7. Göttingen, 1884–1915. Reprint Nendeln-Liechtenstein, 1973–1975.

GIBM The Collection of Ancient Greek Inscriptions in the British Museum. Ed. C. T. Newton. 4 vols. Oxford, 1874–1916. Reprint Milan, 1977–1979.

GVI Griechische Vers-Inschriften. Vol. 1, Grab-Epigramme. Ed. W. Peek. Berlin, 1955.

IG Inscriptiones Graecae. 14 vols. Berlin, 1873–.

IGLAM Inscriptions grecques et latines recueillies en Asie Mineure. Ed. P. Le Bas and W. H. Waddington. 3 vols. Hildesheim-New York, 1968–1972. Originally published in Paris in 1870 as vol. 3, parts 5 and 6 of Voyage archeologique en Grèce et en Asie Mineure

IGLS Inscriptions grecques et latines de la Syrie. Ed. L. Jalabert and R. Mouterde. Multiple volumes. Paris, 1929–.

IGRom. Inscriptiones Graecae ad Res Romanas Pertinentes. Ed. R. Cagnat et al. 4 vols. Paris, 1911–1927. Reprint Rome, 1964.

IGUR Inscriptiones Graecae Urbis Romae. Ed. L. Moretti. 4 vols. Rome, 1968–1990.

ILS Inscriptiones Latinae Selectae. Ed. H. Dessau. 3. Ed. 3 vols. in 5. Berlin, 1962.

ISE Iscrizioni storiche ellenistiche. Ed. L. Moretti. 2 vols. Florence, 1967–1976.

I.Asok. Les Inscriptions d'Asoka. Ed. J. Bloch. Paris, 1950.

I.Assos Die Inschriften von Assos. Ed. R. Merkelbach. Bonn, 1976.

I.Bulg. Inscriptiones Graecae in Bulgaria Repertae. Ed. G. Mihailov. Many vols. Sofia, 1956–. Revise. Ed. Sofia, 1970–.

I.Car. La Carie: histoire et geographie historique avec le recueil des inscriptions antiques. Vol. 2, Le Plateau de Tabai et ses environs. Ed. L. and J. Robert. Paris, 1954–.

I.Chalced. Die Inschriften von Kalchedon. Ed. R. Merlkelbach. Bonn, 1980.

I.Cor. Corinth: The Inscriptions. Ed. J. H. Kent. Princeton, 1966.

I.Cos The Inscriptions of Cos. Ed. W. R. Paton and E. L. Hicks. Oxford, 1891. Reprint Hildesheim-New York, 1990.

I.Cret. Inscriptiones Creticae. Ed. M. Guarducci. 4 vols. Rome, 1935–1950.

I.Cumae Die Inschriften von Kyme. Ed. H. Engelmann. Bonn, 1976.

- I.Delos* Inscriptions de Delos. Ed. F. Durrbach et al. 4 vols. Paris, 1926-
.
- I.Did. Didyma. Vol. 2, Die Inschriften*. Ed. A. Rehm and R. Harder. Berlin, 1958.
- I.Ephes.* Die Inschriften von Ephesos. 8 vols. Bonn, 1979–1984.
- I.Erythr.Klaz.* Die Inschriften von Erythrai und Klazomenai. Ed. H. Engemann and R. Merkelbach. 2 vols. Bonn, 1972–1973.
- I.Gonn.* Gonnoi. Vol. 2, Les Inscriptions. Ed. B. Helly. 2 vols in 1. Amsterdam, 1973.
- I.Ilium* Die Inschriften von Ilion. Ed. P. Frisch. Bonn, 1975.
- I.Kour.* The Inscriptions of Kourion. Ed. T. B. Mitford. Philadelphia, 1971.
- I.Lamps.* Die Inschriften von Lampsakos. Ed. P. Frisch. Bonn, 1978.
- I.Lind.* Lindos: Fouilles et recherches, 1902–1914. Vol. 2, Inscriptions. Ed. C. Blinkenberg and K. Kinch. Copenhagen, 1941.
- I.Magn.* Die Inschriften von Magnesia am Maander. Ed. O. Kern. Berlin, 1900.
- I.Olymp.* Olympia: Die Ergebnisse der . . . Ausgrabung: Textband V, Die Inschriften. Ed. W. Dittenberger and K. Purgold. Berlin, 1896.
- I.Perg.* Die Inschriften von Pergamon. Ed. M. Fraenkel. Berlin, 1890–1895.
- I.Priene* Die Inschriften von Priene. Ed. F. Hiller von Gartringen. Berlin, 1906.
- I.Rhamn.* La Forteresse de Rhamnonte. Ed. J. Pouilloux. Paris, 1954.
- I.Salam.* The Greek and Latin Inscriptions from Salamis. Ed. T. B. Mitford and I. K. Nicolaou. Nicosia, 1974.
- I.Sard.* Sardis. Vol. 7, Greek and Latin Inscriptions. Ed. W. H. Buckler and D. M. Robinson. Leiden, 1932.

I.Sard.Rob. Nouvelles Inscriptions de Sardes. Ed. L. Robert. Paris, 1964-.

I.Side "Inscriptions grecques de Side," Rev. Phil., vol. 84, 1958, pp. 15-53.
Cf. The Inscriptions of Side. Ed. G. E. Bean. Ankara, 1965.

I.Sinur. Le Sanctuaire de Sinuri près de Mylasa. Vol. 1, Les Inscriptions grecques. Ed. L. Robert. Paris, 1945.

I.Thas. Recherches sur l'histoire et les cultes de Thasos. Ed. J. Pouilloux and C. Dunant. 2 vols. Paris, 1954–1958.

LSAM F. Sokolowski. Lois sacrées de l'Asie Mineure. Paris, 1955.

LSCG, LSCGSup F. Sokolowski, Lois sacrées des cités grecques. Paris, 1969. Supplement. Paris, 1962.

Leg.Gort. Leges Gortynensium (= GDI 4991).

MAMA Monumenta Asiae Minoris Antiqua. 9 vols. Manchester-London, 1928–1988.

NCIGNouveau choix d'inscriptions grecques. Ed. Institut Fernand-Courby. Paris, 1971.

RIJG Recueil des inscriptions juridiques grecques. Ed. R. Dareste, B. Haussoullier, and T. Reinach. 2 vols. Paris, 1891–1904. Reprint Rome, 1965.

SEG Supplementum Epigraphicum Graecum. Alphen, 1923-.

TAM Tituli Asiae Minoris. Vienna, 1901-.

B. WORKS CITED BY AUTHOR AND TITLE (OR SHORTENED TITLE)

Bean & Mitford, Cilicia G. E. Bean and T. B. Mitford, Journeys in Rough Cilicia, 1964–1968. Vienna, 1970.

A. & E. Bernand, Memnon A. and E. Bernand. Les Inscriptions grecques et latines du Colosse de Memnon. Cairo, 1960.

A. Bernand, Koptos A. Bernand. De Koptos a Kosseir. Leiden, 1972.

A. Bernand, El-Kanais A. Bernand. Le Paneion d'El-Kanais: Les Inscriptions grecques. Leiden, 1972.

A. and E. Bernand, Philae Les Inscriptions grecques de Philae. Vol. 1, Epoque ptolemaïque. Ed. A. Bernand. Vol. 2 (titled Les Inscriptions grecques et latines de Philae), Haut et Bas Empire. Ed. E. Bernand. Paris, 1969.

A. Bernand, Fayoum A. Bernand. Les Inscriptions grecques du Fayoum. Cairo, 1981.

A. Bernand, Pan A. Bernand. Pan du Desert. Leiden, 1977.

E. Bernand, Inscriptions metriques E. Bernand. Inscriptions metriques de l'Egypte greco-romaine: Recherches sur la poesie epigrammatique des grecs en Egypte. Paris, 1969.

E. Bernand, Fayoum E. Bernand. Recueil des inscriptions grecques du Fayoum. 3 vols. Leiden, 1975-.

Breccia, Iscrizioni E. Breccia. Iscrizioni greche e latine. Catalogue generale des antiquites egyptiennes du musee d'Alexandrie, 57. 1911. Reprinted as Inscriptiones nunc Alexandriae in Museo = Greek and Latin Inscriptions = Iscrizioni greche e latine, Chicago, 1978.

Chalon, T. Julius Alexander G. Chalon. L'Edit de Tiberius Julius Alexander: Etude historique et exegetique. Olten, 1964.

Cumont, Fouilles de Doura-Europus F. Cumont. Fouilles de Doura-Europus (1922–1923). Paris, 1926.

Cumont, L'Egypte des astrologues F. Cumont. L'Egypte des astrologues. Brussels, 1937.

Cumont, Lux Perpetua F. Cumont. Lux Perpetua. Paris, 1949.

Cumont, Symbolisme funeraire F. Cumont. Recherches sur le symbolisme funeraire des Romains. Paris, 1942. Reprint New York, 1975.

Cumont, Studia Pontica F. Cumont. Studia Pontica. Brussels, n.d.

des Gagniers, Laodicee J. des Gagniers. Laodicee du Lycos: Le Nymphée. Quebec-Paris, 1969.

Drew-Bear, Phrygie T. Drew-Bear. Nouvelles inscriptions de Phrygie. Zutphen, 1978.

Durrbach, Choix F. Durrbach. Choix d'inscriptions de Delos. Paris, 1921. Vol. 1 reprinted Hildesheim, New York, 1976.

Ebert, Griechische Epigramme J. Ebert. Griechische Epigramme auf Sieger an gymnischen und hippischen Agonen. Berlin, 1972.

Firatli & Robert, StÉles funéraires N. Firatli and L. Robert. Les StÉles funéraires de Byzance greco-romaine. Paris, 1964.

Grandjean, Aretalogie d'Isis Y. Grandjean. Une nouvelle aretalogie d'Isis a Maronee. Leiden, 1975.

Gregoire, Asie Mineure H. Gregoire. Recueil des inscriptions grecques- chretiennes d'Asie Mineure. Amsterdam, 1968.

Guarducci, Epigrafia greca M. Guarducci. Epigrafia greca. 4 vols. Rome, 1967–1978.

Hermann, Ergebnisse P. Hermann. Ergebnisse einer Reiser in Nordostlydien. Vienna, 1962.

Holleaux, Etudes d'epigraphie M. Holleaux. Etudes d'epigraphie et d'histoire grecques. 6 vols. Paris, 1952–1968.

Hutmacher, Ehrendekret R. Hutmacher. Das Ehrendekret fur den Strategen Kallimachos. Meisenheim am Glan, 1965.

Kaibel, Epigrammata G. Kaibel. Epigrammata Graeca ex Lapidibus Conlecta. Berlin, 1878. Reprint Hildesheim, 1965.

Latyshev, Inscriptiones Antiquae B. Latyshev. Inscriptiones Antiquae Orae Septentrionalis Ponti Euxini Graecae et Latinae. 2. Ed. 2 vols. Hildesheim, 1965.

Letronne, Egypte J. A. Letronne. Recueil des inscriptions grecques et latines de l'Égypte. 2 vols. Paris, 1842–1848. Reprint Aalen, 1974.

Lifshitz, Synagogues juives B. Lifshitz. Donateurs et fondateurs dans les synagogues juives. Paris, 1967.

Michel, Recueil C. Michel. Recueil d'inscriptions grecques. Paris, 1900. Reprint Hildesheim-New York, 1976. Supplement. 2 vols. Paris, 1912–1927. Reprint Hildesheim-New York, 1976.

Pfohl, Grabinschriften G. Pfohl. Untersuchungen über die attischen Grabinschriften. Eisenstein, 1953.

Pleket, Rijksmuseum H. W. Pleket. The Greek Inscriptions in the Rijksmuseum van Oudheden at Leiden. Leiden, 1958.

Pouilloux, Choix J. Pouilloux. Choix d'inscriptions grecques. Paris, 1960.

L. Robert, Documents L. Robert. Documents de l'Asie mineure meridionale: inscriptions, monnaies et geographie. Geneva-Paris, 1966.

L. Robert, Etudes anatoliennes L. Robert. Etudes anatoliennes: inscriptions, monnaies et geographie. Paris, 1937. Reprint Amsterdam, 1970.

L. Robert, Etudes epigraphiques L. Robert. Etudes epigraphiques et philologiques. Paris, 1938.

L. Robert, Gladiateurs L. Robert. Les Gladiateurs dans l'Orient grec. Paris, 1940. Reprint Amsterdam, 1971.

L. Robert, Noms indigènes L. Robert. Noms indigènes dans l'Asie Mineure greco-romaine. Paris, 1963

L. Robert, Opera Minora Selecta L. Robert. Opera Minora Selecta: Epigraphie et antiquites grecques. 7 vols. Amsterdam, 1969–1990.

L. Robert, Villes d'Asie Mineure L. Robert. Villes d'Asie Mineure: Etudes de geographie ancienne. 2. Ed. Paris, 1962.

Rougement, Delphes Corpus des inscriptions de Delphes. Vol. 1, Lois sacrees et rÈglements religieux. Ed. G. Rougement. Paris, 1977.

Schwabe, Beth She'arim Beth She'arim: Report on the Excavations during 1936–1940. Vol. 2, The Greek inscriptions. Ed. M. Schwabe and B. Lifshitz. New Brunswick, N.J., 1973-.

Welles, Royal Correspondence C. B. Welles. Royal Correspondence in the Hellenistic Period: A Study in Greek Epigraphy. London, 1934. Reprint Chicago, 1974.

ABBREVIATIONS: GENERAL WORKS

A. WORKS CITED BY AN ABBREVIATION

ANRW H. Temporini and W. Haase. Aufstieg und Niedergang der römischen Welt: Geschichte und Kultur Roms im Spiegel der neueren Forschung. Many vols. Berlin–New York, 1972–.

Anth. Lyr. Graec. Anthologia Lyrica Graeca. Ed. E. Diehl. Leipzig, 1954–.

BAGD W. Bauer. A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature. 2d ed. Trans. W. F. Arndt and F. W. Gingrich. Revised and edited F. W. Danker. Chicago, 1979.

BDF F. Blass and A. Debrunner. A Greek Grammar of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature. Trans. and rev. of the 9th–10th German edition incorporating supplementary notes of A. Debrunner by R. W. Funk. Chicago, 1961.

CCAG Catalogus Codicum Astrologorum Graecorum. 9 vols. Brussels, 1898–1953.

DACL Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie. 29 vols. Paris, 1903–1952.

DAGR Dictionnaire des antiquités grecques et romaines. Ed. C. Daremberg and E. Saglio. 6 vols. in 10. Graz, 1962–63.

DBSup Dictionnaire de la Bible. Supplément. Ed. L. Pirot and A. Robert. Paris, 1926–.

Dict.spir. Dictionnaire de spiritualité, ascétique et mystique, doctrine et histoire. Ed. M. Viller et al. Paris, 1932–.

DTC Dictionnaire de théologie catholique. Ed. A. Vacant, E. Mangenot, E. Amann, et al. 16 vols. Paris, 1903–1972.

DKP Der kleine Pauly: Lexikon der Antike auf der Grundlage von Pauly's Realencyclopädie der classischen Altertumswissenschaft. Ed. K. Ziegler and W. Sontheimer. 5 vols. Stuttgart, 1964–1975.

EDNT H. Balz and G. Schneider, eds. Exegetical Dictionary of the New Testament. Grand Rapids, 1990–1993.

F.Gr.H. F. Jacoby. Die Fragmente der griechischen Historiker. 3 vols. in 15. Leiden, 1954–1964.

L&N J. P. Louw and E. A. Nida, eds. Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament: Based on Semantic Domains. 2d ed. New York, 1989.

LTGR I. C. T. Ernesti. Lexicon Technologiae Graecorum Rhetoricae. 1795–1797. Reprint Hildesheim, 1962.

LSJ H. G. Liddell and R. Scott. A Greek-English Lexicon. 9th ed. Ed. H. S. Jones and R. McKenzie. Oxford, 1940.

LSJSup E. A. Barber et al. H. G. Liddell, Robert Scott, H. Stuart Jones, Greek-English Lexicon: A Supplement. Oxford, 1968.

LXX Septuagint (Greek Old Testament)

Moulton-Milligan [MM in apparatus] J. H. Moulton and G. Milligan. The Vocabulary of the Greek Testament Illustrated from the Papyri and Other Non-literary Sources. 2 vols. London, 1914–30. Reprint. Grand Rapids, 1985.

MT Masoretic Text

ND G. H. R. Horsley and Stephen Llewelyn, eds. New Documents Illustrating Early Christianity. North Ryde, N.S.W. 6 vols. 1981–.

NIDNTT Colin Brown, ed. The New International Dictionary of New Testament Theology. Grand Rapids, 1986.

NJB New Jerusalem Bible

NT New Testament

OCD Oxford Classical Dictionary. Ed. N. G. L. Hammond and H. H. Scullard. 2d ed. Oxford, 1970.

ODCC Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church. Ed. F. L. Cross and E. A. Livingstone. 2d ed., corrected. Oxford, 1983.

OT Old Testament

PG Patrologiae Cursus Completus, Series Graeca. Ed. J.-P. Migne. 161 vols in 166. Paris, 1857–87.

PL Patrologiae Cursus Completus, Series Latina. Ed. J.-P. Migne. 221 vols. Paris, 1844–1864.

PO Patrologia Orientalis. Ed. R. Fraffin and F. Nau. Paris, 1903–1922.

Prosop.Ptol. Prosopographia Ptolemaica. Ed. W. Peremans and E. van't Dack. 9 vols. Louvain, 1950–1981.

PW Paulys Realencyclopädie der classischen Altertumswissenschaft. New edition by G. Wissowa et al. 49 vols. in 50. Stuttgart, 1894–1980.

PWSup Paulys Real-Encyclopadie der classischen Altertumswissenschaft: Supplement. 15 vols. Stuttgart, 1903–1980.

S J. Strong. Strong's Exhaustive Concordance of the Bible. Reprint. Peabody, n.d.

Str-B [H. L. Strack and] P. Billerbeck. Kommentar zum Neuen Testament aus Talmud und Midrasch. 6 vols. in 7. Munich, 1922–1961.

SVF H. von Arnim. Stoicorum Veterum Fragmenta. 4 vols. Leipzig, 1903–1924. Reprint Stuttgart, 1978–1979.

TDNT G. Kittel and G. Friedrich, eds. Theological Dictionary of the New Testament. Trans. G. W. Bromiley. 10 vols. Grand Rapids, 1964–1976.

TDOT G. J. Botterweck and H. Ringgren. Theological Dictionary of the Old Testament. Grand Rapids, 1974–1990.

TWNT G. Kittel and G. Friedrich. Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament. 10 vols. Stuttgart, 1932–1979. (References to TWNT have been retained only in a few instances in which bibliographies from TWNT were not included in TDNT. All others have been changed to the corresponding references in TDNT.)

B. WORKS CITED BY AUTHOR AND TITLE (OR SHORTENED TITLE)

Abel, Grammaire F. M. Abel. Grammaire du grec biblique, suivie d'un Choix de papyrus. Paris, 1927.

Abel, Maccabées F. M. Abel. Les Livres des Maccabées. Paris, 1949.

Allo, Première Epître aux Corinthiens E. B. Allo. Saint Paul: Première Epître aux Corinthiens. Paris, 1934.

Allo, Seconde Epître aux Corinthiens E. B. Allo. Saint Paul: Seconde Epître aux Corinthiens. Paris, 1937. 2d ed., 1956.

Aujac, Géminos G. Aujac. Géminos: Introduction aux phénomènes. Paris, 1975

Barclay, NT Wordbook W. Barclay. A New Testament Wordbook. London, 1955.

Barr, Semantics J. Barr. The Semantics of Biblical Language. London, 1961.

Barrett, St. John C. K. Barrett. The Gospel According to St. John. London, 1955.

Barth, Ephesians M. Barth. Ephesians: Introduction, translation, and commentary. 2 vols. New York, 1974.

Bengel J. A. Bengel. Gnomon Novi Testamenti. 6th ed. Tübingen, 1858. ET New Testament Word Studies. Trans. C. T. Lewis and M. R. Vincent. 2 vols. Grand Rapids, 1971.

Benoit, Exégèse et théologie P. Benoit. Exégèse et théologie. 4 vols. Paris, 1961–1983. Selections ET Jesus and the Gospel. Trans. B. Weatherhead. 2 vols. New York, 1973–1974.

Bergk, Poetae Lyrici Graeci T. Bergk. Poetae Lyrici Graeci. 5th ed. 3 vols. Leipzig, 1900–1914.

Betz, Lukian von Samosata H. D. Betz. Lukian von Samosata und das Neue Testament: Religionsgeschichtliche und paranetische Parallelen. Berlin, 1961.

Bickerman, Institutions des Séleucides E. Bickerman. Institutions des Séleucides. Paris, 1938.

Black, Aramaic Approach M. Black. An Aramaic Approach to the Gospels and Acts. 3d ed. Oxford, 1967.

Blinzler, Trial of Jesus J. Blinzler. The Trial of Jesus: The Jewish and Roman Proceedings against Jesus Christ Described and Assessed from the Oldest Accounts. Translated by I. and F. McHugh from the 2d German ed. Westminster, 1959.

Bogaert, Banques et banquiers R. Bogaert. Banques et banquiers dans les cités grecques. Leiden, 1968.

Boisacq, Dictionnaire étymologique E. Boisacq. Dictionnaire étymologique de la langue grecque, étudiée dans ses rapports avec les autres langues indo-européennes. 4th ed. Heidelberg, 1950.

Bompaire, Lucien écrivain J. Bompaire. Lucien écrivain: Imitation et création. Paris, 1958.

Bonhöffer, Epikte A. Bonhöffer. Epiktet und das Neue Testament. Giessen, 1911.

Bonner, Magical Amulets

C. Bonner. Studies in Magical Amulets, Chiefly Graeco-Egyptian. Ann Arbor, 1950.

Bonsirven, Judaïsme palestinien J. Bonsirven. Le Judaïsme palestinien aux temps de Jésus-Christ: Sa théologie. 2 vols. 2d ed. Paris, 1934–1935. ET Palestinian Judaism in the time of Jesus Christ. Abridged. Trans. W. Wolf. New York, 1964.

van Brock, Vocabulaire médical N. van Brock. Recherches sur le vocabulaire médical du grec ancien: Soins et guérison. Paris, 1961.

Brown, John R. E. Brown. The Gospel According to John. 2 vols. New York, 1970.

Cerfaux, Recueil L. Cerfaux L. Cerfaux. Recueil Lucien Cerfaux: Etudes d'exégèse et d'histoire religieuse. 3 vols. Gembloux, 1954–1962.

Cerfaux & Tondriau, Culte des souverains L. Cerfaux and J. Tondriau. Le Culte des souverains dans la civilisation gréco-romaine. Paris-Tournai, 1957.

Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique P. Chantraine. Dictionnaire étymologique de la langue grecque: Histoire des mots. 4 vols. Paris, 1968–1980.

Conzelmann, First Corinthians H. Conzelmann. First Corinthians. Trans. J. W. Leitch. Philadelphia, 1975. (ET of Der erste Brief an die Korinther, Göttingen, 1969.)

Le Déaut, Nuit Pascale R. Le Déaut. La Nuit Pascale: Essai sur la signification de la Paque juive à partir du Targum d'Exode XII 42. AnBib 22. Rome, 1963.

Deissmann, Bible Studies A. Deissmann. Bible Studies. Trans. A. Grieve. Edinburgh, 1901. Reprint Peabody, Mass., 1988.

Deissmann, Light A. Deissmann. Light from the Ancient East. Trans. L. R. M. Strachan. New York, 1927. (ET of Licht vom Osten, Tübingen, 1923.)

Deissmann, Neue Bibelstudien A. Deissmann. Neue Bibelstudien. Marburg, 1897.

Delebecque, Etudes grecques E. Delebecque. Etudes grecques sur l'Évangile de Luc. Paris, 1976.

Delebecque, Évangile de Luc E. Delebecque. Évangile de Luc: texte traduit et annoté. Paris, 1976. New edition, Paris, 1992.

Derrett, Law in the NT J. D. M. Derrett. Law in the New Testament. London, 1970.

Dhorme, Emploi métaphorique P. Dhorme. L'Emploi métaphorique des noms de parties du corps en hébreu et en akkadien. Paris, 1923. Reprint Paris, 1963.

Diels, Fragments der Vorsokratiker H. Diels and W. Kranz. Die Fragmente der Vorsokratiker. 10th ed., Berlin, 1960. ET (fragments only) in Ancilla to the pre-Socratic philosophers: A complete translation of the fragments in Diels Fragmente der Vorsokratiker. Trans. Kathleen Freeman. Oxford, 1962.

Dupont, Béatitudes J. Dupont. Les Béatitudes. 2d ed. 3 vols. Bruges, 1958–1973.

Dupont, Discours de Milet J. Dupont. Le Discours de Milet. Paris, 1962.

Dupont, Union avec le Christ J. Dupont. L'Union avec le Christ suivant saint Paul. Bruges-Louvain, 1952.

Durham, Vocabulary of Menander D. B. Durham. The Vocabulary of Menander. Amsterdam, 1969.

Edmonds, Attic Comedy J. M. Edmonds. The Fragments of Attic Comedy after Meineke, Bergk, and Kock. 3 vols. in 4. Leiden, 1957–1961.

Festugière, Dieu cosmique A. J. Festugière. Le Dieu cosmique. Vol. 2 of Hermès Trismégiste. Paris, 1949.

Festugière, Dieu inconnu A. J. Festugière. Le Dieu inconnu et la Gnose. Vol. 4 of Hermès Trismégiste. Paris, 1954.

Festugière, Etudes de religion A. J. Festugière. Etudes de religion grecque et hellénistique. Paris, 1972.

Festugière, Etudes d'histoire A. J. Festugière. Etudes d'histoire et de philologie. Paris, 1975.

Festugière, Hermès Trismégiste A. J. Festugière. La Révélation d'Hermès Trismégiste. 4 vols. Paris, 1949–1954.

Festugière, Idéal religieux A. J. Festugière. L'Idéal religieux des Grecs et l'Évangile. Paris, 1932.

Festugière, Monde gréco-romain A. J. Festugière and P. Fabre. Le monde gréco-romain au temps de Notre-Seigneur. 2 vols. Paris, 1935.

Festugière, Personal Religion A. J. Festugière. Personal Religion among the Greeks. Berkeley, 1954.

Festugière, Vie spirituelle A. J. Festugière. La Vie spirituelle en Grèce à l'époque hellénistique: ou, Les Besoins de l'esprit dans un monde raffiné. Paris, 1977.

Field, Notes on the Translation F. Field. Notes on the Translation of the New Testament. Oxford, 1864–1881. Reprint Peabody, 1994.

Fitzmyer, Semitic Background J. A. Fitzmyer. Essays on the Semitic Background of the New Testament. London, 1971. Reprint Missoula, Mont., 1974.

Fournier, Les Verbes "dire" H. Fournier. Les Verbes "dire" en grec ancien: Exemple de conjugaison supplétive. Paris, 1946.

Gauthier, Magnanimité R. A. Gauthier. Magnanimité: L'Idéal de la grandeur dans la philosophie païenne et dans la théologie chrétienne. Paris, 1951.

Gauthier, Symbola P. Gauthier. Symbola: Les Etrangers et la justice dans les cités grecques. Nancy, 1972.

Gutierrez, Paternité spirituelle P. Gutierrez. La Paternité spirituelle selon saint Paul. Paris, 1968.

Haenchen, Acts E. Haenchen. The Acts of the Apostles: A Commentary. Trans. B. Noble et al. Philadelphia, 1971. (ET of Die Apostelgeschichte, 13th ed., Göttingen, 1961.)

Hengel, Zealots M. Hengel. The Zealots. Trans. David Smith. Edinburgh, 1989. (ET of Die Zeloten, Leiden-Cologne, 1961.)

Héring, Hébreux J. Héring. L'Épître aux Hébreux. Neuchâtel-Paris, 1954. ET The Epistle to the Hebrews. Trans A. W. Heathcote and P. J. Allcock. London, 1970.

Higgins, New Testament Essays A. J. B. Higgins. New Testament Essays: Studies in Memory of Thomas Walter Manson, 1893–1958. Manchester, 1959.

Hill, Greek Words and Hebrew Meanings D. Hill. Greek Words and Hebrew Meanings: Studies in the Semantics of Soteriological Terms. London, 1967.

Hobart, Medical Language W. K. Hobart. The Medical Language of St. Luke: A Proof from Internal Evidence that "The Gospel According to St. Luke" and "The Acts of the Apostles" Were Written by the Same Person, and that the Writer Was a Medical Man. London-Dublin, 1882. Reprint Grand Rapids, 1954.

Hohlwein, Termes techniques N. Hohlwein. Recueil des termes techniques relatifs aux institutions politiques et administratives de l'Égypte romaine. Brussels, 1912.

Hugedé, Colossiens N. Hugedé. Commentaire de l'Épître aux Colossiens. Geneva, 1968.

- Hugedé, Ephésiens N. Hugedé. L'Épître aux Ephésiens. Geneva, 1974.
- Hughes, Hebrews P. E. Hughes. A Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews. Grand Rapids, 1977.
- Jacquier, Actes E. Jacquier. Les Actes des Apôtres. 2d ed. Paris, 1926.
- Jeremias, Abba J. Jeremias. Abba: Studien zur neutestamentlichen Theologie und Zeitgeschichte. Göttingen, 1966. ET The Prayers of Jesus. Naperville, 1967.
- Jeremias, Eucharistic Words J. Jeremias. The Eucharistic Words of Jesus. Trans. N. Perrin from 3d German ed. New York, 1966.
- Jeremias, Jerusalem J. Jeremias. Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus: An Investigation into Economic and Social Conditions during the New Testament Period. Philadelphia, 1969. (ET of Jérusalem au temps de Jésus, Paris, 1967.)
- Jeremias, Parables J. Jeremias. The Parables of Jesus. Trans. S. H. Hooke. 2d ed. New York, 1972.
- Joly, Genres de vie R. Joly. Le Thème philosophique des genres de vie dans l'antiquité classique. Brussels, 1956.
- Jouguet, Vie municipale P. Jouguet. La Vie municipale dans l'Égypte romaine. Paris, 1911. Reprint 1968.
- Kaibel, Comicorum Graecorum Fragmenta G. Kaibel. Comicorum Graecorum Fragmenta. Berlin, 1899. Reprint Berlin, 1958—.
- Kakride, Notion de l'amitié H. I. Kakride. La Notion de l'amitié et de l'hospitalité chez Homère. Thessaloníki, 1963.
- Lagrange, Galates M. J. Lagrange. Saint Paul: Épître aux Galates. 2d ed. Paris, 1926.
- Lagrange, Jean M. J. Lagrange. Évangile selon saint Jean. Paris, 1925.
- Lagrange, Luc M. J. Lagrange. Évangile selon saint Luc. 3d ed. Paris, 1927.
- Lagrange, Marc M. J. Lagrange. Évangile selon saint Marc. 4th ed. Paris, 1929.

Lagrange, Matthieu M. J. Lagrange. Évangile selon saint Matthieu. 7th ed. Paris, 1948.

Lagrange, Romains M. J. Lagrange. St. Paul: Épître aux Romains. Paris, 1931.

Landfester, "Philos" M. Landfester. Das griechische Nomen "philos" und seine Ableitungen. Hildesheim, 1966.

Lattimore, Epitaphs R. Lattimore. Themes in Greek and Latin Epitaphs. Urbana, 1942.

Launey, Armées hellénistiques M. Launey. Recherches sur les armées hellénistiques. 2 vols. Paris, 1949–1950. Reprint with addenda 1987.

Leenhardt, Romans F. J. Leenhardt. The Epistle to the Romans: A Commentary. Trans. H. Knight. Cleveland-New York, 1961. (ET of L'Épître de saint Paul aux Romains, Neuchâtel-Paris, 1957; 2d ed., Geneva, 1981.)

Mandilaras, Verb B. G. Mandilaras [V. G. Mandelaras]. The Verb in the Greek Non-Literary Papyri. Athens, 1973.

Marrou, History of Education H. I. Marrou. A History of Education in Antiquity. Trans. G. Lamb. New York, 1956. Reprint Madison, Wis., 1982. (ET of Histoire de l'éducation dans l'antiquité, Paris, 1948.)

Martin, Architecture grecque R. Martin. Manuel d'architecture grecque. Paris, 1965–.

Martin, Carmen Christi R. P. Martin. Carmen Christi: Philippians ii. 5-11 in Recent Interpretation and in the Setting of Early Christian Worship. London, 1967.

Mayser, Grammatik E. Mayser. Grammatik der griechischen Papyri aus der Ptolemäerzeit. Leipzig, 1906. 2d ed., Berlin, 1970–. [Now see F. T. Gignac, A Grammar of the Greek Papyri of the Roman and Byzantine Periods. Milan, 1976–.]

Mélanges Rigaux Mélanges bibliques en hommage au R. P. Bédé Rigaux. Ed. A. Descamps and A. de Halleux. Gembloux, 1970.

Mélanges Tisserant Mélanges Eugène Tisserant. 7 vols. Vatican City, 1964.

Moule, Birth of the NT C. F. D. Moule. The Birth of the New Testament. 3d ed. New York, 1982.

Moule, Idiom Book C. F. D. Moule. An Idiom Book of New Testament Greek. Cambridge, 1953.

Moulton & Howard, Grammar J. H. Moulton and W. F. Howard. A Grammar of New Testament Greek. 4 vols. Edinburgh, 1908–1976.

Mugler, Terminologie géométrique C. Mugler. Dictionnaire historique de la terminologie géométrique des Grecs. 2 vols in 1. Paris, 1958–1959.

Mugler, Terminologie optique C. Mugler. Dictionnaire historique de la terminologie optique des Grecs: Douze siècles de dialogues avec la lumière. Paris, 1964.

Murphy O'Connor, Paul on Preaching J. Murphy O'Connor. Paul on Preaching. New York, 1963.

Mussies, Dio Chrysostom G. Mussies. Dio Chrysostom and the New Testament: Parallels collected by G. Mussies. Leiden, 1972.

Musurillo, Acta Alexandrinorum H. Musurillo. Acta Alexandrinorum: De Mortibus Alexandriae Nobilium Fragmenta Papyracea Graeca. Leipzig, 1961.

Musurillo, Christian Martyrs H. Musurillo. The Acts of the Christian Martyrs. Oxford, 1972.

Musurillo, Pagan Martyrs H. Musurillo. The Acts of the Pagan Martyrs [translation of Acta Alexandrinorum with notes and commentary]. Oxford, 1954.

Nägeli, Wortschatz T. Nägeli. Der Wortschatz des Apostels Paulus: Beitrag zur sprachgeschichtlichen Erforschung des Neuen Testaments. Göttingen, 1905.

Orlandos, Technique architecturale A. Orlandos. Les Matériaux de construction et la technique architecturale des anciens Grecs. Paris, 1966.

Panagopoulos, Vocabulaire C. Panagopoulos. "Vocabulaire et mentalité dans le Moralia de Plutarque," in Dialogues d'histoire ancienne, vol. 3, Besancon-Paris, 1977.

Pelekidis, Ephébie attique C. Pelekidis. Histoire de l'éphébie attique des origines à 31 avant Jésus-Christ. Paris, 1962.

Pelletier, Josèphe adaptateur A. Pelletier. Flavius Josèphe, adaptateur de la Lettre d'Aristée. Paris, 1962.

Plummer, Second Corinthians A. Plummer. A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Second Epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians. Edinburgh-New York, 1915. Reprint 1948.

Préaux, Economie royale C. Préaux. L'Economie royale des Lagides. Brussels, 1939.

Preisigke, Wörterbuch F. Preisigke. Wörterbuch der griechischen Papyrusurkunden, mit Einschluss der griechischen Inschriften, Aufschriften, Ostraka, Mumienbilder usw., aus Ägypten. 5 vols. Berlin, 1925–1971. Supplement. Ed. E. Kiessling. and W. RübSam. Amsterdam, 1969–.

von Rad, Genesis G. von Rad. Genesis. Trans. J. H. Marks. Philadelphia, 1971.

von Rad, OT Theology G. von Rad. Old Testament Theology. Trans. D. M. G. Stalker. 2 vols. New York, 1962–1965.

Redard, Noms grecs en -THΣ, -TIΣ

G. Redard. Les Noms grecs en -THΣ, -TIΣ et principalement en -ITHΣ, -ITΙΣ: Etude philologique et linguistique. Paris, 1949.

Rigaux, Thessaloniens B. Rigaux. Saint Paul: Les Epîtres aux Thessaloniens. Paris-Gembloux, 1956.

Rouffiac, Caractères du grec J. Rouffiac. Recherches sur les caractères du grec dans le Nouveau Testament d'après les Inscriptions de Priène. Paris, 1911.

Schnackenburg, God's Rule R. Schnackenburg. God's Rule and Kingdom. New York, 1963.

Schnackenburg, John R. Schnackenburg. The Gospel according to St. John. Trans. C. Hastings et al. 3 vols. New York, 1990. (ET of Das Johannes-Evangelium, Freiburg-Basel, 1971.)

Schürmann, Lukasevangelium H. Schürmann. Das Lukasevangelium. Freiburg-Basel-Vienna, 1969–.

Sherwin-White, Roman Society and Roman Law in the New Testament A. N. Sherwin-White. Roman Society and Roman Law in the New Testament. Oxford, 1963. Reprint Grand Rapids, 1978.

Snell, Lexikon B. Snell et al. Lexikon des frühgriechischen Epos. Göttingen, 1955–.

Spicq, Agapè C. Spicq. Agapè dans le Nouveau Testament: Analyse des textes. 3 vols. Paris, 1958–1959. ET (but without the notes) Agape in the New Testament. St. Louis, 1965.

Spicq, Agapè: Prolégomènes Spicq, C. Agapè: Prolégomènes à une étude de théologie néo-testamentaire. Louvain-Leiden, 1955.

Spicq, Charité et liberté C. Spicq. Charité et liberté dans le Nouveau Testament. Paris, 1964. ET Charity and Liberty in the New Testament. Trans. F. V. Manning. Staten Island, N.Y., 1965.

Spicq, Dieu et l'homme C. Spicq. Dieu et l'homme selon le Nouveau Testament. Paris, 1961.

Spicq, Epîtres aux Corinthiens C. Spicq. Epîtres aux Corinthiens. Paris, 1947.

Spicq, Epîtres de saint Pierre C. Spicq. Les Epîtres de saint Pierre. Paris, 1966.

Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales C. Spicq. Saint Paul: Les Epîtres Pastorales. 4th ed. 2 vols. Paris, 1969.

Spicq, Hébreux C. Spicq. L'Epître aux Hébreux. Paris, 1953.

Spicq, Justice C. Spicq. La Justice. Paris, 1935.

Spicq, Péchés d'injustice C. Spicq. Saint Thomas d'Aquin: Les Péchés d'injustice. Paris-Tournai-Rome, 1934

Spicq, Théologie morale C. Spicq. Théologie morale du Nouveau Testament. Paris, 1965.

Spicq, Vie chrétienne C. Spicq. Vie chrétienne et pérégrination selon le Nouveau Testament. Paris, 1972.

Spicq, Vie morale C. Spicq. Vie morale et Trinité sainte selon Saint Paul. Paris, 1957. ET The Trinity and Our Moral Life according to St. Paul. Trans. Sister Marie Aquinas. Westminster, Md., 1963 = Saint Paul and Christian Living. Dublin, 1964.

Swiderek, Propriété foncière A. Swiderek. La Propriété foncière dans l'Égypte de Vespasien. Warsaw, 1960.

Taillardat, Images d'Aristophane J. Taillardat. Les Images d'Aristophane: Etudes de langue et de style. Paris, 1962.

Taubenschlag, Opera Minora R. Taubenschlag. Opera Minora. 2 vols. Warsaw-Paris, 1959.

Taubenschlag, Law of Greco-Roman Egypt R. Taubenschlag. The Law of Greco-Roman Egypt in the Light of the Papyri, 332 B.C.–640 A.D. 2d ed., rev. and enlarged. Warsaw, 1955.

Trench, Synonyms R. C. Trench. Synonyms of the New Testament. 12th ed. 2 vols. London, 1894.

de Vaux, Ancient Israel R. de Vaux. Ancient Israel: Its Life and Institutions. Trans. J. McHugh. New York, 1961. (ET of Les Institutions de l'Ancien Testament, Paris, 1958.)

Vögtle, Tugend- und Lasterkataloge A. Vögtle. Die Tugend- und Lasterkataloge im Neuen Testament: Exegetisch, religions- und formgeschichtlich Untersucht. Münster, 1936.

Wettstein J. J. Wettstein. Novum Testamentum. Post priores Steph. Curcellaei. . . . Amsterdam, 1735.

Ysebaert, Greek Baptismal Terminology J. Ysebaert. Greek Baptismal Terminology: Its Origins and Early Development. Nijmegen, 1962.

Zerwick, Biblical Greek M. Zerwick. Biblical Greek: Illustrated by Examples. Adapted from the 4th Latin ed. of Graecitas Biblica by Joseph Smith. Rome, 1963. Reprint 1983.

ABBREVIATIONS: PERIODICALS

Aeg Aegyptus

AJP American Journal of Philology

AnBib Analecta Biblica

Ang Angelicum

Anton Antonianum

APF Archiv für Papyrusforschung

ASTI Annual of the Swedish Theological Institute

ATR Anglican Theological Review

BAGB Bulletin de l'association G. Budé

BASOR Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research

BASP Bulletin of the American Society of Papyrologists

BCH Bulletin de correspondance hellénique

BerlSitzb Sitzungsberichte der Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften

Bib Biblica

BIFAO Bulletin de l'institute français d'archéologie orientale

BJRL Bulletin of the John Rylands University Library of Manchester

BSac Bibliotheca Sacra

BSOAS Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies

BZ Biblische Zeitschrift

CBQ Catholic Biblical Quarterly

ChrEg Chronique d'Égypte

ConNT Coniectanea neotestamentica

CP Classical Philology

CTM Concordia Theological Monthly

DHA Dialogues d'histoire ancienne

DivThom Divus Thomas

EPap Etudes de papyrologie

EstBib Estudios bíblicos

ETL Ephemerides theologicae lovanienses

ETR Etudes théologiques et religieuses

EvQ Evangelical Quarterly

ExpT Expository Times

GRBS Greek, Roman, and Byzantine Studies

Hellenica Hellenica: Recueil d'épigraphie, de numismatique et d'antiquités grecques

HibJ Hibbert Journal

HTR Harvard Theological Review

HUCA Hebrew Union College Annual

ITQ Irish Theological Quarterly

JAC Jahrbuch für Antike und Christentum

JBL Journal of Biblical Literature

JEA Journal of Egyptian Archeology

JHS Journal of Hellenic Studies

JJP Journal of Juristic Papyrology

JQR Jewish Quarterly Review

JRS Journal of Roman Studies

JSJ Journal for the Study of Judaism in the Persian, Hellenistic and Roman Period

JSS Journal of Semitic Studies

JTS Journal of Theological Studies

LTP Laval théologique et philosophique

MTZ Münchener theologische Zeitschrift

MusHelv Museum Helveticum

*NJahrb Neue Jahrbücher für das klassische Altertum (1898–1925);
Neue Jahrbücher für Wissenschaft und Jugendbildung (1925–1936)*

NKZ Neue kirchliche Zeitschrift

NovT Novum Testamentum

NRT La nouvelle revue théologique

NTS New Testament Studies

OTS Oudtestamentische Studiën

RArch Revue archéologique

RB Revue biblique

REA Revue des études anciennes

RechPap Recherches de papyrologie

REG Revue des études grecques

REJ Revue des études juives

RevistB Revista bíblica

RevPhil Revue de philologie

RevQ Revue de Qumran

RevThom Revue thomiste

RHDFE Revue historique du droit français et étranger

RhMus Rheinisches Museum

RHPR Revue d'histoire et de philosophie religieuses

RHR Revue de l'histoire des religions

RIDA Revue internationale des droits de l'antiquité

RQ Römische Quartalschrift für christliche Altertumskunde und Kirchengeschichte

RSPT Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques

RSR Recherches des science religieuses

RTL Revue théologique de Louvain

RTP Revue de théologie et de philosophie

RTQR Revue de théologie et des questions religieuses

ScEccl Sciences ecclésiastiques

ScEs Science et esprit

Scr Scripture

SE Studia Evangelica (in Texte und Untersuchungen)

SEÅ Svensk exegetisk Årsbok

Sem Semitica

SJT Scottish Journal of Theology

SP Studia Patristica

SPap Studia Papyrologica

ST Studia Theologica

TAPA Transactions of the American Philological Association

TLZ Theologische Literaturzeitung

TQ Theologische Quartalschrift

TS Theological Studies

TSK Theologische Studien und Kritiken

TTZ Trierer theologische Zeitschrift

TZ Theologische Zeitschrift

VC Vigiliae Christianae

VD Verbum Domini

VSpir Vie spirituelle

VT Vetus Testamentum

VTSup Vetus Testamentum Supplements

YCS Yale Classical Studies

ZAW Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft

ZKT Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie

ZNW Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft

ZPE Zeitschrift für Papyrologie und Epigraphik

ZST Zeitschrift für systematische Theologie

ZTK Zeitschrift für Theologie und Kirche

ZWKL Zeitschrift für Wissenschaft und kirchliches Leben

ἀγαθοποιέω, ἀγαθωσύνη

agathopoieo, to do good; agathosyne, goodness

agathopoieo, S 15; TDNT 1.17–18; EDNT 1.4–5; NIDNTT 2.98, 100, 102; L&N 88.3; BAGD 2 | agathosyne, S 19; TDNT 1.18; EDNT 1.7; NIDNTT 2.98, 100–101; MM 1; L&N 57.109, 88.1; BAGD 3

Classical Greek and Koine had different formulas for saying “do something good,”¹ but it was the LXX—translating the hiphil of yatab — then the *Letter of Aristeas*² and the NT that were the first to use the combined form agathopoieo, unknown in the papyri.

In the OT, it refers to the performance of a good deed toward another,³ either by God or by a human.⁴ Thus Wis 1:12 juxtaposes “do good” and “do evil,” just as the Lord asks whether it is permitted on the Sabbath to do good or to do evil—agathopoiesai or kakopoiesai —to save a life or to take a life (Luke 6:9). In its first occurrence in the Sermon on the Mount, the verb, used with an object in the accusative, has the same sense: to render good in return for good.⁵ In Luke 6:35, however, it has a theological significance: “Love your enemies, do good,” because agathopoieite explicates agapate and shows that agape love, when seen clearly and in action, manifests itself in doing good; the context proves that this type of love is proper to the sons of God.⁶

On the other hand, if the four usages of agathopoieo in 1Peter all have a religious meaning, since they refer the doing of good to the will of God and to God’s grace,⁷ the accent is not so much on the charity that gives and forgives, but on the virtue (cf. Gal 6:9-10), which is the virtue of servants who do well that which they ought to do⁸ or of wives who are faithful to the obligations attaching to their position (1Pet 3:6). Doing good is opposed to doing evil (2:14; 3:17), transgressing (2:20).

In the same way, the noun agathopoiia refers to an upright moral life: “Let those who suffer according to the will of God entrust their souls to the faithful Creator in their doing of good.”⁹ Far from losing heart, or being paralyzed by panic, in these last days, Christians will occupy themselves with doing their best (cf. Eccl 9:10), seeking to fulfill the requirements of order and of justice: staying in their place, carrying out the responsibilities appropriate to their gender, their social status, and their function within the community (1Pet 4:10; 5:2), having good morals, doing nothing blameworthy or mean. In short, their manner of life, their conduct (anastrophe; 1:15, 18; 2:12; 3:1, 2, 16), should be commendable and appealing to pagans.¹⁰

If Christians are marked by their good conduct, they will be known as an honest persons, agathopoiioi: governors are appointed “to punish evildoers (kakopoiion) and to praise doers of good” (1Pet 2:14). This adjective, which places the beneficent or charming woman in contrast to the poneria of the man in Sir 42:14, is attested only in three late papyri.¹¹

Closely related to agathopoïia is agathosyne, a strictly biblical term, unknown in secular Greek and in the papyri.¹² Its meaning is doubtful. Used more than a dozen times in the LXX (tôb-tobah), it refers to the beneficence that someone has shown (Judg 8:35; 2Chr 24:16), to kind generosity (Neh 9:25, 35), to moral goodness,¹³ to well-being and happiness.¹⁴ It is used in the New Testament only by St. Paul, who sees it as a gift of God (2Thess 1:11), a fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5:22) and of the light.¹⁵ This would be first of all goodwill or the intention to do that which is good, linked with the power of faith to accomplish it (2Thess 1:11); then a right disposition of the soul, which we would call “kind feelings,”¹⁶ and which characterizes the person who is agathos, morally correct. This person’s excellence is seen in all areas: “in all goodness, justice, and truth” (Eph 5:9). But in the list of virtues in Gal 5:22, agathosyne comes between chrestotes and faithfulness; it no longer means moral goodness so much as goodness of heart. St. Jerome made this excellent comment: “Kindness or mellowness—the two senses of the Greek chrestotes —is a sweet, caressing, quiet virtue, disposed to sharing all of its goods; it invites familiarity; it is sweet in its words, steady in its ways. The Stoics briefly define it as a virtue naturally given to doing good. Goodness per se (agathosyne) is not far removed from kindness, because it also is given to doing good. The difference is that goodness can be a bit somber and have knitted brows and an austere moral tone, doubtless doing good and giving what is asked of it, but without being mellow in its dealings or drawing everyone in with its sweetness.”¹⁷ Thus agathosyne will always take care to obtain for others that which is useful or beneficial, but it can have a stern side and apply itself to correcting and punishing; kindness adds to this basic and active goodness a shading of cordiality and sweetness (cf. Eph 4:32; Col 3:12).

¹ —Αγαθὸν ποιει—ν (Matt 19:16), καλὸν ποιει—ν (Jas 4:17), καλω—ς ποιει—ν (Luke 6:27), εὖ ποιει—ν (Mark 14:7), ἔργον ἀγαθόν (2Cor 9:8); cf. C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, vol. 2, pp. 676ff.

² Ep. Arist. 242: He must pray God to shower them with all good things, πάντα ἀγαθοποιει—ν.

³ Num 10:32; Judg 17:13; Tob 12:13 Wis 1:12 1Macc 11:33 2Macc 1:2 cf. T. Benj. 5.2—ε—ὰν ἀγαθοποιούντες καὶ τὰ ἀκάθαρτα πνεύματα φεύξονται ἀφ’ ὑμῶ—ν.

⁴ At Lystra, St. Paul refers to divine Providence as ἀγαθουργῶ—ν (Acts 14:17), and in writing to Timothy he asks him to exhort the rich to do good

(ἀγαθοεργει—ν; 1Tim 6:18). Unlike Attic, Koine, heedless of euphony, does not avoid hiatus in compound words (BDF §124.)

⁵ Luke 6:33—“If you do good to those who do good to you, what credit do you earn for that?”; cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 1, p. 108; W. Grundmann, “Die Bergpredigt nach der Lukafassung,” in K. Aland, F. L. Cross, SE, 1959, pp. 180–189; H. W. Bartsch, “Feldrede und Bergpredigt: Redaktionsarbeit in Luk. VI,” in TZ, 1960, pp. 5–18; H. Kahlefeld, Der Jünger. Eine Auslegung der Rede Lk VI, 20–49, Frankfurt, 1962; B. Rigaux, Témoignage de l’Evangile de Luc, Desclée De Brouwer, 1970, pp. 168ff.

⁶ 3John 11 restates this concept, contrasting ὁ ἀγαθοποιω—ν and ὁ κακοποιω—ν: “Beloved one, do not imitate the evil, but the good. The one who does good is of God. The one who does evil has not seen God.”

⁷ 1Pet 2:15, 20; 3:6, 17; cf. 4:19; this is a key word of the epistle, cf. W. C. van Unnik, “The Teaching of Good Works,” in NTS, vol. 1, 1954, pp. 92–110; idem, “A Classical Parallel to I Petr. II, 14 and 20,” ibid., vol. 2, 1956, pp. 198–202 (making reference to Diodorus Siculus, 15.1.1; cf. 11.46.1; for 1Pet 2:15, G. Mussies, Dio Chrysostom, p. 236 gives as parallels Dio Chrysostom 4.58; 13.13; 69.7); C. Crowther, “Works, Work and Good Works,” in ExpT, vol. 81, 1970, pp. 166–172.

⁸ 1Pet 2:20; cf. S. Daris, Un Nuovo Frammento della Prima Lettera di Pietro (1Pet 2:20-3:12), Barcelona, 1967.

⁹ 1Pet 4:19. Because verse 18 has touched on the perfection of the judgment of God, one may include in ἀγαθοποιΐα the works of mercy, according to Matt 25:31-46; Acts 9:36; Heb 13:16. Cf. T. Jos. 18.2—καὶ ε—άν τις θέλει κακοποιῆσαι ὑμα—ς ἡμει—ς τῇ ἀγαθοεργείᾳ εὐχεσθε ὑπὲρ αὐτοῦ; Epictetus 4.1.122: “It is human nature to do good, to be useful to others.”

¹⁰ Cf. C. Spicq, Epîtres de saint Pierre, pp. 11, 27f. In Clement of Rome, agathopoiia sums up morality, 1Clem. 2.2; 2.7; 33.1: “What shall we do? Become idle in doing good and forsake agape ?”; 34.2: “We must be eager to do good.” Agathopoiia in 1Pet could be cited as a NT acknowledgement of natural law ethics.

¹¹ Two magical papyri of the fourth century AD, where ἀγαθοποιός is anastrological term meaning “auguring good, favorable”; P.Lond. 46, 48: μετὰ ἀγαθοποιω—ν (referring to stars whose influence is favorable); 122, 16 qualifying Hermes: ἀγαθοποιεῖ τῆς οἰ—κομένης. Stud.Pal. XX, 293, II, 8, which opposes ἀγαθ. to κακοποιός, is from the Byzantine era. According to Plutarch, Osiris is εὐεργέτης and ἀγαθοποιός (Isis and Osiris 12 and 42; commented on by H. Preisker, Die urchristliche Botschaft von der Liebe Gottes, Gießen, 1930, pp. 11ff.). Proclus describes Jupiter and Venus similarly.

¹² It is a derivative of ἀγαθός, like ἀγαθότης, which is unknown in the New Testament, cf. P.Ryl. 619, 6; Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 27.

¹³ Ps 52:3—“You prefer the evil to the good”; cf. Neh 13:31.

¹⁴ Eccl 4:8; 5:10, 17; 6:3, 6; 7:14; 9:18.

¹⁵ Eph 5:9, where some manuscripts, including P46, read πνεύματος instead of φωτός.

¹⁶ Rom 15:14. The variant of F, G, and the Latin manuscripts, ἀγαπῆς, does not deserve to be considered.

¹⁷ Jerome, In Ep. ad Gal. 5.22; PL 26, 420. The distinction that J. B. Lightfoot wanted to establish between these terms, corresponding to that between benevolentia and beneficentia (with ἀγαθωσύνη connoting more realization) doesn't account for actual usage (Saint Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, 8th ed., London, 1884, p. 213). The only possible NT translation in English is “goodness” (cf. E. De Witt Burton, The Epistle to the Galatians, 2d ed., Edinburgh, 1948, p. 316).

ἀγανακτέω, ἀγανάκτησις

aganakteo, to be indignant; aganaktēsis, indignation

aganakteo, S 23; EDNT 1.8; MM 1; L&N 88.187; BDF §229(2); BAGD 4 | aganaktēsis, S 24; EDNT 1.8; MM 1; L&N 88.186; BAGD 4

The etymology of these “emotional” terms has not been established.¹ Common in the Hellenistic period, especially in literary Greek, they are rare in the classics, where they express the idea of bubbling and fermenting, first in the physical sense,² then with respect to the soul that “is seething and irritated” like the gums of a person who is cutting teeth (Plato, Phdr. 251 c); “wailing with grief and roaring with anger”;³ “I am outraged at this encounter; my intestines are seething because I have to reply to this man” (Aristophanes, Ran. 1006; cf. Vesp. 287). Sometimes it is a case of mere discontent (Xenophon, Hell. 5.3.11), usually of indignation (Plato, Ep.

7.349d; Plutarch, Cam. 28.5; Diodorus Siculus 4.63.3), and especially anger.⁴

The three occurrences of the verb in the LXX have a stronger meaning. Expressing God's punishment of his enemies: "the waves of the sea rage (or boil) against them" (Wis 5:22); "in their suffering they became incensed at those whom they had taken for gods."⁵ The connotations are quite varied in Philo and Josephus, first of all with respect to the subjects of the indignation: everyone, the people, even servants and slaves.⁶ But this emotion is often personalized: Laban is irritated (Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.20), as are a seer (Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.204), the leading people of Daphne (War 1.245), members of the Sanhedrin (Ant. 14.179) and of the senate (P.Oxy. 1119, 8), the king (Philo, Moses 1.236, 292, 328; cf. Rewards 77; Josephus, Ant. 2.284; War 1.564), Tiberias (2.180), Titus (5.554; 6.352), Vespasian (4.189), etc. God himself is angry at the outrages committed by the Sodomites (Ant. 1.202) and "when people scorn the gifts that he gives them."⁷ There is, after all, such a thing as legitimate indignation (Philo, Decalogue 112; Moses 1.244; Spec. Laws 3.42), as against an inhumane proceeding (Josephus, War 2.415), "violation of the holy places, pillage, and murder" (4.162), indignation "on behalf of the temple at Jerusalem" (Ant. 13.77), assaults (Philo, Husbandry 117) and murders (Moses 1.45), curses (Decalogue 75), defamation (Flacc. 35), and insulting behavior (To Gaius 361).

As the subject of and reason for the emotion varies, aganakteo and aganaktesis take on varying connotations. An individual can be merely displeased⁸ or peeved (Josephus, War 1.564), but usually anger and rage are meant;⁹ indignation "that a person would claim for himself the honor due to God" (Philo, Dreams 2.99, 197), fury.¹⁰ Once a person's emotions are stirred up (Josephus, War 1.471) and he is seething with indignation (1.438) or upset (6.203), he is unable to master his irritation (1.449), explodes (2.604), and—like Tiron "in his excessive fury" (1.544)—goes mad.

In the Gospels, aganakteo never means indignation or displeasure¹¹ but anger. When the mother of Zebedee's two sons asks that they be seated at Jesus' left and right, "the ten, when they heard, were angry at the two brothers" (Matt 20:24, eganaktesan peri; Mark 10:41). The leading priests and scribes, seeing the wonders worked by Jesus and the way in which the children were praising him, "became irritated" (Matt 21:15), as the ruler of the synagogue was angry at Jesus' violation of the law of Sabbath rest (Luke 13:14, aganakton hoti) and as Jesus himself "became angry" when his disciples forbade parents to bring their children to him.¹²

The substantive aganaktesis appears only once in the NT, regarding the repentance of the Corinthians who had rebelled against the apostle's authority but whose regret was reported by Titus. Alla aganaktessin is usually translated "what indignation" (2Cor 7:11), referring to their feeling about their offense; but we are to understand that they felt horror at what they had done. Today we would say “they were distraught” at their blindness.

¹ P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique, p. 7; cf. B. G. Mandilaras, Verb, n. 892; J. Holt, Les Noms d'action en -ΣΙΣ (-ΤΙΣ), Aarhus, 1940.

² Hippocrates, Liqu. 2.5: “the chest and the stomach, when penetrated by cold, become irritated and cause fatal accidents”; with respect to wine, Plutarch, Quaest. conv. 8.10.734 e.

³ Plato, Phd. 117 d; 63 b–c: irritated at death; 64; Plato, Euthd. 283 d.

⁴ Plato, Lach. 194 a: “I am angry” (ἀγανακτω—); Thucydides 8.43.4; “Tissaphernes was indignant and left them in anger”; P.Lond. 1367, 3 (eighth century).

⁵ Wis 12:27; Bel 28 (Theodotion): “the Babylonians were terribly indignant.” In the papyri, where the verb is sometimes used with ὅτι (P.Bon. 15, 11, edict of Caracalla; P.Ryl. 625, 3), περί (P.Berl.Zill. 8, 11), κατά (P.Fouad 87, 17), and especially ἐ—πί (P.Alex. 2, 14; P.Lond. 44, 20; vol. 1, p. 34; SB 6711, 21; 7464, 14), the meaning is sometimes weakened: “do not be troubled” (P.Mich. 107, 7: Zeno’s correspondence; BGU 1881, 6); sometimes it becomes rather official: in a rescript of Augustus in 6 BC, Asinius Gallus, governor of the province of Asia, seems to detest crime in an unnatural way, “becoming angry, as you did, not against these men who deserved it all . . . but against people who may have been unfortunate in their defense, but who had done no wrong” (Dittenberger, Syl. 780, 35; cf. P.Thead. 15, 10; P.Oxy. 1119, 8). It is pretty much a stock expression among lawyers: Antiphon, 3 Tetr. 2.1: “I have the right, it seems to me, to be angry”; Andocides, C. Alcib. 4.18: “I am incensed when I think that . . .”; Lysias, C. Sim. 3.3: “Most of all, I resent Simon’s forcing me to speak on so delicate a topic”; Isocrates, Big. 16.49: “I am especially incensed if I am to be punished by the very one whom I myself should be punishing.” On the other hand, when an Egyptian woman poured water into the street where Heracleides was walking, he was “irritated” and reproached her (P.Magd. 24, 5; second century BC). The count John, hearing the complaints of three brothers of the monastery of Stratonikis against their superior Jeremias “flew into a rage against the same Jeremias” (P.Fouad 87, 17). For the substantive ἀγανάκτησις, an erroneous variant in A and B at Esth 8:12 i and a NT hapax (2Cor 7:11), the only parallel cited by Moulton-Milligan is P.Grenf. II, 81, 17 (fifth century; cf. P.Cair.Masp. 202, 2); hardly anything else can be added apart from P.Michael. 32, 5 (Byzantine period).

⁶ Philo, Husbandry 117; Spec. Laws 2.80; 3.119: “We must be angry against those who take the lives of newborns”; Philo, Flacc. 141: “everyone was unhappy”; To Gaius 361; Josephus, War 2.20: “the people, incensed at this conduct”; 2.42, 170, 175, 225, 293; 4.342: “everyone was irritated at the judges”; Ant. 13.368; 20.120; in Gos. Pet. 14, when Jesus’ executioners heard the repentant thief confess Jesus as Savior, they “were irritated at him.”

⁷ Josephus, War 3.371; Ant. 8.360; Ag. Apion 1.306: the god Ammon was angry at impure and impious people; Philo, Spec. Laws 2.11: “God himself would be irritated to hear such things uttered”; 4Macc 4:21—“divine justice, irritated at these crimes.” Andocides, Myst. 1.139: “I think that the gods would be quite irritated and indignant to see humans trying to lose those whom they had saved.”

⁸ Josephus, War 1.471, 508, 546; 2.526, 598; Ant. 7.212; 16.386; 20.126.

⁹ Philo, Unchang. God 68; Worse Attacks Better 69; Decalogue 75; Moses 1.45; Marcus Aurelius 7.66: without becoming angry. When they become irritated, princes prepare to make war (Josephus, War 1.133, 137), to kill (2.631), to imprison (2.180). Private individuals exchange insults and come to blows (3.439; 6.108, 203, 302; Ag. Apion 1.204). Cf. Thucydides 2.41.3: “Only our city never provoked the irritation of the enemies that attacked it.”

¹⁰ Josephus, Ant. 4.126: Balak was furious at not being blessed by the Israelites; 6.97: the Philistines were furious at the affront; 6.177: David was furious at the Philistines and wanted to do battle; 7.120, 206; 10.173; 13.292; 14.182; Ant. 20.193; War 4.541: “in his excessive fury, it would not have taken much for him to taste the flesh of his victims”; Numenius, frag. 26.62: the owner, fooled by his slaves, “became furious.”

¹¹ The only exception is Matt 26:8—when Mary of Bethany anointed Jesus, the disciples expressed their displeasure (“Why this waste?” cf. Mark 14:4).

¹² Mark 10:14. Cf. S. Légasse, Jésus et l’enfant, Paris, 1969, pp. 187ff.

ἀγάπη

agape, love

agape, S 26; TDNT 1.21–55; EDNT 1.8–12; NIDNTT 2.538–551; MM 2; L&N 23.28, 25.43; BDF §163; BAGD 5–6; ND 4.258–259

The etymology of agapao is obscure. E. Boisacq and E. Stauffer offer no verdict,¹ Blass and Debrunner say not a word,² E. Risch and H. J. Mette admit their ignorance, as does P. Chantraine.³ A. Ceresa-Gastaldo suggests a link to the Sanskrit pa with the sense of shelter or protect, and an analogy with the Greek posis.⁴ A. Carnoy posits the primitive meaning “greet in a friendly manner” and goes back to the Indo-European ghabh, in Sanskrit gabhasti, “hand,” with reference to the Homeric Greeks, who took each other’s hand as a sign of friendship.⁵ I myself would be tempted to trace this verb to the root aga, “very”; we know that the Greek age means “admiration, astonishment.”⁶ Hence, no doubt, the first usages of this term in the sense of welcome: the surprise of the host who receives a stranger. At any rate, the only adequate translation is “love in the sense of charity”; in Latin, caritas or dilectio.⁷

The Greeks had four terms for expressing the major senses of love.⁸ First, storge (stergo) refers either to the tender feelings that parents naturally feel toward their children⁹ or children toward their siblings and parents, or to the bond that unites husband and wife,¹⁰ and also takes in sympathy for friends and compatriots.¹¹ Eros (erao), no doubt derived from an ancient neuter eras,¹² is not found in the New Testament; it expresses above all unreasoning passion and desire (an alogos orexis), the desire of the wolf for the sheep.¹³ Although it is often used with no negative connotation, this word for a type of covetousness can hardly express a love that is specifically divine, if only because it does not inspire respect.¹⁴

Friendship or amity (philia, phileo) moves on an entirely different plane,¹⁵ even though it often refers to affection pure and simple, attachment, sympathy, always marked by a kindly attitude, and good will. But the Greek philosophers, especially Aristotle, turned it into a very elaborate concept. Strictly speaking, friendship wants reciprocity, does not take root except within a defined group of persons—thus we refer to “a pair of friends”—and above all between persons of the same standing: amicitia pares aut invenit aut facit.¹⁶ If, then, in certain usages phileo is very close to agapao,¹⁷ the former verb was hardly appropriate for expressing a love that unites God and humans and extends even to enemies,¹⁸ especially since the noun agape did not enter literary usage, except in the LXX, before the first century.

So what does agape mean in the NT?¹⁹ It is the most rational kind of love, inasmuch as it involves recognition and judgment of value, whence its frequent nuance of “preference.”²⁰ The verb agapao most often means “value, set great store by, hold in high esteem”;²¹ it is a love with deep respect (1Pet 2:17), which often goes along with admiration and can become adoration.²² This esteem and goodwill tend to be expressed in appropriate words and deeds.²³ Unlike other loves, which can remain hidden in the heart, it is essential to charity to manifest itself, to demonstrate itself, to provide proofs, to put itself on display;²⁴ so much so that in the NT it would almost always be necessary to translate agape as “demonstration of love.”²⁵ This affection—unlike eros, which in the literature brings endless suffering and disaster²⁶—is accompanied by contentment, since the ordinary meaning of agapao is to be happy, satisfied.²⁷ But in Christian usage, since it is a divine love, coming from heaven (Rom 5:5), it will be joyful and already a foretaste of blessedness.²⁸

Finally, and perhaps above all, while friendship is properly used only of a relationship between equals, agape links persons of different conditions: with rulers, benefactors, and fathers; it is a disinterested and generous love, full of thoughtfulness and concern. It is in this sense that God is agape and loves the world.²⁹ With those who are indebted, for inferiors, for subjects, this agape, which is first of all consent, welcome, acceptance,³⁰ is expressed in gratitude:³¹ it is the love inspired in turn by generous love—which is the meaning in 1John 4:10—and it is translated into acclaim, applause, tokens of respect, congratulations, praises,³² and even veneration,³³ so that Christian agape is expressed in liturgy and worship: “To the one who loves us . . . to him be the glory and the power for ever and ever” (To agaponti hemas . . . auto he doxa kai to kratos eis tous aionas ton aionon, Rev 1:5-6).

The verb agapao makes its first appearance in Homer, and agapesis is used in the classical period, but the noun agape is unknown before its usage in the LXX. When it is attested before the Christian era,³⁴ it is almost exclusively in Hellenic Judaism, and in each case it has a religious meaning.³⁵ One is inclined to think that it is not a biblical neologism but was borrowed by the inspired writers from the popular language of Egypt. In any case, contrary to what is often written, no certain attestation is available in any papyrus from the pre-Christian era.

P.Berlin 9869, an unintelligible fragment,³⁶ has often been cited: en tois malista agapes. But not only do the editors point the final sigma as doubtful, but they also put a question mark both after their restoration³⁷ and after the word agape in the index. Actually, the papyrus is mutilated; several letters have to be restored, and one could just as easily read the noun agapeseos, the participle agapesas, or the future agapeseis.³⁸ These verbal forms seem all the more likely since this is a philosophical dialogue, and Aristotle frequently uses mallon or malista agapao.³⁹ Moreover, the date of this papyrus is unknown, and no positive data concerning its date are given.⁴⁰

To this text, which is doubtful, to say the least, E. Stauffer⁴¹ adds P.Paris 49, 3, dated by its editor W. Brunet de Presle to 164–58 BC.⁴² But this citation should be challenged, because after F. Blass aired his doubts on this reading,⁴³ A. Deissmann consulted M. Pierret, conservator of

Egyptian antiquities at the Louvre. The latter, after examining the papyrus, concluded, "One finds in papyrus no. 49 not a trace of the word agape, but only on line 6 something that looks like it reads tarachen."⁴⁴ On the authority of U. Wilcken, I shall adopt this reading: dia te t[on] Sarapin kai ten sen eleuthe_ria Ón kai pepeiramai.⁴⁵

The other texts brought forward are either suspect or of unverifiable date, and E. Peterson has shown that none of them are admissible.⁴⁶ An inscription from Tefeny in Pisidia, from the time of the empire, though the date can be narrowed down no further, reads: penpsei d' eis aga[pe]n se philommeides Apphodeite,⁴⁷ but A. Deissmann has proved that the word must be restored aga[tho]n, not agapen.⁴⁸ In Lib. 13a.3, Philodemus of Gadara (first century BC) wrote philesei kai di' a[g]apes;⁴⁹ but W. Crönert, who had not cited the text without caution in his new edition of F. Passow's Wörterbuch der griechischen Sprache (2d ed., 1912), finally rejects it⁵⁰ in adopting the reading di' agapeseos.⁵¹

P.Oxy. XI, 1380, from the beginning of the second century AD, preserves a list of cultic names attributed in different places to the goddess Isis Polyonymos. In the Egyptian villae of Thonis, she was invoked: e_n Thoni agap[en] . . . Jo.⁵² E. Peterson finds the conjecture unconvincing and reads agap[jeten]. At line 109, the first editors, Grenfell-Hunt (1915) read *A[...]*THN Á-OAON = en Italia agapen theon.⁵³ But G. de Manteuffel, in making a more attentive collation of this papyrus, which is conserved at the Bodleian, observed: "The epithet agape theon is very curious. The word theon does not exist in the manuscript. τ instead of θ is a frequent enough mistake in the papyri. The greatest difficulty is in the division of the word atholos, but perhaps it can be explained in terms of the continuous script."⁵⁴ So the proper restoration is: en Italia a[ga]then atholon.⁵⁵

We must therefore conclude that the term agape, derived from agapao (and not from agapesis) is proper to the Koine. If the LXX gave the word its theological density, it also existed in the pagan language, but it is not attested before the first century AD.⁵⁶ It is nevertheless worth noting the names formed on this root, such as in the second century BC Agapenor, a name similar to that of the founder of the city of Paphos,⁵⁷ Agapomenos at Lindos,⁵⁸ Agapis son of Annianos Neuthenos, near the city of Carthage,⁵⁹ and Agapios.⁶⁰ Among women, we note *Agapema*⁶¹ and of course Agape, which is common but which seems to have been used especially among the higher social classes, as in the second century AD in Phrygia: he kratiste Domna Agape.⁶²

It is important to bring up to date H. Riesenfeld's excellent bibliography on *agape*⁶³ and to complete the one that I myself began almost twenty years ago:⁶⁴

A. H. Armstrong, "Platonic 'Eros' and Christian Agape," in The Downside Review, 1961, pp. 105–121; T. Barrosse, "The Relationship of Love to Faith in St. John," in TS, 1957, pp. 538–559; idem, "Christianity:

Mystery of Love,” in CBQ, 1958, pp. 137–172; idem, Christianity: Mystery of Love, Notre Dame, Indiana, 1964; D. Barsotti, La Révélation de l’amour, Paris, 1957; J. B. Bauer, “. . . ΤΟΙΣ ΑΓΑΠΩΣΙΝ ΤΟΝ ΕΟΝ,” Röm. VIII, 28 (I Cor. II, 9; ICor. VIII, 3),” in ZNW, 1959, pp. 106–112; K. Berger, Die Gesetzesauslegung Jesu, Neukirchen, 1972, pp. 56–257; M. Black, “The Interpretation of Romans VIII, 28,” in Freundesgabe O. Cullmann, Leiden, 1962, pp. 166–172; G. Bornkamm, “Das Doppelgebot der Liebe,” in Gesammelte Aufsätze, vol. 3, Munich, 1968, pp. 37–45; J. W. Bowman, “The Three Imperishables,” in Int, 1959, pp. 433–443; P. I. Bratsiôtis, “Τὸ νόημα τῆς χριστιανικῆς ἀγάπης,” in Epistemonikè Epeteris t. Theol. Scholès, Athens, 1955, pp. 1–3; C. Burchard, “Das doppelte Leibesgebot in der frühen Überlieferung,” in Festschrift J. Jeremias, Göttingen, 1970, pp. 39–62; J. Chmiel, Lumière et charité d’après la première Epître de saint Jean, Rome, 1971; S. Cipriani, “Dio è amore. La dottrina della carità in san Giovanni,” in La Scuola cattolica, 1966, pp. 214–231; A. Colunga, “El amor y la misericordia hacia el prójimo,” in Teologia Espiritual, 1959, pp. 445–462; J. Coppens, “La Doctrine biblique sur l’amour de Dieu et du prochain,” in ETL, 1964, pp. 252–299; idem, “Agapè et Agapan dans les lettres johanniques,” ETL, 1969, pp. 125–127; K.R.J. Cripps, “‘Love Your Neighbor as Yourself’ (Mt. XXII, 39),” in ExpT, vol. 76, 1964, p. 26; J. Deák, Die Gottesliebe in den alten semitischen Religionen, Eperjes, 1914; A. Dihle, Die goldene Regel, Göttingen, 1962; J. Egermann, La charité dans la Bible, Mulhouse, 1963 (popularization); F. Dreyfus, “‘Maintenant, la foi, l’espérance et la charité demeurent toutes les trois’ (I Cor. XIII, 13),” in Studiorum Paulinorum Congressus, Rome, 1963, pp. 403–412; E. Evans, “The Verb ΑΓΑΠΑΝ in the Fourth Gospel,” in F. L. Cross, Studies in the Fourth Gospel, London, 1957, pp. 64–71; A. Feuillet, Le Mystère de l’amour divin dans la théologie johannique, Paris, 1972; E. Fischer, Amor und Eros. Eine Untersuchung des Wortfeldes “Liebe” im Lateinischen und Griechischen, Hildesheim, 1973; A. Fitzgerald, “Hebrew yd = ‘Love’ and ‘Beloved,’” in CBQ, 1967, pp. 368–374; P. Foresi, L’agape in S. Paolo e la carità in S. Tommaso d’Aquino, Rome, 1965; G. Friedrich, Was heißt das: Liebe?, Stuttgart, 1972; R.H. Fuller, “Das Doppelgebot der Liebe,” in G. Strecker, Jesus Christus in Historie und Theologie (Festschrift H. Conzelmann), Tübingen, 1975, pp. 317–329; V. P. Furnish, The Love Command in the New Testament, London, 1973; B. Gerhardsson, “I. Cor. 13. Om Paulus och hans rabbiniska bakgrund,” in SEÅ, vol. 39, 1974, pp. 121–144; G. Gilleman, “Charité théologique et vie morale,” in Lumen Vitae, vol. 16, 1961, pp. 9–27; W. Grundmann, “Das Doppelgebot der Liebe,” in Die Zeichen der Zeit, vol. 11, 1957, pp. 449–455; A. Guillaumont, “Le Nom des agapètes,” in VC, 1969, pp. 30–37; A. J. Hultgren, “The Double Commandment of Love in Mt. XXII, 34–40: The Sources of Compositions,” in CBQ, 1974, pp. 373–378; J.-P. Hyatt, “The God of Love in the O.T.,” in To Do and To Teach: Essays in Honor of C. L. Pyatt, Lexington, 1953, pp.

15–26; J. Jeffrey, “The Love of God in Christ—Romans VIII, 38–39,” in ExpT, vol. 69, 1958, pp. 359–361; R. Joly, Le vocabulaire chrétien de l’amour est-il original? Φίλει—ν et —Αγαπα—ν, Brussels, 1968; J. Kahmann, Die Offenbarung der Liebe Gottes im Alten Testament, Witten, 1959; R. E. Ker, “Fear or Love?,” in ExpT, vol. 72, 1961, pp. 195–196; R. Kieffer, Le primat de l’amour: Commentaire épistémologique de I Corinthiens 13, Paris, 1975; W. Klassen, “Love Your Enemy: A Study of N.T. Teaching on Coping with an Enemy,” in Mennonite Quarterly Review, 1963, pp. 147–171; M. J. Lagrange, La Morale de l’Evangile, Paris, 1931 (the last chapter); idem, “L’Amour de Dieu, loi suprême de la morale de l’Evangile,” in VSpir, Supplément, vol. 26, 1931, pp. 1–16; M. Landfester, “Philos”; M. Lattke, Einheit im Wort: Die spezifische Bedeutung von “agape,” “agapan” und “filein” im Johannes-Evangelium, Munich, 1975; M. M. Laurent, Réalisme et richesse de l’amour chrétien: Essai sur Eros et Agapè, Issy-les-Moulineaux, 1962; N. Lazure, Les Valeurs morales de la théologie johannique, Paris, 1965, pp. 207–250; E. H. van Leeuwen, “—Αγαπητοί,” in Theologische Studien, 1903, pp. 139–151; S. Légasse, “L’étendue de l’amour interhumain d’après le Nouveau Testament: Limites et promesses,” in RTL, 1977, pp. 137–159; O. Linton, “S. Matthew V, 43,” in ST, 1964, pp. 66–79; D. Muñoz Lion, “La Nouveauté du commandement de l’amour dans les écrits de S. Jean,” in La etica biblica (vol. 29, Semana biblica española), Madrid, 1969, pp. 193–231; N. M. Loss, “Amore d’amicizia nel Nuovo Testamento,” in Salesianum, 1977, pp. 3–55; J. B. Lotz, Die Stufen der Liebe: Eros, Philia, Agapè, Frankfurt, 1971; D. Lührmann, “Liebet eure Feinde (Lk. VI, 27–36; Mt. V, 39–48),” in ZTK, 1972, pp. 412–438; S. Lyonnet, La carità pienezza della lege, secondo san Paolo, 2d ed., Rome, 1971; F. Maas, “Die Selbstliebe nach Leviticus XIX, 18,” in Festschrift F. Baumgärtel, Erlangen, 1959, pp. 109–113; D. J. McCarthy, “Notes on the Love of God in Deuteronomy,” in CBQ, 1965, pp. 144–147; T. W. Manson, On Paul and John, London, 1963, pp. 104–127; H. Montefiore, “Thou Shalt Love Thy Neighbour as Thyself,” in NovT, 1962, pp. 157–170; W. L. Moran, “The Ancient Near Eastern Background of the Love of God in Deuteronomy,” in CBQ, 1963, pp. 77–87; J. Moss, “I Cor. XIII, 13,” in ExpT, vol. 73, 1962, p. 253; D. Müller, “Das frühchristliche Verständnis der Liebe,” in Festschrift A. Alt, Leipzig, 1953–1954, vol. 3, pp. 131–137; P. L. Naumann, “The Presence of Love in John’s Gospel,” in Worship, 1965, pp. 363–371; K. Niederwimmer, “Erkennen und Lieben: Gedanken zum Verhältnis von Gnosis und Agape im ersten Korintherbrief,” in KD, 1965, pp. 75–102; A. Nissen, Gott und der Nächste im antiken Judentum, Tübingen, 1974; M. Oesterreicher, The Bridge: A Yearbook of Judaeo-Christian Studies IV, New York, 1962; C. Oggioni, La dottrina della carità nel IV Vangelo e nella la<^> Lettera di Giovanni, Milan, 1953; G. Outha, Agapè: An Ethical Analysis, New Haven–London, 1972; A. Penna, Amore nella Bibbia, Brescia, 1972; C. Perini, “Amicizia e carità fraterna

nella vita della Chiesa,” in DivThom, 1970, pp. 369–407; G. Quispel, “Love Thy Brother,” in Ancient Society, Louvain, vol. 1, pp. 83–93; L. Ramlot, “Le Nouveau Commandement de la nouvelle alliance ou Alliance et commandement,” in Lumière et vie, vol. 44, 1959, pp. 9–36; J. W. Rausch, Agape and Amicitia: A Comparison Between St. Paul and St. Thomas, Rome, 1958; C. C. Richardson, “Love: Greek and Christian,” in JR, 1943, pp. 173–185; K. Romaniuk, L’Amour du Père et du Fils dans la sotériologie de saint Paul, Rome, 1961; G. Rotureau, Amour de Dieu: Amour des hommes, Tournai, 1958 (popularization); G. Schille, “Die Liebe Gottes in Christus: Beobachtungen zu Rm. VIII, 31–39,” in ZNW, 1968, pp. 230–244; H. Schlier, Die Zeit der Kirche, Freiburg, 1956, pp. 186–193; idem, “Die Bruderliebe nach dem Evangelium und den Briefen des Johannes,” in Mélanges Rigaux, pp. 235–245; G. Schneider, “Die Neuheit der christlichen Nächstenliebe,” in TTZ, 1973, pp. 257–275; O.J.F. Seitz, “Love Your Enemies,” in NTS, vol. 16, 1969, pp. 39–54; W. W. Sikes, “A Note on Agape in Johannine Literature,” in Shane Quart., vol. 16, 1955, pp. 139–143; B. Snell, H. J. Mette, Lexikon, col. 45–46 (with the report of B. Marzullo, in Philologus, 1957, p. 205); M. Spanneut, “L’Amour, de l’hellénisme au christianisme,” in Mélanges de science religieuse, 1964, pp. 5–19; C. Spicq, “Le Verbe ἀγάπῃ et ses dérivés dans le grec classique,” in RB, 1953, pp. 372–397; idem, “Die Liebe als Gestaltungsprinzip der Moral in den synoptischen Evangelien,” in Freiburger Zeitschrift für Philosophie und Theologie, 1954, pp. 394–410; idem, “Le Lexique de l’amour dans les papyrus et dans quelques inscriptions de l’époque hellénistique,” in Mnemosyne, 1955, pp. 25–33; idem, “Notes d’exégèse johannique: la charité est amour manifeste,” in RB, 1958, pp. 358–370; idem, Agapè; idem, “La Justification du charitable (I Jo. III, 19–21),” in Studia Biblica et Orientalia, Rome, 1959, vol. 2, pp. 347–359; idem, “Les Composantes de la notion d’agapè dans le Nouveau Testament,” in Sacra Pagina, Paris-Gembloux, 1959, vol. 2, pp. 440–455; idem, Charité et liberté; idem, Théologie morale, vol. 2, pp. 481–566; D. M. Stanley, “God So Loved the World,” in Worship, 1957, pp. 16–23; K. Stendahl, “Hate, Non-retaliation, and Love,” in HTR, 1962, pp. 343–355; J. B. Stern, “Jesus’ Citation of Dt. VI, 5 and Lv. XIX, 18 in the Light of Jewish Tradition,” in CBQ, 1966, pp. 312–316; T. Stramare, “La carità secondo S. Giovanni,” in Tabor, 1965, pp. 47–58; D. W. Thomas, “The Root bħa ‘Love’ in Hebrew,” in ZAW, 1939, pp. 57–64; G. Torralba, “La Caridad en S. Pablo,” in EstBib, 1965, pp. 295–318; J. G. Trapiello, “El amor de Dios en los escritos de S. Juan,” in Verdad y vida, 1963, pp. 257–279; W. C. van Unnik, “Die Motivierung der Feindesliebe in Lukas, VI, 32–35,” in Sparsa Collecta, Leiden, 1973, vol. 1, pp. 111–128; F. Urtiz de Urtaran, “Esperanza y caridad en el N. T.,” in Scriptorium Victorense (Vitoria), 1954, vol. 1, pp. 1–50; A. G. Vella, “Agape in I Corinthians XIII,” in Melita Theologica, vol. 18, 1966, pp. 22–31, 57–66; vol. 19, 1967, pp. 44–54; R. Völkl, Die Selbstliebe in der heiligen Schrift und bei Thomas von Aquin, Munich, 1956; idem, Botschaft und Gebot der Liebe nach der Bibel, Freiburg, 1964; V. Warnach, "Liebe," in J. B. Bauer, Bibeltheologisches Wörterbuch, Grass-Vienna, 1959, pp. 502–542; C. Wiéner, Recherches sur l'amour pour Dieu dans l'Ancien Testament: Etude d'une racine, Paris, 1957; S. K. Wuest, "Four Greek Words for Love," in BibSac, 1959, pp. 241–248.

¹ E. Boisacq, Dictionnaire étymologique de la langue grecque, 2d ed., Heidelberg, 1923, p. 6; E. Stauffer, ἀγαπάω, in TDNT, vol. 1, p. 36.

² BDF.

³ E. Risch, H. J. Mette, ἀγαπάω, in B. Snell, Lexikon; P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique.

⁴ Cf. the root pô, keep; A. Ceresa-Gastaldo, "ΑΓΑΠΗ nei documenti anteriori al Nuovo Testamento," in Aeg, 1951, pp. 302–303.

⁵ A. Carnoy, Dictionnaire étymologique du Proto-Indo-Européen, Louvain, 1955, p. 3. He cites Homer, Il. 23.384: ε—ν τ ἄρα οἰ— φῦ χειρί.

⁶ Ἀγαμαί: to admire, to be astonished (cf. H. Cremer, J. Kögel, Biblisch-theologisches Wörterbuch, 10th ed., p. 9). J. Pollux associates ἀγαπῶ— and ἄγαμαι (Onom. 5.20.113).

⁷ H. Pétré, Caritas. Etude sur le vocabulaire latin de la charité chrétienne, Louvain, 1948; W. Thiele, Wortschatzuntersuchungen zu den lateinischen Texten der Johannesbriefe, Freiburg, 1958; P. Agaesse, Saint Augustin: Commentaire de la première Epître de S. Jean, Paris, 1961, pp. 31ff.; R. Völkl, Frühchristliche Zeugnisse zu Wesen und Gestalt der christlichen Liebe, Freiburg, 1963, pp. 91–95; R. T. Otten, "Amor, Caritas and Dilectio: Some Observations on the Vocabulary of Love in the Exegetical Works of St. Ambrose," in Mélanges Chr. Mohrmann, Utrecht-Anvers, 1963, pp. 73–83.

⁸ C. Spicq, Agapè: Prolégomènes, pp. 2ff. S. K. Wuest, "Four Greek Works for Love," in BSac, 1959, pp. 241–248; and the modern transposition by C. S. Lewis, The Four Loves, London, 1960.

⁹ Cf. M. Raoss, "Iscrizione cristiana-greca di Roma anteriore al Terzo secolo?" in Aevum, 1963, pp. 11–30. Because of the propensity of the Koine to use compound words, philostorgia came to be used more and more for storge (cf. Rom 12:10; C. Spicq, ΦΙΛΟΣΤΟΡΓΟΣ, in RB 1955, pp. 497–510); cf. Plutarch: “Does tenderness for one’s children come naturally for humans?—Εἰ— φυσικὴ πρὸς τὰ ἔκγονα φιλοστοργία;” (Plutarch, Quaest. conv. 3); P.Oxy. 1381, 104: ἡ μήτηρ ὡς ἐ—πὶ παιδί, καὶ φύσει φιλόστοργος; Ps.-Aristotle: “It is φιλοστοργία toward their children that inspires parents to draw up a will in their favor. . . . Children are so loved (ἀγαπωμένων) as being lovable objects per se” (cited by Stobaeus, II, 7, 13 = vol. 2, p. 120); a decree of Chersonesus for Thrasymedes of Heraclea: πατέρων ἀγαθω—ν πρὸς υἱ—οὺς φιλοστόργους (cited by L. Robert, Opera Minora Selecta, vol. 1, p. 311, n. 2).

¹⁰ Cf. MAMA, vol. 8, 367, 373, 374, 391, 392, 394; Menander: “I am ready to accept her without dowry and add an oath to cherish her always— διατελει—ν στέργων” (Dysk. 309, cf. P. Flury, Liebe und Liebessprache bei Meinander, Plautus und Terenz, Heidelberg, 1968). Alphaeus of Mitylene would take στέργω—ε—ράω as synonyms (Anth. Pal. 9, 110).

¹¹ Cf. the letter of Panechotes in the second century: φθάνω μὲν σοι δεδηλωκῶς ἦν ἔχω πρὸς σὲ στοργήν = I have already shown the affection that I have for you (P.Oxy. 2726, 5–8). This instinctive attraction was attributed also to animals (Aristotle, HA 9.4.611a12). The absence of this innate feeling (ἄστοργος, Rom 1:31; 2Tim 3:3) is as noteworthy in humans as in cruel beasts (ἄστόργου θηρός; GVI, vol. 1, n. 1078,4).

¹² A. Ernout, “Venus, Venia, Cupido,” in RevPhil, 1956, p. 7.

¹³ Epicurus defines eros thus: “a strong appetite for sexual pleasures, accompanied by furor and agony” (H. Usener, Epicurea, Frag. 483, Leipzig, 1887); cf. Alexis, in Stobaeus 63.13 (=4.20a13H); Archilochus, Epodes 8.245: “So violent was the desire for love that welled up in my heart, pouring out an opaque fog upon by eyes”; D. M. Robinson, E. J. Fluck, A Study of the Greek Love-names, including a Discussion of Paederasty and a Prosopographia, Baltimore, 1937; F. Lasserre, La Figure d’Eros dans la poésie grecque, Lausanne, 1946; H. Licht, Sexual Life in Ancient Greece, 8th ed., London, 1956; M. F. Galizno, J. S. Lasso de la Vega, F. R. Adrados, El descubrimiento del amor en Grecia, Madrid, 1959; M. M. Laurent, Réalisme et richesse de l’amour chrétien: Essai sur eros et agapè, Issy-les-Moulineaux, 1962; J. Fürstauer, Eros im alten Orient, Stuttgart, 1965.

¹⁴ Musaeus, Hero and Leander 98. On Eros as a warrior and fighter, cf. A. Spies, Militat omnis amans. Ein Beitrag zur Bildersprache der antiken Erotik, Tübingen, 1930; on Eros as a mythic power, cf. G. Bornkamm, Studien zu Antike und Urchristentum, Munich, 1959, vol. 2, p. 31. The stoics give eros a noble sense, cf. A. J. Festugière, Le Dieu cosmique, Paris, 1949, pp. 271ff.

¹⁵ The first meaning of φίλος would have been possessive, “my,” and by a semantic evolution it would have come to mean “dear,” so that its opposite would have been ξένος, “stranger,” meaning “one who does not belong to us” (H. I. Kakride, Notion de l’amitié. “Φίλος, regardless of the etymological details, literally expresses not an emotional attachment, but belonging to a social group, and this usage is linked to the use of the word as a possessive in Homer,” P. Chantraine, Etudes sur le vocabulaire grec, Paris, 1956, p. 15). Cf. F. Dirlmeier, ΦΙΛΟΣ und ΦΙΛΙΑ im vorhellenistischen Griechentum, Munich, 1931; M. Landfester, “Philos”; Stählin, φιλέω-φίλος, in TDNT, vol. 9, pp. 115–116. On φιλέω in the inscriptions, cf. G. Pfohl, Grabinschriften, pp. 41, 44, 46, 101, etc.

¹⁶ [Friendship either finds or makes equals.—Tr.] It is often said that charity is friendship, but St. Thomas Aquinas wrote quasi-amicitia, and he was making reference to the Aristotelian terminology concerning “friendships of superabundance,” like those that link parents to their children.

¹⁷ Cf. Menander, Mis. 307–308: Πρω—τος ἠγάπησά σε, ἀγαπω—, φιλω—, Κράτεια φιλιτάτη (in P.Oxy. 2656, 20–21); Plutarch, De virt. mor. 8: in marriage, reasoning leads to a strengthening of affection and love, τὸ φιλει—ν καὶ τὸ ἀγαπα—ν; Conv. sept. sap. 2: one guest engages the others in friendship and mutual affection, πρὸς φιλίαν καὶ ἀγάπησιν ἀλλήλων; Dio Cassius 60.18: Messalina loved and favored (ε—φίλει καὶ ἠγάπα) indulgent husbands. Cf. John 3:35 and 5:20; 14:21b and 16:27; 11:3 and 5, 36; above all 21:15–17 (where P. S. Minear, Images of the Church in the New Testament, Philadelphia, 1960, p. 159, translates well, “Simon, are you my friend?”); Cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 3, pp. 219–245. The Pauline salutation “Greet those who love us in the faith” (Titus 3:15) and the Johannine salutation “The friends greet you. Greet the friends, each one individually” (3John 15; cf. T. Y. Mullins, “Greeting as a New Testament Form,” in JBL, 1968, pp. 418–426) use φιλέω in exactly the same sense as the contemporary protocol for letters (P.Mert. 83, 13–14): ἄσπασαι τοὺς φιλοῦντάς σε πάντας; 82, 16–19; P.Abinn. 6, 23–24: ἀσπάζομαι πάντες τὰ ε—ν τῇ οι—κίᾳ κατ’ ὄνομα; 25, 9–18; P.Ross.Georg. III, 4, 25–28; A. Bernand, Philae, n. 65; P.IFAO II, n. 40, 11; other papyrological citations in C. Spicq, Agapè, pp. 87ff., idem, “Le Lexique de l’amour dans les papyrus,” in Mnemosyné, 1955, pp. 27–28). Συγγενής (literally “congener” or “fellow,” used as an aulic title, cf. L. Mooren, “Über die ptol. Hofrangtitel,” in Antidorum W. Peremans, Louvain, 1968, pp. 161ff.), is associated with ἀναγκαί—ος φίλος in Acts 10:24, in accord with contemporary usage (on these terms, cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, pp.

92ff.; I.Magn., 38, 52; IG, vol. 9, 2, n. 583, 58; SB 9415, 17; SEG, vol. 19, 468, 32; vol. 23, 547, 2; P.Herm. 1; P.Mil.Vogl. 59, 13; IGLS, vol. 6, 2859, 7; A. Bernand, Philae, n.30; E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, p. 56; Plutarch, Agric. 3.1 and 3.5; L. Robert, Hellenica, vols. 11–12, Paris, 1960, p. 205; idem, Opera minora selecta, Amsterdam, 1960, p. 220; Michaelis, συγγενής, in TDNT, vol. 7, pp. 736–742. On the necessarii regis, cf. Prosop.Ptol., vol. 2, p. xix). As for the formula φίλος τοῦ Καίσαρος (John 19:12; cf. Agapè vol. 3, pp. 239ff.), it should be considered together with the title “friend of the king,” which seems to be of Egyptian origin (C. De Witt, “Enquête sur le titre de smr pr,” in ChrEg, 1956, pp. 89–104; H. Donner, “Der ‘Freund des Königs,’” in ZAW, 1961, pp. 269–277; J. Gaudemet, Institutions de l’antiquité, Paris, 1967, pp. 227ff.), but used among the Persians, the Seleucids, and the Romans, referring to courtiers, courtesans, and royal favorites, the staff officers at headquarters, the ministers in charge, the councillors, and the personal couriers of the sovereign (Ep. Arist. 41, 45, 228, 268, 318). These dignitaries ranked after the “relatives of the king, συγγενει—ς” and there was a hierarchy among them, such that some were distinguished as “friends of the first order” (Dittenberger, Or., vol. 1, 119; vol. 2, 754; Syl. 685, 121; Pap.Lugd.Bat. 14, 4th col.; P.Dura, 18, 10; 19, 18; 20, 3; SEG, vol. 8, 573; vol. 13, 552–557, 568–591; vol. 20, 208; SB 1078, 8876, 9963, 9986, 10122; Strabo 13.2.3; E. Bickerman, Institutions des Séleucides, pp. 40–50, 66, 188–189; M. Hollaux, Etudes d’épigraphie, vol. 3, pp. 220–225; E. Bammel, “Φίλος τοῦ Καίσαρος,” in TLZ, 1952, col. 205–210; A. Pelletier, Josèphe adaptateur, p. 107; B. Lifshitz, “Sur le culte dynastique des Séleucides,” in RB, 1963, pp. 76–81; G. Lumbroso, Recherches sur l’économie politique de l’Égypte, 2d ed., Amsterdam, 1967, pp. 191ff.; Prosop.Ptol., vol. 6., pp. 21ff., 85; A. Bernand, Philae, n. 13, 2; C. Spicq, Prolégomènes, p. 165, Agapè, vol. 3, p. 167, 240).

¹⁸ Matt 5:44. R. Joly (Le Vocabulaire chrétien de l’amour est-il original? Φιλει—ν et —Αγαπα—ν, Brussels, 1968) challenges my semantics and quite often my exegesis. I will merely observe that from Plato to St. John Chrysostom and Basil of Ancyra, and in Philo along the way, it is ε—ράω, much more than φιλέω, that is used in preference to the classical ἀγαπάω, “to be content with, be satisfied.” Moreover, it is the vocabulary of the LXX—in which this verb occurs much more often (268 times, as opposed to around 30 for φιλέω) and with an affective sense—that determined that of the NT. Cf. B. Botte, in Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale, 1969, p. 235; J. Giblet, “Le Lexique chrétien de l’amour,” in RTL, 1970, pp. 333–337.

¹⁹ Cf. C. Spicq, Prolégomènes, pp. 65ff.; idem, “Les Composantes de la notion d’agapè dans le Nouveau Testament,” in Sacra Pagina, Paris-

Gembloux, 1959, pp.440–455 (reprinted in Charité et liberté; developed in Théologie morale, vol. 2, pp. 481ff.); cf. N. Lazure, Les valeurs morales de la théologie johannique, Paris, 1965, pp. 207–250.

²⁰ Rev 12:11; cf. Menander, Dysk. 824; Sam. 272; P.Herc. 1018, col. XII, 5; Plutarch, Sol. 6, 1; Conv. sept. sap. 2; Apollodorus, Bibl. 2.7.7; Dio Cassius 60.18; 61.7.

²¹ 1Thess 5:13; cf. Plato, Resp. 10.600c; Plutarch, Rom. 17.3; Phoc. 6.4; Sert. 14.1; Conv. sept. sap. 6; Dio Cassius 44.39; 59.20; 54.31; 71.31. Hence its opposition to καταφρονει—ν, “despise, scorn” (Matt 6:24; cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 1, Paris, 1958, pp. 31, 101); cf. Isocrates, Antid. 15.151.

²² Cf. Phil 1:9-11; the precept “You shall love the Lord your God” can also be translated “You shall adore” (Matt 22:37); cf. Plutarch, Arist. 6.3: the people should love and venerate the gods. Cyrus, wishing to express his enthusiasm for the beauty of Milto, changed her name to Aspasia, the most “adorable” woman imaginable (Per. 24.12).

²³ 1John 3:18—ε—ν ἔργω καὶ ἀληθείᾳ (2John 3; Ep. Arist. 260; Pss. Sol. 6.9; 10.4; 14.1; 15.3; T. Jud. 24.3; T. Levi 18.8; cf. I. de la Potterie, “La verità in S. Giovanni,” in RivistB, 1963, pp. 3–24; N. Lazure, Valeurs morales, p. 87); ἔργω is opposed to λόγω as reality is opposed to appearances (Philo, Cherub. 41; Thucydides 2.65: “The democracy was such in name [λόγω], but in reality [ἔργω δέ] it was government by the first citizen”; cf. 8.78, nothing but words, without reality). In a personal letter of the first century, the writer complains about a certain Keramos who talks much and does nothing (P.Alex. 25, 19–20: πολλὰ λέγειν. . . οὐδὲν ε—ποιεῖ; P.Alex., pp. 68ff.); P.NYU 1 a 8: ἔργω δὲ ἀληθει— καὶ δυνάμει; I.Olymp., 356, 7: C. Asinius Quadratus τειμήσαντα τὴν —Ολυμπίαν καὶ λόγω καὶ ἔργω; other references in Agapè, vol. 3, p. 263.

²⁴ Rom 5:8 (συνίστημι, cf. Agapè, vol. 2, p. 180); 1John 4:9 (φανερῶω; cf. 2Tim 1:10); 2Cor 8:24 (ε—νδείκνυμαι; cf. Heb 6:10); Titus 3:4 (ε—πιφαίνεν).

²⁵ It is clear, for example, that the authenticity of the followers of Jesus will be discernible only to the extent that they give proof of their mutual love (John 13:35; cf. likewise 15:13; 1John 3:16, etc.; cf. C. Spicq, “Notes d’exégèse johannique: la charité est amour manifeste,” in RB, 1958, pp. 358–370). Under the New Covenant, the keeping of commandments has no value except as a proof of love (John 14: 21). In an analogous use of the word, Ptolemy asks his very dear Apollonius to write him regularly so that he may know how much he loves him: Δι ὅπερ παρακληθεῖς γράφε μοι

συνεχω—ς ἵνα διαγνω— σε οὕτως με ἠγαπηκότα (P.Mert. 22, 8); cf. SB 7804, 5: μνησθεῖς τῆς ἀ[γάπης], ἦν εἰ—ς συνόμαιμον ἔδειξα (second century AD); P.Oxy. 11, 6: “You shall prove your love . . .”; P.Berl.Zill. 14, 12, 14; P.Fouad 86, 5: “Show me your love by saying . . .” etc.

²⁶ Ps.-Lysias, Amat. 233 b: “Those who love deserve more pity than envy”; Anth. Pal. 9.157: “Who said that Eros is a god? We never see a god do evil, and Eros smilingly spills human blood.”

²⁷ Plato, Lysis 218c: “I was joyful like a hunter, entirely happy (ἀγαπητω—ς) to have at last that which I was pursuing”; Isocrates, Ep. 6.6: “I would be quite happy if . . . ἀγαπῶν ἄν εἰ—”; Menander, Dysk. 745; “Each one would be content with his modest part”; Sam. 557; Synesius: “Ptolemy and his successors would be content to use only . . .” (Epist. ad Paeonium 311 B; edited by Terazghi, vol. 2, p. 138, 18); Plutarch, Thes. 17.2: The Athenians “were enchanted by the devotion that Theseus demonstrated toward the people”; Crass. 19.3: “Crassus rejoiced greatly”; De gen. 4 = 577d: “all too happy that their lives had been spared”; Dio Cassius 1.185, 307; 42.7; 61.4; Philo, Post. Cain 171; Sacr. Abel and Cain 37; P.Panop.Beatty 2, 6, 148: ἀγαπητω—ς ἔχειν = to hold oneself to be satisfied, to account oneself happy.

²⁸ 1Pet 1:8; cf. 1Cor 2:9 (cf. Agapè, vol. 1, pp. 219ff.; P. Prigent, “Ce que l’œil n’a point vu,” in TZ, 1958, pp. 416–429; M. Philonenko, “Quod oculus non vidit,” ibid., 1959, pp. 51–56; J. B. Bauer, “ΤΟΙΣ ΑΓΑΠΩΣΙΝ ΤΟΝ ΕΩΝ,” in ZNW, 1959, pp. 108–112; A. Feuillet, Le Christ sagesse de Dieu, Paris, 1966, pp. 37ff.); 1Cor 13:6 (συγχάριμαι); Gal 5:22; Rom 12:12, 15; Phil 2:2; John 14:28; 15:10-11. In the secular language, ἀγαπάω and χαίρω are already often synonyms (Epictetus 4.4.45; Plutarch, Thes. 17.2).

²⁹ John 3:16; 1John 4:16; 5:1; Eph 2:4 (cf. Agapè, vol. 3, pp. 127ff., 288ff.; A. Feuillet, Le Mystère de l’amour divin dans la théologie johannique, Paris, 1972, pp. 179ff.). Caesar declared to his troops, “I love you as a father loves his children, ἀγαπω— . . . ὡς πατήρ παι—δας” (Dio Cassius 12.27; cf. 57; 53.18: the title of “father” given to emperors is “an invitation for them to love their subjects as their children”; 56.9; Stobaeus 2.7.13 = vol. 2, p. 120).

³⁰ Plutarch, Num. 4.3; 14.9; Cor. 39.13; De frat. amor. 6; Onasander 1.21.

³¹ Cf. the exhortation of Antony to the Roman people at Caesar’s funeral: ε—φιλήσατε αὐτὸν ὡς πατέρα, καὶ ἠγαπήσατε ὡς εὐεργέτην (Dio Cassius 44.48, 1; cf. 43.18: Caesar’s soldiers were grateful to those who gave to them; 49.20: “Pacorus, because of his justice and mildness, was surrounded in Syria by more love [ὑπερηγάπων] than any king ever was.” Compare Polybius 9.29.12; 5.11.6: διὰ τὴν εὐεργεσίαν καὶ φιλάνθρωπίαν ἀγαπώμενον); Plutarch, Alc. 4.4; Arist. 23.6: “They bade him give thanks to Fortuna”; Luc. 20.6: “Lucullus was loved [with gratitude_ by the peoples whom he had treated well”; 29.5: “. . . as a benefactor and a founder”; Cant 1:3; John 16:27; Eusebius, Praep. Evang. 9.3.3: διὰ ταῦτα ἀγαπηθῆναι; Theopompus of Chios: διὰ ταῦτα καὶ μα—λλον αὐτὸν ἠγάπα τω—ν πολιτῶ—ν (in F.Gr.H., II B, p. 580, 30). On this return of affection, cf. the Athenian poet Cantharus, frag. 6: καὶ πρότερον οὔσα παρθένος ἀμφηγάπαζες αὐτόν (in J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 1, p. 450).

³² Heraclitus, All. 6; Ps.-Lysias, Amat. 233e: “When one gives a dinner at one’s own home, one should invite not one’s friends, but beggars and starving folk. These are the people who will salute (ἀγαπήσουσιν) you, who will escort you, who will sit at your gate, who will be the most joyful, who will be the most grateful, who will wish you the greatest happiness”; Plutarch, Publ. 10.5; 19.3; Dio Cassius 45.4; the Pythagorean Diotogenes: the majesty of the king can draw the admiration and fear of the crowds, while his kindness provokes their love and applause, ἃ δὲ χρηστότας φιλούμενον καὶ ἀγαπαζόμενον (On Kingship, in Stobaeus, 7.62 = vol. 4, p. 267, 14).

³³ Dio Cassius 44.48; 52.32: “It is natural for all people to rejoice when a superior deems them worthy to be addressed as if they were his equals; it is natural for them to approve all his decrees as if they were their own doing, to applaud them as if they themselves had thought of them first, καὶ ἀγαπα—ν ὡς αὐθαίρετα”; Polybius 9.29.12; 5.11.6. Cf. Theophilus: “Shall I depart, and betray my venerated master—τὸν ἀγαπητὸν δεσπότην?” (in J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 2, p. 568).

³⁴ It is often difficult to date our documents with precision. For example, a tomb inscription preserved in the museum at Alexandria—μνησθεὶς τῆς ἀ[γάπη]ς εἰ—ς συνόμαιμον ἔδειξα, μὴ παρίδης πέτρην οἶκον ὁμοφροσύνης—dated to 27 BC by A. Ceresa-Gastaldo (ΑΓΑΠΗ nei documenti estranei all’ influsso biblico, in Rivista di filologia e di istruzione classica, 1953, pp. 347–356, taken up in like manner by SB 7804; SEG, vol. 8, 374; C. Spicq, “Le Lexique de l’amour dans les papyrus,” in Mnemosyne, 1955, p. 32) is republished by W. Peek (GVI, vol. 1, n. 1143, 5), who not only dates it to the second century AD but also reads τῆς φιλίας instead of ἀγάπης (cf. SEG, vol. 14, 852). The truth is that “with the exception of the two first words, the line is totally effaced” (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 69 = p. 279). The inscription praising Amandos for his love of his country, τίς ὑπὸ πάτρης τόσσην ἔσχ’ ἀγάπην (SEG, vol.

8, 11, 6) is from the third century (A. Ceresa-Gastaldo, “—Αγάπη nei documenti anteriori al Nuovo Testamento,” in Aeg, 1951, p. 289). The inscription of Rhosos—ὕπερ μνήμης καὶ εὐχαριστίας καὶ ἀγάπης (IGLS, 727, 1–2)—is Christian and Byzantine (as SB 5314, 15) etc. In the third and fourth centuries, the formula of Ignatius of Antioch—ἀγάπην ποιει—ν, meaning “celebrate the agape” (Ign. Smyrn. 8.2; cf. SB 1029, 6: εἰ—ς τὴν ἀγάπην τοῦ ἁγίου —Αἴπ —Απολλῶ— πάντως ἔρχομε, “I shall certainly come for the feast of Saint Abbot Apollon,” republished and commented on by H. C. Youtie, in ZPE, vol. 16, 1975, pp. 259–264)—came to be used commonly to mean “give alms” (P.Lond. 1914, 28; cf. 1916, 28; C. Spicq, Mnemosyne, 1955, pp. 30ff.).

³⁵ Ep. Arist. 229 (with the note of the editor, A. Pelletier, Paris, 1962, p. 204); Pss. Sol. 18.4; Philo, Unchang. God 69; Quest. Exod. 23.27a, frag. 21 (edited by R. Marcus, pp. 60, 247; the T. 12 Patr. contains too many Christian glosses to be used here.) The absence of the noun in the secular literature (Josephus, Epictetus, Musonius, Julius Pollux, etc.) is notable (its first use would be a late scholium on Thucydides 1.51.5, glossing ἀρετῆς: φιλανθρωπίας καὶ ἀγάπης; cf. A. Deissmann, Bible Studies, 2d ed., Edinburgh, 1909, p. 200), as is its abundant usage in Christian language (cf. the papyri cited by N. Naldini, Cristianesimo in Egitto, pp. 16ff., 128, 130, 133, 140, 151, 154, 162, 174, 182, 189, 192, 196, 199, 210, 213, 220, 223, 226, 238, 278, 324, 331, 340, 362, 365). The magical papyrus from the end of the third century AD (Codex Paris 2316, fol. 436r), edited by R. Reitzenstein (Poimandrès, 1904, pp. 297ff.) is probably of Christian origin: Γαβριὲλ ε—πὶ τῆς χαρα—ς . . . —Αφαμαῆλ ε—πὶ τῆς ἀγάπης . . . ου—τοι εἰ—σιν οἱ— ἄγγελοι οἱ— προηγούμενοι ε—νώπιον τοῦ εοῦ (cf. A. Ceresa-Gastaldo, in Aeg, 1951, pp. 291–292). But the scholium on the Tetrabiblos of Ptolemaeus, where ἀγάπη expresses the mutual love of a man and a woman, and which I cited in my Prolégomènes, p. 32, n. 5, is by the Arab astrologer Abou Mas’ aschar Apomasar (d.885) whose work was translated into Greek in the eleventh century (cf. Charles E. Ruelle, “Deux identifications,” in Comptes rendus de l’Académie des Inscriptions et Belles Lettres, Paris, 1910, pp. 32–39).

³⁶ Edited by H. Diels, W. Schubart, Berliner Klassikertexte, 2, Berlin, 1905, p. 55. It is no longer possible to refer to the document itself, because Professor P. Moraux tells us that P.Berlin 9869 disappeared in the turmoil of 1945, and officially no one knows where it is. Both he and M. Vogliano, having examined it several times, cast no doubt on Schubart’s reading, but they cannot specify whether ΑΓΑΠΗΣ is the genitive singular of the noun or something like the first part of a verbal form whose end was obliterated (letter from Berlin dated 13 January 1952).

³⁷ Because of the -γμα that begins the following line, the editors restore “ἀγάπης [πρα—]γμα?”; cf. the analogy with P.Erl. 88, 13–14: μάλιστα . . . ἄμα, whose composition on the Logos seems close to this one.

³⁸ Professor Hombert of the Queen Elizabeth Egyptological Foundation of Brussels writes to me: “The Berlin papyrus is an extremely doubtful witness to the use of ἀγάπη in the second century BC, and ἀγάπησις seems to me to be just as possible” (letter dated 19 November 1951). This is also the opinion of A. Ceresa-Gastaldo in Aeg., 1951, p. 293, who points out the oddity of the insertion from the popular Koine in a text of philosophical character.

³⁹ Cf. GVI, n. 1436: ἔπινον πίστεος, εὐνοίης, ἀρετῆς; ἀγάπης τε μάλιστα (funerary inscription of Padua from the second or third century); cf. 2090; Drimachos: ε—γώ σε πάντων ἀνθρώπων ἠγάπησα μάλιστα (F.Gr.H., pp. 671, 10).

⁴⁰ The editors say that it is from the ptolemaic era, around the second century BC. It should be noted that F. Preisigke (Wörterbuch) and the supplement of E. Kiessling (1944) do not cite any usage of ἀγάπη in the papyri before the third century AD. Finally, cf. P.Oxy. 3004, 4: δίκαιον εὐθύς ε—στιν ἀγαπα—ν μητέρα (first century).

⁴¹ E. Stauffer, ἀγάπη, in TDNT, vol. 1, p. 38, n. 87. The citation is probably borrowed from A. Deissmann (Bible Studies, p. 198 or from T. Nägeli (Wortschatz, pp. 38, 60).

⁴² Letter from a certain Dionysius (commander at Memphis?) to Ptolemy, son of Slauchias; cf. W. Brunet de Presle (Notices et extraits des manuscrits grecs de la bibliothèque impériale, Paris, 1865, vol. 18, 2, p. 319) who read the text as follows: διά τε τὴν ἀγά[π]ην καὶ τὴν σὴν ε—λευθερίαν καταπεπέραμαι.

⁴³ A. Deissmann’s summary of the work in TLZ, 1895, p. 488.

⁴⁴ Cited by A. Deissmann in his Neue Bibelstudien (pp. 26ff.) and the English translation Bible Studies by A. Grieve (Edinburgh, 1901, pp. 198–199). It is only more surprising to see the initial error taken up again (cf. again J. S. Banks, in ExpT, vol. 9, 1898, p. 501), because it was denounced by W. M. Ramsay (ibid., pp. 567–568) as by E. Buonaiuti, “I vocaboli d’amore nel N. T.,” in Rivista Storico-critica delle scienze teologiche, 1909, pp. 261–262; E. Jacquier, in RB 1915, p. 262; F. Prat, La Théologie de saint Paul, 2d ed., Paris, 1923, vol. 2, p. 562; E. B. Allo, Première Épître aux Corinthiens, p. 206.

⁴⁵ U. Wilcken edited P.Paris 49, which he believes to be earlier than 160, as number 62 in his UPZ I, p. 308.

⁴⁶ Article —Ἀγάπη, in BZ, 1932, pp. 378–382. E. Peterson analyzes all the references supplied by W. Crönert, in F. Passow, Wörterbuch der griechischen Sprache, 2d ed., 1912, p. 25, and H. Lietzmann, An die Korinther, 3d ed., Tübingen, 1931, p. 68.

⁴⁷ Papers of the American School of Classical Studies at Athens, Boston, 1888, vol. 2, pp. 88, 87–88; again read in the same fashion by W.H.P. Hatch (“Some Illustrations of New Testament Usage from Greek Inscriptions of Asia Minor,” in JBL, 1980, pp. 134–136), who underlines its pagan origin—Aphrodite is given her Homeric epithet.

⁴⁸ A. Deissmann, Light, p. 75, n. 3. He relies on the dissertation of F. Heinevetter, Würfel- und Buchstabenorakel in Griechenland und Kleinasien, Breslau, 1912, pp. 10 and 25.

⁴⁹ P.Herc. 1471, edited by A. Oliviere, Leipzig, 1914. Reading accepted by C. Jan Vooyoys, Lexicon Philodemeum, Purmerend, 1934, p. 2. Compare God’s words to Abraham: τὸν ἠγαπημένον μου φίλον (T. Abr. A 1).

⁵⁰ Recension of the Stoicorum Veterum Fragmenta, vol. 4, of J. von Arnim, in Gnomon, 1930, p. 148. W. C. concludes his note 2: “Thus for the present ἀγάπη remains a Judeo-Christian word, commonly used in the language of the Byzantine epoch, as Preisigke has shown”; cf. SB 8705, 3.

⁵¹ The reading that A. Ceresa-Gastaldo also reckons as the most probably, in Aeg., 1951, p. 297.

⁵² Lines 27–28 (cf. G. Lafaye, “Litanie grecque d’Isis,” in RevPhil, 1916, pp. 55ff.; F. Cumont, Isis latina, ibid., pp. 133–134; A. Ceresa-Gastaldo, loc. cit., pp. 293–294). At line 94 one sees ε—ν Δώροις φιλίαν and at line 137 the appellation μισεχθής. Cf. the proscenium from the imperial period: ὄν ἀγαπα— ἡ Φαρία ΘΙσις (SB 8542, 7). Reitzenstein (Nachr. Götting. Gesell. d. Wiss., 1917, pp. 130ff.) compares CIG, vol. 12, 5,217: ε—γὼ (Isis) γυναι—κα καὶ ἄνδρα συνήγαγα. . . ε—γὼ στέργεσθαι γυναι—κας ὑπ’ἀνδρῶ—νήνάγκασα. One might compare the hymns to Mandoulis: “the holy Talmis whom Mandoulis the sun loves, ὁ ἥλιος Μανδοῦλις ἀγαπα—” (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 166, 20; cf. 167, 1: “Mandoulis beloved of Athena, —Ἀθηνα—ς ἀγάπημα”); cf. the invocation to the divinity: Ἄδων ἀγαπατέ (Theocritus 15.149), ὦ Πᾶν φίλε (ibid. 7.106), φίλα Σελάννα (ibid. 2.142); A. Bernand, El-Kanaïs, Leiden, 1972, n. viii, 9, 11.

⁵⁸ S. Charitôniadou, ΑΙ ΕΠΙΓΡΑΦΑΙ ΤΗΣ ΛΕΣΒΟΥ, Athens, 1968, n. 102; cf. N.A. Bees, Corpus der griech. Inschriften von Hellas, Athens, 1941, n. 15.

⁵⁹ SEG, vol. 18, 775, 10.

⁶⁰ P.Ross.Georg. V, 59, 1 (fourth century AD). Of the same date, a tomb inscription of Tarsus, cf. H. Goldman, Excavations at Gözlü Kule, Tarsus, Princeton, 1950, vol. 1, p. 385, n. ix, 4. Eusebius tells of the martyrdom of “Agapios and Thecla, our contemporary” (Mart. Palest. 3.1 and 4; 6.3).

⁶¹ N. Firatle, L. Robert, Stèles funéraires, p. 150. CIRB, Moscow-Leningrad, 1965, n. 337, 2–3: —Αγάπημα γυνή εοφιλίσκου; F. Bechtel, Die attischen Frauennamen, Göttingen, 1902.

⁶² SEG, vol. 6, 91 (B. Lavagnini, in Aeg, 1925, p. 339 reads otherwise). On a first-century stele of Alyzia in Acarnania this was added in the fourth century: καὶ ὑπὲρ μνήμης τῆς γυναικὸς αὐτοῦ —Αγάπης (IG, vol. 9, 2, n. 446 b). According to Sulpicius Severus (Chronicles 2.46), the origin of the Priscillian heresy was the preaching of an Egyptian of Memphis named Marcus, who had as a student a certain Agape: non ignobilis mulier (likewise St. Jerome, Epist. 133). But Caritas is rare as a proper name (cf. the references given by H. I. Marrou, “Dame Sagesse et ses trois filles,” in Mélanges . . . Christ. Morhmann, Utrecht-Anvers, 1963, pp. 181–183).

⁶³ “Etude bibliographique sur la notion biblique d’ΑΓΑΠΗ, surtout dans I Cor. 13,” in ConNT, vol. 5, Leipzig-Uppsala, 1941, pp. 1–27; idem, “Note bibliographique sur I Cor. XIII,” in Nuntius, vol. 6, Uppsala, 1952, col. 47–48; cf. BAGD, pp. 5–6. This translation of the fourth edition of the Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Berlin, 1952) of W. Bauer could not take into account the clarification accomplished by G. Zuntz in his report in Gnomon, 1958, p. 23.

⁶⁴ C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 1, pp. 317–324; as in that work, I shall here alphabetize according to the names of the authors.

ἀγγαρεύω

angareuo, to requisition

angareuo, S 29; EDNT 1.12; MM 2–3; L&N 37.34; BDF §§6, 42(2), 392(1e); BAGD 6; ND 2.77

This verb of oriental, probably Iranian, origin¹ comes from angaros, which in Persian refers to the post riders who carried royal dispatches from relay post to relay post.² As this official delivery service involved requiring people to provide services and enlisting people as well as provisions, draft animals, or lodging, it came to mean “to requisition” and in general to make someone do something against his will. This explains its pejorative flavor from Menander³ to modern times,⁴ and well attested in the NT: the soldiers requisition Simon of Cyrene to carry the cross of Jesus.⁵

The Egyptian papyri give examples of the many requisitions that were made for pack animals and drivers, farm animals, wheat and the barges that carried it, work, and provisions.⁶ Normally, it was by public authority that individuals were coerced,⁷ but many requisitions were arbitrary or illegitimate. This accounts for the numerous claims of individuals who complained that they had been wronged,⁸ and hence the numerous interventions of sovereigns and prefects from the second century BC onward forbidding royal officers and soldiers to make requisitions for their personal interests. In 118, a decree (prostagma) of King Euergetes II and Queens Cleopatra II and Cleopatra III ordered: “Generals and other functionaries do not have the right to require the inhabitants of the country to work for their private interests, nor to use their beasts for their own purposes . . . nor to make them supply geese, fowl, wine, or grain, whether for money as a bribe for the renewal of their appointment, nor in short to make them work for free on any pretext.”⁹

These facts and the number of documents that exhibit them show how frequent and burdensome these angareiai were. They show precisely the significance of the precept of the Sermon of the Mount: “If anyone requisitions you for a mile, go with him two miles.”¹⁰

The case is so classic that it had perhaps become a topic of popular philosophy and of diatribe. At any rate, Epictetus also takes it up; but he advises only to comply for fear of suffering greater evils: “If an unforeseen requisition arises and a soldier takes your young ass, let it go. Do not resist, do not murmur, lest you receive blows as well as lose the ass” (4.1.79). For the sake of love, our Lord says to acquiesce¹¹ just as he said to bless persecutors. This attitude of acceptance toward impudent and vexatious people becomes a major theme of New Testament ethics: one must overcome evil with good.¹² The paradox of going two miles when only one was demanded puts the emphasis on interior good will, on its promptness and sincerity—or rather on the authentic agape that is manifested in deed and in truth (1John 3:18), in the most costly fashion (John 15:13). According to the principle of John 3:21, “The one who does the truth comes to the light,” it was because Simon of Cyrene freely accepted his angareia that he and his children received the grace of faith.

¹ A. Deissmann, Bible Studies, 2d ed., Edinburgh, 1909, pp. 86, 182; W. Barclay, NT Wordbook, pp. 15ff.; P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique, p. 8. F. Tailliez is inclined toward Akkadian (“Βασιλική ὁδός,” in Miscellanea G. de Jarphanion, Rome, 1947, pp. 346–348). It is also written ε—γγαρεύω, cf. BDF §42, 2.

² Hence ἀγγαρήιον, the royal postal service; cf. Herodotus 8.98 [here presented in the English of Aubrey de Selincourt—Tr.]: “Xerxes dispatched a courier to Persia with the news of his defeat. There is nothing in the world which travels faster than these Persian couriers. The whole idea is a Persian invention, and works like this: riders are stationed along the road, equal in number to the number of days the journey takes—a man and a horse for each day. Nothing stops these couriers from covering their allotted stage in the quickest possible time—neither snow, rain, heat, nor darkness. The first, at the end of his stage, passes the dispatch to the second, the second to the third, and so on along the line, as in the Greek torch-race which is held in honour of Hephaestus. The Persian word for this form of post is angarium.” Cf. Xenophon, Cyr. 8.6–7; Aeschylus, Ag. 282; “like couriers of fire—ἀπὸ ἀγγάρου πυρός—each light in turn hurried its signal toward us.” At the beginning of the third century AD, this term again designated the cursus publicus (Dittenberger, Syl. 880, 54); cf. U. Wilcken, Grundzüge, Leipzig-Berlin, 1912, vol. 1, pp. 372–376; H. J. Mason, Greek Terms, p. 19; D. B. Durham, Vocabulary of Menander, p. 37; the note of A. J. Festugière on Artemidorus Daldianus, La Clef des Songes 5.16 (Paris, 1975, p. 268).

³ Menander, Sik., frag. 440 (J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 3 B, p. 726); cf. A. Blanchard, A. Bataille, “Fragments sur papyrus du ΣΙΚΥΩΝΙΟΣ de Ménandre,” in RechPap, vol. 3, Paris, 1964, p. 155.

⁴ In modern Greek, ε—γγαρεία means “drudgery” (A. Mirambel, Dictionnaire français-grec moderne, Paris, 1960, p. 102).

⁵ Matt 28:32 (M. J. Lagrange, Matthieu, pp. 113–114); Mark 15:21 (M. J. Lagrange, Marc, p. 425).

⁶ P.Tebt. 5, 248–251; 703–704; 750 etc. (cf. Cl Préaux, Economie royale, pp. 139–144, 344–347, 529). P.Stras. 93 is a requisition order.

⁷ Cf. in 252 BC the requisition of a boat for the postal service: τοῦ ὑπάρχοντος λέμβου ἀγγαρευθέντος ὑπό σου . . . ἀγγαρεύσας τὸν —Αντικλέους λάμβον (P.Paris 2,20).

⁸ P.Cair.Zen. 59467; 59509, 5: Somoelis, warden at Philadelphia, ἀγγαρεύων διὰ παντός, asks Zeno to intervene; P.Mich.Zen. 29; P.Enteux. 88; P.Cair.Isid. 72, 32; 123, 5 (editor's note); BGU 21, col. III, 16; PSI 1333, 15: μὴ ἀγγαρευθω—σι = SB 7993, 15.

⁹ P.Tebt. 5, 178–187; cf. line 252 (with the correction of U. Wilcken, in APF, vol. 3, p. 325, adopted by M. T. Lenger, C.Ord.Ptol. 53; cf. 55 = PSI 1401, 9: προστετάχασι δὲ μηθένα ἀγγαρεύειν πλοι—α κατὰ μηδεμίαν παρεύρεσιν ει—ς τὰς ι—δίας χρείας). On 17 August 163, in a series of amnesty proclamations, Ptolemy VI Philometor condemned private and unpaid requisitions of boats: “He decreed that no one should requisition boats for a personal move, προστέταχεν δὲ μηδένα ἀγγαρεύειν πλοι—α” (M. T. Lenger, C.Ord.Ptol., n. 34, 5; SB 9316, col. II, 5; cf. L. Koenen, Eine ptolemäische Königsurkunde [P.Kroll], Wiesbaden, 1957). Before 150, Demetrius I Soter forbade anyone to requisition for his service animals belonging to Jews: κελεύω δὲ μηδὲ ἀγγαρεύεσθαι τὰ —Ιουδαίων ὑποζύγια (Josephus, Ant. 13.52). On 1 February AD 49, an edict of the prefect C.Vergilius Capito forbade his soldiers to make requisitions, at least without written authorization from him: μηδὲν λαμβάνειν μηδὲ ἀγγαρεύειν ει— μή τινες ε—μὰ διπλώματα ἔχουσιν (Dittenberger, Or., 665, 24–25; SEG, vol. 8, 794; SB 8248, 24). In the year 19, Germanicus ordered that for his παρουσία no boat or beast of transport should be requisitioned without an order, and then only upon delivery of a receipt (SB 3924; A. S. Hunt, C. C. Edgar, Select Papyri, London, 1934, n. 211; W.Ehrenberg, A. H. M. Jones, Documents Illustrating the Reigns of Augustus and Tiberius, Oxford, 1955, n. 320). The edict of L. Aemilius Rectus of 29 April 42, prohibits the exactions on pain of very severe sanctions and orders the soldiers to make no requisition without making payment: μηδενὶ ε—ξέστω ε—νγαρεύειν τοὺς ε—πιτήης χώρας . . . ἄτερ ε—μού διπλώματος (P.Lond. III, 1171; Chrest.Wilck., n. 439). An identical prohibition from about 133–137 by the prefect Petronius Mamertinus (PSI 446; Sel.Pap. 221).

¹⁰ Matt. 5:41. “In our case, one may imagine a soldier or a police officer arrogating to himself, without official mandate, the right of requiring someone to transport or carry something, for example” (M. J. Lagrange, on this verse, p. 113). For references to the Talmudic literature, cf. P. Fiebig, “ἀγγαρεύω,” in ZNW, 1918, pp. 64–72.

¹¹ “It goes without saying that the lesson still applies when the first person who happens along lays claim to our services on some more or less plausible pretext. Give way, like good, defenseless folk. St. Thomas Aquinas let himself be led off to the marketplace by a lay brother” (M. J. Lagrange, Matthieu, p. 114).

¹² Rom 12:21. Cf. 15:1-7; 1Cor 6:7—“Why not rather suffer wrong? Why not rather let yourself be defrauded?”; 13:7—“love bears all things”; Gal 5:14-15; 6:2; 1Pet 2:13, 19: “It is meritorious to endure pains inflicted unjustly in order to please God”; 3:9, 17; 4:14; 1John 3:16, etc.

ἀγοράζω

agorazo, to buy

agorazo, S 59; TDNT 1.124–128; EDNT 1.23; NIDNTT 1.267–268; MM 6; L&N 37.131, 57.188; BDF §179(1); BAGD 12–13

This utterly commonplace verb originally meant “to go to market,” then “to buy, make purchases,”¹ the counterpart of “to sell.”² The NT uses it to designate redemption, emphasizing that there has been a transfer of property (Rev 14:3-4) and noting that the price has been paid: “You are no longer your own, because you have been bought and paid for” (egorasthete gar times, 1Cor 6:20). This mention of payment is significant; for, in the Hellenistic era, the contract of sale is not completed by the mere exchange of agreements; the seller must have received the time, at least the partial down payment that guarantees good faith and excludes the possibility of retraction.³ Only the payment of the price accomplishes the purchase of the property; so much so that the seller maintains his right to the item until he has received payment for it. This is why so many contracts mention that the payment has in fact been made.⁴ In accord with these usages, Rev 5:9 specifies that the purchase has been accomplished by the blood of Christ; 1Pet 1:19 that the price of the ransom was the precious blood, and this—according to Eph 1:7—was the means of redemption (apolytrosis).

2Pet 2:1 stigmatizes the false prophets who deny the Master (despotes is the normal term for the owner of a slave, cf. 1Tim 6:1-2) who purchased them, and 1Cor 7:23 comments: “You have been bought and paid for! Do not become slaves of humans.” As a result, the purchase-redemption by Christ is a metaphor that evokes the freeing of slaves⁵ who gained their liberty through a fictive sale to the divinity, notably to the Pythian Apollo of Delphi; the owner, accompanied by his slave, whom he is leading to the god, presents himself at the sanctuary; the priest remits to the master the agreed price, which has been paid to him beforehand either by the slave himself or by his friends. The act of emancipation was inscribed on the walls of the temple: the master has sold his slave (apedoto) so that he is free; the god accepts the abandoned one, purchases him, and guarantees his protection.⁶ Henceforth the emancipated one is known as “sacred, slave of the goddess, being the god’s” (hieros, douletheas, tou theou on)⁷ considering himself as consecrated to the service of the deity. That which was only a legal fiction in paganism is precisely the truth in Christianity. “Those who are in Christ”⁸ cannot revert to their former servitude. The one who has paid the price of their emancipation requires that they be faithful to his worship and his service.⁹

¹ Luke 14:18; John 13:29. This is one of the ways of coming into possession (1Cor 7:30) and of getting rich (Rev 3:18).

² Πωλέω; Matt 21:12; Luke 17:28; Rev 13:17. Cf. M.-J. Bry, Essai sur la vente dans les papyrus gréco-égyptiens, Paris, 1909.

³ I. Cor., vol. 8, 3, n. 530 (= SEG, vol. 9, 154): Euplous has bought the tomb at Anastasios (ἀγοράσας παρά) for one and a half pieces of gold: I gave him the price (καὶ δούς τὰς τιμὰς) and I received from him the property (καὶ λαβὼν ἐξουσίαν παρ αὐτοῦ); P. Oxy. 2951, 25 and 31; Theophrastus: “The purchase has no obligatory force (κυρία), and likewise the sale, in the matter of acquisition, until the price has been given and the parties have observed the legal procedures” (in Stobaeus 4.2.20; ed. Wachsmuth, vol. 4, p. 129, 19ff.). “When the seller has given the amphourion (the tax) and received the price, he will no longer be permitted to bring an action against the purchaser” (P. Hal. 1, 253, p. 140). One must pay the price to become the owner; cf. C. Appleton, “A l’époque classique, le transfert de propriété de la chose vendue et livrée était-il subordonné, en règle, au paiement du prix?” in RHDFE, 1928, pp. 11–12; P. Meylan, “Le paiement du prix et transfert de propriété de la chose vendue en droit romain classique,” in Studi in onore di P. Bonfante, Milan, 1930, pp. 441–491; idem, “L’Origine de la vente consensuelle,” in RHDFE, 1931, pp. 787–788; idem, “Le rôle de la ‘bona fides’ dans le passage de la vente au comptant à la vente consensuelle à Rome,” in Festgabe A. Simonius, Basel, 1955, pp. 247–257.

⁴ Cf. R. Taubenschlag, Opera Minora, vol. 1, pp. 527ff. L. Mitteis, Reichsrecht und Volksrecht, Leipzig, 1891, pp. 71ff. C. Préaux, “La Preuve,” in Recueils de la Société J. Bodin, Brussels, 1965, pp. 197, 200. P. Dura 26, 13–14, moreover, associates the receiving of the time and the transfer of possession (paradosis; cf. Jur. Pap., n. 37, 13–16). On this mode of the structuring of consensual sale, cf. J. Demeyere, “La Formation de la vente et le transfert de la propriété in droit grec classique,” in RIDA, 1952, pp. 215–266; idem, “Le Contrat de vente en droit classique: Les Obligations des parties,” ibid., 1953, pp. 216–228; L. Gernet, “Sur l’obligation contractuelle dans la vente hellénique,” ibid., p. 229–247; idem, Droit et société dans la Grèce ancienne, Paris, 1955, pp. 201–236.

⁵ For Epictetus, the person who is in servitude to his passions is a “great slave” (μεγαλοδούλος), much more in subjection than the slave of any owner (4.1.55; cf. A. Pelletier, “Les Passions à l’assaut de l’âme d’après Philon,” in REG, 1965, pp. 52–60). St. Paul declares himself “sold to the service of sin” (Rom 7:14; cf. Dio Cassius 62.3: “How much better it would be to be sold once—ἅπαξ πεπρα—σθαί—than to be free in name only and have to buy ourselves back every year”). The verb πιπράσκω has here the pejorative sense which it has in the LXX and which is its first meaning in the secular language: to transport prisoners and slaves for sale (Deut 28:68; Lev 25:39, 42; Jer 34:14; 2Macc 5:14; Matt 18:25), like Joseph (Ps 105:17) or the elect people (Esth 7:4; cf. S. Lyonnet, “Péché dans le Nouveau Testament,” in DBSup, vol. 7, 506, 524, 551). But ἀγοράζειν is the most specific verb for the purchase-sale of slaves as merchandise that one buys like clothing, grain, wine, or fish (P.Mich. 657, 5; cf. M. P. Hervagault, M. M. Mactoux, “Esclaves et société d’après Démosthène,” in Actes du Colloque 1972 sur l’esclavage, Paris, 1974, p. 62). On the slave markets and their sales, C.Ord.Ptol. 22 and 25; IGLS 4028, 37–39; Josephus, War 3.541; Plutarch, Cat. 21.1: “Cato used to buy especially prisoners of war who were still small so that he could raise them, train them like puppies or colts”; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 23; C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, pp. 834ff.

⁶ Delphi, 165/4 BC, in J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. 42; cf. P. Foucart, Mémoire sur l’affranchissement des esclaves, Paris, 1867; RIJG, vol. 2, pp. 251ff.; G. Daux, Delphes au II^e et au I^{er} siècle, Paris, 1936, p. 46–69, 615ff. Idem, “Note sur l’intérêt historique des affranchissements de Delphes,” in Proceedings IX, pp. 286–292; A. Kränzlein, “Zu den Freilassungsinschriften aus Delphi,” dans Mélanges V. Arangio-Ruiz, Naples, 1964, vol. 2, pp. 820–827. —At Butrini in Epirus, twenty-nine acts of emancipation by consecration to Asclepius have been recovered (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1967, p. 503, n. 336; cf. 1969, p. 425, n. 1). Two slaves were emancipated at the sanctuary of Phisto (second century BC; cf. IG, vol. 9, 12, 99; L. Robert, Noms indigènes, p. 32). An analogous consecration to Sarapis (C. Michel, Recueil, n. 1393; P.M. Fraser, “Two Studies on the Cult of Sarapis,” in Opuscula Atheniensa, Lund, 1960, pp. 43ff.), to Artemis Gazoria (SEG, vol. 2, 396). The Jews emancipated their slaves in the synagogue (CII, Vatican City, 1936, vol. 1, n. 690; sometimes to pagan gods, n. 711–712), just as Christians carried out this manumission in the church (St. Augustine, Serm. 21.6; cf. F. Fabrini, La manumission in ecclesia, Milan, 1965), etc.

⁷ SEG, vol. 14, 529, 4: ε—λεύτερον ι—ερόν τα—ς θεοῦ; cf. H. W. Pleket, Rijksmuseum, pp. 19ff.; L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 6, Paris, 1948, pp. 9, 46, 49.

⁸ Οἱ τοῦ Χριστοῦ (possessive genitive), 1Cor 15:23; Gal 5:24; cf. “Ce que signifie le nom de Chrétien” in C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, pp. 407ff.

⁹ St. Paul twice uses the compound form ε—ξαγοράζω for “redeem the time” (Eph 5:16; Col 4:5; cited in a Christian letter of the fourth century, P.Lond. 1927, 45; cf. H.I. Bell, Jews and Christians in Egypt, pp. 110ff.; the only occurrence in the papyri. On the meaning of this expression, cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, p. 511; B. Häring, “La Théologie morale et la sociologie pastorale dans la perspective de l’histoire du salut: La Notion biblique de ‘kairos,’” in ScEccl, 1964, pp. 209–224) and twice in Gal 3:13—“Christ has redeemed us from the curse of the law” (cf. W. Elert, “Redemptio ab Hostibus,” in TLZ, 1947, pp. 265–270; E. Pax, “Der Loskauf: Zur Geschichte eines neutestamentlichen Begriffes,” in Anton, 1962, pp. 239–278; S. Lyonnet, L. Sabourin, Sin, Redemption and Sacrifice, Rome, 1970, pp. 104ff.). It is clear that the compound form ε—ξαγ. has the same meaning as the simple verb ἀγ. and that it is understood to involve redemption ε—π̄ ε—λευθερία (cf. Gal 5:1). S. Lyonnet, “L’Emploi paulinien de ε—ξαγοράζειν au sens de ‘redimere’ est-il attesté dans la littérature grecque?” in Bib, 1961, pp. 85–89, shows that the references often made to Diodorus Siculus 36.2.2; Polybius 3.43.2; Plutarch, Crass. 2.5; Dicaearchus 1.22 have the sense of purchasing and not of redeeming. But he cites Diodorus Siculus 15.7, where Plato, who has been sold on the slave market, is “redeemed” by his friends who thus restore his liberty. Of course, there is no question of a prisoner, or of the paying of ransom, but it is indeed a matter of emancipation from servitude ε—π̄ λύσει.

ἀγωγή

agoge, conduct

agoge, S 72; TDNT 1.128–129; EDNT 1.25; NIDNTT 3.935; MM 8; L&N 41.3; BAGD 14–15

St. Paul praises Timothy for having followed him “in teaching, conduct, purpose, faith, patience . . .” (2Tim 3:10). Clearly, the NT hapax agoge, here used in a figurative sense, should be translated “conduct, manner of life.”¹ It is sometimes used in a derogatory sense, for foul schemes,² but for the most part it expresses either the culture³ or the conduct or manner of life peculiar to a given race or a given individual (Diodorus Siculus 5.26), such as Esther, who changed nothing of her ways (Esth 2:20), or the Jews who preferred their particular way of life,⁴ or Herod entreating, “Let everyone consider my age, the life that I lead (ten agogen tou biou) and my piety” (Josephus, War 1.462).

Frequently—and this nuance is discernible in 2Tim 3:10—this conduct is adopted in imitation of a master, of a model, of ancestors.⁵ This is what St. Paul called “my ways in Christ” (tas hodous mou tas en Christo).⁶ The subject for imitation, then, is not the conduct of the person but the manner of life of the apostle. It has to do with conforming to the requirements of the faith that are transmitted in the didaskalia and bear upon customs and specific mores:⁷ practical, observable applications.⁸ In the Pastorals, which develop a theology of beauty, this agoge of the apostle seems to involve a sense of the brilliance or splendor (cf. Phil 3:17; 4:9) that this term can connote in the first century,⁹ and which is at the same time a characteristic of virtue and a grace of the apostle (2Cor 4:6).

¹ BGU 1247, 14 (second century BC); letter of Antiochus II Soter to the Erythraeans, after 261 BC, φαίνεσθε γὰρ καθόλου ἀγωγῆ ταύτη χρῆσθαι (C. B. Welles, Royal Correspondence, n. 15, 15). The word can be transitive or intransitive, designating education per se or its result (Polybius 6.2.13: ἡ ε—κ παίδων ἀγωγή). The philosophical schools distinguished themselves by their agoge (Diogenes Laertius 1.19); cf. “the disciplines that belong to Hellenic education” (Marcus Aurelius 1.6); the “organization” of the Roman army (Josephus, War 3.109). The one who leads—the instructor—is ὁ παιδαγωγός; the instruction, ἡ παιδαγωγία; see K. L. Schmidt on this word in TDNT, vol. 1, p. 128, where he cites the Περὶ παίδων ἀγωγῆς of Plutarch. Plutarch uses agoge in the sense of “reasoning” (Cons. ad Apoll. 9 [but this is a spurious work—Tr.]) as does Chrysippus (cf. SVF, vol. 2, 84; cf. “method” in Aristotle, Rh. 1.15.1375b12), but also with respect to “education” or the spartiate “discipline,” a “hard and painful regimen, but one that teaches the young obedience” (Ages. 1.2; 3.5; Lyc. 16–23; Cleom. 11.3; 37.14) and also with respect to simplicity and philanthropy (Ages. 1.5).

² P.Tebt. 24, 57 (117 BC); cf. A. Pelletier, Josèphe adaptateur, pp. 301ff.

³ Ep. Arist. 8: ἡ παιδείας ἀγωγή, the training that the culture gives; 124, 125: the culture and the eloquence of the philosophers (in the plural).

⁴ 2Macc 11:24; Josephus, Ant. 14.195: every question about the Jews’ way of life; P.Paris 61, 12 (156 BC): πάντα ε—στὶν ἀλλότρια τῆς τε ἡμῶ—ν ἀγωγῆς; cf. Polybius 1.32.1: “a Lacedaemonian who had received the Spartiate education.” This education has as its goal “the training of the hoplites, the heavy infantry who had been responsible for Sparta’s military superiority. . . . To have received the ἀγωγή, to have been educated in the proper fashion, was a necessary, if not a sufficient condition for the exercise of civic rights” (H. I. Marrou, History of Education, p. 42).

⁵ 2Macc 4:16—“In the very same people whose manner of life they wished to imitate and whom they wanted to be like in every respect they met their enemies and their executioners”; Ep. Arist. 43: Aristaeus a worthy representative of your own culture; 280: τὴν ἀγωγὴν μιμούμενοι; Josephus, Ant. 12.10: “determined to preserve their fathers’ type of life”; 14.247: the Romans continuing their ancestors’ way of life. In mathematics, agoge would be the carrying out of a proof, the direction of an argument; hence: to follow out a line that one is drawing from a point (C. Mugler, Terminologie géométrique, p. 41). In law, agoge is the “proceedings” (cf. R. Taubenschlag, Law of Greco-Roman Egypt, pp. 225, 331, 340, 381); in music, it isn’t the tempo (P.Oxy. 2687, 5, 15) but a succession of elements following in a certain order (cf. Ps.-Plutarch, De mus. 29), “a rhythmic series” (W. J. W. Koster, “Quelques remarques sur l’étude de rythmique, P. Oxy. 2687,” in REG, 1972, pp. 551–556).

⁶ 1Cor 4:17. Cf. 1Clem. 47.6: “It is shameful and unworthy of Christian conduct”; 48.1: “the noble and holy conduct of brotherly love.” Cf., in the first century BC, the Περὶ θεο—ν ἀγωγῆς of Philodemus of Gadara (ed. H. Diels, 1916).

⁷ I.Magn. 164, 3: ἄνδρα φιλότιμον καὶ ε—νάρετον καὶ ἀπὸ προγόνων εὐσχήμονα καὶ ἔθει καὶ κόσμιον (edited anew by Dittenberger, Or. 485); I.Car. 70, A 9, an honorific decree in favor of Euneikos, a physician of Heraclea, whose good behavior is praised: διὰ τε τὴν ι—δίαν αὐτοῦ σωφροσύνην καὶ εὐταξίαν καὶ κοσμίαν ἀγωγὴν; MAMA, vol. 8, 408, 6: ἀπὸ πρώτης ἡλικίας νεικήσας πάντας ἠθω—ν τε σεμνότητι καὶ ε—ναρέτου ἀγωγῆς; P.Princ. 75, 5: τὸν περὶ ἠθους καὶ ἀγωγῆς τρόπον (horoscope from the second century AD); P.Ant. 153, fr. 2, 17; whence the equivalence made by Hesychius: ἀγωγῆ = τρόπος, ἀναστροφῆ.

⁸ 2Macc 6:8; Ep. Arist. 246; 3Macc 4:10; SB 9763, 35; P.Oxy. 2420, 7; 2478, 7; P.Stras. 229, 6. In the inscriptions and in numerous papyri, agoge refers to the carrying capacity of the freight of a ship. Cf. I.Did., 39 a 39–40; 40, 26; 41, 28, 483, 7; BGU 1925, 21 (before 131 BC); P.Stras. 519, 3; P.Panop.Beatty 1, 121; a load (C.P.Herm. 24, 7).

⁹ Dittenberger, Or. 474, 9: διὰ τὴν κοσμιωτάτην αὐτῆς ἀγωγὴν; cf. 223, 15. An honorific decree of AD 58 praises Ermadorus and his son Ermocrates, athletes who have distinguished themselves at the Pythian Games: πεποίηνται τὰν ἀναστροφὰν καλὰν καὶ εὐσχήμονα καὶ ἀξίαν τα—ς ι—δίας πατρίδος . . . ἀπόδειξιν διδόντες καὶ τὰς περὶ τὸν βίον

ἀγωγα—ς (Syl. 740, 2–6). An honorific decree of Plutarch son of Hermogenes in the first century BC, διὰ . . . τὴν παρ ὅλον τὸν βίον ἀγωγὴν καὶ σωφροσύνην καὶ τὴν πρὸς πάντας τοὺς πολίτας ε—κτένεια καὶ φιλανθρωπίαν (P.Hermann, Ergebnisse, n. 3).

ἀδιαλείπτως

adialeiptos, unceasingly

adialeiptos, S 88; EDNT 1.31; NIDNTT 3.229–230; L&N 68.55; BAGD 179

This adverb, which means “without interruption, incessantly,” presents no difficulties. It is peculiar to the Koine and is not used in the Old Testament except in the books of the Maccabees.¹ But twice it qualifies continual prayer,² just as according to the Letter of Aristeas the priests maintain religious services without interruption.³ This is the only sense in which the word is used by St. Paul, who is the only NT writer to use it;⁴ hence it has a theological value, but one that is hard to pin down precisely.

The expression “make mention” of someone in prayer is traditional.⁵ In general, people did one proskynema each day;⁶ but it was not extraordinary for this remembering before the deity to be referred to as perpetual.⁷ Not only did St. Paul give thanks always (pantote) and on every occasion (en panti kairo), day and night,⁸ but he agreed to register in the order of widows only women who had persevered night and day in prayer (1Tim 5:5), and he instructed all Christians to “pray continually.”⁹ How is this to be understood? This precept should be linked to that of the Master when he bade his disciples to “pray under all circumstances and never give up,”¹⁰ and understood in light of the tireless diligence of the primitive church in supplication.¹¹

But does the choice of the adverb adialeiptos have some special significance? The papyri shed hardly any light, except that they corroborate the sense “continual, uninterrupted”¹² and several times the nuance “without giving in to weakness.”¹³ A single pagan inscription mentions perseverance in prayer in this way: “I, Isio, son of Kallimachos, kinsman of the king, came and passed my time adoring our lady Isis.”¹⁴ Indeed, only the Christian religion gives this term for prayer its correct meaning. Certainly the point is not the counting of verbal invocations, which would run afoul of the prohibition against battalogia;¹⁵ and at any rate, even prayer day and night assumes some breaks.¹⁶ Taken therefore in a qualitative sense, adialeiptos is hyperbolic. It expresses the positive aspect of the attitude of watchfulness that characterizes the servant of God in the end times, when it is necessary to go without sleep (Luke 21:36; Eph 6:18). It would not be adequate to make an equation with what we call today “the spirit of prayer,” a readiness to place oneself in the presence of God. It would be better to see it as “a spiritual life dominated by the presence of God”¹⁷ and as a perpetual communion with God, after the fashion of a shoot vitally connected to the vine stock. If it is true that, according to the NT, the Christian life consists in the living out of the theological virtues,¹⁸ then the believer’s connection with the three divine Persons is continual, first of all as a creature who is radically and permanently dependent on the Almighty and then as a child of God in a dynamic relationship of love with the One who has predestined him to “exist in love.”¹⁹ We may speak of prayer without ceasing when the heart does not cease to be oriented toward God, just as love never stops or slackens when one’s attention is temporarily diverted away from the beloved: everything is seen with reference to the beloved.²⁰

¹ 2Macc 3:26—two young men “whipped Heliodorus without respite”; 9:4—Antiochus Epiphanes “ordered the driver to drive his chariot without stopping”; 13:12—Maccabaeus maintained an unchangeable and unshakeable confidence.

² Onias declares: “We, then, at no time cease to make mention of you . . . in our prayers” (1Macc 12:11); the Jews implore the Lord “prostrated for three days straight” (2Macc 13:12); cf. 3Macc 6:33—the king gave thanks to heaven without ceasing.

³ Ep. Arist. 92; cf. SB 5156, 11: τυγχάνομεν ἀδιαλείπτως τάς τε θυσίας καὶ σπονδάς (inscription of Theadelphia, 57 BC); 7746, 14.

⁴ 1Thess 1:2; 2:13; 5:16; Rom 1:9; we might add the adjective ἀδιάλειπτος in 2Tim 1:3—“I am full of gratitude toward God . . . when I ceaselessly make mention of you in my prayers, night and day.”

⁵ Μνεΐαν ποιούμαι (Plato, Phaedrus 254 a); 1Thess 1:2; Rom 1:9; Eph 1:16; Phlm 4; cf. Phil 1:3; 2Tim 1:3; P.Cair.Zen. 59076, 3; 59093, 3; P.Lond. 42, 6: “all members of the household remember you continually, οἱ—ε—ν οἴκῳ πάντες σου διαπαντὸς μνεΐαν ποιούμενοι” (24 July 172 BC); 1658, 6; BGU 632, 5: μνΐαν σου ποιούμενος παρὰ τοι—ς ε—νθάδε θεοι—ς ε—κομισάμεν ε—ν ε—πιστόλιον (second century BC); I.Priene, 50, 10: in the second century BC, the inhabitants of Erythrae decide to reward a judge, “so that it will be seen that the people remember good men, ὅπως οὖν καὶ ὁ δῆμος φαίνεται μνεΐαν ποιούμενος τῶ—ν καλῶ—ν καὶ ἀγαθῶ—ν ἀνδρῶν.”

⁶ P.Alex. 28, 2–3: τὸ προσκύνημά σου ποιῶ— καθ ε—κάστην ἡμέραν; 30, 3; P.Hamb. 89, 3; PSI 206, 4; cf. P.Stras. 268: “Each day, I prostrate myself on your behalf before all the gods of the place I am in” (published by F. Dunand, “Les noms théophores en -ammon,” in ChrEg, 1963, p. 135).

⁷ P.Mich. VIII, 502, 4: εὐχομαι καὶ τὸ προσκύνημά σου ἀδιαλείπτως ποιούμενος (second century BC); cf. a “perpetual institution” of lamps in the temple of Heracleopolis (BGU 1854, 4ff.). “Not only did they mention names in prayer, but they also inscribed them in the sanctuaries . . . as a perpetual prayer” (M. J. Lagrange, Romains, p. 14).

⁸ 1Thess 3:10, cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, pp. 358ff.

⁹ 1Thess 5:17—ἀδιαλείπτως προσεύχεσθε (present imperative).

¹⁰ Luke 18:1 (C. Spicq, “La parabole de la veuve obstinée et du juge inerte aux décisions impromptues,” in RB 1961, pp. 68ff.), cf. the intense prayer (ε—κτενω—ς, Luke 22:44) that requires sustained effort.

¹¹ Acts 1:14; 2:42; 6:4; Col 4:2; cf. C. Spicq, Théologie Morale, p. 359.

¹² Ep. Arist. 86: the material of the veil was animated with a continual motion; BGU 180, 10: ε—ν λειτουργία ει—μι ἀδιαλείπτως; P.Mert. 98, 3 and P.Oxy. 2420, 13: a stipulation that has perpetual validity; P.Lond. 122, 32: a continuous gift of food (magical papyrus of the fourth century; cf. Pap.Graec.Mag. VIII, 32). Cf. Marcus Aurelius 6.15: the incessant flight of time.

¹³ Notably in oaths (cf. P.Oxy. 2764, 20; 2765, 11; 2767, 12). One takes watchful care of a tree so that it will live and prosper (P.Oxy. 2969, 10; 2994, 5). Diogenes of the village of Psoaphre pledges to see that a boat is guarded night and day, without absence and without negligence, παραφυλάξειν νυκτός καὶ ἡμέρας . . . ἀδιαλείπτως καὶ ἀμέμπτως (P.Oxy. 2876, 18–20; third century); ἀμένπτως καὶ ἀδιαλείπτως (PSI 1229, 14); T. Levi 13.2—ἀναγινώσκοντες ἀδιαλείπτως τὸν νόμον τοῦ θεοῦ. There is then a psychological or mental note; cf. the joy of the king who has not let himself down (Ep. Arist. 294); P.Tebt. 27, 45: τὴν ἀδιαλίπτως προσφερομένην σπουδὴν (AD 113); Dittenberger, Syl. 1104, 35.

¹⁴ The duration of the act of adoration is expressed by the perfect διαγέωχα (A. Bernard, Philae, Paris, 1969, n. 61), 10 March 44.

¹⁵ Matt 6:7–8; cf. C. Spicq, Dieu et l’homme, p. 64; F. Bussby, “A Note on . . . βαπταλογέω in the Light of Qumran,” in ExpT, vol. 74, 1964, p. 26; P. Gaechter, Das Matthäus-Evangelium, Innsbruck, 1963, pp. 205–209.

¹⁶ Josephus uses the adjective ἀδ. with respect to continuous slaughter, renewed attacks (War 1.252; 2.489; 3.157; 5.31), which in every instance suppose some reprieves or lulls in even the most intense and constant action. By the same token, the “unceasing sorrow” felt by St. Paul (Rom 9:2) need not be actually experienced at every moment. Cf. ἀδιαλείπτως παραμει—ναι (SB 10944, 12).

¹⁷ E. Delay, “ΑΔΙΑΛΕΙΠΤΟΣ,” in RTP, 1950, p. 73.

¹⁸ 1Thess 1:3; cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 2, pp. 10ff.

¹⁹ Eph 1:4; cf. C. Spicq, ibid., pp. 208ff.; K. Romaniuk, L’Amour du Père et du Fils dans la sotériologie de saint Paul, Rome, 1961, pp. 203ff.; J. Cambier, “La bénédiction d’Eph. I, 3–14,” in ZNW, 1963, pp. 58–103; J. Winandy, “Le Cantique des cantiques et le N.T.,” in RB, 1964, p. 163. I. Hausheer, Prière de vie: Vie de prière, Paris, 1964, pp. 16ff., 67ff., 307ff.

²⁰ Cf. Eph 6:24—“All those who love our Lord Jesus Christ with an imperishable love”; ἀφθαρσία means not just immortality, but indestructibility; cf. Philo, Dreams 1.181; Plutarch, Aristides 6.3; C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 1, pp. 294ff.

ἀδύνατον

adynaton, impossible

adynaton, S 102; TDNT 2.284–317; EDNT 1.33–34; NIDNTT 2.601, 606; MM 10; L&N 71.3, 74.22; BDF §127(2); BAGD 19

The impossibility of the conversion of the apostate (Heb 6:4) is a difficult theological problem.¹ What kind of adynaton is this? In the OT, the term sometimes points to an absolute impossibility, like that of escaping the hand of God (Wis 16:15), but usually it denotes a relative or conditional impossibility, like the possibility that Onias could achieve a peaceful settlement without the intervention of the king.² In Jer 13:3, it is a rhetorical figure for expressing an absurd supposition, an event considered impossible because it is contrary to the laws of nature.³

Clearly context is everything.⁴ In the NT, almost all the occurrences are religious, and we should compare our text closely with the response of Jesus to the problem of the salvation of the rich and of everyone: “with humans this is impossible, but with God all things are possible” (para anthropois touto adynaton estin, para de theo panta dynata).⁵ Or again: “It is impossible that the blood of bulls and goats should obliterate sins” (Heb

10:4) or that one could be pleasing to God without faith (11.6), because such is the providential disposition of the economy of salvation.⁶ In the case of apostates, it is not stated that they will not be pardoned, but they are denied the possibility of reforming themselves and repenting, given their spiritual bearing and the nature of their sin: having rejected God, after having seen the light of the faith, they are psychologically incapable of making another about-face; that would be contradictory to their apostate condition.⁷ The best parallel is perhaps Philo: “It is not easy, and perhaps even impossible, for a defiant spirit to be educated.”⁸

Certainly, that which is impossible for humans is possible for God,⁹ and the whole gospel bears witness that divine initiative can change the spiritual condition of apostates, bring to them to a light and a power that will destroy the aforementioned impossibility.¹⁰ But on the one hand the context emphasizes the seriousness of the crime—“crucifying for themselves the Son of God and holding him up for public ridicule”—in order to conclude that such a soul is “rejected and close to destruction; its end is to be burned” (verse 8); on the other hand, it seems that this sin of apostasy can be assimilated to the sin against the light and the blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, which is forgiven neither in this world nor in the one to come.¹¹

¹ Cf. C. Spicq, Hébreux, vol. 2, pp. 167ff.; J. Héring, Hébreux, pp. 59ff. = ET pp. 45ff. It has been taken in the softened sense of a great difficulty (Nicolas of Lyra, Erasmus); in the Middle Ages, theologians set aside the possibility of pardon after death (Peter Lombard, Hugh of Saint Victor, Robert of Melun). Almost all the Fathers, and recently A. Richardson (An Introduction to the Theology of the New Testament, London, 1958, pp. 33, 348ff.) take this verse as a reference to the impossibility of receiving baptism again.

² 2Macc 4:5 (cf. Thucydides 6.86.3: “We cannot remain in Sicily without your concurrence”). Josephus, War 5.57: “It was impossible for him to continue his advance, because the land was crisscrossed with trenches”; 3.172; cf. Alcimus declaring to Demetrius that as long as Judas is alive it will be impossible to restore peace to the state (2Macc 14:10). The examples from Prov 30:18—to understand the course of the eagle in the sky or of the serpent on the rock—prove that adynaton is to be taken in its strict sense, even though it corresponds to the niph'al of pala', “to be arduous, difficult.”

³ “Can a Cushite change his skin or a leopard its spots? And can you, who are addicted to doing evil, do good?” (cf. Dio Cassius 41.33: “Without obeying the laws of nature, nothing can last, not even for an instant”). To represent an impossible or implausible fact or action, one juxtaposes it with one or several natural impossibilities; this is comparison ε—κ or ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀδυνάτου (E. Dutoit, Le Thème de l'adynaton dans la poésie antique, Paris, 1936, pp. ix, 50, 167ff.), which lived on in the examples cited by Roman jurists of materially impossible conditions with respect to wills and stipulations, cf. J. Michel, “Quelques formules primitives de serment promissoire et l'origine de la comparaison par adynaton,” in RIDA, 1957, pp. 139–150.

⁴ St. Gregory of Nazianzus (Orations 30; PG 36.113–116) distinguishes six kinds of impossibility, based on (1) powerlessness: a child cannot fight (cf. P.Lond. 971, 4: ἀδύνατος γὰρ ε—στιν ἡ γυνὴ διὰ ἀσθένειαν τῆς φύσεως, third-fourth century); (2) a condition ut in pluribus: a city locate on a mountain cannot be invisible; (3) reason and propriety: the friends of the groom cannot fast while the groom is with them (Josephus, Ant. 13.423: he saw the incapacity of his brother, who was supposed to succeed to the throne; War 7.144); (4) the disposition of the will: at Nazareth, Jesus could not perform many miracles because of the unbelief of the people; he did not want to perform miracles; (5) nature —but God can change nature: a camel entering through the eye of a needle (cf. Herodotus 1.32.39: “It isn’t possible, so long as one is a human, to bring together all of the advantages of which I have spoken”; Josephus, Ant. 10.196); (6) that which absolutely cannot be: that God should be evil, that two times two plus four should equal ten. We have to add scientific impossibility, as with a method that would not cover actual results (Hippocrates, De Vetere Medicina 2.6; cf. Archimedes, On Spirals 16.9; 17.27; The Equilibriums of Planes 6; The Sand-reckoner 1, etc.; numerous examples in C. Mugler, Terminologie géométrique, pp. 41ff.).

⁵ Matt 19:26; cf. Mark 10:27; Luke 18:27. Salvation is beyond the power of humans; the inability of the creature is radical; God must intervene; cf. Rom 8:3—that which was impossible for the law, because it was without power, God has accomplished. Josephus, War 2.390: without God’s help, it is impossible that such a vast empire could have been established.

⁶ On the other hand, “it is impossible for God to lie” (Heb 6:18) is an absolute impossibility which allows of no exception; cf. Philo, Etern. World 46: “It is impossible that the gods should lose their incorruptibility”; cf. 104: “In pairs of opposites, it is impossible for one term to exist without the other”; Herodotus 1.91.3: “it is impossible, even for a god, to escape destiny.”

⁷ —Αδύνατον in the sense of “not powerful,” “unable,” “there is no means,” is common in secular Greek, cf. Thucydides 1.32.5; 1.73.4.; 1.141.6.; 6.85.1; 6.102.2; 7.44; 7.64.1. Dio Cassius 1.114: “It is [psychologically]

impossible for those who have not been raised with the same mores and who do not have the same ideas concerning evil and good to be united in friendship”; 45.26: “It is morally impossible that a person raised in such disorder and in such shamelessness should not ruin his life altogether”; 5.27; 55.14: “It is impossible to satisfy the passions of the wicked”; 61.2, Domitius, father of Nero, talking about his wife Agrippina: “It is impossible for an honest man to be born to me and her.” Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.4: without allegory, the exegete cannot discover a valid meaning in the letter of a text; 3.10: humans are incapable of praising and thanking God adequately; Spec. Laws 1.32: of understanding God; Alleg. Interp. 1.34: “for some people doing good is impossible”; Change of Names 49: “It is not possible to wash and completely clean away the stains that soil the soul” (cf. Spec. Laws 1.103); Josephus, Ant. 3.230: those who are incapable of offering perfect sacrifices; Ag. Apion 5.442; P.Oxy. 2479, 19: “I cannot pay on that which I have not sown.” J. Ebert, Griechische Epigramme, p. 69.

⁸ Rewards 49: δύσκολον γάρ, μα—λλον δ ἀδύνατον ἀπιστοῦντα παιδεύεσθαι. Cf. the rigor of the Qumranians, who definitively excluded from the community those who transgressed the law in a plainly culpable manner (1QS 8.21–23, 1QM 1.6), and particularly their horror of apostasy (CD 2.17–18; 7.13; 8.1–13), which was especially accursed (cf. R. E. Brown, “The Qumran Scrolls and the Johannine Gospel and Epistles,” in K. Stendahl, The Scrolls and the New Testament, New York, 1957, pp.200ff.; A. M. Denis, Les Thèmes de connaissance dans le Document de Damas, Louvain, 1967, pp. 23, 140, 146). These “transgressors of the law” are opposed to “those who hold firm.”

⁹ Philo, Moses 1.174: τὰ ἀδύνατα παντὶ γενητω— μόνω δυνατὰ καὶ κατὰ χειρός; cf. Gen 18:14; Matt 19:28; Luke 1:37. Even the pagans confess that the gods are capable of carrying out that which is ἀδύνατον for humans, cf. A. Cameron, “An Epigram of the Fifth Century B.C.,” in HTR, 1940, pp. 118ff.

¹⁰ A. J. Festugière has shown that the power of the soul in the order of salvation has to do with the will, with a basic disposition. If God saves only those who want to be saved, how will the apostate have this fundamental desire? (Hermès Trismégiste, Paris, 1953, vol. 3, pp. 110–115).

¹¹ Matt 12:31–32; Mark 3:28–30; Luke 12:10; cf. 2Pet 2:20–22; 1John 5:16; cf. B.B. Warfield, “Misconception of Jesus and Blasphemy of the Son of Man,” in Biblical and Theological Studies, Philadelphia, 1952, pp. 196–237; A. Michel, “Péché contre le Saint-Esprit?” in Ami du clergé, 1955, pp. 123–124; O. E. Evans, “The Unforgiveable Sin,” in ExpT, vol. 58, 1957, pp. 240–244; G. Fitzer, “Die Sünde wider den Heiligen Geist,” in TZ, 1957, pp. 161–

182; R. Scroggs, “The Exaltation of the Spirit,” in JBL, 1965, pp. 360ff.; C. Colpe, “Die Spruch von der Lästerung des Geistes,” in Festschrift J. Jeremias, Göttingen, 1970, pp. 63–79.

ἀθετέω, ἀθέτησις

atheteo, to set aside, abrogate, reject; athetesis, abrogation, rejection

atheteo, S 114; TDNT 8.158–159; EDNT 1.35; NIDNTT 1.74; MM 12; L&N 31.100, 76.24; BAGD 21 | athetesis, S 115; TDNT 8.158–159; EDNT 1.35; MM 12; L&N 13.36, 76.24; BAGD 21; ND 2.77

The etymology of this verb (tithemi with alpha-privative), literally “set aside,” hardly provides a precise statement of its meaning in the language of the New Testament, but its use is varied as well as precise. First, there is the legal sense, “to abrogate, abolish, declare invalid”; thus the institution of the Aaronic priesthood has been abolished (Heb 7:18) and Christ has been manifested to destroy the reign of sin by his own sacrifice (9:26). In both cases, athetesis is chosen to express a judicial and official annulment;¹ the hereditary priesthood is radically abolished; sin can never regain its power, since it has been conquered by the blood of Christ. Athetesis is synonymous with akyrosis, “annulment.”²

In common usage, this “destruction” is only a repudiation, a refusal, or a withdrawal;³ one challenges an authority: “The one who rejects you rejects me, and the one who rejects me rejects the one who sent me”;⁴ one goes back on one’s word or perjures oneself.⁵ Hence, athetesis smacks of perfidy.⁶ This sense is the one that attaches to atheteo, used sixty times in the LXX, where it translates seventeen Hebrew words, but most frequently bagad, “deceive, be unfaithful, betray,” and pasha’, “defect, revolt,” with the result that in biblical usage this verb almost always means “be unfaithful,”⁷ to revolt,⁸ or to betray,⁹ with the sense of “deceive” or “scorn.”¹⁰ Hence the comparison in Jer 3:20—“As a woman betrays her lover, so have you betrayed me, house of Israel.” It is not just a matter of violating an agreement, or even of breaking with a person (cf. Polybius 11.36.10), but of going back on one’s decision and lying to most holy God.

It is in light of these texts that we must read 1Tim 5:12, where the young widows, when their desires are stirred up against Christ, want to remarry, “having [their] condemnation, because they have rejected their former faith.”¹¹ This pistis is not theological faith but the commitment of the widow to serve Christ and the poor, and doubtless also not to remarry. To revoke an agreement is to be unfaithful and to perjure oneself, to act toward God like a woman who betrays her lover.

¹ —Αθετέω is used for the rejection of a law (Isa 24:16; Ezek 22:26; Heb 10:28—τὸν νόμον), of a commandment (Mark 6:9—τὴν ἐντολήν), of a covenant (Gal 3:15—διαθήκην; 2Macc 14:28—τὰ διεσταλμένα), of an agreement (2Macc 13:25—περὶ τῶν συνθηκῶν). Cf. 1Macc 15:27—“He revoked all that he had agreed with Simon.”

² Cf. BGU 44, 16: διδόντα ἡμῶν ἀποχὴν καὶ ἀνδιδούντα τὴν διαγραφὴν εἰς ἀθέτησιν καὶ ἀκύρωσιν (14 July AD 102; cf. 196, 21; 281, 18; 394, 14); PSI 1131, 43 (28 August 44); P.Warr. 9, 22 (23 August 109); P.Fam.Tebt. 9, 15 (22 November 107); P.Mil.Vogl. 225, 15; P.Lips. 27, 20; P.Ryl. 174, 14: εἰς ἀθέτησιν καὶ ἀκύρωσιν (AD 112); P.Tebt. 397, 13; SB 7465, 8; 9839, 16. The invalidation of a document is the opposite of its confirmation, εἰς βεβαίωσιν (Heb 6:16; cf. Lev 25:23).

³ Cf. the withdrawal of a lawsuit: οὕτως ἐξείσχυσεν τὰ βιβλίδια ἀθετηθῆναι (P.Oxy. 1120, 8), the liquidation of an account that is to be erased from a list (P.Tebt. 74, 59; 75, 77), the refusal of grain not fit for consumption (P.Lond. 237, 23). Cf. the rejection of the wisdom of the wise (1Cor 1:19), the Pharisees and doctors of the law annulling the purpose of God (Luke 7:30; cf. Ps 33:10—ἀθετεῖ βουλάς ἀρχόντων; Jdt 16:5). Esther rejects none of Hegai’s instructions (Esth 2:15, LXX). Cf. 1Macc 11:36—“Not one of these favors shall be cancelled, from this time forth for ever”; 14:44—“No one will be permitted . . . to reject one of these points”; Heb 10:28—“Does someone reject the law of Moses?”

⁴ Luke 10:16; cf. John 12:48; 1Thess 4:8.

⁵ Mark 6:26 (cf. Ps 15:4; Polybius 8.2.5; Dittenberger, Or. 444, 18: εἰάν τις ἐάν τις τῶν πόλεων ἀθετῶσι τὸ σύμφωνον). God never fails, doesn’t change that which he has spoken (Ps 89:35; 132:11), he doesn’t revoke his words (Isa 31:2); even though men break their oaths (1Macc 6:62; cf. BGU 1123, 11: μηδενὶ ἡμῶν ἐξόντος ἀθετεῖν τῶν ὁμολογημένων—from the Augustan era).

⁶ Jdt 14:18; Isa 48:8; 1Sam 24:12—“I bear no malice, no perfidy.”

⁷ Judg 9:23; 1Chr 2:7; 5:25; 2Chr 10:19 (= 1Kgs 12:19); 36:14 (the leaders of Judah, the priests, and the people have multiplied their acts of faithlessness, ἀθετήσαι ἀθετήματα); Isa 1:2; Ezek 39:23; Dan 9:7 (Theod.).

⁸ 2Kgs 1:1; 18:7, 20; 24:1, 20 = 2Chr 36:13. Cf. Jude 8: the false teachers, “rejecting the sovereignty (κυριότητα δὲ αἰετοῦσιν).” This revolt is not so much against the leaders of the community of the civil magistrates, nor against the elders or angels, but against the divine authority (verse 4), not taking into account the ordinances of God or the law of Christ.

⁹ 1Kgs 8:50; Isa 21:2—the traitor betrays (ὁ ἄθετω—ν ἄθετει—); 24:16; 33:1; Jer 5:11—“The house of Israel and the house of Judah have betrayed me”; 12:1—the instigators of treachery (οἱ— ἄετοῦντεθ ἄετήματα).

¹⁰ 1Sam 2:17—men who scorned the offering to Yahweh; Isa 63:8; Wis 5:1. —Αθετει—ν = act faithlessly, cf. Exod 21:8; Deut 21:14. Compare the apostates who trample on the Son of God and treat as common the blood that he shed (Heb 10:28-29), as opposed to Paul who does not treat the grace of God as nothing (Gal 2:21).

¹¹ Τὴν πρώτην πίστιν ἤετησαν = fidem irritam faciens (cf. Polybius 8.36.5; 22.16.1; 22.17.5; 23.8.7). Cf. Rev 2:4—“You have relaxed your first love,” which could also be translated, “You have deserted your first love” (on the sense of ἀφιέναι, cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 3, pp. 114ff.). Cf. 2:5—τὰ πρω—τα ἔργα ποιήσον; 2:19; Jer 2:2). Cf. I. Bulg. 13, 25–26: ε—ν τῇ πρώτῃ καὶ μεγίστῃ φιλίᾳ; Philodemus of Gadara, Adv. Soph., frag. Y, col. XV, 8: τὴν πρώτην ὑπομονήν.

αι—δῶς, ἀναίδεια

aidos, modesty; anaideia, shamelessness

aidos, S 127; TDNT 1.169–171; EDNT 1.37; NIDNTT 3.826–827, 829; MM 13; L&N 88.49; BDF §47(4), 126(1b); BAGD 22 | anaideia, S 335; EDNT 1.81; MM 33; L&N 66.12; BDF §23; BAGD 54

After the manner of the pagan cults, which often regulated the grooming of their participants—clothing, jewelry, hair¹—St. Paul instructs the Ephesian women, when they pray at church, to adorn themselves with decency and sobriety (meta aidous kai sophrosynes kosmein heautas, 1Tim 2:9), because the right way for a woman to arrange or accouter herself is to observe the rules of modesty and decency.²

Aidos (from aidomai, to fear, respect) is a very old Greek concept³ expressing the respectful and secret fear that one feels toward oneself (Democritus, frag. 264, Diels). With the Stoics it became a leading virtue.⁴ Plutarch distinguishes aidos, “which often allows itself to be led by reason and places itself under the same laws,” from an unhealthy shame whose hesitations and delays are contrary to reason.⁵ In the first century AD, this sentiment is sometimes that of shame, notably the shame of soldiers who are in flight and know that they are defeated,⁶ hence awareness of guilt;⁷ it is sometimes that of respect for others,⁸ the consideration owed others. It is then a restraint, a dignity,⁹ a modesty, or a discretion that keeps one from excess;¹⁰ thus a self-respect¹¹ and a sense of honor that is often identified with modesty.¹²

This virtue finds its highest expression in women. Philo explains why there was a wall of separation between Therapeutai and Therapeutrides, “to respect the modesty appropriate to the feminine nature,”¹³ and he personifies the virtue as a woman who has “colors which are those of modesty . . . simple clothing, but more precious than gold, wisdom and virtue for her finery” (Sacr. Abel and Cain 26). This is the closest parallel to 1Tim 2:9.

If aidos is sometimes associated with the agreeable equilibrium that is epieikeia,¹⁴ it much more frequently connotes fear¹⁵ and even eulabeia, the feeling of reverence that one experiences in the presence of majesty, whether of the emperor¹⁶ or of God himself. It is in this sense that Christians offer worship to God (Iatreuein meta aidous kai eulabeias, cf. Heb 12:28).

If aidos (Latin verecundia) keeps one from committing an act unworthy of oneself, makes one avoid that which is base, anaideia (NT hapax) is effrontery or impudence that shrinks from no means of achieving its goals.¹⁷ It is the anaideia of the importunate friend who gets the three loaves that he asks for in the middle of the night.¹⁸ This noun is rare in the papyri: it is found in a list of words (P.Cair.Zen. 59534, 21); in the complaint of Kronion, priest of Tebtunis in the second century, victim of the extreme insolence of Kronios;¹⁹ in the complaint of Aurelius, attacked in the third century by a basely impudent woman;²⁰ and finally in an elegiac poem on Meleager.²¹ If the Lord praises this boldness, it is because he has just instructed his disciples to pray to the heavenly Father and ask that his name be sanctified. But in accordance with aidos—the religious fear that one experiences in the presence of the sacred—believers would be careful about being too free with their demands, would be hesitant to hail the holy God in an impetuous fashion, with too little concern for propriety. In truth, a child knows nothing of this timidity, but “pours out her heart” (1Sam 1:15) before her Father, and the tradition of Israel validates this importunity.²² It is a form of parrhesia.

¹ Cf. LSAM, n. 14 (Pergamum), 16 (Gambreion), 69 (Stratonicea), 77, 79; idem, LSCG, n. 56 (Delos), 106 (Camiros); idem, LSCG, vol. 2, n. 68 (Lykosoura); C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, vol. 1, pp. 419ff.

² The αἰ—δῶξ̄σ̄ω̄φ̄ρο̄σ̄ύ̄νη association is constant from Xenophon on (Cyr. 8.1.31; Symp. 1.8; Thucydides, 1.84.3; Diotogenes: “When, in his appearance, his thoughts, his sentences, his character, his deeds, his walk, and his carriage, the king enfolds himself in such decorum and pomp that he has a psychological effect on those who behold him, affected as they are by his dignity and his moderation” in Stobaeus 48.7.62; p. 268, 11); GVI, n. 1575 (first-second century); MAMA, vol. 7, 258, 5; Philo, Who Is the Heir 128: “the special task of human science is to give birth in the soul to restraint and moderation, virtues whose clearest manifestation is that one blushes when the occasion arises”; Prelim. Stud. 124: virtue manifests “a beauty remarkable for its modesty and propriety, beauty . . . truly virginal”; Flight 5; Sacr. Abel and Cain 27; notably in connection with κοσμεῖ—ν—κοσμιότης (Change of Names 217: “If with an older companion at his side a young man adorns himself with modesty and restraint”; Spec. Laws 3.51).

³ Cf. B. Snell, Lexikon, on this word; C. E. von Erffa, “Αἰ—δῶς und verwandete Begriffe in ihrer Entwicklund von Homer bis Demokrit,” in Philologus, Suppl. 30, 1937.

⁴ Musonius Rufus: “Aidos is the greatest good” (That Women Too Should Study Philosophy, frag. 3, p. 42, l. 24; ed. C. E. Lutz); “a feeling of shame toward all that is base” (Should Daughters Receive the Same Education as Sons?, frag. 4, p. 48, l. 3); the study of philosophy leads the king to have a sense of shame (frag. 8, p. 62, l. 18); a man who has many children has the respect of his neighbors (frag. 15, p. 98, l. 3); cf. Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 27: virtue is accompanied by modesty.

⁵ Plutarch, On Ethical Virtue 8; cf. Epictetus, Against Epicurus, in Stobaeus 6.57 (vol. 3, p. 300).

⁶ Josephus, War 3.19, 156; 4.285; 5.118; 6.20; Plutarch, Tim. 7.1: “Timoleon was ashamed before his mother.”

⁷ Josephus, Ant. 2.52; cf. War 2.351.

⁸ Toward guests (Josephus, Ant. 1.201), parents (2.23), ancestral laws (5.108), age (6.262), dignity (19.102); old men (War 2.496), suppliants (2.317), the temple (4.311), neighbors (5.33), the prince (5.87; 6.263; Ant. 19.97); Plutarch, Cleom. 32.4; Ti. Gracch. 5.2; 11.3; C. Gracch. 16.1.

⁹ Cf. the association with σεμνότης in Plutarch (Con. praec. 26) and Philo: the educators of Moses showed only restraint and seriousness, αἰ—δῶ—καὶ σεμνότητα (Philo, Moses 1.20).

¹⁰ Flaccus sojourning at Alexandria, μετὰ τοσθύτης αι—δοῦς (Philo, Flacc. 28).

¹¹ Epictetus 1.3.4; 3.14.13; 4.4.7: “It is no small thing that you are guarding; it is respect for yourself and good faith.”

¹² Cf. Marcus Aurelius 3.7.1; 5.33.3; 10.13.2. Josephus, Ant. 1.44: Adam and Eve cover themselves out of modesty; PSI 1178, 6 (second century).

¹³ Philo, Contemp. Life 33; cf. Flacc. 89: “Young girls who stay in their rooms out of modesty to avoid being seen by men”; Flight 5; Spec. Laws 3.51: “The republic of Moses has no room for the prostitute, to whom decency, chastity, modesty, and the other virtues are foreign”; Moses 2.234: The daughters of Salpaad “go to find the governor with the reserve appropriate to young girls”; Josephus, War 2.465: women from whom even the last veil of modesty has been taken away; cf. the “unspeakable shame” of Helen (Quintus of Smyrna, Posthomerica 9.144) and modesty in conjugal relations (Plutarch, Quaest. Rom. 65); ζήσαντα κοσμίως καὶ αι—δημόνως (MAMA, vol. 8, 490; cf. 414, 9: βίος αι—δήμων καὶ κόσμιος); “I hesitate to speak an indecent word in the presence of a matron” (Terence, Haut. 1042; cf. Propertius 2.6.18).

¹⁴ Josephus, Ant. 13.319: Timagenes, φύσει δ ε—πεικει—ε—κέχρητο καὶ σφόδρα ἦν αι—δοῦς ἥττων; Plutarch, De vit. pud. 2.529 c: “In shaking up false shame, one must fear taking along also its neighbors modesty, moderation, and mildness, τῆς αι—δοῦς καὶ τῆς ε—πεικειίας καὶ τῆς ἡμερότητος”; 3.530a; Dittenberger, Or. 507, 8 (second century AD).

¹⁵ Philo, Rewards 97 (φόβος).

¹⁶ When the Jews are brought into the presence of Caesar, they regard him with modesty and timidity, stretching out their hands toward him (Philo, To Gaius 352), cf. Diogenes Laertius 7.116.

¹⁷ Josephus, War 1.224: “Malichos succeeded by effrontery in getting the better of Antipater’s sons”; 1.504: “Pheroras, despairing of saving himself by honest means, sought deliverance through effrontery”; 1.616; Plutarch, De vit. pud. 11.533d: “feeling disgust and revulsion at the impudence (τὴν ἀναίδειαν) that upsets and assaults our reasoning”; 13.534b: “disagreeable folk lacking in modesty and without shame, ἀναιδω—ς καὶ ἀδυσωπήτως”; Apollonius Rhodius, Argon. 2.407: “insolent eyes.” Theognis associates it with hubris (291).

¹⁸ Luke 11:8—διὰ τὴν ἀναιδείαν. The beggar breaks all the rules of politeness and discretion; his audacity knows no modesty (cf. Sir 25:22—shame and insolence, when it is the woman who supports her husband; 60:30—the lazy person, laying aside all pride, would rather live by begging than work).

¹⁹ In EPap, vol. 8, 1957, p. 104, 11.

²⁰ Γυνή ἀναιδεία μεγίστη καὶ θράσει κεχορηγημένη, P.Oslo inv. 1482, published by S. Eitrem and L. Amundsen, in JEA, 1954, p. 30; also in SB 9421, 12. In the first century, in the Ninopedia (ed. Wilcken, in Hermes, 1895, pp. 161ff.), lines 111, 113, 118, ἀναιδής means something close to rude in speech, crude and impudent in deed.

²¹ Edited by M. Papathomopoulos, in RechPap, vol. 2, Paris, 1962, p. 101. There are two good parallels in Archilochus: “Drinking large amounts of pure wine and neglecting to pay your share of the tab . . . , without even being invited you came looking for us like someone finding himself among friends. In truth, your belly, taking away your reason, made you lose all modesty (εἰ—ς ἀναιδείην)” (Frag. 94; ed. Laserre) and P.Cair.Isid. 55, 16: six villagers, drunk and emboldened by their luck to think that they would get away with it, forcibly entered and pillaged the house of Isidorus, and furthermore they impudently pretend that the law is on their side—ὄθεν τῆς τηλικαύτης αὐτῶ—ν ἀναιδίας δεομένης κτλ. Cf. the impudence of a drunk (Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.46), P.Ryl. 141; refusing impudently to pay (AD 37) and the incipit of the edict of Cn. V. Capito, prefect of Emperor Claudius in Egypt, 7 December 48: “I have long since been informed of unjust charges caused by the exactions of persons abusing their powers with greed and impudence, πλεονεκτικῶ—ς καὶ ἀναιδῶ—ς” (SB 8248, 15–17; cf. the commentary of P. Jouguet, Observations sur les inscriptions grecques de Khargeh, in Proceedings IV, p. 8). Heraclitus, All. 70.11 includes among the “thousand faces of impudence” gluttony, brashness, and covetousness.

²² Isa 62:7—“Give him no rest”; Ps 10:12—“Arise, Yahweh”; 44:27; 74:22; 44:24—“Wake up! Why are you sleeping, Lord? Arise from your slumbers”; cf. the fight between Jacob and the angel (Gen 32:24ff.; S. H. Blank, “Men against God,” in JBL, 1953, pp. 1–14; J. L. McKenzie, “Jacob at Peniel,” in CBQ, 1963, pp. 71–76).

αι—σχροκερδής, ἀφιλάργυρος

aischrokerdes, eager for shameful gain; aphilargyros, free of the love of money

see also ἀφιλάργυρος; φιλαργυρία, φιλάργυρος

aischrokerdes, S 146; EDNT 1.41; NIDNTT 3.564; L&N 25.26; BAGD 25 | aphilargyros, S 866; EDNT 1.183; MM 98; L&N 25.109; BAGD 126

The Pharisees are stigmatized as “loving money,”¹ and according to 2Tim 3:2 people in the last days will be philargyroi; ² which can mean miserliness—often associated with meanness³—as well as covetousness. This is a vice of priests (T. Levi 17.1), above all of sophists, “vendors of words”⁴ who shamefully hawk wisdom, and of false teachers (Titus 1:11). This philargyria is the “root of all evils.”⁵

Thus we can see the message of Heb 13:5 to its readers as being “Let your ways, or conduct, be free of all greed (aphilargyros ho tropos); be content with what you have.”⁶ The Greek Fathers supposed that the Hebrews had suffered or been threatened with the loss of their goods (10:34) and must have been trying too eagerly to rebuild their resources or guarantee their material security.⁷ At any rate, trusting in Providence excludes any preoccupation with tomorrow, and one must be self-sufficient (arkeo, Matt 25:9; Luke 3:14; John 6:7; 1Tim 6:8) with that which one currently has at one’s disposal. In moral theology, aphilargyria and tharreo theo are linked.

St. Paul requires that the candidate for overseer at Ephesus be aphilargyros (1Tim 3:3), that the Cretan overseer not be eager for shameful gain, me aischrokerde (Titus 1:7), and similarly the deacons (1Tim 3:8). St. Peter urges the presbyters to shepherd the flock of God “not for sordid gain (aischrokerdos), but out of devotion.” The office of the presbyter is above all pastoral⁸ and is not a sinecure: watchfulness and continual care for the sheep, providing food, guiding the movements of the flock (Num 27:17; Ps 80:2), leading them to pasture (2Sam 5:2; Isa 40:11; Ezek 34:15; Ps 23; 95:7), keeping the sheep from dispersing and bringing back the strays (1Kgs 22:17; Isa 53:6; Zech 11:16; 13:7; Ps 119:176), defending them against savage beasts (Exod 22:13; 1Sam 17:34; Amos 3:12; Isa 31:4) and thieves (Gen 31:39; Job 1:17). Much courage and self-denial is therefore necessary in a “good shepherd” who seeks only the good of the flock and does not exploit them to his own profit.⁹ All shepherds are susceptible to the degeneration of the hireling who is transformed by the spirit of lucre into a shameless profiteer.¹⁰

This probably explains why, in discussing ministers of the church, St. Paul and St. Peter substitute for the simple aphilargyros the highly pejorative aischrokerdes.¹¹ A “steward” in the household of God has a subordinate function. He will have to turn over his accounts to his Kyrios (Luke 12:42-48); his uprightness, which must be beyond suspicion, is an essential element of the “ethic of the oikonomos” prescribed by the Lord to his servants.¹² This ethic opposes the service of mammon to the service of God (Luke 16:10-13). Xenophon had already defined it: “a good manager must not touch the goods of his master or steal them.”¹³ The Christian steward will be disinterested, no doubt in accord with agape (1Cor 13:5), but first of all in the name of honesty. His freedom from lust for money will guarantee not only his uprightness in the management of material goods but also his compassion toward all the miseries of his neighbors, because it is avarice that hardens the heart.¹⁴

¹ Luke 16:14—φιλάργυροι. Ordinarily poor, Pharisees readily became spongers, soliciting gifts, asking for payment in kind for their services, abusing hospitality. Herod becomes irritated at the wife of Pheroras, who subsidized the Pharisees (Josephus, War 1.571), Alexander Jannaeus warns his wife against religious frauds, who on the outside resemble Pharisees (idem, Ant. 13.400–402) and who are eager for gain (b.Sota 22b; J. Jeremias, Jerusalem, pp. 114ff.). The scribes “devour the resources of widows” (Mark 12:40), concerning which M. J. Lagrange (on this verse) comments thus: “taking advantage of their knowledge of the law to despoil them. In societies where the rights of women depend in large measure on the protection of male relatives, widows are natural targets of greed.”

² In the imperial era, Philargyrus is frequently used as a proper name, both among the slaves and freed slaves and also among the higher classes of society; cf. the citations brought forward by L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 13, Paris, 1965, p. 260.

³ Epictetus 2.9.12; 2.16.45; cf. Choricus of Gaza, Apol. Min. 73: Σμικρίνης δὲ φιλαργύρους ὁ δεδιώς, μή τι τω—ν ἔνδον ὁ καπνὸς οἴχοιτο φέρων (Förster-Richsteig, pp. 360–361).

⁴ Λογοπω—λοι; Philo, Prelim. Stud. 53 (Quest. Gen. 3.31), 127; cf. Giants 37, 39; Moses 2.212: “the sophists who sell, like any other commodity on the market, their principles and reasonings.”

⁵ 1Tim 6:10. This might be a citation from a comic author (S. T. Byington, “1Tim. VI, 10,” in ExpT, 1944, p. 54), but the sentence is traditional from the time of Plato: “The power that money has to give beget a thousand and one furies of insatiable greed, infinite . . . , this adoration of riches is the first and greatest source of the greatest cases of willful murder” (Leg. 9.870a). Preserved in the Jewish tradition (Sir 27:1–3; T. Jud. 19.1; Philo, Post. Cain 116; Spec. Laws 4.65: “the love of riches, a goad [or spur—ὄρμητήριο] of the greatest iniquities.” Sib. Or. 2.115: χρυσέ, κακω—ν ἀρχηγέ, βιοφθόρε, πάντα χαλέπτων; cf. 3.235) and attested in the secular literature: to love money is a supreme vice (Plutarch, Aem. 8.10); “The cause of all these evils was the desire for power arising from greed and ambition” (Thucydides 3.82.8; cf. Sir 10:8). Stobaeus attributes to Democritus the saying: πλοῦτος ἀπὸ κακῆς ἐργασίης περιγινόμενος ἐπιφανέστερον τὸ ὄνειδος κέκτηται, and to Bion: τὴν φιλαργυρίαν μητρόπολιν ἔλεγε πάσης κακίας εἶναι (10.36–37; vol. 3, p. 417; cf. Diogenes Laertius 6.50; Diodorus Siculus, Exc. 21.1); “inde fere scelerum causae” (Juvenal, Sat. 14.173); “Pecunia . . . semina curarum de capite orta tuo” (Propertius 3.7.4; 3.13.48ff.); τὸ κεφάλαιον τῶν κακῶν: ἐν φιλαργυρίᾳ γὰρ πάντ’ ἐνι (Apollodorus of Gela, in Stobaeus, Flor. 16.12; vol. 3, p. 482). The image of the root implies the ideas of cause, principle, source, equally permanent and invisible. A. Plummer notes that all the other vices have their times of satiety, but cupidity has none; even its sleep is uneasy!

⁶ The compound form ἀφιλάργυρος is well attested between the second century BC and the second century AD (I.Priene 137, 5; cf. the adverb ἀφιλαργύρως, Dittenberger, Syl. 708, 17; 1104, 26), notably P.Oxy. 33, col. II, 11: The emperor Antoninus Pius was “first of all the friend of wisdom, secondly he was no friend of money, thirdly he was the friend of the good” (cf. R. MacMullen, “The Roman Concept Robber-Pretender,” in RIDA, 1963, pp. 224ff.). Cf. A. Deissmann, Light, pp. 85–86. Onasander declares that aphilargyria should receive the highest ranking as a chief virtue, because it makes him incorruptible and objective in the handling of business(1.8).

⁷ We know the extent to which political troubles breed uncertainty and worry about tomorrow, and thus foster an awareness of provisions. Christians are exhorted to confide in Providence, which never fails (Heb 13:5-6). This Scripture citation, identical to that of Philo, Conf. Tongues 166, is not from Josh 1:5 but from Gen 28:15, supplemented with Deut 31:6, 8 (cf. P. Katz, “Hebr. 13, 5. The Biblical Source of the Quotation,” in Bib, 1952, pp. 523–525).

⁸ Acts 20:28; cf. J. Dupont, Discours de Milet.

⁹ Isa 56:11; Jer 12:10; 23:1; Ezek 34:1-10. Cf. J. Jeremias, ποιμήν, in TDNT, vol. 6, pp. 485–502.

¹⁰ Notably the deacons who distribute the church’s welfare provisions (Acts 6:3), manage funds, receive gifts, and are exposed to the corrupting power of “unrighteous mammon” (Luke 16: 9, 11). After defining αἰσχροκέρδεια as “the pursuit of sordid gain,” Theophrastus gives this example: “He serves to his guests skimpy morsels of bread. . . . Charged with distributing meats, he pretends that the one who distributes has a right to a double portion and pays himself off immediately” (Char. 30.1–2). Certainly the worker is worthy of his food (Matt 10:10; Luke 10:7) and the cultivator of crops deserves part of the harvest (2Tim 2:5). The first ministers of the gospel lived at the expense of the communities (1Cor 9:4-14; 2Cor 12:13-17) and received “honoraria” (1Tim 5:17-18). But they had to remain disinterested (Acts 20:33). St. Jerome specifies: “Qui altario servierint, de altario vivant [1Cor 4:13-14]. Vivant, inquit, non divites fiant” (“Let those who serve at the altar live by the altar. Let them live, it says, not let them become rich,” In Tit. 1.7). Nothing is as shameful as the spirit of lucre in the service of souls, which demands total devotion of oneself (2Cor 12:14-15).

¹¹ This sordid greed is associated with villainy in Demosthenes (3 C. Aphob. 4). Aristotle makes it a vice against honor and moral beauty (Eth. Nic. 4.33.1121b7ff.). The emphasis is less on grasping greed (Josephus, Life 75) than on the baseness of this covetousness and its consequences: an attack on human and religious dignity (cf. 1Tim 3:8—σεμνούς); thus it is a literally “ignoble” passion (cf. Simon the Sorcerer, Acts 8:18ff.). Plautus designates in the same way the basely greedy man (turpilucricupidus) or “Mr. Vulture” (Trin. 100); cf. P. Monteil, Beau et laid, Paris, 1964, pp. 262ff. D. B. Durham, Vocabulary of Menander, p. 39. The adjective αι—σχροκερδής is not attested in the papyri before the fourth century (P. Vindob. Tandem, n. 4, 18), and similarly the noun (P. Oxy. 2267, 7).

¹² Cf. C. Spicq, “L’Origine évangélique des vertus épiscopales,” in RB, 1946, pp. 36–46; D. Webster, “The Primary Stewardship,” in ExpT, vol. 62, 1961, p. 274.

¹³ Oec. 14.2; cf. P. Landvogt, Epigraphische Untersuchungen über den OIKONOMOS, Strasbourg, 1908.

¹⁴ “Obduratio contra misericordiam” (St. Gregory the Great, Moral. 31.45).

αι—φνίδιος, αι—φνιδίως, ε—ξάιφνης aiphnidios, sudden; aiphnidios, exaiphnes, suddenly

aiphnidios, S 160; EDNT 1.44; MM 16; L&N 67.113; BAGD 26 | exaiphnes, S 1810; EDNT 2.1; MM 221; L&N 67.113; BDF §25; BAGD 272

Derived from aiphnes-aipsa, the adjective aiphnidios (“sudden, unforeseeable”) is used for an unexpected arrival (Thucydides 8.14.1), but usually for a development that causes fear.¹ The courage of the optimist is seen in his remaining “unruffled and imperturbable when some cause for fear unexpectedly appears” (Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 3.11.1117a18), such as an epidemic (“pride is overcome by the sudden and unexpected [to aiphnidion kai aprosdoketon], that which does not conform to expectations,” Thucydides 2.61.3) or especially death: “an unexpected death suddenly took his life” (Aeschylus, PV 680); “God who is responsible for sudden deaths”;² especially in decrees of consolation, as at Cyzicus,³ at Sebaste in Phrygia (SEG VI, 189, 4), etc.

The LXX uses the adjective only twice: for a sudden and unexpected fear (aiphnidios kai aprosdoketos phobos, Wis 17:14), and for the sudden and terrifying arrival of enemies.⁴ Philo uses it a few times in a positive sense (the sudden light of wisdom, Sacr. Abel and Cain 78; Migr. Abr. 156, 184; Dreams 2.137) or in the neutral sense of a sudden change (Alleg. Interp. 1.17; Flacc. 154), but the other occurrences are all pejorative: the wind and the storm that capsize ships (Cherub. 38; Husbandry 174–176; Spec. Laws 4.201), sudden floods (Dreams 2.125), the rising tide and waves that cause disasters (Moses 1.179; 2.254), a cloud of dust that causes a cruelly painful ulceration (ibid. 1.127), lightning that annihilates with one strike (ibid. 2.154, 283), the sudden collapse of a wall (Etern. World 129), the sudden attacks of criminals (Spec. Laws 1.75), the sudden death of animals as the prelude to pestilential epidemics (Moses 1.133). This suddenness is also a characteristic of evil: the sudden inability to grasp the idea of the good and keep it in oneself (Giants 20); errors attack the soul all at once and besmirch it (Flight 115); the sudden loss of moral precepts (Unchang. God 89; cf. 26); a sudden dissoluteness (Spec. Laws 3.126; Rewards 146); “a sudden and unexpected trouble seized them” (aiphnidios kai aprosdoketos tarache, Joseph 211); “a blind and sudden onset of folly and rage” (Flacc. 140).

In Josephus, reference is also made to disasters that strike terror (War 5.472), to shakings of the earth (Ant. 4.51), to sudden death and sickness (7.325; 12.413; Life 48), to sudden reversals of fortune (18.197), and thus sudden fear (9.199). Suddenness is often neutral, however: the wind changes suddenly (War 7.318), a cloud descends suddenly (Ant. 4.326), flame suddenly bursts out (3.207; War 4.180), someone shows up unexpectedly (Life 253), guards wake up suddenly (War 6.69), defenders suddenly open the gates (4.553; Ant. 7.139); but especially attacks by soldiers are so described.⁵

In his warnings concerning the last days, the Lord urges vigilance, as at the prospect of a cataclysm. This is not the time for spiritual lethargy: “Watch yourselves, lest your hearts be weighed down with excessive eating and drinking and the preoccupation of life, lest that day come upon you unawares (episte eph’ hymas aiphnidios he hemera ekeine) like a snare” (Luke 21:34). The unexpectedness of the coming of the divine Judge is supposed to inspire fear and thus wakefulness—a meaning of aiphnidios that conforms completely with classical Greek, the LXX, and Philo and is comparable to en tachei in the parable of the Widow and the Judge.⁶ Thus the word here has a technical sense, almost equivalent to “formidable.” St. Paul retains it: “When they say, ‘Peace and security,’ then ruin will suddenly befall them (tote aiphnidios autois ephistatai olethros), like the pains of a woman in labor” (1Thess 5:3); the unforeseen character of the distress makes it all the harder to bear.

With the same meaning: “Watch, for you do not know when the master of the house is coming . . . lest coming suddenly (me elthon exaiphnes) he find you sleeping” (Mark 13:36). The compound form exaiphnes, referring to an unforeseen arrival, one that is not announced, for which there was no warning, is almost synonymous with the simple aiphnidios and could be translated “instantaneously, all at once.”⁷ In the LXX, with a single exception,⁸ it is used only in the context of disaster (Prov 24:22; Isa 47:11—apoleia); the desert wind striking the house, which collapses, burying the children (Job 1:19); suddenly falling prey to creditors (Hab 2:7); “in an instant, in a single day, the loss of children and widowhood” (Isa 47:9); “suddenly devastation comes to us” (Jer 6:26); “on the mother I have made sudden sleeplessness and terror to fall” (Jer 15:8). Philo, who gives this adverb the meaning “rapidly,” uses it sometimes in a positive, even a religious sense,⁹ or in a neutral context: to appear suddenly (Sacr. Abel and Cain 26), to burst in suddenly (Flacc. 113; To Gaius 217), a statue set up unexpectedly (To Gaius 337). By far the commonest use, however, is with woes: lightning that destroys everything (Alleg. Interp. 3.227), a torrent that overflows (Post. Cain 113), a ship that suddenly wrecks at port after a safe voyage (Dreams 2.143; cf. Virtues 49), bad weather and disasters (Abraham 138; Moses 1.118; Etern. World 141), human misery.¹⁰

Like aiphnidios, the adverb exaiphnes means “suddenly, all at once,” like the light that shone around Paul on the Damascus road (Acts 9:3; 22:6), as well as “immediately, immediately afterward, forthwith.” When the angel had announced the birth of a Savior to the shepherds of Bethlehem, “suddenly” there was with the angel “a large number of the host of heaven praising God” (Luke 2:13); “a spirit seizes him (the epileptic), and suddenly he screams” (Luke 9:39); this meaning is entirely classical: “as soon as he heard their sudden bitter cry, . . . he said” (Sophocles, OC 1610); the judge sees each soul “immediately after death” (Plato, Grg. 523 e; cf. Cra. 396 b). The LXX has this usage: “these woes, from which you will not quickly extricate yourselves” (Mic 2:3), as do Philo (Creation 113) and Josephus (Ant. 7.225).

¹ Plutarch, Crass. 9.3: “The Romans, dismayed by the suddenness of the attack, took flight.” The adjective is unknown in the papyri, but the adverb αἰ—φινιδίως means “immediately, at once”: “Before there was time to asked him when he wanted to leave, he told me at once, ‘Today’” (P.Fay.

123, 21); a condemned man immediately asks that his remaining property be sold (P.Stras. 334 b 3). Numa had had a very simple meal served, but announcing that the goddess had arrived, he suddenly (αι—φνίδιον) had a magnificent table prepared for his guests (Plutarch, Num. 15.2); on the tombstone of a young woman who died at the age of twenty: “suddenly I was ravished by Hades” (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 84, 8 = SB 6178; SEG 8.484; CII 1508); on the tombstone of Politta, dead at age five: “I rest in Hades, to which I was suddenly carried off” (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques 96, 7).

² Heraclitus, All. 8.4: τοι—ς αι—φνιδίοις θανάτοις; Thucydides 2.53.1: “prosperous men died suddenly.”

³ Κτανθείς αι—φνιδίως λαθρίου ἀνδρὸς ἄρε, W. Peek, in Athenische Mitteilungen, 1931, p. 129, n. 14. L. Robert (“Enterrements et épitaphes,” in L’Antiquité classique, 1968, pp. 418ff.) cites an honorific decree from Olbia: When Nikratos was killed in an ambush, the people were suddenly thrown into distress (αι—φνίδιος συμφορὰν θεασάμενος, Dittenberger, Syl. 730, 20; cf. 709, 9; Or. 339, 18), the epitaph of Arkesine, or of Philostorgus, dead at age twenty, ἀρπασμ̄ ε—γενήθην αι—φνιδίου Μοίρης (GVI, n. 1097, 4), that of Amorgus or the young Bryto, who died suddenly at the peak of her youth and beauty (IG XII, 7, 239; cf. 52, 394, 395, 397, 399, 401).

⁴ 2Macc 14.17; cf. 3Macc 3:24. αι—φνιδίως: a surprise attack on Jerusalem (2Macc 5:5); fear of sudden treachery on the part of enemies (14:22).

⁵ War 5.75; Ant. 6.79, 362; 7.73; 8.377; 9.82, 113; cf. the meaning “right away, immediately afterward” (War 4.420). Dionysius of Halicarnassus: “Caesar frightened Ariovistus by the suddenness of his attack” (τω— αι—φνιδίω τῆς ε—φόδου, 38.47).

⁶ Luke 18:7-8 contrasts the slowness or patience of God—who delays (μακροθυμει—), takes a long time to do justice for his people—with his sudden and rapid (ε—ν τάχει = speedily) intervention. The emphasis is on prompt execution (cf. Rev 22:12; Plutarch, Tim. 21.7). We may interpret “suddenly, all at once, at one stroke” or better “like lightning”; swiftness is a sign of diligence, of a resolute and sovereign will, cf. C. Spicq, “La Parole de la Veuve obstinée et du Juge inique aux décisions impromptues,” in RB, 1961, pp. 68–90; H. Riesenfeld, “Zu μακροθυμει—ν (Lk XVIII, 7),” in J. Blinzler, Neutestamentliche Aufsätze: Festschrift J. Schmid, Regensburg, 1963, pp. 214–217.

⁷ Homer, Il. 17.738: “the fire that instantly flared up”; 21.14; Pindar, Ol. 9.52: “suddenly this tide went down”; Aeschylus, PV 1077: “it is not suddenly, unexpectedly, that you will find yourself caught in the inescapable net of woe”; Hierocles: διὰ τὰς ε—ξαιφνιδίους καὶ ἀπροσδοκίτους ε—πιδρομάς τῆς τύχης (in Stobaeus, Flor. 84.27.20; vol. 4, p. 664, 2; cf. Plato, Cra. 414 a). Plato defines the instantaneous (τὸ ε—ξαιφνης) as “the point of departure for two inverse changes” (Prm. 156 d); likewise Aristotle: “the instantaneous is a change that happens in a time that is so quick that it cannot be noticed” (Ph. 4.13.222b15); Iamblichus: “The one (superior, perfect) can do everything at once and uniformly; the other (deficient, less perfect) cannot act all at once or suddenly (οὔτε ε—ξαιφνης) or indivisibly” (Myst. 1.7 = 21.4); “the gods in an instant (ε—ξαιφνης), so to speak, made a clean cut” (5.4 = 203.12). Suddenness is characteristic of miraculous manifestations (Plutarch, De def. or. 17) and dream images: “Suddenly I opened my eyes and saw the Twins” (UPZ 78, 7). In the papyri, ε—ξαιφνης refers to the instantaneousness of a departure (P.Giss. 86; P.Flor. 175, 7; SB 9558, 10; cf. 8858, 48), to hearing news quickly (P.Lond. 1914, 3), “I warned you that very soon we would have no more hay for the horses” (P.Mich. 21, 2). Zoilus wanted to prepare for the feast of Arsinoè, καὶ μὴ ε—ξαιφνης ἀπαράσκευοι καταληφθω—μεν (P.Cair.Zen. 59096, 4); a Libyan marauder broke in “suddenly at dawn” (ε—ξαιφνης ὑπὸ τὸν ὄρθον, P.Oxy. 3292, 15; cf. Acts 5:21).

⁸ Mal 3:1—“Suddenly the Lord whom you seek will arrive in his temple, the king of the covenant.” —Εξαιφνης translates the Hebrew pith'om or petha', which may well come from the Akkadian pitta, pittimma, ina pitta = instantaneous; cf. D. Daube, The Sudden in the Scripture, Leiden, 1964, p. 3.

⁹ Unchang. God 37: “the young plants quickly spring up”; 92: “all at once we find the treasury of faithfulness complete”; 97; Migr. Abr. 35; Change of Names 165; Moses 1.65, 283: “suddenly seized with a divine rapture”; Rewards 15: “suddenly seized by ardor and love for the better”; Cherub. 100.

¹⁰ Moses 2.271: “the people were suddenly blinded”; Spec. Laws 1.57: the burning of rage; 3.96: of implacable torments; 107; Joseph 23, 238: of tears; 214: “Sorrow and fear, the bitterest of evils, fell suddenly upon them”; Husbandry 176: “involuntary offenses swoop down suddenly, thoughtlessly”; To Gaius 123: “suddenly to find oneself without shelter or hearth, expelled and banished.” In Josephus, ε—ξαιφνης is used for an unexpected arrival (War 1.87; 2.13; Ant. 7.218, 299, 333; 13.391), an abrupt about-face (War 1.101), a fire (2.49), a tower that collapses (2.436;

4.65), the shaking of the earth (Ant. 10.269), a sudden attack or violence (13.337; War 5.71).

ἄκακος

akakos, good, beneficent, innocent

akakos, S 172; TDNT 3.482; EDNT 1.48; NIDNTT 1.561, 563; MM 17; L&N 31.34, 88.2; BAGD 29

This adjective is used only twice in the NT (Rom 16:18; Heb 7:26) and is rather rare in classical Greek, where kakos (“bad, of bad quality”) is quite plentiful.¹ The alpha privative (“non-bad”) should not throw us off the track. The first meaning of akakos is “positively good”; Aeschylus, Pers. 662: “Come, beneficent father Darius”; but there is also Demosthenes, C. Euerg. 47.46: “his pretended innocence made an impression on the judges”; Plato, Tim. 91 d: “these men who are devoid of evil but light-minded, with their thoughts turned toward the heavens”; Polybius 3.98.5: the Carthaginian general Bostar “was a man without malice (akakon onta ton andra) and by nature mild,”² like the Lacedaemonian general Callicratides, “of a mild character and a simple soul” (akakos kai ten psychen haplous, Diodorus Siculus 13.76); Menander, Dysk. 222: “you who leave an innocent young woman (akakon koren) all alone, with no more precaution than if the house were empty.”³ Childlike innocence, meaning ignorance of error, of moral evil, of vice, is often mentioned in the funerary epigrams,⁴ as at Olympus: “Here lies Pisidis Hermaios, son of Hermas, an innocent child.”⁵

This double meaning “perfect, whole,” and “innocent, without malice” is also found in the fifteen occurrences in the LXX. It means the former when it translates the Hebrew tam, tamîm, “whole, without defect”: “Job was a perfect and upright man” (anthropos akakos alethinos amemptos, Job 2:3, cf. 8:20; 36:5; Prov 2:21; 13:6). On the other hand, the meaning “simple, without malice” is clear in Jer 11:19—“I, like an innocent lamb (hos arnion akakon) that is led to the slaughter.” The Hebrew ‘alûph, “tame,” was understood to mean “without malice, naive,” not suspecting that it was being led to its death. Akakos is linked with uprightness (Ps 25:21). But the LXX created a new type of “simple” (Hebrew pethî), something like “ingenuous,” almost foolishly simple,⁶ as opposed to the crafty, the clever, the astute, the sly, the deceitful. The Book of Proverbs is addressed to those who are inexperienced and simple (akakois) to teach them discernment (Prov 1:4; 8:5); they need to be educated (15:10, paideia akakou) because they are ignorant and will only learn prudence little by little (21:11, panourgotos ginetai ho akakos); they are considered simpletons and derided (1:22). They believe everything that they are told (14:15), and their ignorance of all malice leaves them incapable of resisting the temptations of concupiscence, so they let themselves be perverted (Wis 4:12). They are a bit dim.

This candor is a function of age (“the perfect innocence of newborns”)⁷ and of virtue (Diodorus Siculus 5.66). The high priests must not keep company with any but “totally innocent and upright folk” (Philo, Spec. Laws 1.105), but this naiveté or simplemindedness is dangerous, because it makes a person credulous, and astute and hypocritical people take advantage. Charlatans link up with “simple and ingenuous souls (aplastous kai akakotatois ethesi) whom they lure and deceive.”⁸

These are the credulous simpletons who are in view in Rom 16:18, which warns against “those people,” Judaizers or Gnostics who instigate dissension and scandal through their teaching (verse 17); “they seduce the hearts of the simple,”⁹ i.e., of naive people who are easily duped. In contrast, when Heb 7:26 writes of Christ the heavenly high priest, “Such is the high priest that we needed, holy, innocent, undefiled” (hosios, akakos, amiantos),¹⁰ this means absolute perfection in the sense of the Book of Job, with an extreme insistence on the absence of any stain, for in heaven he is even “separated from sinners.” Hence the redundancy of these adjectives, which amounts to a superlative. Hosios implies (1) consecrated to God as a priest; (2) holy in the cultic sense, possessing the qualities necessary for the accomplishment of the sacred functions;¹¹ (3) holy in the moral sense, possessing a perfection that is lacking in nothing, carrying God’s will completely. Akakos means that like an innocent lamb (Jer 11:19), Christ is the spotless victim, acceptable to God (Job 8:20). Amiantos means without stain, pure, is the adjective used for the chaste (Heb 13:4), for a consecrated temple (2Macc 14:36; 15:34), for authentically religious acts (Jas 1:27). The perfection of the Christ-Priest is thus consummate, absolute, religious, and moral.

¹ Cf. W. Grundmann, “κακός, ἄκακος,” in TDNT, vol. 3, pp. 469–487. Having no known etymology, κακός expresses a lack, an incapacity, a weakness; the substantive κακόν, κακά: woe, suffering, ruin; κάκωσις: mistreatment (Acts 7:34); the denominative verb κακώω = mistreat, do evil, destroy (Acts 7:6, 19; 12:1; 14:2; 18:10; 1Pet 3:13). The philosophers reflected on evil, its origin, nature, and consequences. On the moral level, κακός is the opposite of ἀγαθός and ἀρετή (Rom 7:19-21; 12:21; 13:3-4; 16:19; Philo, Post. Cain 32; Good Man Free 84; Spec. Laws 2.53; Flight 62, 79; Epictetus 2.4.4; 4.1.42; Stobaeus, Ecl. 2.7.5; [Zeno, vol. 2, p. 57, 19; p. 70, 14: κατὰ τὰ περὶ ψυχῆν, 1.1.12; Cleanthes, vol. 1, p. 26, 6]; Plutarch, De comm. not. 17, 34; De Stoic. rep. 35), especially in the LXX, where the term is found ninety-five times in Proverbs alone. In the NT, (Mark 7:21, 23; 1Tim 6:10; Jas 1:13; 3:8; 1Pet 3:10, quoting Ps 31:13-17), κακός is replaced especially by ἀμαρτία and πονηρός; cf. Col 3:5—επιθυμίαν κακὴν (like Philo, Spec. Laws 4.84) and Luke 16:25—τὰ κακά, ruin, woe.

² Cf. Plutarch, De aud. poet. 7, contrasting θαυμαστικοὶ καὶ ἄκακοι with καταφρονητικοὶ καὶ θρασει—ς.

³ Cf. Anaxilas, regarding flatterers: εἰ—ς ἄκακον τὸν ἀνθρώπου τρόπον (Athenaeus 6.254 c; cf. J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 2, p. 344, 9 A).

⁴ Cf. H. Herter, “Das unschuldige Kind,” in JAC, 1961, pp. 146–162; L. Robert, “Enterrements et épitaphes,” in L’Antiquité classique, Brussels, 1968, pp. 430–433.

⁵ Πισίδης Ἑρμαι—ος, υἱ—ὸς Ἑρμοῦ, ἄκακον παιδεῖν (= παιδίον) ε—νθάδε κει—ται, TAM II, 3, n. 1147. The papyri provide only two occurrences of ἄκακος, which are cited by Moulton-Milligan: a rental contract on a house, λ[άχαν]ον νέον νέον καθαρὸν ἄδολ(ον) . . . ἄκακον, i.e., not damaged, intact (BGU IV, 1015, 1; third century AD); a receipt for the payment for a shipment of 1,485 1/4 artabai of grain: σίτου ... καθαροῦ ἀκάκου (P. Oxy. 142, 5; sixth century).

⁶ Ps.-Plato, Il Alc. 140 c: “People share unreason (ἀφροσύνην). Those who have the most of it we call madmen (μαινομένους); those who have somewhat less we call fools and nuts . . . some are fanatics, some are simple; others are people without malice (ἀκάκους), without experience (ἀπείρους), simpletons (ε—νεούς).”

⁷ Philo, Spec. Laws 3.119; Virtues 43: “They spared the young women out of pity for their innocent youth” (ἄκακον ἡλικίαν); Flacc. 68: these men burned people without pity for innocent youth (ἄκακον ἡλικίαν); To Gaius 234: τὴν ἄκακον ἡλικίαν; Plutarch, Mulier. virt. 23: παιδίσκη νέα καὶ ἄκακος; cf. Aristotle, Rh. 2.12.1389b9. Josephus does not use this adjective.

⁸ Philo, Spec. Laws 3.101; Husbandry 96: “a serpent who speaks with a human voice, who insinuates himself into the most innocent ways of life (ἀκακωτάτοις ἤθεσιν), who deceives a woman through the false splendor of his seduction”; Joseph 6: “in his innocence (ἀκάκοις τοι—ς ἤθεσιν), Joseph did not perceive his brothers’ secret enmity”; Pss. Sol. 4.6—the judge who lives in iniquity “is ready to enter any house with a smile, like an innocent person” (ὡς ἄκακον); 4.25—“They deceived innocent souls

(ψυχὰς ἀκακῶ—ν) through their sophistry”; 12.4—“May God save the innocent from the tongue of the godless.”

⁹ —Εξαπατω—σι τὰς καρδίας τῶ—ν ἀκάκων. O. Michel, Der Brief an die Römer, Göttingen, 1955) translates “die Arglosen”; E. Käsemann (An die Römer, Tübingen, 1973), “die Arglosen” = “the simple” (ET Commentary on Romans, trans. G. W. Bromiley, Grand Rapids, 1980). Cf. W. Schmithals, “Die Irrlehrer von Rm XVI, 17–20,” in ST, vol. 13, 1959, pp. 51–69 (mentions the νήπιοι ε—ν Χριστῶ— of 1Cor 2:6ff.; 3:1ff); R. Devreesse, “La deuxième aux Corinthiens et la seconde finale aux Romains,” in Mélanges Tisserant, vol. 1, pp. 146–161; R. Trvijano, “Ἐὐλογία in St. Paul and the Text of Rom. XVI, 18,” in SE, vol. 6, Berlin, 1973, pp. 537–540.

¹⁰ Cf. C. Spicq, Hébreux, vol. 2, pp. 199ff. R. A. Stewart, “The Sinless High-Priest,” in NTS, vol. 14, 1967, pp. 126–135.

¹¹ S. Meinke, “Der Platonische und neutestamentliche Begriff der ὁσιότης,” in TSK, 1884, pp. 743–768; H. van der Walk, “Zum Worte ὁσιος,” in Mnemosyne, 1942, p. 118; H. Jeanmaire, “Le Substantif Hosia et sa signification comme terme technique dans le vocabulaire religieux,” in REG, 1945, pp. 66–89; L. Moulinier, Le Pur et l’impur dans la pensée des Grecs, Paris, 1952.

ἄκαρπος

akarpos, fruitless, barren

akarpos, S 175; TDNT 3.616; EDNT 2.251–252; NIDNTT 1.721, 723; MM 17; L&N 23.202, 65.34; BAGD 29

Sterility or barrenness—the incapacity for generation, the condition of that which does not produce anything—is a term that applies literally to unproductive land,¹ of trees that bear no fruit,² and of unmarried persons with no children.³ It is also used figuratively for a fruitless labor (Wis 15:4), a profitless work,⁴ such as the erga akarpa of darkness which produce nothing good or valuable (Eph 5:11), as opposed to the fruit of the light (verse 9); and above all it is used of the word of God smothered in the hearts of some by the cares of the world.⁵

It is more difficult to say exactly what the meaning is in Titus 3:14—“Our people⁶ must also learn to be first in good works . . . so that they will not be without fruit” (hina me osin akarpoi).⁷ It could refer to growth in virtue⁸ or to the gaining of a reward.⁹ Most likely, however, this is a reference to a law of fruitbearing, which is a major urgency of New Testament ethics.¹⁰ It appears in the Synoptics, from the Sermon on the Mount, where the plant is judged by its fruit (Matt 7:16-20), and the parable of the Sower (13:3-8) to the incident involving the barren fig tree (Luke 13:6-9); in St. Paul (Rom 7:4; Eph 2:10), who prescribes the bearing of fruit;¹¹ and in St. John, where the branch is judged by its productivity (John 15:2, 4-8; cf. 12:24). Hence akarpōs gains a theological significance in the language of the New Testament: if every Christian is supposed to engage in fruitful activity,¹² the false teachers are without fruit (Jude 12), and the bad Christian is one who produces no fine and noble works. His barrenness is the proof that he is a counterfeit; he is not vitally connected to Christ.

¹ Jer 2:6 (the desert without water); Polybius 12.3.2; Josephus, Ant. 15.300 (cf. War 4.452: a bare and arid mountain); P.land. 142, col. II, 24–25, second century AD (unproductive soil).

² Jude 12; Dittenberger, Syl. 900, 30 (first century AD). In AD 316, Aurelius Irenaeus, president of the carpenters' guild, relates his evaluation of a tree that has been sterile for years and is still incapable of producing any fruit (P.Oxy. 53, 9). In the papyri, this phrase constantly recurs with respect to the transfer of fields: "with the trees [or plants] that bear fruit and those that do not bear fruit" (P.Dura 26, 11; P.Michael. 42 A 18; P.Hamb. 23, 19; 68, 7; P.Avroman 1; ed. E. H. Minns, in JHS, vol. 35, 1915, pp. 22–65); cf. Epictetus 1.17.9–10: "The bushel is made of wood, it is sterile.... Logic is also sterile."

³ Dedicated epigram at Philoxenos: ὀρφανὸς ἐ—κ προγόνων, ἄγονοθ^α ανεν, ὦ τὸν ἄκαρπον βλαστόν (I.Thas., 332, 10); cf. the adverbial usage from the fourth century BC in this epitaph of Elpis: "I have twice endured the pains of childbirth, not without fruit, οὐδ ἐ—ς ἄκαρπον" (I.Sard., 104, 3). Cf. 4Macc 16:7—"Futile these seven fattenings! Useless these seven gestations . . . barren (ἄκαρποι) the first care that I gave them." According to Josephus, Abraham returned thanks to God that Sarah, at first sterile (ἀκάρπως) was then made fecund (Ant. 2.213).

⁴ 1Cor 14:14 (cf. P. Bonnard, "L'Intelligence chez saint Paul," in Mélanges F. J. Leenhardt, Geneva, 1968, pp. 13–14); cf. the irascible athletes with dry and passionate dispositions who bring no returns for their trainers—ἄκαρποι τοι—ς γυμνάζουσι—like the hot sand for the seedings of farmers (Philostratus, Gym. 42).

⁵ Matt 13:22—ἄκαρπος γίνεται; cf. Luke 8:14—οὐ τελεσφοροῦσιν; Mark 4:7—καρπὸν οὐκ ἔδωκεν.

⁶ Οἱ— ἡμέτεροι designates a definite plurality (the suffix -tero added to ἡμεῖς has a differentiating function, cf. E. Benveniste, Noms d'agent, Paris, 1948, p. 119): members of the same family (Plato, Menex. 248b; Strabo 6.3.3), clients (P.Oxy. 37, col. I, 16; from AD 49 P.Fam.Tebt. 24, 99, P.Oslo 80, 5), “our people” as belonging to a restricted group (P.Oxy. 787, a letter of recommendation from the year 16: ὡς ἔστιν ἡμέτερος = as he is one of ours; cf. in 116, at the time of the Jewish insurrection in Egypt: οἱ— ἡμέτεροι ἠττήθησαν, C.Pap.Jud. 438, 7; P.Ryl. 696, 4; P.Oslo 127, 14). Here the group is Christians on Crete, as opposed to “those outside” (1Thess 4:12; 1Cor 5:12; Col 4:5; 1Tim 3:7), Jews or pagans (cf. Titus 1:10).

⁷ Several commentators see here a proleptic response to the accusations of the Romans that the Christians are useless citizens, “infructuosi in negociis” (“unproductive in business”), as Tertullian puts it; he responds: “Navigamus nos vobiscum et militamus et rusticamur et mercamur: proinde miscemus artes nostras, operas nostras publicamus usui vestro” (Apol. 42: “We sail, fight, farm, and trade with you; so also we will share our arts; we publish our works for your use”).

⁸ Cf. 2Pet 1:8—These virtues “when you possess them and they abound keep you from being either inactive or without fruit—οὐκ ἀργοὺς οὐδὲ ἀκάρπους—in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ.” —Ἀργός is used for a worker who is doing nothing (Matt 20:3, 6), for goods or properties that bring no return (P.Flor. 1, 4, 13), deeds or works that do not succeed (1Tim 5:13; Jas 2:20).

⁹ Titus proclaims, “noble deeds should not go unrewarded” (Josephus, War 6.36).

¹⁰ J. Bommer, Die Idee der Fruchtbarkeit in den Evangelien, Pfullingen, 1950(dissertation); C. Spicq, “Le Chrétien doit porter du fruit,” in VSpir, 363, 1951, pp. 605–615; F. Böckle, Die Idee der Fruchtbarkeit in den Paulusbriefen, Fribourg, 1953; A. Lozeron, La Notion de fruit dans le N.T., Lausanne, 1957. Cf. H. Riesenfeld, “Le Langage parabolique dans les épîtres de saint Paul,” in Recherches bibliques, vol. 5, Bruges, 1960, pp. 53ff.

¹¹ Cf. Col 1:6, 10, καρποφορεῖ—ν; cf. Heb 6:7-8; 12:11. Origen, commenting on the parable of the talents (Luke 19:11-27) in terms of Gen 1:28 and Wis 14:4, explains that God does not want his gifts to humankind to remain unproductive: θέλει δὲ μὴ ἀργὰ εἶναι μηδὲ ἄκαρπα μήτε ἀτελεσφόρητα τὰ δοθέντα τῷ— ἀνθρώπῳ (P.Giss. 17,22).

¹² Ἔργα = καρπός; cf. Phil 1:22—καρπὸς ἔργου; Rom 6:22—ἔχετε τὸν καρπὸν ὑμῶ—ν (subjective genitive: your personal fruit).

ἀκατάγνωστος

akatagnostos, unobjectionable, irreproachable

akatagnostos, S 176; TDNT 1.714–715; EDNT 1.48; MM 17; L&N 33.415; BAGD 29

In his preaching, Titus is to speak only “unattackable” words, so that the adversaries¹ will be disarmed, finding nothing blameworthy or unseemly to denounce (Titus 2:8). That is to say, in the church, which is a column or buttress of the truth (1Tim 3:15), one proclaims only the truth, that to which no one can raise any objection (cf. 2Cor 13:8).

The NT hapax akatagnostos, literally “nothing known against,” is a juridical term expressing the innocence of one acquitted in a trial.² It does not appear in the papyri except in the Byzantine period, with respect to an unimpeachable contract or an irreproachable person. Thus it has a moral value, often associated with amemptos,³ deontos,⁴ and spoudeos:⁵ the contractor agrees to work or to render his services, promising that he will be “without reproach” or irreproachable. Titus 2:8 is thus one of many cases where St. Paul seems to be ahead of his time with respect to linguistic usages.

¹ Ὁ ἐ—ξ ἐ—ναντίας is the one facing (Mark 15:39), hence opposing; the one who is against (Acts 28:17; P.Ryl. 144, 15). Here, it is pagan criticism in general (cf. Titus 2:5, 10; 1Pet 2:12; ὁ ἀντικείμενος, 1Tim 5:14), but above all the false teachers, the opposition by definition (Titus 1:9; 2Tim 2:25), lying in wait for any possible grounds for dispute.

² 2Macc 4:47—Antiochus IV “sent back Menelaus, the author of all this evil, absolved of the accusations brought against him and condemned to death some unfortunates who, if they had been able to defend their cause even before the Scythians [the cruelest of barbarians], would have been acquitted (ἀκατάγνωστοι).” The word, unknown in the literary language before the third century, is attested in the inscriptions, cf. A. Deissmann, Bible Studies, p. 200; εοδώρα δούλη θεοῦ ἀκατάγνωστος (A. C. Bandy, The Greek Christian Inscriptions of Crete, Athens, 1970, n.8).

³ P.Michael. 41, 41; PSI 932, 10; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XI, 7, 15; P.Oxy. 2478, 19. Cf. P.Grenf.1.58, 11: τρεφομένων παρ ε—μοῦ ἀναμφιβόλως καὶ ἀκαταφρονήτως καὶ ἀκαταγνώστως.

⁴ P.Ross.Georg. III, 51, 19; SB 9293, 16: ε—νδέξασθαι ε—ν αὐται—ς δεόντως καὶ ἀκαταφρονήτως; P.Lond. 113 (4), 15. Cf. Stud.Pal., vol. 20, 219, 17.

⁵ Pap.Lugd.Bat. XI, 10, 4; cf. P.Oxy. 140, 15: ἀμέμπτως καὶ ἀόκνως καὶ ἀκαταγνώστως μετὰ πάσης σπουδῆς; P.Giss. 56, 14; cf. P.Mil. 48, 6; SB 9011, 6; 9152, 10.

ἀκλινής

aklines, stable, unchanging, firm

aklines, S 186; EDNT 1.49; MM 18; L&N 31.80; BAGD 30

Unknown in Josephus, attested by one late occurrence in the papyri,¹ aklines, literally “which does not bend, is straight,” signifies “stable, set,” then “unmoving, at rest”; it is a synonym of bebaios.² It is used of an enduring friendship (Anth. Pal. 12.158.4) and above all to unshakable reason or judgment.³ The emphasis is on immutability.⁴ It is Philo who gave this adjective its religious and moral sense by attributing stability on the one hand to God, as opposed to creatures,⁵ and on the other hand to the perfectly regenerated human.⁶ From that point one can see how the term made it into the vocabulary of the Epistle to the Hebrews, which exhorts us to hold fast the homologia of our hope (Heb 10:23). This hope, which is “firmly founded” on the promise of God,⁷ must be guarded without wavering. Note that the content of faith is identical to its hope (cf. Heb 11:1), just as in 1Pet 3:15.

¹ A fifth-century petition, ε—υχαριστήσω ται—ς ἀκλεινει—ς ἀκοαι—ς τῆς ὑμετέρας ε—ξουσίας: I will give thanks to the impartial ears of your Authority (P.Oxy. 904, 9).

² Philo, Spec. Laws 2.2, of an oath: ὄρκος ἔστω βέβαιος, ἀκλινής; cf. Heb 6:19.

³ 4Macc 6:7 contrasts the body of Eleazer, which has become feeble, to his reason, which remains sound and unshakable; cf. Philo, Giants 54: “Moses establishes his judgment immutably”; Plotinus, Enn. 2.9.2: “There exists only one intelligence, which is unique, identical, always the same, unshakable (νοῦς ἀκλινης), and imitates her father as much as possible.” Cf. Lucian, Encom. Demosth. 33, ἄ. τῆς ψυχῆς.

⁴ 4Macc 17:3—“You stood up to the upheaval of the tortures without giving ground”; Philo, Moses 1.30: “as if one had arranged for oneself an immutable and perfectly sealed success, when perhaps the following day will no longer find us in the same situation”; Virtues 158: “the trunk [of the tree_ based on a firm foundation.”

⁵ Philo, Alleg. Interp. 2.83: “God explains the difference between himself and the creature; he himself remains always unmoving (ἀκλινης ἔστηκεν ἀεί) and the creature wavers and vacillates between opposite directions”; 2.89: “How can one believe in God? By learning that all else changes and he alone remains immutable (ἄτρεπτος)”; Giants 49: “Stability and immutable repose, these are what one finds with God, who always stands unmoving.”

⁶ Cf. A. J. Festugière, Hermès Trismégiste, vol. 2, p. 214, who cites Quest. Exod. 2.96 (immutabilitas).

⁷ Cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, pp. 330ff.

ἀκρασία, ε—γκράτεια

akrasia, lack of self-control; enkrateia, self-control

akrasia, S 192; TDNT 2.339–342; EDNT 1.54; NIDNTT 1.494–496; L&N 88.91; BAGD 33 | enkrateia, S 1466; TDNT 2.339–342; EDNT 1.377–378; NIDNTT 1.494–496; MM 180; L&N 88.83; BAGD 216

Both of these terms derive from kratos, “force”; the enkrates is the person who is master of himself; the a-krates is the one who cannot contain himself, who is lacking in power. From the time of Socrates, who made enkrateia the basis and foundation of all the virtues,¹ and Aristotle, who distinguished between the perfectly chaste person who knows no impure desires (sophron) and the continent person (enkrates) who feels their power but resists them (Eth. Nic. 7.1–11; pp. 1145a–1152a), this control over impulses and this tempering of the passions are considered among the Greeks as an element of prudence-temperance (sophrosyne), and consequently an essential virtue for the honest person.

In the OT, it appears only in the books influenced by Hellenism and has no distinctive meaning,² as opposed to the Letter of Aristeas.³ In the

NT, it is associated with righteousness,⁴ with gentleness (Gal 5:23), or inserted between gnosis and hypomone (2Pet 1:6), receiving no particular emphasis in these “catalogs of virtues.” It seems that it is mentioned only because of the influence of Stoic ethics, which gave it its greatest prominence.⁵ The fact is that Philo considers conversion to be a passing “from incontinence to self-control” (ex akrasias eis enkrateian, Rewards 116), the latter being the most useful of virtues,⁶ allowing the courageous to triumph over the obstacles along the way and arrive at last in heaven (Spec. Laws 4.112); it is opposed to impure desire (1.149: epithymia), to the love of pleasure (Abraham 24: philedonia), to gastronomic and sexual delights, and even to intemperance in language.⁷ It is in this sense that 1Cor 9:25 compares the Christian to an athlete, observing: “Whoever contends—ho agonizomenos —submits to every kind of abstinence.”⁸ We know how rigorous the training of Greek athletes was,⁹ and the self-mastery cited here as an example applies to all arenas. The people of the end-times will not have it (2Tim 3:3, akrateis); it is not so much that they lead a dissolute life, but rather that they cannot control themselves, and so they no longer act as human beings—they are amoral beings.¹⁰ In the first century AD, self-control is especially a virtue of the religious, who master their passions,¹¹ and of the leader, who cannot direct others unless he is sui compos. According to Onasander 1.2–3, the first quality of a good general is to be sophron (so as not to be distracted from duty by sensual pleasures) and enkrates, because slavery to the passions would cause him to lose all authority. For Ecphantus, the king who would govern in accord with virtue will be enkrates.¹² The tradition lived on with Emperor Julian, who presented himself as an example to all his governors in that he administered the affairs of the empire “with such decorum and prudence and self-control” (meta tosautes kosmiotetos kai sophrosynes kai enkrateias).¹³ It is clear that we must interpret against this literary background the virtue demanded of candidates for overseer: that they be enkrates, that is to say, self-controlled.¹⁴ But with Christians, this virtue is a gift of the Holy Spirit (Gal 5:23).

¹ According to Xenophon, Mem. 1.5.4 (cf. T. Camelot, “Egkratéia,” in Dictionnaire de Spiritualité, vol. 4, col. 358; O. Gogon, Kommentar zum zweiten Buch von Xenophons Memorabilien, Basel, 1959, p. 9), implicitly followed by Philo: “On the basis of self-control, the Therapeutai build up the other virtues of the soul” (Contemp. Life 34). This became a commonplace since Panetius defined temperamentia in similar terms (Cicero, Part. Or. 76–78).

² Notably in Sir 18:15, 30, evoking the soul that is master of itself: ε—γκράτεια ψυχῆς; cf. 26:15.

³ “By nature, all men are akrateis and have a natural inclination to seek pleasure. . . . The state of virtue, on the other hand, restrains those who are being pulled away by the love of pleasure and invites them to give priority to enkrateia and justice” (Ep. Arist. 277–278).

⁴ Acts 24:25; same association in Acts John 84. This theme of Paul’s preaching is taken up in Acts Paul Thec. 5: λόγος θεοῦ περὶ ε—γκρατείας καὶ ἀναστάσεως. . . . Μακάριοι οἱ—ε—γκρατεῖ—ς; cf. Eleazer: “I will never abandon you, beloved temperance” (4Macc 5:34).

⁵ Cf. Musonius Rufus, frag. 5 (ed. C. E. Lutz, p. 50, 22), frag. 12 (p. 88, 3–4), frag. 16 (p. 104, 20). Cleanthes (in Plutarch, De Stoic. rep. 7); Galen, De Plac. Hipp. et Plat., pp. 467, 5–468, 4, etc.

⁶ Spec. Laws 1.173: ὀφηλιμωτάτη τω—ν ἀρετω—ν, guaranteeing the victory of healthy reason over the attacks of incontinence and cupidity (cf. 149–150; Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.319; 2.244, where ἀκρασία is a sort of drunkenness which bogs down one’s reasoning ability). When the Scribes and the Pharisees, in their carefulness about external purity, wash the outsides of vessels, they do not dream that “the contents of the cup and the plate are the products of theft and intemperance, ε—ξ ἀρπαγῆς καὶ ἀκρασίας” (Matt 23:25); cf. Pss. Sol. 4.3—ἔνοχος ε—ν ποικιλία ἁμαρτιω—ν, ε—ν ἀκρασίαις.

⁷ Prelim. Stud. 80: “Philosophy teaches mastery of the stomach (ε—γκράτειαν γαστρός), mastery of the guts (ε—γκράτειαν τω—ν μετὰ γαστέρα), mastery also of the tongue (ε—γκράτειαν καὶ γλώττης)”; cf. Worse Attacks Better 102–103; Good Man Free 84; Spec. Laws 2.195. Cf. a votive epigram of the third century BC, found in Afghanistan: “As a child, be on your good behavior; as a young man, be master of yourself (ε—γκρατής); in midlife, be just; as an old man, be wise; at your death, do not be grieved” (in NCIG, n. 37).

⁸ The scholia on Demosthenes in Codex Bavaricus mention an Orphic work, the Steliteutica, of which the only known fragment furnishes a parallel to 1Cor 9:25; cf. A. Erhardt, “An Unknown Orphic Writing in the Demosthenes Scholia and St. Paul,” ZNW, 1957, pp. 101–110.

⁹ Philostratus, Gym. 25: The trainer must know whether or not the young athlete is self-controlled or not, εἰ—ε—γκρατῆς ἢ ἀκρατῆς, if he is a drinker or a glutton; 52: “If athletes have just yielded to the pleasures of Venus, it is better not to exercise them. Are they perhaps men who will take shameful pleasure rather than wreaths and the proclamations of heralds?”;

C. Spicq, Epîtres aux Corinthiens, p. 235. The only occurrence of ε—γκρατεύεσθαι in the NT is 1Cor 7:9—“If they cannot remain continent, then let them marry”; cf. the ἀκρασία of spouses separated from one another, 1Cor 7:5.

¹⁰ Cf. Ep. Arist. 222–223; 227–278; Epictetus 2.21.3, 7; 3.1.8.

¹¹ Among the Essenes, the candidate had to supply evidence of his temperance during a trial period (Josephus, War 2.138; cf. 120: “These men hold temperance and restraint of the passions to be virtues”). It is through temperance that the worshipers of Isis reached God (Plutarch, De Is. et Os. 2), as also the magi and Brahmins (Dio Chrysostom, Or. 49.7; cf. Hippolytus, Haer. 1.24.1–4) or the Egyptian priests after the model of Cheremon (Porphyry, Abst. 4.6–8; cf. A. J. Festugière, Hermès Trismégiste, vol. 1, pp. 30ff.).

¹² Cf. Stobaeus 7.66; vol. 4, p. 279, 6–19; likewise Diotogenes, in Stobaeus 7.62, vol. 4, p. 266, 11 (cf. L. Delatte, Les Traités de la royauté d’Ecphante, Diotogène et Sthénidas, Liège-Paris, 1942, p. 258); Musonius Rufus, frag. 8 (ed. C. E. Lutz, p. 62, 10ff.).

¹³ P.Fay. 20.21. By way of contrast, Antiochus was carried away by the violence of his passions (ὕπὸ δὲ ἀκρασίας παθω—ν, Josephus, War 1.34), and the sons of Herod did not control their tongues (ἀκρατει—ς λέγειν, idem, Ant. 16.399).

¹⁴ Titus 1:8; cf. the tomb inscription of a martyr, around AD 300, Βερέκων ε—γκρατὸς μαρτυρήσας ε—κοιμή (SB 7315, 9).

ἀλαζονεία, ἀλαζών

alazoneia, boastful arrogance; alazon, boaster

alazoneia, S 212; TDNT 1.226–227; EDNT 1.56; NIDNTT 3.28–32; MM 20; L&N 88.219; BAGD 34 | alazon, S 213; TDNT 1.226–227; EDNT 1.56; NIDNTT 2.435; L&N 88.219; BAGD 34

It is not easy to define precisely the nature of this vice. It is denounced in the pagan literature¹ as well as in the Bible; but each author has his own conception of what it is. Sometimes it has to do with bombastic braggarts of the sort so thoroughly caricatured in Greco-Roman comedy,² especially for the extravagance of their talk; sometimes it has to do with the boastful and presumptuous, whose chatter is tinged with insolence.³

Alazoneia is a vice of the rich and of those in the public eye (Wis 5:8; Philo, Virtues 162), of the man of politics (T. Job 21.3) and of the ruler (2Macc 15:6; Philo, Virtues 161; Spec. Laws 4.170), of the orator, the philosopher, the poet, the magician, the doctor,⁴ that is, of all those who lay claim to intelligence (Wis 17:7), but also of superiors who abuse their authority vis-à-vis their inferiors.⁵ Alazon is thus a term of the wisdom vocabulary that associates arrogance, presumption,⁶ and above all pride.⁷ The alazon takes himself for a god or boasts that God is his father (Wis 2:16). Thus he is an impostor and an ungodly person, after the fashion of Antiochus who “in his superhuman conceit thought that he could give orders to the waves of the sea” (2Macc 9:8).

All of these nuances are found in the NT, especially the most ridiculous form of alazoneia: “Now you glory in your boastings; all vainglory of this sort is iniquitous” (Jas 4:16). At issue are presumptuous merchants and those “business travelers” who are puffed up in their imagination and in their speech,⁸ considering themselves rich in intelligence, ease, and savoir-faire, proud of the importance of their enterprise and their profits, multiplying fine projects for the future. All of this is inane, vain presumption, ignorance of creaturely limitations. To pride oneself on one’s own abilities is, religiously speaking, a sin.

This vice will be much more serious among the people of the end times, “impostors and arrogant,” who are simultaneously proud and blasphemers: alazones, hyperephanoi, blasphemoi,⁹ thus creatures in rebellion against divine authority who confine themselves to their own sufficiency, setting themselves up as their own standard for life. Henceforth, according to Rom 1:30, it is the province of the pagans to be “proud, blustery, inventors of evil.” These are not vain people who exalt themselves thoughtlessly, but people who go to the extreme excess of abolishing their Creator in their thoughts and in their lives. God abhors this conceit (Philo, Spec. Laws 1.265).

This nuance seems necessary in interpreting 1John 2:16—“All that is in the world—the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, he alazonia tou biou —is not of the Father.”¹⁰ If St. John did not mention as a third epithymia “the lust for riches or money,” it is precisely because he had his sights set on a more serious vice than the ostentation of the wealthy or their arrogance toward the poor. He contrasts with God the creaturely pride, the mastery of one’s own existence, of the person who decides and directs the course of his life without taking God into account.¹¹ This “sufficiency” is the exact opposite of the absolute duty of worshiping God and serving God devoutly; it follows that this is something altogether different from the classical and profane alazoneia.

¹ For Aristotle, the boaster sins against truthfulness, “he loves to seem to possess claims to glory that are not really his, or to exaggerate those that he does have. . . . His entire being is vile (because if it wasn’t, he would derive no pleasure from lies), but he is apparently more vain than wicked. . . . Those who boast out of a desire for glory pretend to possess all that inspires praise and congratulations” (Eth. Nic. 4.13, pp. 1127a21ff.); cf. Cyrus: “ὁ ἀλαζών seems to me to apply to people who are richer or braver than they are and who promise to do things that are beyond their capabilities” (Xenophon, Cyr. 2.2.12; cf. 1.6.22). “Boasting, it seems to me, is pretending to have advantages that one does not have” (Theophrastus, Char. 23.1). Numerous texts in O. Ribbeck, Alazon, Leipzig, 1882, which outlines a portrait of the alazon and gives synonyms (cf. J. Pollux, Onom., vol. 1, 195; vol. 9, 146). Cf. the commentary of H. Lloyd-Jones on Menander, Perikeromene, 268, in ZPE, vol. 15, 1974, p. 209.

² Cf. the “empty-talking boasters” (Athenaeus 1.52 = 29c), bullies vaunting their exploits (the miles gloriosus of Plautus, or of Lucian in Dial. Meret. 1, 9, 13, 15; the soldier Thrason in Terence, Eun., or Polemon in Menander, Pk.; cf. J. P. Cèbe, La caricature et la parodie, Paris, 1966, pp. 50ff.); boastfulness, associated with exaggeration (περιττολογία; Josephus, Ant. 14.111) is synonymous with tall tales (Xenophon of Ephesus, Hell. 7.1.38); but is always severely judged, as is Isokos ἀλαζών ἀνὴρ καὶ ἀνοήτος (Josephus, Ant. 8.264), “because alazoneia and haughtiness are characteristic of the limited soul,” Spec. Laws 4.165). At banquets one should at least place “near the boaster, the modest,” Plutarch, Quaest. conv. 1.2.6). “The prattle of those who get puffed up about themselves and their accomplishments” (Polybius 5.33.8).

³ Prov 21:24—αὐθάδης καὶ ἀλαζών. Moses 2.240: “Step forward, now, you boasters, you who puff up your chests . . . who straighten your necks and raise your eyebrows, . . . you for whom the lot of widows is a joke and the condition of orphans a subject for mocking”; Josephus, Ant. 6.179; 4Macc 1:26; 2:15; 8:19; Jos. Asen. 4.16: “his daughter had answered him with insolence and anger.” Cf. Cicero, Tusc. 4.9.20: “Jactatio est voluptas gestiens et se offerens insolentius.”

⁴ Lucian, Rh. Pr., Dial. Mort. 1; 10.8; Tim. 54; Merc. Cond. 35–36; Ind. 29 (cf. J. Bompaire, Lucien écrivain, p. 205; H. D. Betz, Lukian von Samosata, p. 198). Alazon is thus a term of insult, defined by Suetonius: παρὰ τὸ ἀλώμενος ζῆν (J. Taillardat, Suétone, Des Termes injurieux, Paris, 1967, pp. 56, 86). According to Strabo (4.4.5) and Arrian (Anab. 1.4), alazoneia is a flaw of the Celts and Gauls.

⁵ Spec. Laws 3.137: “Masters should not prove their arrogance, pride, and frightful cruelty by abusing their power over servants.” In Job 28:18, υι—οὐ ἀλαζόνων (Theodotion) are savage beasts. But Philo observes that “alazoneia exists also among unimportant people . . . like each of the other passions and moral disorders and weaknesses” Virtues 162; cf. 172); such is the one who vaunts himself before the king (Prov 25:6; this could be the flatterer, κόλαξ).

⁶ Virtues 161, 165; Flight 33–34; Spec. Laws 4.88; 2.18–19.

⁷ Hab 2:5—“ἀνὴρ ἀλαζών (yahîr): the proud man . . . is never satisfied.” Prelim. Stud. 41; Virtues 171–172, citing Pindar (Frag. 280): “every alazon considers himself neither a human nor a demigod but an entirely divine being.” T. Jos. 17.8: καὶ ὕψωσα ε—μαυτὸν ε—ν αὐτοί—ς ε—ν ἀλαζονείᾳ διὰ τὴν κοσμικὴν μου δόξαν, ἀλλ’ ἤμην ε—ν αὐτοί—ς ὡς εἷς τω—ν ε—λαχίστων; T. Dan 1.6. The Pythagorean Callicratidas: ἀνάγκα γὰρ τὼς πολλὰ ἔχοντας τετυφω—σθαι πρα—τον, τετυφωμένως δὲ ἀλαζόνας γίνεσθαι, ἀλαζόνας δὲ γενομένως ὑπερηφάνως ἡμεν (in Stobaeus, Flor. 85.16; vol. 4, p. 684, 3–5). This is why Philo declares that to repress and destroy alazoneia it is necessary to remember God in one’s heart (Virtues 165). He opposes these boasters to the humble (Moses 2.240–241), as Clement of Rome also does constantly, 1Clem. 2.1: “You were all humble, free of conceit, more ready to obey than to command”; 13.1: “Let us be humble in heart, let us set aside all feelings of conceit, of vanity, of foolish pride”; 16.2: “The Lord Jesus Christ did not follow after conceit and pride . . . but with a humble heart”; cf. 35.5.

⁸ Cf. 1Clem. 21.5: “Greeks all proud of their arrogant talk.”

⁹ 2Tim 3:2. In a sin list, comparable with that of Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 32, which juxtaposes ἀλαζών δοκησίσοφος αὐθάδης.

¹⁰ On the basis of Polybius 6.57.6—ἡ περὶ τοὺς βίους ἀλαζονεία—and especially Wis 5:8—πλοῦτος μετὰ ἀλαζονείας—βίος is often understood as referring to riches (cf. 1John 3:17; Mark 12:44; Luke 15:12, 30). The point would have to do with audacious confidence placed in worldly goods (P. Joüon, “I Jo. II, 16, la présomption des richesses,” in RSR, 1938, pp. 479–481). Cf. J. Bonsirven: “The splendor of fortune, following the meaning of the two Greek words, ostentation, the display of all of one’s possessions (St. Cyprian translates: ambitio saeculi, jactantia hujus vitae), splendid luxury, in short, all the pursuits of vanity, one of the grossest forms of pride” (Epîtres de saint Jean, 2d ed., Paris, 1954, p. 118). C. H. Lensky, The Epistles of St. Peter, St. John, Columbus, 1945, p. 426, F. M. Braun, Jean le théologien, vol. 3, 2, p. 208: “ἀλαζονεία τοῦ βιοῦ, which we have rendered by ‘pride of riches,’ would be the appeal of the power conferred by the possession of material goods.”

¹¹ This is the interpretation of J. Chaine, Les Epîtres catholiques, Paris, 1939, p. 164; R. Schnackenburg, Die Johannesbriefe, Freiburg, 1953, p. 114. —Αλαζών does not occur in the papyri, but cf. P.Lond. 1927, 32 (Christian, mid-fourth century, H. I. Bell, Jews and Christians in Egypt, p. 111): τὴν τοῦ κόσμου ἀλαζονίαν ἀπεκήρυξας καὶ τὴν τῶ—ν κενοδόξων μεγαλαυχίαν ε—βδέλυξας.

ἀλήθεια, ἀληθεύω, ἀληθής, ἀληθινός, ἀληθω—ς aletheia, truth; aletheuo, to speak the truth; alethes, true, truthful; alethinος, authentic, genuine; alethos, truly

aletheia, S 225; TDNT 1.232–247; EDNT 1.57–60; NIDNTT 3.874–878, 882–893; MM 21; L&N 70.4, 72.2; BDF §§234(7), 397(3); BAGD 35–36 | aletheuo, S 226; TDNT 1.251; EDNT 1.57–60; NIDNTT 3.874, 877, 886–888; MM 21; L&N 33.251; BDF §101; BAGD 36 | alethes, S 227; TDNT 1.247–249; EDNT 1.57–60; NIDNTT 3.874–877, 882–884, 888–891, 893; MM 21; L&N 70.3, 72.1, 88.39; BAGD 36 | alethinος, S 228; TDNT 1.249–250; EDNT 1.57–60; NIDNTT 3.874, 877, 883–884, 888–889, 891–893; MM 21–22; L&N 70.3, 72.1, 73.2; BDF §263(a); BAGD 37 | alethos, S 230; EDNT 1.57–60; NIDNTT 3.874, 877, 883, 888, 893; L&N 70.3; BDF §243; BAGD 37

All of these terms derive from lanthano, “go unnoticed, be unknown,” and in the middle and passive, “forget.” These compound forms with the alpha prefix mean “not hidden.” Aletheia is that which is not concealed, a fact or a condition that can be seen or expressed as it really is. To speak the whole truth¹ is to conceal nothing, and aletheia is the opposite of lying or forgetfulness.² An event is true (alethes) when it is unveiled; a hidden reality becomes explicit. A person who is true or sincere is one who conceals nothing and does not try to deceive.

Greek philosophy and religious strivings were dominated by the search for truth (he zetesis tes aletheias, Thucydides 1.20.3), as Plato explicates it: “By searching for truth I strive to make myself as perfect as possible in life and, when the time comes to die, in death.”³ The truth not only gives life; it gives the good life (Epictetus 1.4.31; 3.24.40), because it orients action: “If you knew the truth, you would necessarily act rightly.”⁴ It is a question of an ascent of the soul toward the “plane of truth” where it is possible to contemplate the Ideas, the veritable, authentic realities.⁵ Finally aletheia as a metaphysical concept refers to the nature or essence of things—Being insofar as it is intelligible—and is contrasted to the terrestrial world of sensible phenomena. Not only is the true identical to being, the real;⁶ but it is the divine reality as revealed to humans. Truth is God (especially in Gnosticism, cf. Corp. Herm., chapters 7 and 13).

In the LXX, aletheia never expresses a metaphysical concept. It almost always translates ‘emeth, from the root ‘aman, “be firm,” and thus refers to that which is solid, firm, valid, durable. A “true” path is one that ends where it is supposed to go (Gen 24:48; cf. Ps 25:10). The true is that which is real;⁷ “truly” relying on Yahweh means “actually” doing so (Isa 10:20). In a moral sense, truth is synonymous with sincerity and loyalty⁸ and the opposite of lying, falsehood, and counterfeiting (Prov 8:7; 22:21; 26:28). The Wisdom writings warn against hiding secrets (Wis 6:22) or speaking against the truth (Sir 4:25). Intentions are revealed (2Macc 3:9—epynthaneto de ei tais aletheiais); the exhortation is given to fight to the death for truth (Sir 4:28). This is in conformity with secular Greek,⁹ but, in accord with the underlying Hebrew, aletheia in the LXX suggests consistency and solidity and therefore fidelity. Hence Yahweh is called “God of truth”¹⁰ on the basis of his unchangeableness, the solidity or stability of his works, the certainty that his promises will be fulfilled: what he says always comes to pass. His utterances and actual events coincide.¹¹ God does not lie and never fails (Ps 132:11); the principle of his speech is truth (119:160). All his gifts are characterized by stability, fixity, perseverance, continuity;¹² to say that he does the truth (aletheian epoiesas, Neh 9:33; cf. Tob 4:6) is to say not only that his conduct is coherent but also that it corresponds to his prior declarations. Likewise, what is asked of the just is steadfast loyalty to the Lord: “If your sons watch their way, walking before me in truth with all their heart and all their soul.”¹³ Faithfulness and piety go together (Prov 14:22; 20:22). Not only is God near to all those who love truth-sincerity (Ps 145:18; Zech 8:19), he also showers blessings upon them.¹⁴

The usages of aletheia in Philo derive more from the word’s etymology and the Greek tradition than from the Greek Bible, although a religious meaning is retained. The Alexandrian philosopher constantly contrasts authentic divine revelation (the truth) with philosophers and lawmakers who, “wrapping their thought in superfluous bombast, have deceived the masses with the smoke of illusion, masking the truth under mythic fictions.”¹⁵ He means the pure, naked, unadorned truth (Creation 45; Drunkenness 6, 34), unchanged, with nothing added and nothing taken away (Creation 170); thus a revealing, the light shed by revelation. “There is no light for actions more brilliant than the truth” (Alleg. Interp. 3.45; cf. Unchang. God 96), and “it is God’s will to reveal the secrets of things to those who wish to know the truth” (Joseph 90). “Truth” is associated with clarity (sapheneia, Alleg. Interp. 3.124, 128, 140), with revealing¹⁶ and light;¹⁷ it is “the knowledge of the true God” (Rewards 58; cf. Contemp. Life 89).

But Philo Platonizes by contrasting truth and appearance (Migr. Abr. 158; Moses 1.48); the study of intelligible essences, which yields truth, with the study of sensible objects, which yields opinion (Rewards 28). God is “Being, the one who is in truth,”¹⁸ “the one who is truth” (Dreams 1.60; Abraham 121), “truly existing” (tou pros aletheian ontos theou, Decalogue 81; Spec. Laws 1.313, 344). Truth basically means “reality”; “in truth” means “according to being” or “in reality”;¹⁹ true goods are real goods (Creation 21; Sacr. Abel and Cain 99; Giants 15; Virtues 17: tou pros aletheian biou; cf. Ep. Arist. 260, 306); “Do you believe that among mortal realities there is found one that has true being, true substance?” (Unchang. God 172). It is God alone who is “the sole Artisan of the true human being, that is, the spirit in all its purity” (Flight 71); “God placed the true human, that is, the Spirit, in us, among the most sacred shoots and plants of moral worth” (Plant. 42; Dreams 1.215; Virtues 20). Consequently, “true life is to walk according to the orders and commandments of God” (Prelim. Stud. 87), “to grasp the truth” (Sacr. Abel and Cain 13), to be “well in tune with it” (Post. Cain 88), to revere it (Spec. Laws 4.33, 43). That is what is most honorable (ibid. 69, 71) and most profitable.²⁰ In any event, Philo is far removed from the cult of truth in the Psalms and at Qumran.²¹

On the grammatical level, note that apart from the plural,²² most of the occurrences of aletheia with the preposition pros (cf. epi, ek, en) conform to the language of the papyri.²³ These provide no new data. They give this noun the meaning “sincerity, objectivity.” In his edict in AD 68, Tiberius Julius Alexander writes, “As for the most important questions, I will make them known to him in all truth” (auto deloso meta pases aletheias, BGU 1563, 24 = SB 8444). One tells the truth, especially in judicial settings;²⁴ it is revealed: “since the whole truth concerning the matters previously written about will hardly be made known” (ex hou deesei gnosthenai pasan ten periton progegrammenon aletheian, P.Oxy. 283, 13); one is faithful to the facts (C.P.Herm. 18, 16). “That by all means the actual sum disbursed maybe known” (P.Panop.Beatty 1, 17). Aletheia is the real (“Let them not address us as people who have really been wronged”—entynchanousin kat’aletheian plemmeloumenoi, C.Ord.Ptol. 35, 9; second century BC) and is the opposite of falsehood and lying (“hating deviousness but honoring truth”).²⁵

This same meaning, truth-reality, appears in the Synoptic Gospels and in Acts, where aletheia never has a theological meaning.²⁶ Sometimes it has to do with questions of noting or identifying facts,²⁷ but usually en or ep’ aletheias is used with the verbs *didasko, eipon, lego*²⁸ to point to an utterance that is true, exactly correct, trustworthy—the opposite of false or ambiguous.

St. Paul uses the term aletheia in a way that agrees with its Greek etymology (that which may be seen in the open, as it is) but also takes account of OT usage; in various texts, one or the other element predominates. If people are lost, it is because “they did not accept the love of truth in order to be saved. . . . they did not believe the truth.”²⁹ Salvation depends first of all on the adherence and submission of the heart to the objective truth; these responses make it possible to recognize and accept it when it is revealed in the preaching of the gospel (verse 13, pistis aletheias). By being resistant toward God’s commands (Rom 2:8), humans “held the truth captive through their unrighteousness” (Rom 1:18). In other words, when salvation and righteousness were revealed (1:16-17), humans refused to accept them; they shackled or gagged the revelation, as it were, through their impiety and their sins.³⁰ This opposing force is next identified as the lie.³¹

This “truth” of revelation is the correct knowledge of reality (Hebrew ‘emeth). The Jews possess in the Torah the morphosis, the form or expression of knowledge and truth (Rom 2:20); they are sure of the divine will respecting them. It has to be obeyed, after the fashion of submitting to a rule (Gal 5:7), with nothing added and nothing taken away (Gal 2:5); we must walk straight or firmly, according to the solidity of the gospel.³² Preaching and teaching in the church are “conformable to the truth that is in Jesus” (Eph 4:21), and every baptized Christian puts on “the new humanity, created according to God in the righteousness and holiness of truth.”³³ The Passover is to be celebrated “not with the old leaven, nor with the leaven of vice and perversity, but with the unleavened loaves of purity and truth” (en azymois eilikrineias kai aletheias, 1Cor 1:8); here “truth” is sincerity, honesty,³⁴ with a nuance of firmness as well (cf. Gal 5:7-9). This meaning, “truth-honesty,” is constant in the apostle.³⁵

The most numerous occurrences are those that give aletheia its Greek sense of true teaching, the expression or manifestation of the truth (and in a religious sense). “We have put aside the deceits of [false_ shame (ta krypta tes aischynes), we who do not walk in shrewdness (en panourgia) or falsify the word of God (me dolountes ton logon tou theou) but who, through the manifesting of the truth (te phanerosei tes aletheias), commend ourselves to every human conscience” (2Cor 4:2). This is the preaching-proclaiming of the unabridged kerygma, out in the light, under God’s watchful eye. Second Corinthians 6:4, 7: “recommending ourselves as ministers of God ... in the word of truth” (en logo tes aletheias), which is the gospel (Col 1:5), the good news of salvation (Eph 1:30), the divine revelation³⁶ that admits of no distortion or falsification.³⁷ Ultimately, Christianity is “the truth”;³⁸ a person accepts it and submits to it through the profession of faith³⁹ and sets out to follow “the way of truth” (2Pet 2:2). The church is a “pillar and supporting structure of the truth,” which is unchanging.⁴⁰ The heterodox who deviate from the faith (1Tim 2:4; 2Tim

2:25; 3:7) are “without the truth” (1Tim 6:5); heretics “turn their ears away from the truth” (2Tim 4:4), turn their back on it (Titus 1:14, apostrophomenon ten aletheian), deviate or walk away from the truth (2Tim 2:18, estochesan), wander away from it and get lost (Jas 5:19) and end up opposing it.⁴¹ In a word, the Christian religion is a cult of the truth; to be converted is to “come to the knowledge of the truth” (eis epignosin aletheias elthein, 1Tim 2:4). This stereotyped formula, which appears in the later writings of the NT,⁴² refers to the correct knowledge of the true religion; the truth is the object of faith. The Christian profession is to adhere to it, to come to this knowledge, to receive it from God, and to keep it; this is salvation.⁴³ Epignosis is not a deepened knowledge, but a precise, determinate knowledge, built on revelation, the gospel discerned as being real and not a myth; hence it is an orthodox knowledge, received from God, opposed to heretical deviations.⁴⁴

In St. John, aletheia (twenty-five occurrences in the Fourth Gospel, twenty in the epistles) becomes a distinctively Christian term, belonging to the vocabulary of the revelation of epigeia and epourania (earthly things and heavenly things).⁴⁵ In the prologue, which summarizes the theology of his Gospel, John sets out to provide an unshakeable basis for the doctrine of the Revealer par excellence and presents him as “full of grace and truth.”⁴⁶ This is the Word that was made flesh and dwelt among us. In this human condition, and on the level of history, aletheia is not the essential truth of the Logos but a divine gift: the knowledge of the truth communicated to human nature. Hence it is in the first place the beatific vision, then that quality which permits “bearing witness to the truth” (John 18:37), and finally the truth of the teachings of Jesus both regarding God (the Father) and regarding his own sonship and the salvation of humans. It is a truthful and sure teaching, worthy of trust. Jesus possesses this truth in its fullness and reveals, transmits, and explicates it.⁴⁷ He is the supreme Revealer, unveiling and manifesting to the fullest the divine secrets.

He specifies that he alone gives access to God: “I am the way and the truth and the life.”⁴⁸ The emphasis is on the way,⁴⁹ an image explicated by the two ideas of truth and life. Jesus is the only way because he communicates the fullness of revelation and even the very life of God. He is the instrument of the truth that comes from God; it is inherent in him, and he affirms it unfailingly: “I, a man who spoke to you the truth that I heard from God.”⁵⁰ After all, one testifies concerning that which one has seen and heard (3:11). The legal idea of testimony takes on a theological meaning (cf. Jer 42:5; Prov 14:25) when John the Baptist identifies Jesus as God’s Chosen One and reveals him as such (John 5:33; cf. 1:7, 15, 19, 31, 34) and when the incarnate Christ makes known what he has heard in heaven, whence he has come “to bear witness to the truth,”⁵¹ to manifest it. His life’s work is to make this revelation so as to inspire faith (1:7; 19:35; 1John 5:6).

To accept this testimony means not only being teachable and sincere, but also being in spiritual relationship with the truth and the words of Jesus, like sheep that recognize the voice of their true shepherd (John 10:16, 27). Better yet, it is to be “of the truth” (ho on ek tes aletheias): “Whoever is of the truth hears my voice.”⁵² The concrete meaning of the expression is to be originally from a certain place, to have been born there; but it is synonymous with “son of” and means “depend on, abide in.” Consequently, being “of the truth” means being permanently under God’s influence, being obedient to revelation. This is what explains the way of life and the bearing of the believer who abides in the radiance of the truth of Christ. Hence the biblicism “do the truth”,⁵³ “the one who does the truth (ho poion ten aletheian) comes from the light, so that his works are clearly seen (hina phanerothe) as being done in God.”⁵⁴ In the genesis of faith, orthopraxy makes it possible to attain to the knowledge of revealed truth; it presupposes an interior choice—a right action and a true thought realized—that orients a person toward Christ. Thus a person becomes obedient to the Father’s drawing, unconsciously submits to his will, and thus proves to be in communion with him.

“If you abide in my word, you will truly be my disciples, and you will know the truth, and the truth will deliver you” (John 8:32). Aletheia is the content of Jesus’ utterance, the full revelation concerning God and humanity, concerning their relationship (verses 40, 44, 45). To know this truth, a person must abide faithfully in this word and adhere to it (10:38; 2Tim 3:14) firmly (2Pet 1:12; T. Jos. 1.3). Then come (a) progress in becoming a true disciple through a more intimate attachment to Christ; (b) deeper penetration into the truth that is revelation and the Christian mystery;⁵⁵ (c) and finally liberation, because every sinner is considered a slave of error or vice;⁵⁶ but here it is a question of enslavement to the devil and of the sin of unbelief (1John 3:4). There is thus a change of masters; for the former tyranny is substituted by the Lord’s sovereignty (1John 2:13-14; 5:18), then virtuous conduct characterized as service to God, and then finally and above all filiation takes the place of servitude. True liberty belongs to the one who lives in the household. It is a stable condition, characterized especially by a loving relationship with God; one is freed in order to be able to love. This is the noblest fruit of truth.⁵⁷

As of Christ’s advent, there are “true” worshipers (i.e., “real,” or better, “perfect” worshipers) who worship the Father en pneumati kai aletheia (“in spirit and in truth”).⁵⁸ In spirit (the highest faculty of the human person), which allows being united with God, who is Spirit (John 4:24; no longer by material deeds or achievements). In truth means not as at Samaria and Jerusalem, but through the worship of the true God as revealed by Jesus, as children revering their heavenly Father. When Jesus prays to his father asking him to sanctify-consecrate the apostles en te aletheia, as he himself is sanctified-consecrated en aletheia,⁵⁹ we may understand him to mean “really, actually” (Theodore of Mopsuestia), but since through this consecration the subject is not only set apart for a sacred office but prepared and adapted for it, en can have an instrumental meaning. Thus truth would be the instrument of sanctification (cf. 2Thess 2:13; John 16:13). The disciples are invaded by it and transformed within. Finally, this consecration is conformable to that of Jesus and derives from it; they are devoted and reserved for the exclusive service of God.⁶⁰

The Holy Spirit is described as the “Spirit of Truth.” He continues the presence and action of Jesus on earth. He indwells the apostles, to whom he reveals the work of the Father and the Son, provided that their love is authentic (John 14:17). This divine being proceeds from the Father;⁶¹ given to the disciples, he “will guide them into the entire truth . . . he will repeat all that he hears and will make future things known to you . . . he takes what is mine and makes it known to you” (John 16:13-15). An infallible teacher and guide,⁶² worthy of trust, the Holy Spirit leads believers to understand better the truth that is Christ so that they may better fathom; he does not complete it, but on the one hand he makes an exhaustive inventory of the data of the gospel, and on the other hand he illuminates to provide better understanding (cf. the Fourth Gospel vis-à-vis the Synoptics). He unveils its riches, progressively explicates its content, and in this way proclaims (anangelei); in this sense he is a teacher. But like Jesus (John 12:49; 14:10), he invents nothing, does not speak on his own; he only repeats what he has heard from God (cf. 8:26) and, through prophetic charisms, also unveils future things (1Cor 12:29-30; Rev 19:10) and thus strengthens faith. Thus the Spirit is indeed a revealer.

Aletheuo. — Incontestably, this verb has only one meaning in secular Greek, “speak the truth,”⁶³ and that is its meaning in Gal 4:16—“Have I become your enemy because I told you the truth?” Nevertheless, there are shades of meaning. In Plato, Resp. 3.413 a and Tht. 202 c, aletheuein means “being right.” Philo (Etern. World 48) contrasts the lover of truth (aletheuontos) to the concocter of paradoxes. The LXX puts these words in the mouth of Abimelech, addressing Sarah: “speak the truth in all things” (panta aletheuson, Gen 20:16; but the corresponding Hebrew verb is the niphal of yajah, meaning that Sarah will be entirely justified in the sight of everyone). The LXX also contrasts telling the truth with lying (Sir 34:4); but when Joseph explains to his brothers that he is putting them in prison “to find out whether the truth is with you” (ei aletheuete e ou, Gen 42:16, Hebrew ‘emeth), that is, whether they are spies or not, the verb has the sense “be sincere.”⁶⁴ The meaning is “realize, carry out” in Prov 21:3 (the one who pleases God) and Isa 44:26—“I carry out the words of my messengers” (Hebrew hiphil of shalam). These usages allow a somewhat original interpretation of Eph 4:15, aletheuontes de en agape, which could be translated either “live by the truth and in love” (NJB) or, in line with the context, which denounces error and deceitfulness, “remaining in the truth, in love.”⁶⁵ In any event, the emphasis is on remaining attached to the truth (of the gospel), holding fast to it, with the Johannine connotations of being of the truth, loving it, professing it, carrying it out; in other words, conforming one’s conduct to it.⁶⁶

Alethes. — This adjective, attested late, appears in the third century BC from the pen of Zeno: “if that is true (or correct)”;⁶⁷ and it recurs in one form or another to modify something that has been said or written. It is the opposite of “false, lying”;⁶⁸ this is in agreement with Wis 2:17 (“let us see if his words are true”)⁶⁹ and with a goodly number of NT occurrences. In stating that she had no husband, the Samaritan woman spoke the truth, was correct and straightforward (John 4:18); John the Baptist and the evangelist spoke the truth (10:41; 19:35; cf. 2Pet 2:22). This formula is used when security is posted or an obligation is taken on: “The note concerning this is true.”⁷⁰ This adjective constantly occurs in oaths⁷¹ and with testimony (John 5:31-32; 8:13, 14, 17; 21:24; Titus 1:13; 3John 12; Josephus, Ant. 4.219). The nuance is then “authentic”⁷² or “sincere, truthful”;⁷³ it is used to describe reliable men (Neh 7:2; Hebrew ‘emeth), for Jesus and his candor (Matt 22:16 = Mark 12:14; John 7:18), especially for the true God and his word.⁷⁴ Finally, alethes often means “real” as opposed to imaginary or metaphorical,⁷⁵ as in Acts 12:9 where Peter, once freed from prison, “did not know that this was real but thought that he was having a vision,” or in John 6:55—Jesus’ flesh is truly (really) food and his blood is truly drink (the Textus Receptus substitutes the adverb alethos).

Alethinós.⁷⁶ — Less common than alethes, but having pretty nearly the same meaning, this adjective is used relatively little in the papyri, where it is contrasted with lying;⁷⁷ but its precise meaning is “authentic,” with respect to either things⁷⁸ or persons: “true Egyptians (hoi alethinói Aigyptíoi), easily recognizable by their speech” (P.Giss. 40, col. II, 27; edict of Caracalla). The LXX uses it with the nuance “perfect,” sometimes with respect to people,⁷⁹ but with religious connotations. Usually it is applied to God (2Chr 15:3; Isa 65:16; cf. P.Oxy. 925, 2; BGU 954, 28), his benevolence (Exod 34:6; Num 14:18; Ps 86:15; 103:8), his perfect works (Deut 32:4, Hebrew tam; Dan 3:27 [Theodotion]; 4:34), his words (2Sam 7:28, Hebrew ‘emeth; 1Kgs 17:24), his commands and judgments (Ps 119:9; Tob 3:2, 5). Philo retained this meaning—“the one true God” (Spec. Laws 1.332; To Gaius 366)—but kept especially the nuance “authentic,” referring to the essence, the deep truth. For example, false money is contrasted with “true value, that which exists really” (ontosontos).⁸⁰

The NT is faithful to this semantic tradition. The true good (to alethinon) is the authentic good, that of the soul (Luke 16:11). This adjective is applied almost exclusively to God and Christ,⁸¹ but the Fourth Gospel and the Epistle to the Hebrews give it a special meaning: “The Word was the true light” (to phos to alethinon, John 1:9; 1John 2:8), meaning spiritual and divine, authentic or genuine. The opposite is not imperfect, veiled; alethinós implies the idea of an ideal or a perfect model,⁸² so that “the true” can properly mean only divine or heavenly realities; the earthly world is only a degraded participation in those realities. Hence Christ is not so much the “only and true” light as the “perfect” light, the source and model for all other light, the Revealer, the Illuminator par excellence. Likewise John 6:32—“The Father gives you true bread from heaven” (ton arton ton alethinon). This is not only “real” bread, bread of heavenly origin, but divine bread in its very essence. John 7:28—“The One who sent me is true”; alethinós means neither “authentic” nor “real” but the only Sender worthy of the name, having the power to send. The relations between the Father and Jesus are the ideal type for every human mission. John 15:1—“I am the true vine” (ego eimi he ampelos he alethine), not only by comparison with the degenerate vine that is Israel,⁸³ but the vine absolutely worthy of the name, the vine par excellence, doing in the highest degree “that which is proper to vines, bearing fruit that is very sweet and very wholesome” (M.J. Lagrange); the article before the adjective makes for a strong emphasis, a kind of superlative in apposition. Thus “true worshipers” (John 4:23) are authentic and perfect worshipers who actualize the precise concept of worship directed toward the true God. The tabernacle or sanctuary in which the high priest of the new covenant officiates in heaven (Heb 8:2; 9:24) is not “fabricated, an antitype of the true tabernacle,” imperfect and transitory, but is authentic and divine.

Alethos. — In secular Greek this adverb means sometimes “truly, sincerely” as opposed to “falsely,”⁸⁴ sometimes “really” (Philo, Alleg. Interp. 1.17; Post. Cain 27; Proceedings XV, p. 94, line 16). Often the two meanings cannot be distinguished. The latter meaning surfaces in the LXX in questions: “Will I really give birth, now that I am old?” (Gen 18:13); “Will God really dwell on earth?” (1Kgs 8:27 = 2Chr 6:18; cf. Ps 58:1). But the adverb is used especially to give weight to an affirmation: “Truly, it is I who have sinned” (Josh 7:20; cf. 2Macc 3:38). Hence its use in confessions of faith in the NT.⁸⁵ It expresses certitude in knowledge (John 17:8; Acts 12:11; cf. Exod 33:16), the reality of a fact (Matt 26:73 = Mark 14:70; John 7:46; cf. Dan 3:24) or of a condition, its authenticity—“You are really my disciples”⁸⁶—and can be translated “actually.”

¹ Cf. Homer, Il. 24.407: “Tell me all the truth; is my son still near the boats?” Herodotus 6.69: “Then do not accept any other story concerning your birth: the final word of the truth is what you have heard me speak with my own mouth”; Thucydides 4.120: “He had to consider them in truth as the Lacedaemonians’ most faithful friends.” R. Bultmann, “Untersuchungen zum Johannes-Evangelium: A. II. Aletheia in der griechischen und hellenistischen Literatur,” in ZNW, 1928, pp. 134–163.

² Λήθη. Cf. W. Luther, “Wahrheit” und “Lüge” im ältesten Griechentum, Borna-Leipzig, 1935; H. Frisk, “Wahrheit” und “Lüge” in den indogermanischen Sprachen, Göteborg, 1936.

³ Plato, Grg. 526 d; cf. Plutarch, De Is. et Os. 2: “To aspire to the truth is to incline toward divinity—especially the truth concerning the gods. This type of study and research is like an ascent toward the holy things, a more religious task than any ritual or priestly function”; Diogenes Laertius 9.10: ἀπὸ τοῦ πάντοτε ζητεῖ—ν τὴν ἀλήθειαν; Marcus Aurelius 6.21.2: ζητῶ—γὰρ τὴν ἀλήθειαν; Philo, Moses 1.24: the search for truth should be the great human preoccupation (τὴν ἀλήθειαν ζητεῖ—ν); Spec. Laws 3.181; 4.5; Good Man Free 12; Etern. World 1: πόθος ἀληθείας; Joseph 90; Contemp. Life 63; Ps.-Clem. Hom. 19.6.6.

⁴ Epictetus 1.17.14: σὺ δὲ κατεμεμάθηκας τὴν ἀλήθειαν, ἀνάγκη σε ἤδη κατορθοῦν; 1.24.4; 2.26.1–5. Cf. Plato, Soph. 228 c–d; Prt. 345 d–e; Resp. 3.413 a.

⁵ Phdr. 248 b, τὸ ἀληθείας πεδῖον. Cf. P. Courcelle, “La Plaine de la vérité: Platon, Phèdre 248 b,” in MusHelv, 1969, pp. 199–203.

⁶ Plato, Tht. 186 c: “Can that attain to the truth which does not even attain to being? —Impossible”; Symp. 211 b; 212 a; Resp. 6.508 d; 9.585 d; 10.596 d–605 c; Aristotle, Ph. 1.8.191a25: ζητουντες . . . τὴν ἀλήθειαν καὶ τὴν φύσιν τὴν τῶ—ν ὄντων. Cf. R. Herbertz, Das Wahrheitsproblem in der griechischen Philosophie, Berlin, 1913; P. Wilpert, “Zum aristotelischen Wahrheitsbegriff,” in Philosophisches Jahrbuch, 1940, p. 3–16; M. Heidegger, Platos Lehre von der Wahrheit, Bern, 1947; M. Detienne, “La Notion mythique d’—Αλήθεια,” in REG, 1960, pp. 27–36; E. Heitsch, “Die nicht-philosophische ἀλήθεια,” in Hermes, 1962, pp. 24–33; H. D. Rankin, “—Αλήθεια in Plato,” in Glotta, 1963, pp. 51–54; G. Stammer, “Die Bedeutung des Wortes Wahrheit,” in Kerygma und Dogma, vol. 2, 1965, pp. 234–243; E. des Places, Platon: Lexique, Paris, 1964, vol. 1, pp.27ff.

⁷ Deut 22:20—“if the matter is true, if (the signs of) her virginity are not found in the young woman” (ε—άν δὲ ε—π̄ ἀληθείας γένηται); Judg 9:15—“If you truly want to anoint me as king”; 2Kgs 19:17—“It is true, Yahweh, that the kings of Assyria have laid waste the nations”; Job 9:2—“In truth [ε—π̄ ἀληθείας], I know that it is so”; 19.4; 36:4; Dan 2:8 (Theodotion).

⁸ Judg 9:16—“Have you acted in truth and in sincerity?” 2Chr 32:1—“After these acts of loyalty by Hezekiah, Sennacherib came to invade Judah”; Tob 8:7—“It is not in lust that I take this my sister, but in truth” (ε—π̄ ἀληθείας); Hos 4:1; Dan 9:13 (Theodotion); Wis 5:6; 1Macc 7:18; Eccl

12:10—"The Preacher set himself to . . . writing words of truth in uprightness." To make an oath "in truth" (μετὰ ἀληθείας) is to make it sincerely (Jer 4:2), hence honestly (Sir 7:20). One "speaks the truth according to one's heart" (Ps 15:3; cf. 5:9; 119:43—λόγον ἀληθείας). Cf. Ep. Arist. 205 .

⁹ Notably the revelation of the truth, ὑποδείξω σοι τὴν ἀλήθειαν (Tob 7:10); Jdt 5:5; 10:13; Ps 30:9; 88:11; Dan 11:2 (Theodotion). Ahab to Micaiah: "How many times do I have to adjure you to tell me only the truth" (2Chr 18:15). Cf. C. H. Dodd, The Bible and the Greeks, London, 1935, pp. 65–75; J. Guillet, Thèmes bibliques, Paris, 1954, pp. 38–46; E. T. Ramsdall, "The Old Testament Understanding of Truth," in Journal of Religion, 1951, pp. 264–273; Y. Alanen, "Das Wahrheitsproblem in der Bibel und in der griechischen Philosophie," in Kerygma und Dogma, 1957, pp. 230–239; K. Koch, "Der hebräische Wahrheitsbegriff im griechischen Sprachraum," in H. R. Müller-Schwefe, Was ist Wahrheit?, Göttingen, 1965, pp. 47–65; P. Benoit "La Vérité dans la Sainte Ecriture," in Exégèse et théologie, pp. 143–156; J. Barr, Semantics, pp. 187–200.

¹⁰ Ps 31:5; cf. 89:8—"your faithfulness envelops you"; 146:6—"Yahweh keeps faith forever"; 36:6—"Yahweh, your grace is in the heavens, your truth rises to the clouds"; 57:10; 89:2; 108:4.

¹¹ Isa 45:19—"I am Yahweh; I utter truth"; Jer 23:28; Zech 8:8—"I will be their God in truth and in justice"; Sir 41:19—"before the truth of God and the covenant"; Ps 25:5; 40:11—"I told of your faithfulness and your help; I did not hide your grace and your truth"; 57:4—"May Elohim send his grace and his truth"; 43:3; 66:8; 89:14, 25; 100:5; 69:13—"In your great grace, answer me, through the truth of your salvation"; 71:22—"I will give you thanks for your faithfulness, my God"; 89:1, 5; 92:2; 115:1; 117:2; 138:2; 89:50—"Where, O Adonai, are your former mercies which, in your faithfulness, you swore to David?" 98:3—"He remembered his grace and his faithfulness." Note the frequent link between faithfulness and benevolence, Gen 24:27; 32:10; 47:29; Josh 2:14; 2Sam 2:6; 15:20; Tob 3:2; Ps 45:4; Mic 7:20. Cf. F. Asensio, "Misericordia et Veritas: El hèsed y 'Emet divinos: Su influjo religio-social en la historia de Israel," in Analecta Gregoriana, Rome, 1949.

¹² God's laws and commands are immutable truth (Neh 9:13; Ps 111:7; 119:86, 142, 151; Mal 2:6; Midr. Ps. 25 11: the Torah is 'emeth) as are his judgments (Isa 42:3; Ps 96:13; cf. Pirqe 'Abot 3.26; Mek. on Exod 14:18; Exod. Rab. on 6:2; 29:1; b. Ber. 46b).

¹³ 1Kgs 2:4; 3:6; 2Kgs 20:3; Tob 1:3—“I, Tobit, have walked in the ways of truth and of justice” (ὁδοί—ς ἀληθείας); 13:6—“If you practice truth before him with all your soul” (ποιήσαι ε—νώπιον αὐτοῦ ἀλήθειαν); Ps 26:3; 86:11; 119:30—“I have chosen the way of truth”; Sir 37:15; Isa 38:3.

¹⁴ Sir 27:9—“Truth returns to those who practice it.” It is a shield (Ps 91:40) and a belt (Isa 11:5). “All those who love the Lord with faithfulness and justice will have joy” (Tob 14:7).

¹⁵ Creation 1. This contrast between the truth and myths, inventions and falsifications recurs at Alleg. Interp. 3.36, 232; Cherub. 94; Sacr. Abel and Cain 12; Worse Attacks Better 125; Post. Cain 52, 101; Giants 58; Prelim. Stud. 61; Joseph 106; Spec. Laws 1.28, 51, 319; 4.50; Virtues 102, 178; Rewards 8, 162; Contemp. Life 63; Etern. World 56, 68; To Gaius 77.

¹⁶ Δήλωσις, Alleg. Interp. 3.24, 143; Spec. Laws 1.88; 4.69; Moses 2.113, 128–129. Cf. Ep. Arist. 77: τὴν τῆς ἀληθείας ἔμφασιν.

¹⁷ Dreams 1.218: “the unclouded light and brilliance of the truth”; 2.106, 133; Joseph 68; Migr. Abr. 76; Spec. Laws 1.63; 4.52, 178; Flight 139; Moses 2.271; Rewards 25: “smoke is the enemy of truth”; 27, 58.

¹⁸ Change of Names 7: ὁ ε—στι πρὸς ἀλήθειαν ὄν; he cannot be perceived by a human: “It is impossible for anyone to grasp true Being” (πρὸς ἀλήθειαν ὄν, Abraham 80; cf. Moses 2.67, 100); Post. Cain 167: “Being, which exists in reality” (τὸ δὲ πρὸς ἀλήθειαν ὄν); Giants 45: “I am the truly good being” (ε—γὼ τὸ πρὸς ἀλήθειαν ἀγαθόν); Spec. Laws 4.178: “going to dwell with the truth and with the veneration of the only venerable Being”; Virtues 65, 219, 221; Rewards 46; Moses 2.270: “the God of truth”; 2.177: “truth is God’s handmaid”; Unchang. God 61: “truth initiates into the authentic mysteries of Being”; cf. Conf. Tongues 190: the meanings of the words of the oracles “are subsistent realities.” Cf. Arius Didymus: “God has a vision of the truth” (θεὸς οἶδε τὴν ἀλήθειαν, in Stobaeus, Ecl. 2.1.17, vol. 2, n. 6). In Pap. Graec. Mag., ἀλήθεια represents a divine entity (II, 156; IV, 1014; vol. 1, pp. 38 and 106); “I am the truth, the one who hates the injustices of the world” (V, 148; vol. 1, p. 186). The supreme God “possesses the truth unmixed with falsehood” (ὁ ἔχων τὴν ἄψευστον ἀλήθειαν, XII, 257; vol. 2, p. 75). A magical papyrus of the third century: “Great God, you who alone keep the truth on your head” (μόνος ὁ τὴν ἀλήθειαν ἔχων ε—πὶ τῆς κεφαλῆς, P. Warr. 21, 25). Cf. Ep. Arist. 140: σέβεται τὸν κατὰ ἀλήθειαν θεόν.

¹⁹ Worse Attacks Better 162; Creation 136; Alleg. Interp. 2.10, 20; 3.63, 174, 178, 191; Cherub. 50; Post. Cain 12, 42, 119, 147; Plant. 164; Sobr.

11; Heir 20; Change of Names 94; Abraham 179; Moses 2.48; Spec. Laws 1.287, 3.155, 186; Virtues 56; Rewards 123; Good Man Free 41; cf. Post. Cain 136: “those who are the judges of reality”; 164: “the beautiful in its reality”; Flacc. 164: “it was a hallucination; it was not reality” (οὐκ ἀλήθεια); To Gaius 20, 60, 248, 279, 359; Decalogue 128: when a woman commits adultery, the identity (authenticity) of the child’s father is unknown; Joseph 38: “in deed and in truth” (ἔργῳ δὲ καὶ ταί—ς ἀληθείαις).

²⁰ Drunkennes 39, 70; Dreams 1.179. “Enamored of this most sacred good that is truth” (Good Man Free 158), following “the paths of truth” (Contemp. Life 27, cf. 39), seeking “undocored truth” (Spec. Laws 3.53, 141; Virtues 6); just the opposite of the wicked person, the “enemy of truth, defender of lies” (Conf. Tongues 48; cf. Migr. Abr. 110; Flacc. 156; Dreams 2.97; Moses 1.235; 2.167; Decalogue 138; Spec. Laws 1.89; Etern. World 69).

²¹ The sect’s goal was “to carry out faithfulness [emeth], justice, and uprightness” (1QS 1.5) in contrast with impiety and perversity (1.19; 3.7, 19; 4.2, 17, 19, 23–25; 5.3; 6.15; 8.2–6; 1QH 16.7), “with regard to an eternal faithfulness” (1QS 9.3). Its members are “volunteers for his faithfulness” (1.11–12; 5.10), “the party of faithfulness” (4QM 13.12, 15), the sons of faithfulness (= the faithful, 1QS 4.5–6; 4QM 17.8; 1QH 6.69; 7.30; 9.35; 11.1), “men of faithfulness who practice the law . . . in the service of faithfulness” (1QpHab 7.10–12; cf. 8.9: the first name of the impious priest was “Faithfulness”); in fact, the congregation was called the “faithful house” (1QS 5.6; 8.9; CD A, 3.19). All the elect are faithful (1QH 14.15) and rely on God’s faithfulness (6.25–26; 7.20; 9.32; 10.17; frag 2.15). God is faithful (1QS 4.20–21; 1QH 1.30; 3.34; 4.40; 6.9–12; 7.28; 9.10; 11.27, 29; 15.25; 16.40); “Faithfulness of God” is the inscription on the banners (4QM 4.6; cf. 11.14; 13.1–2, 9–10). The angel of faithfulness is the one who is in submission to God’s will (1QS 3.24). Emeth also signifies the divine knowledge that the Teacher of Righteousness inculcates in the disciples (1QS 9.17; cf. CD 2.13: the seers of truth; 1QH 1.27; 10.4; 11.4, 9: the secret of truth). Cf. O. Betz, “Gottes ‘Wahrheit’ (emeth),” in Offenbarung und Schriftforschung in der Qumransekte, Tübingen, 1960, pp. 53–60; F. Nötscher, “‘Wahrheit’ als theologischer Terminus in den Qumran-Texten,” in Vom Alten zum Neuen Testament, Bonn, 1962, pp. 112–125; P. Benoit, “Qumrân et le Nouveau Testament,” in NTS, vol. 7, 1961, pp. 276–296; J. Murphy-O’Connor, “La ‘Vérité’ chez saint Paul et à Qumrân,” in RB, 1965, pp. 29–76.

²² Ταί—ς ἀληθείαις (Philo, Joseph 38), as at 2Macc 3:9; 7:6; Josephus, Ant. 6.59; 14.291; 16.235; Life 401; frequent in the papyri: P.Oxy. 2562, 13: the sums will actually be paid; P.Petr. 6, 14: “if the above-named is actually dead”; 7, 18; 8, 21; 9, 20; P.Ryl. 105, 26; P.Mil.Vogl. 98, 26; PSI 1064, 22; 1433, 3; SB 1114, 14; Proceedings XV, p. 81, line 76 (in AD 80).

²³ With (a) ε—πί, especially in traditional oath formulas: “we swear that we have soundly and faithfully presented the preceding account” (ε—ξ ὑγιούς καὶ ε—πί ἀληθείας ε—πιδεδωκέναι, P.Amh. 68, 33; P.Bon. 17, 8; P.Brem. 32, 25; P.Oslo 98, 29; P.Stras. 207, 5; P.BruX. 20, 22; P.Oxy. 480, 9; 2277, 4, 8, 12 [AD 13]; 2472, 18; SB 7365, 159; 9360, 22; 10633; 10638, 11; P.Cair.Zen. 59384, 7; 59484, 4); P.Flor. 112, 67: τὸν γέροντα ε—πί ἀληθείας τύπτουσιν (Aristophanes); (b) ε—κ; cf. P.Flor. 32, 14: ε—ξόμνυμι . . . ε—ξ ἀληθείας καὶ πίστεως; P.Oxy. 1032, 33; P.Stras. 152, 14 (= SB 8942, 14); P.Yale 80, 11: ἀσπασάντας τοὺς φιλοῦντας ἡμα—ς ε—ξ ἀληθείας; P.Mich. 477, 41: οἱ— φιλοῦντές σε ε—ξ ἀληθείας παντελω—ς; (c) κατὰ, cf. P.Cair.Zen. 59202, 7: ε—ὰν φαίνεται κατ’ ἀλήθειαν (= SB 6739); P.Oxy. 2429, frag 1 (b), col. II, 41; frag. 7, 133: κατ’ ἀλήθειαν (Epicharmus); (d) περί, cf. P.Oxy. 1860, 8: φιλογνωρίσαι αὐτὴν τὸ περὶ τῆς ἀληθείας; (e) πρὸς, cf. Ep. Arist. 161; the letters of Gemellus, P.Fay. 118, 26: ἀσπάζου τοὺς φιλοῦντές πάντες πρὸς ἀλήθειαν; 119, 26 (cf. 2John 1; 3John 1). On the very common use of πρὸς with the accusative case in the papyri, cf. the index of E. Mayser, Grammatik, II, 2, p. 620; with other prepositions, II, 1, pp. 13ff.

²⁴ P.Ant. 87, 13 (transcript of a trial): “tell the truth” (λέγε τὴν ἀλήθειαν); UPZ 70, verso 2; P.Oxy. 2419, 5: εἰ—πέ μετὰ ἀληθείας; P.Giss. 84, 14. Cf. ἡ τω—ν νόμων ἀλήθεια (P.Lond. 412, 5; vol. 2, p. 280; 897, 3, vol. 3, p. 206). UPZ 162, col. VI, 12: εἴπερ γε δὴ ε—νόμιζεν ε—κ τῆς ἀληθείας τῆ κατὰ νόμους ὁδω— πορευόμενος, the epistates will attempt to bring out the truth by following the legal procedure; SB 8248, 54 = Dittenberger, Or. 665.

²⁵ Τὰ πανοῦργα μισω—ν, τὴν δ ἀλήθειαν σέβων, C. Austin, Comicorum Graecorum Fragmenta, n. 307, 5. Cf. P.Apoll. 31, 4: τῇ ἀληθείᾳ θέλω = “to tell the truth, I want the boat to be repaired.”

²⁶ Mark 5:33—the woman with the hemorrhage “fell down before Jesus and told him the whole truth” (εἶπεν αὐτῷ— πα—σαν τὴν ἀλήθειαν); Acts 26:25, Paul to Festus: “I am not mad . . . I am speaking words of truth and good sense” (ἀληθείας ῥήματα).

²⁷ Luke 22:59—“In truth (ε—πί ἀληθείας) he (Peter) was with him (Jesus)” (the parallels, Matt 26:73; Mark 14:70, use the adverb ἀληθῶ—ς, “assuredly”); Acts 4:27—“Truly they joined together against your holy servant Jesus . . .”; 10:34—“In truth, I understand that God is no respecter of persons.”

²⁸ Matt 22:16—“You teach the way of God in truth” (τὴν ὁδὸν τοῦ θεοῦ ἐ—ν ἀληθείᾳ διδάσκεις = Mark 12:14; Luke 20:21); Mark 12:32—“you have spoken truly” (ἐ—π ἀληθείας εἶπες, which Lagrange translates “vraiment très bien”); Luke 4:25—“I tell you truly” (ἐ—π ἀληθείας λέγω ὑμι—ν). This expression corresponds to —Αμὴν λέγω ὑμι—ν (Mark 9:1, 41; Luke 18:29; cf. Rev 5:14; 7:12; 19:4). The Hebrew amen means “yes” (cf. Rev 1:7—ναί, ἀμήν; 22:20; 2Cor 1:20). In this context, it is intended to support or emphasize a statement, make it stand out—especially when it is repeated, as in John (1:51, etc.) where Jesus wants to focus attention and inspire certainty: “this is absolutely true”; cf. G. Stählin, “Zum Gebrauch von Beteuerungsformeln im Neuen Testament,” in NovT, 1926, pp. 122–130. Likewise Rom 9:1—ἀλήθειαν λέγω ἐ—ν Χριστῷ, οὐ ψεύδομαι; 1Tim 2:7.

²⁹ 2Thess 2:10-12, τὴν ἀγάπην τῆς ἀληθείας; cf. Ps 50:8; 83:12; Zech 8:9; Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.296: “To you, Eraphroditus, who love the truth above all things . . . I dedicate this book” (μάλιστα τὴν ἀλήθειαν ἀγαπῶ—ντι); War 1.30: τοι—ς γε τὴν ἀλήθειαν ἀγαπῶ—σιν. C. Spicq, Agarè, vol. 2, pp. 32–39.

³⁰ G. R. Castellino, “Il paganesimo de Romani I, Sapienza 13–14 e la storia delle religioni,” in AnBib, vol. 18, Rome, 1963, pp. 255–263.

³¹ Rom 1:25—“They exchanged the truth of God for the lie,” i.e., they exchanged the only true, real, existing God for false conceptions, “gods who are not” (C. H. Dodd, The Bible and the Greeks, London, 1935, p. 74); Rom 3:7—“If my lying enhances God’s truthfulness and so redounds to his greater glory . . .”; the ψεῦσμα is the unbelief and faithlessness of the Jew; 15:8—“Christ was minister of the circumcision (in the service of the circumcised, i.e., Israel) to show God’s truthfulness in carrying out his promises to the Fathers”; the realization of these promises proves God’s veracity (emeth, that which can be relied on). Cf. the judgment of God κατὰ ἀλήθειαν, in accord with real facts (2:2).

³² Gal 2:14—οὐκ ὀρθοποδοῦσιν πρὸς τὴν ἀλήθειαν τοῦ εὐαγγελίου. The truth is the certain reality, the objective rule of conduct (cf. verse 5). —Ὀρθοποδέω, unknown in secular and biblical Greek before the Christian era, was understood by the church fathers to mean “walk straight” (G. D. Kilpatrick, “Gal. II, 14,” in Neutestamentliche Studien für R. Bultmann, Berlin, 1954, pp. 269–274), but it seems rather to mean “to have clean conduct, a steady stride” according to P.Mil. XXIV, 8: νῆ τὴν σὴν μοι σωτηρίαν καὶ τὴν τοῦ τεκνίου μου καὶ ὀρθοποδίαν (AD 117; cf. C. H. Roberts, “A Note on Galatians II, 14,” in JTS, 1939, pp. 55–56); a University of Michigan papyrus (inv. 337): τὸ πεδεῖον ὀρθοποδεῖ— ἐ—ν ἐ—μοὶ εἶνα (published by J. G. Winter, “Another Instance of ὀρθοποδεῖ—ν,” in HTR, 1941, pp. 161–162); Nicander, Alex. 419: ὀρθόποδες βαίνοντες ἄνις σμυγεροι—ον τιθήνης. In these three instances (P.Phil. XXXV, 4–6 is not clear), the topic is children who are beginning to walk on their own, without having to hold a nurse’s hand to keep from falling. Cf. Cyril of Alexandria, In Matt. 17.17, ὁ ἄπιστος ἔσται που καὶ διεστραμμένος καὶ κατ’ οὐδένα τρόπον ὀρθοποδεῖ—ν ει—δω—ς (in J. Reuss, Matthäus-Kommentare, Berlin, 1957, p. 220).

³³ Eph 4:24; this aletheia is almost “authenticity,” as opposed to the “deceitful desires” of the old self (verse 22); cf. 1Tim 2:7.

³⁴ The Targum calls Abraham “the totally unleavened one,” i.e., “pure, sincere” (R. Le Déaut, Nuit Pascale, p. 173, n. 110); a connotation confirmed by the link with ει—λικρινία. —Ειλικρινῆ, from εἶλη (the sun’s heat or light) means “purified in the sunlight”; the soul is purified when it is open to the light. The a-zymoi are freed from the old lying fermentation, i.e., the community’s lack of straightforwardness and firmness toward those guilty of incest.

³⁵ 2Cor 7:14—“We spoke truthfully to you in everything”; 12:6—“I would be speaking the truth” (J. Cambier, “Le Critère paulinien de l’apostolat en II Cor. XII, 6,” in Bib, 1962, pp. 481–518; idem, “Une lecture de II Cor. XII, 6–7 a: Essai d’interprétation nouvelle,” in AnBib, vol. 17, Rome, 1963, pp. 475–485); 11:10—“the truth of Christ is in me” (guaranteeing what I say); Phil 1:18—“In one way or another, whether hypocritically or honestly (εἴτε προφάσει εἴτε ἀληθείᾳ), Christ is proclaimed” (C. Spicq, Agarè, vol. 2, pp. 244–252); Eph 4:25—“No more lying; let each one speak the truth to his neighbor” (cf. Zech 8:16); 5:9—“the fruit of the light in all goodness, righteousness, and truth” (cf. 1QS 1.5; 2.24–25; 4.5; 5.3–4, 25; 8.2); Eph 6:14—“Stand fast, with truth as your belt, righteousness as your breastplate” (Isa 11:5; 59:17; M. Barth, Ephesians, vol. 2, pp. 767ff.); cf. Jas 3:14—“Do not lie against the truth” (μὴ ψεύδεσθε κατὰ τῆς ἀληθείας). A characteristic of love is that it applauds the truth (1Cor 13:6), i.e., the good, with virtue, righteousness, moral rectitude; it rejoices in it and pours out praise upon it; cf. the proselytes who are ἀληθείας ε—ρασταί (Philo, Virtues 182; cf. T. Dan 5.2; T. Reub. 6.9).

³⁶ Cf. Jas 1:18—“The father of lights . . . has brought us forth by a word of truth”; cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, pp. 89ff.

³⁷ Timothy must rightly dispense the word of truth (ὀρθοτομοῦντα τὸν λόγον τῆς ἀληθείας, 2Tim 2:15). The rare verb ὀρθοτομέω corresponds to the vocabulary of rhetoric: ὀρθὸν λέγειν means to express oneself correctly (Aristotle, Gen. Cor. 1.314b13; Iamblichus, Myst. 1.3 = 7.13). The rule of Greek dialectic was ὀρθοέπεια, expressing oneself correctly and precisely, without error or flaw (Plato, Phdr. 267 c), the opposite of the work of bad exegetes who twist texts (2Pet 3:16). Cf. the apology of Quadratus, who showed ἀποστολική ὀρθοτομία, “apostolic correctness,” i.e., orthodoxy, according to Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 4.3.1.

³⁸ 2Pet 1:12; cf. A. Vögtle, “Die Schriftwertung der apostolischen Paradosis nach II Petr. I, 12–15,” in Neues Testament und Geschichte (Festschrift O. Cullmann), Zurich, 1972, pp. 297–306.

³⁹ 1Pet 1:22—“Having perfectly sanctified your souls by obeying the truth.” In this ancient allusion to baptism, aletheia is the unveiling of what was hidden or unknown, the opposite of the times of ignorance or error in verses 14 and 18.

⁴⁰ 1Tim 3:15; ε—δραῖωμα (biblical hapax, unknown in secular Greek literature) is sometimes translated “rampart, buttress, flying buttress, support, post.” It corresponds to the Latin firmamentum (Vulgate) and derives from the adjective ε—δραί—ος, “firmly seated, solid.” It suggests robustness, stability, and unshakeable permanence of the building-church, built on rock and capable of resisting the gates of hell (Matt 16:18). Cf. J. Murphy-O’Connor, “La ‘Vérité’ chez saint Paul et à Qumrân,” in 67ff.

⁴¹ Cf. 2Tim 3:8; cf. K. Berger, “Die königlichen Messiastraditionen des Neuen Testaments,” in NTS, vol. 20, 1, 1973, p. 10, n. 38; cf. p. 12, n. 40.

⁴² 1Tim 4:3—“believers and those who know the truth”; Titus 1:1—“the faith of God’s elect and the knowledge of the truth that accords with piety”; 2Tim 2:25—God may grant to opponents “conversion to the knowledge of the truth”; 3:7—women who are “always learning but never attaining to knowledge of the truth”; Heb 10:26—at baptism, the Christian receives from God a knowledge of the truth, which is correct and unchanging; 2John 1 addresses “all who have known the truth” and remain in it (verb in the perfect, οί—ε—γνώκότες; cf. R. Schnackenburg, “Zum Begriff der ‘Wahrheit’ in den beiden kleinen Johannesbriefen,” in BZ, 1967, pp. 253–258). —Cf. M. Dibelius, “—Επίγνωσις ἀληθείας,” in Neutestamentliche Studien für G. Heinrici, Leipzig, 1914, pp. 178–189 (reprinted in Botschaft und Geschichte, Tübingen, 1953, vol. 2, pp. 1–13); C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, 3d ed., Excursus XVI, pp. 362–365; H. von Lips, Glaube, Gemeinde, Amt, Göttingen, 1979, pp. 33–40.

⁴³ The few pagan parallels are thus merely verbal: “The magi search the works of nature to learn the truth (πρὸς ε—πίγνωσιν τῆς ἀληθείας) . . . and they receive and transmit the revelation of the divine virtues” (Philo, Good Man Free 74; cf. Spec. Laws 4.178, μεταναστὰς εἰς ἀλήθειαν, going to dwell with truth); Josephus, Ant. 8.33: recognize the truth of someone's sentiments; 20.128: know the truth more exactly; Epictetus 2.20.21: "Is there a faculty that permits discernment of the truth?" On ε—πίγνωσις—discernment and identification—cf. Matt 11:27; Josephus, Ant. 8.48; Plutarch, Cor. 34.3; Ages. 21. —K. Sullivan, "Epignosis in the Epistles of St. Paul," in AnBib, vol. 18, Rome, 1963, II, pp. 405–416; H. Clavier, "Recherche exégétique et théologique sur la notion paulinienne d'épignosis," in E. A. Livingstone, SE, vol. 6, Berlin, 1973, pp. 37–52.

⁴⁴ There was probably some influence from Qumran: the "volunteers of the truth of God" (1QS 1.11–12; 5.10) were converted to emeth (6.15), which is what distinguished them from those perverted in heart (4.24–25). They drew upon the "knowledge of the truth" (9.17–18; 1QH 7.26–27; 10.20–29). The "knowers" were God's faithful, those who held firm (CD 2.13). Cf. H. Kosmala, Hebräer—Essener—Christen, Leiden, 1959, pp. 155ff. J. Murphy-O'Connor, RB, 1965, pp. 61ff. A. M. Denis, Les Thèmes de la connaissance dans le Document de Damas, Louvain, 1967, pp. 51ff., 78ff., 200ff.

⁴⁵ John 3:12. F. Büchsel, Der Begriff der Wahrheit in dem Evangelium und in den Briefen des Johannes, Gütersloh, 1911; A. AugustinoviĀ, "ΑΛΗΘΕΙΑ nel IV Vangelo," in Studii biblici Franciscani liber annuus I, 1950–51, pp. 161–190; H. von Soden, "Was ist Wahrheit?" in Urchristentum und Geschichte, Tübingen, 1951, pp. 1–29; O. Betz, "Die 'Wahrheit' in den johanneischen Schriften," in Offenbarung und Schriftforschung in der Qumransekte, Tübingen, 1960, pp. 60–61; S. Aalen, "'Truth' a Key Word in St John's Gospel," in SE, vol. 2, Berlin, 1964, pp. 3–24; N. Lazure, Les Valeurs morales de la théologie johannique, Paris, 1965, pp. 70–92; R. Schnackenburg, "The Johannine Concept of Truth" (Excursus 10), in John, vol. 2, pp. 225–237. The major books are Yu Ibuki, Die Wahrheit im Johannesevangelium, Bonn, 1972, and I. de la Potterie, La Vérité dans saint Jean, 2 vols., Rome, 1977. Cf. idem, "Storia e verità," in R. Latourelle, G. O'Collins, Problemi e prospettive de teologia fondamentale, Brescia, 1980, pp. 115–139.

⁴⁶ Πλήρης χάριτος καὶ ἀληθείας, John 1:14; cf. verse 17: "From his fullness we have all received. . . . Grace and truth came through Jesus Christ." The pairing χάρις-ἀλήθεια recalls "mercy and truth" in the OT (Gen 24:27, 49; 32:11; 47:29; Exod 34:6; Josh 2:14; 2Sam 2:6; 15:20; Hos 4:1; Mic 7:20; Ps 40:11; 85:11; 89:15; Tob 3:2); cf. I. de la Potterie, La Vérité dans saint Jean, vol. 1, pp. 76–78, 158–176.

47 John 1:18—ε—ξηγήσατο; the object of exegesis is τὰ θει—α (Dionysius of Halicarnassus 2.23.6), the exegete interprets περὶ ι—ερείων (Hesychius); cf. Sir 18:5; 43:31.

48 —Εγώ ει—μι ἡ ὁδὸς καὶ ἡ ἀλήθεια καὶ ἡ ζωή, John 14:6 (I. de la Potterie, La Vérité dans saint Jean, vol. 1, pp. 241–278). As the incarnate Son of God, Jesus is identical with the truth, is the living revelation of the Father (14:9–11). Cf. M. Comeau, “Le Christ, chemin et terme de l’ascension spirituelle d’après saint Augustin,” in Mélanges J. Lebreton (RSR, 1952, pp. 80–89); T. Camelot, “Le Christ, sacrement de Dieu,” in Mélanges H. de Lubac, Paris, 1963, vol. 1, pp. 355–363.

49 The OT links way and truth (Ps 25:10; 26:3; 86:11; 119:30; Wis 5:6; Tob 1:3; Sir 24:18), but in the sense of moral rectitude (cf. Odes Sol. 41.11–12; 4 Ezra 5:1; 1QS 4.16–20). Cf. B. Couroyer, “Le Chemin et la vie en Egypte et en Israël,” in RB, 1949, pp. 412–432; P. Courcelle, “Trames veritatis’: La Fortune patristique d’une métaphore platonicienne (Phédon 66 b),” in Mélanges E. Gilson, Toronto-Paris, 1959, pp. 203–210.

50 John 8:40, 45, 46 (or taught by God, verses 26, 28); cf. I. de la Potterie, La Vérité dans saint Jean, vol. 1, pp. 39–75. If Jesus makes a strange or paradoxical statement (“it is good for you that I go away”), he appeals to his perfect knowledge of things and of the future, as well as to his own veracity (16:7). If the Jews do not believe him, it is because their heart is dominated by the lie, because their father is the devil, a liar who has no truth in him (8:44; 1John 1:8; 2:4).

51 John 18:37 (I. de la Potterie, La Vérité dans saint Jean, pp. 79–116; cf. the “good confession before Pontius Pilate,” 1Tim 6:13). The members of the Qumran sect were “witnesses of truth,” i.e., truthful witnesses (cf. F. M. Braun, “L’Arrière-fond judaïque du quatrième Evangile et la communauté de l’Alliance,” in RB, 1955, pp. 5–44). 3John 3: “Many brothers have given testimony of your truth” (your doctrinal fidelity and your Christian conduct).

52 John 18:37; cf. 1John 2:21; 3:19 (I. de la Potterie, La Vérité dans saint Jean, vol. 2, pp. 593–635). Compare being of God (John 8:47), of the devil (John 8:44; 1John 3:8), of the world (John 7:14; 1John 4:6), of our own (1John 2:19). Knowing the truth (1John 2:21; NT hapax; cf. Plato, Phdr. 262 c; Resp. 9.581 b; Lycurgus, Leoc. 22; Polybius 15.26.6; Josephus, Ant. 2.60) is a firm knowledge, a conviction (of the faith). Cf. loving in truth (1John 3:18; 2John 1; 3John 1) = loving sincerely, really, but also according to the gospel, i.e., loving from the heart and showing it. Likewise “walking in the truth” (2John 4; 3John 3–4). Cf. R. Schnackenburg, “The Johannine Concept of Truth” (Excursus 10), in John, vol. 2, pp. 225–237.

⁵³ Gen 32:10; 47:29; Neh 9:33; Isa 26:10, referring to firm and persevering conduct (1QS 1.5; 5.3; T. Benj. 10.3).

⁵⁴ John 3:21; 1John 1:6; M. Zerwick, “Veritatem facere, Joh. III, 21; I Joh. II, 6,” in VD, 1938, pp. 338–341, 373–377; I. de la Potterie, La Vérité dans saint Jean, vol. 2, pp. 479ff.

⁵⁵ Cf. 2John 1: “to all those who have known the (unveiled) truth” (cf. Tob 5:14; recension S); one learns it better and better, discovers it more clearly (Enoch 106.7, 12; 1QS 9.17–19; 1QH 11.9–10), assimilates it more completely (1Tim 2:4). This is the progress in faith (1John 4:16; Wis 3:9) that is built on God but also and especially on Christ, his divine Sonship and his teaching.

⁵⁶ This was a Stoic doctrine (Epictetus 2.1.23; 4.1.113; Plutarch, Cat. Min. 67; Seneca, Ep. 88.2; etc. Cf. O. Schmitz, Der Freiheitsgedanke bei Epiktet und das Freiheitszeugnis des Paulus, Gütersloh, 1923; M. Pohlenz, La Liberté grecque, Paris, 1956; C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, pp. 623–664, 828–849). Philo wrote a book to prove that the wise person is free, Quod Omnis Probus Liber Sit (Every Good Man is Free). Only submission to God secures freedom for those in servitude: “They have an invincible love of liberty, because they judge that God is the only leader and master” (Josephus, Ant. 18.23, cf. War 7.410; 2Macc 1:27). “You will not find a free man other than the one who devotes himself to the study of Torah” (Pirqe ‘Abot 6.2). The Messiah brings liberation to the people (Tg. Lam 2:22; 4:22; Shemoneh Esreh [the “Eighteen Benedictions”], number 10). Cf. D. Daube, The New Testament and Rabbinic Judaism, London, 1956, pp. 272–278.

⁵⁷ Cf. C. Spicq, Charité et liberté; L. Goppelt, “Wahrheit als Befreiung: Das neutestamentliche Zeugnis von der Wahrheit nach dem Johannesevangelium,” in H.R. Müller-Schwefe, Was ist Wahrheit?, Göttingen, 1965, pp. 80–93; D. Atal, “Die Wahrheit wird euch freimachen (Jo. VII, 32),” in H. Merklein, Biblische Randbemerkungen: Schülerfestschrift für R. Schnackenburg, Würzburg, 1974, pp. 283–299; I. de la Potterie, La Vérité dans saint Jean, vol. 2, pp. 551ff., 789–866.

⁵⁸ John 4:23–24. Cf. F. M. Braun, “In Spiritu et Veritate,” in RevThom, 1952, pp. 245–274; 485–507; R. Schnackenburg, “Die ‘Anbetung in Geist und Wahrheit’ (Joh. IV, 23) im Lichte von Qumrân-Texten,” in BZ, 1959, pp. 88–94 (reworked and developed in Christliche Existenz nach dem Neuen Testament, Munich, 1968, vol. 2, pp. 75–96); D. Muñoz Leon, “Adoración en espíritu y verdad: Aportación targúmica a la inteligencia de Jn. IV, 23–24,” in L. A. Verdes, E. J. A. Hernandez, Homenaje a Juan Prado, Madrid, 1075, pp. 387–403; I. de la Potterie, La Vérité dans saint Jean, vol. 2, pp. 673–705.

⁵⁹ John 17:17, 19. Cf. J. Giblet, “La sainteté de la vérité,” in A. Dondeyne, J. Giblet, Christianisme et vérité, Brussels, 1959, pp. 7–42; I. de la Potterie, La Vérité dans saint Jean, vol. 2, pp. 706–787.

⁶⁰ God is most holy and is the only one who sanctifies (Exod 31:13; Lev 20:8; 21:8, 15; Ezek 20:12; 37:28; 1Thess 5:23), sets people apart for himself alone (Num 3:13; Sir 33:12). This is an exclusive setting apart for a religious function (Exod 40:13; Lev 22:2-3; Matt 23:17).

⁶¹ John 15:26—ε—κπορεύεται (present indicative): “flows from,” as a river flows from its source (Rev 22:1). Historically, at a given moment, the Holy Spirit—who emanates (essentially, eternally) from the Father (eternal procession from deep within the Trinity)—is sent and given to the disciples. In other words, the historic acts of salvation rest on the eternal relationships of both the Son and the Spirit. The latter, “that one” (ε—κει—νος), “bears witness regarding me” (περὶ ε—μου). He has the authority of a divine witness. Knowing Jesus from all eternity, he alone, with the Father, knows perfectly who he is.

⁶² Ὁδηγέω: show the way, lead someone in an unknown region (Rev 7:17). Cf. I. de la Potterie, La Vérité dans saint Jean, vol. 1, pp. 329–466. 1John 4:6—“This is how we know the spirit of truth and the spirit of error” (τῆς πλάνης). In the trial between Jesus (who is innocent) and the world (which condemned him as guilty), the Holy Spirit appears as a lawyer in the court of appeals and “will convict the world” (John 16:8). Every human being is called upon to take sides regarding this “sign spoken against” (Luke 2:34). Cf. T. Preiss, “La Justification dans la pensée johannique,” in Hommage et reconnaissance (Mélanges K. Barth), Neuchâtel, 1946, pp. 100–118.

⁶³ Plato, Cra. 431 b: ἀληθεύειν . . . ψεύδεσθαι, “speak truthfully . . . speak falsehoods”; Xenophon, An. 4.4.15: “having spoken the truth . . . giving out as true that which was true and as false that which was not true”; Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.124: hardly anyone who is angry speaks the truth, being dominated by a drunkenness of the soul; Cherub. 15: a physician does not tell the truth to (hides it from) his patient, and the wise person fears speaking it (unveiling it) to his adversaries; but “good faith speaks the truth” (Drunkenness 40; Abraham 107) and “interpreters of dreams have the obligation to speak the truth” (Joseph 95; Moses 2.177; Spec. Laws 4.60). Josephus, Life 132: “even the inhabitants of Tarichaeae came to believe that the young men were speaking the truth”; 338: the historian Justus “has said nothing true (correct) concerning his native city”; 339: “When writing history, one must tell the truth”; War 3.322: “was this man speaking the truth?”; Ant. 10.105: “Sacchias accepted as true what the prophet was saying”; Ag. Apion 1.223: “Certain authors do not tell the truth about how our ancestors came out of Egypt.” Moulton-Milligan could only produce one weak attestation of this verb in the papyri: α]ληθευοντ (followed by a lacuna), P.Amh. II, 142, 1; but it has since been attested in the second century in a petition to the prefect: a mother, influenced by her depraved sons, did not tell the truth (P.Oxy. 232, 12); P.Oxf. 6, 15: “The villagers of Ogou did not tell the truth”; P.Oxy. 3129, 7: “if you find that he spoke the truth” (ει— ἀληθεύοντα εὔροις). In P.Hercul. 1065, VIII, 12 (= Philodemus of Gadara, Sign.) this restoration has been made correctly: τὸ δόγμα [ἀληθεύεσθαι ν]ομίζομεν, “if we consider our philosophical doctrine to express the truth . . .”; cf. XI, 17.

⁶⁴ This would seem to the nuance of aletheuo in Josephus, War 7.220: Caesennius Paetus “wrote to Caesar, either sincerely or out or hatred”; cf. Ant. 14.267: “make a sincere statement.”

⁶⁵ N. Hugedé, L’Épître aux Ephésiens, Geneva, 1973, on this word. Cf. “being sincere in love” (M. Dibelius, An die Kolosser, Epheser, 3d ed., 1953, pp. 82ff.).

⁶⁶ Cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, p. 540, n. 1; J. D. Dubois, “Ephésiens IV, 15: ἀληθεύοντες δὲ οὐ ἀλήθειαν δὲ ποιοῦντες,” in NovT, 1974, pp. 30–34.

⁶⁷ SB 6744, 4: κὰν ἦ ταῦτα ἀληθῆ; 6764, 4; P.Yale 46, col. I, 17; cf. P.Tebt. 782, 23; SB 7446, 7: ἂ ἦ ἀληθῆ; 7520, 6; 9801, 19; 10044, 19.

⁶⁸ P.Stras. 41, 18: δει— γὰρ τὰ ἀληθῆ λέγειν; P.Oxy. 2419, 5: τὸ ἀληθὲς λέγω; SB 6097, 13: ἀληθὲς ε—στιν τὸν λόγον; PSI 816, 8: ε—ὰν ἦ ἂ γράφω ἀληθῆ; P.Tebt. 775, 14; P.Magd. I, 16; XI, 13; XII, 11; XIII, 10, etc. P.Tebt. 782, 23; SB 9605, 9: γράφω ὑμι—ν, ἴν ι—δῆ ἀληθὲς; 7258, 6.

⁶⁹ Cf. Job 42:7-8: speak the truth (niph'al of kûn); I.Thas. XVIII, 1: “Anyone who informs on an insurrectionist movement . . . whose words prove to be correct”; CII 86: the praises of the deceased are true; Josephus, War 4.154.

⁷⁰ Χειρογραφίαν περὶ τοῦ ἀληθῆ εἶναι, BGU 1573, 22; 1583, 23; 1756, 5; Pap.Lugd. Bat. VI, 29, 18; PSI 1064, 18; 1141, 13; 1225, 14; 1237, 20; 1328, 20; P.Oslo 99, 19; 111, 299; SB 7333, 32; 7599, 33; 7602, 12; 7817, 20; P.Oxy. 2186, 11: ἀληθῆ εἶναι τὰ προγεγραμμένα; 2564, 15; 2837, 22 (AD 50); 3034, 6; cf. P.Oslo 17, 14; τὸ ἀληθὲς ε—ξομολογήσασθε.

71 —Ορκὸν ἀληθῆ, P.Corn. 19, 12 and 17; 20, 18; Pap.Lugd.Bat. VI, 33, 16; P.Cair.Isid. 2, 20; 3, 24; 4, 12; etc; P.Mich. 176, 22; PSI 1328, 69; P.Oxy. 2345, 8; SB 7602, 16; 7623, 20; 7672, 5; 7673, 13; 9317, a 35; 10726, 12, 17; P.Hal., p. 227; Philo, Cherub. 108, 124; Spec. Laws 2.10; Josephus, Ant. 4.219.

72 Wis 6:17; 1Pet 5:12. With respect to legitimate children (Philo, Migr. Abr. 69: τὸν ἀληθῆ πατέρα; Spec. Laws 1.326, 332; P.Tebt. 285, 3), civic rights (Prelim. Stud. 6), a circumcised child who is truly of a priestly family, ἀληθῆ εἶναι ι—ερατικοῦ γένου (P.Tebt. 293, 17). Philo several times links ἀληθὲς καὶ γνήσιον (Conf. Tongues 72; Post. Cain 102; Joseph 258), several times uses the comparative ἀληθέστερον (Sacr. Abel and Cain 65; Moses 1.274; Etern. World 15), and nine times uses the superlative ἀληθέστατος (Creation 72; Alleg. Interp. 3.51; Sacr. Abel and Cain 26; Unchang. God 107, 123; Migr. Abr. 171; Heir 243; Abraham 60, 261). True is contrasted with false (Alleg. Interp. 3.229; Cherub. 127; Dreams 2.47, 64, 162; Virtues 205; Contemp. Life 10; etc.).

73 P.Ant. 188, 16: τὸ δὲ ἀληθέστερον εἰ—πει—ν: “I urge you to express yourself quite frankly”; 2Cor 6:8—ὡς πλάνοι καὶ ἀληθει—ς; taken as imposters, but nevertheless truthful. 1John 2:27; cf. I. de la Potterie, S. Lyonnet, La Vie selon l’Esprit, Paris, 1965, pp. 126–143.

74 Gen 41:32; Dan 2:47; 10:1; Wis 1:6; 12:27; 15:1; John 3:33; 8:26; Rom 3:34; Philo, Post. Cain 115; Drunkenness 45; Dreams 1.238; Abraham 50, 68; Joseph 254; Moses 2.171; Decalogue 8; Spec. Laws 1.36; To Gaius 290, 347; Josephus, Ant. 8.337, 343; 10.268; War 7.323.

75 P.Panop.Beatty 2, 89: so that the true facts may be elucidated; P.Phil. I, 23: the estimation will be made “not according to a declaration with no official character, but according to their true circumstances” (ε—κ ἀληθοῦς αὐτῶ—ν ὑποστάσεως); SB 8444, 57: “the tax charges will be made according to the true [state_ of the grape crop and of the unflooded land”; P.Tebt. 739, 29. Cf. Job 5:12—“their hands do not the truth”—i.e., do not accomplish their plans. Alethes also has the psychological or moral connotation “honest, reasonable”; cf. Isa 41:26—“so that we may say that it was right” (ὅτι ἀληθῆ ε—στιν, Hebrew ʾadîq); 43:9 (Hebrew ʾemeth); Phil 4:8—“whatever is true (honest), whatever is worthy . . . let this be what counts for you.”

76 This is the right spelling (Herodian 2.473.7), as opposed to aletheinos (ἀληθινός) in certain papyri, cf. E. Mayser, Grammatik, p. 92, n. 7; I, 3, p. 100, 38.

77 Moulton-Milligan (on this word) cite P.Petr. II, 19 (l. a) 6; (2) 3 (third century BC); cf. a death certificate: ἀληθινὰ εἶναι τὰ γεγραμμένα (P.Phil. 6, 24; from the second century AD); P.Apoll. 61, 10: “I made him swear that these were not lies but the truth”; 68, 2. A letter from the third century is addressed Σαραπίωνι τω— ἀληθινω— μωρω— (SB 10557, 1); BGU 1141, 12: δέδωκα ἀποδείξεις ἀληθινάς (seventeenth year of Augustus; cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 684, 17).

78 Autolycus of Pitane, Risings, intro. 4: “There are two types of sunrises and sunsets: true (ἀληθιναί = real) and apparent”; cf. 1.1 et passim. — Xenophon, Oec. 10.3: “If I passed off badly died fabric on you as authentic purple (πορφυρίδας ἀληθινάς)”; ἀληθινῆς μικτῆς πορφύρας (SB 11075, 8); the compound form ἀληθινοπόρφυρος (P.Oxy. 114, 7; SB 11075, 11). The verb ἀληθίζω means “die with purple,” in P.Holm., p. 28 = n. 18, 6; third-fourth century); ἀληθινός = purple, in John Malalas, Chron. 2.33.12; 17.413.14 (PG, vol. 97, 101 and 612).

79 Job 1:1; 2:3; 4:7, 23; straightforward speech, 6:25; Prov 12:19; cf. the queen of Sheba: “Then what I heard about you is true” (1Kgs 10:6; 2Chr 9:5).

80 Prelim. Stud. 159, 101: “true and just measure”; Heir 162: “let your weights be correct and just” (Deut 25:15) = Dreams 2.193. True wealth does not deceive (Flight 17) but is found in the heavens (Rewards 104). True goods are the object of divine benediction (Virtues 78). The “true man” is the one who corresponds to his spiritual nature (Worse Attacks Better 10; Giants 33; Flight 131; cf. Moses 1.289). “True life” is that of the religious soul (Alleg. Interp. 1.32, 35; 3.52); cf. authentic wisdom and virtue (Flight 82).

81 John 17:3—“You, the only true God” (σε τὸν μόνον ἀληθινὸν θεόν); 1Thess 1:9—“to serve the living and true God” (as opposed to idols); 1John 5:20; Rev 3:7, 14; 6:10; 19:11; his words (Rev 19:9; 21:5; 22:6), his judgments (16:7; 19:2), his ways are true (15:3). In a secular sense: the proverb spoke truly (John 4:37); in a moral sense: “let us draw near with a true heart,” meaning upright and firm (Heb 10:22); in the OT sense: Christ’s judgment (John 8:16) and the testimony of the evangelist (19:35) are true or perfect because well-founded.

82 This suggests the Platonic theory of the Ideas, cf. R. C. Trench, Synonyms, pp. 27ff. J. H. Bernard, Gospel According to St. John, Edinburgh, 1928, vol. 1, p. 11.

83 R. Borig, Der wahre Weinstock, Untersuchungen zu Jo XV, 1–10, Munich, 1967.

84 Menander, Dysk. 915, 929; Dittenberger, Or. 223, 17; C.P.Herm. 6, 2, 32; 8, 18; SB 7635, 1: τω— δεσπότη μου ὡς ἀληθω—ς τιμιοτάτω; 8262, 1; 9444, 3; 9683, 1 (P.Vindob.Sal., n. XXII, 1 and p. 195); Philo, Alleg. Interp. 2.81: πάνυ ἀληθω—ς = quite true; 3.58; Philo uses the formula ὡς ἀληθω—ς (= in truth) almost sixty times (Cherub. 76, 93; Unchang. God 125; Rewards 30, 43; Etern. World 10, 69; Flacc. 72; etc.).

85 Christ is truly (the) son of God (Matt 14:33; 27:54; Mark 15:39), Savior of the world (John 4:42), the prophet who was to come (John 6:14; 7:40).

86 John 8:31; cf. 1:47. 1Thess 2:13—The Thessalonians received Paul’s preaching “not as a human message, but as it really is, a message from God”; 1John 2:5—“The one who keeps his word, the love of God is truly (actually) perfected in him.”

ἀμελέω, ε—πιμελέομαι ameleo, to not matter; epimeleomai, to busy oneself with, see to

ameleo, S 272; EDNT 1.69; MM 26; L&N 30.50; BDF §176(2); BAGD 44–45 | epimeleomai, S 1959; EDNT 2.31; MM 242; L&N 30.40, 35.44; BDF §§101, 176(2); BAGD 296

The verb melei (construed with moi tinos, peri tinos, hoti) means: to care for someone with respect to something, to take an interest in or busy oneself with a matter;¹ hence meletao is not only “think about, meditate on” but also “to be busy about, to exert oneself” and even “to practice.”² More frequent is ameleo, “to be careless, negligent, not put oneself out.” This indifference is that of the ones first invited to the marriage feast of the kingdom of God (Matt 22:5); it is cursed by Jer 48:10 and receives almost the same treatment in Heb 2:3—“How shall we escape if we neglect so great a salvation?”³—and Heb 8:9—“Since they have not remained in my covenant, I myself have also lost interest in them, says the Lord.”⁴ After asking Timothy to apply himself (proseche) to reading, to exhortation, and the like, St. Paul instructs him: “Do not neglect the spiritual gift that is in you.”⁵ The litotes me amelei occurs frequently in the papyrological literature to express a psychological orientation of zeal and urgency⁶ or application to a task;⁷ me ameleseis, synonymous with me okneseis (P.Harr. 107, 15; P.Mich. III, 221, 12, 13); and opposed to spoudason (SB 9754, 3–4 = P.Mil. Vogl. 255), to prothymos (cf. PSI 621, 7), and to epimeleo (cf. P.Eleph. 13, 7; P.Hib. 253, 3 and 8).

Ameleo is used in medicine for neglected patients, who are lost for lack of care,⁸ but especially for functionaries in the public administration who default on their obligations as epimeletes (P.Panop.Beatty 1, 215; 2, 6, 74; Plutarch, Tim. 18.3: argos and amelos). Ameleia is typical offense of a proxy or of one responsible for carrying out a function, but who shirks his obligations.⁹ It is obvious that we should understand 1Tim 4:14 in this sense—Timothy should not lose sight of the fact that he was supernaturally equipped to carry out his duty, and he should take his stand on this divine gift in facing up to his responsibilities as model pastor and teacher.

In this pastoral context, it is natural that St. Paul uses epimeleomai with respect to the Ephesian overseers: “If anyone does not know how to rule his own household, how will he look after a church of God?” (pos ekklesias theou epimelesetai, 1Tim 3:5). This compound verb, meaning “busy oneself, take care, direct,” suggestive of the public function carried out by the community minister and of the devotion that this function requires, is copiously attested in secular Greek, especially in epigraphy (see the index in Dittenberger, Syl. 4.345ff.), with respect to every occupation,¹⁰ and it could be used here of any job or position of oversight in the ekklesia. But the emphasis is on morality, because the term is used of a task that requires personal devotion, of effective leadership, of diligent application.¹¹ In this sense it has a role in the medical vocabulary from the classical period,¹² where epimelesthai=epimeleian poieisthai means “care for medically.” It is in this sense that, according to Doctor Luke, the good Samaritan, having taken the injured traveler to the inn “took care of him” (Luke 10:34) and instructed the innkeeper, epimeletheti autou.¹³

From Aristotle on, this verb has a political sense: to busy oneself with public affairs.¹⁴ Epimeletes designated especially the high magistrates who governed the city and whose dedicatory inscriptions praise their merit and their justice,¹⁵ so much so that the holder of such a title was addressed in a letter as “Your Diligence”—Epimeleia (P.Panop.Beatty 1, 76, 85–86, 103). Clearly this political-moral sense applies well to the overseer called to guide a Christian community,¹⁶ but it works even better in light of the cultic usages of epimeleia, epimeleomai in the first century. In Israel, the epimeleia tou hierou or ton hieron is entrusted to the priests and to the king:¹⁷ they oversee the cultic celebrations, the organization of processions, the offering of sacrifices, and are responsible for the liturgy. In pagan cultic rules, the phrase epimeleisthai tes thysias recurs frequently,¹⁸ and the inscriptions provide epimeletai ton mysterion.¹⁹ In other words, the Christian minister does not necessarily have a financial role to play, as some have claimed, but is a leader who carries out a religious function and must apply himself to it with the greatest diligence.

¹ In the Gospels, the construction is always negative: οὐ μέλει = the Lord doesn't care (Matt 22:16; Mark 4:38; Luke 10:40); the hireling thinks only of his own interests and does not bother himself about the sheep (John 10:13), nor Judas about the poor (John 12:6); nor does Gallio care that Sosthenes is being beaten before his tribunal (Acts 18:17). The nuance "busy oneself with, take care" is present in 1Cor 7:21; 9:9; above all 1Pet 5:7—"Unload all your cares upon God (Ps 55:23), for he is engaged on your behalf." Cf. Ps.-Plutarch, De mus. 26: "The ancient Greeks were right to devote the greatest care to musical education"; P. Tebt. 703, 174.

² Cf. Acts 4:25—the peoples have planned vain things (cf. Luke 21:14—προμελετα—ν); 1Tim 4:15—Timothy is to meditate on the Paul's exhortations to virtue and on preaching—exert himself on, go to the trouble of putting into practice.

³ Τηλικαῦτος (for τοσοῦτος), literally, of this age (2Cor 1:10; Jas 3:4; Rev 16:18; P. Oxy. 900, 12; P. Flor. 58, 14), highlights the incomparable value of Christian salvation; cf. Diodorus Siculus 2.4.1: "Semiramis, a woman of modest estate, was exalted to just great renown, εἰ—ς τηλικαύτην . . . δόξαν"; Heraclitus, All. 25.11: "How can one heal such (τηλικαῦτα) sicknesses?"; Polybius 3.1.10: "such momentous developments"; cf. P. Chantraine, Etudes sur le vocabulaire grec, Paris, 1956, p. 153.

⁴ Citing Jer 31:32 (a text exploited by the Qumran community, cf. J. T. Milik, Dix ans de découvertes dans le désert de Judah, Paris, 1957, p. 75). On this reciprocity, cf. the letter of Aurelius Sarapion to Aurelius Patas (third to fourth century): "Do not be negligent, knowing that I for my part do not neglect your affairs, μὴ ἀμαλήσης εἰ—δὼς ὅτι κἀγὼ οὐκ ἀμελω— εἰ—ς σε" (B. Boyaval, "Le prologue du Misouménos de Ménandre et quelques autres papyrus grecs inédits," in ZPE, vol. 6, 1, 1970, p. 30; n. 14, 9–11), cf. P. Rein. 117, 11: "Do not neglect to write me a letter, taking into account that if you do something, you will receive it back quadruple." P. Phil. 32, 16: "If through negligence you send nothing, it is yourself that you will wrong" (end of the first century?).

⁵ 1Tim 4:14; ἀμελει—ν is the opposite of προσέχειν, "fix one's attention, attach oneself" (as in Heb 2:1, 3); cf. Hippocrates, Acut. 4.1; Demosthenes, C. Poly. 50.1; C. Call. 55.9). The verb plays a role in the vocabulary of Stoic ethics (Prelim. Stud. 65; Epictetus 4.12.7) and of the Christian pastoral writings (1Tim 1:4; 3:8; 4:1, 3; 2Pet 1:19; cf. J. Dupont, Discours de Milet, pp. 136ff.), where the sense of applying oneself and devoting oneself has a moral value. In a Christian papyrus of the third century, μὴ οὖν ἀμελήσητε, ἀδελφοί, διὰ ταχέων τοῦτο ποιῆσαι (SB 9557, 53) corresponds to καλω—ς οὖν ποιήσαντες (line 37); one even specifies: νῦν οὖν μὴ ἀμελήσης, δέσποτα, διὰ τὸν θεόν (P.Herm. 7, 15).

⁶ P.Mert. 85, 6: “Do not neglect to write, brother, concerning your health”; 112, 11; P.Princ. 186, 16 (AD 28); SB 10724, 18; Pap.Lugd.Bat. I, 19, 8; XI, 26, 19; P.Oxy. 113, 16: μὴ δόξης με ἡμεληκότα τῆς κλειδός; 1929, 4: μὴ ἀμελήσης τοῦ ζητῆσαι τουτό; 2982, 12; 2985, 9; P.Sorb. 62, 5: “Don’t fail to see to that, because I absolutely need it”; P.Cair.Isid. 134, 8; P.Mich. VIII, 464, 15ff.: “Don’t worry about us, take care of yourself” (first century AD).

⁷ P.Yale 77, 8 (AD 100): “I ask you not to be negligent about the gold bracelet”; P.Mil. 74, 8; P.Oxy. 2149, 11: “Do it, do not neglect it”; 2781, 6 and 10; P.Harr. 107, 18: “Do not neglect to send me the coat”; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 18, 36; C.Pap.Jud. 424, 14: letter from Joanna to Epagathos, 15 December 87: “Do not neglect to take us”; P.Tebt. 315, 32: “Do not neglect yourself or that which I wrote you to buy for me”; 417, 31: “You shall not neglect any of these tasks”; P.Abinn. 43, 8: “Do not neglect to pay what you owe”; SB 10567, 53: τοῦτο μὴ ἀμελήσης ἀλλὰ ποίσον γυμνασθῆναι (third century, Antinoe); P.Vars. 26, 33: τοίνυν μὴ ἀμελήσης συντελει—ν τοῦτο. The exhortation is repeated at the beginning and the end of the letter (P.Oxy. 3199, 3, 10). Often the formula is ὄρα μὴ ἀμελήσης = See to it that you do not neglect (ibid. 42, 16; P.Ant. 192, 14; PSI 318, 7–8; P.IFAO II, n. 18, 8–9), and this exhortation concludes the letter, before the salutation: Μὴ οὖν ἀμελήσις. Ἐρρωσο (ibid. 19, 17–18, first century AD; cf. SB 9535, 12; P.Fay. 125, 3–4). —Αμελω—ς is used of a negligent sentinel (Thucydides 1.100).

⁸ Hippocrates, Epid. 3.72.3; Thucydides 2.51.2: people were dying for lack of care (ἀμέλεια). The use of μελέτη for “treatment” is known (Hippocrates, Artic. 50; Fract. 31, 35; Int. 44, 52). Hence the honorific inscription on behalf of Archelaos, doctor at Heraclea: διὰ τῆς ι—ατρικῆς τέχνης ει—ς τὴν τω—ν ἀπόρων ὄνησιν πλείστην μελέτην ποιούμενον (MAMA, vol. 6, 114, 12–13 = I.Car., n. 70, p. 177).

⁹ P.Hamb. 192, 5: οὐκ ἡμέλησά σου τοῦ ε—ντολίου; PSI 425, 13; P.Oxy. 62, 9; 1775, 15; P.Princ. 163, 7; 167, 9: μὴ ἀμελήσης περὶ ὧν σοι ε—νετελάμην; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XVI, 34, 9 and 14; P.Cair.Isid. 77, 20; P.Mil.Vogl. 167, 13 “because of the carelessness of Mario, the inspector of seeds” (17 March 110); P.Mich. 591, 3 (ed. G. M. Browne).

¹⁰ On the Sabbath, the Jews do not take care of any business, don't do any chores, μήτε ἄλλης ε—πιμελει—σται λειτουργίας (Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.209). Simon made an inspection round, “taking care of matters related to the administration of the cities” (1Macc 16:14). Used for the labor of architects (CIRB, Moscow-Leningrad, 1965, n. 1122; 1242, 1243, 1245, 1246). In its legal sense, ε—πιμελέομαι means “to be in charge of managing, to administrate, to watch over the interest of” (L. Gernet, Démosthène: Plaidoyers civils, vol. 4, Paris, 1960, p. 156; V. Arangio-Ruiz, Lineamenti del sistema contrattuale nel diritto dei papyri, Milan, 1928, pp. 22ff.).

¹¹ Cf. P.Tebt. 703, 183: ε—πιμέλου δὲ ε—πισκοπει—ν (third century BC); line 191: ε—πιμελές τέ σοι ἔστω (cf. line 70, 80, 149, 191, 215, 224, 241). A decree awarding public hospitality to Chairias, an adjunct official, mentions that “he demonstrates great care and devotion in his work and in all that he does for Antipatros” (P. Cabanes, “Les inscriptions de théâtre de Bouthôtos,” in Actes de Colloque 1972 sur l'esclavage, Paris, 1974, p. 165, n. 32). Menander, Dysk. 213: “Look after your father”; 240: “take care of my sister”; 618: “See to his needs.” C.Pap.Jud. 424, 27: “above all take good care of yourself, so that you may be well”; P.Ross.Georg. 2, 4; 18, 321; UPZ 1, 61, 29ff.; 59, 39; PSI 1312, 10; P.Oxy. 1479, 13: “take good care of yourself, so that you may be well,” end of the first century BC; P.Mert. 62, 13, from AD 6). Cf. the funerary inscription of New Caesarea: “All the other gods who watch over good souls and take care of them” (in J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. 52, 13). Ζητει—ε—πιμελω—ς (Luke 15:8) = search diligently, carefully. This adverb is used for education (Prov 13:24) and worship (Menander, Dysk. 37: the young girl “honors the nymphs diligently”).

¹² Numerous examples not given in LSJ, mentioned by W. K. Hobart, Medical Language, pp. 269ff., and N. van Brock, Vocabulaire médical, pp. 237ff. “The lesions get worse if left alone, but if cared for (ε—πιμεληθέντα) they get better” Hippocrates, Mochl. 21; cf. Art. 8); “In the eyes of the common people, those who are not themselves in good bodily condition would not be able to take care of others either, οὐδ' ἄν ε—τέρων ε—πιμεληθῆναι καλω—ς” Hippocrates, Medic. 1); Soranus, Gyn. 3.48.1. Honorific decree for a doctor of Cos (Dittenberger, Syl. 943, 30ff.), for the doctor Hermias at Gortyn (I.Cret., vol. 4, p. 230, n. 168, 8ff.).

¹³ Luke 10:35. At Sidon, the centurion Julius to be cared for by his friends, ε—πιμελείας τυχει—ν (Acts 27:3). —Επιμελεία, treatment, care provided for a sick person, cf. Prov 3:8; Sir 30:25.

¹⁴ Ath. Pol. 16.3: ε—πιμελει—σθαι τω—ν κοινω—ν; cf. Pol. 3.5.10: “the man of state is master of the administration of common affairs, κύριος τω—ν κοινω—ν ε—πιμελείας;” 7(6).8.1321b. In the technical usage, the Epimeletes at Athens were the twenty officials of the twenty symmoriae, with responsibility for overseeing the apportionment of charges, the enrolling of the members of the symmoriae, and the defense of the state; they could be compared to magistrates (cf. Glotz, Epimélètes, in DAGR p. 666). At Rome, the epimeletes was the curator (cf. H. G. Mason, Greek Terms, p. 46).

¹⁵ Cf. P. Roussel, Délos colonie athénienne, Paris, 1916, pp. 97–125; F. Durrbach, Choix, n. 77, 83, 95; P. Graindor, Athènes de Tibère à Trajan, Cairo, 1931, pp. 80ff. I.Rhamn., pp. 84ff., 115ff., 118–120, 124ff. 129ff., 139. In an inscription of the port of Ostia, Valerius Serenus is ὁ ε—πιμελητής παντὸς τοῦ —Αλεξανδρεινοῦ στόλου (IG vol. 14, 917). Aeneas Tacticus requires the leader and official (ἡγεμω—ν καὶ ε—πιμελητής) to be prudent and dynamic (Polior. 1.7). Demetrius of Phalerum, who showed much benevolence and humaneness toward his fellow citizens, is ε—πιμελητής τῆς πόλεως (Diodorus Siculus 18.74.3; 20.45; cf. the ε—πιμελητής Καύδου in an inscription of Sparta, L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 1, Limoges, 1940, pp. 109ff.). In Israel, two sorts of overseers and magistrates (ε—πιμελητὰς καὶ ἄρχοντα) maintained public security and good order (Spec. Laws 4.21); Moses was ὁ τοῦ ἔθνους ε—πιμελητής καὶ προστάτης (Rewards 77; cf. Virtues 57). On the epimeletes of the city and the governor, cf. J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1974, pp. 202, n. 108; 291, n. 553.

¹⁶ 1Tim 3:15. We should note the analogous political meaning of the Greek —Επισκόποι, especially at Ephesus; cf. the references in DKP, vol. 2, col. 323.

¹⁷ Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.188; Ant. 20.222; Ep. Arist. 93; cf. Husbandry 51: the Logos, firstborn son of God, will receive the responsibility for caring for the sacred flock. AtDelos, there were officials in charge of the sacrifices: ε—πιμελητὰς τῆς θυσίας (F.Durrbach, Choix, n. 21); at Ostia, Claudius Papirius is ε—πιμελητής τοῦ ι—εροῦ (IG, vol. 14, 926); at Oxyrhynchus, Sarapion is epimeletes of the tribes of priests of the Serapeion and of other temples (P.Oxy. 2563, 5), like Demetrius at the temple of Artemis (P.Thead. 34, 14), —Επιμελητής, ναοῦ θεα—ς —Αρτέμιδος (P. Hermann, Ergebnisse, n. 23, 2–3).

¹⁸ LSCG, n. 93, 35 (Eretria, fourth–third century); 96, 19 (Mykonos, 200 BC); 103, 11 (Minoa of Amorgos, first century BC); 136, 5 (Ialysos, 300 BC); 171, 6, 9, 12 (Isthmos, second century BC); 177, 6, etc.

¹⁹ Dittenberger, Syl. 384, 9 (Athens); 540, 11, 43 (Athens); 1029, 10; SEG, vol. 16, 92, 7 (Eleusis); 162, 10, 24 (Athens); vol. 21, 494, 19 (Eleusis, first century BC), etc.

ἀμεταμέλητος

ametameletos, leaving no room for regret, irrevocable

ametameletos, S 278; TDNT 4.626–629; EDNT 1.69; NIDNTT 1.356–357; L&N 25.271; BAGD 45

Unknown in the OT, this adjective is used only twice in the NT,¹ notably in Rom 11:29, where it has a theological significance; with respect to the final salvation of Israel,² the apostle affirms: “The gifts and the calling of God are irrevocable.” If we insist on an etymological definition (a-meta-melomai), we will see this as meaning that God does not change his mind;³ once God has chosen his people, he will not go back on the decision; God never breaks his word after making a promise (Ps 110:4 = Heb 8:21). Hence our adjective, a synonym of ametanoetos,⁴ will express simply the absence of variation in the divine will. God is am atabletos (Aristotle, Cael. 1.9.279a).

But we must look at usage, which shows two partially overlapping semantics, one literary, the other legal.⁵ Following Socrates’ definition of happiness as “a pleasure that leaves no regret,”⁶ Plato (Tim. 59d), Crates of Thebes,⁷ Plutarch (De tu. san. 26), Porphyry (VP 39; ed. A. Nauck, Porphyrii opuscula, Leipzig, 1886, p. 37), and the Neoplatonist Hierocles of Alexandria (ed. F. Jullach, Fragmenta Philosophorum Graecorum, Paris, 1875, vol. 1, p. 453) frequently modify hedone with the epithet ametameletos. It is a scholastic tradition. But these same authors add that these pleasures are not vain but profitable (opheleiai), are not diluted with any sorrow (alypon), that nothing disturbs or diminishes their charm (hedeia), and finally that they are characterized by permanence or fixity (monimos). This ensemble of subsidiary qualifiers tends to give to ametameletos the sense “absolute, whole, unobscured.”

Meanwhile, another series of texts gives this adjective the meaning “total” or “definitive,” whether with respect to feelings, decisions, or personal resolutions.⁸ Here and there appears a psychological or moral nuance of simplicity, good faith, or candor, which is the sense of the adverb ameletetos. This meaning is predominant around the time of Christ, being used precisely with respect to benefits, to devotion, and—for the first time—to gifts. An honorific decree of Priene expresses the recognition of the city for the good grace and indefectible devotion of Zosimus toward it (I.Priene, 114, 8; end of the first century BC). According to Diodorus

Siculus, “every benevolent act, done without afterthought, bears the good fruit of praise from those who are its beneficiaries” (10.15.3). The sure and definitive character of a donation in the first century AD is seen in the Tabula of Ps.-Cebes of Thebes: When an old man exhorts his interlocutor not to trust goods given by Fortune, who takes back what she gives, the stranger asks what characterizes gifts given by alethine Paideia. The rejoinder: “True knowledge of useful things, a sure and stable gift.”⁹

This sense of ametameletos —“irrevocable”—is exactly its meaning in the few papyri that use the adjective. On 10 November 41, Emperor Claudius wrote to the Alexandrians: “I shall now address the disturbances and the anti-Jewish riots . . . reserving the right to bring an inflexible anger to bear against any who would start up again (reading arxomenon for arxamenon). I flatly declare to you that if you do not put an end to this murderous reciprocal furor, I shall be forced to give you a harsh demonstration of what the righteous anger of a philanthropic prince is.”¹⁰ Three other attestations are of juridical actions: writers of wills or parties to contracts declaring their decisions unchangeable and irrevocable,¹¹ such as Abraham, bishop of Hermonthis, at the end of the fourth century: hothen eis tauten hormesa ten engraphon ametameleton eschaten diathekemiaian asphaleian.¹² The sense “immutable, unalterable” is confirmed by P.Lond. V, 1660, 37 (c. 353), if the restitution of C. Wessely is accepted:¹³ asaleuton kai ametameleton kai ametanatrepton einai;¹⁴ and by P.Cair.Masp. 314, 3, 11, from the sixth century. These are late documents, but they provide good parallels to Rom 11:29, which has the value of a legal axiom.

The revelation will thus be this: The conduct of the beneficiaries of the covenant will have led God to abrogate it. Now God’s faithfulness is not made false by the unfaithfulness of men (2Tim 2:13); not only does God not repent of his generous gifts and his promises,¹⁵ but they are irremissible by their very nature (1Thess 5:24; 1Cor 1:9; 2Cor 1:19-22, etc.). Consequently, God will never go back on his choice and his gifts of grace.¹⁶

¹ 2Cor 7:10—“The sorrow that is according to God works a repentance unto salvation that leaves no room for regret.” Most commentators connect ἀμεταμέλητον to μετάνοιαν and not to σωτηρίαν. A conversion that will not change is without turning back, definitive (Vulg. stabilem); cf. μεταμέλει, regret (Menander, Dysk. 12; E. G. Thomson, Μετανοέω and μεταμέλει in Greek Literature until 100 A.D., Historical and Linguistic Studies in Literature Related to the N.T., second series, vol. 1, Chicago, 1909, p. 366).

² D. Judant, Les deux Israël, Paris, 1960 (with the review of P. Benoit, in RB, 1961, pp. 458–462); idem, Judaïsme et Christianisme, Paris, 1969, pp.

261ff. L. Goppelt, Les Origines de l'Eglise, Paris, 1961, pp. 116ff. The great majority of commentators have seen the Jewish people as the subject of this verse, but about half have not understood it to mean that this people as a whole would necessarily be converted (F. J. Caubet Iturbe, "Et sic omnis Israel salvus fieret' [Rom. XI, 26]," in EstBib, 1963, pp. 127–150); cf. S. Légasse, "Jésus a-t-il annoncé la conversion finale d'Israël (à propos de Mc. X, 23–27)?" in NTS, vol. 10, 1964, pp. 480–487; B. Noack, "Current and Backwater in the Epistle to the Romans," in ST, vol. 19, 1965, pp. 155–166.

³ As opposed to men, Matt 21:30, 32; 27:3; 1Clem. 2.7: "You never regretted having done good"; 54.4: "they will not regret their conduct"; 58.2: "Accept our recommendations and you will not be sorry."

⁴ This adjective occurs frequently in the papyri (wills, deeds of sale, of endowment, of gift) to express the irrevocable character of the decision, P.Grenf. 2.68, 4–5; P.Cair.Preis. 42, 3; P.Flor. 47, 4, 25; R. Taubenschlag, "Das babylonische Recht in den griechischen Papyri," in JJP, 1954, p. 179, n. 5; A. Bonhöffer, Epiktet, pp. 106ff. Cf. the Inscription de Nazareth, line 5: τούτους μένειν ἀμετακινήτους τὸν αἰ—ω—να.

⁵ Cf. the references supplied by H. Windisch, Der zweite Korintherbrief, 9th ed., Göttingen, 1924, p. 232.

⁶ Ἡδονὴ ἀμεταμέλητος, in Stobaeus 103, 39, 18; ed. Wachsmuth, vol. 5, p. 906.

⁷ Ep. 10, ed. R. Hercher, Epistolographi, Paris, 1873, p. 210.

⁸ For example, there are those irrepressible fits of anger so blinding that one kills without hesitation and without a twinge of regret (Plato, Leg. 9.866c); but there are also those serious characters who embark on an undertaking and never look back (Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 9.4.1166a29). If they make promises or offer a treaty, they can be taken at their word; those who trust them will not be sorry (Polybius 23.16; 21.11.11; Dionysius of Halicarnassus 11.13).

⁹ 32.12: ἀσφαλῆς δόσις καὶ βεβαία καὶ ἀμεταμέλητως (ed. C. Praechter, Leipzig, 1893, p. 26).

¹⁰ P.Lond. 1912, 78 = H. I. Bell, Jews and Christians in Egypt, p. 25.

¹¹ R. Taubenschlag, Law of Greco-Roman Egypt, pp. 236ff. In the contract for the sale of some real estate in the Fayum on 8 September 512, "the said seller declares that it is his firm, freely arrived at, and irrevocable decision to sell from this time forth and forever” (A. Sayce, “Deux contrats grecs du Fayoum,” in Rev. des études grecques, 1890, p. 131, A 3).

¹² P.Lond. I, 77, republished by Chrest.Mitt., Leipzig-Berlin; 1912, vol. 2, n. 319; cf. P.Harr. 74, 25, from AD 99: διαθήκη, ε—φ η— ἀμεταθέτω ε—τελεύτησεν.

¹³ Cf. Berichtigungsliste, vol. 3, Leiden, 1958, p. 97.

¹⁴ Cf. P.Michael. 45, 11; P.Berl.Zill., n. 4, 14.

¹⁵ Cf. the texts cited by A. Vaccari, “Irrevocabilità dei favori divini: Nota a commento di Rom. XI, 29,” in Mélanges Tisserant, vol. 1, pp. 437–442; cf. nevertheless the times that God had regrets under the Old Covenant, A. W. Argyle, “God’s Repentance and the LXX,” in ExpT, vol. 75, 1964, p. 367.

¹⁶ The reason is not only that God is immutable (Mal 3:6), but that his election and his gifts are inspired by an agape that is by definition an eternal love (cf. Phocylides 17.4: “Those who I respect, I love from the beginning to the end, τούτους ε—ξ ἀρχῆς μέχρι τέλους ἀγαπω—”; ed. E. Diehl, Anth. Lyr. Graec., 3d ed., Leipzig, 1949, p. 60). A. Vaccari (loc. cit., p. 437) prefers to attach this immutability to the hesed that would be characterized by its durability and permanence. Obviously these are not mutually exclusive options.

ἀμοιβή

amoibe, recompense, return

amoibe, S 287; MM 27; L&N 57.168; BAGD 46

The church takes charge only of those widows who have no family to support them. The children and grandchildren of a widow should learn to “give back [that which they owe_ to their parents” (amoibas apodidonai tois progonois). ¹ Solon imposed this obligation on sons on pain of dishonor.² In Egypt, it was the daughters who were bound to provide for their parents, sons being dispensed, at least unless they had agreed by contract to do so.³ But in year 26 of Euergetes I and in the year 1 of Philopator, Pappos and Ctesicles, aged and infirm, complain that their son and daughter, respectively, have refused or ceased to pay a food pension (P.Enteux. 25 and 26); while the children and grandchildren of the general Diazelmis surround his old age with honor and care, in the second to third century BC.⁴

It is a question of natural law⁵ and of filial devotion,⁶ because it is a repayment or a just compensation of the part of children who after a fashion return to their parents from all that they have received from them.⁷ To be precise, amoibe (a biblical hapax) expresses exchange⁸ or substitution (P.Oxy. 1930, 2 and 4), a return gift, a recompense;⁹ hence its constant usage as a sign of acknowledgement in expressions of gratitude.¹⁰ In 84 BC, Zosimus, having received the title of citizen, felt no sterile gratitude (ouk akarpon ten tes times dedeichen amoiben), for he loved the city as his homeland and poured benefits upon it.¹¹ Pagans and Christians often ask God to return benefit for benefit, like this black slave of the centurion Pallas at Antioch: “In return, my God give my master a long life to live, and with it glory.”¹²

¹ 1Tim 5:4. It is not certain that ἀμοιβάς is an accusative plural of intensity, because it is found often enough as an equivalent to the singular. Cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 798, 5: εὐρει—ν ἴσας ἀμοιβὰς οἷς εὐηργέτηνται νῆ δυναμένων (AD 37); Cagnat-Lafaye, Inscriptions graecae, vol. 4, col. II, 39: κομιζόμενος τω—ν εὐεργεσιω—ν ἀξίας τὰς ἀμοιβάς.

² —Εάν τις μὴ τρέφῃ τοὺς γονέας ἄτιμος ἔστω (Diogenes Laertius 1.55); Plutarch, Sol. 22.1, 22.4.

³ According to Herodotus 2.35; cf. E. Seidl, “Die Unterhaltspflicht der Töchter,” in Proceedings XI, pp. 149–155. According to P.Cair.Masp. 67314, the sons, upon inheriting from their fathers, owe to their widowed mothers to γηροβοσκει—σθαι and νοσοκομει—σθαι (on γηροβοσκία, γηροτροφία, γηροκομία, the feeding, care, and lodging of aged and sick persons, cf. P.Oxy. 889, 19; 1210, 9; BGU 1578, 17; P.Flor. 382, 39; R. Taubenschlag, Opera Minora, vol. 2, pp. 339–345, 539–555).

⁴ SEG vol. 8, 497, 11ff. In the sixth century, a son cares for his sick, aged father, P.Lond. 1708, 51ff.

⁵ P.Ryl. 624, 16. Cf. Hierocles of Alexandria: “Children ought to regard themselves in the household of their parents as being in a temple where nature has placed them and made them priests and ministers, so that they should constantly look after the worship of these divinities who gave them life. . . . Children should supply to their fathers all necessary things, and, lest they should forget anything, should anticipate their desires and often go so far as to guess things that they cannot explain for themselves; for they have often guessed for us, when we could express our needs only through our cries, stammerings, and complaints” (in Stobaeus, Flor. 79.53, vol. 4, p. 640); cf. line 13: προθυμία πρὸς τὸ ἀμείβεσθαι τὰς εὐεργεσίας αὐτῶ—ν). Cf. the parallels cited by C. Mussies, Dio Chrysostom, pp. 208–209.

⁶ Cf. Antiochus I of Commagene, giving as a τύπος εὐσεβείας the respect of ἔκγονα toward their προγόνου (IGLS, Paris, 1929, n. 1, 212ff.). One puts one's "religion" into practice (1Tim 2:2) when one honors one's mother (Exod 20:12) and sustains her in her old age, cf. Sir 3:2, 14; 7:27–28; Prov 19:26; 28:24; 30:17.

⁷ Cf. P. Enteux. 43, 5: "Let him restore [the sum] to me that I may have what I need for my old age: ἀποδο—ι μοι καὶ ἔχω [ει—ς τὸ] γῆρας τὰ ἀνάγκαια." On this value of iteration, cf. μέλλουσιν ὑπάτοιθ δευτέρα ἀμοιβῆ (L. C. Youtie, D. Hagedorn, H.C. Youtie, "Urkunden aus Panopolis III," n. 26, 19, in ZPE, vol. 10, 1973, p. 125; reprinted in P. Panop.).

⁸ Etern. World 108; Josephus, War 1.520: "He came to give him life as the price of his good deeds, the light of day in exchange for his hospitality"; cf. I. Olymp. 57, 56.

⁹ P. Oxy. 705, 61 (AD 200–2); P. Ryl. 624, 3; Josephus, Ant. 5.13; War 3.445; 7.365: "their throats slit . . . that's the recompense the Jews received for their alliance"; MAMA, vol. 8, 418, 36; G. E. Bean, T. B. Mitford, Cilicia, n. 31, B, 7: τὴν ε—κ τούτων ε—λογίζοντο φιλοτιμίαν εἰ—ς ἀμοιβῆν.

¹⁰ Cf. Josephus, War 1.293: certain ones attached themselves to Herod in return for the benefits that they had received from him and his father; P. Brem. 8, 3; P. Oxy. 2474, 37; SB 8026, 3.

¹¹ I. Priene 112, 17; cf. 113, 32; 119, 27; I. Car. 185, 9; the dedication by Menandros of an architectural work, in recognition: ἀμοιβῆς καὶ εὐνοίας ἔνεκεν.

¹² SB 8071, 19 (= E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 26): τούτων δ'ἀμοιβῆν δεσπότην δοίη θεὸς βίου τε μακρὸν οἶμον; MAMA vol. 7, 566, 11 (cf. N. Firatli, L. Robert, Stèles funéraires, p. 177); P. Lond. 1729, 22: only the Lord will be able to recompense you; Josephus, Ant. 4.266.

ἀναγκαι—ος

anankaios, urgently necessary

anankaios, S 316; TDNT 1.344–347; EDNT 1.77–79; NIDNTT 2.663; MM 31; L&N 34.14, 71.39; BAGD 52

The Epistle to Titus concludes with an exhortation to brotherly love: “Let our people¹ also learn to be first in good works, in the face of the urgent needs” (eis tas anankaias chreias, 3:14); which is parallel to Rom 12:13 on authentic agape: “Take your part in the needs of the saints, practicing hospitality zealously.” In the NT, the necessities of daily life—food, drink, clothing, shelter—are expressed by chreia,² which in the classical language often has the nuance of destitution, indigence, privation, distress.³

But here these “needs” are accentuated with the adjective anankaios —“pressing need”—in conformity with the usage of literature,⁴ epigraphy,⁵ and above all the papyri of the Hellenistic period.⁶ Reference is sometimes made to repayment of cash advances (P.Oxy. 1891, 6; 1970, 20; PSI 964, 6), sometimes to services (UPZ 106, 11; 107, 13; 108, 11; chrias pleious kai anankaias parechomenos; October 99; cf. the “indispensable secretary” of Palmyra, in IGLS, 1859, 7), sometimes to necessary food supplies (UPZ 110, 104; 144, 33; SB 7758, 15; cf. 7205, 18; P.Mert. 91, 17). Thus St. Paul has in mind the several forms of aid that Christians should supply to those whom we still call “the needy.”⁷

Curiously, anankaios, “constraining, necessary, indispensable,”⁸ is used for blood relatives, literally the son or the daughter who cannot refuse the obligations of an inheritance;⁹ for friends (P.Oxy. 2407, 36): anankaioi philoi are the most intimate friends.¹⁰ In this sense, Cornelius, while awaiting the arrival of Peter from Caesarea, “had gathered his relatives and close friends.”¹¹

From Euripides on, the expression philos anankaios is commonly used.¹² In Resp. 9.574bc, Plato contrasts the mother (phile anankaia) with the courtesan that someone wants to marry (phile ouk anankaia); then the father, the closest relative and relative of longest standing (philos anankaios) with the adolescent born yesterday (philos ouk anankaios). Josephus mentions “intimate friends” about ten times, but he is almost always talking about confidants of the king.¹³ The son of Nebuchadnezzar, for example, releases Jechonias and retains him as one of his closest friends.¹⁴ In the letters among the papyri, the emphasis is always on confidence and affection, notably in letters of recommendation: “Ptolemaeus, the bearer of this letter, is my friend and an intimate” (P.Col.Zen. 7, 3; from March 257 BC); “Dioscoros, bearer of the letter, is my very close friend” (estin mou leian anankaios philos).¹⁵ Sometimes a writer amplifies the effect by using the superlative: philos anankaiotatos.¹⁶

These examples, to which many more could be added, allow us to place the Lucan vocabulary against its background in the contemporary language. The “intimate friends” shared Cornelius’s frame of mind and probably awaited with the same fervor as he the joyful message that St. Peter would bring them. In pointing out their presence, St. Luke intends to express more fully the social importance of the centurion of Caesarea; not only does he worship God “with all his house” (Acts 10:2), have devout soldiers in his service (verse 7), and enjoy a perfect reputation among “the whole nation of the Jews” (verse 22) but also he has numerous associates of quality (verse 27), including first of all some very dear friends. This pagan is a grand personage whose conversion should receive as much fanfare as possible in the church.

¹ Οἱ—ἡμέτεροι designates a definite plurality (the suffix -tero added to ἡμεῖς has a differentiating function, cf. E. Benveniste, Noms d'agent, Paris, 1948, p. 119): members of the same family (Plato, Menex. 248b; Strabo 6.3.3), clients (P.Oxy. 37, col. I, 16; P.Fam.Tebt. 24, 99), “our people” as constituting a distinct group (P.Oxy. 787, 1, a letter of recommendation from the year AD 16: ὡς ἐστὶν ἡμέτερος = as he is one of ours; cf. P.Brem. 1.7). Here, it is a matter of Cretan Christians, as opposed to “those outside” (1Tim 3:7; 1Thess 4:12), pagan or Jewish (cf. Titus 1:10), οἱ—λοιποῖ (1Thess 4:13).

² Reference is sometimes to that which is indispensable (Acts 20:34; Eph 4:28; 1John 3:17), sometimes to supplies and services (Acts 28:10), even generous charitable giving (Phil 4:16). Cf. SB 9844, 3: πρὸς χρείαν τῶν ἀδελφῶν ἡμῶν (Palestinian letter from the second century AD).

³ Cf. G. Redard, Recherches sur XPH, XPHΣAI, Paris, 1953, p. 82.

⁴ It probably comes from Homer, Il. 8, 57: “Necessity forces them, χρεῖοι—ἀναγκαίη”; cf. Wettstein; Diodorus Siculus 1.34; Philo, Good Man Free 76; Decalogue 99: “Man, inasmuch as he depends upon a thousand things that the necessities of life require—πρὸς τὰς ἀναγκαίαις τοῦ βίου χρείαις—has the obligation of taking care of acquiring the necessities as long as he lives.”

⁵ In 129 BC, Moschion is the object of gratitude because he has provided for some urgent expenses, εἰς χρείαις ἀναγκαίαις (I.Priene 108, 80). We may compare ἀνάγκη, “distress, calamity” (Luke 21:23; 1Thess 3:17; 1Cor 7:26; 2Cor 6:4; 12:10) and ἐν καιροῖς ἀναγκαίοις (I.Assos, n. 11, 6; from the first century BC), ἐν τοῖς ἀναγκαῖοις καιροῖς (P.Paris 46, 7; second century BC).

⁶ P.Grenf. 2, 14 (c) 1: χρείαν ἔχομεν ἀναγκαίαν; P.Oxy. 56, 6; 1068, 16; P.Stras. 264, 10. Sometimes there is a simple formula: ἐπιτόμως ἔχομεν

τῆ σῆ ἀρετῆ εἰ—ς τὰς ἀναγκαίαις σοῦ χραΐας (Pap.Lugd.Bat. XI, 11, 20): “You will do well to pay me for my pressing necessities four talents of silver” (P.Oxy. 2600, 11; cf. P.Michael. 35 B 1; PSI 1122, 8). More often, the formula is developed: “I acknowledge having received for my personal and pressing necessity—εἰ—ς ἰ—δίαν μου καὶ ἀναγκαίαν χρεία—six pieces of imperial gold” (P.Oxy. 2237, cf. PSI 1340, 7; 1427, 9; P.Harr. 86, 2; Pap.Lugd.Bat. I, 10, 12; P.Ant. 102, 6; 103, 15; P.Fouad 53, 2; SB 9191, 4–5; 9270, 4–5; American Studies in Papyrology, vol. 9, 607, 14).

⁷ [French nécessiteux. —Tr.] Cf. ἀναγκαι—ος = that which is essential (P.Fay. 111, 19, from 95–96; P.Oxy. 2838, 7), the needs of orphans (P.Mich. IX, 532, 2).

⁸ Cf. H. Schreckenberg, Anankè, Munich, 1964.

⁹ Οἱ—ἀναγκαι—οι, used absolutely, refers to parents and close relatives (Xenophon, An. 2.4.1: “At the home of Ariaeus arrived his brothers with other relatives, οἱ—ἀδελφοὶ καὶ ἄλλοι ἀναγκαι—οι”; Demosthenes, Embassy 19.290: ὑπὲρ συγγενω—ν καὶ ἀναγκαίων). These blood relationships are distinguished from relationships established with strangers (Lysias, C. Philo 31.23: τοὺς ἀναγκαίους is contrasted with τοὺς ἀλλοτρίους; Lysias, Property of Aristophanes 19.38: “Is this any reason for wanting his parents—τοὺς ἀναγκαίους—to be stripped of all their belongings?” Josephus, Ant. 7.121: the close relatives—οἱ τε ἀναγκαι—οι—and the chiefs of the Ammonite king realize that they have broken the treaty); the closest relatives are designated by the superlative οἱ—ἀναγκαιότατοι (Josephus, Ant. 14.362); Epicharmus, frag. 186: ε—πιηρέστερον καὶ ἀναγκαιέστατον καὶ ὠραιέστατον; ed. G. Kaibel, Comicorum Graecorum Fragmenta, p. 125). G. D. Kypke offered the following definition: “Necessarii vocantur (1) consanguini, (2) adfinitate juncti, (3) familiaritatis et amicitiae connexe vinculis. Interdum vocabulum haec tria simul complectitur” (Observationes Sacrae in Novi Foederis Libros, Wratislavia, 1755, vol. 2, p. 49).

¹⁰ “The notion that could justify this dual semantic development is that of linkage: it must be sought in ἀνάγκη. Nevertheless Schwyzer’s idea (Griechische Grammatik) that ἀν—άγκη (with ἀν— from ἀνα—) expresses the idea ‘take in one’s arms’ (cf. ἀγκών, perhaps ἀγκή in Hesychius), where ‘grip, constraint’ finds some support; cf. Sophocles, Trach. 831–832. The impossible Semitic etymology of Schreckenberg, Anankè, pp. 165–176” (P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique, vol. 1, p. 83 b).

¹¹ Acts 10:24 συγκαλεσάμενος τοὺς συγγενει—ς αὐτοῦ καὶ τοὺς ἀναγκαίους φίλους. Συγγενής is literally “of common origin” (cf. Michaelis, συγγενής, in TDNT, vol. 7, pp. 736–742.). Συγγένεια is the name for a subdivision of a tribe (φυλή) or of a city (πόλις), so the members of these units are called συγγενει—ς (I.Sinur., pp. 26–28, 96). Συγγενει—ς can mean the relatives of an individual when a modifier is used (αὐτοῦ, τοῦ δει—νος); it can mean relations (Plutarch, Publ. 3.5: συγγενει—ς ὄντα ἅμα καὶ συνήθεις) and literal friends: φίλον ὄντα καὶ συγγενῆ καὶ σύμμαχον (SEG, vol. 19, 468, 32); φίλους καὶ συγγενει—ς τῆς πόλεως (Decree of Lebedos, in L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 11–12, Paris, 1960, p. 205; cf. SEG, vol. 23, 547, 2); τοι—ς συγγενέσι καὶ φίλοις καὶ εὐνοίοις (I.Magn., 38, 52; other texts in L. Robert, Opera Minora Selecta, vol. 1, Amsterdam, 1969, p. 220). —It is also an aulic title; at the court of the Ptolemies, the rank of “king’s relative—syngeneis” is the highest (Dittenberger, Or. 104, 2; 135, 5; A. Bernand, Philae, vol. 1, n. 30; E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 5, 5); cf. W. Peremans, “Sur la titulature aulique en Egypte,” in Symbolae . . . J. C. Van Oven, Leiden, 1946, p. 157; Stählin, φίλος, in TDNT, vol. 9, pp. 148, 154–155; L. Mooren, “Über die ptolemäischen Hofrangtitel,” in Antidorum W. Peremans, Louvain, 1968, pp. 161–180. The general is also qualified by this honorific title, N. Hohlwein, Stratège du nome, p. 135. —In Latin, the necessarii are friends. Legal necessitudo, equivalent to cognatio, is a designation of adfinitas (Digesta, vol. 42, 4, 5; Ulpian, 59 ad ed.: the burden of defending a minor reverts to the cognati, the adfines, the libertus; the following reason is provided: Quod verisimile est defensionem pupilli pupillaeve non omissuros vel propter necessitatem vel propter caritatem vel qua aliter ratione). Festus borrows from Aelius Gallus his definition of necessarii as those qui aut cognati aut adfines sunt, in quos necessaria officia conferuntur praeter ceteros (cited by Klebs, in RE, vol. 1, 2 col. 492–493, under the word necessitas). Aulus Gellius defines: “Necessitas autem dicatur jus quoddam et vinculum religiosae conjunctionis . . . Necessitas sane pro jure officioque observantiae adfinitatisque infrequens est: Quamquam, qui ob hoc ipsum jus adfinitatis familiaritatisque conjuncti sunt, necessariae dicuntur” (NA 13.3). Necessitudo = affection in St. Jerome, Ep. 53.1; 68.11; etc.

¹² Euripides, Andr. 671: “You cry against your natural friends, τοὺς ἀναγκαίους φίλους,” who are natural relatives; cf. Athenaeus 4.154c.

¹³ Φίλος is a court title (cf. P.Dura 18.10; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XVI, pp. 13ff. I.Cret., vol. 3, p. 100; Dittenberger, Or. 119; E. Bammel, “Φίλος τοῦ Καίσαρος,” in TLZ, 1952, col. 205–210; C. Spicq, Agape: Prolégomènes, p. 165; R. Huttmacher, Ehrendekret, p. 32; Prosop.Ptol., vol. 4, p. XIX; Stählin, “φίλος,” in TDNT, vol. 9, p. 160, n. 114). In 167–166, for example, the Ionian cities greet the king of Pergamum, Eumenes II, congratulating him both on his good health and on the friends who accompanied him on his journey: συνησθῆναι ἐ—πι τω— ἐ—μέ καὶ τοὺς ἀναγκαίους ε—ρρω—σθαι (Dittenberger, Or. 763, 31; cf. M. Holleaux, Etudes d'épigraphie, vol. 2, pp. 153–178). Attalus II traveled in similar company: συναγαγόντος μου οὐ νόνον —Αθήναιον καὶ Σώσανδρον καὶ Μηνογένην, ἀλλὰ καὶ ε—τέρους πλείονας τω—ν ἀναγκαίων (Dittenberger, Or. 315, 47 = C. B. Welles, Royal Correspondence, n. 61, 5).

¹⁴ Josephus, Ant. 10.229: ε—ν τοι—ς ἀναγκαιοτάτοις τω—ν φίλων εἶχε; cf. 10.5, 10.59; 11.208, 11.254; 13.224; 15.252.

¹⁵ P.Herm. 1, 6–7 (first century AD); cf. P.Oslo 60, 5 (second century); P.Mil.Vogl. 59, 13 (second century); BGU 625, 26: ἔχω ε—ν —Αλεξανδρεία ἀναγκαι—ον φίλον; P.Flor. 142, 2: ε—ποιδήπερ ε—ντολικὸν ἔχω ἀναγκαίου φίλου (AD 264); SB 9415, 17, 11.

¹⁶ P.Brem. 50, 4; Stud.Pal. XX, 233, 2. Cf. the ἀληθινοὶ φίλοι of Musonius, frags. 7 and 9 (ed. C. E. Lutz, pp. 56, 68), and the ἀεὶ φίλοι of Delos (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1970, p. 418, n. 410).

ἀνάγνωσις

anagnosis, reading (aloud, in public)

anagnosis, S 320; TDNT 1.343–344; EDNT 1.79; NIDNTT 1.245; MM 32; L&N 33.68; BAGD 52–53

On the Sabbath day, the Jews congregate at the synagogue (bêt seper) to hear the reading of and a commentary on a text from the Law and the Prophets.¹ The Christian church took up this tradition and turned “readers” into liturgical ministers.² But the reading of papyri and parchments was difficult, and it was necessary for the reader to know the text before reading it publicly.³ “When you say, ‘Come listen to a reading that I am going to do,’ make sure that you do not grope your way through.”⁴ This is the anagnosis that St. Paul enjoins upon Timothy: “Apply yourself to reading, to exhorting, to teaching” (1Tim 4:13).

Thus the letter to the Colossians would be read in the Laodicean community (anaginosko, Col 4:16); public reading, which assured the maximum disclosure of the word of God,⁵ was used from the first days of the apostolic writings and the prophetic revelations (Rev 1:3). In the second century, the duty of the “lector” is entrusted to a competent minister,⁶ meaning on the one hand one who can produce an intelligible reading: anagnostes kathistastho euekoos (Can. App. 19; Const. App. 2.5: polys en anagnosmasin, hina tas graphas epimelos hermeneue [“much given to reading, so that he may interpret the Scriptures carefully”]; cf. Ambrose, Off. 1.44.215); and on the other one who is intelligent: ho anaginoskon noeito (Mark 13:14; cf. Eph 3:4); since he must not only make an informed choice of the passages to read, but also comment on them. He does not have the right to be boring or esoteric (Ambrose, Off. 1.22.100–101; Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 4.23.8).

¹ Neh 8:7-8 (with the commentary of R. Le Déaut, Introduction à la littérature targumique, Rome, 1966, vol. 1, pp. 23ff.); Philo, Dreams 2.127; Heir 253; Josephus, Ant. 10.93–94; Luke 4:16; Acts 13:15 (cf. J. W. Bowker, “Speeches in Acts: A Study in Proem and Yelammedenu Form,” in NTS, vol. 14, pp. 96–111); cf. 2Cor 3:14. In the first third of the first century, Theodotus had a synagogue built at Jerusalem, εἰς ἀνάγνωσιν νόμου καὶ εἰς διδαχὴν ἐντολῶν (CII 1404). At Qumran, where a priest had the job of explaining clearly all the words of the prophets (1QpHab 2.6–9; cf. 1QS 8.11–12; 9.12–14), the monks met “to read in the Book,” to examine the law, and pray together (1QS 6.6–8). Cf. A. Guilding, The Fourth Gospel and Jewish Worship, Oxford, 1960; J. R. Porter, “The Pentateuch and the Triennial Lectionary Cycle,” in F. F. Bruce, Promise and Fulfillment (S. H. Hooke Festschrift), Edinburgh, 1963, pp. 163–174; R. Le Déaut, Nuit pascale, p. 219.

² St. Justin, 1 Apol. 67; Tertullian, Praescrip. 41.8; P.Apoll. 99, 5; P.Cair.Masp. 67088. IG, vol. 10, 2, n. 1030, a tomb inscription of Aristeia, ἀναγνώστῃς καὶ πακτωτῆς (administrator) γενόμενος τῆς ἐσσαλονικέων ἀγιωτάτης ἐκκλησίας; I.Cor., 548; H. Grégoire, Asie Mineure, n. 131 bis (Lindos); 148 (Samos); 226 quater (Didyma); G. Lefebvre, Receuil des inscriptions grecques-chrétiennes d’Egypte, Cairo, 1907, n. 112 (Fayum), 350 (Akhmin), 581 (Aswan); IGLS, 1394 (region of Apamea). Cf. H. Leclercq, “Lecteur,” in DACL, vol. 8, 2, col. 2242ff. J. M. Nielen, Gebet und Gottesdienst im Neuen Testament, Freiburg, 1937, pp. 182ff.

³ Cf. H. I. Marrou, Histoire de l’éducation, pp. 230ff., 365ff. = ET, pp. 230ff., 375ff. Apprenticeship began in the school (Plato, Leg. 810b; O. Guéraud, P. Jouguet, Un livre d’écolier du IIIe siècle avant Jésus-Christ, Cairo, 1938), and if the pupil stumbled over a syllable, his skin became more colorful than a nurse’s apron (Plautus, Bacch. 423ff.; cf. Herondas, Schoolmaster 89–90); it then became an essential element in rhetorical education, exercising the intelligence and the memory, because in the recitation-declamation that was part of the official examination, commentary on and criticism of the text that was sight-read were included (Plutarch, De aud. poet.; cf. I. Bruns, De Schola Epicteti, Kiel, 1897, pp. 3ff. J. Bompaigne, Lucien écrivain, Paris, 1958, pp. 37ff. P.Lips. 32, 12: μετὰ τὴν ἀνάγνωσιν —Ωριγένης νεώτερος ῥήτωρ; A. C. Bandy, The Greek Christian Inscriptions of Crete, Athens, 1970, n. 6, 5: μνήμην —Ἰωάννης ἀναγνώστης καὶ χαρτουλάριος; 37, 4; 104, 1). If the anagnostes is sometimes a specialist (Demosthenes, C. Poly. 1.65: the law will be read to you; C. Tim. 49.43: read me the testimony; cf. 1Macc 14:19; Ep. Arist. 310; P.Oxy. 237, 5, 13; 7.33, 35; 2562, 4; 2963, 14; BGU 2244: the opening and public reading of a will, ἡνοίγη καὶ ἀνεγνώσθη; Dittenberger, Syl. 785, 1. T. C. Skeat, The Use of Dictation in Ancient Book-Production, London, 1956, pp. 179ff.; R. A. Coles, Reports of Proceedings in Papyri, Brussels, 1966, p. 47), it is also “someone who is studying a book” (Cicero, Att. 1.12; Fam. 5.9). Cf. I.Magn., 100, 81.

⁴ Epictetus 3.23.6; Pliny, Ep. 2.19; 5.12; 7.17; Plutarch, Alex. 1.1; 23.3; P.Lond. 1973, 1: “As soon as you read this letter—ὡς ἂν ἀναγνώ—ις τὴν ἐπιστολήν—send it to Ptolemais. . . .”

⁵ 1Thess 5:27 (with the commentary of B. Rigaux, Thessaloniciens, on this verse); cf. 2Cor 1:13; Eph 3:4. Justin, 1 Apol. 67. On a literary level, cf. P.Ant. 93, 5: ἐ—δήλωσα . . . διὰ Σερήνου ἀναγνώστου (fourth century).

⁶ Hippolytus, Trad. ap. 12; cf. Const. App. 8.22.2. The qualities of a lector had to do not only with voice quality and elocution, but also with intelligence for understanding the text of a papyrus or a codex in scriptio continua. The reader had to divide the words and make out the different elements of the sentence, which were not marked by any punctuation. (Cf. Plutarch, An virt. doc. 1: ἀναγινώσκειν γράμματα = decipher letters.) Even by the time of St. Augustine, there was no punctuated text of the Scriptures. Cassiodorus and Isidorus of Seville rightly insisted on the technical education of lectors. Cf. in the Actes de la Conférence de Carthage in 411, vol. 3, 255 (ed. S. Lancel), the criticisms aimed at the clerk: “He can’t read, he doesn’t separate the sentences (or: he doesn’t distinguish the meaning of the words). . . . It is not the good faith of the clerk that is being criticized, but his pronunciation.”

ἀνάδειξις

anadeixis, distinct demonstration, revelation, proclamation

anadeixis, S 323; TDNT 2.31; EDNT 1.80; NIDNTT 3.569; L&N 28.54; BAGD 53

This substantive makes a late appearance in the Koine and remains rather rare, unknown in the papyri, Philo, Josephus, etc. It retains the basic meaning of the verb deiknymi —“show something distinctly”¹—and especially the meaning of the compound anadeiknymi: “make something visible by lifting it up,”² for example on the point of a spear (Plutarch, Crass. 26.4; cf. De def. or. 14), and is used for a shield (Herodotus 7.128; cf. 6.121, 124; Dio Cassius 77.13.5) and for the door of a house or of a sanctuary that is opened.³ Hence the meaning “be revealed,” “be uncovered” (Plutarch, Them. 25.2), “make oneself known” (idem, Caes. 38.5), “appear” (Conf. Tongues 103; Sacr. Abel and Cain 30). On the religious level, anadeiknymi often has God as its subject and means “reveal”: “I have revealed initiations to men.”⁴ It is in this sense that the substantive anadeixis is used by Diodorus Siculus 1.85.4 regarding the cult of the Apis-bull: “When Osiris died, his soul passed into an animal of this species and . . . every time this god makes an appearance on earth, this soul passes successively . . . into the body of a bull.”

The verb anadeiknymi also means “proclaim” (Xenophon, Cyr. 8.7.23), “declare” (2Macc 9:14); “the God of victories proclaimed Abraham master of trophies” (Philo, Prelim. Stud. 93). It is used especially for the designation of a sovereign through investiture (“I have designated my son to be king”)⁵ or of a high official in his office. It is in this sense that the substantive anadeixis is used for the first time by Polybius for “the coronations of the Lagids” (kai tas anadeixeis ton basileon, 15.25.11), then by Plutarch: the colleagues of Caius proclaim the results of his election to a third tribunate (Plutarch, C. Gracch. 12.7); “the day of the election” (of candidates to the magistracies, he kyria tes anadeixeos, Cat. Min. 44.10); Metellus “did not let Marius leave until twelve days before the election of consuls” (ten ton hypaton anadeixin).⁶

Curiously, the two biblical occurrences of anadeixis suggest both nuances, “show” and “institute.” According to Sir 43:6, the moon is anadeixin chronon,⁷ that is, it indicates feasts and determines months; hence in the calendar it has the double function of announcing and ruling. According to Luke 1:80, John the Baptist was in the desert until the day of his manifesting to Israel (heos hemeras anadeixeos autou). The solemnity of this “appearing” of the precursor, inaugurating his ministry, is noteworthy. The evangelist contrasts John’s long, solitary, silent sojourn in the Judean desert east of Hebron to his official manifesting by God; it is like a revelation. The Vulgate translates well, “usque ad diem ostensionis.” We may interpret, “He appeared publicly.” But this is also the coming of a hero who heralds the king and prepares his way, his presentation before the whole nation. It was at this point that John, then about thirty years old, received his investiture as announcer of the messianic era.

¹ J. Gonda, ΔΕΙΚΝΥΜΙ, Amsterdam, 1929, pp. 58–67; H. Schlier, “δείκνυμι,” in TDNT, vol. 2, p. 25.

² E. Bickerman, “ΑΝΑΔΕΙΞΙΣ,” in Mélanges E. Boisacq, Brussels, 1937, vol. 1, pp. 117–124; cf. the index in C. B. Welles, Royal Correspondence, p. 311.

³ Sophocles, El. 1458: “Let your doors open so that the inhabitants may see well”; Aristophanes, Nub. 304: opening a sanctuary; Dittenberger, Syl. 663, 15; Or. 234, 84.

⁴ Aretalogy of Isis (Dittenberger, Syl. 1267, 28); I. Magn. 98, 21 (= Syl. 589); Acts 1:24—“Lord, show which of these two you have chosen”; Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 35; Worse Attacks Better 39, 44; Conf. Tongues 179; 3Macc 2:14; Sib. Or. 3.15: “God has revealed himself as an eternal being.”

⁵ 2Macc 9:25; 10:11—“the prince promoted Lysias governor general”; 14:26; Josephus, Ant. 13.113; 14.280; 20.227: designation of a high priest; Polybius 15.25.5; I. Magn. 100 a 24 and 37; C. Michel, Recueil, n. 55, 20; 57, 27. Cf. Luke 10:1—“The Lord designated seventy-two” disciples.

⁶ Plutarch, Mar. 8.7. E. Bickerman, defines anadeixis as “the act of the solemn presentation of a prince to the people” (“ΑΝΑΔΕΙΞΙΣ,” p. 123), which was part of the ceremonial investiture of Hellenistic sovereigns; but it is also used for the dedication of a temple. Lucullus’s intention in asking Mummius to loan him statues was “to decorate the temple until its dedication” (μέχρι ἀναδείξεως, Strabo 8.6.23). Likewise the verb: a sanctuary is “dedicated” by the Gauls to Caesar Augustus (Strabo 4.3.2); cf. a declaration of war (Dittenberger, Syl. 742, 12; Or. 441, 49).

⁷ The Greek would suggest nothing more than “indication” (cf. Philo, Rewards 153), but the Hebrew manuscript discovered at Cairo has memshalah (in the construct), which means “dominion, rule” (the Hebrew manuscript from Masada has only the initial mem, followed by a lacuna; cf. Y. Yadin, The Ben Sira Scroll from Masada, Jerusalem, 1965; J. Le Moyne, Les Sadducéens, Paris, 1972, p. 68). Cf. the astrological meaning of anadeiknymi in Vettius Valens, p. 119, 25; CPR VII, 4, n. 24, 2: ἀναδεχομένου τὴν ἡμέραν.

ἀναδέχομαι

anadechomai, to welcome, accept; to accept responsibility for

anadechomai, S 324; EDNT 1.80; MM 32; L&N 34.53, 90.75; BAGD 53

The four biblical occurrences of this verb¹ are all of the first aorist middle participle anadexamenos. If the Bible gives it the well-attested sense of hospitality, “to welcome someone as a guest,”² it shows no trace of the common sense of accepting or receiving an object or a sum of money or of being subjected to an action.³ At least in the case of Eleazer’s “accepting” a glorious death in preference to an infamous existence (2Macc 6:19), a voluntary and fervent consent is involved.

This verb is therefore not synonymous with lambano. It very often means “take upon oneself, take on a burden or obligation”; one answers to someone for something. This was the case with Nicanor, who undertook to gain tribute money for the Romans by taking hostages from Jerusalem;⁴ and it is said in Egypt concerning the son of Jason, who only lived five years, that he “accomplished all that he agreed to” (SEG, vol. 8, 799, 2). When one takes on a task, one agrees to carry it through to completion (P.Cair.Isid. 82, 5 and 8). Finally, anadechomai expresses someone’s standing surety,⁵ as attests the constant, albeit late, association engyasthai kai anadechesthai.⁶

This verb consequently has a legal meaning—to take on a responsibility⁷—which is almost certainly the sense in Heb 11:17—“By faith Abraham, when put to the test, offered Isaac—truly it was his only son that he was offering—he who had received the responsibility for the promises.”⁸ The “temptation” of Abraham was a trial of his faith, his love, and his obedience. All the commentators mention the nuance of the tense: the perfect prosenenochen points to the sacrifice as completely accepted and, as it were, already accomplished in the heart of Abraham,⁹ even as the imperfect prosepheren evokes the progressive realization of this offering without weakening throughout the preparations to the immolation on Moriah: “Having offered . . . he was in the process of offering”; while—as the recipient and agent of the promises of a posterity—he appeared to be nullifying this promise forever.

¹ Cf. the doctoral thesis of S. Vitalini, La notion d'accueil dans le Nouveau Testament, Fribourg, 1961 (published in part as La nozione d'accoglienza nel Nuovo Testamento, Fribourg, 1963).

² “Publius received us and showed us hospitality” (Acts 28:7); cf. Dittenberger, Or. 339, 20: τὰς τε πρεσβείας ἀνεδέχετο προθύμως (second century BC); 441, 9; SB 8029, 7.

³ Josephus, War 1.338: “Those who escaped were received at sword-point”; 3.14: “Antonius received the first assaults with firmness”; 3.173: cattle hides to receive the stone projectiles; Dittenberger, Syl. 962, 65 (333 BC); P.Tebt. 329, 19 (AD 139); P.Eleph. 29, 13; Diodorus Siculus 4.29. A senatus consultum of Sulla: “undergo numerous dangers” (I.Thas., 174 C 8).

⁴ 2Macc 8:36—ὁ τοι—ς Ῥωμαίοις ἀναδεξάμενος φόρον; cf. Epictetus 3.24.64: “Diogenes joyfully took on so much bodily fatigue and misery”; Josephus, War 3.4: Vespasian able to assume the burden of so heavy a war; Ant. 14.315; Dittenberger, Syl. 685, 30: πα—σαν ἀναδεχόμενοι κακοπαθίαν (139 BC); SB 7473, 6, 7738, 13: ἀναδεξάμενος πόνον ε—κ νυκτὸς καὶ μεθ ἡμέραν, ἄχρι συνετέλεσεν (honorific decree for a general, from AD 22–23); 7996, 24: ἀναδεχομένου τὸν κίνδυνον τῆς πράσεως (18 September AD 430). P.Oxy. 71, 16; 1418, 18: ἀναδέξομαι τω— παιδὶ τετραμήνιον γύμνασιάρχίαν; P.Ryl. 77, 38; PSI 1239 24; BGU 1762, 11. An honorific decree is voted for Eirenias who “has taken responsibility for the costs entailed by the realization of these honors, τὰς δαπάνας τὰς εἰ—ς τὴν συντέλειαν τω—ν τιμω—ν ἀναδέξασθαι παρ αὐτοῦ” (NCIG, n. 7, 12).

⁵ Thucydides 8.81.3: “Tisaphernes would not entrust himself to the Athenians unless Alcibiades personally stood surety to him”; Polybius 5.16.8.

⁶ P.Oxy. 1972, 6; 2238, 9; 2420, 10; 2478, 12; P.Ross.Georg. V, 34, 5; Stud.Pal. XX, 127, 9; 128, 8; SB 9146, 8–9; 9152, 7; 9592, 11–12; PSI 932, 5; P.Stras. 40, 18; P.Lips. 55, 8

⁷ Josephus, Ant. 14.247; 17.304; P.Oxy. 513, 59: ε—γὼ αὐτὸς τοῦτο ἀναδέξομαι = I myself will take the responsibility (AD 184).

⁸ Ὁ τὰς ε—παγγελίας ἀναδεξάμενος. On Abraham and the sacrifice of Isaac, cf. R. Le Déaut, La Nuit pascale, Rome, 1963, pp. 131ff. 163, 206–207, 259ff. Idem, La Présentation targumique du sacrifice d’Isaac et la sotériologie paulinienne, in AnBib 18; Rome, 1963, vol. 2, pp. 563–574; M. McNamara, The New Testament and the Palestinian Targum to the Pentateuch, Rome, 1966, pp. 164ff. R. de Vaux, Les Sacrifices de l’Ancien Testament, Paris, 1964, p. 61; H. Cazelles, DBSup, vol. 7, 128ff. D. Lerch, Isaaks Opferung christlich gedeutet, Tübingen, 1950; F. M. Braun, Jean le Théologien, Paris, 1966, vol. 3, 1, p. 159. J. L. Vesco, “Abraham,” in RSPT, 1971, pp. 33–80.

⁹ “In certain cases, the perfect tense has considerable psychological significance; this aspect of ‘dramatic past time’ appears in passages where the perfect stands out from a background of aorists (2Cor 11:25—πεποίηκα; Heb 11:17⁷προσενήνοχεν; Heb 11:28—πεποίηκεν)” (E. Osty, “Pour une traduction plus fidèle du Nouveau Testament,” in Ecole des Langues orientales . . . Méorial de Cinquantenaire, Paris, 1964, p. 88).

ἀναπέμπω

anapempo, to send, conduct, bring back, send up

anapempo, S 375; EDNT 1.87; MM 37; L&N 15.70, 15.71; BAGD 59

During the Hellenistic period, this compound verb, unknown in the LXX, often has the same meaning as the simple form pempo, “send, conduct.” “Herod sent subsidies to Antony’s partisans” (Josephus, War 1.358, cf. 2.605; Ant. 18.313); “She sent us our provisions at the city of Antinous” (Pap.Lugd.Bat. VI, 37, 8); “Accept all that I send you.”¹ It is used constantly in shipping orders: “Order from Ischyron to Heroninos to load four camels with vetch (orobos) and send them into the city.”² Documents are sent,³ as are people.⁴ Prayers are sent up to heaven.⁵ Although there is this variety of connotations, the basic meaning is moving a person or thing from the place where it is to another place, as is clear from the numerous “summonses” preserved among the papyri: “Immediately send Emes . . . who is accused by Aurelius Nilus. . . .”⁶ The meaning “bring back, cause to return,” is very common in literary Greek⁷ and in the papyri: “I sent you a bag of sesame . . . send it back with Achilles” (P.Oxy. 3066, 4); a deceased woman’s dowry was not restored to the heirs (UPZ 123, 22); “If there is some rupture between us, I agree to return the estate to Heracleia.”⁸ It is in this sense that we should understand Phlm 12, where St. Paul sent the slave Onesimus back to his legal owner: “I am sending him back to you” (hon anepempsa [epistolary aorist] soi).⁹

Anapempo often has a legal meaning: to send up an accused person or to refer a matter to the competent authorities.¹⁰ This is the case in Luke 23:7, 11, 15: Pilate “sent Jesus up to Herod (anepempsen pros) . . . Herod sent him back to Pilate (anepempsen to) . . . Herod sent him up to us (anepempsen auton pros hemas).”¹¹ These variations of venue and jurisdiction are mentioned constantly.¹² Sometimes plaintiffs who are up against a scheming adversary and are unable to obtain a judgment before an easily influenced jury, appeal to a higher authority;¹³ sometimes the highest authority decides on jurisdiction. Thus a prostagma of Cleopatra III and Ptolemy Soter II rules that only the dioiketes Eirenaios will have jurisdiction to judge state agents: “they shall refer (anapempein) complaints against agents and their trials to Eirenaios the kinsman (of the king) and dioiketes” (P.Tebt. 7, 7 = C.Ord.Ptol. 61; from 144 BC). According to an inscription from Metropolis, the legate P. Ranius Castus received from the governor the assignment of taking on a case that his predecessors could not bring to a conclusion: “Having read Sosthenes’ petition . . . which was sent (anapemphthenai) to me by the proconsul Stertinius Quartus, I am quite amazed that after so many letters from governors . . .”¹⁴

Thus Festus’s language is perfectly adequate when he presents to Agrippa the case of the prisoner Paul: “I asked him if he wished to go to Jerusalem to be judged there, but when Paul appealed for his case to be reserved for the judgment of Augustus (the emperor Nero), I ordered that he be kept until I could send him up to Caesar” (anapempro pros Kaisara, aorist subjunctive, Acts 25:21). This referral to the highest jurisdiction has numerous parallels. Herod had three Arabs arrested who “were yet examined by Saturninus, governor of Syria, and sent to Rome” (anakrithentes ... anapemphthesan eis Rhomen, Josephus, War 1.577; cf. Ant. 14.97). Quadratus promises to examine in detail matters submitted to him (diereunesein hekasta), hears the complaints of the Samaritans, and sends to Caesar (anepemprosen epi Kaisara) two high priests, various eminent persons, and others (War 2.243; cf. 246, 253; 3.398; Ant. 20.131, 134). Felix rids Judea of brigands, arrests Eleazar, who pillaged the region for twenty years, and sends him to Rome in chains (desas anepemprosen eis Rhomen, Ant. 20.161). According to an inscription from Priene, the strategos writes and defers to the Senate: “concerning whom the strategos Lucius Lucilius wrote and sent to the Senate” (peri hon ho strategos Leukios Leukilios egrapsen kai anepemprosen pros ten synkleton, I.Priene, 111, 147; first century BC; cf. Josephus, War 2.207).

¹ P.Oxy. 2273, 19 (H. C. Youtie, Scriptiunculae, vol. 1, p. 262), κομίσου πάντα ὅσα ε—άν ἀναπέμπω σοι; P.Yale 84, 7: “As soon as you have received my letter, send the cakes”; P.Hib. 57, 1; P.Warr. 13, 5, 9; 14, 32: “send me the signed note immediately”; P.Mich. 500, 10: ἄν ε—θέλης ἀναπέμψασθαι; P.Stras. 171, 6; Philostratus, Gym. 31, “send the javelin”; Philo, Unchang. God 84: “the wind exhaled (ἀναπεμπόμενον) by the trachea”; Philo, Dreams 1.29; Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 74.

² SB 9058, 4: ἀνάπεμψον ει—ς τὸν πόλιν; 9076, 7; 9077, 8; 9081, 5; 9408 [2], 67, 69, 73; 9409 [3], 98; 9415 [9], 5; 11129, 3: Βαυθλα—ν μοι ἀνάπεμψον μετὰ τω—ν ὄνων; P.Oxy. 2153, 24: “I am sending the small boat with Isidorus”; 2784, 5: “For this reason, until today, have have not sent the cattle”; 2985, 13: “Send me six keramia of wine”; P.Brem. 20, 10.

³ The summary of taxes sent by the eklogistes of the nome (P.Princ. 126, 4); P.Harr. 75, 21: “I am sending the certificate for the act” (addressed to the keeper of archives). After a concluded agreement is registered, it is sent to the local authorities (P.Oxy. 2349, 3); a petition is addressed to the strategos with “a copy of the συγχώρησις, which has been sent to the keepers of the property registers” (τὸν ἀναπεμφέντα πρὸς τοὺς . . . βιβλιοφύλακας, 2473, 27); ὥστε ἀναπέμψαι τὰ βιβλίδια (1653, 11).

⁴ P.Oxy. 2182, 27; SB 9468, 6: ἀναπέμψαι τοὺς ἀνθρώπους εἰ—ς τὸν ἄέρα.

⁵ Josephus, commenting on 1Kgs 8:23, 27: σοι τὰς εὐχὰς ἀναπέμψωμεν εἰ—ς τὸν ἄέρα (Ant. 8.108); C.P.Herm. 8, 12: ε—ν αἷς ἀναπέμψεις καὶ μεθ ἡμέραν εὐχαι—ς τω— Κυρίῳ σωτήρει ἡμω—ν = prayers that you send up each day to our Lord Savior; P.Oxy. 2479, 17; PSI 1425, 6; P.Alex. 216 (p. 44): οὐ παύομε εὐχὰς ἀναπεμπόμενος ὑπὲρ σωτηρίας τῆς ὑμετέρας μεγαλοπρεποῦς (sixth century); SB 8728, 23: τὴν δόξαν ἰἀναπέμψομεν τω— πατρὶ καὶ τω— υἱ—ω— καὶ τω— ἁγίῳ πνεύματι (seventh century); 8334, 23: τω—ν εἰ—ς τὸν θεῖ—ον ἀναπέμψομένων πάντων (cf. R. Hutmacher, Ehrendekret). We conclude that the verbal prefix ἀνα— specifies sending up, hence raising someone to a higher position, like the prophetess Martha, who was sent to the consul Marius by his wife and stirred his admiration (Plutarch, Mar. 17.3); cf. Dittenberger, Or. 329, 51: ἀναπέμψαι δὲ τὸ ψήφισμα τοὺς στρατηγούς πρὸς τὸν βασιλέα; SB 8728, 23.

⁶ P.Fay. 37, 1: ἀνάπεμψον Έμην ε—νκαλούμενον ὑπὸ Αὐρηλίου Νείλου βουλευτοῦ ε—ξαυτῆς (with the correction by H. C. Youtie, “P. Fay. 37,” in ZPE 33, 1979, pp. 211–212); cf. BGU 1569, 2082–2083; P.Tebt. 594; P.Oslo 20; P.Oxy. 3035; P.Grenf. II, 66; P.Aberd. 60, 1; SB 9352, 11034; P.Ryl. 681 (with the corrections of H. C. Youtie, Scriptiunculae, vol. 1, p. 25); P.Mich. 589 (the editor, G. M. Browne, lists the fifty-five known arrest warrants). P.Oxy. 169 (published by S. Daris, in SPap, 1980, pp. 5–7). Often the verb ἀναπέμψω is replaced by ε—κπέμψω (B. Boyaval, in ZPE, vol. 6, 1970, p. 11; cf. Ursula Hagedorn, “Das Formular der Überstellungsbefehle im römischen Ägypten,” in BASP, 1970, pp. 61–74).

⁷ Josephus, War 1.666: “The king ordered that all these men be sent back home”; 5.84; Ant. 3.72; Plutarch, Sol. 4.6: “The tripod came back to Thebes.”

⁸ P.Mich. 341, 4 (from AD 47); cf. a grain shipment in 49/48 BC, ἀναπεπέμφθαι ε—κ τῆς πόλεως (SB 8754, 7 and 24); ἀναπέμψω τὸ πρα—γμα ε—πὶ τὴν δι αὐτοῦ διάγνωσιν (7601, 12; cf. 7338, 8). In 131 BC, τὸν αὐτόγραφον σὺν τῇ ε—πιστολῇ ταύτῃ ἀναπέμψας: “returning the original (of the bank account to me) with this letter” (UPZ 199, 14); in 127/126: ἀναπέμψαι ἡμω—ν τὴν ἔντευξιν ε—πὶ τοὺς χρηματιστάς (ibid. 170 A 34; cf. B 33); P.Oxy. 1032, 50.

⁹ This restoration of a runaway slave to his master is contrary to Deut 23:16—“You shall not hand over to his master a slave who takes refuge with you from his master” (cf. Str-B, vol. 3, pp. 668ff.), an arrangement without parallel in ancient laws (R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel, vol. 1, p. 87; cf. M. Robert, La Lettera de S. Paolo a Filemone e la condizione giuridica dello schiavo fuggitivo, Milan, 1933, pp. 39–49), but here neither the Mosaic law nor Greek or Roman law governs the case: Onesimus is a brother in the faith; cf. P. J. Verdam, “St. Paul et un serf fugitif,” in Symbolae van Oven, Leiden, 1946, pp. 211–230.

¹⁰ P.Oxy. 2712, 15: ὁ κύριος μου ἡγεμῶν ἀνέπεμψεν ἐ—πὶ σὲ τὸ πρα—γμα.

¹¹ Pilate expected the tetrarch to acquit Jesus, since Jesus was his subject (forum domicilii); cf. J. Blinzler, Trial of Jesus, pp. 196ff.; 200, n. 17; A. N. Sherwin-White, Roman Society, p. 65; H. W. Hoehner, “Why did Pilate hand Jesus over to Antipas?” in E. Bammel, The Trial of Jesus: Cambridge Studies in Honour of C. F. D. Moule, London, 1970, pp. 84–90 (supplies the variants on verse 15, pp. 89–90).

¹² Philo, Spec. Laws 4.190: “The pretender, since he found that his perceptions were blurred by the obscurity . . . had to stand down and send the matter back before more perspicacious judges (the priests)” (ἀναπεμπέτω πρὸς ἀκριβεστέρους δικαστάς); Josephus, War 2.571: in each city, Joseph designated seven elders to judge small cases; “As for important matters and capital trials, he ordered them transferred to himself and to the Seventy” (τὰ γὰρ μείζω πράγματα καὶ τὰς φονικὰς δίκας, ἐ—φ ἐ—αυτὸν ἀναπέμπειν ἐ—κέλευσεν καὶ τοῦθ ἐ—βδομήκοντα); Ant. 4.218: If the judges do not see how they should rule in the matter that is before them, let them send the case up to Jerusalem (ἀναπεμπέτωσαν τὴν δίκην εἰ—ς τὴν ἰ—ερὰν πόλιν); 15.351, Marcus Agrippa sends the Gadarene prisoners back without even hearing them (ἀναπέμπει τω— βασιλει— δεσμίους); BGU 5, col. II, 19: ἐ—αυτὸν δὲ ἐ—ν νόσῳ γενόμενον ἀναπεπόμφθαι ἀναφόριον τω— δικαιοδέτη; idem 15, col. I, 17; 168, 25: ἀναπέμπω οὖν τὸ πρα—γμα ἐ—πὶ τὸν κράτιστον ἐ—πιστράτηγον.

¹³ P.Fouad 26, 7. Hermias, having been unable to get anything from the magistrate, appealed to the highest official in the Thebaid, the epistrategos Demetrius; this new suit also gets nowhere. He then appeals to the strategos, who reserves judgment for himself (ἀναπεμφθὲν δὲ ἐ—φ ἡμα—ς, οὗ ἐ—στιν ἀντίγραφον, UPZ 162, col. I, 13). This referral conforms to the law of the land (ἐ—κ τω—ν τῆς χώρας νόμων; col. VII, 1ff.). Cf. an accused official who falls under the prefect’s jurisdiction (P.Mil.Vogl. 98, 3).

¹⁴ Th. Drew-Bear, Phrygie, p. 20. It is apparent from this text that ἀναπέμπω does not always imply referral to a higher-up; cf. likewise the edict of the proconsul of Asia, Gaius Gabinius Barbarus Pompeianus: “Whereas the city of Euhippe, having had recourse to the great Fortune of our master Emperor Antoninus with regard to the wrongs that they have suffered at the hands of those soldiers and officials who have left the royal routes and great highways and come into their cities (requisitions, exactions, violence), was referred to the governor of the province” (ἀνεπέμφθησαν ε—πὶ τὸν ἡγούμενον τοῦ ἔθνους, published and translated by L. Robert, Opera Minora Selecta, vol. 1, p. 592). The inspector Maximus, having been accused of embezzlement, was referred by the prefect to the epistrategos (ἀνέπεμψεν αὐτοὺς ε—πὶ Κράσσον τὸν κράτιστον ε—πιστράτηγον, P.Tebt. 287, 6); cf. P.Stras. 188, 1.

ἀναστροφή

anastrophe, conduct

anastrophe, S 391; TDNT 7.715–717; EDNT 1.93; NIDNTT 3.933, 935; MM 38; L&N 41.3; BAGD 61

The most banal sense of anastrepho —“return, come back from one place to another,”¹ hence “retrace one’s steps” (1Sam 25:12; 2Sam 3:16; Jdt 1:13)—sometimes retains the etymological nuance “to return upside down,”² like runaways thrown back on top of each other (1Macc 7:46; cf. Jdt 1:11); sometimes it has the sense of coming and going, “living.”³ Hence its metaphorical usage: “walk in virtue.”⁴

Only this moral nuance is retained in the noun anastrophe, designating a mode of existence, a way of behaving.⁵ This became a technical term in NT spirituality. Just as the way of life of the pagans is stigmatized,⁶ so also is “perfect conduct from childhood” praised (2Macc 6:23, kalliste). When St. Paul testifies concerning his conscience (“It is with simplicity and the purity of God—not in fleshly wisdom, but in the grace of God—that we have conducted ourselves in the world, particularly in our dealings with you,” 2Cor 1:12), he contrasts two modes of existence and already gives anastrophe the exemplary sense that will be required especially of ministers of the church;⁷ the model, who is particularly visible, ought to be inspiring. Life lived in the faith is a persuasive testimony.

It is above all St. Peter who demands of all Christians an unassailable comportment. Whether with respect to bearing, dress, or behavior in family and social relations, every action and reaction in the context of the community, that is, the concrete life of the believer, should be noble and radiant:⁸ “Let your behavior among the nations be noble” (1Pet 2:12; kale), apt as a result to disarm criticisms (3:16), notably those of husbands won over by the chaste and quiet deportment of their wives (3:1-2).

It used to be claimed that these moral and religious meanings derived from the OT, but they are attested in the secular literature,⁹ in the papyri,¹⁰ and especially by epigraphy, notably in the honorific decrees that give particular honor to magistrates and functionaries whose conduct has been irreproachable: “Menander, in the magistracies to which he has elected, has shown himself irreproachable by his noble and splendid conduct.”¹¹ “I respect this man, who conducts himself so generously in all things.”¹² This en hapasin anastrephomenon is already attested in the first century AD in I.Priene,¹³ in I.Car.: “In all his embassies, he has conducted himself properly and managed affairs justly,”¹⁴ and in inscriptions from Pergamum.¹⁵ There is a wealth of parallels to the formula in Heb 13:18 (en pasin kalos telontes anastrephesthai) and to 1Pet 1:15 (en pase anastrophe).

If the extension of “good conduct” to all areas is emphasized, its quality or distinguishing marks become even clearer. Just as the NT writers qualify conduct with noble, good, pure, holy, devout, the inscriptions praise it for its nobility, glory, and piety.¹⁶

¹ Gen 8:9 (shûb); 18:14; 22:5; Judg 18:26; 1Sam 3:5-6; Acts 5:22; 15:16.

² [The French phrase sens dessus dessous, literally upside down, can mean “in utter disorder, in a state of distress”—Tr.] But in a favorable sense, one “sets the situation aright” (Josephus, Life 273), one “reverts” (P.Mich. 24, 55, 7). In optical jargon, ἀναστρέφειν means “the reversing of images in mirrors with respect to the actual objects” (C. Mugler, Terminologie optique, p. 33). In geometry, ἀναστροφή expresses the conversion of a ratio (idem, Terminologie géométrique , p. 61).

³ Ezek 3:15; 19:6. —Αναστρέφειν is then synonymous with περιπατει—ν, cf. Epictetus 1.2.26: “pass his life”; 3.15.5: “You are behaving like a child” (cf. A. Bonhöffer, Epiktet, pp. 52, 201). Hence “busy oneself” (P.Sarap. 80, 11; SB 9779, 4), dedicate oneself to one’s duty (Ep. Arist. 252). C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, pp. 382ff.

⁴ 1Kgs 6:12 (halak); Prov 8:20; 20:7; Zech 3:7. Hence the favored meaning of conversion: return to God (Jer 3:7; 8:4; 15:19; 22:10-11; Sir 8:8; 39:3; 50:28). Cf. Ep. Arist. 216: during sleep, one’s thoughts return to the same matters that one was busy about when awake.

⁵ Tob 4:14; Gal 1:13—“You have heard about my conduct when I was in Judaism”; cf. Eph 2:3; 1Clem. 63.3: ἀπὸ μεότητος ἀναστρέφοντας ἕως γήρους ἀμέμπτως ε—νήμι—ν.

⁶ 2Macc 5:8 (κακῆς ἀναστροφῆς); Eph 4:22—“You were instructed to have done with your former way of life, that of the old man corrupted by lusts”; 1Pet 1:18—“You have been freed from the senseless (μάταιος) way of life that you inherited from your fathers” (cf. W. C. van Unnik, “The Critique of Paganism in I Petr. I, 18,” in Neotestamentica et Semitica: Studies in Honour of M. Black, Edinburgh, 1969, pp. 129–142); 2Pet 2:7—just Lot is “distracted at the behavior of these people who are crazy in their debauchery”; 2:18—neophytes, fragile and unstable, “barely distanced from those who live aberrant lives—τοὺς ε—ν πλάνῃ ἀναστρεφόμενους” barely resist such distractions. Cf. Heb 10:33, where Christians are in solidarity with those who are maltreated, “in a similar situation” (cf. P. Tebt. 703, 271: τῆς καθ ἡμα—ς ἀναστροφῆς καὶ ἀγωνίας; third century BC).

⁷ 1Tim 3:15—“I write to you . . . that you may know how one must conduct oneself in a house of God”; 4:12—“Become a model for the believers in speech, in conduct, in love . . .”; Heb 13:7—“Remember your leaders. . . and meditate carefully on the outcome of their manner of life, imitate their faith”; the didaskalos who wrote this letter certifies that he himself wishes to conduct himself well in all things: καλω—ς θέλοντες ἀναστρέφεσθαι (Heb 13:18). Jas 3:13—“Who is wise and experienced among you? Let him manifest his works by a noble comportment—ε—κ τῆς καλῆς ἀναστροφῆς—with an amiable wisdom.” Cf. Ep. Arist. 130: “You see the influence of conduct and company.”

⁸ 1Pet 1:15—αὐτοὶ ἅγιοι ε—ν πάσῃ ἀναστροφῇ γενήθητε; 1:17—“Conduct yourselves with a devout fear during the time of your sojourn”; 2Pet 3:11—“Since all these things are thus to be dissolved, how ought you not to live with a devout comportment and with piety, ε—ν ἀγίαις ἀναστροφαι—ς καὶ εὐσεβείαις” (cf. W. Brandt, “Wandel als Zeugnis nach dem I. Petrusbrief,” in Verbum Dei Manet in Aeternum, Witten, 1953, pp. 10–25; C. Spicq, Epîtres de saint Pierre, on this verse). Philodemus of Gadara, Mus. 4, p. 76 (ed. J. Kemke): Certain melodies incline the soul “to conversation and good relations—πρὸς τὴν ὁμιλίαν καὶ τὴν ἀρμόττουσαν ἀναστροφήν”; Epictetus 1.22.13; 1Clem. 21.8: ὁσίως ἀναστρεφόμενους ε—ν καθαρά—διανοίᾳ.

⁹ Polybius 4.81.1: “Philip attracted admiration beyond his years for his conduct in general”; Epictetus 1.9.24: “God has established for us a line of conduct”; Josephus, Ant. 15.190.

¹⁰ In the second-third century BC, the formula “if your conduct is not better—οὐκ ἀπὸ τοῦ βελτίστου ἀναστρεφομένου” is often used (BGU 1756, 12; 1769, 4; P.Tebt. 786, 15; 904, 10; cf. P.Michael. 20, 5: εἰ—ε—νδεω—ς περὶ τοῦτο ἀναστραφείης). In 5 BC, ἔν τε τοι—ς καιρὸν δείπνοις μεγαλοπόρως καὶ μεγαλοψύχως ἀναστραφεῖς (SB 8267, 31). In AD 276, a husband establishes his will in favor of his wife, who has conducted herself appropriately in his home: πρεπόντως περὶ τὴν συμβίωσιν ἀναστραφείση, καταλείπω (P.Oxy. 907, 17); but a widow complains in 303 to the prefect that his assistant and his business agent have acted dishonestly toward her: οἱ τινες μὴ ὀρθω—ς ἀναστραφέντες (P.Oxy. 71, col. II, 12), after the fashion of Diocles and others in 103: ἀναστρεφομένων ἀδικήματα εἶς με (P.Fay. 12, 7).

¹¹ I.Delos, 1498, 7 (between 159 and 151); cf. SEG, vol. 23, 447, 15: “the generosity and diligence that they showed toward those who conducted themselves well in their magistracies” (second century BC). The judges “in the course of their term put on a comportment worthy of themselves, of the city that sent them, and of ourselves” (second century BC, NCIG, n. 12, 17); in the second century BC, the judges of Scotoussa “acted in their bearing and in their judicial functions in a manner worthy of themselves, of the city that sent them, and of those who had cases before them” (I.Gonn., 91, 12); Dittenberger, Syl. 738 B 4: “Lykinos conducted himself during his term in a manner worthy of his people and of our city” (Delphi, 86 BC); I.Olymp. 52, 24. In an honorific decree of Cheronea, the chiliarch Amatokos, leader of a Thracian troop, is praised: τὴν ἀναστροφὴν ε—ποιήσατο εὐσχήμονα, and we learn that his good conduct consisted of his taking care of the interests of the Cheroneans, in enforcing equity between them and his soldiers, and in the soldiers’ causing no harm to the territory (published by M. Holleaux, Etudes d’épigraphie, vol. 1, p. 144, lines 5, 13, 26).

¹² I.Cor., vol. 8, n. 306, 8 (second century AD); cf. L. Robert, Hellenica, Limoges, 1940, vol. 1, pp. 43–53).

¹³ I.Priene, 115, 5: ἀναστρεφόμενος ε—ν πάσιν φιλανθρώπως; cf. 108, 284: πεποιήται δὲ καὶ διὰ τὴν πρέπουσιν ἀναστροφὴν. Cf. Josephus, Ant. 19.72: εὐπρεπω—ς ἀναστραφισομένου.

¹⁴ I.Car., 167, 16: ε—μ πάσαις δεόντως ἀναστραφεῖς καὶ ὀρθω—ς χρησάμενος τοι—ς πράγμασιν; cf. 70, 10: τῇ παρ ὄλον τὸν βίον ἀναστροφῇ διαφέροντα (= MAMA, vol. 6, 114).

¹⁵ I.Perg., 470, 4: ε—ν πα—σιν ἀνεστραμμένον ἀξίως τῆς πόλεως; cf. 224 A 5; I.Priene, 108, 223: τῇ πόλει συμπερόντως ἀνεστράφη; cf. P.Brem. 53, 35–36. MAMA, vol. 8, 412 b, 4: Καλλίαν . . . νεανίαν καλὸν καὶ ἀγαθὸν τὴν ἀναστροφὴν πεπονημένον ε—νάρετον; cf. line 12; 414, 13: τὰς ε—πὶ τῇ κοσμίῳ ἀναστροφῇ μαρτυρίας καὶ τειμὰς ἀποδιδόναι.

¹⁶ I.Perg., 459, 5: καλω—ς καὶ ε—νδόξως ἀναστραφῆναι; 496, 5: ἀναστρεφομένην καλω—ς καὶ εὐσεβω—ς; Dittenberger, Syl. 598c7; 717, 95; I.Magn. 85, 11: τὴν ἀναστροφὴν ποιησάμενοι μετὰ πάσης εὐκοσμίας. 179, 5: κόσμιον ἀναστροφὴν φιλοτειμησάμενον; 165, 6; I.Bulg. 43, 15: τὴν ἀναστροφὴν εὐσχήνομα καὶ ἀξίαν τοῦ τε βασιλέως κτλ. At Patara ε—πὶ τῇ τοῦ βίου αι—δήμονι καὶ κοσμίῳ ἀναστροφῇ (cited by L. Robert, Études anatoliennes, 2d ed., Amsterdam, 1970, p. 89, n. 1); Dittenberger, Syl. 800, 21 (ὀσίως), Or. 323, 5 (ἀμέμπτως). In case of indecent conduct, the rules of the mysteries of Andania provide for punishments, in 92 BC, τὸν δὲ ἀπειθοῦντα ἢ ἀπρεπω—ς ἀναστρεφόμενον εἰ—ς τὸ θεῖ—ον μαστιγούντω οἰ—ι—εροί (LSCG, n. 65, 40 and 43); cf. SB 8852, 9: μὴ ὀρθω—ς ἀναστρεφόμενους.

ἀνατρέφω

anatrepho, to nurture, raise see also τρέφω, ἀνατρέφω

anatrepho, S 397; EDNT 1.94; MM 39; L&N 33.232, 35.51; BAGD 62

This verb, which means “nurture” a child so that it will grow, then “raise” it, is only used once in the OT, with respect to Solomon: “I was nurtured, surrounded with swaddling clothes and with care” (Wis 7:4). In the NT, it is perhaps used concerning Jesus, who “came to Nazareth, where he had been raised”;¹ it is clearly used concerning Moses, “nurtured for three months in the house of his father,”² and St. Paul, who received his rabbinic education at Jerusalem.³ Because of this range of uses, anatrepho encompasses the entire life of the child until his maturity, including feeding and physical care,⁴ the formation of the mind and character;⁵ in which case it is synonymous with paideuo.⁶

We must note, however, that anatrepho designates by preference the education received at home, almost always in relation with family members—natural or adoptive—that is, with brothers and sisters.⁷ Specifically, L. Robert, in his epigraphical studies, has noted that “the verb anatrephesthai denotes education by the foster father, and is an important term for anyone interested in studying family relations and, for example, the status of the threptoi.”⁸ He cites the tomb of Kladaios at Aphrodisias where Aurelia Glypte he anathrepsamene auton (“who raised him”) is also buried (MAMA, vol. 8, 560, 4), or in Caria the tomb of a certain Zeno, buried together with M. Aur. Eutychos ho anathrepsamenos auton.⁹ Soterichos gives some vines, etc., to a certain Lucius, his pupil (Loukio ho anethrepsamen).¹⁰

¹ Luke 4:16—ου— ἦν ἀνατεθραμμένος (S, W, Θ, several miniscules); but the other authorities (including B, A) have τεθραμμένος, which has been adopted by all editors. H. Schürmann (Das Lukasevangelium, Freiburg-Basel, 1969, vol. 1, p. 226) translates well: wo er aufgewachsen war.

² Acts 7:20. Cf. Moses 1.11: “We nursed him for three full months” (ἀνεθρέψαμεν), but the verb τρέφειν is used for his nurture and education (1.5, 17; cf. τροφή, 8, 15, 20). Josephus, Ant. 2.232: Thermuthis carried the baby Moses to his father to raise him, ἀναθρεψαμένη παι—δα; education (ἀνατροφή) was regarded with suspicion by the Egyptians (2.237); cf. in the sense of “nurture” (7.149) and educate (4.261).

³ Acts 22:3—“I was raised (ἀνατεθραμμένος) in this city.” For the discussion of this verse and this verb, cf. W. C. van Unnik, Tarsus or Jerusalem, London, 1962, pp.9ff.

⁴ P.Lips. 28, 12: πρὸς τὸ δύνασθαι ἀνατρέφεσθαι εὐγενω—ς καὶ γνησίως (an act of adoption, AD 381); P.Cair.Zen. 59379, 1–2; P.Oxy. 1873, 9: θυγάτριον νήπιον εὐγενω—ς ἀνατεθραμμένον; 2479, 47: “That I might return to the same farm and raise my unhappy children.” Hence the medical definition, cf. the numerous references to Hippocrates and Galen given by W. K. Hobart, Medical Language, p. 207.

⁵ 4Macc 10:2—“In the same doctrines that we were raised in”; 11:15.

⁶ According to Porphyry, Ammonius was “raised by his parents in the Christian doctrines” (ἀνατραφεῖς), while “Origen, on the other hand, was raised in Greek studies” (παιδευθείς) cited by Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 6.19.7.

⁷ Epictetus, 2.22.26: “Do not investigate . . . whether these people have the same parents, whether they were raised together (καὶ ὁμοῦ ἀνατεθραμμένοι) and by the same tutor”; 3.1.35: “That is the type of young people that we should hope to see born and raised in our homes” (ἡμι—ν φύεσθαι καὶ ἀνατρέφεσθαι); 3.22.68: “his children shall be raised in the same manner.” Heliodorus, Aeth. 10.14.1: “I am the one who took in the exposed infant and secretly raised him.”

⁸ L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 13, Paris, 1965, p. 222; cf. Hellenica, vol. 3, p. 11: ἀνεθρέψατο υι—οὺς δύο (inscription at Heraclea).

⁹ IGLAM, n. 1641 a.

¹⁰ L. Robert, Villes d'Asie Mineure, p. 345. Other inscriptions in “Bulletin épigraphique” in REG, 1948, p. 202, n. 229; 1959, p. 254, n. 447: ὑπατον τὰ οἰ—κετικὰ παιδία [= θρεπτοί] τὰ ὑπ αὐτοῦ ἀνατρεφόμενα.

ἀναφέρω

anaphero, to cause to ascend, offer up, remove

anaphero, S 399; TDNT 9.60–61; EDNT 1.94; MM 39; L&N 15.176, 15.206, 53.17; BAGD 63

In the classical language, this verb means “to carry up” or “back” (Ep. Arist. 268; Josephus, War 4.404; Ant. 1.16; Ag. Apion 2.162). In biblical Greek, it is used for everything that ascends, physically or metaphorically, from the flower of the vine (Gen 40:10), incense (Exod 30:9), or smoke (Judg 20:38), to anger (1Macc 2:24) and hymns (2Macc 10:7). Hence: to ascend or to carry from one place to another.¹ Thus before the transfiguration Jesus made Peter, James, and John ascend a high mountain (Matt 17:1; Mark 9:2); and after the resurrection he himself “ascended into the sky.”²

A good many OT meanings are unknown in the NT: “raise a levy” (1Kgs 5:27), “to dress up a garment with jewelry” (2Sam 1:24), “to bring something,”³ “present” a matter to Moses (Deut 1:17) or to God.⁴ But in both testaments,⁵ ascend or cause to ascend has above all a sacrificial usage and figures in the cultic vocabulary. The priests carry and transport the victim, raise it to place it on the altar, and offer it as a sacrifice (1Macc 4:53). In this sense, the high priest of the new covenant offered himself once to take away the sins of the many (Heb 9:28) and has no need to offer himself anew (Heb 7:27). Abraham offered his son Isaac on the altar (Jas 2:21), and Christians, “a holy company of priests,” offer spiritual sacrifices (1Pet 2:5), their continual praise, to God (Heb 13:15); anaphero is in this sense synonymous with prosphero,⁶ meaning “to offer.”

There remains 1Pet 2:24—“He bore our sins in his body on the cross,”⁷ where most commentators see a reference to the LXX of Isa 53:12 and understand 1Pet in the same sense: bear sins = undergo punishment for sins. But A. Deissmann objects that quotations do not often have the same sense in their new context as in the original,⁸ and that to undergo punishment on the cross would have been expressed by epi to xylo (the dative case), while the accusative in 1Pet, epi to xylon, evokes the idea of removal. He cites P.Petr. I, 16, 2 (vol. 1, p. 47) from 230 BC, in which the litigant protests against the debts that have been transferred upon him⁹ and submits his case to Asclepiades. It is true that, in the papyri and the inscriptions, anaphero often signifies “transfer, pay money”¹⁰ and that one can here get some idea of substitution. But Moulton-Milligan (on this word) rightly observe that nothing turns our thoughts in this direction in 1Pet 2:24, where the accusative that follows epi is a person, which weakens considerably the parallel cited by A. Deissmann.

¹ Deut 14:24; Judg 15:13; 16:3; 20:26; 1Sam 2:19; 1Kgs 8:1; 10:22; 17:19; 2Kgs 4:21; 1Chr 15:3, 12; 2Chr 1:4; 4:2, 5; Neh 12:31; Tob 6:3; 2Macc 6:10. P.Lille 7, 17: “Now he has transferred me to the prison of Crocodilopolis”; BGU 1500, 15: 1511, 5; SB 9080, 6; Philo, Etern. World 64: “The fragrant breezes carried their perfumes to the flowers.” Josephus, War 5.432: the starved “snatched the morsels of food almost from their throats.”

² Luke 24:51. Cf. V. Larrañaga, L’Ascension de Notre-Seigneur, Rome-Paris, 1938, pp. 145ff., 368ff., 417ff.; P. Benoit, Exégèse et théologie, pp. 363–411 = ET, vol. 1, pp. 209–253; cf. Gos. Pet. 56: “He has left for the place from which he was sent”; Plutarch, Num. 2.4: “Proclus . . . swore that he had seen Romulus ascend to heaven, εἰς οὐρανὸν ἀναφερόμενον.”

³ 1Sam 18:27; 2Sam 21:13; Neh 10:38; Isa 18:7; Sir 8:19. P.Ant. 93, 41: “That I might bring it with me when I come”; P.Mich. VIII, 511, 19; SB 7376, 28 (11 October AD 3); 9188; P.Sorb. 18, 7.

⁴ Exod 18:19, 22; 19, 8. —Ἀναφέρω in the sense of “bring to the attention of, inform, communicate” is very frequent in Josephus, whether concerning a desire (Ag. Apion 1.232), an utterance (Ant. 16.10, 218, 223, 225, 306–307; 17.40; 20.40; cf. LSCG, n.85, 10), or a decree (dogma, Ant. 14.198, 221; LSCG, n. 73 A 24); and in the papyri: the production of a contract P.Rein. 8, 8; 26, 15; 31, 9); “communicate this writing to our lord the duke, for it is for him to pass judgment on such attacks” (P.Thead. 22, 16; 23, 15; P.Abinn. 3, 17; 18, 14; 44, 15); “the copy of the petition that I presented to my lord the prefect” (P.Mert. 91, 2; cf. 5, 17); hence: make a report, a notification (P.Ryl. 163, 13; P.Sorb. 63, 3; C.Ord.Ptol. 37, 1; P.Princ. 119, 24; P.Oslo 126, 15; P.Oxy. 1380, 17; 2407, 5, 8, 42; P.Mil.Vogl. 229, 28; BGU 1669; PSI 823, 2; 1433, 9), an agreement (BGU 2097, 13 from AD 83; SB 7404, 46; 7438, 4); to register (a death) on an official list (P.Lond. 281, 15; from AD 66); cf. C. Préaux, Economie royale, p. 320); and hence to affect (P.Thead. 4, 1; Josephus, Ant. 12.31), attribute (P.Mich. 620, 271, 307, 314; P.Brem. 68, 23, 32; 69, 7; P.Oxy. 2119, 8; Josephus, Ant. 2.285; 6.9; 14.312; 15.6; 16.167; War 4.179, 391). Note further: recover one’s health (Philostratus, Gym. 42), come to, come around (Josephus, War

1.234, 658), recover serenity (1.662); recall a memory (5.182; Ant. 18.188; Dittenberger, Syl. 736, 112).

⁵ —Ἀναφέρειν most often translates the hiphil of ʿalâh from its first occurrence in Gen 8:20, where Noah offers up holocausts on the altar, and means offer a sacrifice or an oblation; cf. Gen 22:2, 13; Exod 24:5; Lev 14:20; Num 23:30; Deut 12:13; 27:6; Judg 13:16, 19; 21:4; 1Sam 6:14; 7:9-10; 2Sam 24:25; 1Kgs 10:5; 2Chr 1:6; 14:14; Isa 57:6; 60:7; 56:3; Ps 66:15; Bar 1:10 (S. Daniel, Recherches sur le vocabulaire du culte dans la Septante, Paris, 1966, pp. 240–255). This sense retained by Josephus, Ant. 7.86; 8.104; 11.76, 124; likewise in the second century AD, in a ruling relative to the cult of Sarapis in Magnesia (LSAM, n. 34, 26).

⁶ Cf. John 16:2; Heb 11:17; C. Spicq, Hébreux, vol. 1, p. 303; LSAM, p. 100. On the “offering of the lips” (unknown in the OT, but cf. “the fruit of the lips,” Hos 14:3), cf. 1QS 9.3–5; A. Jaubert, La notion d’alliance dans le Judaïsme, Paris, 1963, pp. 168ff. B. Gärtner, The Temple and the Community in Qumran and the New Testament, Cambridge, 1965, pp. 86ff.; H. J. Hermisson, Sprache und Ritus im altisraelitischen Kult: Zur “Spiritualisierung” der Kultbegriffe im A.T., Neukirchen, 1965; I. Lévy, Recherches esséniennes et pythagoriciennes, Geneva-Paris, 1965, pp. 19ff.; R. Deichgräber, Gotteshymnus und Christus-Hymnus in der frühen Christenheit, Göttingen, 1967, pp. 117ff.; G. Klinzing, Die Umdeutung des Kultus in der Qumrangemeinde und im N.T., Göttingen, 1971, pp. 93ff., 158, 218ff.

⁷ H. Patsch, “Zum alttestamentlichen Hintergrund von Römer IV, 25 und I Petrus II, 24,” in ZNW, 1969, pp. 273–278; C.F.D. Moule “Death ‘to Sin,’ ‘to Law,’ and ‘to the World’: A Note on Certain Datives,” in Mélanges Rigaux, pp. 367–375.

⁸ A. Deissmann, Bible Studies, pp. 88ff.

⁹ —Οφειλήματα ἀναφερόμενα (cf. P.Hib. 212, 2). It would be better to cite the complaint of a vintner of the third century BC: The agents of the bank “enter to my credit the payment of the tax by writing it in for the thirty-seventh year; while I owe nothing, but I paid everything in full” (ἀναφέρουσίν μοι τὴν καταβολὴν τοῦ τέλους, PSI 383, 9–10). To transfer the debts of a debtor to a third party is to free the original debtor from paying off the debt (cf. 1Sam 20:13; Aeschines 3.215; Isocrates 5.32). Hence the forensic meaning: the sins are no longer imputed to the person. A. Deissmann cites Col 2:14, where the “handwriting” (= bond) is annulled on the cross (Light, pp. 332f.).

¹⁰ P.Kar.Goodsp. 554, 43; P.Yale 49, 14; P.Mich. 601, 21; P.Petr. II, 38 (b) 5: ὅπως ἀνεύγκωμεν ε—πὶ εὐγένην = that we may transfer this to Theogenes; SB 10444, 1, 3, 4, 9; Josephus, Ant. 4.71: the owners must pay to the priests a shekel and a half; War 1.605; pay off a tax (SEG, vol. 3, 378 C 1; Dittenberger, Syl. 204, 42; 736, 94). The legal equivalent of ἀναφέρειν is referre, cf. H. J. Mason, Greek Terms, p. 21.

ἀναψύχω

anapsycho, to refresh

anapsycho, S 404; TDNT 9.663–664; EDNT 1.95; NIDNTT 3.686; MM 40; L&N 25.149; BAGD 63

St. Peter exhorts the Jerusalemites to be converted “so that the times of refreshing [or relief] may come.”¹ These times are linked with the Parousia and coincide with the apokatastasis: the perfect restoring, the complete restoration of the creation. St. Paul for his part, while a prisoner at Rome, declares that Onesiphorus has often comforted him or relieved him by his visits (2Tim 1:16).

The verb anapsycho, which suggests the idea of refreshing² and thus of invigorating, is used first for physical health,³ then for spiritual fortification, the relieving of anxiety,⁴ then of well-being experienced after pain or exertion. This is the meaning of this verb that is found among the papyri only in private letters. In the second century AD, a child writes to his parents: “when I found out, I was delivered from my uneasiness” (P.Osl. 153, 10). Another, in the third century, assures his parents of his academic progress: “I worked very hard and am relaxing.”⁵ But the best parallel to 2Tim 1:16, cited in a Christian letter from the time of Constantine (SB 7872, 12), is in the double appeal made to Hephaistios, who is cloistered in the Serapeum of Memphis (en katoche en to Sarapoeio) on the one hand from his wife Isias, presently very distressed and incapable of being comforted except by the return of her husband to the house,⁶ and on the other hand from Dionysius, brother of Hephaistios, who writes to him along the same lines.⁷ This calming or relieving can blossom into joy.⁸ It is in any case rest,⁹ relaxation,¹⁰ in which the soul expands (cf. platyno; 2Cor 6:11; 4QPs 8.14), is not constrained;¹¹ it is like an enlarging,¹² which—thanks to the brotherly love shown by Onesiphorus—presents a fine contrast with the apostle’s incarceration.

¹Acts 3:20—καίροὶ ἀναψύξεως (cf. O. Bauernfeind, “Tradition und Komposition in dem Apokatastasissspruch Apostelgeschichte,” in Abraham unser Vater: Festschrift O. Michel, Leiden, 1963, pp. 13–23). Ψύχειν, in the compound form ἀναψύχειν, is more closely related to the idea of wind (ψυχή) than that of cold (ψύχος); thus in Homer (exposing a wound to the air by taking off a bandage, Il. 5.795; hence ἀναψύχεσθαι, get one's breath back, 10.575; 13.84) and in the medical writers: leave a wound open to the air (Hippocrates, Fract. chapters 25 and 27); then “get one's wind back (between two painful operations),” “catch one's breath” (Hippocrates, Steril. chapter 222; cf. J. Jouanna, Hippocrate: La Nature de l'homme, Berlin, 1975, pp. 304ff.). —Ανάψυξις (OT hapax; Exod 8:15 [= 8:11 MT]—Pharaoh saw that there was a respite, rewahâh) suggests recreation and relaxation (Philo, Abraham 152), frequently used by physicians (cf. the numerous references to Hippocrates and Galen in W. K. Hobart, Medical Language, p. 166), is not attested in the papyri (P.Ness. 96, 5) and the tomb inscriptions except in a very late period and in Christian prayers asking God to place the deceased in repose (anapausis) and ε—ν τόπῳ ἀναψύξεως = a place of refreshing; cf. SB 6035, 10; 7428, 11; 7429, 7; 7430, 8; 8235, 9; 8723, 10; 8728, 10; 8765, 10.

²Josephus, Ant. 15.54: ἀνέψυχον τὸ θερμότατον τῆς μεσημβρίας; War 2.155: a gentle west wind, blowing from the ocean, continually refreshes the place to which just souls have traveled; 2Macc 4:46: Ptolemy leads King Antiochus IV under the peristyle “as if to take a breath of cool air, ὡς ἀναψύξονται”; Jos. Asen. 3.3: “It is noon . . . great is the heat of the sun, and I shall take a breath of cool air beneath your roof”; cf. Luke 16:24—Let Lazarus “dip the end of his finger in the water and refresh my tongue (καταψύξη).”

³The sabbath rest allows the son of the servant and the guest to catch their breath (Exod 23:12, niph'al of napas). When Samson has taken a drink of water, “his spirit returned, and he revived” (Judg 15:18, hayâh). When they arrived at the stopping place, the king and the people caught their breath (2Sam 16:14; niph'al of napas).

⁴When David plays the harp, Saul finds relief and gets better (1Sam 16:23, rawah; cf. Ps 39:14). A respite in the war allows the people to catch their breath (2Macc 13:11). Cf. the episode that “revived the courage of the allies of the Lacedaemonians” (Xenophon, Hell. 1.19).

⁵*P.Oxy.* 1296, 7: φιλιππονοῦμεν καὶ ἀναψύχομεν (republished by A. S. Hunt, C. C. Edgar, Sel.Pap., vol. 1, n. 137).

⁶*P.Lond.* 42, 18: δοκοῦσα νῦν γε σοῦ παραγενομένου τεύξεσθαί τινος ἀναψυχῆς (second century), republished in UPZ 59 and by A. S. Hunt, C. C. Edgar, Sel.Pap., n.97.

⁷S. Witkowski, Epistulae Privatae Graecae 36, 14–15: ἔτι δὲ καὶ τοιούτους καιροῦς ἀνηντληκυ—α νῦν γε τύχη τινὸς ἀναψυχῆς; republished in UPZ 60.

⁸*P.Yale* 80, 3: ὥστε τότε ἰ—λαροῦς εἶναι κἀγὼ ἀναψύχω (second century).—Ανάψυξις brought to Paul by Mark and Jesus Justus during his first captivity (Col 4:11) is thus more “reinvigorating” than the “calming” (paregoria) brought to Paul by Mark and Jesus Justus during his first captivity (Col 4:11).

⁹Cf. κατάπαυσις, Acts 7:49; Heb 3:11, 18; 4:1, 3, 5, 10, 11 (O. Hofius, Katapausis: Die Vorstellung vom endzeitlichen Ruheort im Hebräerbrief, Tübingen, 1970).

¹⁰Cf. ἄνεσις, Acts 24:23; 2Cor 2:13; 7:5; 8:13; 2Thess 1:7; Philo Plant. 170; To Gaius 12 (with the note of the editor, A. Pelletier, Paris, 1972, p. 323); Strabo, 5.4.7; C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, pp. 301, n. 1; 338, n. 1.

¹¹The Hebrew rawah means “to have room, be unconstrained.” In the NT, ease, the feeling of well-being and of breathing easily, as it were, is characteristic of the “pneumatic,” cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, p. 772; J.F.A. Sawyer, “Spaciousness,” in ASTI, vol. 6, Leiden, 1968, pp. 20–34; R. R. Niebuhr, “The Widened Heart,” in HTR, 1969, pp. 127–154; M. Philonenko, “L’Ame à l’étroit,” in Hommages A. Dupont-Sommer, Paris, 1971, pp. 421–428.

¹²[French: to enlarge (dilater) the heart or the soul means to fill it with joy.—Tr.]

ἀνθ ὧν

anth' hon (anti + hon), in place of, in exchange

anth' hon, S 475, 3739; TDNT 1.372; BDF §§17, 208(1), 294(4); MM 46, 47; EDNT 108, 109; BAGD 73, 74

In the papyri, this expression,¹ used very often in business documents, means above all “in place of,”² “in return, in exchange, in compensation.” For example, the farmer Idomeneus complains to King Ptolemy that his field, already sown, was flooded by Petobastis and Horos. He asks that he be indemnified, that the guilty parties “be forced to buy back my land at their own expense and pay the fees arising from the transaction, and that I be given in place of the one that they flooded (anth' hon) a spread equal to the land that they themselves cultivate.”³ The substitute (BGU 2128, 4) is the equivalent; in contracts for work⁴ and in transfers of land, the boss or the seller certifies that he has received such and such a sum of money from the buyer, or that he has undertaken certain obligations “in return” for the labor of the worker.⁵ There is an exact correspondence between the work and the salary (cf. SB 10526, 8).

Making compensation is the very basis of exchange, as Philo observes: “Those who give (hoi didontes) wish to receive honor in exchange, seeking a recompense in return for their favor (antidosin), and under the guise of flattering with a gift (doreas), they in fact execute a sale; those who are in the habit of accepting something in exchange for (anth' hon) that which they supply are in fact sellers.”⁶ From this developed a logical sense for anth' hon —“because, consequently”⁷—and a moral sense, emphasizing exact repayment.⁸ This double nuance is preponderant in the biblical texts.

Often enough, the expression anth' hon is used in a legal sense, “in compensation.” A young girl who has been violated must become the wife of her seducer, “since he has violated her, and he cannot repudiate her as long as he lives” (Deut 22:29); “Joab and his brother Abishai killed Abner, because he had put their brother to death” (2Sam 3:30); “He shall pay back the sheep fourfold, since he has committed this deed and has not shown pity.”⁹ There is a strict reciprocity: “I will do you no more evil, since my life has been precious in your eyes on this day” (1Sam 26:21). Most frequently, this correspondence occurs in relations between God and humans. Sometimes, when people are faithful God rewards them and blesses them: “In your race (Abraham’s) will all the nations of the earth be blessed, because you have obeyed my voice” (Gen 22:18; cf. 26:5); “My covenant will be for Phineas and his descendants after him a covenant of eternal priesthood, because he has shown himself jealous for his God” (Num 25:13); “Since you have asked for yourself discernment for understanding justice, behold, I shall act according to your word; I give you a wise and intelligent heart” (1Kgs 3:11; 2Chr 1:11; 2Kgs 10:30; 22:19; Jdt 13:20; Ezek 36:13; Zech 4:15).

Most of the biblical usages of anth' hon underline the justice of punishments, the exact repayment by God for people’s sins; the penalties are at the same time the necessary consequence of and the just payment for the fault: “The land will become desolate . . . they will pay for their sin, since and because (double conjunction in Hebrew) they have despised by judgment” (Lev 26:43); “Because you have not served Yahweh your God with joy and gladness of heart when you had everything in abundance, you will serve in hunger, thirst, nudity, and privation the enemy that God will send against you.”¹⁰ It is worth noting that of the five occurrences of anth'

hon in the NT, four express a punishment, the sanction for a trespass; the archangel Gabriel punished the unbelief of Zacharias: “You will remain silent . . . since you have not believed my words” (Luke 1:20). Jerusalem will be destroyed, “because you have not known the time or your visitation” (Luke 19:44); Herod Agrippa is struck dead “because he did not give the glory to God” (Acts 12:23). If certain people are given over to perdition, it is “because they have not accepted the love of the truth in order to be saved.”¹¹

In contrast, Philo and Josephus use anth' hon most often in a favorable context. Not only do they evoke the equity of the recompense,¹² but they emphasize that gratitude is a gift in return for benefits received.¹³ There is an exact correspondence between the action of thanksgiving and the divine favor,¹⁴ for example the celebration of the Passover in grateful tribute for deliverance from servitude in Egypt (Josephus, Ant. 11.110).

In Hellenistic piety, as expressed notably in dedications, the Greek is seen giving gifts to his god, whom he knows to be close and powerful and whose protection and benefits he expects in exchange (anth' hon). The doron is a “tribute of friendship” (Anth. Pal. 6.325), which counts on winning the favors of the divinity (6.340), because the person who needs protection thinks on the one hand of pleasing the god and on the other hand of receiving a benevolent reciprocity. It is an exchange of friendly services.¹⁵ For example, three brothers dedicate their nets to Pan, and ask “Send to them in return (anth' hon) a good hunt” (Leonidas of Tarentum, in Anth. Pal. 6.13; cf. 154). Selene asks Cybele for her daughter that she may grow in beauty and find a husband, a just favor “in return (anth' hon) for the child’s having often let her hair hang down in your pronaos and before your altar” (ibid., 281); some sailors call upon Phoebus, “Be favorable to us and send us a good wind.”¹⁶

¹ Cf. F. M. Abel, Grammaire, 35e, 46j, k. E. Mayser, Grammatik, vol. 2, pp. 374ff.; vol. 2, 3, pp. 101ff.

² Cf. the successor to an obligation (P.Cair.Isid. 125, 18); the substitute (P.Lond. 1913, 8; P.Petaus 14, 10; P.Oxy. 3095, 12); the representative (P.Mur. 116, 11; P.Bru. 21, 34). But Ἐρμίας ἀνθ ου— Ἐρμῆς (BGU 1062, 1; cf. P.Lond. 1170, 727) is only the statement of a surname.

³ P.Enteux. 60, 10; cf. P.Oslo 40, 37, P.Ant. 89, 12; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 11, 18; P.Mich. 605, 5. In records of disbursements, cf. P.Oxy. 1914, 2; 2029, 15; P.Tebt. 120, 43.

⁴ P.Mich. 355, 4 (first century AD; the hiring of a weaver); P.Lond. 1994, 222 (third century BC); 2002, 39; BGU 2175, 4: δέξασθαι τὸ ἄλλο ἥμισο. μέρος ἀνθ ὧν ποιούμεθα καμάτων; P.Stras. 286, 10.

⁵ P.Mich. 427, 15 (second century AD): sale of land and of part of a house by a veteran who acknowledges having received two hundred drachmas in exchange; 564, 11; 609, 17; PSI 1050, 2, (third century); BGU 1731, 8 (first century BC); 1732, 8; 1733, 10; 1734, 8; 1739, 13; 2346, 4; P.Ryl. 159, 19 (AD 31): ἀνθ ὧν ἔλαβε παρὰ τῆς Ταχόιτος. P.Coll.Youtie II, n. 80, 15 (= P.Oxy. 3255); 89, 17: “in recompense for the pains that I took”; 90, 19. Cf. Atticus, frag. 6.2: “if the corps do not receive any compensation for their losses.”

⁶ Philo, Cherub. 122, cf. Spec. Laws 3.82; Migr. Abr. 173. E. Benveniste (“Don et échange dans le vocabulaire indo-européen,” in L’Année sociologique, 3d series, 1948–49; 1951, pp. 7–20) noticed this functional relationship between gift and exchange: the spontaneity and unwarranted nature of the gift (δω—ρον, present) oblige the beneficiary to make a compensatory counter-gift (antidoron; δῶρων χάριν), a gift in exchange (δωτίνῃ; Homer, Il. 9.155, 297; Od. 9.267; 11. 351; Herodotus 6.62; cf. 1.61.69). 1Macc 10:27, Demetrius to the Jews: “Continue even now to preserve your fidelity toward us, and we will provide you with benefits in exchange for what you do for us, καὶ ἀνταποδώσομεν ὑμῖν—ν ἀγαθὰ ἀνθ ὧν ποιει—τε μεθ ἡμῶν.” P.Lond. 1941, 9, letter of Hierocles to Zeno: “Ptolemy hopes to gain you the crown in return for the benefits that you have voluntarily provided for him” (third century BC).

⁷ Cf. Luke 12:3—“There is nothing hidden that ought not to be revealed . . . consequently (ἀνθ ὧν) everything that you hear spoken in darkness will be heard in the light.” The gospel must be proclaimed with the maximum degree of publicity since all must be revealed on the great day. E. Delebecque (Evangile de Luc) translates “Moyennant quoi tout ce que l’on a dit dans les ténèbres sera entendu dans la lumière” (“In return [or consideration] for which all that has been spoken in the darkness will be heard in the light”).

⁸ The collections that need to cover the expenses of worship (UPZ 175a42; PSI 1159, 6; Pap.Lugd.Bat. II, 1, 6); a decree in honor of Samos (405 BC): the decree praises the Samian delegates “taking into account their benefits (ἀντὶ ὧν εἶπεποιήκασιν) with regard to the Athenians” (J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. 23, 11); a foundation for distributions of oil (AD 210): “Flaviana Philokrateia, in honor of her husband Julianus Alexandros and herself, in return for numerous honors (ἀνθ ὧν) issued by the most powerful Council . . . makes a gift (ε—πέδωκεν) of 10,000 Attic drachmas . . .” (NCIG, n. 34, 6); 4Macc 12:12—“Sacrilegious tyrant . . . you were not ashamed to torture those who practice piety. Because of this, Divine Justice reserves you for an intense, eternal fire”; 18:3—the seven brothers know that pious reason is master of sufferings; “that is why they offer their bodies to suffer for piety.”

⁹ 2Sam 12:6; cf. Amos 5:11; Joel 4:19; Isa 53:12; Ps 109:16—“Since he loved cursing, let it fall upon him!”

¹⁰ Deut 28:47; cf. 62; Judg 2:20; 2Sam 12:10; 1Kgs 9:9—“Because they have forsaken Yahweh their God . . . that is why Yahweh has brought upon them all this evil”; 11:20; 20:36; 2Kgs 21:11, 15; 22:17; 2Chr 34:25; Hos 8:1; Amos 1:3, 9, 13; 2:1, 6; Mic 3:4; Mal 2:9; Jer 5:14, 19; 7:13; 16:11; 19:4; 22:9; 23:38; Ezek 5:7, 11; 13:8, 10; 15:8; 16:36, 43; 20:16, 24; 21:29; 22:19; 23:35; 25:3, 6; 29:7; 31:10; 39:23. Cf. Pss. Sol. 2.3—“Because the sons of Jerusalem have defiled the worship of the Lord . . . for this reason God has said, ‘Cast them out from my presence.’”

¹¹ 2Thess 2:10 (cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 2, pp. 32–39); cf. Philo, Spec. Laws 3.197: “The master shall suffer double punishment for his actions”; 4.227; Josephus, War 4.264: “As a result (of the crimes of the enemy), the best course of action is to destroy these criminals and punish them.”

¹² Philo, Joseph 46: “Does he deserve the reward that you advise me to give him? A fine gift (δωρεάς) I would give him, a suitable return for favors received!”; Moses 2.242; Josephus, War 5.530: “Matthias asked this favor in exchange for his having opened the gates of the city to Simon.” Peter of Rosetta: King Ptolemy V has the zeal of a benevolent god, he has built sanctuaries for him and restored their temples, “in recompense for which the gods have given him health, victory, might, and all other good things” (Dittenberger, Or. 110.35 = SB 8232, 3). “May this come to pass for you in recompense for your holy deeds for the divinity” (UPZ 34, 12; second century BC, 35, 25; 36, 21; 46, 13).

¹³ Philo, Virtues 72: “Give thanks to God for benefits received (εὐχαριστίαν ἀποδιδούς ἀνθ ὧν) from birth to old age,” like Moses, (Moses 1.33; Josephus, Ant. 4.318).

¹⁴ Josephus, Ant. 1.229; 6.338; 17.48, 201.

¹⁵ Δῶρων χάριν, Anth. Pal. 6.188; cf. ἀντιδιδούς δός, 42, 91, 280; χάριν ἀντιδίδου, 138, 184, 185. A. J. Festugière, “—AN̄ —ΩN: La Formule ‘En échange de quoi’ dans la prière grecque hellénistique,” in RSPT, 1976, pp. 389–418.

¹⁶ From Philip, Anth. Pal. 6.251; cf. 17: in exchange for an offering, Cypris is asked to send profits; 63; 68; 99: may Pan grant that the goatherd’s goats will give birth twice; 105: may the fisherman's net always be full; 154; 187; 278; 332; 346.

ἀντιβάλλω

antiballo, to exchange

antiballo, S 474; EDNT 1.109; MM 47; L&N 33.160; BAGD 74

The primitive sense of this verb is “to retaliate, return fire.”¹ It is used figuratively in 2Macc 11:13, in the sense of “reflect upon”;² this English expression translates well the nuance of the Greek, “a return of the mind upon itself so as to examine and deepen a spontaneous deliverance of consciousness”;³ the subject returns upon itself and after a fashion is refracted. Hence the sense “dispute” or simply “converse with each other,” like the pilgrims of Emmaus: “What then are these matters that you were discussing among yourselves along the way?”⁴

Literary and papyrological attestations are rare;⁵ not one corroborates the meaning of the two biblical texts.⁶ The clearest meaning is the comparison of two exemplars, for example of a copy and its original (Strabo 13.609; 17. 790), as in the annotation to the will of Antonius Silvanus in AD 142: *Antonis Silbanos ho progegrammenos antebalon ten prokimenen mou diatheken.*⁷

¹ The Syracusans, “crushed under stones . . . returned the volley with javelins and arrows” (Plutarch, Nic. 25.4); cf. Thucydides 7.25.6: “The Syracusans took aim at them, but they retaliated from their large ship”; Polybius 6.22.4.

² “Lysias, who was not lacking in intelligence, reflected on the reverse that he had just suffered” at Beth-zur (cf. 1Macc 4:35). “—Αντιβάλλειν is a metaphor drawn from tax-collecting. Lysias confronts the reality that he has just experienced with the advantages that he had been counting on. With these evaporated, he imagines an acceptable outcome, namely peace. The use of this verb with πρὸς ε—αυτόν, secum reputare from the old Latin for ‘reflect on’ is very rare if not unique in literature” (F.M. Abel, Maccabées, p. 425).

³ P. Robert, Dictionnaire . . . de la langue française, Paris, 1964, vol. 6, p. 21a.

⁴ Luke 24:17. M. J. Lagrange comments: ἀντιβάλλειν is the word used for the collation of manuscripts. Field concludes that this is a latinism, conferre

sermones. But ἀντιβάλλειν used in the sense of exchanging blows could have come to mean “exchange views” (Luc, p. 603).

⁵ Moulton-Milligan cite only the substantive ἀντιβλήματα, meaning the small stones inserted to fill in chinks (P.Oxy. 498, 16, from the second century; a contract with a stone-cutter). The meaning of the verb in P.Oxy. 2177, 27 (third century) can not be precisely determined because the papyrus is badly mutilated.

⁶ P.Mert. 24, 15 (business letter, around AD 200): καλω—ς ποιήσεις ἀντιβαλὼν Σεμπρωνίῳ τὸ λογαρίδιον (verify and settle the account?).

⁷ R. Cavenaille, Corpus Papyrorum Latinorum, Wiesbaden, 1958, n. 221, 9. “This is probably the only well-preserved original of a will per aes et libram” (O. Guéraud, P. Jouguet, “Un Testament latin per aes et libram,” in EPap, vol. 6, 1940, p. 8). These two authors, after mentioning the glossing of ἀντιβάλλει as διορθοί— by Hesychius and as “dictate” by Harpocration (ἀντιβλητέντος, ἀντὶ τοῦ ὑπαγαρευθέντος, Δείναρχος ε—ν τῇ κατὰ Πυθέου ε—ισαγγελία p. 19), but having difficulty seeing how ἀντιβάλλειν could have taken on this meaning, and the discourse of Deinarchos being lost, they conclude: “Thus we do not dare take a stand on the the exact meaning that should be given this verb here” (loc. cit., p. 20). In addition, PSI 1443, 8 (third century); P.Oxy. 1479, 4: “I did not receive the documents, but there is a collation—τὰ βυβλία . . . κει—ται ἀντιβεβλημένα”; cf. BGU 970, 4. —Cf. Josephus asking, in order to identify the author of the best laws and most just rulings on religion, to compare the laws themselves: τω—ν νόμων ἀντιπαραβάλλοντας (Ag. Apion 2.163).

ἀντιδιατίθημι, ἀντικαθίστημι

antidiatithemi, antikathistemi, to oppose, resist

antidiatithemi, S 475; EDNT 1.109; MM 47; L&N 39.1; BAGD 74 | antikathistemi, S 478; EDNT 1.109; MM 47; L&N 39.18; BAGD 74

The first of these verbs appears only in the Koine; but, unknown in the papyri, it is attested in good literature.¹ Occurring in the Bible only in 2Tim 2:25, the present middle participle tous antidiatithemenous refers to “those who oppose or resist” the preaching of the gospel.²

Antikathistemi can have the sense of “put in place of, exchange” (Josh 5:7; cf. P.Cair.Zen. 59278, 4: antikatastesome eis ta nea), “establish, position opposite” with a nuance of hostility (Mic 2:8) and usually against an adversary in justice (Deut 31:21) or in a plea to higher authorities. This is the constant and frequent meaning in the papyri.³ In observing that the Christians have not yet “resisted to the point of shedding blood,” Heb 12:4 uses a sports metaphor,⁴ that of two boxers or pancratists facing each other; their blows were often lethal.⁵ There is also a judicial nuance, because the persecuted Christians have not given the supreme testimony, shed blood.⁶ This usage of antikathistemi, which agrees well with the language of the period, confirms the culture of the author of Heb as well as his familiarity with the language of the LXX.

Antikeimai, “to be situated facing, confronted” (Josephus, War 4.454; 5.70; Strabo 2.5.15), usually⁷—and always in the Bible—has the sense of “be against”: the flesh and the spirit are opposed to each other as two irreducible principles (Gal 5:17), as the sinful life on the one hand and the rectitude and integrity of the gospel on the other (1Tim 1:10). It occurs mostly in the form of the present participle: ho antikeimenos, “the opponent, the enemy, the adversary,”⁸ sometimes without a complement (1Cor 16:9; Phil 1:28), sometimes with the dative.⁹ The term is common and characteristic in Christian language, applied sometimes to the antichrist, the adversary par excellence, “the one who is opposed and set himself up against all that bears the name of God” (2Thess 2:4), sometimes to the devil, ho antidikos,¹⁰ the one who attacks kat’ exochen against the church (Matt 16:18), its ministers (1Tim 3:6-7), and its faithful.¹¹ His aggression is directed against the most vulnerable, for example young widows (1Tim 5:14), who go astray by following him.¹²

¹ Ps.-Longinus, Subl. 17.1: to rebel against persuasive speech; Philo, Spec. Laws 4.103: it is not appropriate for victims to “repay [their persecutors] in like coinage”; cf. T. Nägeli, Wortschatz, pp. 30, 41, 87.

² It is synonymous with ἀντιλέγοντες in Titus 1:9, literally the contra-speakers, the protesters, those who “hold out against others” (Luke 10:27, probable reading), like the Jews who oppose what Paul says (Acts 13:34; cf. 28.19, 22). But to declare oneself against Caesar is to set up an opposition (John 19:12), and ἀντιλέγω has a nuance of insubordination (Rom 10:21; Titus 2:9). In its frequent usages in the papyri (P.Hib. 205, 32; P.Tebt. 734, 8, 13; C.Ord.Ptol. 14, 24; SB 6263, 23; 6720, 15; etc.), this contesting is often tantamount to refusal: “If he opposes, after having supplied guarantees, let him be doubly condemned” (P.Sorb. 10, 3); “if he contests, let him be judged with me after a hearing of all parties” (P.Enteux. 14, 8; cf. 25, 15, P.Abinn. 42, 10); “If anyone raised an objection on this topic, he should advise me of it” (letter of a governor of Achaëa, I.Cor. vol. 8, 3, n. 306, 15); “I do not contest the [part that reverts to you]” P.Phil. 11, 42, = Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIV, p. 116; P.Mich.Zen. 66, 10, 32). On this sort of legal challenge, cf. A. Würstle, “Untersuchungen zu Cair. Zén. III, 59355,” in JJP, vol. 5, 1951, p. 54; cf. C. B. Welles, Royal Correspondence, New Haven, 1934, n.3, 28, 50, 107. Cf. also the ἀντικείμενοι (1Cor 16:9; Phil 1:28; see below), and the “oppositions (ἀντιθέσεις) of a self-proclaimed gnostic” (1Tim 6:20), evoking the dialectical methodology of the controversialists (C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, p. 113, n.1). But these have a spirit of contradiction (Titus 3:9—ἔριν καὶ μάχας; C. T. Ernesti, LTGR, 2d ed., Hildesheim, 1962, p. 67 gives as quasi-synonymns ἀντίθεσις and ἀντικειμένη), having an appetite for objections and for polemic (λογομαχει—ν, 2Tim 2:14; λογομαχίας, 1Tim 6:4; μάχεσθαι, 2Tim 2:24) and oppose the teaching of the apostles (1Tim 1:10, ἀντίκειται), the truth (ἀνθίστανται τῇ ἀληθείᾳ, 2Tim 3:8). Their counterpropositions are contrary to the orthodoxy of the church (2Tim 2:25;3:8).

³ P.Oxy. 260, 8 (from AD 59); cf. 97, 9; in the division of a father’s estate between two brothers, Lysias and Heliodorus: if anyone contests the will, the first brother will take the opposition and clearly establish the title of the second (P.Dura 25, 10 and 31); BGU 168, 11, 21; P.Mil.Vogl. 98, 26; P.Ross.Georg. II, 21, 10; SB 7472, 18 (taken up P.Warr. 1, 18; cf. P. R. Swarney, The Ptolemaic and Roman Idios Logos, Toronto, 1970, p. 99). Boulagoras “having opposed during his embassy the most illustrious friends of Antiochus” (SEG, vol. 1, 366, 12).

⁴ Μέχρις αἵματος = μέχρι θανάτου (2Macc 13:14; Phil 2:8; cf. Rev 12:11).

⁵ The blood flowed (Homer, Il. 23.651ff.; Artemidorus of Daldis 12.11; Theocritus, Id. 22.119–133; Apollonius Rhodius, Argon. 2.1–98; Pausanias 8.40; Virgil, Aen. 5.360ff.). Cf. the epigram of Dorokleidas of Thera: Ἄ νικά πύκταισι δι αἵματος. ἀλλ ἔτι θερμὸν | πνεῦμα φέρων σκληρα—σ παι—σ ἀπὸ πυγμαχίας | ἔστα παγκρατίου βαρὺν ε—σ πόνον. ἅ μία δ ἄως | δις Δωροκλείδαν εἶδεν ἀεθλοφόρον (IG, vol. 12, 3, 390; cited by L. Robert, Gladiateurs, p. 20); cf. R. Lattimore, Epitaphs, p. 145.

⁶ Cf. Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 8.4.4: In undertaking the purification of the pagan army, Veturius, “the one who was carrying out the operation, did it with moderation and did not go so far as to shed blood—μέχρις αἵματος—except in a few cases.”

⁷ Dio Cassius 39.8: “Claudius combatted (ἀντέλεγε) them, but Milo stood up to him (ἀντέκειτο)”; Ep. Arist. 266: “The goal of eloquence . . . is to succeed in persuading the adversary (τὸν ἀντιλέγοντα) . . . without seeming to contradict him (οὐκ ἀντικείμενος)”; 1Macc 14:7—“No one was found to resist him.” This verb is used in astronomy for the opposition of planets (Vettius Valens, cited by O. Neugebauer, H.B. van Hoesen, Greek Horoscopes, Philadelphia, 1959, p. 191, under this word). In the vocabulary of geometry, the participle ἀντικείμενος, “opposed,” is used notably for the two branches of a hyperbola (C. Mugler, Terminologie géométrique, pp. 65–66).

⁸ Exod 23:22—“I will be the enemy of your enemies and the adversary of your adversaries” = 2Macc 10:26; cf. Esth 9:2—οι—ἀντικείμενοι τοι—ς—Ιουδαίοις; 8:11; Isa 41:11; 45:16; 66:6. In Job 13:24, the adversary is ὑπεναντίον σου; in 1Kgs 11:14, Satan. The participle is a traditional term in rhetoric, cf. Archytas of Tarentum, Antik. (in H. Thesleff, The Pythagorean Texts, Abo, 1965, pp. 14ff.); Aristotle, Rh. 1409b35; 1401a5; 1410b29.

⁹ Luke 13:17—“All his adversaries were confounded, οι—ἀντικείμενοι ἀπότω—”; 21:15. In the only text from the papyri, the complement is in the accusative: Μενέδημον ἀντικείμενον ἡμι—ν (3 August 152; S. Witkowski, Epistulae Privatae Graecae n. 46, 6; republished in UPZ 69, 6).

¹⁰ 1Pet 5:8; cf. S. V. McCasland, “The Black One,” in Studies in Honor of H. R. Willoughby, Chicago, 1961, p. 77.

¹¹ Matt 13:38-39; 1John 3:8; cf. 1Clem. 51.1: “All the sins that we have committed as a result of the snares of the adversary, τοῦ ἀντικειμένου.”

¹² 1Tim 5:15. In TDNT, vol. 3, p. 655, n. 3, Büchsel concludes that ὁ ἀντικείμενος (verse 14) is generic and does not refer to Satan, who is not mentioned until verse 15. But it is precisely this latter verse that identifies “the adversary” who has just been referred to in the singular and with the article, and who is in fact the “devil,” the author of λοιδορία. Neither does this formulation support the identification of the ἀντικείμενος with some anonymous pagan or Jew of the future.

ἀντλέω, ἀντλημα

antleo, to draw (water), antlema, bucket

antleo, S 501; EDNT 1.112; MM 49; BAGD 76 | antlema, S 502; EDNT 1.112; MM 49; BAGD 76

The verb antleo is derived from the noun antlos, “ship’s hold,”¹ and literally refers to bilge water that is bailed out.² Hence it means “to empty water from the hull” and, by extension, “to draw.” Cf. “empty the water that the sea casts on board” (Theognis 673); “you draw straight from the cask” (Theocritus 10.13); “to draw water with a sieve, or what is proverbially called a pierced cask” (Ps.-Aristotle, Oec. 1.6.1); “they draw the liquid off with a bascule to which is attached a half of a wineskin instead of a bucket.”³ Hence the figurative sense “to drain, exhaust”: a life of woe (Euripides, Hipp. 898), destiny (Aeschylus, PV 375).

In the papyri, the verb is used sometimes in accounts for the pay of workers who pump water (usually in a vineyard): antlousan eis ampelon (Pap.Lugd.Bat. XII, 20, 7); “for the pay of two water-drawers”;⁴ sometimes it is used for the hydraulic irrigation machine: “so that the machine may draw” (hopos antlese he mechane, SB 9654, b 9); a machine for drawing water for a vineyard.⁵

In the LXX, water is drawn from a well (Gen 24:13, 20, 43; Hebrew sha’ab; Exod 2:16, 19; Hebrew dalâh), and Abraham’s servant asks Rebekah, “Please give me a little water from your jar”;⁶ but in a figurative sense: “You shall draw water with joy from the springs of salvation” (Isa 2:3).

The substantive antlema, which is much rarer,⁷ is still represented by only three attestations in the papyri. In a petition (from the first century AD) to a police chief regarding the “irrigating machine” (epantlion, line 21) of a vineyard at Theogonis, irrigation became impossible “with the water-drawing machine.”⁸ In the second century AD, in an account of workers and pay, each worker receives a drachma a day: “two workers building the waterwheel, two drachmas.”⁹ In the fifth century, in a contract for a bath house, the text is less certain: to on en [toj [ant]lemati tou autou loutrou mechanostasion.

This group of texts, in addition to the immediate context, leaves no room for doubt regarding the meaning of the biblical hapax antlema in John 4:11, where the Samaritan woman says to Jesus, oute antlema echeis, which has to mean, “Lord, you do not have a container for drawing water”; but since antlema “actually serves as a name for an instrument” (P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique), the correct English would be “You have nothing to draw water with,” no vessel of any sort, no rope, etc., and the well is deep.

¹ Homer, Od. 12.411: “the storm collapsed all the running gear into the hold”; 15.479: the Sidonian woman “fell into the hull’s bilge.” Cf. P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique, p. 93.

² Cf. ἀντλία, “bilge, water from the hull”; Aristophanes, Eq. 434: “watch over the bilge.” The bilge is the part of the hull where water collects and is thus a symbol of corruption.

³ Herodotus 6.119; Euripides, Hyps.: ἀνηλώματος Φαύστῳ ἀντλοῦντι μηχανὴν (in P.Oxy. 985; cf. 147, 1); Plato, Tim. 79 a: in the watered body, food and drink are “drawn as from a fountain to be poured out in the channels of the veins”; Xenophon, Oec. 7.40: “people who pour into a bottomless jar” (futile toil); Diogenes Laertius 7.5.168–169: Cleanthes “by night drew water in the gardens”; Josephus, War 4.472: “water drawn before sunrise.”

⁴ Ὑπὲρ μισθοῦ ε—ργατω—ν β ἀντλούντων, P.Oxy. 1732, 12; P.Mil.Vogl. 69, 45: ἀντλούντες ει—ς τὸ νεόφυτον; 64: ἀντλούντες ε—ργάται; 97; B 6, 45, 64, 74, 88, 93; P.Lond. 131, 40; 1177, 66 (vol. 2, p. 183); P.Tebt. 120, 142; BGU 1732, 6 = SB 7420; cf. 9379, col. II, 15; 9699, 25 (accounts from AD 78/79). Cf. the scribal error ἀτλητός for ἀντλητός in a papyrus from Medinet Madi (W. Clarysse, “ΑΤΛΗΤΟΣ, Athlete or Irrigation?” in ZPE, vol. 27, 1977, p. 192).

⁵ Μηχανὴν τοῦ καινοῦ καλουμένην ἀντλοῦσαν ει—ς ἄμπελον, P.Mil. 64, 6 (= SB 9503); P.Mil.Vogl. 308, 99: ἀντληθείσης τῆς μηχανῆς (cf. 5, 30, 35, 61, 94); P.Oxy. 2244, 82 and 85; 2779, 11; SB 11231, 5.

⁶ Ὑδωρ ε—κ τῆς ὑδρίας σου (Gen 24:17). Philo only uses the verb twice commenting on Scripture; both uses are figurative. On Gen 24:20, Rebekah empties the contents of her jar (τὴν ὑδρίαν) in the trough, which means that “all that she knew had been poured out by virtue in the container that is the mind of the disciple” (Post. Cain 151). On Exod 2:16, the perceptions of the intellect “in a way draw sensible external data until they fill the soul’s reservoirs” (Change of Names 111).

⁷ Plutarch, De sol. an. 974 e: a kind of bucket for drawing water; this is in connection with the cattle of Susa, which could count: ει—σὶ γὰρ αὐτόθι τὸν βασιλικὸν παράδεισον ἄρδουσαι περιάκτοις ἀντλήμασιν, ὧν ὄρισται τὸ πλῆθος. ἕκαστον γὰρ ε—κάστη βοῦς ἀναφέρει καθ ἡμέραν ε—κάστην ἀντλήματα; Dioscorides 4.64, water poured on a wound.

⁸ Διακωλύων ε—παντλει—ν ει—ς τὸν ἀμπελω—να δι ου— συνεχώρει ἀντλήματος, line 10; J. R. Rea, “Petition to a Chief of Police,” in Scritti in onore di O. Montevercchi, Bologna, 1981, pp. 317–321. J. R. Rea cites a scholium on Aristophanes, Ran. 1332, which seems to refer to a container of constant size, all the more so since a version of the story in Aelian, NA 7.1 speaks of a hundred jars. The scholiast on Aristophanes mentions the ropes (σχοινίον) of the ἀντλήματα. Finally, J. R. Rea concludes that antlema is a generic term for “the machine for drawing water,” especially the simplest machines such as a beam on a pivot or the winch from which a bucket is dropped into a well. Finally, the word is used for the container itself.

⁹ Οι—κοδομῆς ἀντλήματος ε—ργάται β δρ., BGU 2354, 2; cf. line 4: ἀντλούντες; line 10: for pumping: ἀντλήσεως καινοῦ μὲν τόπου; cf.

workers on the spillways, ἀνοικοδομοῦντες ἀντλητήρια ἐργάται (P.Mil.Vogl. 305, 14).

ἀνυπόκριτος, γνήσιος anypokritos, upright, unfeigned, authentic; gnesios, authentic, dear, legitimate

see also ὑποκρίνομαι, ὑπόκρισις, ὑποκριτής, ἀνυπόκριτος

anypokritos, S 505; TDNT 8.570–571; EDNT 1.112; MM 50; L&N 73.8; BAGD 76 | gnesios, S 1103; TDNT 1.727; EDNT 1.255; MM 128–129; L&N 73.1; BAGD 162–163

Because it is unknown in the papyri and in the secular language prior to its NT occurrences,¹ anypokritos can be said to be a specifically biblical word. If it is used only twice in the OT, in the sense of “upright, straightforward” (Wis 5:18; 18:16), it is found six times in the epistolary corpus of the NT, qualifying wisdom (Jas 3:17), faith (1Tim 1:5; 2Tim 1:5), and brotherly love (Rom 12:9; 2Cor 6:6; 1Pet 1:22).

In accord with its etymology² and with the synonyms offered by Hesychius—adolos, aprosopoleptos—it is usually translated “without hypocrisy,” that is, without sham or dissimulation. It is indeed true that this sense of sincerity or rectitude is implied in all these occurrences, especially in Jas 3:17, where wisdom is first of all qualified by pure (hagne) and finally by adiakritos (without partiality) and anypokritos, which forms an inclusio and expresses a purity without mixture, an absolute sincerity. But this text contrasts the wisdom that comes from above with wisdom that is terrestrial, animal, diabolical (verse 15), and the eight characteristics listed are intended to define the true sophia in terms of its essential components so that it can be distinguished from counterfeits. Similarly the “unfeigned faith” of 1Tim 1:5 and 2Tim 1:5 evokes the pistis whose exterior profession in words and deeds translates the allegiance of the heart and the convictions of the spirit;³ a “sincere” faith is faith that includes intellectual orthodoxy, pious conduct, faithfulness, and loyalty in keeping obligations. But this “truth” then amounts to conformity with the very nature of the virtue, and anypokritos must be translated “authentic.”

This emerges more clearly with the expression agape (philadelphia) anypokritos, which is probably a “love without hypocrisy,” such that the manifestations of affection match the sincerity of the attachment: one does not play-act in brotherly relationships.⁴ But this meaning does not account for Rom 12:9, where this independent noun phrase governs the whole section on charity (verses 9–21) and serves as a kind of chapter title.⁵ St. Paul lists the specific characteristics of agape, which is neither eros, nor philia, nor philostorgia, although it takes on their values; it is a completely original, godly love, revealed by Jesus Christ, poured out in the heart by the Holy Spirit, a love of nobility and beauty whose first mark is a horror of evil. In other words, agape anypokritos is specifically Christian love, characteristic of the baptized.⁶ It is also the mark of the true apostle; St. Paul recommends himself as a minister of God en agapei anypokritoi (2Cor 6:6), not by a show of affection but by the authentic charity which is divine in origin and has all of the traits that can be pondered in the example in Jesus Christ. It is like a certificate of origin that proves that Paul is truly sent by God and is thus a qualified apostle whose authority cannot be contested, in contrast to the pseudapostoloi (2Cor 11:13). This meaning is confirmed by 2Cor 8:8, where the Corinthians are in a position to prove that their love is authentic (to tes hymeteras agapes gnesion dokimazon), in that their urgency to participate in the collection authenticates their invisible love for God.⁷ Similarly Marcus Aurelius writes that “goodwill is invincible, if it is candid, without a mocking smile, without hypocrisy” (to eumenes aniketon ean gnesion e kai me seseros mede hypokrisis, 11.18.15).

The adjective gnesios, distinctively Pauline in the NT, is applied to three persons: Timotheo gnesio tekno en pistei (1Tim 1:2), which must be translated “dear and authentic child in the faith”; to Titus (Titus 1:4); and to Syzygos, on whose name Paul makes a pun, “dear and authentic companion.”⁸ In secular usage, it is used for a son,⁹ a wife,¹⁰ a brother and sister,¹¹ a friend, and a citizen.¹² These usages show that in the Hellenistic period gnesios goes beyond the legal definition whereby it describes the legitimate son, as opposed to the bastard.¹³

(a) It is an emotionally freighted term. Like Isaac, whom Abraham sired by his wife, huios . . . gnesios, atapetos kai monos (Philo, Abraham 168), or the decree of Cersonesos for a certain Heracleotes: “he shows authentic love” (agapan gnasian endeiknytai).¹⁴

(b) It is used in the first century in a religious sense for those who pass on a revelation.¹⁵

(c) In an even broader sense, for the authorized interpreters of a teaching, like Aristotle, “the most authentic disciple of Plato.”¹⁶ “Legitimate sons,” natural heirs of their father, are especially qualified to pass on his commandments (Philo, Virtues 59) and to be named sole governors of his empire (To Gaius 24). The additional observation that the adverb gnesios, “sincerely,” is used in the sense of “efficaciously”¹⁷ will enhance by this density of usages the meaning of gnesios as applied to Timothy and Titus in order to boost their credibility with the Ephesians and Cretans: true children of the apostle, they are his most authentic representatives, interpreters of his teachings, faithful echoes of his own voice. Furthermore, they should be treated with reverence, because they are not simple “brothers” (1Thess 3:2) or collaborators (Rom 16:21), but men who have lived with Paul in a profound intimacy like that between sons and their father; thus they are very dear to him (2Tim 2:1). These are credentials that will inspire Christians to obedience and filial piety toward them.

¹ Cf. T. Nägeli, Wortschatz, pp. 43, 70, 79, 85.

² Ὑποκριτής refers to the Greek actor, the comic player (A. Lesky, “Hypokrites,” in Studi in onore U. E. Paoli, Florence, 1956, pp. 469–476; H. Koller, “Hypokrisis und Hypokrites,” in MusHelv, 1957, pp. 100–107; cf. P. Joüon, “ΥΠΟΚΡΙΤΗΣ dans l’Evangile et l’hébreu hanéf,” in RSR, 1930, pp. 312–316); hence Hippocrates: “Comedians and deceivers—ὕποκριται καὶ ἐ-ξάπαται—say, in front of people who know them, certain things and have other things in mind; they go out the same and come back not the same” (Acut. 1.24). The first meaning of ἀνυπόκριτος is thus “not good at acting on stage” (cf. Ps.-Demetrius Phalereus, Eloc. 194), then “without dissimulation” (Iamblichus, VP 31.188). Cf. the adverb ἀνυποκρίτως: “One must be an honest person ... without pretense” (Marcus Aurelius 8.5).

³ Cf. Rom 10:10. Pelagius commented, “Fides enim ficta est quae solo ore promittitur et actu negatur” (“For that faith is a fiction that is only promised with the mouth and denied in practice.”)

⁴ Cf. 1John 3:18—ἀγαπα—ν ε—ν ἀληθεία; Heliodorus, Aeth. 1.2.9: a sincere love (ἔρωσ ἀκραιφής); Marcus Aurelius 6.39: τούτους (ἀνθρώπους) φίλει, ἀλλ ἀληθινω—ς”; Dio Cassius 53.17: “as we begin to love one another, without mental reservation (ἀνυπόπτως).” C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, p. 291.

⁵ P. F. Regard, La Phrase nominale dans la langue du Nouveau Testament, Paris, 1919, pp. 61–62, 210–211. C. Spicq, Agapè, pp. 141ff. C.E.B. Cranfield, A Commentary on Romans 12–13, Edinburgh, 1965, pp. 38ff.; C. H. Talbert, “Tradition and Redaction in Romans XII, 9–21,” in NTS, vol. 16, 1969, pp. 83–93.

⁶ 1Pet 1:22—“Having perfectly sanctified your souls by obedience to the truth, in order to have an authentic brotherly love, love one another from the bottom of your heart.” This latter expression insists that love be true, but the former makes it the peculiar possession of the baptized (a primitive baptismal formula), who alone are capable of loving one another like children of the same heavenly Father (cf. C. Spicq, Epîtres de saint Pierre, p. 73). The pagans can recognize its originality (cf. John 13:35). Compare with 1Pet 1:22 the decree of Tenos in the first century BC, γνησίαν ἔχοντι πρὸς πάντα φιλοστοργίαν (C. Michel, Recueil d’Inscriptions grecques, Paris, 1900, n. 394, 49).

⁷ Cf. “who loves authentic worship, ὁ γνησίους μὲν θεραπείας ἀσπάζεται” (Philo, Worse Attacks Better 21; cf. Unchang. God 116). For the organizing of a collection, P.Mert. 63: on 18 January 57, Herennia writes to her father Pompeius to tell him about a collection to benefit the sanctuary of Souchos and to say that a contribution from him is desired, and furthermore that contributions are expected from everyone, even Romans, Alexandrians, and the colonists at Arsinoë. —On the theology of the collection, cf. E. B. Allo, Seconde Epître aux Corinthiens, pp. 204–210; C. H. Buck, “The Collection for the Saints,” in HTR, 1950, pp. 1–19; Recueil L. Cerfaux, vol. 2, pp. 390–413; K. Prümm, Theologie des zweiten Korintherbriefes, Rome-Fribourg, 1962, vol. 2, pp. 17ff. A. Ambrosiano, “La ‘Colletta paolina’ in una recente interpretazione,” in AnBib 18, Rome, 1963, pp. 591–600; D. Georgi, Die Geschichte der Kollekte des Paulus für Jerusalem, Hamburg, 1965; K. F. Nickle, The Collection: A Study in Paul’s Strategy, London, 1966. It was a gesture of gratitude to the mother church, the center of catholicity, just as Jerusalem was the center of Israel (J. Jeremias, Jerusalem, p. 51) and . . . the center of poverty (ibid., p. 169). For J. Jervell, St. Paul wrote Romans to justify his theology and his conduct before the mother church (“Der Brief nach Jerusalem,” in ST, 1971, pp. 61–73).

⁸ Phil 4:3. Σύζυγος means “bearing the same yoke.” On this verse, cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, p. 587, n. 5; 786, n. 2. According to J. Fleury, σύζυγε-συνεργός is Lydia, who is charged with reestablishing peace between Euodia and Syntyche (“Une Société de fait dans l’Eglise apostolique,” in Mélanges Ph. Maylan, Lausanne, 1963, vol. 2, pp. 58–59). Cf. Delling, art. σύζυγος, in TDNT, vol. 7, pp. 748–750.

⁹ Menander, Dysk. 842: “I send back my daughter to you to beget legitimate children”; Philo, Spec. Laws 4.184; Good Man Free 87; Contemp. Life 72; P.Oxy. 1267, 15 (cf. Boswinkel’s note on P.Vindob.Bosw. 5, 11), MAMA, vol. 6, 358, 10: μόνοις γνησίους ἦνω—ν τέκνοις; 7.427, 565; 8.595: τὰ γνήσιά μου παιδιά; of the father: τὸν γλυκύτετον καὶ γνήσιον πατέρα (BCH, 1883, p. 274, n. 15; cf. MAMA, vol. 1, 365, 4); Philo, To Gaius 62, 71.

¹⁰ MAMA, vol. 4, 305: τῇ γλυκυτάτῃ τεκούσῃ Μελτίνη καὶ γνησία γυναικὶ—Αμμία; SEG, vol. 6, 232: —Αγελαίδι γυναικὶ μνείας ἔνεκεν.

¹¹ Sir 7:18; P.Gronig. 10, 9: ἡ ε—μὴ γνησιοτάτη ἀδελφὴ Σενεπόνυχος; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 24, 4; P.Oslo 132, 8; P.Michael. 45, 3: Κολλοῦθος γνήσιος αὐτοῦ ἀδελφὸς ε—κ τω—ν αὐτῶ—ν γονέων; SEG, vol. 8, 621, 19; P.Oxy. 2584, 30; 2761, 5; ὁ ὁμογνήσιος ἀδελφός = my legitimate brother.

¹² “Eleazer . . . to King Ptolemy, his true friend, φίλω γνησίῳ” (Ep. Arist. 41; with the commentary of A. Pelletier, Josèphe adaptateur, p. 112). Callisthenes to Onesimus: τῷ—ι—δίῳ γνησίῳ φίλω (B. Latyschev, Inscriptiones Antiquae, vol. 3, p. 425); P.Fouad 54, 34: “Let them not forget their true friends”; P.Apoll. 24, 1: ἔγραψα τῇ περιβλέπτῳ σου γνησίᾳ φιλίᾳ (= PSI 1267, 1). In a letter of the eighth century, the vocative Γνήσιε = my true friend (ibid. 37, 12); cf. 70, 9; γνήσιος ε—ραστής in a Roman inscription from the imperial period (L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 4, Paris, 1948, p. 33); BGU 547, 7.

¹³ Cf. Heb 12:8 (νόθος). Demosthenes defines γνήσιος: “the title of legitimate child belongs to the one that is son by blood” (Demosthenes, C. Leoch. 44.49). Cf. Philo, Dreams 2.47: “Vainglory always adds the illegitimate to the authentic, προστίθησιν ἀεὶ γνησίῳ μὲν τὸ νόθον.” With respect to things, γνήσιος is equivalent to “in line with the rule, regular, usual” (P.Amh. 86, 10 and 15; P.Stras. 2, 13; P.Ryl. 341, 2; P.Oslo 154, 12; BGU 747, 14; SB 7337, 19), hence “proper.” Cf. the adverb—τὰ ἔργα τῷ—ν ἀμπέλων ι—δίῳ γνησίῳ γενέσθω (second century)—adapted or appropriate to its end.

¹⁴ B. Latyschev, Inscriptiones Antiquae, vol. 1, n. 359, 6 (cited by L. Robert, Opera Selecta Minora, vol. 1, p. 311, n. 2); cf. MAMA, vol. 8, 220: λούκιος —Ιωάνη ἀναγνώστη φιλτάτῳ καὶ γνησίῳ υἱ—ῶ—. P.Lond. 1917, 5, 14: ἀταπηταί, γνησιώταται καὶ ἀξιώταται παρὰ κυρίῳ θεῶ—; SB 7655, 9 and 34; 7871, 19: “the good Philhermes was for me an affectionate and true brother—ἀδελφὸν ὄντα μοι καὶ γνήσιον—not according to nature, but according to his tenderness (στοργῇ).” L.Robert (Hellenica, vol. 13, Paris, 1965, pp. 218ff.) cites many examples of this emotional meaning of γνήσιος, “a sentimental epithet on the same order as γλυκύτατος, φίλτατος.” This is obviously the sense of the term in the Pastorals. St. John Chrysostom recognized this, since he commented on 1Tim 1:2—ἀπὸ πολλῆς φιλοστοργίας.

¹⁵ Isis to Horus: “He made me swear not to pass on the revelation, εἰ— μὴ μόνον τέκνῳ καὶ φίλῳ γνησίῳ” (in M. Berthelot, Collection des anciens alchimistes grecs, 2d ed., London, 1963, p. 34, 6); cf. A. J. Festugière, “L’Expérience religieuse du médecin Thessalos,” in RB, 1939, p. 51; J. Bidez, F. Cumont, Les Mages hellénisés, Paris, 1938, vol. 2, pp. 119, 127.

¹⁶ Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Pomp. 1. Letter of Claudius to the Alexandrians: “My brother Germanicus addressed himself to you γνησιωτέραις ὑμᾶ—ς φωναί—ς” (P.Lond. 1912, 27; with the note of H. I. Bell, Jews and Christians in Egypt, p. 31). Cf. Philodemus of Gadara, Adv.

Soph. frag. Y.3.15: γνήσιος ἀναγνώστης = a faithful interpreter; Atticus, frag. 44: οἱ— γνήσιοι φιλόσοφοι, authentic philosophers.

¹⁷ 2Macc 14:8; Phil 2:20—“I really have no one who like Timothy effectively involves himself (γνησίως μεριμνα—ν) on your behalf”; M. Naldini, // Cristianesimo in Egitto, n. 58, 5: μετὰ τὸν θεὸν ἄλλον ἀδελφὸν οὐκ ἔχω οὔτε φίλος γνήσιον οὔτε εὐπροαίρετον ἄνθρωπον εἰ— μὴ σὺ μόνος; P.Tebt. 326, 11: “He will protect the child effectively—προστήσεσθαι γνησίως τοῦ παιδίου”; SEG, vol. 15, 849, 2: “Soades . . . having efficaciously and generously—γνησίως καὶ φιλοτείμνως—assisted the merchants, the caravans, and citizens established at Vologesias in a number of critical situations”; P.Berl.Zill. 14, 18; P.Lond. 130, 3: γνησίως φιλοπονήσαντες; P.Apoll. 46, 10: “So that my master may be up to date, I announce it to him faithfully”; Dittenberger, Or. 308, 9: μετὰ πάσης ὁμοιοῦσας γνησίως.

ἅπαξ, ε—φάπαξ

hapax, ephapax, once

hapax, S 530; TDNT 1.381–383; EDNT 1.115–116; NIDNTT 2.716–719, 725; MM 53; L&N 60.67, 60.68, 60.70; BAGD 80 | ephapax, S 2178; TDNT 1.383–384; EDNT 2.91–92; NIDNTT 2.716–718; MM 269; L&N 60.67, 60.68, 67.34; BDF §§12(3), 203; BAGD 330

In a listing, the adverb hapax has an arithmetic significance—epirrHEMA arithmetikon (Hesychius)—the opposite of “several times.” Thus 2Cor 11:25—“once I was stoned, three times I was shipwrecked”; a constant usage in the literature.¹ The literature often uses the formula hapax kai dis, “a first and a second time,” which can be translated “various times.”² The same usage appears in St. Paul: “We have wanted to come to you a first time and a second time, but Satan has hindered us” (1Thess 2:18); “When I was at Thessalonica you sent what I needed a first time and a second time” (Phil 4:16). Needless to say, uniqueness is the opposite of multiplicity, “one time” of “often”³ and “another time,”⁴ but not of “once again,” which is a repetition, even with significant changes, and with the nuance of a first time which contrasts with the last time (Heb 12:26–27 = Hag 2:5; cf. Judg 16:20, 28; 20:30–31; 1Sam 3:10; 20:25; 2Macc 3:37; T. Abr. A 8, 9, 15).

Often hapax has the meaning “one single time, unique.”⁵ “Only (and without exception) man gives orders to all other living beings that are mortal” (Philo, Husbandry 8; Moses 2.65), “a single bite inevitably brings death” (Dreams 2.88; cf. Spec. Laws 1.59). This uniqueness can be periodic: “Once a year, propitiation is made”;⁶ thus the high priest only enters the holy of holies once a year.⁷ But many other texts emphasize that what is done is not repeatable, and these give hapax its definitive meaning: “Once for all Christ was manifested at the consummation of the ages” (Heb 9:26); “humans are destined to die only once” (Heb 9:27). “The faith is passed down to the saints once for all.”⁸

This meaning occurs frequently in Philo and the papyri: “The parricide would not die at one stroke (me hapax); he finished dying only with continual suffering, sorrow, and distress” (Rewards 72); “It would be better to take nothing away, to add nothing . . . and to leave alone that which was done once for all (hapax = definitively) at the beginning” (Etern. World 42); “Leave all the rest aside once for all.”⁹ The expression pros hapax at the end of a receipt (P.Oxy. 1138, 13; BGU 1020, 15; PSI 1040, 26; P.Erl. 79, 4) or a dossier (P.Bour. 20, 14) seems to mean that the item in question is complete and thus valid and definitive (cf. P.Lips. 34, 20; 35, 19; 39, 6). This would correspond to the Hebrew pa’am, often translated by hapax in the LXX, which means “anvil, step or pace, time or occurrence”; cf. Abishai to David: “let me pin him to the ground with a single throw of the spear” (1Sam 26:8; cf. 1Chr 1:11; Judg 16:18); “May sinners perish far from the face of the Lord, all together.”¹⁰

Hapax usually is given the sense of “once for all” in Heb 9:28; 1Pet 3:18—Christ offered himself and died one single time for sins, and it is indeed true that this oblation was perfect and unique, so that there is no need for it to be renewed. But if this translation suggests the definitive quality of Christ’s sacrifice, it does not sufficiently emphasize that it is absolute,¹¹ complete; it takes hapax too exclusively as an adverb of quantity and inadequately reflects the word’s etymology. Hapax may be an old nominative¹² whose root is found in peg-ny-mi, “to fasten by driving well in, to drive into the ground, fasten by assembling, fix by compacting, solidifying, crystallizing, jelling, being congealed.”¹³ This quality of “compactness” seems to be retained in Josephus, Ant. 12.109: hapax . . . eis aei diamene; 18.172; and the papyri where an initial act includes its effects. In AD 54, when the prefect of Egypt, L. Lucius Geta, wrote that his orders and decisions had been formulated “once,” he means that they always remain binding and must be applied by everyone everywhere just as on the first day.¹⁴ In a contract for a nurse, dating to 21 May 26: “When the year is up Paapis will pay her once for all 60 silver drachmas for the second year” (P.Rein. 103, 14; republished SB 7619). Here eis hapax means not just “one time only” but “entirely, completely”; the sum will be paid in full. On the theological plane, to say that the sacrifice of Christ is “compact” would mean that it includes all of its effects (and its commemorations?), like the spring which contains potentially the whole river.

As for ephapax = ha-pax epi [pasin], unknown in the LXX, in Philo, in Josephus, and in the papyri before the sixth century,¹⁵ it is used five times in the epistolary corpus. Four of these occurrences¹⁶ have the same meaning as hapax in the last sense discussed above. In Rom 6:10, the death of Christ was a unique event that objectively included the death of all. In Heb 7:27, ephapax is opposed to kath' hemeran: Christ does not have to renew his sacrifice daily; its value is absolute and definitive, complete; thus he enters the heavenly sanctuary and does not come out again; his one and only entrance is made in order to remain there forever (9:12). To say that we are sanctified by the sacrifice of the body of Jesus (hegiasmenoï esmen . . . ephapax) means that this sanctification is not only definitive (note the perfect participle) but collective, thanks to this unique offering which contains his body.

¹ Philo, Unchang. God 82 (citation of Ps 62:11; cf. Job 33:14—"God speaks once and does not repeat twice"); Dreams 1.62: "The word place can have three meanings: first of all (ἄπαξ) . . . , according to a second meaning (κατὰ δεύτερον τρόπον) ..., thirdly (κατὰ τρίτον)"; Alleg. Interp. 2.54; 3.51; To Gaius 58: "not once but three times"; 356; Moses 1.183; 2.258; Josephus, Life 82: "Four times I took Tiberias by force, once Gabara."

² David, burdened with armor, "tried to walk once and twice, because he had never tried it" (1Sam 17:39); Neh 13:20; 1Macc 3:30; Philo, Prelim. Stud. 4: "animals and plants bear fruit only once or twice a year, ἄπαξ ἢ δις" (cf. P.Oxy. XI, 37: ἄπαξ ποτὶ ἢ δις, republished by C. Austin, Comicorum Graecorum Fragmenta, n. 254; inscription of Silko: ἄπαξ δύο = δις, in Dittenberger, Or. 201, 2 = SB 8536); Diogenes Laertius 7.13: "Zeno rarely used boys, once or twice a girl"; P.Oxy. 2731, 9: ἄπαξ καὶ δις καὶ τρις ε—δήλωσά σου; 2596, 12. The papyri nevertheless prefer the expression ἄπαξ καὶ δεύτερον, cf. P.Panop.Beatty 1, 54, 112: to order or to give instructions a first and a second time; P.Lund II, 4, 6: "I wrote you a first time, a second time, and often" (republished SB 8091); P.Cair.Isid. 63, 17 (republished SB 9185); P.Mil. 83, 4 (republished ibid. 9013); P.Oslo 64, 4; P.Oxy. 2996, 7.

³ Πολλάκις; Philo, Spec. Laws 4.85: "eros is not content with a single catastrophe (ἄπαξ) but has frequently (πολλάκις) inundated the civilized world with innumerable evils" (cf. Sacr. Abel and Cain 127: μὴ ἄπαξ ἀλλὰ διὰ παντός); Josephus, Ant. 4.314, οὐχ ἄπαξ ἀλλὰ πολλάκις; P.Panop.Beatty 1, 175; P.Mich. 213, 5: "I wrote you often, but you did not write even once . . ."; P.Giss. 48, 10.

⁴ Ἄλλο ἅπαξ, P.Ryl. 435; P.Mich. 482, 5; O.Bodl. 2471, 9.

⁵ Gen 18:32; Judg 6:39; 2Sam 17:7—Ahithophel erred only once; P.Cair.Zen. 59028: περι τοῦ ὀψωνίου ὅλως οὐκ εἰ—λήφασμεν ἀλλ ἢ ἅπαξ; 59218, 27; P.Oxy. 2151, 5: ὑμεῖς—δὲ μοι οὐδὲ ἅπαξ ε—δηλώσατε περι τῆς σωτηρίας ὑμῶν—ν; P.Tebt. 760, 8. Eupolis, frag. 128 D, 2: “οὐκ ἀνεβίων οὐδ ἥπαξ; once dead, I shall not live again, even once” (republished by J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 1, p. 364; C. Austin, Comicorum Graecorum Fragmenta, n. 94, 4; cf. 92, 8). On the occasion of a soldier’s desertion, the priest of the village of Hermopolis pleads: “συνχωρήσε αὐτοῦ τοῦτω τὸ ἅπαξ, forgive him for this one time” (P.Lond. 416, 8; vol. 2, p. 299 = P.Abinn. 32 = P.Berl.Zill. 8, 15).

⁶ Exod 30:10; Lev 16:34; 2Chr 9:21—“Once every three years the ships of Tarshish would arrive”; Philo Spec. Laws 2.146.

⁷ Heb 9:7, ἅπαξ τοῦ ε—νιαυτοῦ; similarly Philo, Spec. Laws 1.72; Drunkenness 136; To Gaius 306; Giants 306 (opposed to πάντα καιρόν, on every occasion); Josephus, War 5.236; cf. m. Yoma 5.

⁸ Jude 3: τῇ ἅπαξ παραδοθείση τοῖς—ἀγίοις πίστει; verse 5: “You who know all things once for all”; Heb 6:4—“Those who were illuminated once for all and tasted the heavenly gift”; cf. Philo, Drunkenness 198: πιστεύει τοῖς—ἅπαξ παραδοθει—σι; Josephus, War 2.158: “Those who have once tasted the wisdom of the Essenes”; Ant. 4.140: the young man who has only once tasted foreign customs is intoxicated and insatiable; cf. P.Oxy. 471, 77: once accustomed to his shame, ἅπαξ γὰρ ε—ν ἔθει τῆς αἰ—σχύνης γενόμενον; 1102, 8: “ε—πεὶ ἅπαξ προσῆλθε τῇ κληρονομίᾳ, having once entered into definitive possession of the inheritance”; T. Abr. A 20: “Stop questioning me once and for all.”

⁹ Philo, Migr. Abr. 137; 40: “the words that concern God are all at once put to rout”; Husbandry 104: “once for all indifferent to all the rest”; 105; Change of Names 247: “Once something has been said it cannot come back”; Xenophon, An. 1.9.10: “He never betrayed them since he had once granted them his friendship”; Jos. Asen. 25.6: “Have you not sold Joseph once for all, οὐχ ἅπαξ πεπράκατε?”

¹⁰ Pss. Sol. 12.8; Philo, Moses 1.46: “At one stroke, the people in their places seized the opportunity”; Flight 101: “The divine Word, the most venerable of the whole lot of intelligences, τῶν—νοητῶν—ἅπαξ ἀπάντων”; Josephus, Ant. 11.192: “she had not once obeyed”; Xenophon, Oec. 10.1: “I have only to say one word for her to obey me immediately.”

¹¹ P.Phil. 35, 26: “ἀλλὰ ἅπαξ οὐ μέλι ἡμι—ν περὶ ε—μοῦ, you care absolutely nothing for me” (second century); P.Oxy. 3006, 9: ἅπαξ ἀκοῦσαι.

¹² Cf. P. Chantraine, Morphologie historique du grec, 2d ed., Paris, 1964, 132. Only the prefix ἅ corresponds to sem-el, sim-plex.

¹³ P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique, under πῆγνυμι.

¹⁴ Τὰ ὑπὲρ ε—μοῦ ἅπαξ κεκριμένα ἢ προσταχθέντα (Dittenberger, Or. 664, 14 = SB 8900); cf. Ps 89:35—“I have sworn once = for all time.” Philo, To Gaius 218: “He intends that what he has once decided shall be carried out”; Menander, Dysk. 392: “since once I have set myself to the task, that isn’t the moment to weaken”; Josephus, Life 314: “Tiberias had ἅπαξ gone over to them,” i.e. validly and definitively; the attribution remains forever effective.

¹⁵ P.Lond. 1708, 242 (sixth century); 483, 88 (seventh century). In P.Flor. 158, 10 (third century), ἀφάπαξ should be read ε—φ ἅπαξ (Vitelli, in Berichtigungsliste, vol. 1, p. 150).

¹⁶ In 1Cor 15:6, Christ resurrected “was seen by more than five hundred brothers at one time, all at once, ὅφθῃ ε—φάπαξ”; but “compact” is also a possible meaning (cf. Enoch [Greek] 16.1—“the great time will come to an end all at once”); the vision is collective; cf. C. Mugler, Terminologie optique, p. 43: “ἅπαξ = semel, at one time. Adverb expressing the synthetic character of the act of vision which the school of Aristotle defied the atomists to explain. Alexander (of Aphrodisias): δοκεῖ— . . . ὡς ἅπαξ . . . καὶ ὡς ἓν ὁρα—ν (sc. ἡ ὄψις) τὸ ὁρώμενον; vision seems to take in the object in a single act and perceive it as a unity, In Sens. 60.5.”

ἀπαράβατος

aparabatos, inviolable, nontransferable

aparabatos, S 531; TDNT 5.742–743; EDNT 1.116; NIDNTT 3.583–585; MM 53; L&N 13.61; BAGD 80

How should we translate this biblical hapax in Heb 7:24—“Jesus, inasmuch as he remains for eternity, aparabaton echei ten hierosynen ”?¹ This rather rare verb is only found in late Greek; it is used only once in Philo and twice in Josephus. Etymologically speaking, (parabaino: pass along or pass beyond, violate) a parabates is a transgressor, a violator, or a denigrator,² so aparabatos should be that which ought not be transgressed, “inviolable,” and that is the meaning—usually in a legal context—that is well attested in the papyri and even in literary writings, notably with the verb meno.³ But this meaning does not fit in Heb 7:24.

One might be tempted to give our adjective the otherwise well-attested meaning of “permanent, perpetual,”⁴ “unchangeable”⁵ as the word was understood by the Vulgate (sempiternum) and the Peshitta, and as it is most often used in literature.⁶ But this would produce a tautology with the first part of the verse, even a banality; and in any case this notion of a priesthood unchangeable in character or quality is not in evidence elsewhere in the epistle.⁷

Alternatively, we can posit a derivative meaning, one for which no attestation has yet been found: “not passing from one to another” (= me parabainousan eis allon). This was the interpretation of St. John Chrysostom (adiadochon) and Theodoret, followed by Bengel—“that cannot pass to successors”—and it is the meaning that flows out of the context. As opposed to the levitical priesthood, whose mortal ministers had to transmit their power to their descendants, an eternal priest remains unique and will never have to pass his priesthood on to any other minister (cf. the hoi men . . . ho de antithesis in verses 23–24). The term was apparently chosen because of its legal connotations and to justify the priestly “institution” of the new covenant—which was identified with a single person! So we translate: “He possesses the priesthood which is nontransferable.”⁸

¹ There are almost as many translations as translators: “priesthood which is not transmitted” (A. Loisy, Les Livres du Nouveau Testament, Paris, 1912; A. Tricot, in La Sainte Bible of C. Crampon, Paris-Tournai, 1952); “intransmissible” (M. Goguel, H. Monnier, Le Nouveau Testament, Paris, 1929); “inalienable” (Médebielle, in L. Pirot’s La Sainte Bible, Paris, 1938; C.F.D. Moule, Idiom Book, 109); “the absolute priesthood” (J.-S. Javet, Dieu nous parla, Neuchâtel-Paris, 1945); “priesthood is . . . not transferable” (J. Héring, Hébreux = ET, p. 62); “perpetual” (NJB); “unsurpassable priesthood” (A. Vanhoye, Traduction structurelle de l’Épître aux Hébreux, Rome, 1963); etc.

² Cf. Hos 6:7; Ps 17:4; Rom 2:25, 27; Gal 2:18; Jas 2:11.

³ The conclusion of a legal sentence of AD 67: μένειν κύρια καὶ ἀπαράβατα (P.Ryl. 65, 18); SB 9152, 10: παραμένοντα ἀπαραβάρως καὶ ἀκαταγνώστως; P.Grenf. 1.60, 7: βεβαίᾳ καὶ ἀπαραβάτῳ . . . πράσει. The Jews placed their confidence in God, protesting εἰς νῦν ἀπαραβάτοι μεμνηκότες, i.e., that up to the present they have remained pure of any transgression, or better, that they have not changed, they have remained unalterable (Josephus, Ant. 18.266). “This sovereign equality keeps itself constantly, unceasingly sheltered from any transgression” (Philo, Etern. World 112); “I shall make a mysterious machine, linked to an infallible and inviolable doctrine, ἀπλανοῦς καὶ ἀπαραβάτου” (Stobaeus 1.49.44; vol. 1, p. 401, 20; [French] translation by A. J. Festugière, Corpus Hermeticum, Paris, 1954, vol. 4, p. 16, n. 18, 20); “In the Whole there are four places, which are under an inviolable law and authority, ἀπαραβάτω νόμῳ” (Stobaeus 1.49.45; vol. 1, p. 407, 21; [French] translation by A. J. Festugière, Corpus Hermeticum, p. 52); cf. Epictetus, Ench. 51.2: νόμος ἀπαραβάτος.

⁴ P.Lond. 1015, 12: ἄτροπα καὶ ἀσάλευτα καὶ ἀπαραγάτα; Chrest.Mitt., n. 372, col. V, 19: ἔνια ἀπαραβατά ε—στιν = There are some things for which nothing has changed. Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.293: “What finer thing than undeviating piety.”

⁵ The meaning retained by J. Schneider (in his excellent article on this word in TDNT, vol. 5, pp. 742–743), O. Michel (Der Brief an die Hebräer, 10th ed., Göttingen, 1957, p. 175), G. W. Buchanan (To the Hebrews, New York, 1972).

⁶ Epictetus 2.15.1: “They imagine that they must always remain unshakeable”; Plutarch, De def. or. 3: “The sun maintains its accustomed course unchangeably, according to the received tradition.” It is worth noting that it is used for the course of the stars, which cannot be changed (F. Cumont, L’Egypte des astrologues, p. 17, n. 2) and for destiny or unyielding fate (Plutarch, De fato 1; Marcus Aurelius 12.14.1–2).

⁷ W. L. Lorimer, “Hebrews VII, 23 f,” in NTS, vol. 13, 1967, pp. 386–387, taking note of these problems, suggests that the author of the epistle wrote (or meant to write) ἀμετάβατον, “not passing to another”; the mistake resulted from the παραμένειν of verse 23.

⁸ Obviously ἔχειν retains its strong sense “possess, hold, keep.”

ἀπαρχή

aparche, firstfruit

aparche, S 536; TDNT 1.484–486; EDNT 1.116; NIDNTT 3.415–417; MM 54; L&N 53.23, 57.171, 61.8; BAGD 81

Most of the peoples of antiquity had the custom of offering to the deity, the master of nature and source of fertility, the firstfruits of their fields and the firstborn of their domestic animals.¹ This usage is well attested in Greece, not only by the first literary text to employ the term aparche,² but by many inscriptions in which it can be seen that the aparchai are not only levies but personal gifts, and more precisely offerings to the deity:³ “Firstfruits to the goddess Artemis.”⁴ An Athenian decree pertaining to the offering of the firstfruits of grain and to the Eleusinian feasts celebrated on this occasion modifies the payment of a certain otherwise unknown Chairemonid: kata ton Chairemonido nomon ton peri tes aparches.⁵ Similarly, a decree probably found on the two steles at Eleusis and at Athens calls upon the Athenians to pay the aparche used for the sacrifices.⁶ This religious act takes quite different forms; it may be carried out at the beginning of a meal⁷ or before the departure of an army (Xenophon, Cyr. 7.1.1; Hier. 4.2); but it is always an opening ritual.⁸

We know how insistent Moses was about making this custom obligatory, how one had to present the firstfruits at the sanctuary with a word of dedication and a prayer (Deut 26:1-4) and the portion reserved for the priests (Num 5:9; 18:11; 31:29).⁹ The firstfruits are the levy (Hebrew terûmah) assessed¹⁰ on the firstfruits of the soil, considered as the best.¹¹ The consecration to God of the firstfruits that sanctifies the whole harvest is a “sacred levy” (Lev 22:12; Ezek 48:10; Sir 7:31). At the return from captivity, this levy, which is reserved either for the priests or for the prince as part of their emolument (Ezek 45:16; 48:12, 18, 20, 21; cf. Philo, Spec. Laws 1.151: semnoteron phoron kai hagioteran; 2.120, 222), strongly resembles a tax; this meaning of aparche becomes common in the papyri and the equivalent is found in Josephus.¹² Dio Cassius tells of when Emperor Commodus “ordered for his birthday that he be paid two gold denarii as firstfruits”; the term is also used in the inscriptions.¹³

Philo commented copiously on the texts of Scripture relative to the aparchai.¹⁴ He most often gives these latter the meaning “offering” (Joseph 194; Spec. Laws 2.167, 184, 186) and emphasizes their value as the first portion, an initial offering (Heir 253; Abraham 196; cf. Prelim. Stud. 89: archas, tas aparchas [that which is original, first]), but above all he insists on their religious meaning as an expression of gratitude toward God, a basic way of honoring him: “The aparchai are offerings of thanks (charisterious) to God” (Spec. Laws 1.152; cf. 1.138). The sacred obligation to offer the firstfruits (Spec. Laws 2.168; 4.99) is an act of religious virtue that honors the deity (Virtues 95; Sacr. Abel and Cain 74, 117); virtue “returns in thank offerings the firstfruits of goods received” (Prelim. Stud. 7).¹⁵ If it is necessary to consecrate to God the firstfruits of all plunder (Moses 1.316),¹⁶ it is because of the knowledge that the victory was given by God. These levies are so plentiful that they constitute a treasure in almost all the cities (Spec. Laws 1.77–78, 133, 153), as a benefice for the priests, for the priests' servants, or for a priest's daughter who has been widowed or divorced and is childless (Spec. Laws 1.117, 126, 128, 129); so much so that it is evaluated as a sum of money (timatai ten aparchen argyrio rheto, Spec. Laws 1.139; cf. m. Bek. 8.7–8), and thus the Jews “gathered together the sacred funds (chremata hiera; cf. Syl. 416, 9), those of the firstfruits, which they sent to Jerusalem” (To Gaius 156, 157, 216, 291, 311, 312, 316).

In the usage of the papyri, aparche hardly ever has the religious meaning,¹⁷ but it retains its basic meaning of “beginning, first, initial” and most often designates the birth certificate, the identification document for free men,¹⁸ corresponding to the hypomnema epigenneseos; and for Roman citizens it refers to the professio liberorum natorum.¹⁹ According to the Gnomon of the Idios Logos: “A female citizen (of Alexandria) who by mistake married an Egyptian man, thinking that he was of the same estate as herself, is not held responsible. If the two spouses together present the birth certificates of their children (hypo amphoteron aparche teknon tethe), these latter will retain the right of (Alexandrian) citizenship” (tereitai he politeia) from their mother (47, line 131). In a list of inscriptions of minors as new citizens in AD 133, the document itself is called the aparche. It proves that the child of a citizen was inscribed for the first time on an official list of citizens, with sponsors (gnosteres, line 8) guaranteeing not that the child was born but that he has the right to be called a citizen of Antinoöpolis (Pap.Lugd.Bat. VI, 30, 18).²⁰ At the beginning of the third century, Ermias and his wife Helen address a petition to the senate of Antioch that their five-year-old son Castor be inscribed as a citizen (βουλόμενοι θέσθαι ἀπαρχὴν υἱοῦ Καστορος ε—τω—ν ε? . . . ἀξιούμεν συντάξαι τω— γραμματεῖ— θέσθαι τὴν τοῦ Καστορος ἀπαρχὴν ὡς καθήκει, P.Stras. 634, 9 and 14). The editor, J. Schwartz, explains the procedure followed: “The father first addresses a petition to the boule; then he presents his child, probably accompanied by two sponsors (gnosteres) and pays perhaps . . . a tax (aparche); then the child is inscribed in the register; and finally a certificate (likewise called an aparche) is delivered to the father by the prytaneis.”²¹ Under Hadrian's reign, the tutor of a certain child born to a soldier had to prove that this child was a citizen by producing his birth certificate, but he seems to have been unable to do so: “that which is sought concerning the child's aparche . . . to seek out the birth aparche.”²² In the third century, PSI 1067, 11 contains the request for a child's birth certificate: “desiring the aparche that we had from our mutual daughter Eudaimonis.”²³

Requests for enrollment as an ephebe are rather common,²⁴ and as with the birth certificate aparchai,²⁵ the payment of a monetary tax is mentioned (omnyo tassesthai aparchen),²⁶ and the aparche can mean a sum of money,²⁷ notably that put up as a guarantee²⁸ or the tax on Jews.²⁹

These usages, which despite their diversity retain the same fundamental meaning, help us better understand the NT usages of aparche, which are almost all metaphorical. Most of these point to some beginning, a newness or even a birth. First of all, Jas 1:18—“He begot us by the word of truth so that we might be as it were the firstfruits of his creatures.”³⁰ Christians are the new Israel, constituting the “assembly of the firstborn” (ekklesia prototokon, Heb 12:23). Newly born, they are like the firstfruits of the harvest and belong to God, and are described in terms of their precedence in regard to generations to follow. The best parallel is Philo: Israel, an orphan-people that stirs God’s compassion, is “like a sort of firstfruits of the whole human race” (Spec. Laws 4.180). In the same sense, Christ resurrects the dead, “the firstfruits of those who sleep” (1Cor 15:20); this is put in necessary relation with the mass of the other dead, who cannot not be “awakened” in their turn by God. Jesus is “at the avant-garde of those who have passed on,”³¹ part of the same company; his own resurrection cannot be an isolated event but precedes and guarantees the resurrection of the other deceased.

If Epenetus is greeted as “firstfruits of Asia [offered] to Christ” (Rom 16:5) and “the household of Stephanas, firstfruits of Achaëa” (1Cor 16:15), this is a title of honor or dignity attributed to an elite, to the “firstfruits” of those who consecrated themselves to Christ in a certain region,³² the “firstborn” begotten to the divine life, but constituting a unity with those who will be converted in the future and stirred up by their example. The “firstfruits,” in accord with the usage of the LXX, are always the best. If the virgins “follow the Lamb wherever he goes, they have been redeemed (and separated) from humankind as a firstfruits for God and for the Lamb” (Rev 14:4); there has been a transfer of ownership.³³ The reference is to the redemption of slaves (agorazo), who have a new standing and become the property of the deity. In the case at hand, it is the best part of redeemed humanity, that which is specially consecrated to God and to God’s service, but they are “firstfruits” with regard to the universal harvest of the elect.³⁴ If all Christians have the firstfruits of the Spirit (ten aparchen tou pneumatou echontes), groaning inwardly and longing for adoption, the deliverance of the body (Rom 8:23), this aparche is not a first participation as compared to a second that would be more abundant; it is an anticipation. The Holy Spirit is the pledge of the gift of glory. By his very presence he guarantees that the condition of the sons of God in this world will not remain precarious, imperfect, and threatened, or merely inchoative. They aspire intensely, for their standing as adoptive children should not only be recognized, but should also bring along all its rights and results, notable among which is the transformation of the physical body into a body that is spiritual and glorious. The Holy Spirit in the heart of the believer gives much greater certitude than any prytaneis of their birthright in the heavenly world.³⁵ This integral fullness of adoption is a marvelous novum.

More delicate is the interpretation of Rom 11:16, where St. Paul wishes to prove by a reference to Num 15:20-21 that the Jews are a people consecrated to God: "If the firstfruits are holy, the rest of the dough is also, and if the root is holy, the branches are as well." It matters little here whether the aparchai are the first Jewish converts or rather the patriarchs, notably Abraham (11:25), who constitutes "the holy root." On first reading, one understands that the consecration of the firstfruits profits the ensemble, that it has the effect of consecrating the rest. But Fr. Lagrange observes that this theology is not found in the Bible, nor in Philo, nor in Josephus; the goal of the firstfruits is "rather to give the people free usage of the whole after a small part has been set aside for Yahweh (Lev 23:14). . . . This offering thus has as its result that it confers [on plants and fruits] a sort of legal purity,"³⁶ making the loaf edible for the people of God; its initial "impurity" is removed. In the case at hand, the descendants of Israel, though unbelievers at present, still benefit from the blessing granted their ancestors; they remain called to salvation by virtue of the very firstfruits: "the root is holy." Now, the first NT meaning of the word is "non-impure" and it is thus in a marriage between a Christian husband and a pagan wife, or conversely "the unbelieving husband is found sanctified in the wife, and the unbelieving wife is sanctified in the brother; since otherwise we would have to conclude that your children are impure, whereas in fact they are holy" (1Cor 7:14). This latter case is explained by the "incorporating personality" of the Christian parent, who passes on qualities and privileges to his descendant.³⁷ But for the firstfruits, it seems that rabbinic theology granted it a value analogous to "sanctification" with regard to the whole harvest: the best part served for the whole (cf. 1Cor 15:20, 23). The first includes the aggregate, and that is why the offering of the former is beneficial for the latter. This is the teaching of R. Josue ben Kabsai: "All my life I read this verse (Num 19:19), 'The pure man sprinkles the impure' and I believed that an individual could only annul the impurity of one person, until I learned that a sprinkling suffices for many" (b. Dem. 3.4); "The Mishna (m. shabb. 21.2) permits the transporting of a pure oblation together with a part that is profane. If it is allowed to take away what is impure, it is thanks to the pure part which is the majority" (b. Dem. 7.2).³⁸

Thus all the NT usages of aparche, while referring to OT texts and theology, apply only to humans. Under the influence of Philo, and, it would seem, the rabbis, they emphasize less the offering to God than the link between the firstfruits and the whole of the harvest; the former represent the latter and in some way contain it. Conformably to contemporary papyrological usage, the sense of newness, beginning, and birth is strongly emphasized; but according to the Pauline parallels, the nuance of "pledge, guarantee" comes to the surface. If the OT insists on the setting apart of the firstfruits, the NT makes the most of their unity with the rest of the harvest: "the branches are also holy."

¹ Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 8.9 (1160a): “Still today we see sacrifices and assemblies of ancient origin after the harvest as a feast of firstfruits”; cf. Stengel, s.v. “—Απαρχαί,” PW, vol. 1/2, 2666–68. On the ἀπαρχαὶ ἀνθρώπων, cf. Aristotle, Constitution of the Boeotians (cited by Plutarch, Thes. 16.2): “The Cretans, in discharge of an ancient vow, the firstfruits of their offspring”; Plutarch, De Pyth. or. 16: “I approve of the people of Eretria and Magnesia who offered the firstfruits of their population to the god as the dispenser of all fruit, to the father, author, and friend of humankind”; Quaest. Graec. 35; cf. Solon 6.1.6.

² Herodotus 1.92: “The offerings that Croesus made at Delphi and at the sanctuary of Amphiaraus came from his own property; they were levied on the wealth inherited from his father” (τω—ν πατρῴων χρημάτων ἀπαρχήν); cf. Euripides, Or. 96; Euripides, Phoen. 1525; Plato, Leg. 7.806 D. In his speech in praise of agriculture, Xenophon (Oec. 5.10) cries, “What art supplies to the gods better firstfruits” (ἀπαρχάς); and Theophrastus justifies the offering made to the gods on the grounds of the importance of cereals for civilization (cited by Porphyry, Abst. 2.6). Thucydides 3.58.4: “All the ritual offerings with all the fruits of our land, the firstfruits of which we bring (to the tombs of your fathers), levied by friends on a friendly land.”

³ Cf. ἀπάρχεσθαι: one offers to the god the firstfruits of one’s art (Dittenberger, Syl. 711.12; 795 A; Dittenberger, Or. 352.42), or the firstfruits of wisdom (Plato, Prt. 343 B; Dio Chrysostom 72.12), of a discourse (Euripides, Ion 402). Pss. Sol. 15.5—“a new psalm . . . firstfruits of the lips, from a holy and righteous heart.” Cf. L. Robert, Études épigraphiques, 40–45.

⁴ —Απαρχήν τῆ θεα— —Αρτέμιδι (I. Magn. 83.12–13); Νέαρχος ἀνέθεκεν ὁ κεραμεὺς ἔργον ἀπαρχὴν τάθENAΙΑ, Dittenberger, Syl. 1139 (vol. 3, 294–95, fifth century BC); cf. Syl. 731.23 (vol. 2, 395): δοθῆναι δὲ αὐτοί—ς ὑπὸ τοῦ δήμου καὶ εἰ—ς ἀπαρχήν καὶ σύνοδον χρυσοῦς τέσσαρας (first century); Dittenberger, Or. 179, 12 (vol. 1, 261): Aniketo, οἰ—κονόμος σιτικῶ—ν of the merits of Herakleides, decides in 96 BC “to give in his own name and the name of those who work under his orders to the office of circumscription each year as firstfruits, to the sanctuary of the very great god Soknopaios, 182| artabai of wheat” (= SB 8888, 12; E. Bernard, Fayoum, n. 71, 12). Dedication to a goddess in the fifth century BC: ἀπαρχήν θεα— (I. Rhamn. 150, n. 36). Cf. Hans Beer, —Απαρχή und verwandte Ausdrücke in griechischen Weilinschriften, Würzburg, 1914.

⁵ F. Sokolowski, LSCGSup, n. 13, 10. Cf. LSAM, n. 10, 39 = decree of the Ilian confederation regarding the panegyris of Athena in 77 BC, τὰς δὲ ἀπαρχὰς διοικεῖ—σθαι καθότι καὶ πρότερον = I.Ilium, 10, 39, which cites the response of Attalisl to the Magnesians: ἀπαρχὴν ε—γώ τε ἔταξα δοῦναι; Dittenberger, Or. 282, 17 (vol. 1, 458) = C.B. Welles, Royal Correspondence, n. 34, 18; I.Thas., n. 379, 2–3. —Απαρχαί for the Delian Pythiads, J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1946–47, 322, n.96.

⁶ LSCG, n. 43, 47 = Dittenberger, Syl. 83, 43, 37; around 422–23 BC; LSCG, n. 155 B 5: ἀπαρχαὶ ε—μβάλλωνται τω— θεω—.

⁷ Χφ. Τ. Ηομολιε, σ., “Δαμαριυμ,” ΔΑΓΡ, ολ. 21, 36382.

⁸ Α νυανχε στρονγλψ εμπηασιζεδ βψ ἔαν Ρυδηαρδτ, Νοτιονσ φονδαμενταλεσ δε λα πενσ᾽ε ρελιγιενυσε ετ αχτεσ χονστιτυτιφσ δυ χυλτε δανσ λα Γρ□χε χλασσιθυε· Ετυδε πρ᾽λιμιναιρε πουρ αιδερ □ λα χομπρ᾽ηενσιον δε λα πι᾽τ᾽ ατη᾽νιεννε αν Ιμε σι□χλε, Γενῆα, 1958, 21922: “Ἴτ ωασ νοτ αφτερ τηε ἰχτορψ, αφτερ τηε ηαρῆστ, τηατ τηισ ριτε ωασ χαρριεδ ουτ, βυτ βεφορε τηε σταρτ οφ τηε ηαρῆστ ορ τηε πλυνδερινγ. Τηεσε τωο μομεντσ χοινχιδε. . . . Τηε φιστφρριιτσ, ωηετηερ σάεδ ορ δεστροψεδ, ωερε λῆιεδ ον α χολλεχτιον οφ γοοδσ ιν χονσιδερατιον οφ ωηιχη τηειρ χονσεχρατιον δεριεδ αλλ ιτσ ἄλυε”; ανδ ηε χιτεσ Πηιλοχηορυσ, Τρεσπ. 35· πάσας τε τὰς ἀρχὰς προσῆθαν αὐτοί—ς (τοι—ς θεοί—ς), ὀρθω—ς ποιοῦντες. τοὺς γὰρ ἀπάντων ἄρχοντας τοί—ς ὁμοίοις χρῆ γεραίρειν.

⁹ Cf. tractate Ma’aserot; Ezek 44:30—“The choice firstfruits of everything and all levies whatsoever among your levies shall be for the priests”; Sir 45:20—“God allotted to Aaron the first of the firstfruits.” Cf. J de Fraine, s.v. “Premices,” DBSup 8, 446–61; R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel, vol. 2, pp. 379, 404; O. Eissfeldt, Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des israelitisch-jüdischen Kultus (Beiträge zur Wissenschaft von Alten Testament 22; Leipzig, 1917).

¹⁰ Exod 25:2-5; 35:5; 36:6; 2Sam 1:21; mountains of Gilboah, “mountains of firstfruits,” i.e., fertile; 2Chr 31:10; Mal 3:8; Ezek 20:40; 45:1, 6, 7, 13. Cf. the Mishnah tractate Terumot.

¹¹ Exod 23:19 (Hebrew reshith; commented on by the tractate Bikkurim); Lev 2:12; 23:10; Num 15:20 (applications in tractate Ἰαλλη); 18:12; Deut 18:4; 26:2, 10; 33:21 (Gad “appropriated the firstfruits; he saw that a ruler’s portion was reserved for himself”); 1Sam 2:29, “making yourselves fat with the best (the firstfruits) of all the offerings of my people”); 2Chr 31:5; Ezek 44:30. Cf. Hebrew heleb, “the fat,” meaning “the best” (Num 18:12, 29-32). In Ps 78:51; 105:36, the firstborn is “the firstfruits of vigor.”

¹² Josephus, War 5.21: the party of Eleazar kept the sacred firstfruits (τὰς ἰ—εράς ἀπαρχάς); Ant. 7.378: out of his own purse (τῆς ἰ—δίας ἀπαρχῆς) Solomon gives 3,000 talents of gold to the Temple; so also Ptolemy sends offerings as ἀπαρχάς for the Temple (Ant. 12.50), and Caesar Augustus and Agrippa allow the Jews to carry their ἀπαρχάς to Jerusalem as an act of piety toward God (εὐσεβείας ἔνεκα, Ant. 16.172). Otherwise, if the firstfruits are given in homage to God, the source of plenty (Ant. 3.250), they provide a living for the priests and assure their office (Ant. 9.273); and the firstfruits of plunder are reserved for God (Ant. 5.26). According to a rabbinic prescription that is not found in Scripture, the firstborn are redeemed for five shekels (Ant. 4.71; cf. the tractate sheqalim).

¹³ The treasures kept in the temples were made up of money “coming from gifts, fines, ἀπαρχαί, property revenues, tithes of booty, confiscated goods” (R. Bogaert, Banques et banquiers, p. 91). The state bank, at Delos, paid an annual contribution—ἀπαρχή—of 200 drachmas to the god Apollo (IG 22 2336, lines 179 and 267; cf. Bogaert, Banques, 185, 187, 191, 213, 238). Cf. IG 2.985 (first century BC).

¹⁴ Philo considered that Abel offered firstfruits not only of the firstborn, but also of their fat (Sacr. Abel and Cain 136), while Cain kept for himself the firstfruits of his farming labors and did not present his produce to God until much later (Sacr. Abel and Cain 72; Conf. Tongues 124).

¹⁵ Cf. Prelim. Stud. 98: “It is right to offer the firstfruits (of all the faculties related to reason) to God, the giver of fertile intelligence”; Dreams 2.272. Collaborating in the making of the bronze basin, the women “offered their mirrors as most worthy firstfruits of their wisdom, of their chastity in marriage, and, in sum, of the beauty of their souls” (Moses 2.137); “firstfruits always keep the remembrance of God present” (Spec. Laws 1.133), “thanksgiving memorial” (Moses 1.317); Virtues 159. The feast of the sacred sheaf, the firstfruits of the grain, is an act of gratitude (Spec. Laws 2.167, 171, 175), because the levy is made on an abundant harvest that is a gift and favor from God (Spec. Laws 2.216, 219).

¹⁶ Cf. Moses 1.252, 254; cf. Sophocles, Trach. 183, 761; Euripides, Phoen. 857; Ps.-Plato, Alc. 2.151 B.

¹⁷ Cf. BGU 30, 1, P. 6815, n. 30 (second-third century): ἡ ἀπαρχὴ Μάκρου —Αντωνίου Διασκόρου.

¹⁸ Jur.Pap., 54.

¹⁹ Cf. T. Reinach, “Un code fiscal de l’Egypte romaine: Le Gnomon de l’Idiologue,” Nouvelle revue historique de droit française et étranger, 3d series, 44 (1920), 31.

²⁰ = Preisigke, SB 7603.

²¹ P.IFAO I, pp. 50–51.

²² P.Oxy. 2199, 19 and 21: τὸ ζητούμενον περὶ τῆς τοῦ παιδίου ἀπαρχῆς. This has to do with an inheritance; cf. the inheritance tax: τὴν ἀπαρχῆς κληρονομίαν ἀπογράψασθαι, UPZ I, p. 162, col. VII, 10; O.Wilck. I, p. 345). P.Catt.: ἡμελήθη ἀπαρχὴν αὐτοῦ ἀποτεθῆναι (Chrest.Mitt., p. 421, n. 372, col. IV, 7); perhaps P.Flor. 57, 81: τοῦ παιδὸς ἀπαρχή: but the meaning is obscure (cf. the γραφὴ παίδων in Chrest.Wilck., p. 168, n. 143, 81). The heir, who had to make known his right and the value of his inheritance within a set period of time, did not actually inherit until paying the tax (P.Amh. 2, 72). Cf. S. L. Wallace, Taxation in Egypt from Augustine to Diocletian (Princeton Univ. Studies in Papyrology 2, 1938), p. 234.

²³ G. Vitelli, et al., eds., Pubblicazioni della Società italiana: Papiri greci et latini (=PSI) 1067, 11.

²⁴ P.Tebt. 316, 10 (AD 99); PSI 1225, 16: χρηματίζειν ἡμι—ν τελοῦσι τὰ πρὸς τὴν ἀπαρχὴν καὶ ε—φηβείαν τοῦ προγεγραμμένου μου υι—οῦ Μηνοδώρου (second century AD); P.Ant. 37, 4: τάσσεσθαι ἀπαρχὴν (cf. τάξασθαι, Berichtigungsliste 4, 2). Cf. Wallace, Taxation in Egypt, 277.

²⁵ Cf. the oikogeneia of PSI 690, 14 (first-second century): Flavius Longus paid the ἀπαρχή of the slave Juliana Philotera: ε—τάξατο τῆς ὑπερθέσμου ε—βδομαίας ἡμέρας θεα—ς Βερνίκης Εὐεργέτιδος τὴν καθήκουσαν ἀπαρχὴν (= SB 6995–96); Pap.Lugd.Bat. VI, 33, 8: “the tax whereby I paid my son’s ἀπαρχή” (= SB 7602, 8).

²⁶ PSI 464, 7.

²⁷ P.Mert. 5, 28: “He paid to the god Soter the ἀπαρχή according to the custom in violation of my contract of sale, which is in the public archives” (second century BC).

²⁸ BGU 1150, 11 (from 19 BC), with the observations of O. Gradenwitz, Berliner philologische Wochenschrift 34 (1914), col. 134–135.

²⁹ Ostraca from the year AD 85, C.Pap.Jud. 183a. On the —Ιουδαίων τέλεσμα, cf. Wallace, Taxation in Egypt, 170–176.

³⁰ Εἰς τὸ εἶναι ἡμαρσ ἀπαρχὴν τινα τῶν αὐτοῦ κτισμάτων. Cf. Carl-Martin Edsman, “Schöpferwille und Geburt Jac 1, 18: Eine Studie zur altchristlichen Kosmologie,” ZNW 38 (1939), 11–44; L. Elliott-Binns, “James 1.18: Creation or Redemption?” NTS 3 (1956–1957), 148–161. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, pp. 89–91.

³¹ “A l’avant-garde de trépassés,” the translation of J. Héring, La Première Epître de saint Paul aux Corinthiens, 2d ed., p. 138.

³² Cf. 1Clem. 42.4—“The apostles preached in the countryside and in the cities and established their firstfruits” (καθίστανον τὰς ἀπαρχὰς αὐτῶν).

³³ C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, p. 557, n. 2; p. 835, n. 4, 5; R. Devine, “The Virgin Followers of the Lamb (Apoc. 14, 4),” Scr 16, 1964, pp. 1–5; C. H. Lindijer, “Die Jungfrauen in der Offenbarung des Johannes XIV 4,” Studies in John, Presented to Professor Dr. J. N. Sevenster on the Occasion of His Seventieth Birthday, No_TSup 24, Leiden, 1970, pp. 124–142.

³⁴ E. B. Allo, L’Apocalypse, 3d ed., Paris, 1933, p. 217. Cf. Philo, Spec. Laws 2.134: “The firstfruits of those who were of the first rank among our children were offered to God the Savior”; Good Man Free 15: “It is good that all young people of all lands dedicate the firstfruits of the springtime of their age to the sole pursuit with which it is good to pass both youth and old age.”

³⁵ H. S. Jones (“—Απαρχὴ πνεύματος,” JTS 23, 1922, 282–283) precisely situated this expression in the language of the papyri, giving ἀπαρχή its technical sense of a birth certificate of a free person; as the οἰκογένεια was the birth certificate of a slave.

³⁶ M.-J. Lagrange, Saint Paul: Epître aux Romains, p. 279.

³⁷ Cf. J. de Fraine, Adam et son lignage: Etudes sur la notion de “personnalité corporative” dans la Bible, Museum Lessianum, Section Biblique 2, Bruges, 1959.

³⁸ Cf. b. Ter. 2.1: “A levy is not placed on pure produce to liberate the impure; but if it has been done, it is valid. . . . According to R. Eliezer, one can levy the pure for the impure.” Cf. 1QS 3.4—“He shall not be cleansed by purifying waters,” with the commentary of J. Schmitt, “La Pureté sacerdotale d’après 1QS 3, 4–9,” RSR 33, 1970, 214–224.

ἀπάτη

apate, deception, trickery, pleasure

apate, S 539; TDNT 1.385; EDNT 1.117; NIDNTT 2.457–459; MM 54; L&N 31.12; BAGD 82

The classical meaning “deception, seduction, trickery” is the meaning in the LXX, which has only four occurrences, all in Jdt.¹ It is the only meaning in St. Paul,² and in the papyri, from the law of Cyrene in the second-third century BC³ and an imperial rescript of the second century⁴ to the quasi-stereotyped formula reproduced in various forms in the sixth and seventh centuries: “I confess without any guile or fear or force or deceit or compulsion” (homologo dica dolou kai phobou kai bias kai apates kai anankes pases).⁵

But in 1903, A. Deissmann announced another meaning of the term: “pleasure, delight.”⁶ In 1911, J. Rouffiac mentioned that several Italia manuscripts (codd. Corbeiensis, Bobbiensis) translate apate with delectationes, voluptas, delectamentum, and he located this sense in I.Priene 113, 64 (84 BC): Euergetes Zosimus gave a banquet for the city, hired artists, “did not only that which was pleasant, but desiring moreover to delight the spectators, (he hired [a flute-player?] and a pantomime).”⁷ Finally, with immense epigraphical erudition, L. Robert showed that in the popular Hellenistic language apate was often synonymous with hedone, tryphe, terpsis (a species of sensual pleasure, pleasure in spectacles). Apart from the Latin-Greek glossaries of the third century, he cites the Lexeis Attikon kai Hellenon kata stoicheion of the lexicographer Moeris in the second century: “apate: deceit among the Attics; pleasure among the Greeks.”⁸ The examples are numerous, from Polybius 2.56.12: tragedy is modeled on reality “for the pleasure of the spectators”; to 4.20.5: music was not brought to humans as a charlatan’s pleasure (or illusion?); to Dio Chrysostom, Or. 32.4–5: spectacles are a delight for the city (cf. 4.114). According to Artemidorus of Ephesus, dreaming about peaches, apricots, plums, and cherries “signifies pleasures and sensual delights if these are seasonable.”⁹

These attestations provide a framework for translating he apate tou ploutou in the explanation of the parable of the sower (Matt 13:22; Mark 4:19). Commentators usually say “the seductions of wealth stifle the word.” But we should probably follow M. J. Lagrange, who in his commentary on St. Mark relies on A. Deissmann and translates “the pleasures of wealth.” The parallel in Luke 8:14 is almost conclusive: hedonai tou biou.¹⁰

The two meanings are brought together in Strabo 11.2.10, which explains the epithet Apatouros given to the Aphrodite of Phanagoria:

Attacked by giants, “she called on Heracles for help and hid him in a cave, then, receiving each of the giants in turn in her home, she turned them over one at a time to Heracles to be killed, thanks to this ruse whereby she served as bait, ex apates.”¹¹

¹ Jdt 9:10, 13; 16:8. In 9:3, the text is difficult because of a play on words and corruption of the manuscripts; it could mean that the bed of the rulers, “stained with their deception” or “their sensual pleasure,” was soaked with blood. In Eccl 9:6, ἀγάπη should be read in place of ἀπάτη; in 4Macc 18:8—ἀπάτης ὄφις (the devil). The verb ἀπατα—ν occurs very often in the OT: in Gen 3:13, Eve is duped by the serpent (cf. 1Tim 2:14), and Hezekiah misleads the people (2Kgs 18:32; cf. 2Chr 32:11, 15; Isa 36:14, 18; 37:10). But in both occurrences in Sir (14:16; 30:23; in the latter text, ἀπάτα must be read in place of ἀγαπα—), the verb surely has the sense of “rejoice”—“delight your soul.” In the NT, cf. Eph 5:6; Jas 1:26.

² 2Thess 2:10—the Antichrist is known for all sorts of evil deceptions = numerous seductions; Col 2:8; philosophy is an illusion, a hollow deceit; Eph 4:22—the old man is corrupted by deceitful lusts. According to Heb 3:13, sin is a seducer that does not keep its promises, that deceives, and it is sensible to speak of the ἀπάτη τῆς ἀμαρτίας (on this verse, cf. W. L. Lorimar, in NTS, vol. 12, 1966, pp. 390–391). In 2Pet 2:13, ἀγάπαις must be read rather than ἀπάταις (cf. E. M. Paperrousaz, “Le Testament de Moïse,” in Sem, vol. 19, p. 65).

³ SB 9949, 11: μηθενὶ δόλω τινὶ ἢ ἀπάτη. The word is attested in P.Tebt. 801, 29 (142–141 BC), which is mutilated.

⁴ P.Oxy. 1020, 8: τὸν ἀγω—να τῆς ἀπάτης ὁ ἡγούμενος τοῦ ἔθνους ε—κδικήσει; cf. P.Princ. 119, 40: τὴν ε—ξ ἀπάτης εὐρήκασιν (a petition of the fourth century AD).

⁵ C.P.Herm. 31, 7; 32, 23; P.Michael. 40, 50; 41, 67; 45, 60; 52, 28; 55, 10; Stud.Pal. XX, 269, 5; SB 8987, 10; 8988, 51; 9463, 3; cf. P.Ross.Georg. III, 37, 15: χωρὶς ἀπάτης.

⁶ A. Deissmann, “Hellenisierung des semitischen Monotheismus,” in NJahrb., 1903, p. 165. If we confined ourselves to biblical semantics, we could explain the evolution beginning with certain uses of ἀπάτη—ἀπατα—ν: “seduce a woman” (Exod 22:16; Judg 14:15; 16:5; Sus 56; Jdt 12:16). In Philo, Joseph 56, the γυναικω—ν ἀπάτας could just as well be the deceptions as the pleasures of women (cf. Creation 165; Sacr. Abel and Cain 26; Good Man Free 151: ἔρωτος ἀπάτης). In any event, Alleg. Interp. 3.64 sets forward the principle: πα—σα οὖν ἀπάτη οἰ—κειοτάτη ἡδονῆ! According to Drunkenness 217, the method of preparation and the form of pastries “are made not only for the pleasure of taste, but also for that of the eyes.”

⁷ [French] translation of J. Rouffiac, Caractères du grec, p. 38.

⁸ —Ἀπάτη· ἡ πλάνη παῖ —Αττικοί—ς . . . ἡ τέρψις παῖ Ἑλλησιν. The edition of J. Pierson, 1759, p. 65; cf. L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 11, Paris, 1960, pp. 5–15; Oepke, in TDNT, vol. 1, p. 385.

⁹ Artemidorus Daldianus, Onir. 1.73: προσκαίρους ἡδονὰς καὶ ἀπάτας σημαίνει. Cf. Plutarch, Sol. 21.4: Solon put on the same level “deception (ἀπάτην), constraint, sensual pleasure (ἡδονήν), suffering.” —Ἀπάτη is attested several times as a proper name of a woman (P.Petr. III, 11, 21) or a place (BGU 1665, 6); does it suggest deception or delight?

¹⁰ J. Dupont, “La Parabole du Semeur dans la version de Luc,” in Arophoreta: Festschrift für E. Haenchen, Berlin, 1964, pp. 97–108; cf. H. J. Cadbury, The Making of Luke-Acts, London, 1958, p. 179.

¹¹ Cf. W. Kastner, “ἀπάτη,” in MusHelv, 1977, pp. 199–202.

ἀπελπίζω

apelpizo, to hope for something in return

apelpizo, S 560; TDNT 2.533–534; EDNT 1.437–441; NIDNTT 2.238, 241; MM 56–57; L&N 30.54; BAGD 83–84

In the Sermon on the Mount, the Lord, wishing to emphasize the disinterested quality of agape, commanded “Love your enemies, do good, and lend meden apelpizontes.”¹ If this were a matter of making interest-free loans, it would be an illustration of the gratuitousness of benevolence (agathopoieo), not as a profitable financial operation for the lender, even at the lowest rates, but as a brotherly service.² But if the righteous person lent money to his countrymen without charging interest,³ debtors often abused his generosity (cf. Sir 29:1–7), so that the lender, defrauded of his capital, was tempted to refuse to make new advances. Hence the exhortation in Matt 5:42—“Do not turn away from one who wants to borrow”; note the continued action implied by the present imperative danizete —“lend habitually” (Luke 6:35)—and the clear instruction meden apelpizontes —“without expecting anything in return.” Lend with the willingness never to be repaid.

But this translation, which is an interpretation—the difficulty is well known⁴—does not match the unique and well-attested meaning of apelpizo: not to hope that something will happen, to despair.⁵ Furthermore, it seems to contradict the motive given later in the verse for heeding the exhortation: “and your recompense will be great.” Some have suggested a mistake in the text,⁶ or else exploited the reading of certain manuscripts (a, Ξ, Π 489) supported by the Syriac versions (medena apelpizontes) taking the neuter plural medena as referring to rebuffed would-be borrowers, “not forcing anyone to despair.”⁷ But this reading is clearly a dittography (meden a-apelpizontes). Finally, one could follow the Old Latin, nihil desperantes, not despairing of someday recovering your capital or of being repaid a hundredfold by God (cf. the thought in Eccl 11:1—the sea returns that which is given it). But M. J. Lagrange rightly rebels against the meaning, which he says is “absolutely repugnant in this heroic context” (RB, 1895, p. 196).

So we must follow the Clementine Vulgate (nihil inde sperantes), which takes the verb in the sense clearly demanded by the context,⁸ specifying the practical consequences of agape in the abrupt manner of Semitic formulations. Jesus is not entering the spheres of business or of the virtues of prudence or justice. He is pointing out the nature of Christian love: complete forgetfulness of oneself and absolute gratuitousness. “Lend without expecting anything in return.”⁹

¹ Luke 6:35. Hebrew has several terms for lending. The verb lawâh, “borrow” (in the qal), “lend” (in the hiphil; LXX δανείζειν, κίχρα—v); the verb nashâ, “lend, charge interest,” and in the hiphil “oppress” (foenerari, foenum imponere); or the noun mashsheh, “usury, interest.” The verb nashak, “bite, oppress, exact interest,” which yielded neshek, one of the proper names for usury (in the versions: τόκος and usura). From the verb rabâh, “increase, multiply,” are derived two other kinds of interest, marbit and tarbit (πλεονασμός, superabundantia).

² Exod 22:25; Lev 25:46-47; Deut 23:19-20 require lending to a fellow-countryman without charging interest (cf. C. van Leeuwen. Le développement du sens social en Israël avant l'ère chrétienne, Assen, 1955, pp. 42–58). “The one who practices mercy lends to his neighbor” (Sir 29:1); “Happy is the man who is compassionate and lends” (Ps 112:5). The ungodly “lends today and insists on collecting tomorrow” (Sir 20:15). On loans in the OT, cf. J. Hejcl, “Das alttestamentliche Zinsverbot im Lichte der ethnologischen Jurisprudenz,” in BZ, vol. 12, 4, Fribourg, 1907; C. Spicq, Les Péchés d'injustice, Paris, 1935, vol. 2, pp. 444–450 (bibliography, pp. 488ff.); S. Stein, “The Laws on Interest in the Old Testament,” in JTS, 1953, pp. 161–170; R. North, Sociology of the Biblical Jubilee, Rome 1954, pp. 176–190; E. Neufeld, “The Rate of Interest and the Text of Nehemiah V, 11,” in JQR, 1954, pp. 194–204; idem, “The Prohibitions against Loans at Interest in Ancient Hebrew Laws,” in HUCA, 26, 1955, pp. 355–412; E. Szlechter, “Le Prêt dans l’Ancien Testament et dans les codes mésopotamiens d’avant Hammourabi,” in La Bible et l’orient, Paris, 1953, pp. 16–25; R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel, vol. 1, p. 170; H. A. Rupprecht, Untersuchungen zum Darlehen im Recht der graeco-ägyptischen Papyri der Ptoläerzeit, Munich, 1967; R. P. Maloney, “Usury in Greek, Roman and Rabbinic Thought,” in Traditio, 1971, pp. 79–109; P. W. Pestman, “Loans Bearing No Interest?” in JJP, 1971, pp. 7–29; B. Menu, “Le Prêt en droit égyptien,” in Etudes sur l’Égypte et le Soudan anciens, Lille-Paris, 1973, pp. 59–141.

³ Ps 15:5; Ezek 18:17; cf. ἄτοκος: P.Fouad 44, 19, “Lucius will repay the loan to Didymus without interest” (28 August 44); P.Rein. 31, 10: “Dionysos will return this grain without interest to Hermias” (109 BC); P.Amh. 50, 10; P.Ross.Georg. II, 6, 21; P.Tebt. 342, 30; C.Pap.Jud. 143, 25.

⁴ The best discussion is that of M. Lagrange, Luc, cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 1, p.111.

⁵ God “the Savior of those who despair” (Jdt 9:11); “those who are without hope among humans” (Isa 29:19); “If you have drawn the sword against a friend, do not despair; a return is possible” (Sir 22:21); “The one who has revealed the secrets (of his friend) can hope no more” (Sir 27:21); Lucillius “Diaphantus who took away all hope from others” (Anth. Pal. 11.114). In Josephus, it is always a matter of giving up hope of surviving (War 1.462), of receiving pardon (4.193; 5.354), the pity of the Romans (6.368), security (4.397); thus it means renouncing any future good, given present circumstances. Likewise Polybius, “Hannibal despaired of his situation” (1.19.12) and Diodorus Siculus: “These monsters had made them despair of saving their lives” (17.106.7; cf. 19.50). Unknown in Philo, this verb, attested for the first time by Hyperides 5.35, is also found in a number of inscriptions (cf. R. Bultmann, in TDNT, vol. 2, pp. 533–544), is used in Galen for illnesses without hope of cure, desperate cases, and—with negation—for not doubting, having confidence (cf. W. K. Hobart, Medical Language, pp. 118–119); finally, in two papyri (P.Cair.Zen. 59642, 4, mutilated; BGU 1844, 13, from AD 130) and an ostrakon from 260 BC (SB 8266, 10b and 20). On the Theban stele on which is inscribed the honorific decree for the general Callimachus in 42 BC, τοι—ς ἀπελπίζουσιν refers to the Egyptians reduced to a critical state by the insufficient rise in the Nile (Dittenberger, Or. 194, 19 = SB 8334), but this restored verb was not retained by R. Hutmacher, Ehrendekret, p. 22.

⁶ —Αντελπίζοντες. T. Reinach, “Mutuum date, nihil inde sperantes,” in REG, 1894, p. 52; the restoration refused by M. J. Lagrange, in RB, 1895, p. 116. The variant ἀπηλπικότες (D, G, Lat., Peshitta, read ἀπηλγηκότες) at Eph 4:19 is too poorly attested to be retained.

⁷ F. Field, Notes on the Translation, p. 59.

⁸ Opposition to παρ ὧν ε—λπίζετε λαβει—ν (verse 34); cf. E. Klostermann, Das Lukas-Evangelium, 2d ed., Tübingen, 1929, p. 82, who cites the parallel text of Exod. Rab. 31 (91c): “The one who lends money without demanding interest, God esteems this so highly in him that it is as if he had kept all the commandments.” “The Gentiles lend in hope of a return; lend without hoping for a return, without hoping to receive. —Απελπίζω never has this meaning, it is true, but it could have been invented by Luke as a parallel to ἀπολανβάνειν, which also has both senses, receiving and giving up. In the Middle Ages this verse was understood to refer to lending for interest, but there is no exegetical tradition for that meaning. . . . Merely to forego interest would be hardly be to live up to the ideal of total renunciation that is set forth in this passage. This is not an order, it is a counsel. The objection that lending is then tantamount to giving misses a fine distinction. Often a person who borrows would be embarrassed to accept a gift. So one lends to him, being open to receiving repayment if it is offered, but also with a willingness sometimes to sacrifice the whole amount, nihil sperantes, μηδὲν ε—λπίζοντες ἀπολαβει—ν (Field)” (M. J. Lagrange, RB, 1895, pp. 196–197).

⁹ What follows in the verse—καὶ ἔσται ὁ μισθὸς ὑμῶν—πολύς—agrees with the supernatural lex talionis operative everywhere in the Synoptics: whatever is sacrificed on earth is compensated a hundredfold in supernatural value. Is it permissible to cite the discourse of Nero to the Corinthians in 67: “From my greatness of heart one may have all hope, παρὰ τῆς ε—μῆς μεγαλοφροσύνης ἀνέλπιστον” (Dittenberger, Syl. 814,11)?

ἀπέραντος

aperantos, endless, interminable, vain

aperantos, S 562; EDNT 1.120; L&N 61.19; BAGD 84

The heterodox Ephesians are fond of “fables and endless genealogies,” i.e., never completed and inconsequential (1Tim 1:4). The adjective aperantos (NT hapax), unknown in the papyri (cf. P. Tebt. 847, 21, aperamenou) has these two connotations.¹ But in the first century it took on a technical rhetorical significance in the Stoic vocabulary, qualifying “reasonings that do not result in proof, arguments that do not conclude,”² sterile conversations (Josephus, Ant. 17.131). Cicero complains to the son of Amyntas, an intolerable babbler (aperantologias aedous, Att. 12.9; cf. Strabo 13.1.41). One of the best parallels is in the satirical poet Timon of Phlius: the philosophers “dispute endlessly [and vainly] (apeirita derioontes) in the aviary of the muses [meaning the Museum of Alexandria] . . . until these table speakers are unburdened of their flow of words [literally, logodiarrhea]” (Athenaeus 1.22*d*). The other is in Philo: the happiness of the skeptics rides entirely upon the endless and fruitless (aperanto kai anenyto) criticism of names and words (Prelim. Stud. 53). Minds of this sort know neither measure nor limit in their discourse, they speak indiscriminately, bringing chaos and confusion in all matters, mixing the true and the false, the sacred and the profane. Prattlers of this type, already exposed at Alexandria,³ have taken up exegesis and theology at Ephesus and pose a threat to the faith (cf. Titus 3:9).

¹ Without limit, infinite. Ep. Arist. 156: an infinity of appetudes; Polybius 1.57.3: the historian cannot enumerate an infinity of events; Philo (Prelim. Stud. 53) expressing his disdain for tricks of logic: “the endless and pointless minute examination of nouns and verbs”; Corp. Herm. 1.11.4: εἰ—ς ἀπέραντον τέλος; without issue, inextricable, without effect, without result (Job 36:26—the number of God’s years is endless and unfathomable); Josephus, Ant. 17.131: Varus realizing that the affair was endless and without effect; 1Clem. 20.8—the ocean impassable by men; Corp. Herm. 9.8: “The Good is unsurpassable, limitless, and endless, ἀδιάβατον γὰρ τὸ ἀγαθὸν καὶ ἀπέραντον καὶ ἀτελές.”

² Λόγοι ἀπέραντοι (Philodemus of Gadara, Ir., p. 97; cf. Diogenes Laertius 7.78; Strabo 2.4.8).

³ Philo, Abraham 20: πρὸς ἄμετρον καὶ ἀπέραντον καὶ ἄκριτον διήγησιν.

ἀπερισπᾶστος

aperispastos, without hindrance or distraction

aperispastos, S 563; EDNT 1.120; MM 57; L&N 30.33; BAGD 84

The Corinthians are exhorted to virginity, which would firmly position them near the Lord, without distraction (euparedron to Kyrio aperispastos, 1Cor 7:35). This adverb is a biblical hapax and is relatively rare in the Hellenistic period.¹ Apart from errors, it is found only twice in the papyri,² but its meaning is clear. Derived from perispao, “pull from another direction, pull against,” aperispastos means “without hindrance, without distraction”; which agrees with the meaning of the adjective aperispastos, “not drawn hither and thither,” known in the OT³ and very common in our papyri. The oldest attestation is from the third century BC,⁴ and it is multiplied in the first and second centuries AD, so that it could be said that the word becomes common coinage.⁵ Now a general orders, “see to it that he is left in peace until he has finished his sowing” (P.Rein. 18, 40; 12 October 108 BC); now the weavers of Philadelphia remark that they “have until now been left in peace to practice our trade” and ask not to be disturbed and to remain exempt from other public services (P.Phil. 10, 16; from AD 139); or someone requires “that the carrier not be bothered” (ho diagon aperispastos estai, UPZ 226, 6). In AD 46, 48, and 52 the homologia aperispastou is a guarantee of immunity to any constraint, penalty, or disagreement that a contracting party might incur.⁶

In all these occurrences, the adjective emphasized the absence of troubles, bothers, inconveniences, freedom from worries; in other literary texts, the focus is on steadiness, attention, and refusal of any digression.⁷ All of these nuances converge perfectly in the aperispastos of the virgins in 1Cor 7:15, who are spared the perispasmoi of the married life.⁸ With good reason, the exegetes bring in Luke 10:38-42, where Mary of Bethany is seated, at rest, at the feet of the Lord,⁹ all her attention focused on him; while Martha busies herself here and there (periespato), pulled between divergent concerns. Thus virginity allows exclusive concentration on God.¹⁰

¹ Polybius 2.20.10: When the Romans had conquered the Gauls, nothing remained to distract them from the war against Pyrrhus; 4.18.6: They could not run without hindrance against those who were rushing through the gate; Epictetus 1.29.59: in contemplation (θεωρει—ν), “one must settle in well, not letting oneself be distracted . . . be very attentive” (cf. 3.22.69: The Cynic who remains free of all that could distract him, ἀπερίσπαστον εἶναι); cf. J. Weiss, Der erste Korintherbrief, 10th ed., Göttingen, 1925, p. 205.

² P.Tebt. 895, 57 (from 175 BC): ἀπερισπάστως γενέσθαι; D. Foraboschi, L'Archivio de Kronion, Milan, 1971, n. 38, 16: παρέξομεν δὲ τὸν Σασω—πιν ἀπαρανοχλήτως καὶ ἀνισπράκτως καὶ ἀπερισπάστως κατὰ πάντα τρόπον; cf. the decree of Euergetes II in 124 BC, ἀπερισπάστους γεννηθέντας (P.Tebt. 700, 36; taken up again in C.Ord.Ptol. 50, 15); P.Grenf. 1, n. 11, col. II, 4: τούτου δὲ γενομένου καὶ ἀπερίσπαστος ὢν (discussion concerning a field, from 157 BC); Polybius 2.67.7: “Freed by this maneuver (ἀπερίσπαστον γινόμενον), the division of the Illyrians . . . threw themselves valiantly against the enemy.”

³ Sir 41:1—“O death, how bitter is the memory of you . . . to the man who has no cares—ἀνδρὶ ἀπερισπάστῳ—and is successful at everything”; Wis 16:11—“For fear lest they become careless of your benefits.”

⁴ BGU 1243, 13. In the second and third centuries BC, cf. 1057, 22; 1756, 5: παρασχοῦσάυτους ἀπερισπάστους; UPZ 145, 23. Cf. Diodorus Siculus 17.9.4: “Alexander would like to have a free hand (ἀπερίσπαστον ἔχειν) in the war against the Persians.”

⁵ So much so that T. Nägeli (Wortschatz, p. 30) mentions this word as one of those which identify St. Paul as an authentic Hellenist.

⁶ P.Mich. V, 238, 35 and 177; 353, 4; 354, 19; cf. P.Oxy. 286, 17 (from AD 82): ὅπως παρέχωνται ἡμα—ς ἀπερισπάστους καὶ ἀπαρενοχλήτους ὑπὲρ προκειμένης ὀφειλῆς καὶ ἀποδώσειν ταῦτα = so that he can be free from any responsibility or trouble in connection with the aforementioned debt and may repay it; 898, 15 (AD 123), which the editors translate [into English]: “to mortgage all my property in the Oasis in return for a deed of release received from Dioscorus.” The editors further explain γράμματα ἀπερισπάστου as “a deed of indemnification.” Cf. A. Berger, Die Strafklauseln in den Papyrusurkunden, 2d ed., Aalen, 1965, pp. 203ff.

⁷ Polybius 4.32.6: “The Lacedaemonians, without allowing themselves to be distracted, set out to harm them”; Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Th. 9: “In historical writing, everything should be connected and contribute to unity, ἀπερίσταστον εἶναι.” This nuance of uninterruptedness is that of Plutarch, Arist. 5.3: “The authority of Miltiades was reinforced by the continuity of his command.”

⁸ Cf. Hierocles the Stoic, Marriage, in Stobaeus, Flor. 67.22.24 (vol. 4, p. 504).

⁹ Παρακαθεσθει—σα, cf. εὐπάρεδρον—perhaps a neologism coined by St. Paul—to be well situated near someone; the meaning is someone “with an attentive demeanor toward a venerable or sacred object” (E. B. Allo, Première Epître aux Corinthiens, p.184).

¹⁰ Cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, pp. 564–565; L. Legrand, La Virginité dans la Bible, Paris, 1964, pp. 83ff.

ἀπέχω

apecho, to hold, collect, acknowledge receipt of payment in full; remain distant; abstain

apecho, S 568; TDNT 2.828; EDNT 1.120–121; MM 57–58; L&N 57.137, 59.47, 85.16, 90.67; BDF §§ 129, 180(3), 180(5), 308, 322; BAGD 84–85; ND 6.3

This verb, which has several very different meanings, is a compound of echo, “to have,” which expresses a relationship of possession: “to hold, keep,” hence “collect.” Thus after Asclepius has healed Demodike, Akeson’s wife, Akeson writes on a tablet, “You have received the debt of Akeson.”¹ According to Marcus Aurelius 9.42.12–13, when a person does something good, it is enough to have acted in accord with nature; no reward is to be sought (misthon zeteis) any more than that the eye should receive a reward (apechei to idion) for seeing. In fulfilling its role, it possesses that which belongs to it (echei to heautou).

Hence the commercial meaning of apecho, “acknowledge receipt of payment in full,”² which is copiously attested in the papyri and is highlighted by A. Deissmann:³ to have something from someone’s hand is to receive one’s due. There are two types of receipts: some note the act of a person who has paid, with the verb in the perfect (for the abiding result of the action); others express the acknowledgment of the one who receives, with the verb in the present (echo, “I have”; apecho, “I have my due”).⁴ The oldest papyrological attestation of the verb is from 276 BC: homologeîn apechein K . . . (P.Hib. 97, 5; republished as P.Yale 27; cf. P.Alex. 9, 10). Usually it is specified that the “price” (ten timen) of some land, a house, an ass, etc., has been received: “C. Anthistius Valens has received the price of these lands (to auton teimas apeschekenai) as stipulated in the papers” (P.Phil. 11, 13); “Sarapion acknowledges having received from the buyer the full price agreed upon, amounting to fifty-four thousand drachmas.”⁵ Also quite often, however, only the sum of money is mentioned: “I have received the prescribed drachmas of silver”;⁶ “I acknowledge (having from you) twelve staters and two denarii which I received (apeschon) and which were charged to my account, and which I will repay” (P.Mur. 114, 12); sometimes obols (P.Genova 88, 2), as with this new officer (principalis) who has drawn some money (chalkon apeschon) and would have liked to send a gift to his mother (P.Mich. 465, 7). Sometimes a dowry is in question (pherne, P.Fam.Tebt. 13, 38; P.Mil.Vogl. 185, 21, 36), sometimes expenditures (dapanemata, P.Fouad 64, 5; P.Hamb. 69, 6), artabai of grain,⁷ of straw (SB 9782, 3), a cargo or load,⁸ food⁹ and fruit (karpon, BGU 1587, 7); on occasion, “what is due to me.”¹⁰ A rental or lease that is paid in kind (to ekphorion)¹¹ and a lease paid in cash (phoros)¹² are mentioned either together or separately; but for the latter it is often specified that it is a loan or rent (misthosis).¹³ In contracts for service, receipt of the agreed-upon wage is acknowledged (apeschekenai . . . to symphonethen salarion, P.Harr. 64, 25; SB 10205, 16). In AD 24, “He acknowledges . . . receiving from him the price and the wages” (homologeï . . . apeschekenai par’ autou ten timen kai tous misthous, P.Mich. 337, 7); in the second century, “I have received the wage from Phaophi” (apecho de ton tou Phaophi misthon, BGU 1647, 13; cf. 1663, 1, 16; P.Oxy. 1992, 19).

These usages shed light on Matt 6:2, 5, 16, where—with respect of almsgiving, prayer, and fasting—the Lord denounces the ostentation of the hypocrites who seek to be seen and praised by other people. He repeats three times, “Truly, I tell you, they have received their reward” (apechousin ton misthon auton). The verb in the present indicative means that these apparently pious people have nothing more to expect in the beyond. They already have now that which is due them. They have in hand the receipt for what they have supplied . . . so much wind! The irony is plain. In the same sense, the rich are told in Luke 6:24, apechete ten paraklesin hymon; they have had their portion of joy on earth and must not expect “consolation” in heaven! In contrast, Philemon, whose runaway slave was temporarily separated from him (echoristhe), will recover him (apeches) for good in heaven as a brother for eternity (Phlm 15). The same bookkeeping nuance appears in Phil 4:18, in a section where the apostle uses several expressions borrowed from the language of business.¹⁴ He acknowledges receiving the help sent by the Philippians: “I have received everything and more than enough” (apecho de panta kai perisseuo); “through Epaphroditus, I received what you sent” (dexamenos . . . ta par’ hymon). We could translate, “I give a receipt for everything, and I have plenty.”¹⁵

The verbal prefix ap- retains its full force when apecho means “be distant,” first of all in a geographical sense: “Jesus was not far from the house” (Luke 7:6); the prodigal son was still far from his father (15:20); Emmaus is “a town about sixty stadia away from Jerusalem” (apechousan stadious hexekonta, 24:13). The usage is classical¹⁶ and is particularly common in the LXX: Joseph’s brothers, having left the city, “had not gone far” (Hebrew hiphil of rahaq, Gen 44:4); “They were far from the Sidonians.”¹⁷ It is common even in the papyri.¹⁸ From this spatial meaning comes the definition “remain apart, stay distant,”¹⁹ especially in a figurative and psychological sense: “You are much farther than we from saying things worthy to be believed.”²⁰ This meaning is common in the LXX, where Job begs God to remove his hand (Job 13:21) and Yahweh is far from the wicked (Prov 15:29); as a reproach, “He has removed his heart far from me” (apechei ap’ emou, Isa 29:13; the opposite of engizeï, draw near). It is commanded to “stay away from a man who has the power to put to death” (Sir 9:13), from quarreling (28:8), from violence (Isa 54:14), from the snares that lie in the path of the perverse (Prov 22:5; cf. Wis 2:16). Matt 15:8 quotes Isa 29:13—“This people honors me with their lips, but their heart is far from me” (apechei ap’ emou, cf. Mark 7:6).

To keep one’s distance can be a sign of respect: “When the Lacedaemonians ravaged the rest of Attica, they respected Decelea” (Herodotus 9.13; cf. Thucydides 4.97.3); “certain people do not even respect corpses.”²¹ To be far from means to be unable to touch,²² a negative connotation that can be translated either “hinder” (“In all of these parts [thorax, the head, the back], with their numerous clefts, nothing hinders [ouden apechei] the vessels from carrying various materials”)²³ or “spare.” Aristobulus gives the order to “spare Antigonus if he is unarmed.”²⁴

In the language of NT ethics, apecho (in the middle voice), as in classical Greek,²⁵ always has the nuance of prohibition: “to abstain.” At the Jerusalem Council, St. James proposes, “Let us write to the Gentiles to abstain from the pollution of idols and fornication.”²⁶ St. Paul gives this definition: “This is the will of God, namely, your sanctification, abstaining (apechesthai hymas) from sexual immorality” (1Thess 4:3), from every kind of evil.²⁷ St. Peter writes, “I exhort you to abstain from fleshly desires that make war on the soul.”²⁸ This means not just keeping one’s distance, but refusing to have even the slightest contact; at least this is the ethical nuance given this verb by the LXX²⁹ and especially by Philo: “It is commanded to abstain from wickedness” (Philo, Alleg. Interp. 1.102; cf. 3.104), from injustice (Husbandry 113), offenses (ton hamartematon apechou, Change of Names 47; Virtues 163), from doing evil (Spec. Laws 2.15), “from returning to each other the wrongs that are done us” (Virtues 140; cf. Moses 1.308). Likewise, in Josephus God commands Adam and Eve to abstain from the tree of knowledge (Ant. 1.40), and commands Noah to abstain from shedding blood.³⁰

There remains the difficult task of translating Mark 14:41—“Sleep now and rest. It’s all up (apechei)! The hour has come; the Son of Man will be handed over.”³¹ The Vulgate translates “sufficit,” but what does “it is enough” mean?³² F. Field noted³³ that apart from the [pseudo-] attestation in Hesychius, the translation “sufficit” can be supported only with a text of Ps.-Anacreon (Od. 28.23): the poet, having given his instructions to the painter for a portrait of his mistress, concludes, “Enough! For now I see the young woman herself” (apechei. blepo gar auten). This would perhaps be a sufficient attestation, but it can be corroborated by P. Stras. 4, 19, from the sixth century,³⁴ and by the chorus in Aeschylus, PV 687—“Oh! Oh! Far from me! Enough!” (ea, ea, apeche, pheu)—and probably by other equivalent usages.³⁵ We have to remember that a word may commonly have a meaning in the spoken language that is not attested in written documents. In any event, this meaning is in harmony with “abstain” and “be distant.” We may imagine that the apostles, already asleep, have risen, and that after a few minutes Jesus, referring to all that has happened at Gethsemane, utters the word apechei either meaning “You’ve had it”³⁶ or pointing out that the time has come: “The hour is now.” They would have to leave the garden and prepare to go.

¹ Callimachus, Epigr. 54.1; cf. 50.4: “The old woman, in exchange for the milk of her breasts, received thanks” (ἀπέχει χάριτας); Plutarch, Them. 17.4: “Themistocles reaped the fruit of the labors (τὸν καρπὸν ἀπέχειν) that he had expended for Greece”; Sol. 22.4: τὸν τε μισθὸν ἀπέχει; Mor. 2.124 c; Josephus, War 1.179: “Pompey had not touched the temple gold”; 596: “I receive the price of my impiety” (ἀπέχω τὸ ε—πιτίμιον). A Jewish epitaph, for Horaia and her family: “Stranger, you have all the information about us” (ἀπέχειθ, ὦ ξει—νε, σαφω—θ τὰ ἅπαντα παρῆμω—ν).

² A contract to hire a nurse, in AD 26: “The declarer and her husband and guarantor Petseiris hereby acknowledge receipt (ἀπέχειν) from Paapis of sixty drachmas of silver” (P.Rein. 103, 12); 104, 5; P.Ryl. 588, 9 (78 BC). —Αποχή is the “receipt” (P.Oxy. 91, 25; 296, col. II, 8; P.Princ. 181, 16; P.Mich. 596, 9, etc.); “Draw up the model and the receipt” (τὸν τύπον καὶ τὴν ἀποχὴν, P.IFAO II, n. 9, 4); ἡ ἀποχὴ κυρία καὶ ε—περωτηθεῖς ὠμολόγησα (P.Charite, n. 13, 7; cf. 8, 8 and 18).

³ A. Deissmann, Light, pp. 110–112. Idem, Bible Studies, p. 229.

⁴ O.Bodl. 690–693. C. Préaux, “Aspect verbal et préverbe: L’Usage de ἀπέχω dans les ostraca,” in ChrEg, 1954, pp. 139–146. Presents, according to the place and time, alternate with the aorists ἔσχον, ἔλαβον (O.Bodl. 670–737; O.Wilck. I, pp. 86, 109; II, n. 1081–1090, 1616). This nuance of the aorist has been described as “Aorist-präsens” (A. Thumb, “Prinzipienfragen der Koine-Forschung,” in NJahrb, 1906, pp. 246–263); the added prefix reinforces the aorist (referring to an outcome) to express the perfect idea. With good reason, this aoristic role of the verbal prefix was rejected by E. Mayser (Grammatik, II, 1, pp. 132–133), who places ἀπέχω among the presents with perfect meaning, and by H. Erman (“Die Habe-Quittung bei den Griechen,” in APF, 1901, pp. 77–84) who translates “have in return.” C. Préaux (ChrEg, 1954, p. 146) concludes “thus we cannot call upon the ostraca as testimony to the function of the prefix in expressing aspect with regard to the verb ἀπέχω.” Cf. the index prepared for the Bodleian ostraca by J. Bingen and M. Wittek, O.Bodl. III, p. 245.

⁵ P.Thead. 2, 8; 3, 10: “I have sold a white adult ass for the agreed price of . . . talents of silver, and I have received the aforesaid money”; 12, 24, P.Tebt. 109, 17: this sum “has been received by the above-names parties from Petesuchos, hand to hand, apart from the house” (93 BC); PSI 39, 8;

P.Princ. 19, 7 (second century BC), 149, 9; P.Köln 146, 2 (10 BC); 54, 5 (4 BC); 155, 17 (AD 6); P.Mich. 241, 15 (AD 16); 251, 33 (AD 19); 254, 4 (AD 30/31); 428, 6, 14, 17; 583, 12; 621, 6; P.Fouad 40, 19 (AD 35); P.Athen. 25, 10 (AD 61); P.Alex. 15, col. II, 3: Heracles acknowledges having received the agreed price (first century); BGU 1643, 20; 2036, 21; 2049, 12, 18; 2335, 8 (AD 42/43); Pap.Lugd.Bat. II, 6, 20: ἀπέσχον τὴν τιμὴν; P.Corn. 13, 29; P.Dura 26, 13; P.Erl. 106, 25; P.Harr. 146, 5; P.Cair.Isid. 83, 16; P.Mert. 19, 7; P.Mil.Vogl. 78, 27; 161, col. I, 23; 239, 13; P.Oslo 45, 2; P.Oxy. 2138, 5; 2270, 16; 2951, 25; 3143, 27; P.Wisc. 59, 21; P.Soterichos 5, 40; SB 6001, 6; 6016, 28.

⁶ BGU 2119, 8 (first century); 2338, 15; 2342, 10; P.Fouad 56, 8; P.Athen. 29, 16; P.Fam.Tebt. VI, 3, 17; 7, 6; 9, 10; 10, 7; XIII, 17, 21; P.Cair.Isid. 80, 8; 81, 17; P.Mil. 7, 11, 37 (AD 38); P.Mich. 189, 23; 194, 8 (AD 61); 252, 5 (AD 25/26); 256, 4 (AD 29/30); P.Mil.Vogl. 159, 8; 186, 8, 18; 225, 11; P.Princ. 141, 2 (AD 23); P.Yale 63, 19 (AD 64); P.Soterichos 22, 15; 25, 12; P.Oxy. 3254, 24; SB 7533, 23, 53; 7664, 12; 8053, 4; O.Mich. 138, 4: ἀπέχω παρὰ σου δραχμὰς ζ?; 146, 2. In AD 43: ἀπέχω τὰς τριάκοντα δύο δραχμὰς Ἀρμύσιος (P.IFAO I, n. 17, 2); cf. pieces of meat, 56, 2: ἄ. τὰ δύο κρεάδια.

⁷ P.Mich. 195, 6, 19; P.Oslo 38, 17; P.Princ. 181, 10; P.Mil.Vogl. 158, 11, 27; 226, 9; that which has been sent: ἀπέχομεν παρῶν ὑμῶν—τὰς ε—πισταλείσας (BGU 2269, 5; 2270, 3; 2271, a 5; b 6; c 3; SB 7515, 33, 112, 133; 10889, 4); cf. P.Mich. 531, 2: ε—πει—χον τὴν ε—πιστολήν; P.Oxy. 2964, 5; 2965, 5; 2968, 7.

⁸ Γόμον; O.Brüss.Berl. 67.

⁹ P.Fam.Tebt. 53, A 5: ἀπέσχον παρὰ σοῦ τὰ τροφι—α; B 5: τὰ ὠψώνια; P.Wisc. 68, 12; P.Amst. 41, 53 and 77.

¹⁰ —Απέχω παρὰ σου ἄς ὠφιλές μοι, P.Mil.Vogl. 146, 2; P.Oxy. 2587, 5: ὁμολογῶ—ἀπεσχηκέναι παρὰ σου ἀφ᾽ ὧν μου ὀφείλεις ἀργυρίου; 2834, 2; P.Princ. 34, 14; 35, 3; P.Soterichos 23, 5; BGU 1656, 3; 1657, 4; 2047, 5; Pap.Lugd.Bat. II, 11, 4; P.IFAO III, 22, 4; SB 9201, 8; 9406 b 6; 9485, 2; 10723, 12; cf. 8307, 8, a tomb inscription from Doris: “The one who is good also receives at last an easy death.”

¹¹ BGU 2038, 3: ἀπέχω παρὰ σοῦ τὸ ε—κφόριον; 2039, 2; P.Corn. 41, 13; P.Aberd. 63, 3; 64, 3; P.Cair.Isid. 108, 6; 109, 4, 10; 122, 3; P.Mich. 196, 7, 20; 197, 7; 198, 6; 199, 7; P.Mil.Vogl. 54, 4: ἀπέχομεν παρὰ σου τὰ ε—κφόρια καὶ τοὺς φόρους; 105, 23; 161, col. II, 15; 168, 4; 169, 3; P.Princ. 37, 5, 18; P.Oxy. 2836, 4; P.Wisc. 57, 5; P.Col. VIII, 185, 6;

P.Soterichos 8, 2; 10, 2; 11, 4; 12, 4; SB 7624, 5; 7677, 6; 9175, 3; 9650, 4; 10332, 2.

¹² P.Soterichos 6, 10; 7, 11; P.Warr. 12, 4; P.Yale 67, 15; SB 8014, 5; 9357, 6; 9833, 8; 10423, 2; cf. τὸ γενόμενον τέλος, 7580, 4, 8; 9552, 2, 4; O.Brüss.Berl. 25, 27. On the βαλανευτικόν tax paid to the collectors of the treasury, cf. O.Wilb. 44–48.

¹³ BGU 612, 2; 1647, 13; 1663, 1, 16; 2344, 5; P.Athen. 20, 29; P.Mich. 337, 7; P.Oxy. 1992, 19; P.Corn. 45, 7, 20; P.Gron. 9, 15, 23; P.Princ. 146, 18; SB 6766, 39; 7607, 30.

¹⁴ Phil 4:15—λόγος δόσεως καὶ λήμψεως, “account of giving and receiving”; ε—κοινώησεν, was associated, having a common account in community property.

¹⁵ J. Fleury, “Une société de fait dans l’Eglise apostolique,” in Mélanges P. Meylan, Lausanne, 1963, vol. 2, pp. 41–59. Cf. Gen 43:23—“your money came to me” (Hebrew bō’); Num 32:19—“our inheritance has come to us across the Jordan.”

¹⁶ Herodotus 1.179: “There is another city, about an eight days’ journey away from (ἀπέχουσα) Babylon, called Is”; Thucydides 6.97.1: “Leon is six or seven stadia away from Epipolae”; Xenophon, Cyr. 1.1.3: “Cyrus thought that he was obeyed by peoples who were several days’ journey away”; 3.3.28: “the armies were no longer more than about a parasang away”; Aristotle, Gen. An. 5.1.781a: the more distant objects are, the more distinct they appear; cf. Part. An. 2.9.655a: τὰ ἀπέχοντα; Xenophon, An. 4.3.5; Euphron, frag. 11.3: ἀπὸ θαλάττης Νικομήδει δεσποτῆ ὁδὸν ἀπέχοντι δώδεχ ἡμερῶν (third century BC; cf. J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 3A, p. 278); Diodorus Siculus 5.42; 12.33; Philostratus, Gym. 5: “the runners were placed at a distance of one stadion.”

¹⁷ Judg 18:7; Deut 12:21; Ezek 8:6; 22:5; Ps 103:12—“as the east is far from the west”; Isa 55:9—the heavens above the earth; 1Macc 8:4—“the place (ὁ τόπος) was very far from them”; 2Macc 11:5—“Beth-zur was about five leagues from Jerusalem”; 12:29; cf. Philo, Joseph 256: his father was not far from the border; Dreams 2.257; Josephus, War 2.516, 636; 3.10; 4.474; 5.70, 133, 7.217; Ant. 7.34, 243; 10.169; Life 64, 115, 214.

¹⁸ —Απέχον εἰς τὴν πόλιν, P.Princ. 116, 15; P.Lille 1, 5: “nine transverse levees running from west to east, each separated from the next by a distance of ten schoinoi”; 2, 2: “distance from this land to the town: fifteen stadia”; P.Stras. 57, 6: “the two towns are not more than a mile apart”; cf.

the decree at lasos relative to the divisions of the ekklesiastikon: ἀπέχον ἀπὸ τῆς γῆς ε—φ ὅσον ποδω—ν ε—πτά (C. Michel, Recueil, n. 466,9).

¹⁹ Homer, Il. 6.96: “Remove the son of Tydeus from Ilium”; Od. 15.33: separate a ship from the isles; 20.263, Telemachus: “It is my task to keep you away from the abuse and blows of those claiming the lordship”; Xenophon, Cyr. 1.1.2: “the flocks stray far from (ἀπέχονται) places from which they are pushed away.” Ps.-Homer, H.Aphr. 230: “Venerable Dawn leaves her bed behind.”

²⁰ Isocrates, Bus. 11.32; cf. Archid. 6.70: “I am so far from carrying out any of these obligations” (ἀπέχω τοῦ ποιῆσαι).

²¹ Philo, To Gaius ; Spec. Laws 2.94; 4.202; 3.12: “The law requires respect not only for married women but for single women as well”; 21; Abraham 253: Abraham “stayed away (ἀποσχέσθαι) from Sarah out of a continent nature and the respect he had for his spouse”; Alleg. Interp. 2.88: “the serpent of pleasure does not even respect the one much beloved of God, Moses”; Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.98: Ramesses ordered his brother to “respect the royal concubines.”

²² Aeschylus, Eum. 350: “the immortals must not lay a hand upon us.” Cf. Deut 18:22—when the prophet speaks presumptuously, he is not to be respected (οὐκ ἀπείχοντο αὐτοῦ), be feared (Hebrew gûr).

²³ Hippocrates, Art. 10; cf. Plato, Cra. 407 b; Resp. 1.354 b: “I was not able to keep myself from leaving the previous subject for this one”; Plutarch, De def. or. 41.433 a.

²⁴ Josephus, War 1.75, 637; 2.307; 4.262; 7.265; Ant. 6.318; 16.404. The temple is spared (1.400); the wealth of Hyrcanus (1.268); a city (2.69; Ant. 17.289); carnage (Ant. 3.54); cf. P.Mich. 43, 7: μηθενὸς ἀπόσχῃ, “Do not spare any efforts!”

²⁵ Homer, Il. 8.35: “we will keep ourselves far from battle”; 12.248; 14.206: “They both abstain from bed and love”; Herodotus 1.66: “They refrained from attacking”; Plato charges the citizens not to abstain from geometry (Resp. 7.527 c), and Xenophon urges the most influential people not to abstain from agriculture (Oec. 5.1); cf. Cyr. 1.6.32: they did not refrain from exploiting even their own friends. Thucydides 1.20.2: refrain from attacking; 5.25.3; Plutarch, De Is. et Os. 4 and 7; De sera 22; Ep. Arist. 115, 143; Josephus, War 2.142: abstain from brigandage; 581; 3.461; from wine (2.313), from all scandalmongering (Ag. Apion 1.164). P.Panop.Beatty 2, 235 orders tax collectors to refrain entirely from such actions (τω—ν τοιούτων παντελω—ς ἀπέχεσθαι).

²⁶ Acts 15:20—ἀπέχεσθαι (middle infinitive); cf. D. R. Catchpole, “Paul, James and the Apostolic Decree,” in NTS, vol. 23, 1977, pp. 428–444. In the first century, this is a technical meaning; cf. the six occurrences in Ps.-Phocylides 6, 31, 35, 76, 145, 149; Plutarch, De gen. 15: abstaining from shameful pleasures, etc.

²⁷ 1Thess 5:22; cf. 1Tim 4:3—impostors commanded abstinence from foods that God created to be taken with thanksgiving by believers.

²⁸ 1Pet 2:11; cf. N. Lazure, “La Convoitise de la chair en I Jo. II, 16,” in RB, 1969, pp. 161–205.

²⁹ 1Sam 21:6—David’s soldiers do not approach (Hebrew asar, hold back) a woman during the campaign and are in a state of holiness; Job (1:1, 8) refrains from every evil action (Hebrew sûr, 2:3; 28:28; cf. Mal 3:6); like the wise person (Prov 3:7; 14:6; 14:16), who turns away from riches (23:4; Hebrew hadal) but does not abstain from doing good (mana’) to whom good is due (3:27) or from receiving instruction (23:13); Joel 1:13; 4Macc 1:34.

³⁰ Ant. 1.102, 334; 2.237; 3.92; 6.117; the sons of Eli: οὐδενὸς ἀπείχοντο παρανομήματος (5.339; cf. 19.150); abstinence from certain animals (3.259–260; 7.155; 10.190; 11.228; Ag. Apion 1.239, 261; 2.141, 174), from things consecrated to God (Ant. 5.32; 12.250; cf. 11.101).

³¹ The translation of M. J. Lagrange (“C’en est fait!”); R. Schnackenburg (L’Evangile selon saint Marc, Paris, 1973): “continuez à dormir et reposez-vous! C’est passé” (the agony, the conflict in prayer, the anguish has been overcome); manuscripts ψ and k omit ἀπέχει; D, W, Θ , Φ add τὸ τέλος, “the end has arrived; the hour has come”; this is also the interpretation of the Sahidic version (“the work has been finished”) and the Syriac version (“the end has come”). M. Black (Aramaic Approach, pp. 225–226) postulates an error in the Aramaic original, reading qyjđ instead of qyjr, “urge, press.”

³² Sometimes Hesychius is cited: ἀπέχει ἀπόχρη, ε—ξάρκει (not found in the edition by K. Latte, 1953). Taking up the hypothesis formulated by J. de Zwaan (“The Text and Exegesis of Mark XIV, 41 and the papyri,” in The Expositor, 1905, pp. 459–472), H. Boobyer (“ἀπέχει in Mark XIV, 41,” in NTS, vol. 2, 1955, pp. 44–48) and W. Barclay (“The New Testament and the Papyri,” in H. Anderson, W. Barclay, The New Testament in Historical and Contemporary Perspective: Essays in Memory of G. H. C. Macgregor, Oxford, 1965, pp. 75ff.) suggest that this is a reference to Judas (cf. verse 43), who has received the money that was the price of his betrayal—he has been paid and can now arrest Jesus. This, however, is to make a great deal of a simple verb without an object.

³³ F. Field, Notes on the Translation, p. 39.

³⁴ Καὶ μεθ ὃν ᾧ ἀπέσχε χρόνον ἔχειν; the editor, F. Preisigke, writes “ἀπέσχε steht hier unpersönlich im Sinne von ‘satis est’: καὶ μετὰ τὸν χρόνον, ᾧ ἀπέσχε ἔχειν”; cf. P.Lond. 1343, 38 (eighth century).

³⁵ Aeschylus, Ag. 1125: “Careful! Away from the cow”; Homer, Il. 12.321: “Let us leave the flocks”; Philo, Husbandry 91: to halt in an undertaking; Josephus, Life 80: give in to the passions.

³⁶ Cf. the conclusion of Ep. Arist. (322): ἀπέχεις τὴν διήγησιν—“There you have the whole story, Philostratus, just as I promised.”

ἀπλότης, ἀπλοῦς

haplotes, simplicity, singleness, sincerity; haplous, morally whole, faithful

haplotes, S 572; TDNT 1.386–387; EDNT 1.123–124; NIDNTT 3.571–572; MM 58; L&N 57.106, 88.44; BAGD 85–86 | haplous, S 573; TDNT 1.386; EDNT 1.123–124; NIDNTT 3.571; MM 58; L&N 23.132, 57.107; BDF §§45, 60(1), 61(2); BAGD 86

These are two terms that cannot be well understood in the NT except in light of the LXX. In classical Greek, “haplous is the opposite of diplous, meaning simple or single rather than double . . . sometimes in the moral sense of straight, without turning aside.”¹ But in the OT, this adjective translates the Hebrew tam, signifying all that is whole (hence upright [French intègre —Tr.], perfect); then well made; and finally peaceful, and hence innocent. Tamîm refers to all that is complete, finished, done; hence intact or undefiled, without fault; and finally irreproachable, exemplary, impeccable.² This perfection, which the Vulgate calls simplicitas, is frequently associated with yasar, expressing rectitude: that which corresponds to an objective norm; thus, in a physical sense, that which is straight, direct, unified; and in a moral sense that which is loyal, just, right.³ This union (Ps 25:21; 37:37) points out that the perfection-integrity of the just is characterized by an absolute rectitude of conscience and life. Furthermore, the models of the pious person, like Noah and Job (Gen 5:9; Job 1:1, 8) are presented as “perfect and upright,” they are seasoned, lacking in nothing, innocent and irreproachable.

This is not just a dictionary entry but an entire spirituality. This faultless innocence, this uncompromising rectitude, is blessed by God (Prov 2:7; 10:29; 11:20; 28:10) and is the way of salvation (Prov 28:18). It is the virtue of the servants of God (Deut 18:13; Ps 19:24; 25:21; Prov 13:6), or better, a deep-seated purpose, a condition of the soul. As opposed to duplicitous people, those with divided hearts, those who are simple have no other concern than to do the will of God, to observe his precepts; their whole existence is an expression of this disposition of heart, this rectitude: “Let us all die in our simplicity” (1Macc 2:37). In the first century BC, haplotes, so exalted in the Wisdom writings, is considered the supreme virtue of the patriarchs.⁴

It is not easy to define precisely the meaning of haplous in the outline of the logion of the two lights,⁵ which calls for checking the condition of this “lamp of the body,” the eye,⁶ because if it is “evil” (dark) it is unable to make out the exterior light of Christ; this would be blindness indeed, like that of a blind person facing the sun.⁷ If we take haplous and poneros in a physical sense, they would mean respectively “healthy or normal” and “sick.” Thus Socrates called myopia a “defect of the eyes, poneria ophthalmon” (Plato, Hp. Mi. 374d), but this meaning is not biblical, and in secular Greek a healthy eye is normally called ophthalmos agathos; consequently, what we are dealing with is a Septuagintism. It is best to take the logion as a whole in a moral sense—the “darkened eye” in the sense of T. Issach. 4.6 (cf. T. Benj. 4.2), a clouded eye or depraved will. The eye is the organ for recognizing divinity: ho ophthalmos sou = to phos to en soi (cf. Prov 20:27) = tous ophthalmous tes kardias (Eph 1:18). The point here is probably unclouded loyalty,⁸ in the sense in which pure hearts will see God (Matt 5:8), but the deepest meaning is that of a simple soul, not parceled out, like that of a small child,⁹ oriented exclusively toward God. This integrity, this rigorousness of basic purpose, introduces one to the light, the world of God.¹⁰ The light is total and perfect; but if one’s outlook is evil, deficient because the heart is pulled in different directions (cf. Matt 6:21), the whole person abides in darkness (the world of Satan?). Simplicity is thus total involvement and the unreserved giving of the self.

These same connotations of generosity or liberality are to be understood in the verses about the gifts of the Macedonians and the Corinthians to the community at Jerusalem (2Cor 8:2; 11:11, 13), and about gifts given by the charismatic, who gives not grudgingly but generously (ho metadidous en haploteti, Rom 12:8). On the other hand, the nuance of integrity and uprightness come to the fore in 2Cor 11:3—“I fear that just as the serpent lured Eve through his wiliness (en te panourgia; cf. Gen 3:1) your thoughts might be corrupted (and abased) from the simplicity and purity that are fitting with respect to Christ.”¹¹ But if slaves must obey their masters “in simplicity of heart” (Col 3:22; Eph 6:5), purity of intention and wholehearted devotion cannot be separated in their service. The Christian slave will want to obey orders faithfully and not balk at his duties. He works as a person in a position of trust and with real nobility.¹²

The meaning of the adverb haplos (NT hapax) in Jas 1:5 cannot be determined with certainty: “God gives to all haplos and does not reproach.”¹³ Given the last part of the sentence, it is tempting to translate haplos “sincerely, without reservation or restriction.”¹⁴ But the meaning of the Vulgate, supported by the Peshitta, agrees better with the language of the LXX: God gives perfectly, i.e., with abandon. The papyri shed hardly any light,¹⁵ or rather they most often use haplos, especially in the first century, to affirm a statement: “absolutely, quite plainly.”¹⁶ Contracting parties agree not to file any complaints whatsoever concerning debts, payments, stipulations, or “anything else at all.”¹⁷ Thus, in an act establishing ownership, “the declarer and his successors will not initiate any legal proceedings concerning the above-mentioned goods, nor for anything else, absolutely, in any manner. . . . For his part, Anthistia Cronous will not start legal proceedings against the declarer concerning any of the above stipulations (peri medenos haplos pragmatos) . . . in any fashion (tropo medeni)” (P.Phil. 11.16, 21). In AD 38, emou methen haplos lambanontos means “without receiving absolutely anything.”¹⁸ Consequently, the best translation of Jas 1:5 would appear to be “purely and simply,”¹⁹ without emphasizing one nuance or another, except that of pure gift.

¹ P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique, p. 97; cf. Bauernfeind on this word in TDNT, vol. 1, pp. 386–387.

² Whence the corresponding terms ἀληθινός, ἄμωμος, ὅσιος, εἰ—ρηνικός, καθαρὰ καρδία, τέλειος. J. Lévêque, Job et son Dieu, Paris, 1970, vol. 1, pp. 137ff. Cf. C. Spicq, “La vertu de simplicité dans l’Ancien et le Nouveau Testament,” in RSPT, 1933, pp. 5–26.

³ Cf. “simplicity of heart,” Gen 20:5; Josh 24:14; 1Kgs 9:4; 1Chr 29:17; Wis 1:1.

⁴ In T. 12 Patr. the exhortation recurs endlessly to “walk in haplotes according to the law” (T. Levi 13.1; cf. T. Reub. 4.1; T. Sim. 4.5) or “in simplicity of heart” (T. Issach. 4.1; cf. 3.8; 7.7) or “of soul” (T. Issach. 4.6), “before God” (T. Issach. 3.2; cf. 5.8). Haplotes, the subject of joy (T. Issach. 3.6), is parallel to akakia (T. Issach. 5.1). In the last days, your sons will abandon haplotes. (T. Issach. 6.1; cf. 7.7; T. Benj. 6.7) and will have “double vision” (T. Asher 4.1, διπρόσωπον). A. Jaubert (La notion d’alliance dans le Judaïsme, Paris, 1963, p. 274) sees an anti-Pharisee point in these texts.

⁵ “The light of the body is the eye. If then your eye is simple, your whole body will be full of light; but if your eye is evil, your whole body will be darkened.” Recorded similarly by Matt 6:22 and Luke 11:34, but in totally different contexts; inserted by Matt in the Sermon on the Mount (devotion to wealth produces blindness of heart); by Luke among other fragments without any definite connection, after the passage about Martha at home, where it serves as a warning that purity of outlook is necessary for recognizing the teaching of Jesus, or better the light on Jesus (H. J. Cadbury, “The Single Eye,” in HTR, 1954, pp. 69–74. L. Vaganay, “L’Etude d’un doublet dans la Parabole de la Lampe,” in Le Problème synoptique, Paris-Tournai, 1954, pp. 426–442). Cf. C. Edlund, Das Auge der Einfalt, Copenhagen-Lund, 1952 (cf. the summary by P. Benoit, in RB, 1953, pp. 603–605); E. Sjöberg, “Das Licht in dir: Zur Deutung von Matth. VI, 22 f Par.,” in ST, vol. 5, 1952, pp. 89–105; J. Amstutz, ΑΠΛΟΤΗΣ, Bonn, 1968.

⁶ For the Greeks, the eye emits visual rays which travel outward in a straight line (Plato, Tim. 45c; Archimedes, fragments edited by C. Mugler, vol. 4, p. 207; cf. J. Itard, “Optique et perspective,” in La Science antique et médiévale, Paris, 1957, vol. 1, pp. 341ff.) Empedocles, frag. 84.3 (Diels, 7th ed.) compares it to a lantern with a flaxen veil (cf. REG, 1959, pp. xi, 58). There is a movement (flow) from the eye toward its object (Philo, Conf. Tongues 99; Unchang. God 78). Cf. the texts in C. Mugler, Terminologie géométrique, pp. 293ff. A. Lejeune, Recherches sur la catoptrique grecque, Brussels, 1957.

⁷ To put it another way, seeing requires both the objective light (the sun) and the subjective light (the eye). It is the same in the spiritual order: the subjective light of the body or soul is necessary, and the whole practical issue is making sure that it is in good order for receiving the objective light of the revelation of Jesus Christ. The union of both lights is required. Only the “simple eye” sees things exactly as they are. We must remember that in the Hellenistic period, φω—ς—φωτίζειν refer to the light from the beyond, and that it was in this period that the religious use of candles developed; cf. S. Aalen, Die Begriffe Licht und Finsternis im A. T., im Spätjudentum und im Rabbinismus, Oslo, 1952; F. N. Klein, Die Lichtterminologie bei Philon von Alexandrien und in den Hermetischen Schriften, Leiden, 1962; J. Duncan M. Derrett, Law in the NT, pp. 188–207.

⁸ C. Edlund, Das Auge der Einfalt, Copenhagen-Lund, 1952, p. 67, is right in understanding this logion as aimed against the legalists and scribes. The most intelligent rabbis cannot see (understand) anything of the Savior’s manifestation so long as they claim to be φω—ς τω—ν ε—ν σκότει (Rom 2:19).

⁹ Mark 10:15; cf. S. Légasse, Jésus et l'enfant, Paris, 1969.

¹⁰ In biblical anthropology, body is not opposed to soul but designates the whole person.

¹¹ 2Cor 11:3, ἀπὸ τῆς ἀπλότητος καὶ τῆς ἀγνότητος; cf. Philo, Creation 156: the eating the fruit “suddenly conveyed them from innocence and simplicity in their way of life to deceitfulness—ε—ξ ἀκακίας καὶ ἀπλότητος ἠθω—ν εἰ—ς πανουργίαν μετέβαλεν.”

¹² In Philo (Moses 1.172) goodwill (ἀπλότης) is opposed to recrimination, hardness, and a spiteful personality (τὴν πικρίαν καὶ τὸ βαρύμηνι); cf. “the natural uprightness of Titus” (Josephus, War 5.319; cf. 529).

¹³ Cf. H. Riesenfeld, “ΑΠΛΩΣ: Zu Jak. I, 5,” in ConNT, vol. 9, 1941, pp. 33–41, where several occurrences of this adverb with δίδωμι are cited (Plutarch, Sol. 21.4; Demetr. 19.10); P.Panop.Beatty 2, 95. W. C. van Unnik (De ἀφθονία van God in de oudchristelijke Literatuur, Amsterdam-London, 1973, pp. 12ff.) juxtaposes Jas 1:5 and Odes Sol. 7.3.

¹⁴ Cf. Dio Chrysostom 51.1: οὐχ ἀπλω—ς ἀλλὰ μετὰ φροντίδος; Marcus Aurelius 5.7.2: “One must either not pray at all or pray naively, candidly”; Philo, Drunkenness 76: “serving loyally and candidly, ἀψευδω—ς καὶ ἀπλω—ς θεραπεύων.” In Prov 10:9, “the one who walks in uprightness” is in antithetical parallel with “devious.” Hence my earlier translation, “without mental reservation or ulterior motive” (C. Spicq, “AMETAMEΛΗΤΟΣ in Rom. XI, 29,” in RB, 1960, pp. 217).

¹⁵ With respect to coins, ἀπλω—ς means “genuine” (Dittenberger, Syl. 901, 9; P.Ryl. 709, 6; P.Fouad 53, 3; P.Oxy. 2237, 8; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 1, 7; cf. J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1960, p. 142, n. 59). In legal language: “the written contract in a single exemplar (without duplicates) is valid” (P.Rein. 105, 10; 108, 14; P.Warr. 10, 30; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 4, 8; 20, 22; PSI 1427, 23; cf. P.Fouad 20, 11; P.Mert. 36, 17; 98, 19; P.Harr. 66, 4 and 13; 81, 7; 83, 14; 141, 6; 145, 4; BGU 2117, 10; C.P.Herm. 32, 22; P.Oxy. 2237, 19; 2270, 14; 2350, col. III, 19; 2587, 9; etc.).

¹⁶ Cf. Menander, Dysk. 507: “I said plainly to everyone around. . . .”

¹⁷ The formula περὶ ἄλλου οὐδενὸς ἀπλω—ς (P.Yale 63, 15, from 7 July 64; cf. 65, 31; UPZ 218, col., 1, 24; 223, col, 1, 18) or περὶ ε—τέρου ἀπλω—ς πράγματος (P.Fouad 56, 19, from 11 February 79; P.Ryl. 588, 23; 20 September 78 BC) recurs constantly: P.Mich. 337, 15 (AD 24); 345, 15 (AD 7); 351, 14 (AD 44); 352, 10 (AD 46); P.Mert. 111, 15; P.Fam.Tebt. 9, 18; 13, 23, 44, 58; 20, 30; 21, 15, 27; P.Oxy. 2185, 27 (AD 95); P.Tebt. 45, 25; 395, 10, 18; in two acts of divorce, P.Dura 31, 15; 32, 11; cf. Philo, Drunkennes 78; Post. Cain 114; Epictetus 3.13.10; 3.22.96; 4.1.172.

¹⁸ P.Mich. 266, 15; 276, 10, 24, 25, 32, 40 (AD 47); cf. 603, 18 “with nothing more”; P.Mert. 115, 16; P.Tebt. 392, 26, 35; P.Sarap. 36, 10.

¹⁹ Cf. 2Macc 6:6—“It wasn’t even allowed to celebrate the Sabbath, nor to keep the festivals of our ancestors, nor simply to admit that one was Jewish”; Wis 16:27—“That which was not destroyed by the fire melted, simply heated by a brief ray of sunlight.” Epictetus 2.2.13: “Do not let yourself be pulled in all directions, sometimes ready to serve, sometimes refusing, but serve simply and with all your heart, ἀλλ᾽ ἀπλω—ς καὶ ε—ξ ὅλης τῆς διανοίας.”

ἀποβλέπω

apoblepo, to look, observe, pay close attention
see also ἀφοράω

apoblepo, S 578; EDNT 1.125; MM 59; L&N 30.31; BAGD 89

To describe the character of the faith whereby Moses, in the midst of his trials, took the promised reward into account, Heb 11:26 uses the verb apoblepo, “look, observe, pay attention.” Faith “looks from a distance,” or better, “considers steadfastly” and as it were exclusively. In the OT, apoblepo sometimes connotes lying in wait or scrutinizing (Ps 10:8; 11:5), or making a profitable observation (Prov 24:32); but when it translates the verb pānāh (Hos 3:1; Cant 6:1), which means turn to look (Exod 2:12) or to leave (Isa 13:14), it takes on the sense of turning away, of detaching oneself from other concerns to devote one’s attention to one thing only. This meaning, which is the one that applies in Heb 11:26, is confirmed by Philo, Spec. Laws 1.293; Moses keeps his eyes fixed on the greatness of God. Cf. P.Stras. 305, 6: apoblepon kai eis ta mellonta; PSI 414, 9, a letter from the vine-grower Meno claiming his pay from Zeno: eis to opsonion apoblepo.

In secular Greek, apoblepo expresses the activity of the astronomer who “observes the heavenly motions,”¹ or that of a painter who fixes his gaze on a model, constantly checking in order to take in every detail.² The use of the word is extended from simple eyesight³ to a “become aware of” (Epictetus 1.6.37) and especially to “take into consideration, take into account”⁴ in order to pattern one’s conduct accordingly.⁵ This is exactly what Moses did in reckoning that there was no comparison between the treasures of Egypt and the divine “recompense.”

¹ Plato, Resp. 7.530a; cf. C. Mugler, Terminologie optique, p. 44: “ἀπ. Verbal expression designating the contemplation, out of curiosity or scientific interest, of an optical phenomenon.”

² Plato, Resp. 6.484c. Cf. Philo, Virtues 70: Moses is contemplated as a model and example; cf. B. Snell, H. Ersbe, Lexikon, vol. 1, col. 1090ff.

³ Josephus, War 7.200: “the place where he was best seen by the spectators”; 7.338: “they looked at each other”; Ant. 8.344; 9.14.

⁴ Josephus, Life 135: “take your ancestral laws into consideration”; Ag. Apion 1.31: “without taking into consideration fortune or other distinctions”; War 2.311: “Florus, considering neither the number of the dead nor the high birth of the suppliant”; Ant. 20.61: “Izates took into consideration . . . the fact that changes of fortune are the dowry of all people (ἀποβλέπων is parallel to λογισμῶ— διδούς).” In a Christian letter of consolation to a friend who has lost his son: ἀπόβλεψον ὅτι οὐδεὶς ἐ—ν ἀνθρώποις ἀθάνατος (P.Princ. 102, 13–14; from the fourth century).

⁵ Josephus, Ant. 4.39: the companions of Dathan come with their wives and their children “to see what Moses would decide to do, τί καὶ μέλλοι ποιει—ν.” Moulton-Milligan cite the edict of Ephesus, around AD 160, ἀποβλέπων εἰς τε τὴν εὐσέβειαν τῆς θεοῦ καὶ εἰ—ς τὴν τῆς λαμπροτάτης —Ἐφεσίων πόλεως τειμήν.

ἀποδοχή

apodoche, acceptance, enthusiastic reception, respect

apodoche, S 594; TDNT 2.55–56; EDNT 1.129; NIDNTT 3.744, 746; MM 62; L&N 31.52; BAGD 91

“This saying is sure and worthy of all approbation” (pases apodoches axios, 1Tim 1:15; 4:9). This kerygma formula, influenced by Hellenism, and abundantly commented upon by exegetes,¹ can be clarified when apodoche is given its proper value. This noun, which only appears in late Koine (except for Thucydides 4.81.2), normally means “a good welcome, favorable reception,”² and it is thus that it is attested in Ep. Arist. 257: “How can one find a good welcome among strangers?” and in Josephus, Ant. 18.274: “their insuperable objection to receiving the statue” of the emperor.

But already in the last century F. Field pointed out that the connotation of approval and admiration stood out in numerous texts,³ and in 1911 J. Rouffiac tracked it down in two inscriptions of Priene.⁴ We could add Ep. Arist. 308—when Demetrius undertook a reading and a translation in the presence of the translators, “these were received with enthusiasm by the crowd”⁵—and Diodorus Siculus 1.69; 9.40; 15.35.

What is more, the expression axios apodoches, already used by Philo (“He alone is worthy of approval who has placed his hope in God,” Philo, Rewards 13; likewise Flight 129), is current in the literature: “Strato himself was a man worthy of much acceptance” (autos de ho Straton aner gegone polles tes apodoches axios, Diogenes Laertius 5.64); “If the starting point is unknown . . . all that follows can in no way deserve assent and confidence” (Polybius 1.5.5); with respect to the tomb of the king Osymandyas, “not only was this work praiseworthy on account of its immense size (to megethos apodoches axios), but it was also admirable from an artistic point of view” (Diodorus Siculus 1.47.4; cf. 5.31: apodoches megales axiountes autous; 12.15: this law is “perfectly just and worthy of the greatest praise”); andros ergon kai polles axion apodoches (Hierocles, in Stobaeus, Flor. 4.27.20; vol. 4, p. 662, 2). It is especially with respect to people that the meaning “consideration, high esteem” predominates in the inscriptions;⁶ for example inhonorific decrees. One of these from the village of Odessa, around 45 BC, in honor of Menogenes, a kaloskagathos who had bestowed many benefits on the city and its region: “with the king he was reckoned worthy of great esteem” (para to basilei megales apodoches axioutai, I. Bulg., 43, 13); another honors Menas of Sestos: “being considered worthy of the noblest esteem” (tes kallistes apodoches axioumenos par’ auto, Dittenberger, Or. 339, 13–14). Similarly, a second-century inscription from Ephesus honoring the agonothetes Priscus: “a most respected man and worthy of all honor and esteem” (andros dokimotatou kai pases teimes kai apodoches axiou, Dittenberger, Syl. 867, 20).

Consequently, the apostolic preaching not only deserves to be accepted by all but also deserves the highest credit (pas is intensive; cf. 1Tim 6:1). It is worthy of devout respect, the respect that everyone owes to the Truth.⁷

¹ H. B. Swete, “The Faithful Sayings,” in JTS, 1917, pp. 1–7; J. M. Bover, “Fidelis sermo,” in Bib, 1938, pp. 74–79; G. W. Knight, The Faithful Sayings in the Pastoral Letters, Kampen, 1968, pp. 22ff. C. Spicq, Epîtres

Pastorales, vol. 1, p. 277; C.F.D. Moule, Birth of the NT, pp. 283–284; Grundmann, on this word in TDNT, vol. 2, pp. 55–56.

² Cf. ἀποδέχομαι (Acts 2:41). A. Calderini (ΗΣΑΥΡΟΙ, 2d ed., Milan, 1972, p. 97) relates it to ἀποδοχία, “the reserve, the place where one keeps things.”

³ F. Field, Notes on the Translation, p. 203. Cf. Josephus, Ant. 6.347: “It is right that they should receive approval.”

⁴ J. Rouffiac, Caractères du grec, p. 39. After 129 BC, ε—ν ἀποδοχῇ τῇ μεγίστῃ γινομένους = enjoying the highest esteem (I.Priene 108, 312; likewise 109, 234; around 120 BC). Cf. I.Magn. 113, 21: εἶναι ε—ν ἀποδοχῇ τῷ— δῆμῳ; CIRB 432 B: ε—παίνου καὶ πλείστης ἀποδοχῆς ὑποστῆναι; J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. 8, 7: ἀποδοχαί = favors. Polybius associates ἀποδοχή and πίστις several times: “Alexo enjoyed their favor and confidence” (1.43.4; cf. 1.5.5).

⁵ Οἵτινες μεγάλης ἀποδοχῆς καὶ παρὰ τοῦ πλήθους ἔτυχον.

⁶ —Αποδοχή, unknown in the papyri, belongs to cultivated language. In Greek rhetoric, one uses ἄξιος ἀποδοχῆς to qualify an utterance, a discourse based on argumentation and in which one may place confidence, cf. I.C.T. Ernesti, LTGR, 2d ed. Hildesheim, 1982, p. 226.

⁷ W. A. Oldfather, L. W. Daly (“A Quotation from Menander in the Pastoral Epistles?” in CP, 1943, pp. 202–204) mention this saying in Terence: “It is a universal defect that in old age we are too attached to things,” followed by the sentence, “the saying is true and must be put into practice—et dictum est vere et re ipsa fieri oportet” (Terence, Ad. 954); and since Terence is transposing Menander, these writers suppose that the latter wrote πιστὸς ὁ λόγος καὶ πάσης ἀποδοχῆς ἄξιος, which the Pastorals preserved more precisely.

ἀποκυέω

apokyeo, to deliver, give birth

apokyeo, S 616; EDNT 1.134; MM 65; L&N 13.12, 13.87; BDF §101; BAGD 94

“Desire, when it has conceived (syllambano), gives birth to sin (tikto), and sin, when it has come to term, gives birth to death (apokyo).”¹ The Father of lights “by his own will gave birth to us (apekyesen) by a word of truth, so that we should be something of a firstfruits of his creatures.”² The verb apokyeo (biblical hapax), unknown even in Josephus, belongs to cultivated Hellenistic Greek.³ It is much used by Philo, who gives it its precise, objective meaning as the last stage of begetting—“deliver” or “give birth”—even when the usage is metaphorical.⁴ After the conception (syllambano) and the gestation (en gastri echo, kyo), the woman brings her child into the world; the prefix apo- precisely emphasizes the “delivery.” Although the compound verb under discussion sometimes includes the two preceding phases, it must normally be distinguished from the simple kyo (“carry in the womb, be or become pregnant,”⁵ the opposite of tikto, Isa 61:4) and even more from the very general gennao,⁶ because it refers to the moment when the mother, at the end of the period of gestation, brings forth into the world a fully formed child now capable of an independent existence.⁷ The genuit of the Vulgate must therefore be eliminated in favor of the peperit of the Old Latin (ed. Beuron, vol. 26, p.17). In choosing this verb, St. James wanted to point out the efficaciousness of the divine action and the reality of baptismal generation. Christians had taken on a spiritual mode of existence by virtue of which they were capable of leading a really new life.

¹ Jas 1:15. The metaphor is attested several times in the OT: “The one who carries sin in the womb, who conceives a misdeed and gives birth to a lie” (Ps 7:15; cf. G. J. Thierry, “Remarks on Various Passages of the Psalms,” in OTS, vol. 13, 1963, pp. 77ff.); “They conceive mischief and bring forth iniquity” (Isa 59:4); Job 15:35. It is loved by Philo: “We speak of corruption and of the birthing of the virtues . . .” (Philo, Cherub. 42–46; cf. 57); “The proper name of imprudence is She Who Gives Birth, because the intelligence of the insane . . . is always suffering the pangs of child-bearing, when it desires riches, glory, pleasure, of some other object” (Alleg. Interp. 1.75); the soul, which conceives thoughts, vices, and passions, has a reproductive capacity comparable to that of a woman who conceives and gives birth to a child (Sacr. Abel and Cain 103); all the virtues are fertile and can be compared to a productive field or to a mother who gives birth (Worse Attacks Better 114), especially justice, “which brings into the world a male offspring (ἀποκεκύηκε), right reasoning” (121); and “prudence, which, like a mother, brings into the world (ἀποκυήσασα) the race capable of receiving her instruction” (Change of Names 137). “The one who beholds God . . . brought into the world (ἀποκυηθέν) by virtue” (Post. Cain 63). Cf. T. Benj. 7.2—“The dianoia is pregnant with the works of Beliar.”

² Jas 1:18. Cf. Deut 32:18—“You despise the Rock that gave birth to you and you forget the God who brought you into the world”; Isa 66:7–11; the metaphorical and collective birthing of the people Israel. O. Michel, O. Betz

(“Von Gott gezeugt,” in Festschrift J. Jeremias, Berlin, 1960, p. 22, and in NTS, vol. 9, 1963, pp. 129–130) point out parallels at Qumran. C. M. Edsman (“Schöpferwille und Geburt, Jk. I, 18: Eine Studie zur altchristlichen Kosmologie,” in ZNW, 1939, pp. 11–44; idem, “Schöpfung und Wiedergeburt: Nochmals Jac. I, 18,” in Spiritus et Veritas: Mélanges Kundzinu, Auseklis, 1953, pp. 43–55) provides references to ecclesiastical writers who use this term to designate the begetting of the Word by the Father or of Jesus by the Virgin Mary (Justin, 1 Apol. 32.14; 2 Apol. 6.5; Irenaeus, Haer. 1.1.1; Origen, Cels. 5.52; 5.58; Eusebius, Dem. Evang. 3.2; 3.50; etc.). A. v. Harnack knows only two authors (Clement of Alexandria, Paed. 1.45.1, and Methodius of Olympus, Symp. 3.8) who use this verb to speak of baptismal generation (Die Terminologie der Wiedergeburt und verwandter Erlebnisse in der ältesten Kirche: Texte und Untersuchungen, vol. 42, 3; Leipzig, 1918, p. 109, n. 2; p. 120, n. 2). Cf. L. E. Elliott-Binns, “James I, 18: Creation or Redemption?” in NTS, vol. 3, 1957, pp. 148–161; above all J. Ysebaert, Greek Baptismal Terminology, pp. 108, 126, 139ff., 150.

³ It is very rare in the papyri: BGU 665, col. II, 19 (first century AD); SB 6611, 15, 20 (a notarial act of divorce, AD 120), always meaning specifically “bring into the world”; cf. 4Macc 15:7—“O woman, the only one who has brought into the world perfect piety.”

⁴ Philo, Flight 208: “Through an easy birthing (πραῦτόκοις ὠδι—σιν), you will bring forth a male child (ἄρρενα γενεὰν ἀποκυήσεις);” Philo, Post. Cain 114: “This shadow, these ambiguous hallucinations, give birth to (ἀποκυει—ται) a son.”

⁵ Κυέω, concipio, is said of the mother: “be great with child”; cf. an inscription of Delphi: οὔτε κύουσα γυνή (SEG, vol. 16, 341, 7; R. Ferwerda, La signification des images et des métaphores dans la pensée de Plotin, Groningen, 1965, pp. 82ff.); “all the pregnant women (πα—σαι αι—κυούσαι γυναι—κες) brought malformed children into the world” (Plutarch, Publ. 21.2); “They saw that his brother’s wife was pregnant (κύουσαν)” (Plutarch, Lyc. 3.1; cf. Alex. 2.5; 77.6); “The seventh day . . . was brought into the world without gestation, γεννηθει—σαν ἄνευ κύσεως” (Philo, Moses 2.210); Abraham had relations with Hagar “until she conceived a child (ἄχρι τοῦ παιδοποιήσασθαι) and—as the most trustworthy narrators tell us—only until she was pregnant (ἄχρι τοῦ μόνον ε—γκύμονα γενέσθαι)” Abraham 253. “The essence of God is to inseminate (τὸ κύειν) and produce all things” Corp. Herm. 5.9. Obviously the term is sometimes used more broadly (cf. Philo, Moses 1.16: “A Jewish woman who had recently given birth, κυήσαντι”); according to Lucian, Ver. Hist. 22, the inhabitants of the moon carry their children (κύουσι) in the paunchy part of the leg. Otherwise, κύος = fetus; κυΐσκω = inseminate (E. Boisacq, Dictionnaire étymologique, under this word). Among the Gnostics, κύημα referred to spiritual or pneumatic generation.

⁶ Cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, pp. 100ff.; A. Schlatter, Der Brief des Jakobus, Stuttgart, 1956, p. 136.

⁷ Cf. Philo: “With women, and with all females, when the time of parturition (ἀποκυΐσκω) draws near, their sources of milk can be seen to begin to form so that their bodies may supply the newborn offspring with needed and appropriate food” (Plant.); “The Pythagoreans compare the number seven to a woman of perpetual virginity and without a mother, because it was not born and does not beget, ὅτι οὔτε ἀπεκνήθη οὔτε ἀποτέξεται” (Alleg. Interp. 1.15); God is the father of this world, and one could call its mother the knowledge with which he begot it, “this knowledge, having received the divine seed, after conceiving and bringing to term her only and well-beloved son, she then gave birth to our sensible universe (ἀπεκύησε)” (Drunkenness 30); “It is one and the same soul that carries both of these conceptions. Once they are brought forth into the world (ὅταν ἀποκηθῶ—σι), they must necessarily be separated” (Sacr. Abel and Cain 3). Plutarch: “Valeria gave birth to a daughter (ἀπεκύησεν)” (Sull. 37.7); “In the middle of her dinner . . . she brought a boy into the world (ἀποκηθὲν ἄρρεν)” (idem, Lyc. 3.5); Corp. Herm.: Mind-God, being male-and-female . . . gave birth by a word (ἀπεκύησε λόγῳ) to a second Mind demiurge” (1.9); “He gave virth to a Man like himself, whom he loved as his own child” (1.12).

ἀπόλαυσις

apolausis, enjoyment, happiness

apolausis, S 619; EDNT 1.135; MM 65–66; L&N 25.115; BAGD 94

This noun, unknown in the papyri before the sixth century (cf. P.Flor. 296, 11), is only used twice in the NT, and in accord with the double meaning that it has in the secular language. God provides us with “all things richly for our enjoyment, eis apolausin” (1Tim 6:17). As opposed to the ascetic Manichaeism of the heterodox teachers, St. Paul affirms the optimism of revelation with respect to the earthly goods that divine providence obtains for us.¹ The end purpose eis apolausin had already been expressed by Philo and Josephus in reference to food, subsistence, and everyday necessities of life.² In 68, the prefect of Egypt, Tiberius Julius Alexander, promulgated an edict to the effect that his subjects should wait upon the “safety and material happiness” of the benevolent emperor Galba.³ The meaning is “to derive benefit, to enjoy personally, to make the most of a possession.”⁴

This enjoyment, well-being, and pleasure is extended to happiness in all its forms, whether culinary delights (Josephus, Ant. 12.98), marital koinonia (2.52), the love of a woman,⁵ the joys of youth (I. Thas. 334, 18), the diversion of activities,⁶ the satisfaction of ownership,⁷ or the present and lasting enjoyment of good things.⁸ It is in light of these usages that we must understand Heb 11:25—Moses chose to be “mistreated with the people of God rather than to enjoy for a time the pleasure of sin.”⁹

¹ Acts 14:17. A Stoic theme, cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, p. 236.

² Philo, Moses 2.70: Moses remained on the mountain, “having brought no provisions for necessary food, εἰς ἀναγκαίαν ἀπόλαυσιν τροφῆς”; Rewards 135: prosperous people find life desirable for the enjoyment of good things, εἰς ἀπόλαυσιν ἀγαθῶν”; cf. God’s words to Adam: thanks to Providence, all things contribute to “well-being and pleasure, πρὸς ἀπόλαυσιν καὶ ἡδονήν” (Josephus, Ant. 1.46); Ant. 8.153: “those goods conveniently arranged for pleasure and joy, εἰς ἀπόλαυσιν καὶ τρυφήν”; 16.13: Herod entertains Marcus Agrippa and his friends with all sorts of pleasures and food. 1Clem. 20.10: “inexhaustible springs, created for pleasure and health, πρὸς ἀπόλαυσιν καὶ ὑγείαν.”

³ Τά τε πρὸς σωτηρίαν καὶ τὰ πρὸς ἀπόλαυσιν (SB 8444, 8; cf. G. Chalon, T. Julius Alexander).

⁴ Cf. enjoyment of succession to the throne or the benefits of royalty (Josephus, War 1.111, 1.587), and the verb ἀπολαύω, which occurs frequently in the papyri (P.Herm. 5, 10: ἀπολαύειν τῆς ε—πὶ σοὶ μεγίστης εὐφροσύνης) and the inscriptions, cf. the discourse of Nero at Corinth in 67: “a larger number of people enjoyed my favors, ἵνα μου πλείονες ἀπολαύωσι τῆς χάριτος”; (Dittenberger, Syl. 814, 18; cf. Or. 666, 10); an inscription on a ring from Homs: “—Ἀπόλαυε χέρων—Enjoy with pleasure” (IGLS 2482).

⁵ —Ἀπόλαυσις represented in the form of an elegant young woman (IGLS 871). The Hebrews did not try to flee the enchantment of the beauty of the daughters of the Midianites and the intimacy of relations with them (Josephus, Ant. 4.131).

⁶ Inscription of Antiochus I of Commagene (IGLS 1.150; cf. 12 = Dittenberger, Or. 383, 12). Cf. the technical meaning of voluptas: ε—πίτροπος ἀπὸ τῶ—ν ἄ. (ILS 8849; Suetonius, Tib. 42).

⁷ Josephus, Ant. 5.95: τὴν ἀπόλαυσιν τῶν ὑπαρχόντων ὑμῶν ἀγαθῶν; cf. 14.160.

⁸ Josephus, Ant. 2.48; 2.161; 4.178; every sort of satisfaction (War 7.388). Diodorus Siculus 17.67.3; 17.75.1; 17.75.6; 17.110.5: the pleasures of existence.

⁹ Josephus, Ant. 4.42: ἀφείς τὴν ἐκείνων ἀπόλαυσιν τῶν ἀγαθῶν ἐμαυτὸν ἐπέδωκα ταῖς ὑπὲρ τούτων ταλαιπωρίαις; cf. 2.174: God's words to Jacob—"This son whom you believe to be lost (Joseph) has been preserved by my Providence, and I have led him into a greater happiness, hardly different from that of a king." Demetrius and Antonius gave themselves up to debauchery (ἀπολαύσεις), Plutarch, Ant. 90(3).1; cf. 91(4), 5.

ἀπολείπω

apoleipo, to leave behind

apoleipo, S 620; EDNT 1.135; MM 66; L&N 13.140, 15.59, 85.65; BDF §393(6); BAGD 94

After a quick visit to Crete, St. Paul left Titus there, and when he reached Rome as a prisoner, he had left Trophimus behind sick at Miletus (2Tim 4:20). As parallels to this meaning of apoleipo ("leave behind") one could cite 1Macc 9:65, "Jonathan left his brother Simon in the city"; 2Macc 4:29, "Menelaus left his own brother Lysimachus to replace him as high priest."¹ Not only people are left behind but also objects, just as the apostle left behind his cloak at the home of Carpos at Troas.²

This nuance of losing and missing, an extremely frequent usage, is pejorative;³ it refers to any sort of failure or deficiency,⁴ from lateness or absence⁵ to renunciation and abandonment, with connotations of disorder and betrayal.⁶ It is certainly with this connotation of "desertion" that the angels, whose natural habitation is heaven, are said to have "left their proper abode."⁷

The idea of leaving⁸ and perhaps the use of apoleipo to communicate that a deceased person leaves surviving progeny or leaves possessions behind⁹ coincide with the technical usage of this verb in wills, as is attested in the papyri and the inscriptions:¹⁰ the testator "leaves" his goods to his heirs. Thus, around 200 BC, Epicteta: "I leave as follows (apoleipo kata tan gegenemenan) in accord with the recommendation of my husband Phoenix";¹¹ in the second century AD, the will of Taptollion

(P.Wisc. 13, 6, 7, 11, 13) or P.Oxy. 105, 3–4: “If I die with this will unchanged, I leave as heir my daughter Ammonous . . . objects, furnishings, buildings, and all other property that I leave.”¹²

This meaning of “survival” or of “things left,” of definitive acquisition, is the meaning in Heb 4:6, 9, where participation in God’s rest is still bestowed upon or granted to believers,¹³ because God’s promise is as unalterable as a diatheke; it does not expire. But, on the other hand, “there remains no further sacrifice for the sins” of the apostates (10:26), because the divine economy has made no provision for their pardon.

¹ Cf. 2Macc 10:19; 1Macc 10:79; Judg 9:5—“Only Jotham was left”; 2Kgs 10:21; Josephus, War 2.108: “Aristobulus was intentionally left behind on Cyprus so that he would not be ambushed”; 4.107: “women and children were left behind”; Ant. 7.218; P.Athen. 1, 4 (letter of Amyntas to Zeno, from 16 March 257 BC): ἀξιολογοῦντες δὲ ἐν Μιέμφει ἀπολειφθεὶς ἐργάζεσθαι; Lucian, Nav. 32: “We easily took possession of the open cities, where we left governors behind.”

² 2Tim 4:13 (on the paenula, a long, heavy, and thick cloak, cf. C. Spicq, “Pèlerine et vêtements,” in Mélanges Tisserant, pp. 389–417); Josephus, War 1.667: “Ptolemy read a letter left by Herod for the benefit of his soldiers”; 3.452: “they left their mounts”; Ant. 18.38: the city; 14.354: the country; SB 6775, 2 (list of objects, from 257 BC): ἐν Ἑρμοῦπόλει ἀπολελοίπαμεν; hence, in an abstract and figurative sense: leave behind an opinion (Philo, Etern. World 7), a subject for criticism (vision of Maximus, in E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 168, 21), a souvenir (Wis 8:13; 10:8; Josephus, Ant. 15.298: Herod left for posterity a monument to his philanthropy), a job to finish (Josephus, War 7.303).

³ Sir 3:13—“If he has lost his understanding, be patient”; Josephus, Ant. 16.13: “Herod left out nothing that might please Marcus Agrippa”; 1.115; 1.215; 3.102; 9.236: “the king did not lack any virtue”; 1.75; 12.96; War 3.91: “no one should be missing from the ranks”; 3.250: “nothing that could terrify the eyes or ears was missing”; 4.382: “they left the bodies to rot in the sun”; 5.200; 5.222; 7.169; 7.186: “springs of water not lacking in sweetness.” Hence the connotation of inferiority (Ant. 14.129; Ag. Apion 2.39: a period of a little less than three thousand years). In some post-Euclidean mathematicians, ἀπολείπω, as a synonym of καταλείπω and ὑπολείπω refers to “the effect of a subtraction carried out on geometrical figures” (C.Mugler, Terminologie géométrique, p. 77).

⁴ P.Tebt. 10, 5; 72, 110; P.Rein. 109, 1: ε—ἀν ἀπολίπη = in case of default (second century BC); P.Oslo 85, 17; P.Mert. 70, 32: if it is still due (28 August AD 159).

⁵ Menander, Dysk. 402: “Getas, my boy, you are quite late”; Josephus, Ant. 9.135: “He would punish with death any absent priest”; 6.236: “the son of Jesse had been absent from the meal.”

⁶ Prov 2:17 (‘azab’); 19:27 (hadal); Sir 17:25; Isa 55:7; UPZ 19, 6: “our father deserted the community” (164 BC); P.Oxy. 1881, 19: not abandoning a lawsuit just because it has come to a conclusion; 2711, 6; Josephus, Ant. 7.136: they left him to fight alone; War 4.393: “many dissidents abandoned him”; Ant. 14.346: Phasaël did not think it right to abandon Hyrcanus; 8.335: they abandoned the true God; 8.296 (his worship); 6.231—Jonathan’s words to David: “God will not abandon you”; 1Clem. 3.4: “each one has abandoned the fear of God”; 7.2: “then let us leave behind vain and useless preoccupations.”

⁷ Jude 6: ἀπολιπόντας τὸ ἴδιον οἰ—κητήριον. In the Greek fragments of the book of Enoch found at Akhmim, Enoch receives this command: “Go say to the Watchers of heaven that, having left high heaven . . . they are unclean” (12.4); “why have you left high heaven?” (15.3). In 2Enoch 11, “the devil became Satan when he fled heaven” (ed. A. Vaillant, p. 103).

⁸ Polybius 2.1.6; Josephus, War 2.13.

⁹ Josephus, Ant. 8.285: Abias left twenty-two daughters behind; 8.272; 12.282; War 1.572; 588: Herod would take care not to leave any of his children alive. In AD 36: “My husband died, leaving me with three children” (P.Mich. 236, 5 = SB 7568, 5); BGU 1833, 5 (50 BC), τὰ ἀπολελειμμένα = things left by the deceased, inheritance (P.Mert. 26, 9; P.Harr. 68, 8; SB 9790, 7; 10500, 13, 16, 24, 27; 10756, 13); cf. P.Oxy. 2111, 22–24; 2583, 4.

¹⁰ It is set forth especially by J. H. Moulton, G. Milligan, The Vocabulary of the Greek Testament, 2d ed., London, 1949, under this word.

¹¹ C. Michel, Recueil, n. 1001, col. I, 7; col. II, 3: “I leave (ἀπολείπω) the museum with the enclosure” (RIJG, vol. 2, p. 78); P.Rein. 96, 5; P.Mil.Vogl. 79, 14; 161, col. II, 7.

¹² Chrest.Mitt., n. 371, col. IV, 9 (the time of Nero): κληρονόμον γὰρ αὐτὸν τω—ν ι—δίων ἀπολελοιπέναι; cf. n. 100, 17; BGU 1098, 49; 1148, 22; 1164, 18; Josephus, War 1.71: “John had left everything to Aristobulus.”

¹³ Cf. Polybius 6.58.9: ε—λπίς ἀπολείπεται σωτηρίας.

ἀπόστολος

apostolos, apostle

apostolos, S 652; TDNT 1.407–445; EDNT 1.142; NIDNTT 1.126–130, 133–134, 136; MM 70; L&N 33.194, 53.74; BAGD 99–100

This adjective (Plato, Ep. 7.346 a) and noun derives from the verb apostello, “send, dispatch,”¹ and like this verb it has a large variety of nuances that flow from the context.²

From Herodotus on, apostolos refers to the bearer of a message, such as the herald sent by Alyattes to Miletus (1.21). Varus authorizes a “delegation” (ton apostolon) of Jews to Rome (Josephus, Ant. 17.300, the only occurrence; 1.146 is very poorly attested). The word means someone sent on a mission out of the country, or an “expedition,”³ or a group of colonists (Dionysius of Halicarnassus 9.5). Beginning in the fourth century, however, apostolos almost always refers to a naval expedition, a fleet,⁴ a transport ship (P.Oxy. 522, 1; P.Tebt. 486: logos apostolou Triadelphou; PSI 1229, 13). In the papyri, it is a technical term⁵ for the naulotikai syngraphai, the official papers ordering the shipment of grain by boat on the Nile from the public granaries to Alexandria.⁶ The apostolos is a passport, a safe-conduct, or, if the bearer wished to leave, an exit authorization (prostagma, P.Oxy. 1271; cf. Strabo 2.3.5), an export license. Gnomon of the Idios Logos 162 prescribes: “Legal proceeding against persons who have embarked (at Alexandria) without a passport (choris apostolou) now fall under the jurisdiction of the prefects.”⁷

None of these meanings from everyday or legal parlance, except for the basic meaning “envoy, emissary,”⁸ can explain the extreme theological density of this term in the NT, especially in St. Paul. Paul’s usage presupposes a Semitic substrate, namely that of the shaliah,⁹ an institution apparently going back to Jehoshaphat.¹⁰ This person is not a mere envoy but a chargé d’affaires, a person’s authorized representative; his acts are binding upon the “sender.”¹¹ At this point the principal and the proxy are equivalent: “A person’s shaliah is as the person himself.”¹² This rule carries over into the religious sphere: when the shaliah acts on God’s orders, it is God himself who acts (b. B. Mes. 86b), as in the case of Abraham, Elijah, or Elisha (Midr. Ps. 78 5; 173b). The rabbis considered the priest who offered the sacrifice to be God’s shaliah, “doing more than we can do” (b. Qidd. 23b ; cf. Rengstorf, “ἀπόστολος,” in TDNT, vol. 1, pp. 407, 419, 424), and on the Day of Atonement they called the high priest

“the people’s representative before God” (m. Yoma 1.5; m. Git. 3.6). On the other hand, in the Mishnah and the Talmud, the shaliah represents the community (m. Rosh Hash. 4.9), invested with the power given him by his constituents. These data were little by little transposed into the Christian tradition.

“Jesus spent the night praying to God. When it was day he called his disciples, and having chosen twelve from among them, he named them apostles” (kai apostolous onomasen).¹³ Among the mathetai who followed him, shared his life, and belonged to him (cf. talmidim, students of a master), Christ marked out twelve who would represent him in a special way, would be more closely associated with him,¹⁴ and would therefore have special authority. For the moment nothing is said concerning their function, except that the word shaliah in itself indicates that they would be envoys and proxies with appropriate powers.¹⁵ This is what Mark 6:7 says on the occasion of the temporary mission in Galilee: “He called the Twelve to himself and began to send them (apostellein) two by two, giving them power over unclean spirits” (cf. Matt 10:1-2). With Jesus’ exousia at their disposal, the apostles are prepared to carry out their mission. Here we already see the essential character of Christian apostleship.

1. — The apostle is a religious person, one set apart,¹⁶ chosen from among others and called by Christ; which implies that the apostle will share Christ’s condition, abandon his property, his trade, his family, will drink his cup (Matt 20:23), receiving the baptism with which the Master was baptized (Mark 10:39). St. Luke insists, “Jesus, having through the Holy Spirit given his orders to the apostles whom he had chosen (hous exelexato), he was taken away” (Acts 1:2; cf. John 15:16, 19). St. Paul always justifies his authority as a proxy: kletos apostolos, apostle by (God’s) call (Rom 1:1), i.e., by virtue of a vocation. The recurrent formula is “apostle of Christ Jesus by God’s will” (1Cor 1:1; 2Cor 1:1; Col 1:1; Eph 1:1). The genitive Christou Iesou (1Pet 1:1) is a genitive of possession and of origin (cf. Rom 1:5), as clarified by the reference to the appearance of the resurrected Christ (1Cor 9:1; 15:3-9) and reinforced by the divine will (thelema).¹⁷ No surer basis can be given for the legitimacy of the apostolic mission: the mandate comes from God. “An apostle not in the name of humans, nor [appointed] by a human, but by Jesus Christ and God the Father” (Gal 1:1). This investiture is official and stable.¹⁸

2. — The apostle is essentially a person sent by someone to someone else. The purpose can be more or less secular;¹⁹ as a delegate or representative, this “apostolos is not greater than the one who sent him” (John 13:16); nevertheless, “whoever receives the one whom I have sent receives me, and whoever receives me receives the one who sent me.”²⁰ The attitude that a person takes toward the shaliah is in reality directed toward the person of the sender. The apostle’s mission is first of all that of preaching,²¹ but also founding churches (1Cor 9:2), forgiving sins (John 20:23), passing on the Holy Spirit (Acts 8:18), ordaining deacons (Acts 6:6), instituting presbyters (Titus 1:5). If need be, different audiences are specified: Peter is sent to the circumcised (Gal 2:7), Paul to the pagans (Rom 11:13; cf. 2Cor 10:13-16).

3. — Such a role in God's plan of salvation requires that the apostle be invested with power and authority (Luke 24:49; 1Thess 1:5). The Lord gave them the Holy Spirit and exousia over the demons. As heirs or proxies of Christ, the apostles live not only as itinerant missionaries but as heads of communities, repositories of Jesus' authority: "many wonders and signs were done by the apostles,"²² or more precisely, "by the power of God" (2Cor 6:7). This is what gives so much credibility to the teaching and the promises of the apostles (2Pet 3:2; Jude 17), since in reality they only pass on the word that they have received from their Master (1Thess 2:13—"The word that you heard from us is not the word of men but the word of God"). They are aware of this (Paul's message was with "a demonstration of the Spirit's power")²³ and conduct themselves as befits leaders,²⁴ even if they are considered the peripsema ("offscouring") of the universe (1Cor 4:13). They do not claim special privileges; they are servants (John 13:12-17; Luke 22:25-27), but they are at the top of the hierarchy of the kingdom of God. Apostolos is a title of honor ("I do not deserve to be called an apostle, because I persecuted the church of God" [1Cor 15:9]; "As apostles of Christ, we could have looked down on you" [1Thess 2:7]), because the "holy apostles" (Eph 3:5; Rev 18:20) are entirely consecrated to God (John 17:19).

4. — Since the Bible is neither a law code nor a theological handbook, words gain richer theological meaning from day to day and do not have a definite meaning that is fixed once and for all. In the NT, there are the high apostles, and there are second-order apostles. St. Luke knows only the Twelve as apostles: hoi dodeka. Matt 10:2 specifies hoi dodeka apostoloi. The Semitism epoiesen tous dodeka (literally, "he made the twelve") in Mark 3:13-19 confirms that Jesus did indeed himself establish the college of the Twelve to govern the new Israel.²⁵ These shelûhîm are proxies, representatives, plenipotentiaries, granted his own powers: "The one who listens to you listens to me, and the one who rejects you rejects me; but the one who rejects me rejects the One who sent me" (Luke 10:16; cf. Matt 10:14). In governing the church (cf. Matt 19:28; Luke 22:28-30), better than the "twelve men and three priests" who presided over the Qumran community, these apostles are "pillars" (Gal 2:9), "VIPs" (Gal 2:2, 6), judges and guarantors of orthodoxy, established to abide forever, forever united with Christ. They are the "twelve apostles of the Lamb" (Rev 21:14).

In a text whose importance cannot be overestimated, the resurrected Lord is said to have appeared first of all to Cephas, then to the Twelve, and then to "all the apostles, and after all them to me (Paul)" (1Cor 15:5-8). These apostoloi named after the twelve could be divinely appointed missionary preachers, charismatics who are listed first among the official ministers of the church (1Cor 12:28-31; Eph 4:11), which shows that there is no conflict between institutions and charisms. Their anonymity is like that of the “apostles and presbyters” who are associated in an indeterminate group in Acts 15:4, 6, 22, 23; 16:4. Nevertheless, we know of Barnabas, Paul’s collaborator (Acts 14:4, 14; 2Cor 12:7) and of particularly zealous missionaries like Andronicus and Junias, “outstanding among the apostles.”²⁶ Just as there are always unfaithful stewards, there were Jewish-Christian missionaries, hardened in their prejudices, who took pride in the title of apostle and played up their prestige, hoi hyperlian apostoloi (2Cor 12:11); these “super-apostles” (2Cor 11:5) are “false apostles.”²⁷ The church at Ephesus is congratulated for having identified them: “You have tested those who call themselves apostles but are not, and you have found them to be liars” (Rev 2:2).

5. — “Consider the apostle (Peshitta: shliho) and high priest of our faith, Jesus” (Heb 3:1). This is the only time that Christ is described as apostolos (before Justin, 1 Apol. 1.12). Perhaps there is a reference to the angel of Yahweh (Hebrew mal’aj), messenger and guide who led Israel during their wanderings in the wilderness (Exod 14:19; 23:20, 23; 32:34; 33:2; Num 20:16), God’s help personified for his people.²⁸ We might also think of a contrast with Moses, chosen from among the Israelites to lead them, but not coming from heaven like the Son;²⁹ more likely, however, the author of Hebrews is showing the influence of the Johannine tradition,³⁰ in which Christ is first and foremost the one “sent” from God.³¹ Note John 9:7—“Siloam, which is translated Sent” (Siloam, ho hermeneuetai Apestalmenos). The Evangelist treats the substantive shiloah, referring to a canal leading or “sending” water, as a passive participle and considers it a proper name (cf. Isa 8:6ff.; Gen 49:10, Hebrew shiloh; given a messianic interpretation at Gen. Rab. 98.13; 99.10; Tg. Onq.), which he applies to Jesus, “the Sent One,” by antonomasia (John 3:17, 34; 5:36; 7:29). Moreover, in Heb 3:1 the connection of “apostle” and “high priest” indicates that Jesus’ divine mission is to “represent” humankind before God, to be the shaliah, the one delegated by believers to plead their cause, a paraclete (1John 2:1), interceding unceasingly on their behalf in the heavenly sanctuary (John 14:13-14). His “apostolate” is his permanent priestly office.

¹ Herodotus 5.32: “Artaphernes sent the army to Aristagoras”; 4.150: Grinnus “did not dare to send out colonists to an uncertain destination”; 1.123: Harpagus “sent (a message)” to Persia; Aristotle, Pol. 5.7.2.1306b: “They were sent to colonize Tarentum”; Xenophon, An. 2.1.5: “Clearchus sent messengers” (ἀποστέλλει τοὺς ἀγγέλους); Thucydides 3.89.5: “with the tidal waves, the earth shook and the sea retreated”; 3.28.1 (an embassy); Sophocles, Phil. 125: “I am going to send him back to the ship”

(πρὸς ναῦν ἀποστελω— πάλιν); 1297; El. 71; Euripides, Phoen. 485: “send the army away” from the land. In the sense of “banish” (idem, Med. 281; Plato, Resp. 10.607 b). In the Hellenistic period, Vespasian “had dispatched (ἀπεσταλμένος) his son Titus to Syria” (Josephus, War 4.32); “Diogenes was sent as a scout and brought us other news” (Epictetus 1.24.6); with a religious meaning: “the cynic must know that he has been sent to humans by Zeus as a messenger” (ἄγγελος, idem 3.22.23), “as an example sent by God” (4.8.31); Joseph “was not sent (ἀπεστάλθαι) by humans but was chosen by God to govern the body and the outside world legitimately” (Philo, Migr. Abr. 22). We may recall Hecataeus of Abdera, in the third century AD, according to whom the Jews considered the high priest “the messenger of God’s commands” (ἄγγελον γίνεσθαι τω—ν τοῦ θεοῦ προσταγμάτων, cited by Diodorus Siculus 40.3; cf. T. Reinach, Textes d’auteurs grecs et romains relatifs au Judaïsme, 2d ed., Hildesheim, 1963, p. 17; F. R. Walton, “The Messenger of God in Hecataeus of Abdera,” in HTR, 1955, pp. 25–257). —Αποστέλλειν, “emit,” express the shining out of light (C. Mugler, Terminologie optique, p. 53). — The bibliography, which is considerable, is given in TWNT, vol. 10, pp. 986–989. In P.Grenf. I, 43, 5 (letter from the second century BC), where all that remains is the ending of the perfect active infinitive -κέναι, we must read not ἡγορακέναι—“you wrote me that you had bought a mare” (Chrest. Wilck., n. 57; S. Witkowski, Epistulae Privatae Graecae 58)—but ἀπεσταλκέναι “had sent” (C.Pap.Jud., n. 135). The writer of the letter is letting his brother know that he has “received neither the mare nor the wagon”; the agent has not yet had time to carry out his mission (cf. J. M. Modrzejewski, “Sur l’antisémitisme païen,” in Pour Léon Poliakov: Le Racisme, mythes et sciences, Brussels, 1981, p. 415).

² It is difficult to say exactly what the difference is between ἀποστέλλω and πέμπω, since each author has his own vocabulary and is not even always consistent with himself. (Cf. J. Rademakers, “Mission et apostolat dans l’Evangile johannique,” in F. L. Cross, SE, II, Berlin, 1964, pp. 100–121; J. Seynaeve, “Les Verbes ἀποστέλλω et πέμπω dans le vocabulaire théologique de saint Jean,” in M. de Jonge, L’Evangile de Jean, Gembloux-Louvain, 1977, pp. 385–389). In principle, this latter verb means simply to pass something on (Herodotus 1.123: send gifts) or send a person (a herald, idem 1.21), an intermediary. In the third century AD, P.Hal. I, 124, 147, 154 (cf. P.Hal., p. 84) disallows lawsuits against the king’s envoys (ἀπεσταλμένων ὑπὸ τοῦ βασιλέως); this perfect passive participle indicates that the mission with which they are entrusted is linked to the persons of these officers, these “representatives” who act with the monarch’s authority; cf. K. H. Rengstorff, “ἀπόστολος,” in TDNT, vol. 1, pp. 407–445.

³ Demosthenes, 3 Olynth. 3.5: “You have given up the expedition” (τὸν ἀπόστολον; cf. the inscription from Cyprus in J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1961, p. 257, n. 824). This is often the meaning of ἀποστολή: the mission of the sacred ambassadors to Alexandria (SEG I, 366, 25); “How shall we justify our mission?” (Ep. Arist. 15); the sending or departure of people (P. Tebt. 703, 22; Josephus, Ant. 20.50; Life 268); “an expedition of angels of woe” (Ps 78:49; cited by Philo, Giants 17); “Your shoots (ἀποστολαί σου) are a garden of pomegranates” (Cant 4:13); Philo translates Methuselah ἀποστολή θανάτου, expedition of death (Post. Cain 73). In 256 BC, Panakestor is superintendent of expeditions or shipments: ὁ πρὸς ται—ς ἀποστολαι—ς (P.Lond. 1964, 6 and 18; cf. Pelops as ἀποστελεύς, ibid. 1940, 3). Frequently enough, ἀποστολή means “gift, present” (1Macc 2:18; 2Macc 3:12; 1Esdr 9:51, 54; P.Hamb. 191, 8); it translates the Hebrew shiluhîm (from the verb shalah in the piel, “dismiss”) in 1Kgs 9:16—the dowry given by Pharaoh to his daughter, who took leave of him to marry.

⁴ Dittenberger, Syl. 305, 50; Demosthenes, Corona 80: “I dispatched all the expeditions (τοὺς ἀποστόλους) that saved the Chersonese, Byzantium, and all the allies”; Lysias, Property of Aristophanes 19.21: “the envoys (πρέσβεις) from Cyprus ... lacked money for the departure of the fleet” (ει—ς τὸν ἀπόστολον). Hesychius, taking up Demosthenes 18.107, defines the apostolos as an admiral: στρατηγὸς κατὰ πλοῦν πεμπόμενος. The apostoleis in Aeschines are maritime quartermasters (Fals. Leg. 2.177). T. Nägeli, Wortschatz, p. 23, quotes a lexicon: ὁ ε—κπεμπόμενος μετὰ στρατια—ς καὶ παρασκευῆς ἀπόστολος καλεῖ—ται.

⁵ With the exception of late and Christian texts: the living expenses of a messenger during his sojourn and his voyage (P.Apoll. 89, 7; P.Ross.Georg. IV, 1, 7 and 31; 11, 3); Μααμετ ἀπόστολος θεοῦ (SB 7240, 5; seventh–eighth century); the apostle Paul (P.Lond. 1915, 14; 1927, 35; SB 8176; an inscription at Cappadocia, in J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1939, p. 518, n. 451), Peter (SB 6087, 18), James (6206), Andrew (8179), the intercession of the apostles (IGLS 1587). The Latin epitaph of Faustina, a Jew who died at age fourteen, in the fifth–sixth century at Venosa in Apulia, states that “her funeral oration was done by two apostles and two rabbis” (CII, n. 611; gives the bibliography on apostoli, who date to the fourth century in Judaism; cf. Epiphanius, Pan. 30.11; Eusebius, In Isa. 18.11); cf. J. Jeremias, “Paarweise Sendung im Neuen Testament,” in A. J. B. Higgins, New Testament Essays, pp. 136–143.

⁶ The naukleros, commanding eight transport ships, receives and measures his shipment “conformably to the message” of the epitropos

(P.Oxy. 1259, 10). The formula ε—ξ ἀποστόλου is constant (P.Stras. 205, 4–5; 202, 6; P.Princ. 26, 14; SB 9088, 8). In 64/63 BC, ναυκλήρων Ἴπποδροματῶ—ν ἀποστόλου ἀντίγραφον (BGU 1741, 6); in AD 15, P.Lond. 256 recto a 10 (Chrest.Mitt., n. 443). Cf. A. J. M. Meyer-Termeer, Die Haftung der Schiffer im griechischen und römischen Recht, Zutphen, 1978, pp. 6, 24; U. Wilcken, Grundzüge, pp. 379ff. Chrest.Wilck. (p. 21) compares Dig. 49.6.1: “litteras dimissorias sive apostolos.”

⁷ Cf. P.Amh. 138, 10 (cf. Chrest.Mitt., n. 342); P.Oxy. 1197, 13; 1259, 10; P.Princ. 26, 14; P.Stras. 202, 6; 205, 4–5; 206, 4; SB 7405, 6; 8754, 9; 9088, 8.

⁸ In the first century, apostolos is rare in literary Greek; unknown in Philo, used only once in Josephus, it is a LXX hapax: The prophet Ahijah was warned by God concerning the visit of Jereboam’s wife, who was coming to consult him concerning her son’s illness. When she arrived, he said, “I have been sent (ε—γώ ει—μι ἀπόστολος; Hebrew shalah) to you with bad news” (1Kgs 14:6). But ἀποστέλλω is used for a prophet’s mission, cf. D. Müller, “Apostle,” in NIDNTT, Grand Rapids, 1975.

⁹ Cf. Rengstorf, “ἀπόστολος,” in TDNT, vol. 1, pp. 407–445; H. Mosbech, “Apostolos in the New Testament,” in ST, 1950, pp. 166–200; G. Dix, Jurisdiction in the Early Church: Episcopal and Papal, London, 1938; J. C. Margot, “L’Apostolat dans le Nouveau Testament et la succession apostolique,” in Verbum Caro, 1957, pp. 213–225; J. Colson, Les Fonctions ecclésiales aux deux premier siècles, Paris, 1956, pp. 11ff.; J. Dauvillier, Les Temps apostoliques: I^{er} siècle, Paris, 1970, pp. 139ff., 151–156, 175ff., 225ff. M. Delcor, E. Jenni, article jlv, in Theol. Handwörterbuch zum A. T., vol. 2, 909–916. The most nuanced studies are C. K. Barrett, “Shaliah and Apostle” (in Donum Gentilicium . . . in honour D. Daube, Oxford, 1978, pp. 88–102) and A. L. Descamps, “Paul, apôtre de Jésus-Christ,” in Lorenzo de Lorenzi, Paul de Tarse apôtre de notre temps, Rome, 1979, pp. 25–60. The shaliah was not a missionary but a member of the Jewish community; the title was not applied to prophets; whereas the title of the Christian apostle emphasizes the official status and especially the divine origin and authority of the envoy; the apostle has a religious character. Cf. E. M. Kredel, “Der Apostelbegriff in der neueren Exegese,” in ZKT, 1959, pp. 169–193; 257–305.

¹⁰ 2Chr 17:7-9: “In the third year of his reign, he sent his officials Ben-Hail, Obadiah, Zechariah, Nethanel, and Micaiah to teach in the towns of Judah. He sent with them the Levites. . . .”

¹¹ We may recall Eliezer, Abraham's shaliah, sent to Laban and Bethuel to arrange Isaac's marriage with Rebekah (Gen 24). According to m. Qidd. 2.1 (41*b*), a man or a woman can marry through the agency of a shaliah.

¹² M. Ber. 5.5. The shaliah is an agent (b. Git. 14*b*; t. Git. 1.4); a minor cannot appoint a proxy (m. Git. 6.3). A mission to take someone something that belongs to him cannot be withdrawn (t. Git. 1.8–9). Cf. Str-B, vol. 3, pp. 2ff., citing Mek. on Exod 12:4 (5*a*); 12:6 (7*a*); b. Īag. 10*b*; b. Nazir 12*b*.

¹³ Luke 6:13. J. Dupont (Le Nom d'Apôtres a-t-il été donné aux Douze par Jésus?, Louvain, 1956), L. Cerfaux ("Pour l'histoire du titre Apostolos dans le Nouveau Testament," in Recueil L. Cerfaux, vol. 3, Gembloux, 1962, pp. 186–200) and others consider this title to be redactional and not given by Jesus, but (with Rengstorf, Descamps, A. Médebielle, "Apostolat," in DBSup, vol. 1, pp. 533–588) we must insist that Jesus could very well have used the word shaliah to designate disciples given a special charge to represent him and participate in his ministry.

¹⁴ Mark 3:14 specifies: "He appointed twelve to be with him," so as to train them better. In fact, we see them join together as apostoloi around Jesus (Mark 6:30), returning to him after their mission to report to him all that they had done (Luke 9:10). They ask him to increase their faith (Luke 17:5). It is to them alone that the Lord speaks confidentially at the Last Supper (Luke 22:14); he places his testament in their hands; they are his heirs (John 13:17); he will remain with them always (Matt 28:20), cf. Phil 3:12.

¹⁵ Cf. L. Cerfaux, "La mission apostolique de Douze et sa portée eschatologique," in Mélanges Tisserant, vol. 1, pp. 4–66; A. L. Descamps, "Aux origines du ministère: La Pensée de Jésus," in RTL, 1971, pp. 3–45; 1972, pp. 121–159; F. Agnew, "On the Origin of the Term Apostolos," in CBQ, 1976, pp. 49–53.

¹⁶ Rom 1:1, ἄφωρισμένος; cf. A. M. Denis, "Investiture de la fonction apostolique par 'apocalypse': Etude thématique de Gal. I, 16," in RB, 1957, pp. 335–362; 492–515; A. Satake, "Apostolat und Gnade bei Paulus," in NTS, vol. 15, 1968–1969, pp. 96–107.

¹⁷ Cf. 2Tim 1:1; θέλημα is replaced by ε—πιταγή (in 1Tim 1:1; Titus 1:3), which expresses a particularly imperative command, notwithstanding any custom or order to the contrary, an irrevocable decree that is carried out.

¹⁸ Cf. τίθημι, "install in a function" (1Tim 2:7; cf. Acts 20:28; 1Cor 12:28), and πιστευθῆναι (1Tim 1:11–13; Titus 1:3). A. M. Denis, "L'Apôtre Paul prophète ‘messianique’ des Gentils,” in ETL, 1957, pp. 300ff. G. Klein, Die Zwölf Apostel: Ursprung und Gehalt einer Idee, Göttingen, 1961.

¹⁹ Paul left for Damascus as the shaliah of the Sanhedrin, armed with letters of requisition (Acts 9:2; 22:5; 26:10, 12). The Jews of Rome had not received any shaliah speaking ill of Paul (Acts 28:21); the church at Antioch sends Barnabas and Saul to Jerusalem (Acts 11:30; 13:3-4; 15:2); the church at Jerusalem sends Barsabbas and Silas to Antioch (Acts 15:23). The Philippians send Epaphroditus to help Paul (Phil 2:5). Titus and other brothers who receive gifts for the collection are ἀπόστολοι ἐκκλησιῶν (2Cor 8:23), sent and authorized by the churches.

²⁰ John 13:20, the only occurrence of ἀπόστολος in John, who uses the verbs ἀποστέλλω and πέμπω. The mission of Jesus in the world (John 3:17, 34; 5:36-38; 6:29; 7:29; 8:42; 10:36; 11:42; 17:3, 8, 23) will be carried on by his own apostles (Matt 10:5; Luke 9:2; 11:49; John 4:38). “Just as you sent me into the world, so also have I sent them into the world” (John 17:18; cf. 20:21). Cf. J. Seynaeve, “Les Verbes ἀποστέλλω et πέμπω,” pp. 385–389; F. Klostermann, Das christliche Apostolat, Innsbruck, 1962; Y. Congar, “Définition de l’apostolat par son contenu,” in ÔSpir, n. 535, 1967, pp. 130–160; cf. L. M. Dewailly, “Note sur l’histoire de l’adjectif ‘apostolique,’” in Envoyés du Père, 2d ed., Paris, 1960, pp. 114–140.

²¹ Mark 3:14; Matt 28:20; 1Cor 1:17, cf. proclaiming the gospel or Christ as Savior (1Thess 2:2, 4; Rom 11:13-14; 1Cor 1:17; Gal 1:16; Eph 3:8), bearing witness to him (Acts 1:22; 4:33; 1Cor 1:6; 1Tim 2:6), etc. The responsibility of Judas, which was a ministry (διακονία), is defined by St. Peter: an ἀποστολή (Acts 1:25), as Paul had “received χάριν καὶ ἀποστολήν” (Rom 1:5; cf. 1Cor 9:2) and Peter, the apostle to the Jews (Gal 2:8); but its content is never specified. Cf. A. M. Denis, “La fonction apostolique et la liturgie nouvelle en esprit,” in RSPT, 1958, pp. 401–436; 617–656; A. Ródenas, “El apostolado, ministerio de salvación en el Nuevo Testamento,” in Analecta Calasanctiana, 1966, pp. 5–29.

²² Acts 2:43; 4:33, 37; 5:12; Christians come to lay the proceeds from the sale of their property at the apostles’ feet, as the holy women returning from the sepulcher announced what they had seen to the apostles (Luke 24:10); but Peter tries and convicts Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5:2, 9). Miracles are signs that accredit the apostolos (2Cor 12:12).

²³ 1Cor 2:4-5; cf. Acts 4:7-33. St. Paul insisted more than anyone else on the dynamis of God as underlying the apostle’s effectiveness, cf. 2Cor 4:7; 6:7; 10:6; 13:9; Eph 3:7; Col 1:29.

²⁴ Cf. F. Giblet, “Les Douze: Histoire et théologie,” in Recherches bibliques, vol. 7, Desclée De Brouwer, 1965, pp. 51–64A; reprinted in L. Descamps, Le Prêtre, Foi et Contestation, Gembloux-Paris, 1970, pp. 44–76.

²⁵ B. Rigaux, “Die ‘Zwölf’ in Geschichte und Kerygma,” in H. Ristow, K. Matthiae, Der historische Jesus und der kerygmatische Christus, Berlin, 1961, pp. 468–486; cf. J. Giblet, “Les Douze: Histoire et théologie.” “The Twelve” is a closed group. Judas is still referred to as εἰς τῶ—ν δώδεκα (Mark 14:10, 20; Matt 26:14, 17; Luke 22:47; John 6:71). Since the Scripture required that the number of the Twelve be reconstituted in its totality (Ps 69:26; 109:8), Matthias was elected to replace the traitor (Acts 1:15-26), although he does not appear again and plays no role in the book of Acts. If the integrity of the college of the Twelve is so important, it is because it has a specific mission in the history of salvation and will be the guarantor of the Christian tradition (P. H. Menoud, “Les Additions au groupe des Douze Apôtres dans le Livre des Actes,” in idem, Jésus-Christ et la foi, Neuchâtel-Paris, 1975, pp. 91–100). If Paul of Tarsus can claim the title of apostolos in its full meaning (Acts 22:15; 26:16) it is because on the one hand he has seen the resurrected Christ and been given this charge by him, and on the other hand because he is the missionary par excellence (cf. 2Cor 5:20—“We are ambassadors for Christ, seeing that it is God who urges you through us”). He is the only one to go “to the ends of the earth” (Acts 1:8), traveling as far as Spain (cf. C. Spicq, “Saint Paul est venu en Espagne,” in Helmantica, 1964, pp. 45–70; idem, Les Epîtres Pastorales, pp. 129–138). “Paul in himself is another circle, outside of and parallel to the circle of the Twelve. They are envoys to Israel and its proselytes; he goes to the pagans” (P. H. Menoud, Jésus-Christ et la foi, p. 100); cf. J. Munck, “La Vocation de l’Apôtre Paul,” in ST, 1947, pp. 131–145; idem, “Paul, the Apostle, and the Twelve,” ST, 1950, pp. 96–110; J. Cambier, “Paul, apôtre du Christ et prédicateur de l’Evangile,” in NRT, 1959, pp. 1,009–1,028; idem, “Le Critère paulinien de l’apostolat en II Cor. XII, 6ff.,” in Bib, 1962, pp. 481–518; F. Bovon, Luc le théologien, Neuchâtel-Paris, 1978, pp. 370–389.

²⁶ Rom 16:7. Cf. E. Lohse, Ursprung und Prägung des christlichen Apostolates, in TZ, 1953, pp. 259–257; J. Dauvillier, Les Temps apostoliques: Ier siècle, pp. 322ff. On the different meanings of the word apostle in the Pauline churches, cf. P. Grelot, “Les Epîtres de Paul, la mission apostolique,” in J. Delorme, Le Ministère et les ministères selon le Nouveau Testament, Paris, 1973, pp. 48ff.

²⁷ 2Cor 11:13. It is not easy to identify these enemies of Paul’s ministry; were they Jewish Christians? false teachers (cf. ψευδοπροφήται, Matt 7:15; Luke 6:26; Acts 13:6; 2Pet 1:1)? uncommissioned missionaries? Cf.

C. K. Barrett, “ψευδαπόστολοι (II Cor. XI, 13),” in Mélanges Rigaux, pp. 377–396. J. Dupont, “L’Apôtre comme intermédiaire du salut dans les Actes des Apôtres,” in RTP, 1980, pp. 342–358; J. Zumstein, “L’Apôtre comme martyr dans les Actes de Luc,” RTP, 1980, pp. 371–390.

²⁸ “A sort of mediator of the covenant” and even of God’s own appearance in human form (cf. Judg 6:17ff.); cf. G. von Rad, OT Theology, vol. 1, pp. 287ff.

²⁹ Cf. P. Borgen, “God’s Agent in the Fourth Gospel,” in J. Neusner, Religions in Antiquity, Leiden, 1970, pp. 137–148.

³⁰ Cf. C. Spicq, Hébreux, vol. 1, pp. 109–131. Moderns consider this Johannine tradition very old, cf. ibid., p. 132, n. 2; A. Gyllenberg, “Die Anfänge der johanneischen Tradition,” in Neutestamentliche Studien für R. Bultmann, Berlin, 1954, pp. 144–147; B.P. W. Stather Hunt, Some Johannine Problems, London, 1958, pp. 105–123.

³¹ Cf. John 17:3, 18; 20:21; 1John 4:10—ἀπέστειλεν . . . ἰ—λασμόν. In the discourse after the Last Supper, “the Teacher becomes the Intercessor; the Prophet, the High Priest” (H. B. Swete, The Last Discourse and Prayer of Our Lord, London, 1914, p. 159).

ἀργός

argos, inactive, inoperative

argos, S 692; TDNT 1.452; EDNT 1.150; MM 74; L&N 30.44, 42.46, 65.36, 72.21, 88.248; BDF §59(1); BAGD 104

A contracted form of aergos, the adjective argos is the opposite of energos, “active, effective” (cf. synergos: one who helps; euergetes, benefactor), and means “inactive, idle, not working” when it is used to describe people (cf. Diodorus Siculus 17.79.3) and “ineffectual, incapable of doing something, sterile, inoperative, ineffective, unfruitful” when it is used to describe things. These meanings occur constantly throughout classical Greek¹ and in the Koine. Menander: “He will call you a pest, a loafer” (Dysk. 366); “they reduce me to inaction”;² Plutarch: “Marius did not spend this period in idleness” (Cor. 31.4); “a lazy and idle crowd” (argon de kai scholasten ochlon, Sol. 22.3; cf. 31.5, Pisistratus promulgates the law on idleness, ton tes argias nomon; cf. Ti. Gracch. 1.3). In Philo, the dozen occurrences of argos refer to a lazy and indolent life (Philo, Conf. Tongues 43; Philo, Spec. Laws 2.101), “the idlest (argotate) and least formed soul has been allotted to the fish” (Creation 65; Alleg. Interp. 1.32), brute, unformed matter (Flacc. 148; Moses 2.136; Spec. Laws 1.21), idle land, meaning land lying fallow (Spec. Laws 2.86, 2.88). Likewise in Josephus: at the time for sowing “the people spent fifty days doing nothing” (War 2.200); David decided to march against the Philistines “being neither idle nor slack in his conduct of affairs” (meden argon mede rhathymon en tois pragmasin).³

In the vocabulary of the papyri, argos almost always means “not busy, unused,” whether describing persons⁴ or things: a house or a place (P.Mil. 67, col. 1.7: oikos protos argos; P.Mich. 620, 58, 60, 73, 83, 90, 107, 108, arge kella), a chest that is empty or out of service (P.Oxy. 1269, 22), land that has not been sown (P.Stras. 144, 5; cf. PSI 837, 7; Dittenberger, Syl. 884, 23), an oil press that is not in working order,⁵ unproductive money: “they say that their gold is sitting idle and that they are greatly wronged” (P.Cair.Zen. 59021, 25: SB 6711; cf. 10257, 18). Finally, the onos argos is a beast that is good for nothing, as opposed to others that carry loads (P.Lond. 1170 verso, 474, 483; SB 9150, 38).

The three occurrences of argos in the OT are rather in the sense of “inert, unproductive.” God does not want for the works of wisdom to be ineffectual, erga arga, i.e., created in vain, remaining sterile, unexploited, unproductive (Wis 14:5); the feet of the idols are useless for walking (Wis 15:15); the idle or lazy servant is not consulted concerning a great labor (Sir 37:11), he must be put to work lest he remain idle (Sir 33:28, hina me arge).

At least seven of the eight NT occurrences retain the meaning “not busy, idle, inactive.” In the parable of the workers sent to the vineyard, certain ones have not yet been hired and wait around “not doing anything” (Matt 20:3, 6). Young widows who no longer have a household to manage, have no child to raise, and do not devote their time to prayer become idle (argai manthanousin), and not only idle but gossips and busybodies (1Tim 5:13). Epimenides of Cnossos, in calling the Cretans “do-nothing bellies,” means that they are gluttons who get fat doing nothing.⁶ According to Jas 2:20 “faith without works is sterile,”⁷ i.e., useless for salvation; but 2Pet 1:8 recognizes “you are not inactive and without fruit (ouk argous oude akarpous) toward the exact knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ.”

On Matt 12:36 all the commentators take different tacks:⁸ “For every idle word that one speaks one will give account on the day of judgment.” How should we take pan rhema argon? As E. Stauffer has pointed out, it seems to be true that this warning must be assessed alongside the paideai stomatos of Sir 23 and the disciplina oris of Qumran, where there was a cult of silence.⁹ In fact, the expression logon argon is found in Josephus, Ant. 15.224, where it refers to an inconsequential utterance or bit of advice, one that is not taken into account, that has no effect. In Philo, Dreams 1.29, sound issues from thought, and “it is in the mouth that it is articulated”; the tongue serves as the herald and interpreter of the intelligence and “does not produce a sound that is not just that, that is ineffectual (argen)”; cf. the ban on hasty speech (Spec. Laws 1.53); Sent. Sextus 154: “words without thought are mere noise” (rhemata aneu nou psophos). Pythagoras had instructed “It is better to throw a stone with no goal than to utter an idle word” (e logon argon, in Stobaeus, Ecl. 3.34.11; vol. 3, p. 684); cf. Pindar, frag. 58: “Take care not to utter useless words (ton achreion logon) in front of everyone.”¹⁰ Finally, this expression was used for the fatalistic argument posed by Chrysippus, the conclusion of which was the rejection of any initiative at all,¹¹ which is the argos logos theorem taken up by Plutarch (De fato 11) and Cicero.¹² Thus, not only is argos commonly linked with logos in the first century, but it always has the meaning “ineffective, inactive.” Therefore this meaning must be applied in Matt 12:36, where it fits the meaning of the context (bearing good or bad fruit, verse 33) and of all the other biblical occurrences, especially since it accords with the theology of the word in the Old and New Testaments: the word of God is never ineffectual (Isa 55:11), because it is by definition energes (Heb 4:12). Similarly the word of the Christian must issue in ergon (1John 3:18; cf. Phlm 6); it would be out of line with its dynamism for it to be inoperative, without effect. Thus it seems to have been understood by Did. 2.5: “Your word shall not be empty (ou kenos logos), but fulfilled in action.”¹³

¹ Aristophanes, Ran. 1498: διατριβὴν ἀργόν; numerous references in LSJ under this word.

² Dysk. 443: ποιούσιν γέ με ἀργόν; “he isn’t a person to walk around all day doing nothing, ἀργὸς περιπατεῖ—ν” (ibid. 755); Philostratus, Gym. 44: “instead of being active, they are lazy, ἀργοὶ δὲ ε—ξ ε—νεργω—ν”; 58: “older athletes should be exposed to the sun, for they lie resting (ἀργοὶ κείμενοι)” while others are full of vigor (ε—νεργοί); cf. 34, 35.

³ Ant. 7.96; War 6.44: “if you remain idle with such powerful arms”; 4.309, a vain clamor opposed to an effective rescue; Ant. 12.378, land that hasn’t been sown is argen. The Sabbath and the sabbatical year are times of rest, of the cessation of all activity, War 1.60; 2.517; 4.100; 7.53; cf. 2Macc 5:25.

⁴ P.Lond. 915, 8 (vol. 3, p. 27); BGU 833, 5; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XI, 24, 19; SB 9604, 24, 7: Ἀμμωνος ἄργου. —P.Brem. 13, 5: “καθήμεθα ἀργοί, we are here without work”; BGU 1078, 6: οὐ γὰρ ἀργὸν δεῖ— με καθῆσθαι (letter of AD 39); SB 8247, 22: πορόεσθε ἕκαστος εἰ—ς τὰ εἶδια καὶ μὴ γείνεσθε ἀργοί (around AD 63).

⁵ —Ελαιουργίου ἀργοῦ (P.Amh. 97, 9; P.Flor. 1, 4; cf. SB 10278, 10–12). In the third century, a dioiketes writes to a subordinate: “if you are unable to find the available material” (P.Tebt. 703, 159).

⁶ Titus 1:12; cf. Theopompus (in Athenaeus 12.527a): the laziest inhabitants of Pharsalus and the most luxurious of all people, ἀργότατοι καὶ πολυτελέστατοι.

⁷ The reading of B, whereas a, A, Peshitta have νεκρά.

⁸ Cf. J. Viteau, “La ‘Parole oiseuse’: Sur saint Matthieu XII, 36,” in ÔSpir, Supplément, 1931, pp. 16–28; E. Stauffer, “Von jedem unnützen Wort?” in Gott und die Götter (Festgabe E. Fascher), Berlin, 1958, pp. 94–102; L.-M. Dewayly, “La Parole sans œuvre (Mt. XII, 36),” in Mélanges M.-D. Chenu, Paris, 1967, pp. 203–219. —It isn’t certain that this logion is in its true location and fits in with the polemical pericope against the Pharisees.

⁹ Cf. 1QS 6.11: “In the Assembly of the Congregation no one should speak a word without the permission of the Congregation”; 7.9, a penalty “for the one who utters with his mouth a profane word (nbl) and for interrupting his neighbor’s speech”; 10.21–24: “no profanity will be heard in my mouth”; CD 10.17: “on the Sabbath day, no one must use any profane (nbl) or scornful language.” —A number of the church fathers understood Matt 12:36 to refer to foul, blameworthy, shameful, or slanderous language (cf. J. Viteau, L.-M. Desailly); but the rabbis understood debarîm betalîm as referring to language that was superfluous, lacking in substance, trivial, vain (cf. Str-B, vol. 1, p. 640). It would be necessary to give an accounting even for the negative, for that which did not exist.

¹⁰ SVF, vol. 2, 278, 19.

¹¹ Cf. the ἀχρει—ος slave (Matt 25:30; Luke 18:10), i.e., the one who does not work. “The adjective ἀχρει—ος . . . is hard to translate. It is used of men who are no good, or no longer good, for service; for soldiers not fit for duty because of their age or their injuries; and figuratively of persons from whom nothing can be had, or from whom one no longer has anything to get” (E. Delebecque, Etudes grecques, p. 106).

¹² Cicero, Fat. 12.28–29: “We do not burden ourselves with what is called the ‘idle argument;’ philosophers apply the label argos logos to an argument that would lead us to lead lives of total inactivity. This is how the question is posed: If it is your fate to recover from this illness, then whether you go to the doctor or not you will recover. Likewise, if it is your fate not to be cured of this disease, then whether you go to the doctor or not you will not recover. And one of the two is your fate. Thus it is useless to go to the doctor.”

¹³ Cf. Plutarch, De garr. 2: “the speech of prattlers is infertile and leads to nothing”; Lyc. 19.3: “an intemperate tongue makes discourse empty and senseless.”

ἀρνέομαι, ἀπαρνέομαι

arneomai, aparneomai, to say no, deny, repudiate

arneomai, S 720; TDNT 1.469–471; EDNT 1.153–155; NIDNTT 1.454–56; MM 78; L&N 30.52, 31.25, 33.277, 34.48, 36.43, 88.231; BDF §§78, 311(2), 392(1a), 397(3), 420(2), 429; BAGD 107–108 | aparneomai, S 533; TDNT 1.471; EDNT 1.153–155; NIDNTT 1.454–455; MM 53; L&N 30.52, 33.277, 34.49; BAGD 81

The grammarians point out that the Koine prefers the aorist middle of arneomai to the aorist passive form of the classical period;¹ furthermore, verbs expressing will, desire, or hindrance are rather commonly construed with the infinitive (without an article) or with the conjunctions hina, hoste, hoti. In the NT, however, only the infinitive follows arneomai.² Moreover, after “negative” verbs like arneomai (“deny”), antilego (“object”), and amphisbeteo (“question”), the complementary clause takes the negative ou with hoti (1John 2:22) and the negative me with infinitive (Luke 22:34; cf. F. M. Abel, Grammaire, 75 i). Finally, of the arneomai compounds with the verbal prefixes ap-, ex-, kat-, the NT has only aparneomai and uses it with exactly the same meaning as the simple form, as is proved by the use of these two verbs in strictly parallel texts in the Synoptic Gospels.³

The simplest meaning of arneomai is “say no,” in an oral context: “Sara denied it, saying, ‘I did not laugh’” (Gen 18:15; cf. Philo, Abraham 112, 206; Spec. Laws 2.54); Leah is “the one refused by every madman and sent back with a denial.”⁴ Petronius vacillates between two options: “to the crowd he said neither yes nor no.”⁵ Thus when Jesus asked who had touched him “they all denied it” (arnoumenon de panton, Luke 8:45); Moses “refused to be called (ernesato legesthai) son of Pharaoh’s daughter.”⁶ This meaning—spoken denial—is the commonest meaning in the papyri. Just as today we say, “The accused denied that he was guilty” or “The accused denied everything,” arneomai is in a way a legal or judicial verb. It shows up in petitions and in transcripts of trials, where it often has connotations of lying,⁷ as it does also at 1John 2:22. For example, on July 18, 142, the prefect of Egypt, Valerius Eudaemon, reacting against blackmail by debtors and denouncing their fraudulent maneuvering

(panourgia), sets forth the legal means whereby they can resist: “If someone is being pursued for a debt and does not immediately state that he does not owe it (me parautika arnesamenos opheilein), that is, if he does not try to prove—by saying that the documents are falsified and filing charges—the falsification of the documents or fraud or inveigling, then either such a maneuver will be pointless for him . . . or he will not be shielded from punishment but will be liable for the statutory fines.”⁸ In 6 BC, Asinius Gallus, governor of the province of Asia, questioned some slaves who had been implicated in a murder during the course of a nocturnal row. Here is what happened: Philinus came three nights in a row, hurling insults, to besiege, as it were, the house of Eubulus and Tryphera. The third time he brought with him his brother Eubulus. So the masters of the house “ordered a slave not to kill him . . . but to chase him off by throwing their waste on him. But in pouring it out, the slave, whether intentionally or not—for he persists in denying it (autos men gar enemeinen arnoumenos)—let the vase fall on Eubulus, who was killed.”⁹

To say no is to deny consent, to refuse, to protest, sometimes to revolt. The nuances are numerous. One can simply refuse to take a meal (Homer, Il. 19.304) or to sing (Polybius 4.20.11), decline an invitation to dinner (Josephus, Life 222), or a favor, or honors.¹⁰ Or one can refuse to admit something: the healing of the lame man at Jerusalem was so obvious that “we can not deny it.”¹¹ There are friendly refusals,¹² sometimes mere omissions (Wis 18:9), or the results of ignorance (Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 23: me agnoun arne; cf. 79); usually, however, a resolute refusal is meant. According to St. Stephen, the Israelites rebuffed Moses, “saying, ‘Who set you up as a leader and judge?’” (Acts 7:35). Pilate refused to remove the standards from Jerusalem (Josephus, War 2.171); when Vespasian declines imperial honors, his officers become more insistent.¹³ Arneomai can also mean “renounce,” that is, to desist, detach oneself, and voluntarily forsake a person to whom one has been attached. Aseneth states, “My father and my mother have forsaken me, because I destroyed and shattered their gods.”¹⁴

These usages are secular. It is the Wisdom of Solomon that gives this verb a religious meaning, with respect to the impious: refusing to know God.¹⁵ Philo uses it to mean “repudiate, apostasize”: “Whoever renounces the truly real God (ho ton ontos onta theon arnoumenos)—what punishment does such a person deserve!” (Spec. Laws 2.255). These texts are few and late. Perhaps it could be suggested that it was the Lord who coined the idea of “repudiation” that would be preserved and exploited in the NT. The most important statement is, “Whoever confesses (homologesei) me before men, him will I also confess (homologeso) before my Father who is in heaven; but whoever denies me (arnesetai me) before men, him will I also deny (arnesomai) before my Father who is in heaven.”¹⁶ A strong contrast is made between confessing the faith and repudiating it;¹⁷ the content, the object, and the publicness are the same. The reference is to a disciple who publicly professes that he knows Jesus as Savior and God, adheres to his teaching, and submits his life to his Master's will. If this "Christian" later says no to this Amen, that is, if he officially renounces Jesus, declaring before other people that he is freeing himself from his dependence on the Lord, then the Lord in turn will abandon him and will not exercise his role as advocate and paraclete on his behalf (1John 2:1). In other words, the baptized person, and especially the apostle, must bear witness publicly to Jesus; their renunciation of Jesus would prompt his official renunciation of them.

Seven times the Gospels use the verb arneomai for Peter's "denial" in the courtyard of the high priest.¹⁸ The apostle actually denies knowing Jesus (Luke 22:57) and being one of his disciples (John 18:25), and this renunciation takes place "in front of everyone" (Matt 26:70). This abandonment seems to fulfill perfectly the prediction recorded in Matt 10:32-33, at least in terms of the apparent events; but Peter wept bitterly after his sin, and the Lord, who had predicted it (John 13:38), had also prayed for him that his faith would not fail (Luke 22:32), and afterward he rehabilitated him, giving him the charge to feed his sheep (John 21:15-17). In other words, Peter denied Jesus with his lips, but in his heart he remained constantly faithful to his Lord and Master. The use of the word "denial" for this charade intended to get people to leave him alone is thus problematic. Theodoret commented well: Peter denied Jesus through weakness, but "was held fast by the bonds of love" (tois tou philtrou desmois katechomenos, Theodoret, Car. 31.10). On the other hand, when the members of the chosen people cry, "We recognize no king but Caesar" (John 19:15), they hand over and "deny Jesus . . . the holy and just one" before Pilate,¹⁹ denying his messianic identity. Through their perjury (their violation of sworn loyalty) they exclude themselves from the covenant and abdicate their privileges along with their obligation to be in submission. This about-face is the same as that of the false teachers and heretics who "in denying the Master who redeemed them bring swift perdition upon themselves."²⁰ They refuse to submit their thought to the only teacher of truth, Christ (John 14:6; 2Cor 10:5), to whom they have promised unconditional obedience (1Pet 1:2, 18, 22). They are like slaves whose master has paid the price for their emancipation but who respond with insolence and ingratitude. Their perdition is sure.

Another series of texts gives arneomai the meaning "to renounce," referring to self-sacrifice, the giving up of one's own stake: "Anyone who wishes to come after me must deny himself (aorist imperative, arnesastho), take up his cross each day, and follow me."²¹ To say no to oneself firmly and radically is to treat oneself as a negligible quantity that should never enter into consideration, to suppress oneself, in a way; a meaning reinforced by the image of bearing the cross, which leads to death.

Conversion to Christianity is a categorical refusal to be in servitude to worldly desires, the goal being to live freely, “with self-control and piety.”²² Faith implies faithfulness, a living adherence to Christ; it requires living in conformity to his teachings. Heretics profess (homologousin) to know God, but through their deeds they deny him (tois de ergois arnountai).²³ This is repudiation in the most serious sense of the word: “If anyone does not care for his own people, and especially the members of his own household, he has denied the faith (ten pistin ernetai) and is worse than an infidel” (1Tim 5:8). This violation of sworn loyalty means breaking the initial baptismal commitment to live a life of the brotherly love that characterizes the disciple (John 13:35). To fail here is worse than being an unbeliever, who at least is not breaking a promise.²⁴ Without brotherly agape, the Christian is not only failing to keep his word to the Lord Christ but also stooping beneath common morality. “Melior est canis vivus leone mortuo (Eccl 9:4), id est paganus christiano impio” (“Better a living dog than a dead lion, i.e., better a pagan than an impious Christian,” Hugh of St.-Cher).

¹ F. M. Abel, Grammaire, 18 m; B. G. Mandilaras, Verb, n. 315.

² F. M. Abel, Grammaire, 69 m R.

³ Cf. C. K. Barrett, “Is There a Theological Tendency in Codex Bezae?” in Text and Interpretation: Studies in the N. T. Presented to M. Black, Cambridge, 1979, p. 23, n. 3; H. Riesenfeld, “The Meaning of the Verb ἀρνεί—σθαι,” in ConNT, vol. 11, 1947, pp. 207–219; H. Schlier, “ἀρνέομαι,” in TDNT, vol. 1, pp. 469–471.

⁴ Philo, Cherub. 41. —Αρνέομαι is used constantly from Homer on for the refusal of a marriage proposal: “refuse a marriage (ἀρ. γάμον) abhorrent to her” (Homer, Od. 1.249); Amasius “was afraid and could bring himself neither to give his daughter nor to refuse her” (Herodotus 3.1); Abraham does not refuse the marriage with Rebekah (Josephus, Ant. 1.245); Samson’s parents refuse his marriage with Thamna (5.286). “King Ptolemy asked for Cornelia’s hand in marriage; she said no” (Plutarch, Ti. Gracch. 1.7).

⁵ Philo, To Gaius 247; cf. Malichos, who appeases the people by his denials (Josephus, War 1.227; Ant. 14.278, 282); Ladice protested (Herodotus 2.181).

⁶ Heb 11:24. The formula used concerning John the Baptist’s response when asked about his identity (“He acknowledged and did not deny . . . ‘I am not the Christ,’” John 1:20) has analogies in Greek (Euripides, El. 1057:

“I say it and do not deny”; Josephus, Ant. 6.151) and in Hebrew; cf. A. Schlatter, Der Evangelist Johannes, Stuttgart, 1948, p. 38.

⁷ This usage is found already in Ps.-Homer: “this rascal of a child denies so artfully and with such sophistication in this bogus tale” (H. Hermes 3.390); Herodotus 1.24: “they were convicted of their crimes and could deny them no longer”; 3.74; 4.68; 6.69; Plutarch, Amat. 5 (752 a): “the love of boys denies sensual pleasure” because it is ashamed and afraid.

⁸ P.Oxy. 237, col. VIII, 14—P. Collinet, “L’Edit du préfet d’Egypte Valerius Eudaemon (P. Oxy. II, 237, 7–8) (138 ap. J.-C.): Une hypothèse sur la ‘Querela non numeratae pecuniae,’” in Proceedings IV, pp. 89–100).

⁹ Dittenberger, Syl. 780, 25 (rescript of Augustus to the city of Cnidos); cf. J. Colin, Les Villes libres de l’Orient gréco-romain, Brussels, 1965, p. 88; cf. P.Flor. 61, 49: ἠρνήσατο οὐ—τος τὴν κληρονομίαν τοῦ πατρὸς καὶ ἐ—γὼ τὴν τοῦ ἰ—δίου πατρὸς (first century AD); BGU 195, 22–23; SB 8945, 26; P.Mil.Vogl. 229, 12: ἠρνήσατο ἃ παρεθέμην αὐτῇ (cf. N. Lewis, “On Paternal Authority in Roman Egypt,” in RIDA, 1970, pp. 251–258); Thucydides 6.60.3: “He will be safer if he confesses his crimes under a guaranty of impunity than if he is handed over for judgment while denying them” (ἀρνηθέντι); Philo, Spec. Laws 4.32: to contest the reality of a deposit that has been entrusted to us is to renege on a twofold deposit (διττὰς ἀρνεῖ—σθαι παρακαταθήκας); 4.40: “the thief denies and lies (ἀρνεῖ—ται καὶ ψεύδεται) out of fear of the punishment that will follow his confession. The person who denies (ὁ τε ἀρνούμενος) does his best to shift the blame to someone else through slander”; 1.235: “He blames himself for his denials and perjury”; 1.278: refuse to restore; Plant. 107; Josephus, War 1.548: Tiron and his son, when put to the question, denied everything; 2.303, 603; Ant. 7.226: the woman did not deny having seen him; 11.341: the Samaritans, when they are in a difficult spot, deny the truth; 15.173: Hyrcanus denied having given his consent; 15.288; 17.135.

¹⁰ Plato, Soph. 217 c. Anth. Pal. 6.47. Οὐκ ἀρνήσομαι = I do not deny it (Euripides, Hec. 303; cf. Aeschylus, PV 266). In AD 41, the emperor Claudius refuses two gold statues that his very good friend Barbillus, ambassador of the Alexandrians, wished to dedicate to Pax Augusta Claudiana and declines to introduce a Claudian tribe (P.Lond. 1912, 36 and 41; cf. A. Kasher, “Les Circonstances de la promulgation de l’édit de l’empereur Claude et de sa lettre aux Alexandrins,” in Sem, vol. 26, 1976, pp. 99–108).

¹¹ Οὐ δύναμεθα ἀρνεῖ—σθαι. Acts 4:16; cf. Plato, Symp. 192 e: “No one on earth would refuse such an offer”; Grg. 461 c: “who then would deny being . . . able to teach”; Epictetus 3.24.81: “you will not deny knowing”; Philo, Dreams 1.49; Josephus, Ant. 16.150: it is impossible to deny Herod’s very generous nature; Life 255: “I produced the letter, so that no one could deny anything, since the text refuted their objections”; 385: “It was impossible to deny that the Tiberians had written to the king.”

¹² The refusal to loan a bow (Homer, Il. 21.345) or to give tools (Hesiod, Op. 408). Longinus was quite willing to carry a letter, but he refused to deliver objects, “saying (ἤρνήσατο λέγων) that he was unable to take anything” (P.Mich. 466, 14); but to refuse to serve the city is a kind of treason (Demosthenes, Corona 18.282).

¹³ Josephus, War 4.603; cf. 5.425: the refusal of the occupants of a house to hand over foodstuffs; Ant. 1.275: Isaac’s refusal to bless Esau; 4.86: the king of the Ammonites refuses to allow Israel to pass through; 18.159: refusal of a loan; 20.222, or a request.

¹⁴ Jos. Asen. 12.11 (cf. Ps 27:10); 4Macc 8:7—speaking to the Maccabee brothers, the tyrant states, “You will get prominent posts in my administration if you renounce the ancestral law that governs you”; the fourth brother rejects this proposition: “I will not renounce our noble brotherhood”; cf. Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.191: to renounce ancestral customs. P.Phil. 2, 6, in a transcript of an audience: after as agreement has been concluded for the restoration of an inheritance to some children, a woman interrupts; contradicting her earlier commitments (ὁμολογήσασα), she reneges (ἤρνήσατο) and causes problems.

¹⁵ Wis 12:27; 16:16. “To know” is to be understood in its Semitic sense as an existential relationship.

¹⁶ Matt 10:32-33 (cf. Luke 12:9—ἀπαρνεῖ—σθαι); Epictetus 4.1.146: “Slaves, do not run away from your masters, do not repudiate them (μηδ ἀπαρνοῦ), and do not have the audacity to produce your emancipator, when the proofs of your slavery are so numerous.” Jesus’ prophecy found its way into a liturgical hymn at Jerusalem, quoted at 2Tim 2:12—“If we deny [him], he will also deny us.”

¹⁷ The ὁμολογέω-ἀρνέομαι antithesis is constant, cf. Plato, Tht. 165 a; Thucydides 6.603; Epicurus, Nat. 29; Aelian, NA 2.43; Philo, Drunkenness 188, 192; Spec. Laws 1.235; To Gaius 247; Josephus, Ant. 6.151; P.Phil. 2, 6; John 1:20; Titus 1:16; 1John 2:23; etc. Cf. H. F. von Soden, Untersuchungen zur Homologie in den griechischen Papyri Ägyptens bis Diokletian, Cologne-Vienna, 1973; W. Kramer, Christ, Lord, Son of God, London, 1966, pp. 15ff.

¹⁸ Matt 26:70; Mark 14:68, 70; Luke 22:57; John 13:38; 18:25, 27. Cf. M. Goguel, “Did Peter Deny His Lord?” in HTR, 1932, pp. 1–27; C. Masson, “Le Reniement de Pierre: Quelques aspects de la formation d’une tradition,” in RHPR, 1957, pp. 24–35; B. Schwank, “Petrus verleugnet Jesus (XVIII, 12–27),” in Sein und Sendung, 1964, pp. 51–65; P. Benoit, Passion et résurrection du Seigneur, Paris, 1966, pp. 61–86; R. Pesch, “Die Verleugnung des Petrus,” in Neues Testament und Kirche, für R. Schnackenburg, Freiburg, 1974, pp. 42–62. G. Klein and E. Linnemann rejected the historicity of Peter’s denial (cf. R. E. Brown, Peter in the New Testament, Minneapolis, 1973, p. 63, n. 139; cf. pp. 112, 121, 133), but H. Merkel (“Peter’s Curse,” in E. Bammel, The Trial of Jesus, London, 1970, pp. 66–71) shows that it is unthinkable that the Christian community would have forged this story if Peter had not really denied Jesus.

¹⁹ Acts 3:13-14. Cf. Demosthenes 36.34: ὅταν τὴν διάηκην ἀρνῆται. M. Wilcox, The Semitisms of Acts, Oxford, 1965, pp. 139ff.

²⁰ 2Pet 2:1. Cf. 1John 2:22—“Who is the liar, if not the one who denies the Jesus is the Christ? He is the Antichrist who denies the Father and the Son,” and hence the Incarnation and the Trinity (2Tim 2:13 says that Christ cannot deny himself; he remains faithful under all circumstances, incapable of any denial whatsoever). 1John 2:23—“Whoever denies the son does not have the Father either; the one who confesses the Son (homologon) has the Father”; in true faith in the divinity of Jesus Christ there is communion with the Father (John 12:44; 14:6); Jude 4: the impious “deny our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ.”

²¹ Luke 9:23 (cf. ἀπαρνησάσθω, Matt 16:24; Mark 8:34); cf. Luke 14:26—μισει—ν τὴν ε—αυτοῦ ψυχὴν; Aristodicus: “they renounced life” (Anth. Pal. 7.473). R. Völkl, Die Selbstliebe in der Heiligen Schrift, 1956, p. 160; C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, p. 264, n. 3; vol. 2, p. 529; S. Brown, Apostasy and Perseverance in the Theology of Luke, Rome, 1969.

²² Titus 2:12 (A. Fridrichsen, “Zu ἀρνει—σθαῖ im N.T. insonderheit in den Pastoralbriefen,” in ConNT, 1942, pp. 94–96). To live a holy life, i.e., a life that belongs to God, implies not just separation and leaving, but a rejection, a form of violence. Faithfulness is perseverance in this attitude. Christ directs this praise to the church at Pergamum: “You hold fast to my name, and you have not denied my faith” (Rev 2:13), and similarly to the church at Philadelphia: “You have kept my word and not denied my name” (3:8).

²³ Titus 1:16. The impious people of the end times, among their other vices, will maintain the forms of piety but deny its power (2Tim 3:5). These are impostors. They rob the gospel of its dynamis, so that their profession of faith is empty.

²⁴ Cf. b. shabb. 116a : “These know and deny, while those deny without knowing”; b. B. Mes. 71a : Lending for interest is a serious sin, but “to gather a witness, a notary, and ink and sign a document is to deny the God of Israel.” Cf. Str-B, vol. 1, p. 585.

ἀρχιποίμην

archipoimen, chief shepherd

archipoimen, S 750; TDNT 6.485–499; EDNT 1.165; NIDNTT 3.564, 568; MM 82; L&N 44.5; BDF §118(2); BAGD 113

“The shepherd’s mission is so lofty that it is rightly attributed not only to kings, sages, and souls of perfect purity, but even to the Lord God.”¹ In the East, “pastor” is actually used to describe the function and the office of a sovereign;² it is also used for Moses, who led Israel in its wanderings;³ for David;⁴ and above all for God.⁵ Jesus claimed the designation,⁶ and the faith of the disciple recognized him as the archegos of the new People of God: “the God of peace who brought again from the dead the Shepherd of the sheep, the great one.”⁷

If the salvation of all Christians lies in following the “guardian Shepherd” of their souls,⁸ the presbyters of the churches of Asia Minor are motivated to behave as models by the thought that “when the Chief Shepherd appears you will receive an unfading crown of glory” (1Pet 2:4). The term archipoimen is not a Christian coinage, even though it is unknown in the OT (cf. nevertheless its use by Symmachus to translate noqed in 2Kgs 3:4). It appears for the first time in T. Jud. 8.1—“I had many cattle, and my chief herdsman was Hiram and Adullamite” (esan de moi ktene polla, kai eichon archipoimena Hieram ton Odolometen).⁹ It is found again in an inscription of the imperial era on an Egyptian mummy—“Plenis the younger, chief shepherd’s, lived . . . years,”¹⁰—and rather often in rent receipts and transfer orders. Around AD 270: “Aurelius Abous, son of Asemis, of the village of Philadelphia, chief shepherd of Antonius Philoxenos, the most powerful former procurator . . . to Aurelius Kalamos. . . I have received from you, from those that you hold that belong to the noteworthy (Antonius Philoxenos), twelve goats that I will record among those entered in my accounts”;¹¹ “Aurelius Abous . . . chief shepherd of the livestock of Antonius Philoxenos . . . to Aurelius Neliammon . . . I have received from you from the livestock that you have on location for the account of the noteworthy (Antonius Philoxenos) twenty-eight goats that I will record among the entries of the account of the noteworthy (Antonius Philoxenos) as having been handed over by you.”¹² On 21 May 270, Dionysius writes to Neilammon, small livestock tenant: “Hand over to Pekysis, the chief shepherd, the small livestock in your keeping that formerly belonged to Kyrilla—fifty sheep, males and females in equal numbers, and five goats—and get an acknowledgement of receipt from him.”¹³

The point of these texts is to underline the authority, the competence, and the responsibility of the chief shepherd. He exercises a high level of oversight over the shepherds and the flocks. It is up to him to see to it that the flocks are grazed in the best pastures, that the shepherds are remunerated, that the rent is paid, that the animals entrusted to his care are returned. Thus St. Peter, addressing presbyter-shepherds, suggests that they are only vicars, that they must carry out their duty in union with Christ, the “chief of pastors,” in conformity with his instructions and his example.

¹ Philo, Husbandry 50. After defining the true shepherd as an overseer, guide, and leader (41ff.), Philo argues that God is the supreme shepherd (49–66). Elsewhere he compares the shepherd and the king, Moses 1.60ff.; Joseph 2; Sacr. Abel and Cain 49ff. Cf. the Mebaqqer at Qumran (CD 13.9).

² Cf. M. J. Seux, Epithètes royales akkadiennes et sumériennes, Paris, 1967, pp. 244ff. D. Müller, “Der Gute Hirte,” in Zeitschrift für ägyptische Sprache und Altertumskunde, vol. 86, 1961, pp. 126ff. In the prologue to his code, Hammurabi calls himself pastor (col. 1, 50–51), and he repeats the designation in the epilogue: “I am the pastor, the bearer of salvation. . . . In my bosom I have held the peoples of Sumer and Akkad” (col. 24, 42–43, 49–52). J. Jeremias, ποιμήν, in TDNT, vol. 6, pp. 485–502; C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 3, 1959, pp. 235ff. (on John 21:15–17); J. Dauvillier, Les Temps apostoliques, Paris, 1970, pp. 147ff.

³ Cf. H. Kosmala, Hebräer—Essener—Christen, Leiden, 1959, pp. 415ff. R. Le Déaut, Nuit Pascale, p. 268; Str-B, vol. 2, p. 209.

⁴ Les Paroles des luminaires, col. IV, 6 (cf. ed. M. Baillet, in RB 1961, pp. 205, 222); A. Dupont-Sommer, “Le Psaume CLI et son origine essénienne,” in Sem, vol. 14, 1964, p. 45.

⁵ Isa 40:11; Ezek 34:12ff.; Ps 23. The metaphor suggests watchfulness, care, benevolence, and devotion, cf. C. Spicq, Agapè: Prolégomènes, Louvain-Leiden, 1955, p. 110; W. H. Brownlee, Ezekiel's Poetic Indictment of the Shepherds, in HTR, 1958, pp. 191–204; G. M. Behler, “Le Bon Pasteur: Psaume XXIII,” in VSpir, 526; 2966, pp. 442–467; J. Dupont, Le Discours de Milet (Actes, XX, 18, 36), Paris, 1962, pp. 143ff.; 149ff.; 167.

⁶ John 10:14; cf. Ezek 37:26; Zech 11:14ff.; Matt 25:32; 26:31. L. Sabourin, Les Noms et les titres de Jésus, Bruges-Paris, 1963, pp. 71ff. W. Tooley, “The Shepherd and Sheep Image in the Teaching of Jesus,” in NovT, vol. 7, 1964, pp. 15–25.

⁷ Heb 13:20. In Hebrew, the attributive adjective follows the noun (cf. Sir 39:6—Κύριος ὁ μέγας; Heb 4:14—ἔχοντες οὖν ἀρχιερέα μέγαν; G. D. Kilpatrick, “The Order of Some Noun and Adjective Phrases in the New Testament,” in Donum Gratulatorium Eth. Stauffer, Leiden, 1962, pp. 111ff.). Here, this modifier, commonly used in antiquity for sovereigns and divinities (cf. C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, pp. 249, 269) exalts the King-Priest above Moses and all the hegoumenoi who have died and not yet been resurrected (cf. H. Kosmala, Hebräer—Essener—Christen, Leiden, 1959, pp. 415–417). On the participial construction, which is common in the Hellenistic preaching (ὁ ε—γείρας . . .), cf. Isa 64:11 (A. Feuillet, “Le Baptême de Jésus,” in CBQ, 1959, p. 472); J. Dellings, “Partizipiale Gottesprädikationen in den Briefen des Neuen Testaments,” in ST, vol. 17, 1963, pp. 23ff.

⁸ 1Pet 2:25—ε—πὶ τὸν ποιμένα καὶ ε—πίσκοπον τω—ν ψυχω—ν ὑμω—ν is a hendiadys. Cf. A. Rose, “Jésus-Christ, Pasteur de l’Eglise,” in VSpir, 1965, pp. 501–515.

⁹ Manuscript A has ἦν ὄνομα τοῦ ἀρχιποιέμενος μου.

¹⁰ SB 3507: Πλῆνις νεώτερος ἀρχιποιέμενος ε—βίωσεν ε—τω—ν . . . (according to A. Deissmann, Light, pp. 100ff.); in the third-fourth century, PSI 286, 6; in 338: Καμήτι ἀρχιποιέμενι (P.Lips. 97, col. XI, 4).

¹¹ J. Schwartz, “Une Famille de chepteliers au IIIe s. p. C.,” in RechPap, vol. 3, 1964, p. 56.

¹² Ibid., p. 57.

¹³ Ibid., p. 66 = SB 8087, 7–8 (cf. P. Collomp, “Un bail de troupeau,” in Mélanges Maspéro, Paris, 1955–57, vol. 2, p. 343). Cf. again “Pekynis, the chief shepherd . . . Aurelius Sabinus, the chief shepherd,” in an acknowledgement of transfer (J. Schwartz, loc. cit., p. 67, lines 2 and 13).

ἀρχιτέκτων

architekton, master builder

architekton, S 753; EDNT 1.165; NIDNTT 1.279; MM 82; L&N 45.10; BDF §118(2); BAGD 113

St. Paul, having laid the foundation of the church at Corinth,¹ compares himself to a master architect who is within his rights in requiring his successors to adapt their labors to his own structure.² There is nothing to say philologically about the NT hapax architekton, except that its English transliteration is hardly to be defined in terms of our contemporary architects. This is already suggested here by the architekton's job of laying the foundation; and it is confirmed by Sir 38:27—"Every craftsman and every master worker who works day and night"³—and by the papyri and inscriptions.⁴

At the beginning of the second century AD, Tesenouphos is an engineer or mechanic who complains about the lack of maintenance of the machines (P.Tebt. 725, 1, 12, 25). Some hundred years later, Apollonius is a naval engineer;⁵ Onasander uses this term for builders of siege engines (42.3). In the second century AD, the declaration of an "architect" who is in charge on the building site is registered (P.Tebt. 286, 19). But there are also architects in the literal sense of the word who are summoned when someone wants to build a house (P.Cair.Zen. 59233, 2, 7; 59302, 3), who propose changes in the plan that has been proposed to them (59193, 3, 8), and who take care that the dwelling is well outfitted (59200, 3, kataskeuazetai). Not only do the Greeks vote them honorific decrees,⁶ but they also endlessly praise their concern and devotion.⁷

The architect proper has both speculative and practical capabilities. He works together with the commission set up by the city and he serves as the technical adviser.⁸ He establishes the estimates. He goes to the quarries to select the materials,⁹ oversees the manner in which they are rough-hewn and prepared for installation, according to the models or mock-ups (typoi) that he has prepared. He is in charge at the work site and manages the execution of all of the jobs, even the lowliest of them. He recruits, gives instructions to, and oversees a multitude of specialized workers: quarriers, masons, inscribers, marble masons, smiths, carpenters, joiners, marqueteurs,¹⁰ etc., whose salaries he pays (cf. I.Lind., 419, 141); and as he is often in charge of the ongoing maintenance of the edifices, he remains on the job for years.

This description allows us to understand better how the apostle can compare himself to an architekton, which should probably be translated "builder":¹¹ being in charge of ergon, he is within his rights to require of preachers who come to labor on his work site and "add to his construction”¹² that they be strictly faithful to the “canon” that he has determined once for all.¹³ “The architect (ho oikodomos) . . . the painter . . . the shipbuilder . . . allocate all their materials such that when they are arranged and connected they give the whole work solidity, beauty, and utility” (Plutarch, Quaest. conv. 1.2.5).

¹ 1Cor 3:10 (cf. V. P. Furnish, “Fellow Workers in God’s Service,” in JBL, 1961, pp. 364–370; J. Pfammatter, Die Kirche als Bau, Rome, 1960, pp. 19–35). The metaphor of founding was common in the diatribe, cf. Heb 6:1; Philo, Dreams 2.8: “These preliminary considerations will serve as a foundation, but to build the rest, the building itself, let us follow the directives of Allegory, the expert architect, σοφῆς ἀρχιτέκτονος”; (same modifier: σοφὸν ἀρχιτέκτονα, Isa 3:3); Giants 30; Change of Names 211; Epictetus 2.15.8–9: “Don’t you want to establish the principles and the foundation . . . then establish on this foundation the firmness and stability of this decision? But if you put at the base a rotting and crumbling foundation, you must not build”; cf. J. Weiss, Der erste Korintherbrief, 10th ed., Göttingen, 1925, p. 79; H. MuszyĔski, Fundament, Bild und Metapher in den Handschriften aus Qumran: Studien zur Vorgeschichte des ntl. Begriffs θεμέλιος, Rome, 1975.

² Cf. 2Macc 2:29—“The architect of a house must concern himself with the whole structure,” τῆς ὅλης καταβολῆς = the foundation, in the sense of masonry (cf. F. M. Abel, Maccabées, on this text). The architect is distinguished from the painter or the decorator who ornaments the structure after it is built.

³ Πα—ς τέκτων καὶ ἀρχιτέκτων. The τέκτων is the simple laborer, worker, or artisan working with wood, the joiner or carpenter (P.Mil.Vogl. 255, 5; Prosop.Ptol., vol. 5, n. 13234–13294; a papyrus from Strassburg, in ChrEg, 1963; p. 135, line 30; A. Orlandos, Technique architecturale, pp. 26ff. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, p. 378, n. 2; vol. 2, p. 525). The ἀρχιτέκτων could be the foreman, the entrepreneur, whoever directs a work, hence the architect, but here the mechanic or machinist (P.Lond. 2074, 2; 2173, 4, 8). Similarly, Strabo associates carpenters and smiths, who have “no conception of beauty or nobility,” whereas the poet is a person of quality (Prolegomena, 1.2.5). Cf. A. Bernand, Pan du désert, p. 192.

⁴ Cf. Prosop.Ptol., n. 182–185, 528–542 (mentions some hyparchitects); 1953, pp. 52–54. On the architect Pathemis (P.Petr. III, 43), cf. idem, Prosopographica (Studia Hellenistica 9), Louvain, 1953, pp. 52–54: in an adjudication by the oikonomos Hermaphilos in the presence of the royal scribe and the architect; the latter comes after the royal scribe but has precedence over the representative of the royal scribe. J. Coupry, Inscriptions de Délos: Période de l'amphictyonie attico-délienne, Paris, 1972, n. 104, 4 (notebook of charges, technical conditions imposed, various costs, the assistant architect's remuneration, etc.).

⁵ A. Bernand, Philae, vol. 1, n. 39 (with the editor's note); B. Boyaval, "Correspondance administrative de l'ingénieur Théodoros," in Etudes sur l'Égypte et la Soudan anciens, Lille-Paris, 1973, p. 195, SB 8322, 8323 (with the commentary of D. Meredith in ChrEg, 1954, pp. 110ff.). M. Guarducci (Epigrafia Greca, Rome 1969, vol. 2, pp. 192, 198, 214, 261) translates ἀρχιτέκτων by ingegnere; the corresponding Latin term is faber (H. J. Mason, Greek Terms, p. 26); cf. R. Martin, in Annuaire de l'École des Hautes Etudes (4th section), 1973–1974, pp. 221ff.

⁶ For Epicratus, at Olbia (Dittenberger, Syl. 707, 8, 26), cf. Syl. 494, 3; SB 8580, 5,16.

⁷ Epimeleia, cf. SEG vol. 2, 480, 3 = CIRB, Moscow-Leningrad, 1965, n. 1112: ἀνεκτίσθη τὸ τει—χος ε—κ θεμελείων διὰ ε—πιμελείας Εὐτύχους ἀρχιτέκτονος; 1245, 17 (cf. 1249, 11; 1250, 17; 1252, 10; 1258); Dittenberger, Syl., 736, 90, 115. These honors are explained by the architect's having contributed to the embellishment of the city and having built a temple (Dittenberger, Syl. 695, 72; 972, 160), but they contrast with the modest honorarium—one drachma per day: "Theodotus, architect, receives an annual salary of 352 drachmas" (C. Michel, Recueil, n. 584, 9; with the commentary of the NCIG, pp. 131ff.)

⁸ P.Lille 1, 24. "Harpalos was the most industrious in the science, which requires competency" (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 23, 2). For the rebuilding of a temple of Demeter and of Kora, at Tanagra (third century BC), "the commission (elected for three years) will build the sanctuary in the city, consulting on this matter with the polemarchs and the architect" (RIJG, vol. 2, n. 36, 14); cf. the treatise on archaeology of Vitruvius; LSAMSup, n. 107, 25; idem, LSCG, n. 5, 11–12; 41, 29, 42, 21; R. Martin, Architecture grecque, pp. 172–179; idem, L'Urbanisme dans la Grèce antique, Paris, 1956, pp. 69–71.

⁹ Cf. J. A. Letronne, Égypte, vol. 2, pp. 117–119, 231. A. Bernand, Koptos, n. 41, 19 (with the editor's commentary, pp. 89ff.).

¹⁰ Cf. F. Cumont, L'Égypte des astrologues, p. 106; L. Robert, Études anatoliennes, pp. 86ff.

¹¹ Cf. MAMA, vol. 8, 564, 3: σοφιστῆς κτίστης τω—ν μεγίστων ἔργων ε—ν τῇ πόλει.

¹² 2Cor 10:12-18; cf. R. Devreesse, “La Deuxième aux Corinthiens,” in Mélanges Tisserant, vol. 1, pp. 143ff. C. K. Barrett, “Paul’s Opponents in II Corinthians,” in NTS, vol. 17, 1971, pp. 237ff.

¹³ In architecture the κανών is “the rule.” Cf. H. Opperl, KANON, Leipzig, 1937, L. Wenger, Canon in den römischen Rechtsquellen und in den Papyri, Vienna, 1941.

ἀσφάλεια, ἀσφαλής, ἀσφαλίζομαι, ἀσφαλω—ς asphaleia, stability, safety, assurance, guarantee; asphales, safe, sure; asphalizomai, to secure, make sure, asphalos, without slipping, securely, safely

asphaleia, S 803; TDNT 1.506; EDNT 1.175–176; NIDNTT 1.663–664; MM 88; L&N 21.9, 31.41; BAGD 118 | asphales, S 804; TDNT 1.506; EDNT 1.175–176; NIDNTT 1.663; MM 88; L&N 21.10, 31.42; BAGD 119 | asphalizomai, S 805; TDNT 1.506; EDNT 1.175–176; NIDNTT 1.663; MM 88; L&N 18.12, 21.11; BDF §126; BAGD 119 | asphalos, S 806; TDNT 1.506; EDNT 1.175–176; NIDNTT 1.663; L&N 21.10, 31.42; BAGD 119; ND 3.9

These words are formed from the alpha-privative and sphallo, which means “stumble, fall,” and by extension “fail, be foiled.”¹ They are particularly common in the literary (Philo, Josephus) and popular (the papyri) Koine. In the fifteen NT occurrences, St. Luke (eight occurrences) alone uses the substantive, the adjective, the verb, and the adverb; this is probably because these terms belonged to the medical vocabulary,² but their use is so widespread that their meanings are considerably nuanced, both in classical Greek and in Hellenistic Greek.

Asphaleia —the condition of not slipping, a firm step³—means first of all stability,⁴ and then especially security and safety,⁵ certainty or assurance: “by far the most surely true answer” (makro pros aletheian asphalestaton, Plato, Tim. 50 b). Finally, it is a legal term, meaning security in the sense of a guarantee: “Otherwise he does not affix his seal on an act or sign a guarantee” (e asphaleian graphej, Epictetus 2.13.7; cf. 2Macc 3:22—keeping deposits safe; Prov 11:15; BGU 1149, 24); Polybius 2.11.5: a guarantee against Illyrian violations. The LXX retains especially the meaning security and solidity,⁶ as does the Letter of Aristeas,⁷ which also notes that the translation of the Law had to be done meta asphaleias, meaning with care and precision (45; cf. 28; Josephus, Ant. 12.56). Philo mentions the security of persons, of property, and of places,⁸ notably of the altar and of places of refuge,⁹ but also in the intellectual order: stability and balance (asphaleian kai eukosmian) in the refutation of sophistry (Heir 125; cf. Spec. Laws 4.21; To Gaius 42); the reasoning faculty with its “sureness and good order” (asphaleian kai kosmon, Change of Names 111). The meaning personal or military security is predominant in Josephus,¹⁰ who also knows the meanings “holding someone under tight guard,”¹¹ “assurance, certitude,” “victory” (War 1.375), “hope” (Ant. 15.166), “safety” (17.3). “He reckoned that God would certainly make sure that nothing that he had uttered would prove false” (Ant. 2.220; cf. 2.280; 4.31; 6.157). Also present is the legal meaning, a guarantee, security (Ant. 17.346): “the principal guarantee of secure peace (pros asphaleian eirenes) is the legitimate succession of princes” (War 4.596).

The adjective asphales, “not slipping, not falling,” means first of all “firm, solid,” whether with respect to things (Homer, Od. 6.42: Olympus) or persons;¹² then “safe”¹³ or “making safe.”¹⁴ God has firmly fixed the clouds above (Prov 8:28) and opened a sure path through the sea (Wis 14:3); the ungodly do not lay solid foundations (4:3). But immutable Wisdom never changes in her designs, is of firm, sure, and tranquil mind (bebaion, asphales, amerimnon, 7:23). For Philo, “safety lies in staying at home” (Husbandry 162); “the safest option is to remain calm.”¹⁵ If the adjective usually modifies a route or a journey,¹⁶ it is also used to define knowledge: “a comprehensive, firm, and solid grasp that reason cannot shake” (Prelim. Stud. 141); “to speak more truly (or precisely)” (to ge asphalesteron eipein, Etern. World 74); “the sustenance, the support, the strength, the firmness (bebaiotes) of all is the immutable God” (ho asphales theos, Dreams 1.158). Most of the occurrences in Josephus have to do with security,¹⁷ sometimes in the legal sense;¹⁸ some have to do with prudence,¹⁹ which is very close to the idea of certitude (Ant. 1.106; cf. 15.67: uncertain hopes).

The verb asphalizo, “to secure, fortify,”²⁰ is used for the solidity of a building (Neh 3:15; hiphil of Hebrew hazaq, “make firm”), for the fastening of an image with iron (Wis 13:15), for putting something in a safe or sheltered place (10:12; cf. 4:17), for supporting with might (Isa 41:10, Hebrew tamaḥ). In Josephus, it means especially to secure the defense of a country or a city, to take measures to ensure its security,²¹ especially with a nuance of prudence: the Tiberians “took the precaution (asphalistenai) of fortifying their walls” (Life 317); “being on guard against the appearing of enemies” (asphalisamenoi periemenon autous, Ant. 4.160). Josephus also uses the word, however, to describe how he safeguarded himself against those who might criticize his narrative (Ant. 10.218), and in a legal sense: “those who read these letters, which are guaranteed by the royal seal—tas hypo tou basilikou semanteros esphalismenas epistolas —shall not oppose what is written herein” (11.271).

The adverb asphalos, “without slipping, solidly, firmly,” takes on all of the meanings of the adjective.²² In the LXX, it always translates the Hebrew betah, referring to a safe place (Tob 6:4), a journey made in safety,²³ but we may understand asphalos eidotes to mean knowledge free of any doubt: “knowing with certitude what oaths they trusted in” (Wis 18:6).

All of this would be superfluous except that it helps determine the significance of asphaleia at the end of the prologue to the Third Gospel, which is written in purest Greek style, and in which Luke sets out to specify the goal of his work:²⁴ heos an epignos peri hon katechethes logon ten asphaleian (Luke 1:4). First of all, we must point out the emphatic position of the last term which is thus spotlighted: epignos . . . ten asphaleian.²⁵ Thus we should not hesitate to translate, along with most moderns, “absolute certainty”²⁶—the Philonian definition²⁷—but at the same time recognizing that it means not just intellectual conviction but also safety, firmness, and stability. Xenophon had already used the word with respect to the certainty of an argument (Xenophon, Mem. 4.6.15, asphaleia logou); the meaning is identical in the synonym to asphales, in P.Amh. 131, 3: “until he has certain knowledge of the matter” (hina to asphales epigno tou pragmatos, second century); 132, 5; P.Giss. 27, 8: “so that I may know with certainty” (hina to asphales epigno kai stephanephorian axo). Finally, we should note the custom of supplying a guarantee or a written assurance.²⁸

On the other hand, in 1Thess 5:3 it is a question of stability and safety, which is one of the most common meanings in the papyri:²⁹ “When they say, ‘Peace and safety’ (eirene kai asphaleia), then sudden destruction will fall upon them.”³⁰ When the officers from the Sanhedrin go to find the imprisoned apostles, they find the prison “locked and secure (en pase asphaleia) and the guards standing before the gates.”³¹

The adjective asphales is used three times by St. Luke in the sense of certain, precise, or exact knowledge (Acts 21:34; 22:30; 25:26), for which there is no parallel in the papyri (except for P.Lond. 1916, 26, from the fourth century AD, hina to asphales methomen kai pisthomen; SB 11017, 5: ten asphalen phasin gnous), which use it only with the meaning “sure,”³² which corresponds better to Phil 3:1—“It does not hurt me to write the same things to you, and for you it is a guarantee” (hymen de asphales, it is safer for you); and especially to Heb 6:19—“We have a soul’s anchor that is sure and firm” (asphale te kai bebaian). These metaphors of land or sea routes and anchors were traditional,³³ like the union of the two adjectives.³⁴

The four occurrences of the verb asphalizo in the NT are all in the middle voice and have to do either with the guard at Jesus’ tomb³⁵ or the Philippian jailer, who “secured the feet (tous podas esphalisato) of Paul and Silas in stocks” (Acts 16:24; cf. Wis 13:15; P.Tebt. 283, 19). This latter meaning is the most common in the papyri where a suspect is captured or secured³⁶ or where the body of a deceased person is guarded (P.Princ. 166,5), but in addition products are seized (P.Tebt. 53, 29) and property is secured (407, 4).

The adverb asphalos has the same meaning in Mark 14:44, where Judas asks the soldiers to hold Jesus securely when leading him away, and in Acts 16:23, where the Philippian jailer is ordered to guard Paul and Silas closely (asphalos terein autous). Similarly P.Giss. 19, 14, “so I enjoin you to (guard) yourself closely” (parakalo se oun asphalos seauton [terein]); and P.Oxy. 742, 5: “put them in a secure place” (thes autas eis topon asphalos). But at Pentecost Peter affirms, “Let the whole house of Israel know with certainty (asphalos oun ginosteto hoti) that God made this Jesus Lord and Christ . . .”;³⁷ a meaning that accords well with Luke 1:4.

¹ Cf. Plato, Resp. 3.396 d: “faltering (ε—σφαλμένον) because of sickness, love, or even drunkenness”; 404 a: “a habit dangerous (σφαλήν) to the health.”

² Summarized by W. K. Hobart, Medical Language, pp. 199–201 (gives the references to Hippocrates, Galen, Aretaeus) and N. van Brock, Vocabulaire médicale, p. 184. Cf. Hippocrates, Aph. 2.19: “with acute illnesses, predictions either of death or of health are not absolutely certain”; Epid. 1.5: “Digestion signals that the turning point is imminent and [return to] health is certain” (ἀσφαλίην = certainty); 1.11: “the semi-tertian fever, the most dangerous of all”; Nat. Hom. 13: “the safest diagnosis” (illnesses whose outcome can be predicted with the most certainty, cf. J. Jouanna, Hippocrate: La Nature de l’homme, Berlin, 1975, p. 290); Acut. 9: “Medicine can do much to preserve the health of the healthy” (τοι—σιν ὑγιαίνουσιν ε—ς ἀσφάλειαν); 58.2: a regular diet is safer for the health and sudden, major changes; 62.1; Append. 4.2: “purgation after bleeding requires security and moderation”; 31.4; 54: “foods are not to be prescribed except when completely safe, when the patient is well beyond the spike of the fever”; 57.1; Liqu. 6.5: “the greatest sign of recovery” (μέγιστον σεμήϊον ε—ς ἀσφάλειαν); Vict. 3.76.2: “the safest treatment”; 4.90.1: “a sign of health: a firm step” (ὁδοιπορεῖ—ν τε ἀσφαλω—ς); Oct. 11.1: “those who are born without risk”; 10.2: “the ones that come head first come out better than the ones that come feet first”; Dent. 18: “ulcerations of the tonsils that come without a fever are less troublesome.”

³ Thucydides 3.22.2: “with only the left foot shod for the sake of surefootedness” (ἀσφαλείας ἔνεκα).

⁴ Aristotle, Pol. 6.5.2: to provide for the stability of constitutions against unsettling elements; Sophocles, OT 51: the rescue of a city; Epictetus 2.15.9: “the firmness and stability of this decision.”

⁵ Plato, Resp. 5.467 c: “providing for their safety”; Demosthenes, 1 C. On. 24; Aeschylus, Suppl. 495: an escort of guards “to guarantee our safety”; Thucydides 1.17: the administration of cities by tyrants δι’ ἀσφαλείας; 1.120.5: “When a plan is being formed you are safe, but when the time comes for execution fear intervenes”; Xenophon, Cyr. 4.5.28: “It is not those who remain seated near their friends who protect them the best” (τὴν ἀσφάλειαν παρέχουσιν); Hell. 2.2.2: Lysander gives safe-conducts to the Athenians for their security; Polybius 1.57; 3.97.7: a place of refuge that provides shelter from enemies; Dio Cassius 44.33: “for security reasons, the conspirators retired to . . .”; 45.9.38; 47.11; 55.15; P. Mich. XIV, 683, 3: the payment provides a guarantee, εἰς τὴν ἀσφάλειαν.

⁶ Lev 26:5; Deut 21:10—“You shall dwell in security” (Hebrew betah); 1Macc 14:37; 2Macc 4:21—Antiochus takes security measures, πραγμάτων τῆς ἀσφαλείας; 9:21; 15:1—Nicanor attacks without risk; 15:11; Ps 104:5—the earth has foundations that are unshakable (Hebrew majōn). In Prov 8:14, ἀσφάλεια (Hebrew tūshiyâh) is associated with counsel (βουλή); cf. Philo, Worse Attacks Better 36, 37, 42: “safety lies in keeping quiet.”

⁷ Ep. Arist. 115, 118, 172, 230: “gratitude, which is stronger than any argument, assures the greatest safety”; cf. 61: the gems “were fastened with gold pins that crossed them for greater security” (πρὸς τὴν ἀσφάλειαν); 85: “the solidity of the lintel.”

⁸ Philo, Joseph 63 (σωτηρίας καὶ ἀσφαλείας); 251; Spec. Laws 4.58; Moses 1.178; Flacc. 41; Cherub. 126: “a house is built for security and protection”; Creation 142; Husbandry 149, 167; Plant. 146: “the security of those most dear”; Decalogue 178; Spec. Laws 1.75; Contemp. Life 22–23; Conf. Tongues 103: the solidity of asphalt.

⁹ Philo, Flight 80; Spec. Laws 1.69, 159; 3.130, 132; Good Man Free 151; cf. Josephus, Ant. 8.13; Dittenberger, Or. 81, 16.

¹⁰ War 1.567, 623; 2.466, 572, 606, 620; 3.33, 85; Ant. 13.263, 266, 307; 14.151, 161; 15.60, 167; Life 45, 113, 126, 330; Ag. Apion 2.157.

¹¹ War 3.398: “Vespasian commanded that Josephus be guarded most carefully (φρουρεῖ—ν αὐτὸν μετὰ πάσης ἀσφαλείας), intending to send him to Nero as soon as possible”; Life 163: “the mission of guarding closely (φυλάξοντασ μετ̄ ἀσφαλείασ) anyone who wished to leave.”

¹² Sophocles, OT 617: “deciding too quickly is not without risk”; Euripides, Phoen. 599: “a prudent general is more sure than a fearful general”; Plato, Soph. 231 a; Euripides, IT 1062: “we can count on each other”; Thucydides 1.69.5: “They used to say that you could be counted on!”

¹³ Herodotus 1.109: “for the sake of my security this child must die”; Aristophanes, Av. 1489: “at this time, it is more secure to be with them”; Sophocles, Aj. 1251: “big strapping fellows . . . the most solid”; Xenophon, Hell. 5.4.51: “the route of Potniae is the most secure”; Xenophon, An. 3.2.19: “it is safer for them to flee than for us”; 8.39.4: “judging themselves to be safe.” For Hippocrates: ἀσφαλή εἶναι (or ε—ν ἀσφαλεία εἶναι) is to be out of danger, on the road to recovery; cf. Acut. Suppl. 6: “give barley water when the crisis is past and the patient is out of danger (ε—ν ἀσφαλείη ἤδη ἦ)”; 11: “next, if the patient seems to be out of danger (ἀσφαλὴσ φαίνηται), give him barley water mixed with honey.”

¹⁴ Xenophon, An. 1.8.22: “That is the safest place for them”; 3.2.19; Cyr. 7.1.21: “You will be much safer once you are outside than shut up inside”; Eq. Mag. 4.18: “retiring to safety” (εἰ—σ τὸ ἀσφαλὲσ); 5.5: “distance provides the greatest safety and increases the illusion”; Thucydides 1.39.1: “Someone who proceeds in all safety.”

¹⁵ Dreams 2.92; hence the link with prudence (Giants 46; Flight 136, 206; Change of Names 242); Drunkenness 203: “the safest thing is to suspend judgment”; Moses 1.15: Pharaoh’s daughter “judged that it was not safe to take the child to the palace right away.”

¹⁶ Abraham 269: “going straight ahead on a safe route (one free of danger) where the ground is not shifting”; Moses 2.247; Spec. Laws 4.159; Flacc. 31, 115; To Gaius 247, 361; cf. Conf. Tongues 104: “asphalt is solid and sure.”

¹⁷ War 1.303; 3.174, 457; 4.31, 44, 368, 615; Ant. 13.41, 165 (safe-conduct); 20.85; Life 108, 118, 269; cf. War 3.402: “I ask for a more secure prison (ἀσφαλέστερον) if I have spoken the name of God flippantly.”

¹⁸ Ant. 17.156: a security deposit; Life 347: “to secure themselves against me, they duped me.”

¹⁹ War 4.143; Ant. 3.41; 6.59; 16.327 (examine carefully); Ag. Apion 2.224: “It would not be prudent to divulge God’s truth to the ignorant mob.”

²⁰ Polybius 1.22.10: “those who came after secured their flanks”; 1.42.7: “a city well defended by its walls”; intransitive: to secure oneself, to be on guard: “Molon secured the support of the neighboring satrapies” (5.43.6); Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.77: “Salitis fortified the eastern regions.”

²¹ War 2.609; 4.120; 6.15; Ant. 13.22, 175, 183, 202; 14.178.

²² Homer, Il. 13.141: “the stone unflinching follows its fixed course”; Od. 13.86: “The ship ran on steadily, unwavering.” Herodotus 1.86: “In human affairs, nothing is certain”; 2.161: “to reign with greater security over the rest of the population”; Plato, Phd. 85 d: “the possibility of going on with more security and less risk”; Xenophon, Eq. Mag. 6.2: This leader “provides for their safety in retreat”; 7.11; 8.1, 3: “to descend the hillocks in safety” (without the risk of slipping); I.Priene 44, 33: an escort seeing to the safety of a judge returning to his country: ἵνα δὲ ἀσφαλῶς παραπεμφθῆ.

²³ Gen 34:25; Bar 5:7; 1Macc 6:40—the soldiers “advanced steadily and in good order” (ἀσφαλῶς καὶ τεταγμένως); cf. this epitaph from Sosibios: “Depart in all safety.”

²⁴ Cf. Cajetan: “Lucas causam finalem scribendi a se Evangelium, assignat certitudinem rerum Evangelicarum”; C. F. D. Moule, “The Intention of the Evangelists,” in A. J. B. Higgins, New Testament Essays, pp. 165–179.

²⁵ E. Delebecque (Etudes grecques, p. 8) notes: “It is clear that Luke has detached ἀσφάλεια from the rest of the prologue by separating it from the verb (‘certitude’ being the direct object of ἐπιγνώσκω) with the relative clause.” He translates “afin que tu découvres à propos des instructions que tu as entendues, la certitude,” and comments, “The certitude, in short, that will be revealed to Theophilus is the certitude of revelation” (p. 9).

²⁶ Cf. Acts 2:36; 1Macc 7:3. J. H. Ropes, “St. Luke’s Preface, ἀσφάλεια and παρακολουθεῖν,” in JTS, 1924, pp. 67–71. W. den Boer (“Some Remarks on the Beginnings of Christian Historiography,” in SP, vol. 4, Berlin, pp. 348–362) prefers to translate: “precise information.”

²⁷ Cf. above. An intellectual meaning, Tabula of Cebes 32.2: the science that confers παιδεία is ἀσφαλῆς δόσις καὶ βεβαία καὶ ἀμετάβλητος; P.Giss. 27, 8: ἵνα τὸ ἀσφαλῆς ἐπιγνώσκω.

²⁸ P.Berl.Zill. VI, 3: τήνδε τὴν ἔνγραφον ἀσφάλειαν; VIII, 16: δέξασθαι παρ ἐμοῦ ταύτην τὴν ἔγγραφον παρακλητικὴν ἀσφάλειαν; P.Mich. 322 a, 33 (AD 46): katveῖngraphpton aÓsfaleiaß; 607, 13; διὰ τῆς παρούσης ε—γγράφου ἀσφαλείας; P.Flor. 25, 28; 293, 9; P.Wash.Univ. 46, 13: πρὸς σὴν ἀσφάλειαν τούτου; P.Ant. 42, 13; P.Amh. 78, 16: ἀσφάλειαν γραπτὴν; P.Princ. 34, 17; P.Soterichos 22, 23, 33; 24, 11, 27; P.Bour. 15, 9; P.Köln 153, 4; C.P.Herm. 32, 26: πρὸς ἀσφάλειαν εἰ—ς πάντα τὰ ε—γγεγραμμένα καὶ εἰ—ς τὴν βεβαίωσιν; P.Erl. 67, 10: διὰ ταύτης ἡμῶν τῆς ε—γγράφου ἀσφαλείας ε—σχηκέναι; 81, 47; P.Oxy. 1891, 5: ὁμολογῶ— διὰ ταύτης μου τῆς ε—γγράφου ἀσφαλείας; 1896, 14; 2975, 19; 3365, 11; SB 6704, 7; 10781, 8; etc.

²⁹ Edict of Tiberius Julius Alexander: “The gods have reserved the safety of the world for this most sacred moment” (BGU 1563, 26; AD 68). An honorific decree of Rhamnus for the strategos Theotimus, who “provided for the safety of the countryside, so that the inhabitants might enjoy safety” (J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. 20, 6–7; cf. 22, 44); honorific decree of Phalanna for the judges from Metropolis, granting them “safety in wartime and in peacetime, for them and for their descendants” (NCIG, n. 12, 36; second century BC). With the meaning “guarantee”: Thaesis gives full authority to her husband Ptollion to act on her behalf in a lawsuit, “the rights of Thaesis being fully reserved in the recovery of eighty drachmas loaned by her with guarantee (κατὰ ἀσφάλειαν) to Petsiris” (P.Fouad 35, 14; from AD 48); “the guarantee is valid and secure” (ἡ δὲ ἀσφάλεια κυρία καὶ βεβαία, P.Rein. 107, 4; cf. 6, 7). A receipt delivered to an epimeletes “for more certainty, I have made out this receipt, valid in one copy” (P.Got. 9, 19); C.P.Herm. 18, 17; 19, 8; 29, 5; 40, 4; P.Erl. 79, 9; P.Oxy. 1865, 11–12; 1880, 17; 2411, 34; 2666, col. II, 8; 2780, 23; 2951, 26; PSI 823, 3; P.Ant. 91, 11; 104, 4, 6; P.Mert. 97, 17; P.Mich. 282, 8; 283, 19; P.Amst. 96, 3: so that you may act with all assurance; P.Fam.Tebt. 9, 13: κατὰ ἀσφάλειαν τετελειομένην; 29, 49; P.Aberd. 19, 23; Pap.Lugd.Bat. II, 7, 31; BGU 1659, 7; SB 7201, 22; 10256, 6; 10289, col. I, a 9; 10539, 26; 10810, 5–6; 11215, 7; P.Köln 153, 7. Guarantee in the commercial sense: αἰ—ῶναὶ καὶ ἀσφάλειαὶ = contracts and property titles (P.Tebt. 407, 10; P.Oxy. 3240, 6).

³⁰ Cf. Philo, Rewards 147: “When they think that they are in safety (ε—ν ἀσφαλει—) in the cities—an illusion born of false hope—they will perish in their prime, falling into the enemy’s snares.”

³¹ Acts 5:23; cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 547, 30: ὅπως μετὰ πάσης ἀσφαλαίας συντελεσθῆι—; P.Fay. 107, 11: “guard those found guilty in a secure place” (τοὺς φανέντας αἰ—τίους ἔχιν ε—ν ἀσφαλείᾳ); SB 8881, 9. Josephus, War 6.116; Ant. 15.178.

³² P.Phil. 35, 7: “I sent you a letter through Valerianus . . . a trustworthy man (ἀνθρώπου ἀσφαλοῦς), and I cannot believe that he would not have given you my letter”; P.Oxy. 2598, b 6: “Let me know the price through a trustworthy person (διάσφαλοῦς ἀνθρώπου) so that I can reimburse you”; 2983, 13; 2984, 12; 3357, 17; P.Ryl. 92, 19; P.Mich. 657, 11: “you will give the dates to someone who will ship them as safely as possible” (τω—ἀσφαλέστερον φέροντι); Pap.Lugd.Bat. XX, 25, 4; BGU 909, 24; P.Köln 161, 10; SB 6717, 11: ὡς ἀσφαλέστατα = the most reliable; Dittenberger, Or. 701, 10: route “across safe and flat terrain along the Red Sea”; P.Oslo 128, 12: ε—ν ἀσφαλει— εἶναι; P.Oxy. 2228, 29; 2268, 7; I.Priene 114, 10: τὴν δὲ πίστιν καὶ φυλακὴν τω—ν παραδοθέντων αὐτω— γραμμάτων ε—ποιήσατο ἀσφαλή; 118, 8: ἀσφαλέστατα πρὸς πάντα τὸν χρόνον γενηθῆναι τὰ βραβει—α; ZPE, vol. 10, 1973, p. 105, n. 21, n. 22, 7; P.Cair.Isid. 94, 4. Of an arrested suspect, “under close guard” (P.Oxy. 1886, 14; P.Mert. 29, 6; 66, 9).

³³ —Ἀσφαλω—ς: the security of a mooring (Strabo 5.4.6; Philo, Rewards 58); ἀσφαλει—ς: the security of a route (Strabo 4.6.6). “What security (ἀσφάλεια) can those who navigate have if the sailors do not listen to the pilots?” (Dio Cassius 41.33). For the anchor, cf. Herondas 1.41; Pindar, Ol. 6.100; Plato, Leg. 12.961 c; Philemon, frag. 213, 10: ε—βάλεῖ ἄγκυραν καθάψας ἀσφαλείας εἵνεκα (in Stobaeus, Ecl. 30.4.10, vol. 3, p. 664); Philo, Spec. Laws 2.52: “to cast an anchor of security in an existence free of danger”; Plutarch, Sol. 19; De virt. mor. 6: “my heart is ready to yield and resists no longer, like the point of an anchor in the sand that is disturbed by the sea”; Heliodorus, Aeth. 8.6.9: “cast the anchor of salvation”; 4.19.9. Cf. C. Spicq, “Ἀγκυρα et Πρόδρομος dans Hébr. VI, 19–20,” in ST, 1949, pp. 185–187; same symbolism in Rabbinic Judaism, cf. R. Mach, Der Zaddik in Talmud und Midrasch, Leiden, 1957, pp. 223–241.

³⁴ To the references given by C. Spicq, Hébreux, vol. 2, p. 164, add Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 141: ἀσφαλῆς καὶ βέβαιος; Alleg. Interp. 3.164; Cherub. 103; Conf. Tongues 106; Heir 314; Prelim. Stud. 141; Plutarch, Cat. Mai. 21.5: “He invested his capital in solid and sure ventures”; Polybius 12.25.2; Heliodorus, Aeth. 8.16.1: a troop is sent on ahead to clear the route (τὸ ἀσφαλὲς τῆς ὁδοιπορίας) and through their explorations to secure (βεβαιώσοντες) the march of the bulk of the army.

³⁵ Matt 27:64, 65, 66. Cf. Ep. Arist. 104: “a forward post that guarantees the protection” of the citadel. In the sense of reinforcing a house (P.Fouad 30, 24).

³⁶ P.Ryl. 68, 19 (first century BC); P.Tebt. 283, 19; 798, 25; 800, 35; 960, 7; P.Mich. XIII, 660, 13: “after arresting my husband”; 661, 2; P.Bour. 10, 20: if these persons take part in an uprising, “you will do well to secure their persons until we have arrived.” —Ἀσφαλίζομαι also means “certify”;

P.Oxy. 2407, 13, 31, 48, 52; 2956, 22: “guaranteeing at your own risk”; 3289, 14; BGU 1576, 10; P.Panop.Beatty 1, 273; P.Ryl. 77, 40; SB 6002, 18; 6643, 20; 7558, 26; 10253, 3; 10801, 4.

³⁷ Acts 2:36; cf. γράψον μοι ἀσπαλω—ς, “write me without fail” (P.Oxy. 3312, 6; SB 10529, A 23); ἵνα ἀσφαλω—ς ἀναλεύσης (SB 10557, 9); nuances of security (P.Hib. 53, 3: ἀσφαλω—ς διεγγυα—ν); Ep. Arist. 46: that the books (of the Law), once translated, “return to us with certainty,” become our property again; defense of a territory against any attack (NCIG, n. VI, 44).

ἄσωτία, ἀσώτως

asotia, incurable dissoluteness; asotos, prodigally

asotia, S 810; TDNT 1.506–507; EDNT 1.176; MM 89; L&N 88.96; BAGD 119 | asotos, S 811; EDNT 1.176; L&N 88.97; BAGD 119

Made up of the alpha-privative and soo, asotos normally means “incapable of being saved,” and thus “incurable,”¹ and the adverb asotos “in a hopeless state.” With the philosophers and in usage, asotia, literally “lost life,” can have two meanings, which are so closely linked that it is not easy to distinguish them:² sometimes it means prodigality, sometimes a dissolute life. The transition from the one to the other is explained perfectly by Aristotle: “We label as prodigal those who are incontinent and those who become spendthrifts to satisfy their intemperance. That is why prodigals have such a bad reputation: they have several vices all at once. . . . Properly speaking, the word prodigal refers to the one who has only the sole vicious tendency to destroy his means of subsistence.”³

Asotia, dissipation of wealth and debauchery, is very often associated with drinking binges during festivals: “the temple was filled with debaucheries and orgies by dissolute Gentiles and prostitutes” (2Macc 6:4); “Do not be drunk with wine, which only amounts to licentiousness.”⁴ Athenaeus (4.59–67) showed by many examples that the asotos not only wastes his goods, but loses his time, degrades his faculties and abilities, and consumes him. So much did asotia become synonymous with dissoluteness and immorality, and opposed to virtue (arete), that it became a literary topos and is even found in symbolic monuments.⁵ It is in this general sense that asotia designates the pagan lifestyle in 1Pet 4:4—the pagans often find it strange that Christian converts “no longer run with them to the same torrent of licentiousness.”

The prodigal spending, these dissolute ways, this flashy existence is often denounced as the vice of the sons of the family, of the younger set, starting with Prov 28:7—“The one whose companions are the debauched (Hebrew zalal) brings dishonor to his father.” It is in this sense that admission to the presbyterate is allowed only for the father of a family in which the children “are not accused of bad conduct or undisciplined.”⁶

We should hesitate to be specific about the conduct of the young man in Luke 15:13—“he wasted all his substance by living asotos ” (dieskorpisen ten ousian autou zon asotos).⁷ Because the older brother maligns the younger in verse 30—“this son of yours has consumed your wealth with prostitutes”—we get the idea that the prodigal has lived lasciviously. But our Lord is much more delicate and discreet, and we must translate, with Fr. Lagrange: “He wasted all his substance through a life of foolish spending.”⁸ The tradition has precisely designated him as “the prodigal son.”⁹

¹ Plutarch, Quaest. nat. 26; cf. Alc. 3.1: The child Alciabiades having fled, Pericles announces “If he is safe (σω—ς), the rest of his life will be lost (ἄσωτον).” R. C. Trench, Synonyms, p. 54; Foerster, in TDNT, vol. 1, p. 506.

² According to Plato, false opinions in the soul of the young man introduce “insolence, anarchy, prodigality (ἄσωτία) . . . and prodigality is called magnificence” (Resp. 8.560 <l+>e); but in the Laws: the totally perverted man who usually lives in debauchery (or prodigality? ὡς ἄσωτος), is altogether impoverished” Leg. 5.743 b).

³ Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 4.1.1120b31ff. Cf. frag. 56 (Rose), cited by Plutarch, Pel. 3.2; De cupid. divit. 527 a; Eum. 13.11: “They transform the camp into a place of debauchery”; Ant. 10.4.

⁴ Eph 5:18; T. Jud. 16.1: φυλάξασθε . . . τὸν ὄρον τοῦ οἴνου· ἔστιν γὰρ ε—ν ἀύτῳ— . . . ε—πιθυμίας, πυρώσεως, ἄσωτίας καὶ αι—σχροκερδίας. Cf. Philo: “The secret desire of gluttons . . . devotees of a decadent and dissolute way of life who take pleasure in drinking bouts and wild parties” (Spec. Laws 4.91). Drinkers pass their life far from home and hearth; they are enemies of their parents, of their wives, of their children, enemies also of their country, they are also their own enemies. A life spent on drink and licentiousness (ἄσωτος βίος) is a menace for everyone” (Contemp. Life 47). “Vitellius left the palace drunk after the most lascivious dinner ever (τῆς ἀσώτου τραπέζης)” (Josephus, War 4.651). “Charybdis is a good name for the insatiable, spendthrift debauchery of drinking bouts” (Heraclitus, All. 70.10). “Athens offered scarce resources for his intemperance (asotia), so he stocked up in Macedonia” (Plutarch, De cupid. divit. 5.525 c). “Everyone berated and reproached him for, among other things, his asotia, since he had a large belly” (Dio Cassius 65.20.3).

“Plautianus became the most intemperate of men (ἄσωτότατος), to the point of abandoning himself to good eating and then making himself vomit, since his stomach could no longer digest meats and wine, so much had he loaded it” (ibid. 75.15.7). “He is a good companion, capable of drinking with him and the right one to carouse in the company of a flute girl” (Lucian, Vit. Auct. 12).

⁵ On the opposition of —Αρετή and —Ασωτία, see F. Cumont, Symbolisme funeraire, p. 423. In the Tabula of Cebes 7, one of the hetaerae, —Ασωτία, is accompanied by —Ακρασία, —Απληστία, Κολακεία.

⁶ Titus 1:6—μὴ ἐ—ν κατηγορίᾳ ἀσωτίαθ ἢ ἀνυπότακτα; cf. the rebellious (sarar) prostitute of Prov 7:11.

⁷ Cf. Philo, Prov. 2.4: “Parents do not stand aloof from their prodigal sons, τω—ν ἀσώτων υἱ—έων; they take pity on their misfortune, surround them with care, shower attention upon them” (according to Eusebius, Praep. Evang. 8.14).

⁸ M. J. Lagrange cites as a good parallel Josephus, Ant. 12.203: ὡς ἀσώτως ζῆν διεγνωκότες = having chosen to live in a foolish manner (a financial contract). This is also the common meaning in the papyri: a cloak guaranteed 2,700 copper drachmas πρὸς ἀσωτείαν (P.Fay. 12, 24; from 103 BC); Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 9, 6 (edict of Praeses of the Thebaïis on maximum interest rates; fourth century AD); likewise the verb ἀσωτεύεσθαι, “dissipate all one’s resources”; P.Flor. 99, 7 (first-second century AD): ἐ—πεὶ ὁ υἱ—ὸς Κάστωρ μεθ ἐ—τέρων ἀσωτευόμενος ἐ—σπάνισε τὰ αὐτοῦ πάντα καὶ ἐ—πὶ τὰ ἡμω—ν μεταβάς βούλεται ἀπολέσαι κτλ.; PSI 41, 12 (fourth century), a woman complains that her husband is squandering their goods: ἀσαυτεύων [lit. ἀσαυδεύων] καὶ πράττων ἃ μὴ τοι—ς εὐγενέσι πρέπι.

⁹ Verse 32 corresponds to verse 13: “He was lost, ἀπολωλώς.” It remains true that the common title of the parable of the prodigal son does not exactly express its content, because it is the parable of both sons, the one a sinner and the other faithful, and reveals the love of God for the one as for the other, although in two different ways.

ἀτακτέω, ἄτακτος, ἀτάκτως

atakteo, to be disorderly; ataktos, undisciplined, disorderly, rebellious; ataktos, in disorder

atakteo, S 812; TDNT 8.47–48; EDNT 1.176; MM 89; L&N 88.246; BAGD 119 | ataktos, S 813; TDNT 8.47–48; EDNT 1.176; MM 89; L&N 88.247; BAGD 119 | ataktos, S 814; TDNT 8.47–78; EDNT 1.177; L&N 88.247; BAGD 119

In 1Thess 5:14, St. Paul asks the community to take back the brothers who are living in a dissolute manner (noutheteite tous ataktous). In his second letter, he more severely prescribes keeping away every brother who is leading a dissolute life (ataktos peripatountos, 2Thess 3:6, 11), giving himself as an example: “We ourselves did not lead a disorderly life in your midst.”¹ It would not be necessary to insist on the meaning of ataktos —“not remaining in his/her/its place, out of order, undisciplined”—if a certain number of exegetes did not suggest translating it “idle, lazy.”² But the usage of the verb, the adjective, and the adverb in the Koine, notably in the first century AD, confirms that the word covers any breach of obligation or convention, disorders of life in general; and the usage is decisive.

On the cosmic level, matter was “disorderly and confused,” then God takes it from disorder to order.³ In military parlance especially, the word is used with respect to negligent officers (P.Hib. 198, 149; from the third century BC), an army in disarray, undisciplined or insubordinate soldiers.⁴ In addition, “disorderly” modifies “multitude, crowd.”⁵ In a political context, Josephus compares people who live unencumbered by laws and rules (“those who live in a lawless and disorderly fashion,” ton anomos kai ataktos biounton) to those who observe order and common law.⁶ In the social realm, if sons do not meet the financial needs of their parents when necessity arises, they become subject to a penalty of a thousand drachmas, according to testamentary convention.⁷ In apprenticeship agreements, it is provided that if the apprentice is guilty of misconduct or has been absent for one reason or another, he must work additional makeup days.⁸

The moral sense is constant from T. Naph. 2.9, which prescribes doing everything “in order and with good intentions, in the fear of God, doing nothing disorderly (meden atakton poiesete), out of due season,” to Iamblichus, who calls passion “disorderly, culpable, unstable” (Myst. 1.10 = 1.36.13). Morality lies in not letting reason follow its course with disorderly haste.⁹ Ataktoi andres (Philodemus of Gadara, D. 1.7.6) are apaideutoi.¹⁰ Diodorus Siculus goes so far as to equate the life unshackled by moral norms to the life of wild beasts: “settling down into an ataktos and beastlike life and go out to various pastures at random” (en atakto kai theriodei bio kathestotas sporaden epi tas nomas exienai 1.8.1). Finally, the ataktoi are rebels, the disobedient, or insurgents,¹¹ even impious troublemakers; a regulation from Delos covers the possibility that pilgrims may conduct themselves improperly in the sacred places.¹²

In sum, the ataktos is the who is defective in action, irregular, against the rule; and since in the Christian life the “order” is established by God or the leaders of the church, disorder can mean sometimes a shortcoming or a discordant note, sometimes law-breaking and moral dissoluteness. The ataktoi Thessalonians free themselves from the rule of community life. One thinks of sins against brotherly love, a propensity to favor discord, a refusal to accept the customs or discipline of the church. Certain “troubled” ones seem particularly stormy, befuddled types who disturb the peace (1Thess 4:11-12). At any rate, “their walk is not in line” (Gal 2:14). They are “culpable” and probably stubborn.

¹ 2Thess 3:7; cf. W. P. De Boer, The Imitation of Paul, Kampen, 1962, p. 126ff. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, pp. 720ff. M. F. Wiles, The Divine Apostle, Cambridge, 1967, pp. 24ff.

² The semantics of this word group has been outlined excellently by B. Rigaux, Saint Paul: Les Epîtres aux Thessaloniens, Paris-Gembloux, 1956, pp. 582ff. Cf. C. Spicq, “Les Thessaloniens ‘inquiets’ étaient-ils des paresseux?” in ST, vol. 10, 1956, pp. 1–13.

³ Philo, Plant. 3; Creation 22: “Matter was on its own without order (ἄτακτος), without quality, without life, without homogeneity, but full of heterogeneity, disharmony, and discord”; Etern. World 75: “The nature of the world is order from the disorderly (τὴν τάξιν τῶ—ν ἀτάκτων), accord from the discordant, harmony from the unharmonious, union from the disparate . . .”; Spec. Laws 1.48. Cf. Ps.-Archytas, in Stobaeus, Ecl. 1.41.2 (vol. 1, p. 278); Numenius, in Eusebius, Praep. Evang. 15.17.

⁴ In the third century BC, the inhabitants of Soloe in Cilicia complain: “the city is occupied by soldiers who are encamped in disorder, ὑπὸ τῶ—ν στρατιωτῶ—ν ἀτάκτως κατεσκηνωκότων” (C. B. Welles, Royal Correspondence, n. 30, 4; reproduced in C.Ord.Ptol., n. 84); Thucydides 3.108.3: “They charged without order and with no discipline”; Aeneas Tacticus, Polior. 15.5; 16.2–4; Onasander 10.7; 10.20; 21.7; 27; Josephus, War 1.101: “the army of Antiochus in disorder”; 1.382; 2.517; 3.77; Ant. 15.150; 17.296; Plutarch, Phoc. 12.3; Diodorus Siculus 17.48.4: dispersed, scattered soldiers. In contrast, the ephebes carried out sorties in the countryside with discipline, εὐτάκτως (IG vol. 2, 2, 1011, 15); cf. L. Robert, Opera Minora Selecta, vol. 2, p. 1076; idem, I.Car., p. 289, n. 166.

⁵ Herodian 4.14.7: ἄτακτον πλῆθος. Philo, Rewards 20: “All that is disorderly (ἄτακτον), unseemly, dissolute, questionable, that is what the crowd is, and keeping company with them is worthless for one who has just passed into virtue”; Josephus, War 2.649; Ant. 15.152; 3Macc 1:19. Cf. the confusion of a tumult, θόρυβος ἄτακτος (Philodemus of Gadara, Hom., col. IX, 27).

⁶ Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.151; cf. Plutarch, Cat. Mai. 16.3: the censors have the right to expel from the senate one whose life is licentious and disorderly; Plutarch, Cim. 4.4.

⁷ P.Eleph. 2.13 (285–284 BC): ἡ πρα—ξις ἔστω ε—κ τοῦ ἄτακτοῦντος καὶ μὴ ποιῶντος κατὰ τὰ γεγραμμένα (new edition by Chrest.Mitt., n. 311; commentary in Jur.Pap., pp. 56–60).

⁸ P.Oxy. 275, 24 (from AD 66); 725, 39 (AD 183); cf. P.Oslo 159, 9; SB 10236, 33 (AD 36). The formula ε—άν τις ἄτακτῆσι is characteristic of corrections or amendments that become effective in case of default on contractual agreements or disobedience, P.Cair.Zen. 59596, 18; BGU 1125, 8; P.Wisc. 4, 22; SB 9841, 7; (cf. P.Oxf. 10, 23).

⁹ Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 85; cf. 45: the νοῦς does not let irrational forces “proceed in disorder or discord, without master or guide.” The fool does not know how to act, after the fashion of a coachman who is not in control of his horses; the latter take off on a crazy course (Husbandry 74; cf. Worse Attacks Better 141; To Gaius 344). Philo modifies ἄτακτος with ἄφρων (Husbandry 74), the complete opposite of the εὔτακτος, who is σώφρων (IG, vol. 9, 750, 18; H. W. Pleket, Epigraphica, vol.2, n. 3, 43; B. 48). This quality is commonly praised in the neoi (MAMA, vol. 6, 112, 4; 114 A 8; N. Firatli, L. Robert, Stèles funéraires, pp. 161–162), and especially inephebes (SEG, vol. 19, 86; 4: πάντες εὔτακτοῦντες καὶ πειθαρχοῦντες; 96, 5; 116, 2; cf. vol. 21, 252, 11; 452, 8; 525, 20; C. Pélékidis, Ephébie attique, pp. 38, 181, 235). So the accent is on discipline (cf. J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1970, p. 453, n. 553). The inhabitants of Rhamnus vote an honorific decree for Dikaiarchos, who “has correctly and zealously provided for the defense of the citadel and its residents, showing himself to be disciplined (εὔτακτον παρέχων), himself and the soldiers placed under the command of his father” (I.Rhamn., n. 15, p. 130). In sports: “If one of the leaders does not present his runners in good order, the city may fine him ten silver staters” (J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. 11, 12). More broadly: “Teachers’ stipends should be paid regularly” (ibid. 13, 10); “awarding me a citation for my orderly life, my spirit, and my wisdom” (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 114, col. III, 5).

¹⁰ Herodian 7.9.5; cf. Plutarch, Apoph. Iac. 54. The Stoics used the noun ataktema in the sense of a moral fault, a lapse of discipline, an infraction (cf. SEG, vol. 13, 521–59 = Dittenberger, Or. 483; complete French translation in R. Martin, L'Urbanisme dans la Grèce antique, Paris, 1956, pp. 58ff.).

¹¹ An edict of the prefect of Egypt, Petronius Quadratus (P.Haw. 73, verso; edited by J. G. Milne, in APF, vol. 5, 1913, p. 324); Dittenberger, Syl. 305, 80. Atakteo = to disturb or shirk one's obligation to the the public order, to free oneself from a regulation, to undertake a revolt (Dittenberger, Or. 200, 6).

¹² —Ατάκτως ἀναστραφει— (F. Sokolowski, Lois sacrées: Supplément, n. 51, 4). Cf. SB 6152, 14: "By their assaults and worse acts of violence they enter tumultuously into the temple and commit sacrilegious acts"; P.Fay. 337 (second century). Philo, listing the vices of the φιλήδονος, places the ἄτακτος between the seditious and the impious (Sacr. Abel and Cain 32).

ἀτενίζω

atenizo, to look attentively, stare

atenizo, S 816; EDNT 1.177; NIDNTT 3.520; MM 89; L&N 24.49; BAGD 119

Among the numerous verbs of seeing in the NT (blepo, theoreo, eidon, horaō, etc.), the denominative verb atenizo merits special attention.¹ It refers to "attentive and prolonged visual observation of an object,"² an insistent fixing of the attention. Thus certain fixed stars "take on a tail . . . in fact, one of the stars, in the constellation of the Dog, had a tail, though a dim one; those who looked at it intently (atenizousin) saw only a faint glow" (Aristotle, Mete. 343 b 9); "Why do we feel ill at ease when we fix our gaze on other objects (ta all' atenizontes), but very comfortable when we look at objects that have the green color of grass, cabbage and other plants? It is because we cannot fix our gaze for long (atenizein) on white and black."³ In the medical writers, the verb is used especially with omma for a particularly fixed gaze.⁴ Moulton-Milligan cite only one papyrus,⁵ to which we can add only BGU 1816, 25 (axio atenisai eis to megethos ton proexerithmemenon, a letter from 60/59 BC) and Pap.Graec.Mag. 4, 556 ("You will see the gods staring at you and rushing upon you," opse de atenizontas soi tous theous kai epi se hormomemous) and 711 (with eyes fixed on God, not giving in to any distraction).

This verb is used twelve times by St. Luke (in Luke and in Acts) and twice by St. Paul.⁶ In Luke 4:20, it expresses curiosity and extreme attentiveness: in the synagogue at Nazareth, "all eyes were riveted on Jesus." The high priest's servant saw Peter (idoussa) sitting near the fire, and “after examining him closely (kai atenisasa auto) she said, ‘This person also was with him’” (Luke 22:56). It was with intensity and a certain amount of anxiety that the apostles, on the day of the ascension, as Jesus disappeared behind a cloud, continued to stare into the sky.⁷ When Peter stopped and fixed his gaze on the paralytic who was asking for alms,⁸ and when St. Paul looked piercingly at Elymas,⁹ this look was both an examination¹⁰ and the point of departure for mental reflection. Several times it connotes an emotional reaction. Thus it is possible to stare in a way that conveys awe, as when the Jews gazed at St. Peter, stupefied that he could perform a miracle (Acts 3:12) and when Cornelius beheld the angel and trembled (10:4). When Herod Agrippa, at the theater of Caesarea, appeared in his luxurious finery, glimmering in the early rays of sunlight, the spectators were seized with holy fright and could not take their eyes off of him (Josephus, Ant. 19.344). During the siege of Jerusalem, the Jews, agonizing under the cruelty of the brigands, “breathed their last with their gaze fixed determinedly on the temple” (War 5.517). Thecla was not only attentive to Paul’s teaching but beside herself with joy (atenizousa hos pros euphrasian, Acts Paul Thec. 8).

¹ Unknown in the LXX (cf. 1Esdr 6:28; 3Macc 2:26) and Philo, having only two occurrences, in Josephus, rare in the papyri, ἀτενίζω derives from ἀτενής “all of whose usages can be related to an original meaning ‘stretched out,’ especially when speaking of eyes or a gaze that are fixed (Aristotle, Lucian, etc.); hence ‘straight’ (Euripides, frag. 65); intense, excessive (Aeschylus, Callimachus); in speaking of a person’s mind ‘strained, serious’ (Hesiod, Pindar, Plato); ‘obstinate’ (Arrian, etc.)” (P.Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique, p. 133).

² C. Mugler, Terminologie optique, p. 63: “l’observation attentive et prolongée d’un objet par la vue.”

³ Ps.-Aristotle, Pr. 959 a 24. C. Mugler (Terminologie optique) cites also Theon of Alexandria, In. Alm., p. 148, 7: “As for those who attentively peruse books (τω—ν ἀτενιζόντων τοι—ς βιβλίοις) . . . even they cannot see (ὄρα—ν) all the letters contained in a page”; Olympiodorus, In Mete. 223.11: “So if we gaze intently (ἀτενιζόντων), the phenomenon of the halo appears; if we do not gaze intently (μὴ ἀτενιζόντων), it disappears”; “the multicolored halo that appears around lamps . . . if we do not stare right at the lamp” (μὴ ἀκριβω—ς ἀτενίσωμεν, ibid. 235.15); John Philoponus, Comm. de An. 335.11: “Why do we see neither the sky nor any of the objects of sight, or at least fix our regard toward them?” (ἀτενίζοντες πρὸς αὐτά).

⁴ Hippocrates, Epid. 7.10: “the gaze of the dying man became fixed”; cf. 7.6: the eyes do not blink; 7.30; Galen, Remed. Parab. 1.4: ἀτενίζειν εἰς τὴν χύτραν; Aretaeus, SA 5; SD 33; W. K. Hobart, Medical Language, p. 76.

⁵ P.Leid. W, 16, 8: εἰ—σελθόντος δὲ τοῦ θεοῦ μὴ ε—νατένιζε τῇ ὄψει, ἀλλὰ τῆς (Ι.τοι—ς) ποσί.

⁶ 2Cor 3:7, 13—the Israelites could not keep their eyes fixed on Moses’ face because of the shining brilliance (literally δόξα) of his face.

⁷ Acts 1:10; cf. 7:55—St. Stephen keeps his eyes fixed on the heavens; 6:15—the members of the Sanhedrin fixed their gaze on Stephen (ἀτενίσαντες) and saw (εἶδον) his face, which looked like an angel’s. Paul was particularly attentive when, before beginning his speech, he kept his eyes fixed on the Sanhedrin (23:1).

⁸ Acts 3:4—“Peter fixed his eyes on him (ἀτενίσας) . . . and said, ‘Look (βλέψον) at us.’”

⁹ Acts 13:9; cf. 14:9—Paul fixed his gaze (ἀτενίσας) on the lame man at Lystra and saw (ἰ—δών) that he had faith.

¹⁰ Peter fixed his eyes on—stared intently at—the sheet descending from heaven and examined all that it carried (ἀτενίσας κατενόουν, Acts 11:6).

αὐθάδης

authades, presumptuous, arrogant, ill-bred

authades, S 829; TDNT 1.508–509; EDNT 1.178; MM 91; L&N 88.206; BAGD 120–121

The first quality required in a candidate for the episkope is that he be me authade (Titus 1:7). False teachers, on the other hand, come across as tolmetai authadeis.¹ It is quite difficult to specify the meaning of a word that is not illuminated by its context, especially since English happens not to have a term that corresponds exactly to authades. Etymologically (autos + handano) the word would refer to the person who delights in himself (cf. Josephus, Ant. 5.39) and is thus self-sufficient and presumptuous. This infatuation and self-centeredness lead to arrogance and even insolence.² The authades is constantly characterized as hard (skleros, Gen 49:3, 7; Polybius 4.21.3; Plutarch, Lyc. 11.6) and violent.³

Thus it is not simply a matter of self-satisfaction, but of prickly pride, a haughty character who, refusing to hear what is said to him, persists stubbornly in his own opinion;⁴ such as Pharaoh and Herod, inflexible and mulish (Philo, Moses 1.139; To Gaius 301). Not only does this authades do only what he wants but he is unfriendly, he is brutal⁵ and aggressive,⁶ at the least a quarreler and quibbler;⁷ in sum, ill-bred. In addition, in the catalog of vices in Sacr. Abel and Cain 32, Philo places authades between vainglorious and vulgar. In fact, Josephus attributes this sort of behavior to prisoners (War 4.96), the young (Ant. 4.263; 16.399), and slaves (War 2.356), for example, to Hagar, expecting a child and showing arrogant and insolent pride toward Sarah (Ant. 1.189). In Lucian and in the literature, it is a constant trait of the “misanthrope,”⁸ who is strictly insufferable.

So it is evident that “presumptuous” and “arrogant”⁹ do not convey the depth of meaning of authades, but it is clear that “God’s steward” cannot have this sufficiency, this infatuation, this bad character, these base sentiments, which would confine him to a conspicuous isolation. Someone so unsociable¹⁰ would not be able to carry out the responsibilities of a pastor.

¹ 2Pet 2:10. These τολμηταί are brassy, insolent, going so far as to insult “the glories,” meaning “the glorious ones,” i.e., the angels (cf. J. Starcky, “Psaumes apocryphes de la grotte 4 de Qumran, 4 Q Psf VIII, 12,” in RB, 1966, pp. 363–364; the designation Κύριοι ἄγγελοι, in P.Princ. 159, 9; P.Oslo 1, 44 and 246). Often αὐθάδης (αὐθάδεια) is associated with τόλμη (P.Mich. 174, 9; P.Oslo 22, 6; SB 9458, 11; 9527, 6).

² Prov 21:24—one despises and mocks others; Josephus, War 6.172: “Jonathan, a braggart by nature, full of disdain for his adversaries”; Plutarch, Luc. 7.2. Cf. Bauernfeind, in TDNT, vol. 1, p. 508; BGU 2240, 7 and 11.

³ Βίαιος, PSI 1323, 6; cf. P.Fouad 26, 13: “Through his insolence and violence, he exerts a strong influence on the region”; P.Mich. 426, 10: τῆ ε—αυτω—ν βία καὶ αὐθαδία χρῆσάμενοι. This latter expression appears constantly in complaints against aggressors (P.Cair.Isid. 74, 11; P.Mert. 91, 12; P.Gen. 31, 9; P.Mich. 231, 10; 426, 10; BGU 1904, 12); SB 4284; 10218, 21: ἀρπαγῆ αὐθάδως ἀναστραφέντες (first-second century); it is glossed (P.Tebt. 16, 10) by η—ν ὕβρισμένος οὐ μετρίως (line 7; cf. Josephus, Ant. 19.236). Cf. 1Clem. 30.8: “Impudence, arrogance, temerity for those cursed by God; benevolence, humility, mildness for those blessed by God”; Plotinus, Enn. 2.9.9, line 55: “Great is the αὐθάδεια of humans, even if they were previously humble, modest (μέτριος), simple and profane.”

⁴ “The general must be neither indecisive (ἄστατος) nor obstinate (αὐθάδης), as if he thought that no one could have a better idea than his own” (Onasander, 3.3); cf. M. Guilmot, “Une lettre de remontrances,” in ChrEg, 1965, p. 239.

⁵ Theophrastus, Char. 15.1–2: to the simplest question he replies “Leave me alone”; cf. Plutarch, Cim. 6.2: Pausanias treated his allies τραχέως καὶ αὐθάδως; Plutarch, De gen. 9.

⁶ P.Oxy. 2563, 43; Dai papiri della Società Italiana, Florence, 1965, n. 10, 11; P.Lond. 358, 12 (vol. 2, p. 171). P. J. Sijpesteijn, “Einige Papyri aus der Gießener Papyrussammlung,” in Aeg, 1966, p. 18, l 21: ὁ τρέφω μέρος προβάτων ἀρπαγῆ αὐθάδως ἀναστραφέντες κτλ. Strabo 11.2.16: “ὕπὸ αὐθαδείας καὶ ἀγριότητος, because of their arrogance and ferocity.” Cf. 1Clem. 1.1: a revolt “fanned to flame by several rash and self-willed persons.”

⁷ Philo, Abraham 213: The servants of Lot “take liberties, in their authadeia, and constantly have disagreements with the most eminent children of the wise Abraham,” whose temperament is marked by πραῦπάθεια. In Heir 21, Moses’ freedom of speech vis-à-vis God is justified, φιλία μα—λλον ἢ αὐθαδεία. This nuance must be emphasized in Titus 1:7, given the prescription that follows immediately: not quick-tempered or rash (μὴ ο]ργίλον).

⁸ Cf. J. Bompaire, Lucien écrivain, p. 171.

⁹ F. Field, (Notes on the Translation, p. 219) justifies this translation on etymological grounds—arrogans, qui sibi aliquid arrogat—and cites Aristotle: σεμνότης ε—στὶν αὐθαδείας ἀναμέσον τε καὶ ἀρεσκειίας (Mag. Mor. 1.29). R. C. Trench (Synonyms, p. 349) groups this term with φίλαντος and αὐτάρεσκος, as opposed to εὐπροσήγορος—approachable, affable (Plutarch, Praec. ger. rei publ. 31), and cites Aristotle, Eth. Eud. 3.7.4: μηδὲν πρὸς ἕτερον ζῶ—ν.

¹⁰ Cf. Strabo 3.4.5: “By authadeia, the Greeks refuse to take on mutual obligations.... With the Iberians this authadeia reaches extreme proportions, being added to a naturally treacherous and deceitful character.” Plutarch (Praec. ger. rei publ. 13.808 d) cites Plato (Ep. 4.321, 321 b): in heads of state, “arrogance mingles with solitude”; Cat. Min. 55.6: “the unseasonable pride and arrogance of the son of Pompey”; 58.7: “Scipio presumptuously scorned the opinion of Cato”; Agis 5.3: “Epitades, of an arrogant character”; Cic. 28.1: “Clodius, of daring and presumptuous character.”

αὐτόματος

automatos, spontaneous, self-moving automatos, S 844; EDNT 1.179; MM 93; L&N 89.21; BDF §§59(1), 117(2), 243; BAGD 122

In writing that the iron door of the prison at Jerusalem “opened itself” for the angel and Peter, not only does St. Luke show his Hellenistic culture once again—the expression being a common one—but he also points to the miraculous character of the event.¹

More delicate is the exegesis of automatos —spontaneous, moving of its own accord²—in the parable of the grain that comes up without any tending, without the help of the sower. The earth acts alone:³ the man sleeps night and day “and the seed sprouts and grows, he knows not how.”⁴ By itself (automate), the ground produces first the stalk, then the ear, then the full grain in the ear” (Mark 4:27-28). The Lord did not give an explanation of this parable, and the interpretations that have been suggested are widely divergent,⁵ but the emphatic position of automate (not translated by the Peshitta) at the beginning of the sentence indicates that it is the most important word and that the interpretation of this teaching depends on understanding it.⁶ So what does it mean? That the earth produces, on its own, independently of the activity of the farmer, without any human cooperation? Or that it produces without visible cause, in an undiscernible fashion?⁷

We should recall first of all the belief that in the golden age “the soil would produce on its own (automate) an abundant and generous crop,”⁸ then the constant use of automatos to describe the spontaneous production of uncultivated land, the natural growth of seed, its own energy.⁹ Thus this word describes the second crop in Lev 25:5, 11 (sephîah); and Josephus, comparing the sacrifices of Abel and Cain, observes: “God is honored by things that grow spontaneously and according to nature” (tois automatois kai kata physin) and not by products fashioned by human ingenuity (Ant. 1.54). This word is used when Judas Maccabeus finds the temple at Jerusalem wasted and “plants growing on their own in the sanctuary” (Ant. 12.317). Philo similarly contrasts spontaneous growth and the art of agriculture.¹⁰ Given this commonplace, contemporary agricultural usage, it indeed seems that in the Markan parable Jesus is insisting on the wonder of a grain that grows without anyone’s tending it; being alive, it accomplishes on its own its germination, growth, and fruit-bearing through mysterious exchanges between itself and the soil that has received it: they are linked—“it is the earth alone that produces.” Just so the kingdom of God on earth has its own dynamism, an immanent energy, a vital force. Since humans have nothing to do with it, we can conclude that this innate vitality comes from God.¹ In fact this is what is indicated by the fact that the vitality is not easily perceptible; but this invisibility is not mentioned for its own sake; it is a secondary trait.

¹ Acts 12:10—ἤτις αὐτομάτη ἠνοίγη αὐτοί—ς. “This aorist passive indicates that the door opened automatically, but at the instance of a supernatural force” (E.Jacquier, Actes, p. 364). More precisely, this spontaneous opening of doors is traditionally seen as a prodigy, as much in Greek literature as in Israel; cf. b. Yoma 39b : “Our rabbis teach: Forty years before the destruction of the temple . . . the doors of the sanctuary opened themselves, until Yohanan ben Zakkai reproached them, saying, Sanctuary, sanctuary, why are you frightened?”; Xenophon, Hell. 6.4.7: “News came to them from their city that the doors of all the temples had opened themselves, πάντες αὐτόματα ἀνεώγοντο”; Plutarch, Tim. 12.9: “At the moment when battle was joined, the holy door of the temple opened itself, αὐτόματα διανοιχθει—εν”; Dio Chrysostom 44.17; Caesar’s dream of warning, “the doors of the room where he was sleeping opened themselves, αὐτόμαται ἠνεώχθησαν”; ibid. 60.35: at the death of Claudius, the doors of the temple of Jupiter the Conqueror opened themselves (αὐτόματος); Josephus, War 6.293: “They saw the door of the temple . . . even though it was bronze and so heavy that twenty men could not easily close it at dusk, and it was held in place by bolts fitted with iron chains and with bars . . . open itself (αὐτομάτως ἀνοιγμένη) . . . this portent seemed very favorable to the ignorant”; Artapanus, De Jud., τάς τε θύρας πάσας αὐτομάτως ἀνοιχθῆναι τοῦ δεσμοτηρίου καὶ τῶν φυλάκων (in Eusebius, Praep. Evang. 9.27.23), etc.

² Cf. Josh 6:15—“The walls of the city fell of their own accord” (cf. Josephus, War 5.292); Wis 17:6—the shining pillar, “By itself shined for them an automate (i.e., lighting and fueling itself) and terrifying fire” (cf. Josephus, Ant. 3.207); cf. 2Kgs 19:29; Diodorus Siculus 1.8: “a calamity that was not sent by the gods but came by itself” (Josephus, War 1.373: natural disasters); Menander, Dysk. 545: “by itself the affair brought me back to this place”; idem: “He will present himself on his own, αὐτόματος οὐ—τος παρέσται” (in Plutarch, Alex. 17.7; cf. 34.2: πολιτεύειν αὐτόνομους, govern themselves according to their own laws; 35.11; 77.7); Philostratus, Gym. 53: “Spontaneous fatigue (of athletes) is the beginning of sickness” (citation of Hippocrates, Aph. 2.5; ed. Littré, vol. 4, p. 470); Onasander 10.3: soldiers trained well to place themselves rapidly in formation, “so to speak, automatically, ὡς εἰ—πει—ν αὐτόματα.” The adverb αὐτομάτως, for spontaneous action (Josephus, War 3.386). Αὐτόματος is rare in the papyri; Stud.Pal. V, n. 119, l, 16 (third century AD) is too badly damaged to yield any meaning; the other known occurrence is from the sixth century, P.Stras. 4, 13: οἰ—κία μετὰ παντὸς τοῦ . . . χρηστηρίου καὶ δικαίου . . . αὐτομάτου = naturally, it goes without saying. In an epitaph (SEG, vol. 8, 474, 9): δ αὐτομάτης . . . μελίσσης is translated “The Spring sends hither the product of the hard-working bee” by E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, p. 351.

³ This is not an allegory, but a parable, peculiar to Mark, the point being “the action of the soil without the help of the sower” (M. J. Lagrange, Marc, p. 116).

⁴ Mark 4:27—ὡς οὐκ οἶδεν αὐτός, cf. H. Sahlin, “Zum Verständnis von drei Stellen des Markus-Evangeliums,” in Bib, 1952, pp. 56–57; A. Suhl, Die Funktion der alttestamentlichen Zitate und Anspielungen im Markusevangelium, Gütersloh, 1965, pp. 154 and preceding.

⁵ For N. A. Dahl (“The Parables of Growth,” in ST, vol. 5, 1951, pp. 149–150) and J. Jeremias (Parables, p. 151), this is the “Parable of the Patient Husbandman,” but the passivity of the man is there only to show in relief the immanent activity of nature. According to H. Baltensweiler (“Das Gleichnis von der selbstwachsenden Saats,” in Oikonomia: Festschrift O. Cullmann, Hamburg, 1967, pp. 69–75), this is “the Parable of the Unbelieving Farmer,” the “grotesque” story of a sower who sows without any concern for germination and harvest. K. Weiss (“Mk IV, 26 bis 29—dennoch die Parabel vom zuversichtlichen Sämann,” in BZ, 1929, pp. 50ff.) does a good job of showing that the farmer’s inactivity is only a secondary element of the parable. On ὅταν δὲ παραδοί—ὁ καρπός, cf. T. W. Manson, “A Note on Mark IV, 28 f,” in JTS, 1937, pp. 399–400. For the bibliography, cf. J. Dupont, “La Parabole de la semence qui pousse toute seule,” in RSR, 1967, pp. 367–392. W. G. Kümmel, “Noch einmal: Das Gleichnis von der selbstwachsenden Saat,” in Festschrift J. Schmid, Freiburg, 1973, pp. 220–237; J. Dupont, “Encore la parabole de la semence qui pousse toute seule,” in Festschrift W. G. Kümmel, Göttingen, 1975, pp. 96–108 (defending the unity of the parable).

⁶ R. Stuhlmann saw this quite well in “Beobachtungen und Überlegungen zu Markus IV, 26–29,” in NTS, vol. 19, 1973, pp. 153–162, as did D. Buzy, Les Paraboles, Paris, 1932, p. 49: “it is the earth alone that produces in the listing of all the phases of the growth of the grain. . . . The main lesson is that it is the kingdom alone, by its own virtue, by its divine energy, that will develop until the last phase of its perfection.” Cf. Plutarch, An virt. doc. 1:

“excellence that nature produces spontaneously (ἀυτομάτως)”; Diodorus Siculus 17.50.6: “the carriers of the god’s image proceed randomly, wherever the god directs their steps by a nod of the head.”

⁷ Cf. Philo, Flight 171: “In the spontaneous products of nature that we encounter, we discover neither origins nor ends that could be causes in themselves; thus the origin is the sowing, and the term is the harvest.” The secret of growth is imperceptible, like the mystery of life (2Macc 7:22; Eccl 11:5; Ps 139:13-18) and the nature of the pneuma (John 3:8).

⁸ Hesiod, Op. 118; cf. Heraclitus, All. 6.5: “The first humans fed on . . . fruits that grew spontaneously on trees.”

⁹ Josephus, Life 11: Bannus contented himself “for food with that which the land produced spontaneously, τὴν ἀυτομάτως φυομένην”; Ant. 1.49; 3.281. Philemon, frag. 103: οὐδὲ φύεται ἀυτόματον ἀνθρώποισιν . . . μοῦς ὡσπερ ἐ—ν ἀγρω— θύμος (in Stobaeus, Ecl. 2.31.17, vol. 2, p. 204).

¹⁰ Philo, Creation 81: “One could hope that God . . . would supply the human race through the spontaneous production of goods all prepared . . . without the art of agriculture, ἄνευ τέχνης γεωργικῆς”; 167: “man deprived of the spontaneous goods that the earth had learned to produce without the art of agriculture”; Philo, Change of Names 260: In the seventh sacred season (the sabbatical year), “there will be a growth of spontaneous goods (τω—ν ἀυτομάτων ἀγαθω—ν); they will not be the products of an established art; they will germinate by virtue of a nature capable of begetting itself, sufficient to its ends, and they will bear their natural fruits.” Cf. Diphilus, frag. 14: ἦκει φερόμεν ἀυτόματα πάντα τὰγαθά (in Athenaeus 9.370 e).

¹¹ This is what Philo says, Flight 170: “Third definition of spontaneous knowledge: it is that which grows by itself, τὸ ἀναβαι—νον ἀυτόματον (here he cites Lev 25:11). Natural products require no art, because it is God who sows them; thanks to his agriculture, he causes to develop, as if they were growing on their own, products that do not grow on their own, except in the sense that they have no need at all for human attention”; cf. 168: that which one gets from nature is received from God. It is he who causes fecundity (Rewards 9, 63, 160; Abraham 52–54) and growth (1Cor 3:6; 2Cor 9:10; cf. Matt 6:28). Philo loves to exploit metaphorically the “automatism” of knowledge (Flight 166ff., Abraham 6; Dreams 1.68) or of the virtues, which are like seeds innate in the soil of the soul (Alleg. Interp. 1.92) and rich in potentiality. At any rate, all that grows spontaneously is supplied or commanded by Providence (Josephus, Ant. 1.46), so that “nothing happens by chance” (4.47), and if the walls of Jericho fall by themselves, it is God who makes them fall (5.24). This must indeed be the case, if an event does not fall out “either from natural causes, nor from the activity of others” (War 1.378).

αὐτόπτης

autoptes, eyewitness
see also μάρτυς

autoptes, S 845; TDNT 5.373; EDNT 1.179; MM 93–94; L&N 24.46; BAGD 122

Luke the historian calls upon the authority of eyewitnesses of the gospel message preached by Jesus from the beginning of his ministry: hoi ap' arches autoptai kai hyperetai genomenoi tou logou.¹ The noun autoptes (a biblical hapax, unknown in Philo), formed from opsis (J. Pollux, Onom. 2.57–58), often has the banal meaning of a spectator who sees with his own eyes, as opposed to the “hearer” of a reputation or a bit of news.² In the magical papyri, it designates the immediate vision of the divinity.³ It is often used by medical writers⁴ and can have a juridical meaning⁵ after the fashion of autopsia, personal inspection.⁶

In Luke 1:2, the autoptes, as opposed to a simple informer who mediates between the sender of a message and its recipient, is a qualified witness who personally affirms both that which he has seen and his conviction, thus making certainty possible. He himself guarantees the truth of the gospel. This term must therefore be understood in its technical sense as a major component in the documentation or factual report that the historian sets out to describe. The eyewitness, who has participated in the events, provides an account that is in accord with reality.⁷ From Herodotus on, Greek historians make a distinction in their sources of information between that which they have heard and that which they have seen personally.⁸ Only their presence in the theater of action makes their account believable: “As for the history of the war, I wrote it after having been a participant in many of the events (pollon autourgōs praxeōn), a witness of a large number of them (pleiston d' autoptes genomenos); in short, without being unaware of anything that was said or done.”⁹ The Jewish historian is here plagiarizing Polybius: “On account of the fact that I was not only the witness of the events (me monon autoptes) but in some a collaborator (synergōs), in others the architect (cheiristes), I have undertaken to write so to speak a new history from a new point of departure (archen allen).”¹⁰ According to Dionysius of Halicarnassus, the value of Theopompus of Chios, author of historical works, lay in his having been “eyewitness of most of the events, pollon men autoptes gegenemenos.¹¹ Finally, in the first century, Diodorus Siculus, in describing the Arabian Gulf, distinguishes between the two categories of sources: that which he derived from the Royal Annals kept at Alexandria, and observations that were communicated to him by eyewitnesses, ta de para ton autopton peposmenoi.¹² Luke 1:2 clearly is in line with this historiographical hermeneutic. Its autoptai have all the trustworthiness of persons who have been present at occurrences, of witnesses who merit belief.¹³

¹ Luke 1:2 (cf. A. Feuillet, “Témoins oculaires et serviteurs de la Parole,” Lc. I, 2b,” in NovT, vol. 15, 1973, pp. 241–259). Αὐτόπται has to do with facts (πραγμάτων), as in Vettius Valens 260.30: πολλὰ δὲ κακῶν καὶ παθῶ—ν αὐτόπτης γενόμενος τῶ—ν πραγμάτων δοκιμάσας συνέγραψα. Cf. Polybius 4.2.2: “We ourselves were present at certain events, and we learned of the others from those who saw them. To extend the account further back in time by setting down hearsay based on hearsay would not, it seems to us, provide a basis either for judgments or even for solid (ἀσφαλει—ς) statements.”

² Plato, Leg. 10.900a: “Whether you know of these spectacles through hearsay (δι ἀκοῆς) or you have seen the sight yourself with your own eyes (αὐτόπτης); Xenophon, Hell. 6.2.31: “Since he had not learned from an eyewitness concerning Mnasippos, he feared that it was to deceive him that they made all this fuss . . . but when he received clear reports . . .”; Josephus, Ant. 18.342: “Anilaios had heard of the woman’s reputation for beauty from the Parthian general (ἀκοῆ τῆς εὐπρεπείας), but when he saw her with his own eyes (αὐτόπτης γενόμενος), he fell in love with her”; 19.125: “Anteios was drawn by the pleasure of seeing Gaius with his own eyes, ὑπὸ ἡδονῆς τοῦ αὐτόπτης γενόμενος Γαΐου”; War 6.134: Caesar claimed to be eyewitness and arbiter of all the actions of his soldiers, γέννηται δ αὐτόπτης καὶ μάρτυς ἀπάντων. At the end of the first century AD, Theo writes his sister not to be disturbed during his absence: “αὐτόπτης γὰρ εἰ—μὶ τῶ—ν τόπων καὶ οὐκ εἰ—μὶ ξένος τῶ—ν ε—νθάδε, because I am familiar with the places and I am not a stranger here” (P.Oxy. 1154, 9).

³ P.Lond. 122, 85 (vol. 1, p. 119 = Pap.Graec.Mag. II, p. 49): ε—άν θέλης καὶ αὐτοψαν(πτον) αὐτὸν ε—κάλεσε; cf. αὐτοπτική, αὐτοπτικός (ibid., 121, 319; vol. 1, p. 94; K. Preisendanz, vol. 1, p. 14), line 335: αὐτοπτική ε—άν βούλης σεαυτὸν ι—δει—ν; also line 727 (other references in F. Cumont, L’Égypte des Astrologues, Brussels, 1937, p. 165, n. 1; LSJ on this word). For αὐτόπτως, cf. PSI 1345, 7: χαίρομαι ὡς ἵνα αὐτοπτω—ς προσεκύουν τὸν δεσπότην μου (sixth-seventh century).

⁴ W. K. Hobart, (Medical Language, pp. 89–90) gives a dozen references to Galen (cf. our modern “autopsy”). Xenophon, Cyr. 5.4.18: “Cyrus either examined the wounded with his own eyes (αὐτόπτης) or if he could not do so himself he sent people to care for them.”

⁵ PSI 1314, 9 (episkepsis, report; first century BC): αὐτόπτην μάχιμον ε—ῥ ἡμα—ς ἀποστείλας. Cf. H. Sahlin, Der Messias und das Gottesvolk: Studien zur protolukanischen Theologie, Uppsala, 1943, pp. 40–42. The meaning is very close to μάρτυς; cf. John 1:34; 15:27; 19:35; Acts 1:8; 1John 1:1-2.

⁶ P.Mil.Vogl. 24, 20: ὡς νῦν οὖν Δημήτριος γενόμενος παρ ε—μέ ε—ξ αὐτοψίας (second century AD); P.Tebt. 286, 20: ε—κ τῆς αὐτοψίας ἦν ε—γὼ ε—πει—δον (same date); P.Oxy. 1272, 19: ἄξιω— ε—ἄν δόξη σοι παραγενέσθαι ε—πὶ τὴν αὐτοψίαν (same date); P.Stras. 259, 7 (business letter, from the third century. Go to perform an on-site verification); P.Cair.Isid. 66, 6 and 10; 67, 8 (third century, I am sending someone to do an inspection); P.Oxy. 2233, 9 (fourth century), ὥστε ε—κει—σαι παραγενέσθαι πρὸς αὐτοψίαν; P.Amh. 142, 12; P.Mil. 41, 6: ὅθεν ε—πὶ τὴν αὐτοψίαν παραγενόμενοι; the formula is technical.

⁷ Cf. ἀκριβω—ς (Luke 1:3; Polybius 12.4d). D. Kurz, AKPIBEIA: Das Ideal der Exaktheit bei den Griechen bis Aristoteles, dissertation, Tübingen, 1970.

⁸ Herodotus 2.99: “To this point what I have said is drawn from what I have seen (ὄψις), from my reflections (γνώμη), from accounts (ἱ—στορίη) that I have received. From now on, I will recount what the Egyptians say, as I heard it; some things will also be added from what I saw for myself (τῆς ε—μῆς ὄψιος)”; 2.5.106, 122, 131: “Certain people tell (τινες λέγουσι) the following story. . . . This whole account is nothing but rubbish. . . . We have seen for ourselves (ἡμεῖ—ς ὥρω—μεν)”; 3.12; 7.129. With respect to the formation of the earth in Egypt: “In the sphere of human matters, the priests tell me unanimously . . . What they said seemed to me to be correct . . . I readily trust those who told me what I have reported and I am personally convinced that it is so when I see (ἱ—δών) . . .” (2.4–14); with respect to the origin of the Colchidians: “What I am saying was my personal opinion before I heard it expressed by others (ἀκούσας ἄλλων)” (2.104–105); description of Lake Moeris: “The people of the country told me (ἔλεγον) . . . Since I nowhere saw . . . (οὐκ ὥρων) . . . I asked . . . they told me . . . I had no difficulty believing what they said; for I had heard that something similar had happened at Ninevah” (2.149–150); Thucydides 1.22.1–2: οἷς τε αὐτὸς παρῆν καὶ παρὰ τω—ν ἄλλων. The two ways of getting information are complementary. Cf. G. Nenci, “Il motive dell’ autopsia nella storiografia greca,” in Studi classici e orientali 3, 1955, pp. 14–46; H. Verdin, “L’Importance des recherches sur le méthode critique des historiens grecs et latins,” in Antidorum W. Peremans sexagenario ab alumnis oblatum (Studia Hellenistica 16), Louvain, 1968, pp. 298–308; idem, “Notes sur l’attitude des historiens grecs à l’égard de la tradition locale,” in Ancient Society 1, 1970, pp. 183–200; idem, De historisch-kritische methode van Herodotus, Brussels, 1971, pp. 107–154; G. Schepens, “L’Idéal de l’information complète chez les historiens grecs,” in REG, 1975, pp. 81–93.

⁹ Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.55; cf. War 3.432: “When the news of the catastrophe at Jotapata came to Jerusalem, most people would not at the outset believe it . . . because no eyewitness was available to confirm the report, διὰ τὸ μηδένα τῶν λεγομένων αὐτόπτην παρει—ναι.”

¹⁰ Polybius 3.4.13. In 12.25–28, Polybius criticizes the fabrications of Timaeus of Tauromenion, “a historian without culture,” and his bookish accounts. Timaeus saw nothing (12.25g4). It isn’t enough that he resorted to “the works of his predecessors, spent his time in libraries, and stocked up on scholarship” (12.25e4); “sight is much more of an instrument of observation than hearing” (12.27.1). “Timaeus entirely neglected visual information” (12.27.3). Cf. Marie Laffranque, “L’Ouille et l’oreille: Polybe et les problèmes de l’information à l’époque hellénistique,” in Revue philosophique, vol. 93, 1968, pp. 263–272.

¹¹ Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Pomp. 6.3. Cf. Dio Chrysostom 7.1: τόδε μὴν αὐτὸς ἰ—δών, οὐ παρ᾽ ε—τέρων ἀκούσας, διηγῆσομαι.

¹² Diodorus Siculus 3.38.1. These autoptai could be travelers, merchants, sailors, soldiers, elephant-hunters, indigenous folk, or explorers; cf. W. Peremans, “Diodore de Sicile et Agatharchide de Cnide,” in Historia, vol. 16, 1967, pp. 432–455.

¹³ E. Delebecque, Etudes grecques, pp. 66ff.

ἄφεσις

aphesis, a sending out, point of departure, discharge, settlement, forgiveness, dispensation, acquittal, liberation

aphesis, S 859; TDNT 1.509–512; EDNT 1.181–183; NIDNTT 1.697, 700–703; MM 96; L&N 37.132, 40.8; BAGD 125

This noun, derived from the verb aphiemi, “send out, let go” (Matt 8:22; P.Amh. 37, 10), has multiple shades of meaning, some of them quite everyday, like the sending out of ships (Demosthenes, Corona 18.77–78); but there are also technical applications, for example in architecture, and in sports, where it refers to the starting line for the athletes in the diaulos; ¹ in astrology, it refers to the point of departure, the beginning.² In Aristotle, it refers to the emission or expulsion of fish roe,³ and in Hippocrates it becomes a medical term, the emission of gas being a symptom of illness.⁴

Aphesis is used especially for persons, usually as a legal term for a layoff, for the release of slaves or prisoners (Polybius 1.79.12; Plato, Plt. 273c), the repudiation of a spouse,⁵ an exemption from military service (Plutarch, Ages. 24.3), a dispensation from an obligation: “A councillor who does not come to the meeting chamber at the appointed time shall pay one drachma for each day’s absence unless the council grants him a dispensation” (ean me heuriskomenos aphasis tes boules ape, Aristotle, Ath. Pol. 30.6). In Demosthenes, aphesis is usually a “discharge” in the technical sense of freeing someone from an obligation,⁶ but also a “settlement” (“My father was able to recover the debt after the settlement,” C. Naus. 38.14) and a “remission” (“This remission of interest did not wrong the creditors”).⁷ On rare occasions it refers to the forgiveness of an offense: “What we have said concerning forgiveness of a parricide by a father shall be valid for similar cases” (Plato, Leg. 9.869 d). The term does not seem to have been used by the moralists, however.

In the papyri, aphesis refers especially to the draining of water from pools (P.Oxy. 3167, 10; P.Petr. II, 13, 2: aphesis tou hydatos; P.Flor. 388, 44) and especially to sluice gates (“the sluice gates at Phoboou,” P.Oxy. 3268, 11; 918, verso 20; P.Ryl. 583, 16, 63) or the conduits from which water flows out into the fields.⁸ It is difficult to determine the meaning of ge en aphesei; ⁹ scholars disagree.¹⁰ Indeed, it seems that the expression had several meanings, but the very word aphesis suggests land “in remission,” recalling the fundi derelecti of the empire,¹¹ i.e., either uncultivated land, fallow land (P.Got. 20, col. II, 2, 6, 7, 8; P.Yale 1674, 57); or land exempted from certain taxes.¹² It seems that aphesis also had the meaning “expense” or “disbursement,” for example, in the phrase logos apheseos stateron, expenses of 130 staters (P.Tebt. 404, 1); apheseos chomatos (O.Bodl. 1827: an accounting for the repair of a dike; P.Tebt. 706, 11); payment for a route (P.Tebt. 815, col. IV, 26); or expenses for the considerable work projects throughout a nomarchia (SB 8243, 9, tas apheseis).

“Dispensations” from leitourgiai are well attested. According to a transcript of an audience before a strategos, a weaver wrongly chosen for a leitourgia asks for an exemption (tes leitourgias aphasis, P.Phil. 3, 5; second century AD). In the third century, this exemption is a privilege of the artists of Dionysus (P.Oxy.Hels. 25, 17). An imperial prescript provides that the prefect of the province shall be able to release a petitioner from a legal obligation (P.Oxy. 1020, 6). Aphesis is also debt remission: according to a judgment at Cnidos in the second century BC on behalf of Calymna, “a deduction made from the talent that the Calumnians claim was forgiven them by Pausimachus and Cleumedes.”¹³ Finally, aphesis refers to the liberation of a prisoner: homologia apheseos (SB 9463, 12–13). A decree at Athens, for the poet Philippides, who used his influence on behalf of his compatriots after the battle of Ipsos, “for all those who were prisoners, after making his case to the king and obtaining their liberation . . . he sent them on their way to their chosen destinations” (Dittenberger, Syl. 374, 21). An Iranian act emancipating slaves by consecrating them to the god Sarapis uses the words ten aphesin autou.¹⁴ In a dream in the Serapeum, a vision gives Ptolemy confidence that he will be delivered soon (aphesis moi ginetai tachy, UPZ 78, 39).

Apart from several occurrences with no original meaning,¹⁵ the LXX gives aphesis at least two special meanings. First, the sabbatical “remission”: “You shall give the earth release and let it lie fallow” (aphesin poieseis, Hebrew shamam, Exod 23:11; Lev 25:2-7). This sabbatical year is also the occasion of the liberation of Israelite slaves and the return of security held for debts: “At the end of seven years, you shall make a remission . . . a remission of what he has loaned to his neighbor” (shemitâh, Deut 15:1, 9; 31:10). Similarly, the jubilee every fiftieth year is the occasion for the freeing (Hebrew deror) of all the inhabitants of the land; and the ground lies fallow.¹⁶ Elsewhere, aphesis takes on a metaphorical meaning—and for the first time, a religious, messianic meaning—in Isa 58:6—“to send back free(en aphesei, Hebrew haphshîm) those who have been mistreated.”¹⁷ It enters into the vocabulary of instruction in Jer 34:15—“You were converted today . . . and each of you proclaimed freedom to his neighbor” (cf. verse^o7).

It is in Jewish literature that aphesis receives its full, if not definitive, meaning. For Philo, the term is constantly associated with eleutheria and understood to mean complete liberty.¹⁸ Allegorical exegesis takes the sabbatical years and jubilees as referring to “the emancipation and liberation of souls that call upon God” (Heir 273) and reject their former errors (Prelim. Stud. 108). When Abraham pleads for Sodom, “at first he sets forth the number of the liberation (tes apheseos) at fifty (righteous), but he stops at ten, the limit of redemption (ten apolytrosin)” (ibid. 109), i.e., liberation in exchange for ransom (cf. Spec. Laws 2.121). Moses offers a goat “as a sacrifice for the remission of our sins” (thyse peri apheseos hamartematon, Moses 2.147; Spec. Laws 1.190; cf. 215, 237).

Josephus, who usually uses aphesis in its secular literary meaning,¹⁹ also recognizes the meaning “acquittal”²⁰ and even pardon: Herod “promised to pardon past offenses” (War 1.481). Didous aphesin could be translated “give absolution.”

It is remarkable that the NT writers use aphesis thirty-six times, always meaning pardon for sins; there is never a secular meaning, as if this were a technical term reserved for religious use. Its first occurrence is on the lips of Zechariah in his description of the goal of John the Baptist's ministry: namely, to prepare the Messiah's ways "so as to give to his people the knowledge of salvation through the forgiveness of their sins" (en aphesei hamartion auton)²¹ on account of God's tender mercy (verse 78). The remark that salvation consists of forgiveness of sins shows that the messianic soteria is spiritual and will not be a political liberation. In effect, Mark 1:4 and Luke 3:3 characterize the ministry of the precursor in the region of the Jordan as a bath of conversion "for the forgiveness of sins" (eis aphesin hamartion) so as to prepare sinners for the coming of the Messiah. This involves sorrow for offenses committed, penitence, upright intentions; without these things God could not grant pardon. Water baptism is a means of realizing this conversion, and its goal—something altogether new—is a washing, "the remission of sins."²² In the blood covenant sealed by Jesus with the institution of the Eucharist, the blood is not poured out on the people but drunk by the participants: "This is my blood, the new covenant, shed for the many for the remission of sins."²³ Henceforth it is clear that aphesis is the basic element of the redemptive work accomplished on the cross; it is connected with pardon, sanctification, and salvation. Speaking to the disciples at Emmaus, Jesus reminded them of "what was written ... that in his name repentance for the forgiveness of sins (eis aphesin hamartion) should be preached to all nations," but he specified that first the Christ had to suffer, die, and be resurrected (Luke 24:47). This point is of the highest importance, because it implies that forgiveness of sins is due to the sufferings of Jesus.

This is what St. Peter keeps teaching to the crowd at Pentecost (Acts 2:38), to the Sanhedrin,²⁴ and to the centurion Cornelius: concerning Christ, "all the prophets bear witness that whoever believes in him receives remission of sins through his Name" (Acts 10:43). This forgiveness depends on faith in the person and the power of Jesus; it is universal, so that everyone can benefit from it. St. Paul said the same thing at Pisidian Antioch,²⁵ before King Agrippa,²⁶ and to the Colossians (Col 1:14; aphesis ton hamartion is linked with apolytroisis, "redemption").

There remain five texts where aphesis is used without a complement or in the variant expression aphesis ton paraptomaton, "the remission of trespasses," associated with redemption (apolytroisis, Eph 1:7), the two terms being almost equivalent. In Mark 3:29 the Lord states, "Whoever blasphemes the Holy Spirit will never have forgiveness" (ouk echei aphesin eis to aiona; the last three words are omitted in D and in numerous Latin manuscripts). This unpardonable blasphemy is a willful blindness and hardening.²⁷ At Nazareth, identifying himself as the Messiah, Jesus cites Isa 58:6, which announces the deliverance (en aphesei) of the chosen people (Luke 4:18). The Epistle to the Hebrews uses aphesis without a complement for forgiveness, declaring that the absolution of offenses depends on the sacrificial efficacy of the blood: “Without the shedding of blood there is no remission” (ou ginetai aphasis).²⁸ Glossing Jer 31:34 (“I will remember their sins and iniquities no longer”), Hebrews adds, “Now, where there is remission of these (hopou de aphasis touton), there is no more offering for sin” (Heb 10:18). In fact, since sin has been “remitted” because of the sacrifice on the cross, we could say that when Jesus died sin died as well, so that a new offering in the future would be nonsensical;²⁹ “fieret enim injuria hostiae Christi.”³⁰ All these NT usages, which are so perfectly homogeneous, presuppose a catechesis—whose scope and evolution are unknown to us—that added the term aphesis to the Christian vocabulary with a precise and exclusive theological meaning.

¹ Diodorus Siculus 4.73; Pausanias 5.15.5; 6.20.9. Cf. J. Delorme, Gymnasion, Paris, 1960, pp. 106, 151, 290–291.

² Vettius Valens: χρῆται—λοιπαι—τω—ν ἀστέρων ἀφέσει καὶ μαρτυρίαις καὶ ἀκτινοβολίαις προσέχειν (p. 225, 16). Cf. O. Neugebauer, M. B. van Hoesen, Greek Horoscopes, Philadelphia, 1959, pp. 87ff., 105ff.

³ Aristotle, Gen. An. 3.5.756a10; HA 8.30.68a1; cf. 9.40.626a25: bees release their excrement; 6.22.576a25: a mare remains standing at the moment of delivery; Part. An. 4.13.697a24: “the spiracle of cetaceans is for expelling water.”

⁴ Hippocrates, Coac. 3.485 (other references in Hobart, Medical Language, pp. 101–102). Aphasis can also mean “exhaustion, prostration”: “forgetfulness and prostration, loss of voice . . . signs of illness” (Epid. 3.6).

⁵ Plutarch, Pomp. 42.13: “Pompey sent his wife a bill of divorce” (ἔπεμψεν αὐτῇ τὴν ἄφεσιν).

⁶ Demosthenes, C. Apat. 33.3: “If he had had a release and discharge from all the obligations existing between us”; P. Phorm. 26.23: “There was a settling of accounts and a release relative to the bank lease”; C. Naus. 28.5: “In every instance where he was given a release and discharge, there was no action. And precisely when there was a discharge, in the presence of numerous witnesses . . .”; 9: “You have been sufficiently informed on that matter by the discharge.”

⁷ C. Dionys. 56.28, 34; remission of a debt, Isocrates, Phil. 5.127.

⁸ P.Brem. 14, 6; P.Mich. 92, 5; 103, 6: the sluice gates were open and water flowed out everywhere; 233 (AD 25), the oath of a sluice gate guard (ἀφροφυλάκεις): “the sluice gate of the priests west of the bridge” (line 8), “the sluice gate of the priests to the east” (line 10), “each one guards his sluice” (line 15); 645 (= SB 7174).

⁹ P.Tebt. 5, 37, 112, 201 (= C.Ord.Ptol. 53); 705, 7; P.Oxy. 2134, 16; P.Kroll col. I, 14 (ed. L. Koenen, Eine ptolemäische Königsurkunde, Wiesbaden, 1957, p. 10 = SB 9316); UPZ 110, 177.

¹⁰ Cf. J. Hermann, “Zum Begriff γῆ ἐ—ν ἀφέσει,” in ChrEg, 1955, pp. 95–106. J. C. Shelton (“Ptolemaic Land ἐ—ν ἀφέσει: An Observation on the Terminology,” ChrEg, 1971, pp. 113–119) cites P.Tebt. 81, 3: “other land ἐ—ν ἀφέσει”; 141, 3 and denounces the restorations of γῆ in many editions of the texts. In the Ptolemaic period, we never find γῆ ἐ—ν ἀφέσει but only ἡ ἐ—ν ἀφέσει γῆ or ἡ ἐ—ν ἀφέσει. As opposed to βασιλικὴ γῆ, land ἐ—ν ἀφέσει is often understood as “ceded, conceded, left” for cultivation by private persons; some see a determination of fiscal status: a land whose produce is freed by the royal administration.

¹¹ Cf. G. Lumbrose, Recherches sur l'économie politique de l'Égypte sous les Lagides, 2d ed., Amsterdam, 1967, p. 90.

¹² Cf. Dittenberger, Or. XC, 12: εἰ—ς τέλος ἀφῆκεν; P.Petr. II, 2, 1: ὅταν ἡ ἄφροσις δοθῆ; H. A. Rupprecht, Studien zur Quittung im Recht der graeco-ägyptischen Papyri, Munich, 1971, p. 60.

¹³ RIJG, vol. 1, n. X, B 7 = C. Michel, Recueil, n. 1340; I.Magn. 93 c 16; Dittenberger, Syl. 495, 166: τοι—ς μὲν ἀφέσεις ἐ—ποιήσατο τω—ν χρημάτων, not requiring interest for the other debtors.

¹⁴ Ed. L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 11, Paris, 1960, p. 85, 8–9.

¹⁵ Exod 18:2—Jethro receives Zipporah back from Moses after her repudiation (Hebrew shilûhîm); Jdt 11:14—“the people with the task of passing on the senate’s permission to them”; Lev 16:26—the scapegoat (aphesis translates the Hebrew ‘a<^>za’zel).

¹⁶ Lev 25:10-13; 25:28, 30: property leaves people hands at the Jubilee (ἐ—ξέρχασθαι); 27:17-24; Num 36:4; Ezek 46:17 (R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel, vol. 1, pp. 175ff.). The translation of the Hebrew yôbel by the substantive σημασία (Lev 25:15) or ἐ—νιαυτός or ἔτος ἀφέσεως σημασίας (verses 10–13) is elliptical: a sign of the year of liberation, the Jubilee year. Cf. the h<∅>a<^>nahâh, the day of rest and relief of debts, in Esth 2:18—“the king gave relief to the provinces”; 1Macc 10:34—Demetrius writes to the Jews: “All the holy days and Sabbaths . . . shall be days of immunity and release (ἡμέραι ἀτελαίας καὶ ἀφέσεως) for all the Jews who are in the kingdom”; 13:34. —Elsewhere, ἀφέσεις ὑδάτων are “watercourses” (Joel 1:20; Hebrew ‘aphîq; Ezek 47:3) or “rivers of tears” (Lam 3:48; Hebrew peleg). A. Deissmann (Bible Studies, pp. 98ff.) well noted that this meaning derives from Egyptian usage with respect to irrigation and the pouring out of water and that the translation of the Hebrew ‘aphîqê by ἀφέσεις in 2Sam 22:16 might have been suggested by the initial aph-.

¹⁷ Isa 61:1—“Yahweh has anointed me . . . to proclaim liberation to the captives” (Hebrew derôr); Jer 34:8—Jeremiah’s mission is to “proclaim emancipation to the captives” (Hebrew derôr).

¹⁸ Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 122; Worse Attacks Better 63, 144; Change of Names 228; Spec. Laws 2.67; Flacc. 84. “The harvest of fruits that came all alone is called the harvest of liberty” (Migr. Abr. 32).

¹⁹ Freeing slaves (Ant. 12.40) or prisoners (17.233), letting them go free (War 3.533; 7.192), especially the launching of projectiles (2.423, 3.256, 4.580, 5.10, 7.403), and also the discharge of lightning (Ant. 5.60).

²⁰ “Called before the court, he must rejoice at his acquittal” (περὶ τῆς ἀφέσεως εὐχαριστω—ν, War 1.214; cf. Ant. 14.182; 17.185). Compare the formulations of Herodotus (6.30, with respect to the possible pardon by Darius at Histiaeus) and Antiphon (1 Tetr. 2, “We have not let the guilty escape,” οὐ ἀφέντες).

²¹ Luke 1:77; ε—ν ἀφείσει attaches to σωτηρίας or γνω—σιν σωτηρίας, not to δοῦναι.

²² Ps 51:4, 9, 11, 14; Ezek 36:25-27 (H. Schürmann, Lukasevangelium, p. 157). Cf. J. Gnllka, “Die messianischen Tauchbäder und die Johannestaufe,” in RevQ, vol. 3, 1961, pp. 186—207.

²³ Matt 26:28. Mark 14:24 says simply: “poured out ὑπὲρ πολλῶ—ν”; Luke 22:20—“poured out for you” (τὸ ὑπὲρ ὑμῶ—ν); “εἰ—ς ἄφεσιν ἁμαρτιῶ—ν is probably an addition—correct in its substance—by Matthew” (J. Jeremias, Eucharistic Words, p. 114; cf. idem, Die Abendmahlsworte Jesu, 3d ed., Göttingen, 1960), apparently inspired by Isa 58:6; 61:1 (cf. Luke 4:18). This means a permanent physical presence of Jesus among his own to communicate the divine life to them, cf. P. Benoit, Exégèse et théologie, vol. 1, pp. 163—254.

²⁴ Acts 5:31—"God raised Jesus to his right hand as leader and Savior so as to grant repentance and forgiveness of sins to Israel."

²⁵ Acts 13:38—"It is through him that forgiveness of sins is announced to you (καταγγέλλεται)"; this forgiveness is identified with justification (v. 39) and salvation.

²⁶ Acts 26:18—The glorified Christ sent Paul to the Jews and the Gentiles "that they might receive (λαβει—ν) by faith in me the forgiveness of sins and the heritage of the saints." Cf. L. Hartman, "Baptism 'into the Name of Jesus' and Early Christology," in ST, vol. 28, 1974, pp. 21–48.

²⁷ Cf. C. Spicq, Hébreux, vol. 1; "Excursus IV: Hébr. VI, 4–6: L'Impossible Pénitence," pp. 167–178; O. E. Evans, "The Unforgivable Sin," in ExpT, vol. 68, 1957, pp. 240–244; G. Fitzler, "Die Sünde wider den Heiligen Geist," in TZ, 1957, pp. 161–182; J.G. Williams, "A Note on the 'Unforgivable Sin' Logion," in NTS, vol. 12, 1965, pp.75–77.

²⁸ Heb 9:22. Cf. T. C. G. Thornton, "The Meaning of αι—ματεκχυσία," in JTS, vol. 15, 1964, pp. 63–64; L. Morris, "The Biblical Use of the Term 'Blood,'" JTS, 1952, pp. 216–227; 1955, pp. 77–82; J. Dupont, "La Réconciliation dans la théologie de saint Paul," in EstBib, 1952, pp. 291ff. L. Sabourin, Rédemption sacrificielle, Desclée De Brouwer, 1961, pp. 179, 316; C. Spicq, Hébreux, "Excursus VIII: La Théologie et la liturgie du Précieux Sang," pp. 277–285; E. F. Siegman, "The Blood of Christ in St. Paul's Soteriology," in Precious Blood Study Week, Carthage, 1962, pp. 11–35; D. J. McCarthy, "The Symbolism of Blood and Sacrifice," in JBL, 1968, pp. 166–176; N. Snaith, "The Sprinkling of Blood," in ExpT, vol. 82, 1970, pp. 23–24; S. Lyonnet, L. Sabourin, Sin, Redemption, and Sacrifice, Rome, 1970, pp. 167ff.; J. M. Grintz, "'Do Not Eat of the Blood,'" in ASTI, vol. 8, 1970–71, pp. 78–105.

²⁹ Cf. W. Stott, "The Conception of 'Offering' in the Epistle to the Hebrews," in NTS, vol. 9, 1962, p. 66.

³⁰ For it would be an affront to the sacrifice of Christ," Thomas Aquinas, on this text. Christian theology has correctly understood that Hebrews does not thus exclude the permanent oblation of the earthly church in the sacrifice of the Mass, for just as St. Paul completes that which is lacking in the passion of Christ (Col 1:24), the heavenly High Priest continues to intercede for believers; and the Mass is nothing other than this union of the faithful with the oblation and intercession of the Savior then and now (C. F. D. Moule, The Sacrifice of Christ, London, 1956). Cajetan already commented: “Do not think it strange, novice, that the sacrifice of the altar is offered daily in Christ’s church; because it is not a new sacrifice, but a commemoration of the very same sacrifice that Christ offered; he himself commanded: Do this in memory of me. So also all the sacraments are nothing other than applications of Christ’s passion to those who receive them. Moreover, it is one thing to repeat Christ’s passion, but another to repeat the commemoration and application of Christ’s passion” (“Nec propterea, novitie, mireris quotidie offerri sacrificium altaris in Christi ecclesia; quoniam non est novum sacrificium, sed illudmet quod Christus obtulit commemoratur; praecipiente ipso: Hoc facite in mei commemorationem. Sacramenta quoque omnia nihil aliud sunt quam applicationes passionis Christi ad suscipientes. Aliud autem est iterare passionem Christi, at aliud iterare commemorationem et applicationem passionis Christi,” Epistolae Pauli et aliorum Apostolorum ad graecam veritatem castigatae, Venice, 1531, on this text).

ἀφιλάργυρος

aphilargyros, free of the love of money

see also αι—σχροκερδής, ἀφιλάργυρος; φιλαργυρία, φιλάργυρος

aphilargyros, S 866; EDNT 1.183; MM 98; L&N 25.109; BAGD 126

Since the love of money is one of the signs of belonging to the world, Heb 13:5 addresses to persecuted Christians the charge “that your way of life be aphilargyros. ” This is an echo of Matt 6:24: “You cannot serve God and money.” The same virtue is among the qualities required of the candidate for the episkope (1Tim 3:3). There is not much of significance to add to the citations of this term supplied by T. Nägeli and A. Deissmann¹ unless perhaps from the honorific decrees and in speeches in praise of virtue. The first mention is an honorific decree of Priene, from the second century BC. Unfortunately it is mutilated, but J. Rouffiac finds reason to classify it among “expressions of piety and of the moral ideal” which are common to the vocabulary of the inscriptions and of the NT.² More developed is the inscription of the Egyptian delta of 3 May 5 BC, “let arete and philagathia and aphilargyria be manifest” (arete te kai philagathia kai aphilargyria prodelos geinetai, SB 8267, 44).

That this absence of avarice was a highly prized virtue is already known from Diodorus Siculus, who emphasizes that Bias never used his oratorical prowess to gain wealth (9.11, aphilargyria), but especially from the listing of the qualities of Antoninus Pius: “Hear! In the first place, he had a love of wisdom; in the second place, he did not love money, and in the third place, he loved virtue.”³ But the best parallel to 1Tim 3:3 is in Onasander (1.8), in a list of qualities required in a general: he must be aphilargyros because aphilargyria guarantees that the leader will be incorruptible in his management of affairs. After all, many who demonstrate courage are blinded by money. The conclusion is that detachment from money will guarantee the probity of the bishop in the administration of material goods and probably also in the handling of spiritual things. One cannot be too strict (dokimasthesetai kai prote, Onasander, loc. cit.); hence, similarly, me aischrokerde (Titus 1:7). It is enough to recall that Judas loved money (John 12:6) as did the Pharisees (Luke 16:14, philargyroi) and that Simon Magus expected “to gain the gift of God by paying money” (Acts 8:20).

¹ T. Nägeli, Wortschatz, p. 31; A. Deissmann, Light, pp. 85–86.

² I.Priene, 137, 5 (J. Rouffiac, Caractères du grec, p. 84). Similarly the adverb ἀφιλαργύρως in the honorific decrees of Istropolis (Dittenberger, Syl. 708, 17; first century BC) and of the region around Athens (ibid. 1104, 25, from 37/36 BC).

³ P.Oxy. 33, col. II, 11 (interview with the emperor Marcus Aurelius): ἄκουε, τὸ μὲν πρῶτον ἦν φιλόσοφος, τὸ δεύτερον ἀφιλάργυρος, τὸ τρίτον φιλάγαθος (second century AD).

ἀφοράω

aphorao, to look from a distance, gaze fixedly see also ἀποβλέπω

aphorao, S 872; EDNT 1.183; MM 98; L&N 27.6, 30.31; BDF §74(1); BAGD 127

Christians are like athletes who compete together in the arena, where all the believers of the OT cheer them on like “supporters” (Heb 11–12:1). Once the race is begun, the athlete must not allow himself to be distracted by anything. Not only so, but he does not look back (Luke 9:62), nor to left or right, but keeps his attention fixed on the goal, concentrating only on it; and this exclusive attachment is the secret of his endurance and perseverance. Thus Heb 12:2 asks the disciples to “fix their gaze” on Jesus (aphorontes eis).

It does not do justice to this biblical hapax to translate it simply “look at,” especially in a letter where the verbs of seeing and considering are so numerous, so varied, and used with careful attention to their particular nuance.¹ The first meaning of aphorao is “look at from a distance,”² so it is very close to apoblepo (Heb 11:26): just as Moses fixed his eyes on his reward, the believer under the New Covenant thinks only of the heavenly high priest (3:1, katanoeo), to whom every step here below in some way brings him closer (12:22-24, proselelythate). But with the particle eis, this verb signals the turning of eyes from different points on the same object, in which one faces it³ and finally fixes one’s attention on it.⁴ Thus people look at a model,⁵ a guide or leader,⁶ and above all God himself.⁷ The multitude of citations having to do with looking to God show that a spiritual attitude is intended—whether in a Jewish or a pagan context—the attitude of every human creature face to face with their Creator and Lord.

This attitude entails first and foremost a selectivity, even exclusivity, in attention, as when, for example, the priests refuse to hear the high priests and prominent persons urging them to offer sacrifices for the emperors. They rely on the large numbers and the assistance of the revolutionaries; above all they look to the authority of Eleazar.⁸ When Josephus says that “each of the victims died gazing resolutely toward the temple” (War 5.517; cf. 6.123) or that “the army had its eyes on Titus” (7.67, eis auton apheora), or that “when he had to render judgment, he considered only the truth” (Ant. 7.110), it is understood that these contemplatives have turned away from other considerations and focused only on one thing. It is precisely in this sense that believers turn and keep their gaze fixed on their archegos, who “in place of the joy that lay before him endured a cross, despising the shame thereof” (Heb 12:2).

In addition, aphorao means “consider, reflect,”⁹ because faith, the evidence of things invisible (Heb 11:1), is a faculty of perception—it “takes in” (verse 3, noeo)—but this “observing” is not here purely speculative; aphorao is used for a spectacle that affects the feelings¹⁰ and gives rise to a practical response,¹¹ notably in the papyri where in its rare occurrences it has the sense of “take into account”: “but if you take into account that they are slandering you” (ean de aphides hoti diaballousi se, P.Fouad 54, 29, from the second century; P.Oxy. 1682, 14 from the fourth century); “considering the absolute necessity of this task (= in taking into consideration, aphoron to aparaiteton tes chreias), bring your zeal to bear . . .” (P.Panop.Beatty 2, 46; third century). Such is the point of the exhortation in Heb 12:2—believers, in meditating on the passion of Jesus, find the model for their own conduct, the source of their hypomone (endurance). They have only to follow the archegos. The best parallel is Plutarch’s: “Cato says that in critical circumstances, the senators would turn their eyes toward him (aphoran . . . pros auton), as the passengers on a ship turn toward the pilot” (Cat. Mai. 19.7).

¹ C. Spicq, Hébreux, vol. 2, pp. 377ff.

² Cf. Josephus, Ant. 1.335: the two wives of Jacob are sent to watch from afar the actions of the combatants; 11.329; War 5.160: from the high tower of Psephinus at Jerusalem, one could espy Arabia in the distance; 5.445; 15.398.

³ Josephus, Ant. 11.55; 15.401; Lucian, Philops. 30: ὁ —Αρίγνωτος δριμὺ ἀπιδὼν εἰ—ς ε—πέ; P.Oxy. 2111, 17: Petronius Mamertinus ἀπιδὼν εἰ—ς τὴν Ζωσίμην εἶπεν; PSI 76, 7; ἀφορὰν πρὸς τὴν σὴν λαμπρότητα.

⁴ Josephus, Ant. 3.36: the people's eyes were fixed on Moses, εἰ—ς αὐτὸν ἀφορω—ντα; War 5.352: the old wall of Jerusalem is ornamented with spectators so attentive that they lean forward to see better. Cf. Plutarch, Agis 1.4: those who keep watch from the prow see better than the pilots what is coming up ahead.

⁵ Epictetus 4.1.170: εἰ—ς ταῦτα ἀφόρα τὰ παραδείγματα.

⁶ Josephus, Ant. 12.431: the soldiers of Judas Maccabeus, after the death of their leader, think of nothing else . . . ; this στρατηγοῦ τοιούτου στερηθέντες should be compared with the archegos of Christians (Heb 12:2).

⁷ Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.166: “Moses urged them all to turn their eyes toward God as the source of all blessings”; Ant. 8.290: “Asanos, the king of Jerusalem, was a person of excellent character, keeping his eyes fixed on the divinity (πρὸς τὸν θεῖ—ον ἀφορω—ν),” he thought nothing and did nothing that did not orient him to piety and the observance of the laws; 4Macc 17:10, the epitaph of some Maccabean martyrs: “They avenged our people while looking to God (εἰ—ς τὸν θεὸν ἀφορω—ντες) and enduring all torments even unto death”; Epictetus 3.24.16: “looking steadfastly to Zeus, he carried out all his deeds.”

⁸ Josephus, War 2.410 (μάλιστα δ ἀφορω—ντες εἰ—ς τὸν —Ελεάζαρον); Epictetus 2.19.29: “It is my intention to free you from every constraint and every fetter . . . directing your gaze toward God in all matters, large and small”; 3.26.11: “Is that also your custom . . . to look to others and hope for nothing from yourself?”

⁹ To behold a spectacle (Josephus, War 1.97; 6.233), to consider a situation in its entirety (4.279; cf. Ant. 2.42; 2.141; 2.336; 7.350; Plutarch, Lyc. 7.4; cf. ἀφίδω, Phil 2:23).

¹⁰ Josephus, War 1.142: “the sight of the Romans’ perfect order” inspires fear.

¹¹ Cf. ἀφίδω; Jonah 4:5—Jonah, sitting outside the city, waited to see what would happen; 4Macc 17:23—the tyrant Antiochus had observed the courage and patience of the martyrs.

βαθμός

bathmos, threshold, step, stage, rank

bathmos, S 898; EDNT 1.189–190; MM 101; L&N 87.3; BDF §34(5); BAGD 130

Formed from baino, “stand or lean on,” the NT hapax bathmos is an architectural technical term meaning a (raised) threshold of a door or of a temple,¹ a stair step;² hence “degree” or “step,” whether of the zodiac or a sundial,³ of a genealogy (P.Cair.Masp. 169, 10, from the sixth century; Dio Chrysostom, 41.6), or of time: “Nature has produced stages of life, like steps, as it were, by which people ascend and descend” (Philo, Etern. World 58). Hence, in a metaphorical sense, bathmos refers to any step of progress toward a goal, levels of vice or of virtue,⁴ a stage along the soul’s journey.

Thus we may approach 1Tim 3:13, where deacons “who serve well gain an excellent rank, bathmon heautois kalon, ” a sentence that is something of a crux interpretum. It can be understood as saying that deacons, after the fashion of candidates for the episkope (3:1), will not have to be embarrassed at their duties, that they will serve without an inferiority complex;⁵ but also that they are in a position to be promoted to a higher level. T. Nägeli, (Wortschatz, p. 26) cites an inscription from Mitylene: “kept up to the degrees (basmoi) of his rank” (tois tas axias basmois aneloge, IG, vol. 2, 243, 16); P. N. Harrison cites the Sententiae of Hadrian, where the emperor asks a soldier who wants to join the praetorian guard first of all to prove himself “in political service, and if you become a good soldier, you will be able to pass on to the praetorium as a third bathmos. ”⁶ In any event, the term is used in honorific designations, as seen in the formula used in inscriptions at Sardis and at Side: “ho lamprotatos komes protou bathmou, vir clarissimus, comes primi ordinis.”⁷

The best context is probably Qumran, where the stages of approach to the various offices and the rules determining precedence and hierarchical order (sereq) are so detailed: “the priests shall go first, in order according to their spirit, one after the other. The Levites shall go behind them, and all the people third, in order.”⁸ “In accord with his intelligence and the perfection of his conduct, each one shall keep to his place to carry out the service with which he is charged with respect to a more or less extended group of his brothers. Thus shall be recognized in some a higher dignity than in others."⁹

The diaconal bathmos kalos seems to derive from the Lord's teaching on the steward faithful in small things, who carries out a lower duty conscientiously and will also be faithful in higher functions. The Master will place him over his whole household and all his goods, and he will entrust to him the government of ten cities, the managing or dispensation of spiritual riches (Luke 7:44f.; 16:10ff.; 19:17). It is at least with this meaning that our text is understood when it is cited by the first Roman ordination ritual (Hippolytus, Trad. ap.) and by the ordination ritual of the patriarchate of Antioch (Const. App.).

¹ 1Sam 5:5—"The priests of Dagon and all who enter the temple of Dagon do not step on the threshold of Dagon at Ashdod . . . but they jump over it"; Sir 6:36—"If you know an intelligent man, visit him at dawn. Let your foot be familiar with the threshold of his door." At Laodicea, Apollonia had steps built above the pavements (IGLS 1259, 7; cf. 4034: "had the pavement built with steps"; RB 1895, p. 76). At Cyzicus, it is the base on which a tower is built (C. Michel, Recueil, n. 596, 10); at Didyma, cf. SEG, vol. 4, 453, 14. Βαθμοί are bases of stone (SB 3919, 8; R. Martin, Architecture grecque, p. 207). Cf. the tax on thresholds (P.Oxy. 574; second century AD).

² Josephus, War 1.420: "a stairway of two hundred steps"; 5.195, 5.206: "fifteen steps leading from the women's wall to the great gate"; Ant. 8.140 (or ἀναβαθμός); cf. A. Orlandos, Technique architecturale, p. 62.

³ 2Kgs 20:9-11; Josephus, Ant. 10.29; Vettius Valens 31.2; O. Neugebauer, H. B. Hoesen, Greek Horoscopes, Philadelphia, 1959, p. 152, n. 12.

⁴ Josephus, War 4.171: "levels of audacity"; Corp. Herm. 13.9: "This stage, my child, is the seat of justice." Cf. Athenaeus 1.1c: "surpassing himself . . . he jumps from level to level."

⁵ Cf. P. Dornier, Les Epîtres Pastorales, Paris, 1969, p. 65.

⁶ —Εν τῇ πολιτικῇ στρατείᾳ, καὶ ε—άν καλὸς στρατιώτης γένη, τρίτῳ βαθμῷ— δυνήσῃ εἰ—ς πραιτώριον μεταβῆναι. Cf. SEG, vol. 21, 505, 7; Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 3.21; P.Tebt. 703, 276: "If your conduct is above reproach, you will be taken to be worthy of advancement" (third century BC).

⁷ Cf. the texts cited by J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1968, p.518, n. 478.

⁸ 1QS 2.20; cf. 2.23: “his allotted place.” “They shall be enrolled in order, one after the other, each one in proportion to his intelligence and his works, so that they may obey one another, the lower obeying the higher, . . . that each one may be advanced . . . or demoted” (5.23–24). The progression has to do not only with knowledge (9.18; 1QH 14.13) but also honor (cf. 1Tim 5:17).

⁹ 1QSa 1.17, 18; cf. 2.14–18 (ed. D. Barthélemy, J. T. Milik, Qumran Cave I, Oxford, 1955, p. 112). The parallel is pointed out by W. Nauck, “Probleme des frühchristlichen Amtsverständnisses,” in ZNW, 1957, pp. 216ff.; but H. Braun is skeptical (Qumran und das N. T., Tübingen, 1966, vol. 2, pp. 199, 336).

βαρύς

barys, important, serious, burdensome, grave, dangerous

barys, S 926; TDNT 1.556–558; EDNT 1.199; NIDNTT 1.260–262; MM 104; L&N 22.4, 65.56, 78.23; BAGD 133

The meaning of this adjective varies according to context and may be either favorable or pejorative.¹ Sometimes it means “worthy, important,” like certain commandments of the law, as opposed to those which are “secondary”;² or the letters of Paul, serious, powerful, impressive;³ sometimes—most often, in fact—the connotations are negative, as with “heavy burdens,” burdensome responsibilities, difficult undertakings,⁴ even “grave accusations” (Acts 25:7).

It is in this sense that the scribes and the Pharisees place heavy burdens on people’s shoulders (Matt 23:4, phortia barea), burdens that are crushing and literally unbearable,⁵ after the fashion of sins that weigh on the conscience more than a heavy burden (hosei phortion bary ebarynthesan ep’ eme, Ps 38:4), or of a tax collector who oppresses the taxpayers (P.Mich. 529, 28, 35–36; P.Ant. 100, 11, enochlein hymin eti peri toutou moi bary), or of the “unjust” person who carries very heavy burdens, pherousa barytata (Philo, Husbandry 20). This constraint is so linked to the person that at times it becomes one with him, as in the case of this man of the second-third century who “wears the yoke of Judaism” (houtos pheron loudaikon phortion, C.Pap.Jud. 519, 18; cf. t. Ber. 2.7).

Jesus stated that his yoke is easy and his burden light (Matt 11:30), and 1John 5:3 repeats: “his commands are not bareiai (hai entolai autou bareiai ouk eisin).”⁶ This can be understood as meaning that his precepts are not crushing or oppressive,⁷ or that they are not difficult to carry out.⁸ The best commentary is Philo’s: “God doesn’t ask anything burdensome, complicated, or difficult, but something that is simple and easy: to love him as benefactor, or at least fear him as master and lord.”⁹ It seems that this is a traditional description of laws or commands: “the precepts are neither excessive nor too burdensome (ou hyperonkoi kai baryterai) for the abilities of those who conform to them” (Philo, Rewards 80). More precisely, it is the ideal voiced by Israelite and pagan rulers, but too often contradicted by actual deeds. The assembly of Israel at Shechem stated to Rehoboam: “Your father made our yoke heavy (ebarynen); but now you should lighten the harsh servitude of your father and the heavy yoke that he placed on us.”¹⁰ The Gadarenes denounced Herod, whose orders were too severe and tyrannical.¹¹ Pharaoh published ordinances that made demands beyond the abilities of the Jews (Philo, Moses 1.37), just as Tarquin had “become hateful and unbearable to the people.”¹² But Vespasian forbids burdening the provinces (IGLS, 1998, 12, barynesthai), and Tiberius Julius Alexander refuses to “weigh down Egypt with new and unjust burdens” (SB 8444, 5, barynomenen kainais kai adikois eispraxesi). If the “weight of business” rests on rulers,¹³ they acquit themselves honorably when they do not impose overly heavy burdens on their subjects (Acts 15:28; 1Thess 2:7; Rev 2:24).

When St. Paul preaches to the Ephesian elders, “Grievous wolves (lykoi bareis, literally heavy wolves) will enter in among you and will not spare the flock,”¹⁴ he depicts the heretic as a fierce and ravenous animal,¹⁵ a type of the tyrants who exploit the people in Ezek 22:27; Wis 3:3; Prov 28:15 (bear in the Hebrew). Jesus had called them lykoi harpages (Matt 7:15; cf. John 10:12) that ravage the flock; the same modifier is used of the wolves in Gen 49:27, Ezek 22:27, corresponding to the Hebrew tarap, “tear to pieces”: Benjamin is a wolf who tears up his prey, but no parallel is known to the “heavy wolf,” which evokes the ideas of violence and of irritation,¹⁶ and which could just as well be translated “dangerous, formidable, voracious, ferocious, rapacious, or cruel.”

¹ The noun βάρος denotes first of all weight (Philo, Joseph 140: unequal weights; Heir 146; P.Oxy. 3008, 12: “the weight is equal”), that which is heavy, like baggage (Judg 18:21; cf. Jdt 7:4; Xenophon, Oec. 17.9; Cyr. 3.3, 3.42); the adjective means “heavy, weighty”; cf. stone (Prov 27:3), the hands (Homer, Il. 1.89; Exod 17:12; Job 23:2; 33:7), an old man (1Sam 4:18; Job 15:10), a burden carried by camels (Philo, Post. Cain 148).

² Matt 23:23, τὰ βαρύτερα (ε—ντολή βαρει—α—ε—λαφρά); cf. Str-B, vol. 1, pp. 900–905; J. Bonsirven, Judaïsme palestinien, pp. 73–80. In the LXX, βαρὺς often means “considerable, numerous,” describing a people or an army (Num 20:20; 1Kgs 3:9; 2Kgs 6:14; 18:17; 2Chr 9:1; 1Macc 1:17, 20, 29; 4Macc 4:5; Ps 35:18; Nah 3:3); cf. Polybius 1.17.3; heavy infantry is distinguished from light infantry (ibid. 1.76.3); Xenophon, Cyr. 5.3.37.

³ 2Cor 10:10, αἰ—ε—πιστολαὶ βαρει—αι καὶ ἰ—σχυραὶ as opposed to his weak physical presence and his speech, which is ineffectual (cf. P. E. Hughes, Paul’s Second Epistle to the Corinthians, 4th ed., Grand Rapids, 1973, pp. 361ff.); cf. nobility of character (Plutarch, Cat. 1.6; 20.2), consideration (Ages. 7.1). “Heavy words” can be serious (Job 6:3) or strong-voiced (Aristotle, Rh. 3.1.29; cf. 1Sam 5:11; Philo, Alleg. Interp. 1.14; 3.51), or painful: ε—δεξάμην βαρέα ῥήματα (P.Princ. 120, 3; SB 9616, verso 31); cf. 6263, 26: ἀλλὰ μὴ βαρέως ἔχε μου τὰ γράμματα νουθετοῦντα σε.

⁴ Exod 18:12—“The thing is too heavy for you, you cannot do it alone”; Neh 5:18—“the task weighed heavy on this people” (cf. SB 6263, 20); Sir 31:2, a grave illness (cf. P.Tebt. 52, 11; Philo, Creation 125; Diodorus Siculus 17.31.4). In the papyri, βαρὺς describes notably onerous public service (BGU 159, 3; P.Oxy. 2110, 9, 18, 33, 36; cf. P.Mich. 529, 18, λειτουργίας βάρος; PSI 1103, 6; 1243, 20; BGU 159, 5), urgent necessities (P.Oxy. 2131, 12), or the condition of a pregnant woman who miscarries because of blows that she has received, τὴν μὲν Τάησιν βαρέαν οὔσαν ε—κ τῶ—ν πληγῶ—ν αὐτῶ—ν ε—ξέτρωσεν τὸ βρέφος (P.Cair.Goodsp. 15, 15). Τὸ βάρος, “the burden,” commonly describes the child carried in its mother’s womb, P.Brem. 63, 4 = C.Pap.Jud. 442; SEG, vol. 8, 802: “she bore the fruit of her womb, and put down her burden in pain”; vol. 15, 876, 1: ἔσχατον ὠδίνων βάρος = the final burden of pains (of childbirth); cf. Philo, Unchang. God 15; but also “the burden of the day and of the heat” (Matt 20:12), and all that weighs one down (Gal 6:2; P.Oxy. 1062, 14; 2596, 10; PSI 27, 7); cf. burden of care (Philo, Moses 1.14; Migr. Abr. 14).

⁵ Cf. Polybius 1.10.6: “They feared that there were troublesome and fearsome neighbors, λίαν βαρει—ς καὶ φορεβοί”; Anth. Pal. 11.326: “Do not try to make yourself unbearable, μὴ πάντα βαρὺς θέλε”; Plutarch, De frat. amor. 16: older brothers can make themselves unbearable and disagreeable to their juniors, βαρει—ς καὶ ἀηδει—ς.

⁶ Cf. G. Lambert, “Mon joug est aisé et mon fardeau léger,” in NRT, 1955, pp. 963–969; N. Lazure, Les Valeurs morales de la théologie johannique, Paris, 1965, pp. 134ff.; H. D. Betz, “The Logion of the Easy Yoke and of Rest (Mt. XI, 28–30),” in JBL, 1967, pp. 10–24.

⁷ Sir 40:1—“A heavy yoke was created for the sons of Adam”; cf. 17:21—“a heavy night”; 13:2—βάρος ὑπὲρ σὲ μὴ ἄρης; 2Macc 9:10—“the unbearable weight of his odor”; an epitaph from Doris, from the imperial period: “Death is not equally heavy for all, but the one who is good receives also at the end an easy death” (SB 8307, 6): in the sixth century, ὡς βαρυτέρου ὄντος τοῦ ζυγίου (9400, 5).

⁸ Dan 2:11—“The thing that the king asks is difficult” (yaqqîrâh); Sir 29:28—a hard-to-take insult; Judg 20:34—“the battle was tough”; Philo, Husbandry 120, athletes knock to the ground “difficult and heavy adversaries.”

⁹ Philo, Spec. Laws 1.299, οὐδὲν βαρὺ καὶ ποικίλον ἢ δύσεργον, ἀλλὰ ἀπλοῦν καὶ ῥάδιον.

¹⁰ 1Kgs 12:4, 11 (and the whole pericope, 12:1-14, retold in 2Chr 10:1-14 and Josephus, Ant. 8.213); cf. Num 11:14—“I cannot carry this whole people by myself, because they are too heavy a burden for me” (kabed); Josephus, Ant. 19.362: a kingdom is a heavy responsibility, εἶναι βαρὺ βίασταγμα βασιλείαν.

¹¹ Josephus, Ant. 15.354, βαρὺν αὐτὸν ἐν τοῖς ἐπιτάγμασι καὶ τυραννικὸν εἶναι.

¹² Plutarch, Publ. 1.3: μισω—ν καὶ βαρυνόμενος; cf. 2.4. Βαρύς modifies tyranny, “an unbearable burden of excessive constraint” (Philo, Moses 1.39; cf. Conf. Tongues 92: iron discipline), but also anything that one may suffer (Gen 48:17; Wis 2:15).

¹³ Philo, Plant. 45: “the heavy burden of the cares of government”; Josephus, War 1.461: τὸ βάρος τῶν πραγμάτων; 4.616: τὸ βάρος τῆς ἡγεμονίας; Plutarch, Per. 37.1; cf. UPZ 110, 176; P.Ryl. 659, 4: Let each one stand up under his own burden, ἕκαστον ὑπαντα—ν πρὸς τὰ ἴδια βάρη.

¹⁴ Acts 20:29; cf. G. W. H. Lampe, “‘Grievous Wolves’ (Act. XX, 29),” in B. Lindars, S. S. Smalley, Christ and Spirit in the New Testament (in honor of C. F. D. Moule), Cambridge, 1973, pp. 253–268; J. Dupont, Discours de Milet, p. 209ff.

¹⁵ Cf. Homer, Il. 16.352–355: the Achaean chiefs are like wolves that ravage the flocks.

¹⁶ J. Pollux, Onom. 5.164, defines ὁ δὲ βίαιος · καλοῖ—τῆ ἄν βαρὺς, ἀλαζῶν, φορτικός; cf. 3Macc 5:1, ὀργὴ βαρεῖ—α; Philo, Giants 51, “the violent storm”; Philo, Moses 1.119: “pelted by the weight of the hailstones”; Aristophanes, Ran. 1394: death, the cruelest of evils, βαρύτερον κακόν; Plutarch, De cupid. divit. 5: “an oppressive and cruel mistress of the house”; De sera 12: “burdensome old age”; Demetr. 10.2: “made unbearable and hateful by the extravagance of the honors that the Athenians voted him”; 28.4: Antigone “hard by nature and scornful”; 19.4: “the heaviness of the body”; Ant. 2.5: “heavy debt”; SEG 18, 194: “a heavy chain,” which is contrasted with freedom; Apollonius Rhodius, Argon. 1.272: “a painful life”; 2.1008: “a hard task,” etc.

βασιλεία, βασιλείος, βασιλεύς, βασιλεύω, βασιλικός, βασιλίτσα basileia, kingdom, reign; basileios, royal; basileus, king; basileuo, to be king, rule, reign; basilikos, royal; basilissa, queen

basileia, S 932; TDNT 1.564–593; EDNT 1.201–205; NIDNTT 2.372–382, 386–388; MM 104; L&N 1.82, 11.13, 37.64, 37.65, 37.105; BDF §163; BAGD 134–135 | basileios, S 934; TDNT 1.564–593; EDNT 1.205; NIDNTT 2.372–373; MM 104; L&N 37.69; BDF §50; BAGD 136 | basileus, S 935; TDNT 1.564–593; EDNT 1.205–208; NIDNTT 1.372–373, 377–378, 389; MM 104–105; L&N 37.67; BDF §§46(2), 146(3), 147(3); BAGD 136 | basileuo, S 936; TDNT 1.564–593; EDNT 1.207–208; NIDNTT 2.372–373, 377–378, 380–381; MM 105; L&N 37.22, 37.64; BDF §§177, 234(5), 309(1); BAGD 136 | basilikos, S 937; TDNT 1.564–593; EDNT 1.208; NIDNTT 3.372–373; MM 105; L&N 37.69; BAGD 136 | basilissa, S 938; TDNT 1.564–593; EDNT 1.208; NIDNTT 2.372–373, 381; MM 105; L&N 37.68; BDF §§34(1), 111(1); BAGD 137

In every language, a “king” is a head of state, a sovereign, a monarch; by extension, a head or representative of a group, one who reigns or presides at an event. A “kingdom” is the land or state governed by a king, and by extension a collective or persons or things ruled by a common principle (cf. the animal kingdom, the plant kingdom). “Reign” is the exercise of royal power, domination, either absolute personal power or dominating influence.

From Homer on, the ideal king fears the gods and lives justly (Homer, Od. 19.109); his power and honor come from Zeus,¹ who is kindly disposed toward him (Il. 2.196; cf. Hesiod, Th. 80–101; 886; Dittenberger, Syl. 1014, 110: Dios basileos). In the classical period, Aristotle distinguishes five types of government (arche, Pol. 3.14.1284b35ff.): (1)

Spartan monarchy, law-based (Plato, Leg. 3.691 d –692 b) but not entirely sovereign (ouk esti de kyria panton). (2) Barbarian monarchy, especially in Asia Minor, is law-based and hereditary, and thus stable, but despotic and quite close to tyranny, because it favors the sovereign and does not have the consent of the subjects, as with Hieron of Syracuse (Pindar, Ol. 1.23; Pyth. 3.70, 85); it is a perversion of monarchy (Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 8.12.1160b3). (3) Elective tyranny, as it existed among the ancient Greeks, was called aisymneteia; aisymnetai were lawmakers chosen (for a given term or for life) to put an end to civil discord and given extensive powers; such was Pittacus, one of the Seven Sages (Plato, Hp. Ma. 281 c; Prt. 343 a; Resp. 1.335 e; P.Oxy. 2506, frag 77). (4) The monarchy of the heroic age, the period of Heracles and Priam, was based on general consent and heredity but regulated by law. The founders of the dynasty were benefactors of the people;² their descendants inherited their power, led military operations, judged lawsuits, and presided over sacrifices that were not reserved for the priests. (5) Finally, there was absolute monarchy, under which “one person has authority over everything,” as in the domestic government, which is a kind of household monarchy (cf. Rh. 1.8.1365b37ff.). But it is more advantageous to be governed by the best laws than by the best person (cf. democracy).

During the Hellenistic period, Xenophon mentions the identification of the good shepherd and the good king (Cyr. 8.2.14), which is emphasized by Philo³ and many others. They are only repeating the image of the shepherd-king from the Code of Hammurabi⁴ and the designation of the sovereign as shepherd in Akkadian (ré'u) and in Sumerian (sipa), a royal and divine title in Egypt⁵ and in the Mediterranean world.⁶ Hence the abundant literature on the good king, beginning with the edicts of Asoka in third-century BC India (“king, friend of the gods, with a friendly look”),⁷ the Stoics Zeno, Cleanthes, Sphaerus, and Perseus, who wrote treatises Peri basileias,⁸ and also Diotogenes, Ecphantus, and Sthenidas, whose fragments are preserved in the Florilegium of Stobaeus.⁹ Two main themes are expounded: monarchy is an institution of divine law, and the king is an image of God’s rule over the world. The king conforms to God, and the subjects imitate the king.

The papyri and the inscriptions exalt the title of basileus adopted around 334 by Alexander the Great (I.Priene I, 1) and preserved in the Antiochian and Egyptian monarchies. Antiochus I of Commagene was called “great king Antiochus the just god” (basileos megas Antiochos theos dikaios, IGLS I, 1–2) and even “king of kings” (basileus basileon III, 12–13; cf. A. Deissmann, Light, pp. 356, 363ff.). Not only is a king called “great” (P.Oxy. 2554, col. I, 13: ho basileus megas) but also “very great” (P.Fouad 16, 10: hyper tou megistou basileos; BGU 1816, 23), “eternal” (PSI 1314, 17), “most pious” (P.Oxy. 2267, 9), the “divinized”;¹⁰ oaths are sworn by him (BGU 1735–1740); furthermore, Zeus is venerated as basileus.¹¹ So the friendship of kings is a grounds for pride,¹² and those who seek justice resort to them (P.Yale 46, col. I, 19; P.Mert. 5, 4; P.Sorb. 13, 1). It is the king who hears suits (P.Yale 42, 30) and gives verdicts (C.Ord.Ptol. 21, 14). He commands, and his prostagmata are “edicts.”¹³ If he is enriched by the collection of taxes,¹⁴ he is also a benefactor who gives generously.¹⁵ In return, places of prayer, an altar, a front hall in a temple, etc. are dedicated to him.¹⁶

Basilissa is a title of the goddess Isis (E. Bernand, Fayoum, n. 167, 3; 169, 6), but it is the ordinary term for the wife of a reigning sovereign.¹⁷ She is described as kyria (SB 7746, 33: hyper tes kyrias basilisses; 7944, 3), as a priestess (ibid. 8035 a 5–6: hiereias basilisses Kleopatras theas; 10763, 3; hierateuouses basilisses), and as a goddess (te thea basilisse, ibid. 6033, 2; 6156, 3; 6157, 1). Oaths are sworn by her as by the king (ibid. 6261, 13, P.Sorb. 32, 6; P.Eleph. 23, 10), and Antiochus III orders that worship be offered to “our sister, Queen Laodice.”¹⁸

It is common practice for a document to be dated by the year of the reign of the sovereign or “under the reign of” (C.Ord.Ptol. 9, 1), usually with the present participle of the verb basileuo, for example: “the twentieth year of Ptolemy’s reign.”¹⁹ But there is also the figurative statement that Nemesis became queen or began to reign over the world (basileouosa tou kosmou).²⁰

Basileia is sometimes “kingdom,”²¹ sometimes “reign,” “government” (“having received from his father the rule over Egypt and Libya,” paralabon para tou patros ten basileian Aigyptou kai Libyes, SB 8545, A 6; cf. 6003, 14; 8232, 3; 8858, 6; P.Oxy. 2899, 3; 2903, 7), sometimes described as “very happy.”²² Βασιλεία (as our word is accented, with an acute on the penult) should not be confused with βασιλία (accent on the antepenult).²³

The adjective basileios, “royal” (Wis 5:16), is rather rare,²⁴ basilikos on the other hand is extremely common, used especially with reference to the land belonging to the Lagids (basilike ge),²⁵ leased out to renters (P.Rev., col. 26, 13; 33, 9–18), cultivated by royal farmers (basilikos georgos);²⁶ hence the “royal grain” (P.Sorb. 17 a 7, b 8) and the royal linens (P.Rein. 120, 3; 121, 3); othonia were a royal monopoly.²⁷ Everything pertaining to the sovereign was modified by this adjective,²⁸ notably the royal clerk or scribe (basilikos grammateus), who collaborated with the strategos and was an important official in the financial administration;²⁹ the royal law (nomosbasilikos, Jas 2:8), enacted by the sovereign;³⁰ the oath by the king (basilikos horkos, P.Ryl. 572, 55; 585, 43; P.Lond. 2188, 145; C.Ord.Ptol. 21, 23); the royal treasury (to basilikon, P.Yale 57, 13; P.Lille 14, 6–7; C.Ord. Ptol. 71, 10), made up of the revenues of the royal domains and taxes; or the royal stores, a grain warehouse (P.Cair.Zen. 59015); the royal bank or banker (trapeza, trapezites basilike) that receives all the money due the treasury.³¹ Finally, there is the praise implied in the designation of a person as basilikotatos.

The OT uses melej for king. The primitive meaning of this root is “to deliberate,” then “to decide”:³³ the king is the one who governs, who wields supreme power. The first mention of a king is religious: “Yahweh is King.” After the crossing of the Red Sea, Moses and the Israelites sing a victory chant: “He is King, Lord forever and ever.”³⁴ This is not a reference to some monarchical government, but rather to the exercise of absolute power³⁵ to protect and guide the chosen people (Mic 2:13; Ps 74:12); thus Yahweh is King of Israel.³⁶ Gideon proclaimed “It is the Lord that should be your sovereign” (Judg 8:23), meaning that Israel is the domain or kingdom over which God reigns and in the midst of which he resides (Ps 59:14), Zion being the “city of the great King” (Ps 48:3). As the object of the psalmists’ faith, adoration, and supplication, God is called “my King and my God” (Ps 5:2; 44:5; 68:25; 84:4; 145:1), “my Lord, our King” (Add Esth 14:3). The transcendence of this royalty is elaborated over the centuries. Yahweh is an eternal king, “for ever and ever,”³⁷ whose universal reign will have no end (Ps 66:7; 102:13; Dan 6:27). God is also called King of heaven³⁸ and of ages (Deut 9:26, LXX; Tob 13:7; 14:15). He is clothed in majesty (Ps 93:1), the King of glory (Ps 24:7, 10; 1Chr 29:11), sitting enthroned amid a court (Ps 29:10; 93:2; 103:19); so he alone is king (2Macc 1:24–25), King of kings (Dan 4:34), above all the gods (Ps 95:3–4) and king of the nations, which he rules (Jer 10:7; Ps 22:29; Pss 96–98). He directs the history of the world (Ps 33:13) because “all things are in his power” (Add Esth 13:9, 15; Ps 48:3ff.). As Lord of heaven and earth, he is “King of all things” (Tob 10:13, a). In his special role as King of the chosen people, whom he rewards for their faithfulness, Yahweh has an eschatological kingdom: “The Lord will reign over them forever and ever” (Wis 3:8); “the King of the world will resurrect us to a new life.”³⁹ We can see how the proclamation of this reign would cause the earth to rejoice (Ps 97:1) and how Rabbi Yochanan said “any blessing that is not contained in the kingdom is no real blessing” (b.Ber. 12a).

As for human royalty in Israel, certain texts that present it as the product of agitation by the people are unfavorable toward it (1Sam 8:1–22; 10:18–25; 12:15); but others that attribute the initiative to God are favorable.⁴⁰ In any event, this monarchy has a religious character.⁴¹ First of all, the king is enthroned in the sanctuary, where he is anointed (Ps 89:21, 39, 40); this anointing is the essential rite of coronation.⁴² Next, at the royal palace, where he is given the kingly insignia, he is acclaimed and the ranking officials pay him homage. From there the messengers depart, the “evangelists of joy”⁴³ who carry the news of the investiture into the countryside, where “the earth resounds with their shouts” (1Kgs 1:40). The Israelite king is essentially a proxy and representative of God, chosen by God to be his people’s leader and his own earthly assistant, the mediator of his gifts (2Sam 16:18; 2Chr 13:8). Obviously, the king must remain dependent on and obedient to God, not becoming puffed up with pride over his brothers (Deut 17:20). He carries out justice (Jer 22:16). He needs his subjects' prayers (Ps 72:15), but he puts all his trust in Yahweh, who grants him his favor (Ps 21:8).

The NT mentions "the kings of the earth" (hoi basileis tes ges)⁴⁴ and "kings of the nations" (hoi basileis ton ethnon, Luke 22:25), who hold sway over their peoples and govern them.⁴⁵ It is commanded to honor them (1Pet 2:17), to obey them as sovereigns (2:13), and to pray for them and for all who hold authority,⁴⁶ for this authority is from God (John 19:11; Rom 13:1). The only true God is acclaimed late as "King of the ages, incorruptible, invisible,"⁴⁷ and in a doxology as "the blessed God . . . King of those who reign and Lord of those who have sovereignty."⁴⁸ On the other hand, Jesus at his birth is described by the magi as "King of the Jews" (Matt 2:2; cf. 27:11), that is, as Messiah. Nathaniel confesses him as "King of Israel" (John 1:49). After the miracle of the multiplication of the loaves, the crowd wanted "to take him and make him king" (John 6:15), and he was acclaimed as such on the occasion of his messianic entry at Jerusalem: "Your king comes to you" (Matt 21:5; Luke 19:38; John 12:13 = Zech 9:9). In the course of his trial before Pilate, Christ, accused of being King of the Jews, admits "I am a king" (John 18:37), but he adds that his kingdom is not of this world.⁴⁹ In fact, he will appear as a glorious king at his Parousia (Matt 25:34), "Lord of lords and King of kings" (Rev 17:14; 19:16). This is the belief of the primitive church, since at Thessalonica the Jews accuse the Christians of contravening "Caesar's edicts by saying that there is another king, Jesus" (Acts 17:7).

The expression "kingdom of God" (basileia tou theou) appears more than 130 times in the NT, and in a new way, especially in Matthew (50 times), whose theology as a whole is summed up by the phrase.⁵⁰ It is relatively rare in the Pauline epistles, where it is very close to the concept of justification; this evolution already suggests the variety of meaning of the formula. Jesus begins his preaching with these words: "The time is fulfilled (pleroo) and the reign of God has drawn near (engiken); repent and believe the gospel" (Mark 1:15). As the first phrase of this saying indicates, the proximity is temporal; but inasmuch as this reign comes in the person and the ministry of Jesus, the proximity is also spatial (cf. P.Oxy. 1202, 8; P.Gen. 74, 17; P.Theod. 17, 12) and we may also translate it as "is coming."⁵¹ Since the verb is in the perfect indicative, it means an extreme closeness, immediate imminence (J. Schlosser), even a presence ("It is here"), because the moment of this coming is at the actual beginning of the ministry of Jesus. The reign of God has thus indeed come at this point. This is confirmed by Luke 11:20; Matt 12:28, where the Lord concludes, "If I cast out demons by the finger of God, then the reign of God has come" (ephthasen). The verb phthano, which means "come before, precede" in classical Greek (cf. again 1Thess 4:15), in the Koine has the sense "arrive, come upon";⁵² here, given the aorist tense and the context, it can mean only the actualization of a past fact whose consequences may be observed; “it expresses not proximity, however great, but effective contact, a presence that has become a reality,”⁵³ or better, a continued present. This curious link between coming, being close, and being present occurs in John 4:23; 5:25—“The hour is coming and now is.”⁵⁴ Finally, the basileia entos hymon estin (Luke 17:20-21), which can be taken either as “among you, in your midst,” meaning that the reign of God is present in Israel; or “in you,” meaning in each person who acts spiritually.⁵⁵

In any event, the reign is progressive and dynamic, like seed sown and growing on its own (Mark 4:26), or a mustard seed that becomes a large tree (Mark 4:30-32; Matt 13:31-32; Luke 13:18-19), or again leavening whose action is mysterious and independent of human action (Matt 13:33). It is given⁵⁶ as a demonstration of the Father’s love (eudokesen); and Jesus’ disciples are taught to pray that this reign, already inaugurated by him, might “come” to its full, universal blossoming;⁵⁷ it then becomes the kingdom of God on earth, a place that one enters to take possession of it (eiserchesthai, Matt 5:20; 7:21; 18:3; 19:23; 23:13). It is prepared from the creation (25:34), people are called to it (22:10), as to a wedding feast.⁵⁸

It is each person’s responsibility to respond to the invitation, to prepare, like the wise virgins (Matt 25:1-13); for “not everyone who says ‘Lord, Lord’ will enter into the kingdom of heaven” (Matt 7:21; Luke 6:46). A person does not enter the kingdom, does not receive the gospel, without having a little child’s qualities of openness and receptivity,⁵⁹ without being poor in spirit, that is, aware of one’s poverty.⁶⁰ These requirements are otherwise expressed as not looking back (Luke 9:62), as renunciation (Mark 9:43-47; Luke 18:29)—just as a person sells everything in order to purchase a pearl or gain possession of a treasure (Matt 13:44-46)—as becoming a eunuch if need be,⁶¹ as doing oneself violence and forcing one’s way (Luke 16:16; Matt 11:12-13). In essence, this amounts to being converted and believing (Mark 1:15), possessing a higher righteousness than that of the Pharisees (Matt 5:20; 6:25-33), that is, practicing brotherly love (Matt 18:23-25; cf. Jas 2:5) and being born from above (John 3:3, 5). In a word, it is not enough to wait expectantly for the reign or the kingdom; a total giving of oneself to the divine sovereign is required.

As a wheat field also has tares, so the kingdom of God on earth is composed of good and bad persons (Matt 13:24-30, 36-43, 47-50) and there is a hierarchy in its membership. Because of the excellence of the new dispensation, “the one who is least in the kingdom of God is greater than John the Baptist” (Luke 7:28; Matt 11:11). Publicans and prostitutes precede, enter ahead of (proagousin) the heirs of the old covenant.⁶² There are the small and the great (Matt 5:19-20). The keys of the kingdom are entrusted to Peter (Matt 16:17), the apostles are taught the mysteries of the *basileia*⁶³ that they must proclaim to all the world (Matt 10:6-8; 24:14), but the scribes and Pharisees shut up the way into these mysteries (Luke 11:52; Matt 23:13).

This reign of God, this kingdom of Christ, a place of blessedness (Luke^o4:15), is also eschatological and will have no end (Luke 1:33), is an unshakable kingdom (Heb 12:28), paradise (Luke 23:42), or heavenly glory (Matt 20:21; Mark 10:37). Inaugurated by the resurrection of Jesus, this life in the kingdom is comparable to an eternal banquet where guests beyond number from East and West (Matt 13:11) celebrate at Christ's table.⁶⁴

According to Acts 1:3 (cf. 1:6) Jesus discussed the reign of God with his apostles between the resurrection and the ascension, and this kingdom is also the theme of Philip's preaching (8:12) and of Paul's (19:8; 20:25; 28:23, 31). The latter points out that "it is through many tribulations that we must enter the kingdom of God." His epistles add nothing to the Synoptic theology, but they insist forcefully on the holiness of the members of the basileia, which cannot be inherited by the unjust.⁶⁵ A person must be worthy of this reward (2Thess 1:5), even though it is absolutely certain (2Pet 1:11). The emphasis is on the eschatological royalty of Christ (1Cor 15:24-25; 1Tim 4:1) as well as on the power of the reign of God.⁶⁶ Hence the acclamations in Revelation. Not only is Christ the "ruler of the kings of the earth" (Rev 1:5), and not only is he thanked for becoming king (11:17), but "he has made of us a kingdom, priests for God his Father" (1:6; 5:10), and his own "will reign as kings forever" (22:5; cf. 1:9). "The reign of our Lord and of his Christ has been established over the world, and he will reign forever and ever."⁶⁷

Basileuo, basileios. — The verb basileuo, "be king, reign" (Matt 2:22) has no special meaning in the NT, but it can have the nuance "become king, begin to reign"⁶⁸ and is used especially for Christ (Luke 1:33; 14:14, 27) and his victorious domination over his enemies (1Cor 15:25); for God (Rev 11:15); and for Christians (Rev 5:10; 20:4, 6).

As an adjective in the singular, basileios describes the "royal priesthood,"⁶⁹ but used as a substantive in the plural, it refers to a royal palace (Luke 7:25), beginning in Herodotus: Croesus lodges Solon en toisi basileioisi.⁷⁰ The adjective basilikos, much commoner in secular Greek, is applied to an official in the court of Antipas. The description "royal officer" (John 4:46, 49; D and several manuscripts have basiliskos) suggests that this is a ranking dignitary (cf. Plutarch, Sol. 27.3; Josephus, Life 149), as the Old Latin and the Vulgate interpret it (regulus, a king of a small country or person of royal blood). In Acts 12:20—"the land drew its subsistence from the king's land" (apo tes basilikes). An interesting usage is in Jas 2:8, which describes the precept concerning loving one's neighbor as the "royal law"; Jesus had called this the "great commandment" (entole megale, Matt 22:36). The expression is already used in Xenophon, Oec. 14.7 (basilikoi nomoi = laws enacted by the king) and Ps.-Plato, Min. 317 (nomos esti basilikos = all that is correct is royal law, i.e., is worthy of a statesman),⁷¹

but Philo is the one who gives it its theological elaboration: “the king is a living law” (ton basilea nomon empsychon, Moses 2.4); “piety is the queen of virtues” (te basilidi ton areton, Spec. Laws 4.147); “the sky is the king of the sensible realm . . . astronomy is the queen of the sciences” (Prelim. Stud. 50); the “royal road” is the way of perfection, of the word of God (Post. Cain 101–102; Giants 64; Unchang. God 144–145; 159–160; cf. Num 20:17), leading to the truth (Migr. Abr. 146). Consequently, if basilike refers to all that comes from the king (Josephus, Ant. 9.25), belongs to him, and concerns him (Philo, Flight 95, 100, 103; Dreams 1.163; Moses 2.99), then the “royal law” in Jas 2:8 will mean a precept enunciated by God (Josephus, Ant. 11.130) and imposing an absolute obligation. But we might also interpret it as prescribing the highest virtue, agape, the queen of all the others, or even as being addressed to the members, the heirs, of the kingdom of God.⁷² Finally, we cannot rule out a connotation of excellence;⁷³ “royal,” a synonym of “august,” is an excellent description of the king of commandments!

¹ The king is called “offspring of Zeus” (διογενής), Il. 1.279; 2.196, 205; 9.98–99. Cf. W. Westrup, “Le Roi de l’Odyssée,” in Mélanges Fournier, Paris, 1929, pp. 767–786; E. Janssens, “Royauté mycénienne et olympienne,” in Le Pouvoir et le sacré, Brussels, 1962, pp. 87–102. Cf. E. Peruzzi, “L’Origine minoenne du mot βασιλεύς,” in Onomastica, 1948, pp. 48–74; Actes du Colloque international sur l’Idéologie monarchique dans l’Antiquité: Cracovie-Mogilany, du 23 au 26 octobre 1967, Warsaw-Krakow, 1980.

² Cf. J. Bielawsky, M. Plezia, Lettre d’Aristote à Alexandre sur la politique envers les cités, Wrocław, 1970, pp. 67–70; R. Monier, G. Cardascia, J. Imbert, Histoire des institutions et des faits sociaux, Paris, 1955; J. Gaudemet, Institutions de l’antiquité, Paris, 1967.

³ Joseph 2: “The one who has learned the shepherd’s art well can be an excellent king, because he has been trained to guide the noblest flock of living beings, namely humans, on a subject matter worthy of less zeal”; Moses 1.60–61: “Moses, after he was married, led flocks out to pasture, thus also carrying out an apprenticeship in government, because the care of flocks is a preparatory exercise for the monarchy.... So kings are called ‘shepherds of flocks’ . . . a sublime honor”; Husbandry 41–48; Sacr. Abel and Cain 49–51; To Gaius 44: Caligula “like a shepherd has charge of a flock.” Cf. A. Dupont-Sommer, “Le Psaume 151,” in Sem, vol. 14, 1961, pp. 45ff. P. Bogaert, Apocalypse syr. de Baruch, Paris, 1969, vol. 2, p. 153; O. Betz, “Die Frage nach dem messianischen Bewußtsein Jesu,” in NovT, 1963, p. 39, n. 1; W. Tooley, “The Shepherd and Sheep Image in the Teaching of Jesus,” ibid., 1964, pp. 15–25; L. Sabourin, Les Noms et les titres de Jésus, Bruges-Paris, 1963, pp. 71ff.; A. J. Simonis, Die Hirtenrede im Johannes-Evangelium, Rome, 1967; F. Martin, “The Image of Shepherd in the Gospel of Saint Matthew,” in ScEs, 1975, pp. 261–301; C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 3, pp. 235ff. J. Dauvillier, Les Temps apostoliques, Paris, 1970, pp. 147ff. — God is “shepherd and king” (Philo, Husbandry 49–54; R. Le Déaut, Nuit Pascale, p. 100, n. 84).

⁴ Code of Hammurabi, col. 1.50–51; 24.42–43: “I am the shepherd who brings salvation . . . I have held the peoples of Sumer and Akkad in my bosom”; 24.49–52.

⁵ M. J. Seux, Epithètes royales akkadiennes et sumériennes, Paris, 1967, pp. 244ff., 441ff. D. Müller, “Der Gute Hirte,” in Zeitschrift für ägyptische Sprache und Altertumskunde, 1961, pp. 126ff.

⁶ βασιλεύς (J.-L. Perpillou, Les Substantifs grecs en -εύς, Paris, 1973, n. 3.15.49). According to Apollonius Rhodius, Argon. 3.1089, “Deucalion was the first to be king over men,” but cf. Plutarch, Dem. 10.3: “The Athenians were the first of all men to confer on Demetrius and Antigonus the title of king, but they had scruples about accepting, because of all the royal titles that the descendants of Alexander and Philip seemed to possess, this was the only one that remained inaccessible and incapable of being passed on to others”; cf. 18.1–7; A. Aymard, “L’Usage du titre royal dans la Grèce classique et hellénistique,” in RHDFE, 1949, pp. 579–590; C. Préaux, Le Monde hellénistique, Paris, 1978, pp. 181–294; the articles of R. Turcan, J. C. Richard, D. Fishwick, in ANRW, vol. 16, 2.

⁷ I.Asok.

⁸ The Letter of Aristeas draws inspiration from Stoic ideology (D. Mendels, “‘On Kingship’ in the ‘Temple Scroll’ and the Ideological Vorlage of the Seven Banquets in the ‘Letter of Aristeas to Philocrates,’” in Aeg, 1979, pp. 127–136); cf. Plutarch, Ad princ. iner.; Aelius Aristides, Orat. 9; Synesius, De Regno, an address by the bishop of Ptolemais to Emperor Arcadius (C. Lacombrade, Le Discours sur la royauté de Synésios de Cyrène, Paris, 1951). Cf. L. François, “Julien et Dion Chrysostome: Les Περὶ βασιλείας et le second panégyrique de Constance,” in REG, 1915, pp. 467ff. V. Vademberg, “La Théorie monarchique de Dion Chrysostome,” REG, 1927, pp. 142ff. E. Goodenough, “The Political Philosophy of Hellenistic Kingship,” in YCS, vol. 1, 1928, pp. 65ff.

⁹ Flor., vol. 4, chapters 6–7, pp. 238–295. Cf. L. Delatte, Les Traités de la royauté d’Ecphante, Diotogène et Sthénidas, Paris, 1942. Demetrius of Alexandria (275–194 BC) wrote a work on the kings of Judah (cf. C. Müller, Fragmenta Historicorum Graecorum, vol. 3, 214, 224; B. Z. Wacholder, “Biblical Chronology in the Hellenistic World Chronicles,” in HTR, 1968, pp. 451–481). Musonius states that kings must philosophize (frag. 8), i.e., in the language of the period, must be both virtuous and intelligent.

¹⁰ BGU 1764, 8: the tyche of the god and lord king; 1767, 1; 1768, 9; 1789; 1834, 7; 1845, 6; P.Dura 18, 1, 12, 13: an act of donation “under the reign of the king of kings Arsaces, the beneficent, the just, a manifest god and friend of the Greeks”; 19, 1; 20, 1; 22, 1–2; P.Oxy. 2478, 1: τοῦ θειοτάτου; SB 10697, 7: τοῦ θιοτάτου βασιλέως ἡμῶ—ν; H. Engelmann, I.Ephes., IV, 1333, 12. Chronology is a function of the royal reign (P.Hib. 198, 199, 201, 202, 205, 209, etc.; P.Lond. 1912, 59, 67; 1913, 4; 1914, 30; P.Mil. 29, 2, 8, 14). A. Aymard, “Le Protocole royal et son évolution,” in REA, 1948, pp. 232–263.

¹¹ At Lebadaia; cf. NCIG, n. 22, A 30.

¹² Apollonius is “a benefactor who has been honored by the friendship of kings” (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. VI, 25); “Diazelmis, honored by kings” (ibid. X, 15). Cf. “Alexander, king of Macedonia, begotten by Ammon” (LXXI, 27); “There is only one Caesar, one great emperor, only one master, only one sovereign (εἷς βασιλεύς)” (LXXI, 27); “Mandoulis, sovereign over all” (CLXVI, 18); “the lion, the king of the animals” (CXXX, 5).

¹³ P.Genova 54, 6; C.Ord.Ptol. 1, 1; 2, 6; 5, 1; 6, 1; 8, 1; 11, 1; etc. BGU 1730, 1. King Antigonus entrusts to Epinicus the guard of the citadel of Rhamnus (J. Pouilloux, Choix, XIX, 5–6). The councillors of king Eumenes II of Pergamum send him a copy of the decree inscribed on the base of his statue (ibid. XI, 22). Taxes are paid to the king (P.Mich. 200, recto 27). Cf. C. B. Welles, Royal Correspondence.

¹⁴ According to Diodorus Siculus 17.52, he received more than six thousand talents from Alexandria; cf. Appian, Praef. 10.

¹⁵ NCIG, VII, col. I, 4, 9, 14. He gives tax exemptions (ibid. col. II, 2); he provides for defense against enemies (ibid. VI, 16, 17, 46); founds many institutions; grants proxenia (E. Bernand, Philae, n. 128, 17, etc.). An archon-king, assisted by four epimeleteis, supervises the celebration of the mysteries (Aristotle, Ath. Pol. 57.1). An eponymous official can be called basileus (Dittenberger, Syl. 57, 22; 1011, 13; 1037, 6; I.Chalced. 7, 1; 19, 2; L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 2, Paris, 1946, pp. 51, 53, 63; vol. 8, pp. 76–77). At Miletus, a college of basileis worked with the treasurer to sell priesthoods (NCIG, VII, col. III, 16); at Chios, it protects the property around the sanctuary (Dittenberger, Syl. 986, 8).

¹⁶ E. Bernand, Fayoum, n. 1, 2, 3, 4, 83, 84.

¹⁷ P.Berl.Zill. I, 38, 57, 64; BGU 1730; 1735, 3; 1736, 3; 1738, 4; 1739, 3; P.Tebt. 43, 1; 78, 13; 86, 39; 106, 3; 124, 1; P.Köln 81, 3, 9, 12; SB 6668, 2; 7172, 32; 7783, 1; 7879, 3; SEG XXVII, 1206. Basilissa describes the sister of King Ptolemy II, hence a nonreigning member of the royal family (Dittenberger, Or. 35, 1; third century BC).

¹⁸ L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 7, Paris, 1949, pp. 7–29.

¹⁹ P.Sorb. 14 a 1; 17 a 1; 21, 1, 10; 32, 1; P.Köln 50, 17; 51, 1; 81, 1; P.Corn. 2, 1; P.Dura 18, 1; 19, 1; 20, 1; 22, 1; 24, 1; P.Mert. 6, 3; P.Mich. 190, 1; P.Oslo 16, 1; PSI 1016, 16; 1018, 5; 1822, 9; 1824, 1; 1825, 9; SB 10859, 1; 11053, 1; 11054; MAMA VI, 154, 1; CII, n. 683, 1; 690, 2–3; 691, 1. Cf. Stud.Pal. V, 125, col. II, 3: ε—πὶ μὲν διατρίβοντός σου ε—πὶ τῆς βασιλευούσης Ῥώμης; PSI 965, 4 (cf. Rev 18:7).

²⁰ IGUR, n. 182. In this sense, an agraphon of an utterance of Jesus: “surprised, he will reign, and having gotten the royal power, he will rest” (θαμβηθεὶς βασιλεύσει καὶ βασιλεύσας ἀναπαήσεται, P.Oxy. 654, 8); this logion derives from Gos. Thom. 3: “He who seeks must not stop seeking until he finds; and when he finds, he will be bewildered; and if he is bewildered, he will marvel, and will be king over the All”; cf. R. Kasser, L’Evangile selon Thomas, Neuchâtel, 1961, pp. 29ff.

²¹ “Let none of the subjects of the kingdom be subjected to annoyances contrary to the order” (C.Ord.Ptol. 45, 8; cf. 53, 3). Decree of Antiochus III: “Let high priests be appointed for us throughout the whole empire” (κατὰ βασιλείαν, J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. XXX, 21).

²² P.Panop.Beatty 1, 132, 396; P.Oxy. 1257, 7; SB 7634, 31; 8699, 3. Beginning with the fifth century, basileia is usually used for chronological notes: βασιλείας τοῦ εὐσεβεστάτου ἡμῶ—ν δεσπότης Φλαουίου Ἡρακλείου (P.Alex. 35, 2; 37, 2; P.Mich. 607, 1; P.Warr. 10, 2; P.Ant. 42, 1; BGU 1764, 5; P.Athen. 40, 3; P.Berl.Zill. 7, 1; P.Erl. 73, 4; 87, 2; C.P.Herm. 65, 2; P.Princ. 87, 3; P.Stras. 190, 2; 247, 1; 328, 2; 484, 3; SB 6271, 2; etc.). In the Rosetta Stone (Dittenberger, Or. 90, 43) the basileiai are crowns or ornaments: “let the lavatory be crowned with ten headdresses of the king’s gold” (τὰς τοὺς βασιλέως χρυσα—ς βασιλείας δέκα, cf. Diodorus Siculus 1.48).

²³ At Lebadaia, εἰς τὰ βασιλεία refers to a Boeotian athletic meet: “the report of the taxiarchoi sent to the βασιλεία concerning the sacrifice that they offered” (NCIG, n. II, 10), a feast in honor of Zeus Basileus in memory of the victory of Leuctra in 371 (cf. M. Holleaux, Etudes d'épigraphie, vol. 1, pp. 131–142); n. XXII a 20: “Xenarchus . . . agonothetes of the basileia”; c 47: “the judges of admission to the basileia”; cf. SEG XXVII, 1114. But Isis is “queen of the gods” (E. Bernard, Fayoum, n. 175, col. I, 1; II, 12).

²⁴ SB 8246, 48; 8299, 45; 10453, 3: βασιλείω διοικητῆ; it refers to a type of fig in P.Fouad 77, 17 and a royal residence at Philadelphia (P.Lond. 1974, 9: ε—ν τοι—ς βασιλείοις; cf. P.Cair.Zen. 59664, 1–2: καὶνὰ βασιλει—α), the palace of the satrap Saitaphernes (Dittenberger, Syl. 495, 45), the scepter (P.Lond. 46, 448; vol. 1, p. 79).

²⁵ CIG III, 4860; P.Athen. 44, 5; P.Berl.Zill. 1, 37; 2, 20; P.Brem. 36, 6; P.Yale 53, 9; P.Köln 137, 33; P.Mich. 555, 6, 8, 13; 557, 7; 564, 9; P.Mert. 5, 22, 25, 27; 11, 7; P.Aberd. 49, 4; 50, 5; P.Got. 2, 5; P.Phil. 1, 38; 15, 9; P.Oxy. 2410, 10; 3205, 13; P.Lond. 2188, 209, 335; P.NYU 20, 9, 10, 16; 21, 19; SB 10880, 7; 10881, 8; 10891, col. I, 13, etc. Cf. C. Préaux, Economie royale, p. 68.

²⁶ P.Yale 53, 4; P.Tebt. 786, 3–4; 788, 21 (C. Préaux, Economie royale, pp. 438, 553). Cf. γεωργία βασιλική, P.Oxy. 2134, 23; 2722, 32; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XVI, 9, 25; SB 11233, 44.

²⁷ Cf. βασιλικὸς ἔλαιον, Papyrus 23, 28 (in Notices et extraits des manuscrits de la Bibliothèque impériale, Paris, 1865, XVIII, p. 269); C. Préaux, Economie royale, p. 76. Royal lodgings (C.Ord.Ptol. 1, 4), royal public sales (22, 15), “sacred and royal affairs” (SEG I, 363, 33); arrangements (βασιλικά διατάξεις, SB 10797, 4).

²⁸ Cf. a royal favor, κατὰ χάριν βασιλικήν (IGUR, n. 240, 14).

²⁹ P.Laur. 66, 2; 63, 1; P.Köln 86, 2; 94, 15; BGU 1626, 8; P.Oxy. 1219, 15; 2409, 6; P.Mich. 526, 1; P.Bon. 12 g verso 2; P.Brem. 2, 9; 28, 23; 41, 26; P.Phil. 6, 1; 8, 3; P.Sorb. 43, 2; P.Mur. 117, 11; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XVI, 18, 2; 36, 2; P.Oxy. 5 a 12. A. Bernard, Philae, n. 19, 24; cf. P.Vindob.Worp, p. 19.

³⁰ A. Deissmann (Light, p. 362, n. 5) cites a law from Pergamum on the astynomia: τὸν βασιλικὸν νόμον ε—κ τω—ν ι—δίωιν ἀνέθηκεν.

³¹ P.Giss., col. III, 18; Dittenberger, Syl. 577, 17 (C. Préaux, Economie royale, pp. 280ff.; R. Bogaert, Banques et banquiers, pp. 39, 89–90); cf. the “Royal Street” (ῥύμη βασιλική, P.Lond. 2191, 44).

³² IGUR, n. 166, 4. Cf. E. Bernand, Fayoum, n. 71, 17: βασιλικὴν τιμὴν, “royal dignity.”

³³ M. J. Lagrange, “Le Règne de Dieu dans l’Ancien Testament,” in RB, 1908, pp. 36–51; P. Haupt, “The Hebrew Word melek: Counsel,” in JBL, 1915, pp. 54ff. J. Bonsirven, Le Règne de Dieu, Paris, 1957, pp. 11ff. R. Schnackenburg, God’s Rule; J. Coppens, “Règne de Dieu: Ancien Testament,” in DBSup, vol. 10, col. 1–58. J. Carmignac, Le Mirage de l’eschatologie, Paris, 1979, pp. 13ff. (gives the bibliography). Maljût is the reign, mamlajâh the kingdom, melûjah the monarchy but also the kingdom and sometimes the reign. Likewise, the Greek βασιλεία sometimes means royalty (the dignity of the king; cf. Josephus, War 1.19, 74), sometimes the exercise of royal power (reign; cf. War 1.70, 72), and even the land or people over whom the king’s authority is exercised, i.e., the kingdom. See also E. LipiĚski, La Royauté de Yahwé dans la poésie et le culte de l’ancien Israël, Brussels, 1965.

³⁴ Exod 15:18; cf. Ps 22:23; 99:1, 4; Mal 1:14—“I am a great king, says Yahweh of Hosts.” The bibliography is immense; apart from the works already cited, see especially O. Eissfeldt, Jahwe als König, in ZAW, 1928, pp. 81–105; H. J. Kraus, Die Königsherrschaft Gottes im A. T., Tübingen, 1951; E. LipiĚski, “Yahweh mâlak,” in Bib, 1963, pp. 405–460; idem, La Royauté de Yahwé, Brussels, 1965; G. von Rad, OT Theology, pp. 291ff. F. Beisser, Das Reich Gottes, Göttingen, 1976; B. D. Chilton, “Regnum Dei Deus Est,” in SJT, 1978, pp. 261–270; J. Gray, The Biblical Doctrine of the Reign of God, Edinburgh, 1979.

³⁵ Num 23:21; Deut 33:5. Cf. P. Biard, La Puissance de Dieu, Paris, 1960; C. H. Powell, The Biblical Concept of Power, London, 1963.

³⁶ Isa 24:23; 33:22; 41:21; 43:15; 44:6; Zech 14:9, 16; Ps 149:2; cf. “your God reigns” (Isa 52:7; Obad 21).

³⁷ Exod 15:18; Isa 41:21; Ps 10:16; 29:10; 145:12–13; 146:10; 2Kgs 19:15; 2Chr 20:6; Add Esth 14:12; Jer 10:10; Wis 3:7; Dan 2:44; 7:14; 2Macc 3:24; 7:9; 12:15.

³⁸ Dan 4:34; Tob 1:18 (a); 13:6, 11; Isa 6:5—“my eyes have seen the King, Yahweh of Hosts”; 44:6; 52:7.

³⁹ 2Macc 7:9; Prov 9:6 (LXX). Cf. J. Coppens, La Relève apocalyptique du Messianisme royal: I. La Royauté, le Règne, le Royaume de Dieu cadre de la relève apocalyptique, Louvain, 1979; J. Gray, The Biblical Doctrine of the Reign of God, pp. 182ff., 225ff.

⁴⁰ 1Sam 9:1-10:16; 11:1-11, 15; 13:14. (R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel, vol. 1, pp. 94ff. P. Gibert, La Bible à la naissance de l'histoire: Au temps de Saül, David et Salomon, Paris, 1979). If Nathan's prophecy gives sacral legitimacy to the throne of David (H. van den Bussche, "Le Texte de la prophétie de Nathan sur la dynastie davadique," in ETL, 1948, pp. 354–394), the institution of the monarchy was still in an embryonic stage in Saul's time (melej, 1Sam 11:15); Saul was hardly more than the chief of a clan, having no defined territory, although he had a "king's rights" (1Sam 8:11-17; his rights were put in writing, 10:25).

⁴¹ J. de Fraine, L'Aspect religieux de la Royauté israélite, Rome, 1954; E. Jacob, Theology of the Old Testament, trans. A. W. Heathcote and P. J. Allcock, New York, 1958, pp. 234–239; G. von Rad, OT Theology, vol. 1, pp. 38ff. Cf. R. Labat, Le Caractère religieux de la Royauté assyro-babylonienne, Paris, 1939. N. D. Mettinger, The Civil and Sacral Legitimation of the Israelite Kings, Lund, 1976.

⁴² Once anointed, the king is called "son of God" (2Sam 7:14; Ps 2:7), adopted by Yahweh (cf. G. von Rad, OT Theology, vol. 1, pp. 320ff., vol. 2, pp. 169ff., 312ff.). This unction establishes a special relationship between the king and God, a participation of the king in the holiness of the one whose Spirit he has received (1Sam 10:10); thus the king becomes inviolable (1Sam 24:7, 11; 26:9, 11, 16, 23; 2Sam 1:14-16; 19:22). So it could be said that this unction, which confers a grace, is a sacrament that establishes the king of Israel as God's vassal (R. de Vaux, "Le Roi d'Israël, vassal de Iahvé," in Mélanges Tisserant, vol. 1, pp. 119–133). The anointing becomes a characteristic of the messianic King (Jer 23:5; Ezek 37:25; Zech 9:9ff.), "Servant" of God par excellence, or Son of Man (Dan 7:13), causing the rights of Yahweh to triumph on earth, bringing peace through his reign (Isa 7:10-17; 11:1-8; 42:1-4; 49:1-6; 50:4-11; 52:13-53:12; Mic 5:1; Ps 72:12-14). To express the extent to which "Yahweh's anointing" is a source of life, Lam 4:20 calls it "the breath of our nostrils"!

⁴³ Isa 52:7; 40:9; Zech 9:9; cf. 2Sam 15:10; 2Kgs 9:13.

⁴⁴ Matt 17:25; Acts 4:26; 9:15; Rev 1:5; 6:15; 17:2; such as Pharaoh, king of Egypt (Acts 7:10) and Aretas (2Cor 11:32); cf. Rev 16:14—"the kings of the whole world." The basilissa of Sheba or of the South (Matt 12:42; Luke 11:31), the Candace (= “queen”) of Ethiopia (Acts 8:27). Babylon: “I am seated as queen” (Rev 18:7).

⁴⁵ Luke 22:25; Rev 17:12. As administrators (Matt 18:23; cf. R. Sugranyes de Franch, Etudes sur le droit palestinien à l’époque évangélique, Fribourg, 1946), kings execute justice (Matt 10:18; Mark 13:9; Luke 21:12), collect taxes (Matt 17:25), wage war (Luke 14:31), and live in luxury (Matt 11:8; 22:2, 7, 11, 13). The holy kings of Israel, like David (Matt 1:6; Acts 13:22), are linked with the prophets in their messianic hope (Luke 10:24).

⁴⁶ 1Tim 2:1-2: “Let supplication be made . . . for kings.” These basileis are all territorial rulers, whether of lands, towns, large cities, or kingdoms (cf. C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, vol. 1, p. 359) and can include the emperor (inscriptions from Argos and Ephesus, cf. J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1951, n. 32, 65; 1952, n. 137; GVI, n. 514; L. Biehl, Das liturgische Gebet für Kaiser und Reich, Paderborn, 1937). Acts 8:27 uses Candace as a proper name for the basilisse of the Ethiopians, but it is actually a title of the Ethiopian sovereigns (ka[n]take or ka[n]dakit), like Pharaoh in Egypt. This queen might be the same as the one who reigned at Meroë under Nero (Pliny, HN 6.186). In a lease from Olymos, there is a βασιλεὺς τοῦ κοινοῦ τῶ—ν Καρῶ—ν, king of the Carian confederation (L. Robert, Etudes anatoliennes, p. 571, n. 2); the city of Istros is under the protection of the basileus Rhemaxus (D. M. Pippidi, Scythica Minora, Budapest-Amsterdam, 1975, pp. 33, 124, 153, 169, 175, 197). Cf. the kings of Thrace (Dittenberger, Syl. 762, 22–25), Amyntas king of Lycaonia and Galatia (Plutarch, Ant. 61.1–2), Mithridates king of Pontus (REG, 1936, pp. 17–37; cf. Plutarch, Ant. 38.3), Pharnaces king of the Bosphorus (CIRB, n. 28), Burebistas king of Dacia (Strabo 7.3.11; cf. 7.5.2), Voccio king of Norica (Caesar, BGall. 1.53.4; BCiv. 1.18.5), the Celtic kings Balanos and Catmelus (Livy 44.14.1; cf. 41.1.8; 43.5; cf. P. W. A. Immink, “Gouvernés et gouvernants dans la société germanique,” in Gouvernés et gouvernants, Recueils J. Bodin, vol. 23, Brussels, 1968, pp. 365ff.). J. Dobias, “King Marobodius as a Politician,” in Klio, 1959, pp. 155–166. In Spain, cf. R. Etienne, Le Culte impérial dans la Péninsule Ibérique d’Auguste à Dioclétien, Paris, 1958, pp. 51ff., 75ff., 88, etc. In the inscriptions, cf. J. Marcillet-Jaubert, A. M. Vérilhac, Index du Bulletin Epigraphique de J. et L. Robert, 1966–1973, Paris, 1979, p. 39.

⁴⁷ 1Tim 1:17 (cf. Tob 13:7; Sir 36:17; C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, vol. 1, p. 346). Jerusalem is “the city of the Great King” (Ps 47:3). Cf. P. Brunner, “Elemente einer dogmatischen Lehre von Gottes Basileia,” in Die Zeit Jesu: Festschrift H. Schlier, Freiburg, 1970, pp. 228, 256.

⁴⁸ 1Tim 6:15; Rev 15:3—Almighty God is “King of the nations.” On the other hand, the grasshoppers (images of demons) have over them as their king the Angel of the Pit (Rev 9:11).

⁴⁹ John 18:36; cf. verses 33, 37; 19:12, 14: “Behold your king”; verse 15: “Shall I crucify your king?” (J. Blank, “Die Verhandlung vor Pilatus Joh. XVIII, 28–XIX, 16 im Lichte johan. Theologie,” in BZ, 1959, pp. 60–81; A. George, “La Royauté de Jésus selon l’Evangile de saint Luc,” in Sciences Ecclésiastiques, 1962, pp. 57–70; J. Bosc, L’Office royal du Seigneur Jésus-Christ, Geneva, 1957). This proclamation of royalty was official and would be inscribed as the titulus on the cross (Matt 27:37; Mark 15:2, 9, 12, 18, 26; Luke 23:3, 37–38; John 18:39; 19:3, 15, 19, 21); the soldiers make mockery of it (Matt 27:29), and at Calvary the high priests ridicule it: “He is the king of Israel!” (Matt 27:42; Mark 15:32).

⁵⁰ This basileia basically refers to God’s rights as sovereign over his creatures. The formula “kingdom of heaven” does not mean a kingdom that is in heaven but results from Jewish scruples about uttering the divine name (cf. Dan 4:23; 1Macc 3:18–19; Luke 15:18, 21; Str-B, vol. 1, pp. 172–184). J. Carmignac and R. Schnackenburg give the bibliography; especially worth mention are H. Schlier, “Reich Gottes und Kirche,” in Studia Catholica, Nijmegen, 1957, pp. 178–189; F. C. Grant, “The Idea of the Kingdom of God in the New Testament,” in The Sacral Kingship (Supplements to Numen, vol. 4), Leiden, 1959, pp. 437–446; W. Dantine, “Regnum Christi—Gubernatio Dei,” in TZ, 1959, pp. 195–208; S. Aalen, “‘Reign’ and ‘House’ in the Kingdom of God in the Gospels,” in NTS, vol. 8, 1961, pp. 215–240; G. Lundström, The Kingdom of God in the Teaching of Jesus, Richmond, 1963; N. Perrin, The Kingdom of God in the Teaching of Jesus, London, 1963; H. Merklein, Die Gottesherrschaft als Handlungsprinzip: Untersuchungen zur Ethik Jesu; Würzburg, 1978; B. D. Chilton, God in Strength: Jesus’s Announcement of the Kingdom, Freistadt, 1979; K. Koch, “Offenbaren wird sich das Reich Gottes,” in NTS, vol. 25, 1979, pp. 158–165; S. Ruager, “Das Reich Gottes und die Person Jesu,” in Arbeiten zum Neuen Testament und Judentum, vol. 3, Frankfurt, 1979; Margaret Pamment, “The Kingdom of God According to the First Gospel,” in NTS, 1981, pp. 211–232; especially J. Schlosser, Le Règne dans les dits de Jésus, vols. 1–2, Paris, 1980; A. Feuillet, “Règne de Dieu, III: Evangiles synoptiques,” in DBSup, vol. 10, col. 61–165.

⁵¹ R. F. Berkey, “ε—γγίζειν, φθάνειν and Realized Eschatology,” in JBL, 1963, pp. 177–187. In the LXX, the verb ε—γγίζω sometimes translates the Hebrew naga’ or the Aramaic meta’, meaning “reach, attain to” (Jer 51:9; Jonah 3:6; Ps 32:6; 88:3; 107:18; Dan 4:11, 22), but usually it translates the Hebrew qarab in the sense “arrive” (1Kgs 8:59; Lam 4:18; Ps 118:169; 1Macc 9:10); P. Joüon, “Notes philologiques sur les Evangiles,” in RSR, 1927, pp. 537–540; C. H. Dodd, The Parables of the Kingdom, London, 1935, pp. 44ff. J. Gray, The Biblical Doctrine of the Reign of God, pp. 317ff.

⁵² LXX, Philo, T. 12 Patr., P.Oxy. 237, col. VI, 30; VII, 42; 935, 20; 1666, 3; P.Tebt. 417, 10; P.Flor. 9, 9. In NT usage, φθάνω means to come upon someone, to come at a set time (1Thess 2:16; Rom 9:31; 2Cor 10:14; Phil 3:16).

⁵³ J. Schlosser, Le Règne dans les dits de Jésus, p. 138. The actual coming is not visible, cannot be observed: οὐκ ἔρχεται ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ μετὰ παρατηρήσεως (NT hapax, Luke 17:20; cf. R. Le Déaut, Nuit Pascale, pp. 272ff.), like an astronomical phenomenon; we cannot be on the lookout for it, because it is spiritual and is not within our reach. Sometimes it is interpreted “the kingdom comes unawares,” cf. Gos. Thom. 113: “The kingdom does not come when expected.”

⁵⁴ Ἐρχεται ὥρα καὶ νῦν ἐ—στιν; John 16:32: ἔρχεται ὥρα καὶ ἐ—λήλυθεν (cf. Rom 13:11-12; 1John 2:18). This is not a Semitism, cf. Polybius 4.40.10: ἔσται δὲ καὶ περὶ τὸν Πόντον παραπλήσιον· καὶ γίνεται νῦν.

⁵⁵ Cf. A. Rüston, “ἐ—ντός ὑμῶ—ν ἐ—στίν: Zur Deutung von Lukas XVII, 20–21,” in ZNW, 1960, pp. 197–224; R. Sneed, “The Kingdom of God is Within You (Lc. XVII, 21),” in CBQ, 1962, pp. 363–382. J. Schlosser (Le Règne dans les dits de Jésus, p. 201ff.) notes that ἐ—ντός followed by the genitive can mean (1) “within, inside” in a temporal sense (a time period not to be exceeded, P.Oxy. 724, 11; 728, 18; 1278, 26) or in a local sense (inside a wall, Josephus, War 2.531, 632; 4.8, 564), inside a person (Ps 39:3; 109:22), like entrails (Josephus, Ant. 2.304; 4.80); within the reach of, in the power of (P.Oxy. 1274, 13; 2342, 1, 7, 8; P.Ross.Georg. III, 1, 8–9). Finally “in the midst of” (analogous to ἐ—ν μέσῳ), cf. Herodotus 7.100.3; Thucydides 8.5.3; Josephus, Ant. 6.315; (2) as an attribute of basileia: deep down inside (E. Delebecque, Evangile de Luc, on this text); “in you” as a reality that is imminent and already present.

⁵⁶ Luke 12:32—δοῦναι ὑμῖ—ν; Matt 21:43. W. Pesch, “Zur Formgeschichte und Exegese von Lk XII,” in Bib, 1960, pp. 25–40.

⁵⁷ Luke 11:2—ἐ—λθέτω ἡ βασιλεία σου. Manuscript D introduces this petition with ἐ—φ ἡμα—ς (“that upon us may come”), which must be a liturgical addition, since it loses the focus on the wishes on God; it breaks the symmetry with “Hallowed be thy name” and “thy will be done” (cf. J. Carmignac, Recherches sur le ‘Notre Père’, Paris, 1969, pp. 90ff.). This monarchy over souls, triumphing over hostile powers, is a coming of God

(Isa 35:4; 40:9; 66:15, 18; Zech 14:5; Mal 3:1-2), the more and more stable and universal establishing of his sovereignty; cf. J. Jeremias, Abba, pp. 151–171. — The destruction of Jerusalem, freeing Israel's gospel to bring salvation to the Gentiles, will be a triumphant coming of the reign (Matt 16:28; Mark 9:1; Luke 9:27), one of its "advents" (cf. M. Künzi, Das Naherwartungslogion Markus IX, 1 par., Tübingen, 1977).

⁵⁸ Matt 22:2ff.; 25:10ff. Cf. M. J. Lagrange, Matthieu, pp. CLff.

⁵⁹ Mark 10:14-15; Matt 19:14; Luke 18:17-17. Cf. S. Légasse, Jésus et l'enfant, Paris, 1969, pp. 187ff. J. Dupont, "Matthieu XIII, 3: ε—άν μὴ στραφῆτε καὶ γένησθε ὡς τὰ παιδιά," in Neotestamentica et Semitica: Studies in Honour of M. Black, Edinburgh, 1969, pp. 50–60; J. I. H. McDonald, "Receiving and Entering the Kingdom: A Study of Mark X, 15," in E. A. Livingstone, SE, vol. 6, Berlin, 1973, pp. 328–332.

⁶⁰ Matt 5:3; Luke 6:20. The rich have difficulty entering the kingdom because they do not feel their need of God (Mark 10:23-25; Matt 19:23-24; Luke 18:24-25).

⁶¹ Matt 19:12. Cf. "—Εἰσὶν εὐνοῦχοι," in ZNW, 1957, pp. 254–270.

⁶² Matt 21:31, 43. Cf. S. Légasse, "Jésus et les prostituées," in RTL, 1976, pp. 137–154.

⁶³ Mark 4:11; Matt 13:11; Luke 8:10. These "secrets" are those of the divine economy, of the making up of a new people, of the forgiveness of sins, of the sharing in the very life of God. These divine intentions can only be known through revelation.

⁶⁴ Mark 14:25; Matt 26:29; Luke 22:16, 18, 29, 30. Jesus, in announcing his imminent death, uses this eschatological logion to express the certainty of his triumph over death and his exaltation, perhaps also "the new paschal rite, i.e., the Church" (P. Benoit, Exégèse et théologie, p. 198). Cf. M. Rese, "Zur Problematik von Kurz- und Langtext in Luk. XXII, 17ff.," in NTS, vol. 22, 1975, pp. 15–31. On the characteristics that permit to a certain extent equating the church and the kingdom of Christ, cf. J. Bonsirven, Le Règne de Dieu, pp. 187–200; H. Schlier, "Reich Gottes und Kirche"; R. Schnackenburg, God's Rule, pp. 259–270 (urges caution); J. Gray, The Biblical Doctrine of the Reign of God, pp. 369ff.; B. Gloege, Reich Gottes und Kirche im N.T., Gütersloh, 1929.

⁶⁵ 1Cor 4:9-10; Gal 5:21; Eph 5:5; cf. Col 1:13. The kingdom is completely spiritual: God reigns in our midst through the virtues and his gifts (Rom 14:17); 1Cor 15:50, cf. J. Jeremias, “Flesh and Blood Cannot Inherit the Kingdom of God,” in NTS, vol. 2, 1956, pp. 151–159. Christ’s scepter is a scepter of righteousness (Heb 1:8). E. Cothenet, “Règne de Dieu, IV: Epîtres pauliennes,” in DBSup, vol. 10, col. 165–187.

⁶⁶ 1Cor 4:20—οὐ ἐ—ν λόγῳ . . . ἀλλ’ ἐ—ν δυνάμει: the virtues of the faithful as well as the community’s progress are present realizations of the power of God. 2Tim 4:18—God saves by bringing his faithful one into his eternal kingdom; cf. R. Deichgräber, Gotteshymnus und Christushymnus, Göttingen, 1967, p. 33.

⁶⁷ Rev 11:15; cf. 12:10. P. Prigent, “Le Temps et le Royaume dans l’Apocalypse,” in J. Lambrecht, L’Apocalypse johannique et l’Apocalyptique dans le Nouveau Testament, Gembloux-Louvain, 1980, pp. 231–245.

⁶⁸ Rev 11:17; 19:5. It is used metaphorically when it is said that sin and death reign (Rom 5:14, 17, 21; 6:12), i.e., establish their dominion, wielding power and commanding obedience. It is also used for the image of complete fulfillment. St. Paul ironically declares to the Corinthians: “Without us, you have become kings (ἐ—βασιλεύσατε, ingressive aorist); how I wish that you had really become kings, so that we might be kings with you (συμβασιλεύσωμεν)” (1Cor 4:8). The verb συμβασιλεύω is used elsewhere only in 2Tim 2:12—“If we endure, we shall also reign with him.”

⁶⁹ 1Pet 2:9 (cf. Exod 19:6, Hebrew mamlajâh); 2Macc 2:17; Philo, Spec. Laws 1.142; Abraham 56; C. Spicq, Epîtres de saint Pierre, pp. 90ff.; P. Sandevour, “Un Royaume de prêtres,” in C. Perrot, Etudes sur la première Lettre de Pierre, Paris, 1980, pp. 219–229; cf. J. H. Elliott, The Elect and the Holy, Leiden, 1966, pp. 149–154.

⁷⁰ Herodotus 1.30; Esth 1:9—Queen Vashti gave a feast in the royal house of King Ahasuerus; Philo, Flacc. 92: “the space separating the gates of the arsenal from the royal palace” (ἐ—ν τοι—ς βασιλείοις); Josephus, Ant. 13.138; cf. Deut 3:10, the royal cities = the cities of the kingdom; Wis 18:15—the royal thrones. — Beginning with Xenophon, the noun in the singular also refers to the king’s tent (Cyr. 2.4.3; 4Macc 3:8; Josephus, Ant. 6.251), and Philo gives the equation “the palace (βασίλειον) is certainly the house of the king (βασιλέος οἶκος)” (Sobr. 66), cf. Prov 18:19 (= citadel).

⁷¹ Cf. Ps.-Plato, Ep. 8.354 c: “royal power”; 2Macc 3:13—βασιλικὰς ἐ—ντολὰς = orders received from the king; A. Deissmann (Light, p. 362, n. 5) noticed this in an inscription from Pergamum: τὸν βασιλικὸν νόμον ἐ—κ τῶ—ν ἰ—δίῳ ἀνέθηκεν (a law from the royal period on astynomoi, published by Dittenberger, Or. 483, 2; cf. J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin

épigraphique,” in REG, 1952, p. 171, n. 137; 1955, p. 255, n. 188). The expression is also found in a letter of the imperial musicians to the Dionysiac technitai, under Aurelian (SB 5225, 15). Cf. M. Gigante, Νόμος βασιλεύς, Naples, 1956; M. Treu, “Νόμος βασιλεύς: alte und neue Probleme,” in RhMus, 1963, pp. 193–214; O. J. F. Seitz, “James and the Law,” in F. L. Cross, SE, vol. 2, Berlin, 1964, pp. 472–487.

⁷² Cf. J. Marty, L’Épître de Jacques, Paris, 1935, pp. 81ff. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, p. 36, n. 2; vol. 2, p. 505, n. 2. On the absence of the definite article, cf. J. B. Mayor, The Epistle of St. James, 3d ed., London, 1910, pp. 90ff.

⁷³ Cf. Jos. Asen. 5.6; 14.8 (royal scepter); 10.14, 13.2 (royal robe); 13.7 (royal dinner); Josephus, Ant. 8.356 (royal authority); 11.277 (royal honors); Ag. Apion 1.98; Philo, Cherub. 63 and Plant. 68; Virtues 216; Good Man Free 123, 126, 154 (the soul of a king contrasted with a commoner); Moses 1.153; To Gaius 54; 4Macc 14:2—reason, royal and free; Polybius 8.24; SEG 1.363.3: “sacred and royal business,” etc.

βασκαίνω

baskaino, to bewitch, cast a spell, regard enviously
see also φθόνος

baskaino, S 940; TDNT 1.594–595; EDNT 1.208; NIDNTT 2.552, 559; MM 106; L&N 53.98, 88.159; BDF §§72, 152(1); BAGD 137

Paul’s exclamation to the Galatians is not easy to translate: “O foolish Galatians! Who has bewitched you (tis hymas ebaskanen), before whose eyes Jesus Christ was portrayed crucified?”¹ An NT hapax, the verb *baskaino*² is a denominative formed from baskanos, “one who casts a spell”;³ a baskania is an evil spell,⁴ and the verb, meaning “cast a spell, wish evil, speak ill of,” “emphasizes the magical value of the group, which relates properly to an evil spell.”⁵ Hence the modern translations: “Who has bewitched you, cast a spell on you?”⁶ But doesn’t this notion of a verbal incantation overplay the metaphorical sense of the word? —for surely the sense is metaphorical here. The best approach is to take into account the actual usage of this verb, which is unknown in the papyri.

Baskaino (and related words) is constantly associated with phthoneo, “to envy” (cf. Gal 5:26). Callimachus wrote this as his own epitaph: “He sang louder songs than Envy” (Epigr. 21), and Stobaeus collected fifty-nine sayings peri phthonou, of which the fifty-second goes “They were exceeding baskanos and phthoneros.”⁷ In the LXX, in times of famine, “a man will have an evil eye toward (that is, will look askance at, will envy, sphodra baskanej, Hebrew ra'a') his brother, the wife of his bosom, his children" (Deut 28:54), and even his wife will jealously spy on her husband and her children (28:56). Moreover, if the miser does not profit from his property, the envious person never has enough and is consumed with the desire to have more, "is grudging to himself" (Sir 14:6). In his insatiability, he commits the grossest injustices to increase his wealth: "The person with the jealous eye is evil" (poneros ho baskainon ophthalmo, Sir 14:8). This same psychology is evoked by Philo: adversaries, who ought naturally to be jealous of the conqueror, feel no envy toward him" (baskainein, me phthoneisthai, Husbandry 112); "he always looks at happy people with an evil eye (baskainon)."⁸ This is also in the vocabulary of Josephus: "Daniel was envied (ephthonethe) because people are jealous (baskainousi) of those who are more honored than they themselves by the king" (Ant. 10.250; 257); "people made jealous by my fortune invented accusations against me" (Life 425); "to remove from those envious of us the last pretext for chicanery" (Ag. Apion 1.72). This meaning of baskaino, "look at with an evil eye, be envious of," fits with Demosthenes, C. Lept. 20.24: "If the possessor of a great fortune did not acquire it at your expense, then there is no room for regarding him with hostility (baskainein)."

This envious regard is often considered harmful and injurious; it is described as "the evil eye"⁹ and is connected with the magical notion of the casting of an evil spell: "I do not wish to seem to cast an evil spell on (baskainein en) the general prosperity" (Lucian, Nav. 17; cf. Philops. 35). A lead bracelet bears the inscription "Spell-caster begone" (exo baskanos);¹⁰ "May Envy and the Evil Eye be far from this happy art."¹¹ The influence of this oculus invidiosus, the symbol of baskania, was even attributed to demons, for example, to the she-devil Baskosyne.¹² Plutarch, in Quaestionum convivialum,¹³ tries to explain how "a look can do harm, even though the causal link is difficult to grasp" (680 f); he uses the terms "effluence," "emanation," "current," "fascination."¹⁴ Heliodorus draws on this: in the course of a procession, Charicleia "attracted the evil eye (ophthalmon tina baskanon). 'You also, like the rabble, believe in the bewitching power of the eyes (baskanian).' 'Yes; I say nothing is more real'" (Aeth. 3.7.2); "the sickness comes from envy (ho phthonos), which is properly called bewitchment (baskanian)" (3.7.3; cf. 3.19.2; 4.5.4).

It was difficult to escape the evil eye (Stobaeus 3.38.10), especially when its fascination was worked on the eye of the person to whom harm was wished.¹⁵ Magicians, however, used incantations, talismans, and especially amulets for protection against this sort of influence; "their strange appearance distracts the gaze of the baskanos and thus keeps him from fixating on his victim."¹⁶ The epistolary papyri constantly use abaskantos with respect to the health of humans, especially children, and even of horses (O. Florida 15, 2; 17, 4; SB 1022, 6). The writer prays for the health of the recipient and for his preservation from the evil eye.¹⁷

In view of these data, it seems best to translate tis hymas ebaskanen “Who put a spell on you?” meaning “Who beclouded your mind?”¹⁸ The Galatians have lost their minds (anoetoi); it is not as if they had made some easily explainable mistake in a secular matter, but rather as if their freedom has been put in bondage by the mysterious maneuverings of parties unknown (tis ?)—baskania is often personified (SEG XV, 853, 6)—behind whom the working of the devil may be detected; by the jealousy (phthono diabolou) whereby death entered into the world.¹⁹ This would mean Paul’s enemies in Galatia, moved by envy, like those Roman preachers who sought to ruin the apostle’s authority and prestige by taking advantage of the powerlessness to which he was reduced by his captivity. They acted dia phthonon kai erin, through envious, partisan malice.²⁰ These jealous folk must have somehow cast an evil eye on Christians, even though they had the wherewithal to conjure against this seduction: “You, before whose eyes Jesus Christ was portrayed crucified.”²¹ Keeping the eyes fixed on the Crucified One would have been the antidote par excellence.²²

¹ Gal 3:1. After ε—βάσκανεν, C, D, K, L, and P add τῆ ἀληθείᾳ μὴ πείθεσθαι. The description ἀνόητοι, “unthinking” (cf. verse 3; Luke 24:25; Rom 1:14; 1Tim 6:9; Titus 3:3) expresses incomprehension in the realm of faith, a lack of discernment, an ignorance of one’s own limits. Cf. Ps.-Aristotle, Mund. 1.391 a 10: the Aloadae, in their folly (οἱ—ἀνόητοι), formed the plan to explore the sacred regions of philosophy, when the body is incapable of exploring the heavenly places.

² Aorist formed with α, usually with accusative object, cf. F. M. Abel, Grammaire, 17 h; 43 e.

³ A sorcerer, one with the evil eye; cf. E. Kuhnert, in PW, vol. 6, 2009ff.

⁴ Cf. Plato, Phd. 95 b: “Beware lest some evil eye turn our argument around backward.”

⁵ C. Bonner, Magical Amulets, pp. 97ff. P. Chantraine (Dictionnaire étymologique, p. 167) rejects the etymology given by Hesychius, who seems to derive the verb from βάζω, βάσκω (φάσκω), “talk.”

⁶ Cf. A. Oepke (Der Brief des Paulus an die Galater, Leipzig, 1937); H. Schlier (Der Brief an die Galater, Göttingen, 1951); F. Mussner (Der Galaterbrief, Freiburg, Basel, 1974): “wer hat euch bezaubert.” Cf. the bucolic singers of Theocritus 6.39: “In order not to be bewitched (ὥς μὴ βασκανθω—), I spat three times in my bosom, as old Cotyttaris taught me.” There is no room here for the definition of βασκαίνω as “disparage, denigrate”; cf. Demosthenes, Chers. 8.19: “do not disparage this army”; Corona 189: “He basely disparages”; Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.285: “Let them cease disparaging us”; Heraclitus, All. 6.3: “envy that always seeks to sully and disparage.”

⁷ Βάσκανοι τε σφόδρα ἦσαν καὶ φθονεροί. Stobaeus, Ecl. 4.38, vol. 3, pp. 708–721. Cf. P. Walcot, Envy and the Greeks: A Study of Human Behaviour, Warminster, 1978, pp. 77–84.

⁸ Flacc. 143; cf. 29: the Alexandrians, “stirred to jealousy (φθόνου)—for Egyptian means spiteful (βάσκανον)”; cf. Plutarch, De inv. et ot. 7: “People are even more jealous (βασκαίνουσι μα—λλον) of those who are considered good because of the thought that they possess the greatest property of all, which is virtue.”

⁹ —Οφθαλμὸς πονηρός. This does not mean that there is anything wrong with the eye itself (Matt 6:23; Luke 11:34) but that the eye translates the feelings of the heart or soul, in this case envy, cf. Mark 7:22; Matt 20:15; Prov 23:6; 28:22; Sir 14:10. Cf. Plutarch, De inv. et ot. 2: envy is like a disease of the eyes.

¹⁰ SEG XXV, 1199 = SB 10702; cf. 6295: ὀφθαλμὸν ἀπετρύπησα τὸν τοῦ βασκάνου; 6584, 4–5. The decree of association of the athletes of the empire: “Because of all these qualities, malignant Envy (ὁ βάσκανος φθόνος) . . . took from us this common good, of which she was jealous, coming to press on the parts of the body that are most useful to pancratists, namely, the shoulders” (MAMA VIII, 417, 19–20; republished, corrected and translated, by L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 13, Paris, 1965, pp. 145ff.). On the linking of βάσκανοι, magicians, evil persons, cf. Strabo 14.2.7; Diodorus Siculus 5.55.3; Callimachus, Aet., in P.Oxy. 2079, 17.

¹¹ Τὸν Φθόνον ε—κ μέσσου καὶ ὄμματα Βασκανίης τῆς ι—λαρῆς τέχνης, SEG XXV, 1197 c (cf. E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 122), IX, 818.

¹² In funerary epigrams, Hades is described as βάσκανος (Anth. Pal. 7.328, 712; cf. G. Kaibel, Epigrammata 345, 379; E. Peterson, EIS' EOUS, Göttingen, 1926, p. 230; J. Geffcken, “βάσκανος δαίμων,” in Charisteria A. RZACH . . . dargebracht, Reichenberg, 1930, pp. 36–40). Cf. P. Perdrizet, Negotium perambulans in tenebris, Strasbourg, 1922, p. 24: “Envy, jealousy, being the essential nature of evil spirits, and fascination, the evil eye, being their more fearsome weapon of harm.” The owl of Athena sometimes sometimes conjured up fascination, sometimes was auxiliary to

it. Baskania (Envy) is a chthonic divinity, along with Tartarus, Charon, etc., in Pap.Graec.Mag. 4, 1451; cf. I, 1400; VIII, 34 (ed. K. Preisendanz, vol. 1, p. 120). In epitaphs, Ἔδης (or Ἔιδης) is described as βάσκανος (CIRB, n. 193, 141; cf. GVI, n. 949). On the evil eye, cf. W. Déonna, Le symbolisme de l'œil, Berne, 1965, pp. 153–158, who cites an abundant bibliography, especially Elworthy, The Evil Eye, London, 1895; Seligmann, Der Böse Blick und Verwandtes, 2 vols., 1910.

¹³ Plutarch, Quaest. conv. 5.7.1.680 c: Περὶ τῶν καταβασκαίνειν λεγομένων καὶ βάσκανον ἔχειν ὀφθαλμόν, “On those who are said to cast spells.”

¹⁴ Heliodorus, Aeth. 2.25.1, writes that the eye captures its object like a net.

¹⁵ J. B. Lightfoot (Epistle to the Galatians, 8th ed., London, 1884) and M. J. Lagrange (Épître aux Galates) cite Alexander of Aphrodisias, Pr. 2.53: ὥσπερ ἰ—ώδη τινὰ καὶ φθοροποιὸν ἀκτι—να ε—ξια—σιν ἀπὸ τῆς κόρης αὐτῶ—ν καὶ αὕτη εἰ—σιοῦσα διὰ τῶ—ν ὀφθαλμῶ—ν τοῦ φρονουμένου τρέψει τὴν ψυχὴν καὶ τὴν φύσιν; Sir 18:18—δώσις βασκάνου ε—κτῆκει ὀφθαλμούς.

¹⁶ Plutarch, Quaest. conv. 681 f. In Syria, a drawing to ward off phthonos has been found (F. Cumont, Fouilles de Doura-Europos, Paris, 1926, p. 138). U. Wilcken has published a Christian amulet from the sixth century: τὸν δαίμονα προβασκανίας (APF, 1901, p. 431); cf. Ep Jer 69: “a scarecrow in a field of cucumbers preserves nothing” (βασκάνιον οὐ προβασκάνιον). Definition of amulet by C. Bonner, Magical Amulets, p. 2.

¹⁷ P.Oxy. 292, 12 (AD 25); 930, 23; 2679, 2; 2981, 24, 30; 3312, 3; 3313, 23; P.Fay. 126, 10; P.Lips. 108, 9: ἄσπασε τὰ ἀβάσκαντά σου παιδία; P.Ryl. 604, 25; P.Oxy.Hels. 50, 21; BGU 811, 4; P.Wisc. 72, 5–6; 74, 16; 76, 26; P.Stras. 187, 4; P.Mil. 80, 6; P.Giss. 23, 10; 24, 7; 25, 3; P.Mich. 473, 14. The proper name Abaskantos (“of good omen”) is quite widespread in the imperial period: a freedman (SB 7515, 390), an archon from Thera (L. Robert, Hellenica, in RevPhil, 1944, pp. 40–42); T. Drew-Bear, Phrygie, Zutphen, 1978, p. 79.

¹⁸ P. Robert’s Dictionnaire . . . de la langue française cites the expression “Il faut qu’on l’ait ensorcelé” and notes “se dit de quelqu’un dont la conduite paraît inexplicable” and almost diabolical.

¹⁹ Wis 2:24. A. M. Dubarle (“La Tentation diabolique dans le Livre de la Sagesse, II, 24,” in Mélanges Tisserant, vol. 1, pp. 187–195) compares 1QS 3.23–24, where the angel of darkness misleads the sons of righteousness and “all the spirits of his sort trip up the sons of light”; 1QM 13.11–12; Enoch 54.6: the servants of Satan have misled the inhabitants of the earth; T. Jud. 23.1, the demons of misleading. The devil’s “jealousy” was probably stirred up by God’s benevolence toward humankind, whose prerogatives go so far as to include even “dominating the universe” (Wis 10:2, 9ff.).

²⁰ Phil 3:15; cf. 17, ε—ξ ε—ριθείας. Cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 2, pp. 244–252; J. Gnllka, “Die antipaulinische Mission in Philippi,” in BZ, 1965, pp. 258–276; A. F. J. Klijn, “Paul’s Opponents in Philippians III,” in NovT, 1965, pp. 278–284; A. E. Harvey, “The Opposition to Paul,” in F. L. Cross, SE, vol. 4, pp. 319–332.

²¹ Προγράφω expresses an official publicness that no one could ignore, a posting, a public notice on a placard; Aristophanes, Av. 450: “Let them note what we post on the boards”; Plutarch, De Pyth. or. 29: the inscriptions due to the wise; Dem. 46.10: “a soldier inscribed before his tent the beginning of the Oedipus. ”

²² Cf. A. J. Festugière, Hermétisme et mystique païenne, Paris, 1967, pp. 188–199, n. 47–48.

βατταλογέω

battalogo, to babble

battalogo, S 945; TDNT 1.597; EDNT 1.209; MM 107; L&N 33.88, 33.89; BDF §40; BAGD 137

Before teaching his disciples the Our Father, our Lord instructed them: “In your prayers, do not babble as the gentiles do,¹ for they think that by using many words they will make themselves heard.”² This advice seems to recall Eccl 5:1, “Do not be hasty to speak in God’s presence . . . let your words be few,”³ and Sir 7:14—“do not repeat words in your prayer”; but no sure etymology can be given for battalogo.⁴ A. Schlatter, pointing out that lego can mean “gather, collect” (cf. poelogo, blastologo, botanologo, krithologo) and that batos (Syriac bata) means “bramble,” relies on Philo (Alleg. Interp. 3.253; Dreams 2.161; cf. Moses 1.65) to arrive at the forced sense of “give oneself over to painful and sterile work.”⁵ Furthermore, most modern scholars see in this verb a hybrid of the Aramaic battalta and the Greek logos (in a pejorative sense, cf. spermologos, koprologos, sykologeo) and draw support from the Palestinian Syriac and Sinaitic Syriac versions, “do not be saying (mouthing) battalata = vain things.”⁶ So what is in view is verbiage or constant repetition, as verse 8 specifies—“They think that their prayer will be answered thanks to their torrent of words.”⁷ Quality matters more than quantity; but above all verbosity and prattling are here denounced.⁸ Moulton-Milligan (on this word) cite the nickname given Demosthenes (battalos, pouring out torrents of words). Battalogia would then be “logorrhea, an endless torrent of prayers and litanies,”⁹ which reminds us of the prophasei makra proseuchomenoi (making long prayers for show) of the scribes (Mark 12:40). It is not the length of the prayer in terms of time that is denounced, because Jesus spent whole nights in prayer and tarried in prayer (Luke 6:12; 22:14) and his church persevered in prayer (Acts 1:14; 12:5; 1Tim 5:5; etc.), but abuse and redundancy and canned formulas, in which the cry of the heart becomes mere words.

Liddell-Scott-Jones (Lexicon) and M. J. Lagrange (Evangile selon saint Matthieu, 3d ed., Paris, 1927) prefer to see this word as onomatopoeic, like battarizo (stammer);¹⁰ which should be compared to the “muddling up” of tongues at Babel (Gen 11:7-9), the “babbling” of Isaiah,¹¹ and the “gurgling” water of Ezek 47:2. By way of an example of the meaningless litanies, cf. the magical incantation of the third century, to which we might compare our abracadabra: “Demon, whoever you are, I adjure you by the god Sabarbarbathioth, Sabarbarbathiouth, Sabarbarbathioneth, Sabarbarbaphai . . . ,”¹² or “the secret name Thoathoethathoouthaethoouthioaithithethointho.”¹³ Whether we are talking about unintelligible muttering and stammering or of prattling on unreflectively, the play on words and the results are similar (cf. Herodotus 7.35: “to speak barbara and recklessly,” legein barbara te kai atasthala). “We should see this as a useless spate of words such as that produced by uncultivated people telling their business to lawyers . . . a reference to the eloquence expended by the pagans to persuade the gods” (M. J. Lagrange) and to “tire them out,” as the Latins said.¹⁴

The followers of Jesus Christ have only to say “Our Father” to be heard.¹⁵

¹ The term ethnikoi is pejorative, cf. A. Pelletier, Josèphe adaptateur, pp. 79ff.

² Matt 6:7, NJB; M. J. Lagrange translates, “When you pray, do not stammer on (bredouillez) like the Gentiles, because it seems to them that their prayer will be answered thanks to their spate of words” (Evangile selon saint Matthieu, 3d ed., Paris, 1927, p. 123); E. Bonnard: “Do not multiply vain words” (Evangile selon saint Matthieu, Neuchâtel, 1963, p. 79); the New English Bible: “Do not go babbling on like the heathen”; cf. F. W. Beare, “Speaking with Tongues,” JBL 1964, pp. 229ff.

³ Cf. A. Barucq, Ecclésiaste, Paris, 1968, pp. 101–102.

⁴ Unknown in the Greek language before the Life of Aesop (ε—ν οἴνω μὴ βατταλόγει σοφίαν ε—πιδεικνύμενος, ed. A. Westermann, Vita Aesopi, Brunswick, 1845, p. 47) and the commentary on Epictetus by Simplicius in the sixth century (cited by J. J. Wettstein, on this text); cf. G. Delling, in TDNT, vol. 1, p. 597.

⁵ A. Schlatter, Der Evangelist Matthäus, Stuttgart, 1948, p. 206; cf. H. Huber, Die Bergpredigt, Göttingen, 1932, pp. 113ff.

⁶ Cf. bata', Lev 5:4; Ps 106:33. Cf. BDF §40; BAGD, p. 137; but cf. the summary by G. Zuntz in Gnomon, 1958, pp. 20–21.

⁷ —Εν τῇ πολυλογίᾳ (Prov 10:19; Job 11:2; cf. 1Kgs 18:26-29; Isa 1:15; Sir 7:14; Maurer, on this word, in TDNT, vol. 6, pp. 545–546).

⁸ Cf. περιττολογία, superfluous or excessive exposition, linked with ἄμετρον (in Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Pomp. 2), with ἀλαζονεία (in Josephus, Ant. 14.111). Cf. πολυλογία, βραχυλογία, μακρολογία, in Sent. Sextus, n. 155–157. With good reason, E. J. Bickerman draws a contrast with the simplicity of improvised prayers in Israel (“Bénédiction et prière,” in RB, 1962, pp. 524ff.). We might think of the custom of shouting acclamations forty or fifty times (cf. Acts 19:34; J. V. Le Clerc, Des Journaux chez les Romains, Paris, 1838, p. 420).

⁹ D. Buzy, Evangile selon saint Matthieu, Paris, 1935, p. 75.

¹⁰ Herodotus 4.155: “The child’s speech was confused and stuttering . . . the name Battos was given to him, παι—ς ι—σχνόφωνος καὶ τραυλός, τω— οὔνομα ε—τέθη Βάττος” (cf. F. Chamoux, Cyrène sous la monarchie des Battiades, Paris, 1953, pp. 93–98); Plutarch, De Pyth. or. 22: “It is not possible to give clear pronunciation to a stutterer or a beautiful voice to one whose organ of speech is weak. It is for this reason, I believe, that Battos, who came here on account of his voice, received from the god the order to go found a colony in Libya, because, if he was a stutterer and had a weak voice, the quality of his spirit was that of a king and a statesman.” Cf. the nickname βάτταρος (the stutterer) (I.Did., 425, 4; cf. O. Masson, “En marge du Mime II d’Héronidas: Les surnoms ioniens BATTΑΡΟΣ et BATTΑΡΑΣ,” in REG, 1970, pp. 356–361; L. Robert, Noms indigènes dans l’Asie-Mineure gréco-romaine, Paris, 1963, p. 193, n. 5).

¹¹ Isa 28:10-11 (W. H. Hallo, “Isaiah XXVIII, 9–13 and the Ugaritic Abecedaries,” JBL 1958, pp. 324–338).

¹² G. Milligan, Selections from the Greek Papyri, Cambridge, 1927, n. 47; cf. C. Bonner, Magical Amulets, pp. 68, 117, passim; cf. the medical-magic prescriptions of P.Ant. 66, 45–46 or the Arab amulet (P.Mur., vol. 2, pp. 289–290).

¹³ P.Mert. 58, 12–14 and the references given by the editors (p. 24). St. Paul preferred to “speak five words intelligently rather than ten thousand ‘in tongues’” (1Cor 14:19).

¹⁴ Fatigare deos, cf. Horace, Carm. 1.2.26ff.; Livy 1.11.2; Seneca, Lucil. 4.2.5; Apuleius, Met. 10.26; Martial 7.60.3. Cf. Pherecrates, frag. 137 a: τί δ αὐτὸ λῖαν ὦδε λιπαρεῖ—ς θεόν (in J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 1, p. 258).

¹⁵ F. Bussby (“A Note on . . . βαπτολογέω in the Light of Qumran,” ExpT, vol. 76, 1964, p. 26) mentions the meaning of the Aramaic bâthal in Ezra 4:24—“the work on the house of God was stopped,” and its use in a bill of sale (P.Mur., n. 26, 5; cf. ε—γκόπτω in 1Pet 3:7) where it means “without legal effect,” and comments: “Don’t use long prayers—like the pagans—prayers that are without effect, so long as you have not called upon God the Father in the right way.”

βέβαιος, βεβαιόω, βεβαίωσις

bebaios, solid, durable, sure, valid, guaranteed; bebaioo, to make sure, confirm, authenticate, guarantee, carry out; bebaiosis, firmness, juridical definiteness

see also ἀσφάλεια

bebaios, S 949; TDNT 1.600–603; EDNT 1.210–211; NIDNTT 1.658–660; MM 107; L&N 28.43, 31.90, 71.15; BDF §59(2); BAGD 138 | bebaioo, S 950; TDNT 1.600–603; EDNT 1.210–211; NIDNTT 1.658–659; MM 108; L&N 28.44, 31.91; BAGD 138 | bebaiosis, S 951; TDNT 1.600–603; EDNT 1.210–211; NIDNTT 1.658–659; MM 108; L&N 28.44; BAGD 138

Bebaios —“that on which one can walk,” hence “solid, firm, durable” and finally “sure, certain”—often modifies logos: an utterance that is well-founded, authorized, and thus convincing.¹ This firmness-solidity implies immutability when the topic is a promise, an institution, or the word of God.² Thus we arrive at the legal meaning, “valid” and even “guaranteed,” copiously attested in the papyri and the inscriptions for bebaios, the denominative verb bebaioo, and bebaiosis.³ It is in this strong sense that we should understand Rom 4:16: bebaian ten epangelian; the divine promise is not only firm and immutable, not only assured for all posterity, but it is guaranteed to them. Similarly, in Mark 16:20—ton logon bebaiountos—the Lord does more than confirm the word of the apostles by the miracles that accompany him; he also authenticates and guarantees it. Inasmuch as the law of Moses was promulgated by angels, this “word” is valid and authentically divine (logos bebaios, Heb 2:2). At the transfiguration, the appearance of Moses and Elijah evokes the messianic prophecies of the OT; these prophecies become more sure, their veracity is guaranteed by the transfiguration of Jesus (bebaioteron . . . logon, 2Pet 1:19).

It is indeed legal language that is used in Heb 9:17, an exceptional scriptural use of the word diatheke in the sense of a will, in order to express our ability to inherit these heavenly goods: it was necessary for Christ, the only Son and heir of God, to die so that we might gain possession of his inheritance; diatheke epi nekrois bebaia, a provision of a will is not valid, has no legal force (ischuei) and cannot become operative, until after the demise of the testator.⁴

As for the verb bebaioo, it can mean “carry out, realize,”⁵ and it is in this sense that we should take Rom 15:8, eis to bebaiosai tas epangelias: Christ “demonstrated God’s truthfulness by carrying out the promises made to the fathers”; Heb 2:3—“The salvation that was announced by the Lord ... was confirmed to us by those who heard him.”⁶

When Heb 6:16 appeals to the oath as the juridical proof that nullifies any dispute between adversaries⁷—eis bebaiosin ho horkos—the sense of eis bebaiosin is “definitive, without opposition, with no reconsideration or challenge possible,” recalling Lev 25:23, where once Yahweh has affirmed that the Holy Land belongs to him “the land shall not be sold eis bebaiosin” (Hebrew lismitut); God remains the owner, so the ceding of absolute ownership is forbidden.⁸

Finally, the moral applications of the words of this group are frequent, usually in the sense of firmness, fixity, solidity (1Cor 1:8; 2Cor 1:21; Heb 3:14; 13:9; 2Pet 1:10), notably with respect to faith⁹ or hope that is well founded¹⁰ and solidly attached, like an anchor in the heavenly holy of holies: asphale te kai bebaian.¹¹

¹ Βέβαιος is therefore often associated with πιστός (Plato, Tim. 49 b) and ἀληθής (Phdr. 90 c). In the third century AD, Sotas writes to Satyros: “Believe it, it is sure, because it can be seen—πίστευε τὸ βεβαία, ε—πεὶ ἰ—δι—ν ε—στίν” (Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 19, 7). SB 5114, 20: ε—πὶ βεβαίῳ καὶ ἀμεταθέτῳ λόγῳ. Cf. Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 93: “the simple words of God, in their certitude, differ not at all from oaths . . . it is because of God that an oath itself is sure, ὁ ὄρκος βέβαιος”; Philo, Dreams 1.12: “There is nothing about which we can be so sure as the unlimited and infinite nature of wisdom.”

² The Mosaic constitution is “firm, unshakable, unchanging (βέβαια, ἀσάλευτα, ἀκράδαντα), . . . solidly planted . . . it will endure throughout the future as if immortal” (Philo, Moses 2.14). Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.156: the law of Moses unshakable for eternity; War 4.154: a law solidly established. The formula κυρία καὶ βεβαία is used of an ε—γγύη (P.Stras. 50, 8), a διαθήκη (P.Lond. 77, 66), an ἀποχή (P.Flor. 95, 25; P.Lips. 38, 6); cf. P.Gron. 10, 20: καὶ ἔστω ἡ χάρις κυρία καὶ βεβαία πανταχοῦ προφερομένη.

³ This meaning is forcefully supported by A. Deissmann, Bible Studies, pp. 104–109. Cf. L. Mitteis, Grundzüge, Leipzig-Berlin, 1912, vol. 2, 1, pp. 188ff. R. Taubenschlag, Law of Greco-Roman Egypt, New York, 1944, pp. 253–254. Cf. the letter of Claudius to the Alexandrians: “I guarantee to the ephebes the right to the Alexandrine city” (P.Lond. 1912, 54); Wis 6:18—“observing the laws is the guarantee of incorruptibility”; a bill of sale, P.Rein. 42, 5 (guarantee that the object sold or bequeathed is clear of tax obligations, first-second century AD), BGU 87, 18; 153, 23; P.Vindob.Worp 9, 12–13: “I will guarantee to you with all of the guarantees specified below”; a rental contract: “the administrators of the Kytherians guarantee (βεβαιώω) the location to Eucrates” (RIJG, vol. 1, n. 134 A, 13; 7, 108: “Guarantors and confirmers of the sale of the lands and the house.”) A lease, P.Mich. 633, 29, 40; 634, 13. In a sale, the guarantee protects the buyer against the danger of eviction (cf. ibid., vol. 2, p. 259); J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. 42, 10: “βέβαιον παρεχόντων οι—βεβιωτήρες, the guarantors furnishing the guarantee of the sale in the name of the god, conformably to law” (an act emancipating a slave; Delphi, second century BC); P.Köln 55, 9. The formula βεβαιώσω πάση βεβαιώσι is normal in contracts, cf. PSI 1130, 25 (AD 25); SB 9109, 14 (AD 31); P.Fam.Tebt. 27, 17–18; P.Mich. 188, 23; 189, 30; 259, 32 (AD 33); P.Princ. 146, 18 (AD 36); P.Fay. 92, 19 (second century); P.Oslo 40, 45; etc. up to the sixth century (P.Michael. 40, 44; 45, 55; 52, 22, 43, etc.).

⁴ We may cite the testament of St. Gregory of Nazianzus: “This is my will, which I want to be firm and valid, τὴν διαθήκην κυρίαν καὶ βεβαίαν” (PG, vol. 37, 394). Herod designates Caesar as the guarantor of his will (Josephus, War 1.669).

⁵ Epictetus 2.11.24: “philosophy consists of examining and establishing these norms.” J. Rouffiac (Caractères du grec, p. 48) noted this from I.Priene 123, 9: a magistrate who had promised to give out beef when he entered into office carried out his promise by making a sacrifice to the gods and giving out the meat to those who were on the list, ε—βεβαίωσεν δὲ τὴν ε—παγγαλίαν παραστήσαθ μὲν τοι—θ ε—ντεμενίοιθ εοι—θ τὴν ὑσίαν.

⁶ Ει—ς ἡμα—ς ε—βεβαιώθη: having been inaugurated by Christ, salvation is effectively carried out, applied by the apostles to the converted. But given συνεπιμαρτυροῦντος τοῦ θεοῦ (verse 4), the nuance of “guarantee” should be preserved. Through their vigor in certifying the facts for which they bear the guarantees, in communicating grace and performing miracles, the apostles sanction the truth of the message; their proclamation inspires confidence. The twofold sense—“guarantee” and “accomplish”—is also found in 1Cor 1:6—“the testimony of Christ was established (or accomplished) among you”; Phil 1:7—“you associate yourselves with my grace in the defense and the establishing (or realization) of the gospel.” P.Mil.Vogl. 26, 13: the seller guarantees that the fields purchased by the buyer are free of all taxes; P.Mich. 635, 13; cf. H. H. Hobbes, Preaching Values from the Papyri, Grand Rapids, 1964, pp. 33–36.

⁷ Cf. C. Préaux, “La Preuve à l’époque hellénistique,” in La Preuve (Recueils de la Société J. Bodin, XVI), Brussels, 1965, pp. 161–222. Cf. Josephus, Ant. 17.42: βεβαιώσαντος δι’ ὄρκων; Philo, Abraham 273: God gives Abraham a guarantee by an oath, τὴν δι’ ὄρκου βεβαίωσιν; Philo, Plant. 82.

⁸ Cf. G. Lumbroso, Recherches sur l’économie politique de l’Egypte, 2d ed., Amsterdam, 1967, p. 78. A “solid conversion” (Philo, Moses 1.298) is a decisive conversion.

⁹ Col 2:7—βεβαιούμενοι τῇ πίστει. This firmness derives from Ps 41:12; 119:28; it is exalted by Philo (Rewards 30: “The one who has . . . an unbending and unshakable faith: happy is such a one in truth, and three times blessed”), who demonstrates that βεβαίωσις characterizes the laws of nature, as opposed to positive legislation (Good Man Free 37); the soul of the friend of God receives fixity, solidity, and consistency (πῆξις καὶ βεβαίωσιν καὶ ἴδρυσιν; Alleg. Interp. 2.55; cf. Cherub. 13). If the divine appearances in the realm of becoming dissipate, those produced by unbegotten being can remain stable, firm, eternal (μόνιμοι καὶ βέβαιοι καὶ αἰδίοι, 3.101). There is on earth no stable place, where the security of fortune is assured (τὸ ἀκλινὲς τῆς εὐπραγίας ε—ν βεβαίῳ, Moses 1.30; cf. Drunkness 170). Βέβαιος is used to describe the true and the good (Moses 1.95, 1.220; 2.108; Spec. Laws 1.70, 1.77, 1.291; 2.2, etc.), and of friendship (Josephus, Ant. 7.203; 14.185; 15.193; 19.317). Plutarch, Cat. Min. 1.3: “a character firm in all respects.” According to an epigram from Nicomedia, spouses reunited in the same tomb choose to love each other constantly even among the dead, στοργὴν βεβαίαν κὰν αἰ—ρούμενοι (S. Sahin, in ZPE, 1975, p. 42, n. 125; 1976, p. 189). Cf. Diodorus Siculus 17.51.2: the god grants firmly (βεβαίως) that which is asked of him.

¹⁰ 2Cor 1:7; cf. 4Macc 17:4. Josephus, Ant. 5.176, 8.8, 8.280, 15.153, 16.238; War 7.165, 7.413: βεβαίαν ε—λπίδα σωτηρίας.

¹¹ —Ἀσφαλῆς, “that does not slip,” used in medicine for a sick person who is out of danger and on the way to a cure (P.Oxy. 939, 5; cf. Thucydides 1.80.1; N. van Brock, Vocabulaire médicale, pp. 184ff.), for the security of a route (Strabo 4.6.6; Heliodorus, Aeth. 8.16.1); ἀσφαλω—ς used for the security of a mooring (Strabo 5.4.6) or of a naval escort (Dittenberger, Syl. 581, 84); ἀσφάλεια used for the security of sailors who heed their pilots (Dio Cassius 41.33). There is a proverb: “If the vessel does not hold to its anchor, the mooring is not sure” (Herondas, Pimp 1.41; cf. Plutarch, De virt. mor. 6; Sol. 19.2; Philemon, frag. 213—ε—βάλετ ἄγκυραν καθάψας ἀσφαλείας εἶνεκα—in Stobaeus, Flor. 30.4; vol. 3, p. 664, 2); hence “drop the anchor of safety” (Heliodorus, Aeth. 8.6.9).—The βέβαιον-ἀσφαλές linkage is constant from Wis 7:23 on; Philo, Virtues 216; Rewards 30; Prelim. Stud. 141; Conf. Tongues 106; Heir 314; cf. Plutarch, Cat. Mai. 21.5: “He invested his capital in solid and sure businesses”; Polybius 12.25a2: “There will be nothing solid or sure in the sayings of our author”; P.Rein. 107, 5: ἡ ἀσφάλεια κυρία καὶ βεβαία; P.Lips. 4, 18: ἀνέδωκεν . . . πρὸς τὴν κυρίαν ἀπὸ τούτων ἀσφάλειαν καὶ βεβαίωσιν.

βέβηλος, βεβηλόω

bebelos, accessible, profane, impure, impious; bebeloo, to profane, besmirch

bebelos, S 952; TDNT 1.604–605; EDNT 1.211; MM 108; L&N 88.115; BAGD 138 | bebeloo, S 953; TDNT 1.605; EDNT 1.21; L&N 53.33; BAGD 138

Derived from baino, “go, come,” the adjective bebelos, “accessible, profane,” unknown in the papyri, is the opposite of abatos, hieros, hagnos, “inaccessible, sacred,” and is used for places that are not consecrated, where it is permitted to set foot; hence, accessible to everybody (cf. Philo, Alleg. Interp. 1.62; Josephus, Ant. 3.181; War 4.182; Thucydides 4.97.3). The exact equivalent would be “profane” (pro-fano): that which is opposite or outside of the sacred. When used of persons it means “uninitiated, profane, impure”¹ and takes on a moral value (Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 138).

In the language of the Bible, it is highly pejorative (Ezek 21:30—bebele anome!, profane and lawless one); and it is often associated with anosios (unholy, 1Tim 1:9; 3Macc 2:2), with pornos (sexually impure, Heb 12:6), anieros (unholy, Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 138; Spec. Laws 4.40); akathartos (unclean, Spec. Laws 1.150), amyetos (uninitiated, Plutarch, De def. or. 16). It takes on a technical meaning: the profane is opposed to the sacred as the impure to the pure.² The verb bebeloo, translating the Hebrew piel hilel, in the sense of “profane, besmirch,” speaks of a sort of sacrilege.³ In fact, the profaner is an impious person, after the manner of Esau, who renounced the sacred prerogatives which were his as the firstborn and which made him the fully entitled heir of the messianic promises; thus he was faithless.⁴

In the Pastorals, bebelos is an adjective for heterodox and heretical teaching: “impious fables, old wives’ tales.”⁵ So myth is gratuitous invention (2Pet 1:16), opposed to true history,⁶ against which so many first-century authors protest: Moses urges “putting away the fiction of myths ... which provoke endless errors” (Philo, Virtues 178); “the sophists of Egypt give myths . . . more attention than the evidence for the truth” (Migr. Abr. 76); “The ones who spread this idea sacrificed to mythological invention more than to history.”⁷ When St. Paul calls myth profane, he denounces its incompatibility with the sacred; it is a profanation and an impiety to introduce into gospel teaching these human, fictive elements, which do not mix with religion (cf. Heb 13:9—didachais xenais), and which do not encourage true eusebeia.⁸

This inanity is again expressed in the prohibition against crude and profane chatter—tas bebelous kenophonias (1Tim 6:20; 2Tim 2:16)—which, under the guise of doctrine, secularize and besmirch the divine truth entrusted to the church. Literally, kenophonia (attested by the best manuscripts instead of kainophonia, empty chatter rather than novel chatter) means: “sounds with no meaning” (cf. 1Cor 14:7-11), unintelligible words, like those of a baby; hence hazy and vain discourse, inane and empty;⁹ called mataiologia (1Tim 1:6; Titus 1:10), they are stigmatized by Plutarch as vain rantings against all that one says (De tranq. anim. 468a; De aud. poet. 39c). Similarly, Archimedes protests, “I wanted to avoid appearing to somepeople to have set forth vain words (kenen phonen)” (Archimedes, Eratosth., intro.).

This is how the first Christians assessed the “profane” in religious instruction.

¹ Cf. E. Boisacq, Dictionnaire étymologique, p. 112; P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique, p. 172. In Josephus, War 5.18, 6.271, this word designates lay people, as opposed to priests. In I.Thas. 18, 4, μήτε ι—ρη μήτε βεβήλη can mean an “action sacred or profane” or “private or public.”

² Lev 10:10; Ezek 22:26 (Philo, Moses 2.158). In 1Sam 21:4—profane loaves as opposed to the sacred loaves. Antiochus Epiphanes “takes with his impure hands (ται—ς μιαραι—ς χερσίν) the sacred vessels and gathers up with his profane hands (ται—ς βεβήλοις χερσίν) the offerings” of the temple in Jerusalem (2Macc 5:16).

³ One profanes the Sabbath (Isa 56:2, 6; Ezek 20:13, 16, 21; 22:8; 1Macc 1:43, 45; 2:34; Matt 12:5); the name of God (Lev 18:21; 19:12; 20:3; 21:6; Isa 48:11; Ezek 20:9; 36:20-21; 39:7; Amos 2:7; Mal 1:12); the holiness of Yahweh (Lev 19:8); the sanctuary (Acts 24:6; Lev 21:23; 22:2, 15, 32; Num 18:32; Ezek 23:29; 1Macc 1:48; 2:12; 2Macc 8:2; 10:5); that which is holy (Ezek 22:26; Mal 2:11; Zeph 3:4); the altar (1Macc 4:38, 44, 54); the covenant (Ps 55:20; Mal 2:10; 1Macc 1:63); the land (Jer 16:18; Ezek 7:21-22); posterity (Sir 47:20). A profane woman is prostituted (Lev 21:7, 14) or besmirched (Sir 42:10; cf. Philo, Spec. Laws 1.102; Josephus, Ant. 15.90). Cf. a cultic regulation of Cyrene (fourth century BC): ε—ς ι—αρὰ καὶ ε—ς βάβαλα καὶ ε—ς μιάρὰ (SEG, vol. 9, 72, 9; cf. line 21: ὀσία παντὶ καὶ ἀγνώ— καὶ βαβάλω).

⁴ Heb 12:16—τις πόρνος ἢ βέβηλος (cf. Philo, Spec. Laws 1.102). Esau is the type of the φαῦλος, whose concubines are ruinous (Prelim. Stud. 54). The Jewish tradition attributed the worst vices to Esau (cf. C. Spicq, Hébreux, vol. 2, p. 401); J. D. M. Derrett, Law in the NT, p. 120). Codex Neophiti I, on Gen 25:34, glosses: “Esau despised his birthright, he denied the resurrection of the dead, and he denied the life of the world to come.” Philo called him senseless (Prelim. Stud. 175; cf. 61), “eponym of insanity” (Sacr. Abel and Cain 17), “savage and violent, full of fire and passion” (Rewards 53). Why was he so criminal? According to Jubilees, it was because he broke the oath that his parents made him swear to love Jacob and to do him no harm (Jub. 35.24; 36.7–9; 37.1–21; cf. A. Jaubert, La Notion d’alliance dans le Judaïsme, Paris, 1963, pp. 109ff.). We know well how legends grow, whether for good as in the case of Rahab (cf. C. Spicq, Hébreux, vol. 2, pp. 361ff.) or for evil (M. S. Enslin, “How the Story Grew: Judas in Fact and Fiction,” in Festschrift F. W. Gingrich, Leiden, 1972, pp. 123–141).

⁵ 1Tim 4:7. St. Thomas Aquinas comments precisely “ineptae et inanes.” At root, these are tales or twaddle that grandmothers or nurses tell to small children: monster stories or Aesop’s fables (Philo attributes to the mythologers the tradition that ascribes a common language to all animals, Conf. Tongues 6); the expression then became a rhetorical characterization and a polemical insult: that which flies in the face of reason and presupposes an incredulity unworthy of an honest person

(Heliodorus, Aeth. 4.5.3), for example, with respect to the life of separated souls on the moon: “That’s a good one to tell women, because it is so fabulous” (Plutarch, De aud. poet. 16e; Strabo 1.3; Lucian, Philops. 9). “The stories that circulate are for the most part fables dreamed up by women and magicians” (Aristotle, HA 8.24.605a5). According to Strabo, Eratosthenes called the poetry of Homer old wives’ tales (Strabo, Prolegomena 1.2.3). “These marvelous phenomena sometimes appear to people. These . . . have been related not only by those who might be suspected of making up fables but also by those who have long shown philosophical rigor” (Numenius, frag. 29; ed. Des Places, p. 80). Listening to such nonsense is appropriate for women (Philo, Post. Cain 166). “In his own explanations, he is full of visions, prodigies, and incredible fables, in a word, of low trickery and the sort of fantastic tales appropriate for women” (Polybius 12.24.5). Galen heaps scorn on a certain Pampylos who prescribed certain incantations during the gathering of medicinal herbs, “this person was given to old wives’ tales and the practices of Egyptian drivelers” (Galen, De simpl. medicam. temp. 6, proem., in C. G. Kühn, Medic. Graec. opera, vol. 11, 971; cf. Achilles Tatius, Leuc. et Clit. 1.8.4). “This senile foolishness that one readily calls drivel” (Cicero, Sen. 36; cf. Horace, Sat. 2.6.77: garrit anilis ex re fabellas; Quintilian, Inst. 1.8); Minucius Felix, Oct. 11.2: aniles fabulas adstruunt; Origen, Cels. 6.34: “What old woman, given to wine, spinning out a fable to put a baby to sleep, would not be ashamed to whisper such twaddle?”

⁶ Cf. the texts cited in C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, pp. 93ff.

⁷ Strabo 10.3.20; cf. 22–23; Polybius 3.38.3: “Those who speak or write of it know nothing and are only passing fables along.” Plutarch hesitates to retell the myth of Thespesios, because of the thought that his account (logos) could pass for a fable (mythos) (Plutarch, De sera 561b); “this tale is more like a fable . . . than a sensible account” (Plutarch, De gen. 21). — The converted pagan Firmicus Maternus wrote a work titled Against the Error of the Profane Religions.

⁸ 1Tim 4:7. The piety of the Essenes was thus distinguished: “before sunrise they did not utter a single profane word” (Josephus, War 2.128).

⁹ Cf. the ἄδολον milk of 1Pet 2:2 and the οὐ καθαρὸν of Hippocrates (Aff. 4.55.1). Ἄδολον is nearly synonymous with καθαρὸν in Pap.Lugd.Bat. XVI, 7, 33.

βιάζομαι

biazomai, to use violence or force

biazomai, S 971; TDNT 1.609–613; EDNT 1.216–217; NIDNTT 3.712; MM 109–110; L&N 20.9, 20.10; BDF §311(1); BAGD 140; ND 6.98–99

Matt 11:12—he basileia ton ouranon biazetai, kai biastai harpazousin auten; Luke 16:16—he basileia tou theou euangelizetai kai pas eis auten biazetai. These verses are among the most enigmatic of the NT, and any proposed interpretation can be only a hypothesis. Neither the rabbinic texts¹ nor the papyri² provide direction for exegesis. The exegesis depends on whether biazetai is passive or middle voice and whether it should be taken in a favorable or an unfavorable sense; but these decisions are determined by the interpretation that one chooses.

We must emphasize that these two texts are not real parallels; each evangelist has not only inserted this logion in a different context but has understood it in a particular way.³ Matthew seems more primitive and Palestinian; Luke fits with a later stage in the propagation of the gospel. So we cannot use one text to explain the other; each has its own particular significance.⁴

Predominant in Matt 11:12 is the idea of violence against the reign and of effort or aggression on the part of people.⁵ All the old versions took biazetai as a passive; but is it transitive or intransitive? In the papyri of the third-fourth century BC, it is used for the violation of a law, as with this woman, who is seeking to have construction banned: “The above-named person coming upon this land in violation of my rights brought in bricks and dug a foundation to build” (P. Enteux. 69, 4; P. Tebt. 779, 5). It is also used when an orphan complains about the encroachments of a neighbor who despises him (P. Enteux. 68, 11). Sometimes what is at issue is the right of the stronger, the compelling of an adversary in spite of himself, without his permission; hence an abuse of power that gives rise to a tort.⁶ Sometimes it is a matter of violence as such and a stroke of force; the owner who calls upon a centurion in AD 31 because he has suffered great violence at the hands of his aggressors (epei de kata polla biazontai me) explains: katabiazomenos de kai synarpozomenos (P. Oxy. 2234, 8, 19; cf. P. Fouad 26, 33). In several papyri, and constantly in literary texts, the verb is used for forced entry into a house (P. Tebt. 804, 9), a route, or a city.⁷

In view of these usages, we may understand Matt 11:12 as follows. From the time of John the Baptist to the present, the reign of God has been the object of violence, and violent or fanatical people assault it or attempt to take it by force. The logion would be about violence that is detrimental to the reign on the part of the Pharisees, the Zealots, members of the Sanhedrin, demonic powers, any Jewish or pagan adversary whatsoever, all persecutors (Acts 5:26; 21:35, bia; cf. Gal 1:13). Christ is a “sign spoken against” (Luke 2:34); John the Baptist is in prison (Matt 11:2), and it is a characteristic of the kingdom of God on earth to be oppressed by the violent, just as the church is attacked violently by the gates of hell.⁸ It would be just as possible to take the passive biazetai in a favorable sense as an allusion to the power inherent in the reign of God, which “forces a way for itself” and deploys itself in force,⁹ but this interpretation loses sight of the meaning of “violent people,” who would then appear to be opponents of this power and would “seize” the reign rather than “receive” it (cf. nevertheless Josephus, Ant. 4.121: do violence to the divine will; War 6.108: “I strive to save people condemned by God”).

The Lucan recension is altogether different. Not only have the biastai disappeared, so that it is no longer a question of seizing or ravishing the kingdom in order to plunder it (harpazo), but the main clause is controlled by the verb euangelizetai,¹⁰ which has its technical biblical sense, “announce glad tidings, good news”; for example, the granting of a favor, or a victory. The Hebrew basar (piel bissar) carries the idea of joy; here, it is the joy of deliverance and salvation, which John the Baptist was the first to announce (Luke 3:18). The Acts of the Apostles will then show that when the preaching of the gospel opens the gates of the kingdom, believers receive the good news with joy. So then, how should we take the second part of the verse—pas eis auten biazetai? It is difficult to think of a person entering the kingdom of God as being under compulsion or suffering violence.¹¹ Commentators just as easily take biazetai as a middle, as is often the case in the papyri, either in a positive sense (“everyone strives to get in”) or in a negative sense (“everyone uses violence in his own interest”); this last meaning does not yield any sense, because it is too universal.

P. H. Menoud considers the verb to be a passive and suggests translating “each one is expressly invited to enter.” He justifies this sense, which harmonizes perfectly with the preceding clause, on the basis of the weakened meaning that biazomai has taken on over the centuries.¹² Actually, biazomai in the LXX often translates the Hebrew pasar, “urge someone through words or prayers” and has the sense of “insist,” with the interlocutor “accepting” the demand made of him of his own free will, having the freedom to refuse (Gen 33:11; Judg 19:7; 2Sam 13:25, 27; 2Kgs 5:23); a meaning well attested in the literature¹³ and confirmed by a papyrus from AD 22, in which Serapion confesses that he is the object of friendly persuasion by friends: “I was pressed by my friends to enter the service of Apollonios” (ego de biazomai hypo philon genesthai oikakos tou archistatoros Apolloniou).¹⁴ This weakened sense seems to apply also in a rule relating to the Lycian sanctuary of Men Tyrannos in the second century AD, where biazomai has an absolute and reflexive meaning: having detailed the preliminary purification rituals (garlic, pork, sexual abstinence), the founder forbids the offering of any sacrifice out of his presence or without his permission (aneu tou katheidrysamenou to hieron), immediately adding: eande tis biasetai (and if anyone violates), his offering will not be pleasing to the god.¹⁵ There is no question of a violator's forcing entrance into the temple, but simply of his transgressing the rule and sacrificing anyway.¹⁶

If we add that biazomai expresses not only obstinate determination (Judg 13:15-16) but the firmness of a decision and zeal in carrying it out,¹⁷ we can understand Luke 16:16 in terms of the dynamis inherent in the apostolic preaching: the reign of God is announced with power and absolutely every person—with no categories whatsoever—is in a hurry to follow the way and enter in; “each one forces his entrance.”¹⁸

¹ D. Daube, The New Testament and Rabbinic Judaism, London, 1956, pp. 285–300.

² Moulton-Milligan, p. 109.

³ Cf. M. Black, Aramaic Approach, p. 84, n. 2; p. 264, n. 3.

⁴ On the exegesis of the first proposition of each verse, cf. W. G. Kümmel, “Das Gesetz und die Propheten gehen bis Johannes’—Lukas XVI, 16 im Zusammenhang der heilsgeschichtlichen Theologie der Lukasschriften,” in Verborum Veritas: Festschrift G. Stählin, Wuppertal, 1980, pp. 89–102.

⁵ Βιάζεται, βιασταί, ἀρπάζουσιν. The pair βιάζομαι–ἀρπάζω is also found at least five times in Plutarch (H. Almqvist, Plutarch und das Neue Testament, Uppsala, 1946, p. 38). Cf. A. H. M’Neile, The Gospel According to St. Matthew, London, 1952, p. 155ff. In Josephus, cf. the precise and thorough study of W. E. Moore, “Βιάζω, Ἀρπάζω and Cognates in Josephus,” (in NTS, vol. 21, 1975, pp. 519–543) = those who had the first claim on the kingdom of God made themselves unworthy of it by their violence; violence is contrary to the nature of the kingdom, which cannot be established by the force of arms. Cf. Plutarch, C. Gracch. 15.4: “It is through violence and steel that proceedings are settled.”

⁶ P.Tebt. 6, 20 = C.Ord.Ptol. n. 47: “Certain ones are seizing land without contracts, not paying the revenues due from them” (a circular of Ptolemy Euergetes II, from 140/139 BC); Dittenberger, Syl. 888, 24; P.Cair.Zen. 59451, 6: the chief of police Leontiskos forced us to go make bricks; P.Tebt. 780, 6; P.Ryl. 659, 9: the tax collectors want to compel me; P.Fay. 20, 2; P.Flor. 296, 24: βιάσασθαί με παρὰ τὸν τοῦ δικαίου λόγον (sixth century AD); SB 8033, 15: παρὰ τὸ καθήκον βιαζόμενος; 7657, 15; 9328, 13: βιάζεται ἡμα—ς παρὰ τὸ ἔθος. Josephus, Ant. 4.143: βιάζεται τοὺς νόμους; 14.173: β. τὸ δίκαιον; Menander, Dysk. 253: “It is the law that defends him against compulsion, and his character that defends him against persuasion”; Plutarch, De garr. 2: “Garrulous people take the floor by force”; Phoc. 2.9: “God governs the world without using violence”; 9.7: “you can indeed force me to do what I do not want to do”; Cat. Min. 18.4: “those whom one was trying to compel”; Ti. Gracch. 19.4; C. Gracch. 8.6: “The eminent ones invited Livius Drusus to join them, but without violence, without clashing with the crowd”; 12.7.

⁷ 2Macc 14:41; Philo, Moses 1.108, 1.215; Epictetus 4.7.20: “no closed door for me, but for those who want to force it”; Josephus, War 2.262: take Jerusalem by force; 4.554: “Vespasian entered Hebron by main force”; 5.59: “Titus forced a way through to his own”; 5.112: force entrance; Josephus, Ant. 17.253: he had attempted to take their fortresses by force, etc.; Thucydides 7.83.5; Diodorus Siculus 2.19.7; 17. 68. 2: the Macedonians forced their way, were obliged to withdraw; Polybius 5.4.9: force passage. Often, in the OT and the writers who draw their inspiration from it, βιάζομαι means “do violence to a woman,” Deut 22:25 (hazaq), 28 (taphas); Esth 7:8 (kabash); Josephus, Ant. 2.58, 4.252, 7.152, 7.168, 11.265; Ag. Apion 2.201, 2.215; Josephus, War 1.439. The verb is frequently used with respect to surgery (cf. W. K. Hobart, Medical Language, p. 179). On the meaning of ἀποβιάζομαι, “seize” or “appropriate by force,” cf. M.-T. Lenger, “Le Fragment de loi ptolémaïque P. Petrie III, 26,” in Studi in onore U. E. Paoli, Florence, 1956, pp. 459–467, and M. Jager, M. Reinsma, “Ein mißverständenes Gesetz aus ptolemäischer Zeit,” in Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIV, pp. 114–115; but also Prov 22:22; 28:24 (gazal) = steal, appropriate unjustly.

⁸ Matt 16:18—we might cite Heb 12:3—Jesus suffered a violent assault by sinners against his person. In favor of this exegesis, cf. Schrenk, in TDNT, vol. 1, pp. 609–614; A. Schlatter, Der Evangelist Matthäus, Stuttgart, 1948, pp. 368ff.; J. Bonsirven, Le Règne de Dieu, Paris, 1957, pp. 44ff.; O. Betz, “Jesu Heiliger Krieg,” in NovT, 1958, pp. 116–137 (comparing our text to the Qumranian eschatological war and identifying the biastai with the ‘arûsîm, hostile demoniac powers and their earthly henchmen: state authorities who presume to preserve the empire of the world and who oppose the blossoming of the reign of God, making it “suffer violence”); M. Brunec, “De legatione Joannis Baptistae, Mt. XI, 2–24,” in VD, 1957, pp. 321–331; F. W. Danker, “Luke XVI, 16: An Opposition Logion,” in JBL, 1958, pp. 231–243 (the kingdom suffers violence in a real sense; it is as if it were the victim of forced entry by sinners; the Pharisees murmured against the salvation given to publicans and against soteriological universalism. The rabbis thought that the kingdom of God was vulnerable to violence; they used the verb kabash of a prophet who “does violence” to his message by keeping silent, as Jonah tried to do; of a rabbi who did violence to the halakah by misinterpreting it or rejecting it; of judges who showed favoritism to the powerful; cf. Str-B, vol. 1, pp. 599ff.); L. Ligier, Péché d'Adam et péché du monde, Paris, 1961, pp. 87ff.; G. Braumann, “Dem Himmerleich wird Gewalt angetan’ (Mt. XI, 12 par.),” in ZNW, 1961, pp. 104–109; J. Héring, “Remarques sur les bases araméennes et hébraïques des Evangiles synoptiques,” in RHPR, 1966, p. 28 (proposing the translation “the kingdom of heaven is oppressed and violent people try to plunder it”).

⁹ M. J. Lagrange, Matthieu, p. 221; M. Black, in ExpT, vol. 63, 1952, p. 290; C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 1, p. 165; R. Schnackenburg, God’s Rule, pp. 85f., 129–131.

¹⁰ The formula εὐαγγελίζεσθαι τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ θεοῦ is peculiar to Luke (4:43; 8:1; Acts 8:12). This evangelization is not aimed at “adversaries,” but at the poor (Luke 7:22).

¹¹ I will at least mention the “compel them to come in” of the parable of the impolite guests (Luke 14:23); but on the one hand the purely parabolic expression must not be taken literally; and on the other hand, ἀνάγκασον εἰσελθεῖν can just as well be translated “invite them to enter.”

¹² P. H. Menoud, “Le sens du verbe BIAZETAΙ dans Lc. XVI, 16,” in Mélanges Rigaux, pp. 207–212 (reprinted in P. Menoud, Jésus-Christ et la Foi, Neuchâtel-Paris, 1975, pp. 125–130). He takes up the exegetical position of F. Godet, Commentaire sur l’Evangile de saint Luc, 3d ed., Neuchâtel, 1889, vol. 2, p. 259. [ET A Commentary on the Gospel of Luke, Edinburgh, 1881–1890, vol. 2, pp. 172–173. It should also be noted that functionaries used violent compulsion (P. Tebt. 61b, second century BC), for example, for carrying out an assignation (UPZ 110). Cf. W. Dahlmann, Ἡ βία im Recht der Papyri, Cologne, 1968; R. Taubenschlag, Law of Greco-Roman Egypt, pp. 446ff.

¹³ Josephus, War 1.83: “The king insists on knowing”; 3.393: “Certain ones insisted on seeing him at closer range”; psychological or moral pressure, as when Eli compels the prophet by oath (Ant. 5.351), Herod “did not cease trying to force Pheroras to separate from his wife” (1.578), certain Romans “strive to have sacrifices offered to God” (6.101); “if one may do this violence to the language” (Ag. Apion 2.165; cf. 150). Circumstances can force you to make a certain decision without taking away your freedom: a storm forced them to encamp in the neighboring villages (War 1.330; cf. Ant. 7.141; 12.429); “I will compel Pharaoh to order the exodus” (Ant. 2.271); Titus asks Simon and John not to force the destruction of the city (War 5.456); the remedies that the sickness forced him to take (Ant. 15.246); the force of fear (13.316); do violence to one’s nature or to fate (4Macc 2:8; 8:24); Xenophon, Symp. 2.26; Menander, Dysk. 371: “Why are you so bent on mistreating yourself, τί κακοπαθει—ν σαυτὸν βιάζει?” Agathocles, negotiating with the Thracians, convinces them to do no harm to the city, μὴ βιάσασθαι τὴν πόλιν (NCIG, n. 6, 19–20; around 200 BC).

¹⁴ P.Oxy. 294, 16; cf. P.Giss. 19, 13: my father forced me to take food (second century AD). Aseneth compels Joseph to allow her to wash his feet (Jos. Asen. 20.3) = a sweet violence! Cf. the insistence of the disciples of Emmaus, παρεβιάσαντο αὐτὸν λέγοντες (Luke 24:29).

¹⁵ Dittenberger, Syl., 1042, 8 (commented on by A. Deissmann, Bible Studies, p. 258); cf. SEG, vol. 23, 76, 8: ε—ἀν δέ τις βιαζόμενος πίνη (around 400 BC).

¹⁶ Cf. P.Wisc. 14, 14, from AD 131: Pannonios the epitropos violated his responsibilities, βιάσηται τὸν ληγα—τον; 47, 38.

¹⁷ Cf. Exod 19:24—“Let the priests and the people not rush out to ascend to Yahweh” (Hebrew haras, break out); Polybius 1.74.5: “the elephants threw themselves against the encampment, βιασαμένων εἰ—ς τὴν παρεμβολήν.” With εἰ—ς, β. is often hostile or pejorative; Josephus, Ant. 12.429: “he forced them to flee, εἰ—ς φυγὴν”; War 3.423: “they strove to get into the open”; Thucydides 1.63.1: “Aristeus decided to force entry into Potidaea, βιάσασθαι ε—ς τὴν Ποτείδαιαν”; 7.69.4; P.Hib. 265, 3: βιάζονται εἰ—ς τὸν —Αρσινοίτην.

¹⁸ French “chacun y force son entrée,” the translation of E. Delebecque (Evangile de Luc, p. 105), who cites Black’s translation: “everyone oppresses it,” thus harmonizing the verse with Matt 11:12. Delebecque also observes “βία denotes obligation as well as violence”: one is legally or morally compelled (Etudes grecques, p. 74). Cf. Διὸς βία, οἶ εοῦ βία, an expression of extreme compulsion, P.Laur., n. 6.

βλαβερός

blaberos, harmful

blaberos, S 983; EDNT 1.219; MM 112; L&N 20.13; BAGD 142

Derived from blabe, “damage, harmfulness” (Wis 11:19), the adjective blaberos describes that which does harm, like vinegar to the teeth or smoke to the eyes (Prov 10:26). People who seek to get rich fall prey to “senseless and baneful desires” (epithymias pollas anoetous kai blaberas, 1Tim 6:9). In various contexts, blaberos can refer to simple inconveniences,¹ that which is injurious,² and even that which is disastrous (Aristotle, Pol. 3.15.13; 1286*b*). Rare in the papyri, it is used for the deterioration of a machine³ or a person’s health.⁴

In 1Tim 6:9, the strong sense of the word is to be understood, because “terror and violence will lay riches waste” (Sir 21:4): instead of the expected multiplication of profits, covetousness that is never satisfied hastens losses that lead to ruin.⁵ Otherwise, the adjective has the judicial and penal sense so often attached to the noun blabe: penalty, pecuniary compensation.⁶ Eternal perdition (cf. eis olethron kai apoleian) would be the compensation, as it were, for the greedy person who prospered here below; that at least is Abraham’s verdict (Luke 16:25).

¹ Ep. Arist. 255: “good counsel in its reflections takes account of the inconveniences associated with the opposed solution.”

² Aristotle, Pol. 3.16.2; 1287*a*: “it is injurious to the body to give unequal beings equal food or clothing”; Ep. Arist. 192: “God shows to those whose prayers he does not answer that which would have been harmful to them”; Plutarch, An vitiositas 4: the Parthian poison is injurious and harmful only to those who are sensitized to it; Phoc. 12.3: undisciplined soldiers are injurious for the combatants.

³ P.Tebt. 725, 5; a communication from an engineer of the second century BC, μεγάλων βλαβερῶν—ν ε—πιγεγενημένων.

⁴ P.Cair.Goodsp. II, col. I, 6; medical fragment of the second century AD, ὡς βλαβερωτερόν; Plutarch, De curios. 1: “unhealthy and baneful passions.”

⁵ This annihilation of hope allows the qualification of epithymiai by “senseless” (ἀνοήτους), the epithet for the rich person who trusts his fortune to guarantee his future (Luke 12:20, ἄφρων).

⁶ P.Cair.Goodsp. 13, 13: “in addition to damages and expenses”; P.Lips. 3, col. I, 14; 4, 29; 6, col. II, 15; P.Flor. 16, 18. Cf. A. Berger, Die Strafklauseln in den Papyrusurkunden, 2d ed., Aalen, 1965, pp. 26ff., 133, 186. D. Hennig, “Die Arbeitsverpflichtungen der Pächter,” in ZPE, 1972, p. 115.

γαστήρ

gaster, belly, womb

gaster, S 1064; EDNT 1.239; MM 121; L&N 8.68, 23.19, 23.50; BAGD 152

The “belly” is an organ of the body distinct from the stomach (stomachos) and the intestines (koilia), making up one of its internal parts.¹ “The great blood vessels pass above the belly” (Hippocrates, Nat. Hom. 11; 196.4). Its functions, changes, and diseases are described.² In the OT, the Hebrew beten, related to the Akkadian bântu, “eminence, prominent part,” can refer to a protuberance in a pillar;³ but usually it refers to the inside of a person, especially in contradistinction to the lips, the organ of externalization.⁴ If the seat of wisdom is in the belly (Job 32:18-19; Prov 20:27), it is because certain words, spoken of as if they were delicacies, descend “into the chambers of the belly,” to the depths (Prov 18:8; 26:22).

“Belly” is substituted for the mother’s womb.⁵ The expression “to have in the belly” (echein en gastri) as a way of saying that a woman is pregnant is first attested in Herodotus 3.32 with respect to the wife of Cambyses; the LXX uses this expression to translate the Hebrew harâh.⁶ It is used almost constantly in the NT,⁷ notably for the Virgin Mary (heurethe en gastri echousa, Matt 1:18), fulfilling the prophecy of Isa 7:14.

But “to conceive” was also expressed syllambanein en gastri (Gen 25:21), especially in the medical writings.⁸ It is therefore not surprising that Doctor Luke put the angel’s announcement to Mary this way: kai idou syllepse en gastri kai texe huion.⁹

Gaster is often used with a pejorative nuance, for example in Philo,¹⁰ who denounces its desires (Creation 158; Alleg. Interp. 3.149; Spec. Laws 1.192; 4.96) and its pleasures.¹¹ It is insatiable (Dreams 2.147, 208) and must be mastered (Prelim. Stud. 80; Spec. Laws 2.195; 4.127). It is with this meaning that Titus 1:12 cites Epimenides of Cnossos, who calls the Cretans “idle bellies” (gasteres argai). Already in Homer, Melantheus insults the swineherd by saying that he would rather “fill his belly” than work.¹² The insult became traditional; cf. the disdain of the Muses: “Shepherds . . . who are nothing but bellies” (Hesiod, Th. 26). At Rome, L. Veturius was drummed out of the equestrian order because “from neck to groin he was nothing but a belly” (Plutarch, Cat. Mai. 9.6); the materialistic turncoats of Alexandria apostasized “for the love of their belly” (3Macc 7:11; cf. Phil 3:19); “rebels against the divine law, incapable of restraint . . . in the quest for pleasures of the belly and the entrails” (Philo, Virtues 182); whereas Socrates considered humans as related to the gods, “we, on the other hand, regard them as bellies, as guts, as sexual organs” (Epictetus 1.9.26). J. M. Edmonds quotes an anonymous writer: “the whole body is a belly.”¹³

¹ Philo, Creation 118; Post. Cain 8. But man is said to “throw himself on his belly” (Flight 31 = position himself at table), and the serpent, “an animal without feet, is slumped on its belly” (Creation 157; Migr. Abr. 65; Spec. Laws 4.113); Josephus, Ant. 20.18; P.Oxy. 2810, 14.

² “The belly has no intelligence, but through it we are aware of thirst or hunger” (Vict. 12.2). It is made to feed and strengthen the body, not as an organ for pleasure, like the root of a plant (Musonius, frag. 18 b; ed. C. E. Lutz, p. 118, 9). It has a “prodigious function” (Philo, Alleg. Interp. 1.83); tortured by hunger (Moses 1.195), it is “filled” with food (Contemp. Life 55; cf. Alleg. Interp. 3.145; Jer 51:34, Hebrew keres) and satisfied (Philo, Spec. Laws 4.82; Virtues 126, 135), but it can be overloaded (Philostratus, Gym. 48): “Greeks measure their food by the capacity of their belly” (Xenophon, Lac. 2.1). If a person changes habits, “the belly is thrown off” (Hippocrates, Acut., Appendix 42.1); “a walk after dinner dries it out” (Vict. 4.49.2; 4.54.2). There can be “pain in the belly” (Loc. Hom. 20; 47.4). Agrippa dies after five days of abdominal pain (Josephus, Ant. 19.350). The belly is shrunken (Philostratus, Gym. 34–35), or swollen (Num 5:22; Hippocrates, Acut. 51.1; Nat. Hom. 21.214.16; Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.148–150; Spec. Laws 3.62) and produces colic (Hippocrates, Nat. Hom. 20.212.7); “dropsy can concern the belly alone” (Aff. 4.57.2). Philo often identifies or associates the belly with sexual functions (Alleg. Interp. 3.157; Worse Attacks Better 113; Post. Cain 155; Giants 15; Dreams 1.122; Moses 1.160).

³ 1Kgs 7:20; cf. P. Dhorme, Emploi métaphorique, pp. 107, 133–134. Compare γαστήρ, the rounded part of a shield (Tyrtæus 11.24); γάστρα, the belly of a vase (Dioscorides 5.103, 144); a swollen pouch of processed meat: a sausage (Aristophanes, Nub. 409).

⁴ The interior of an object is called “the belly.” Jonah (Jonah 2:3-4) was in “the belly of Sheol . . . in the depths of the sea.” Cf. Flight 204: “that which is hidden in the belly.”

⁵ Hebrew rehem. Cf. “the mother’s belly” (Judg 16:17), a child described as “son of the belly” or “fruit of the belly” (Gen 30:2; Ps 127:3). Cf. Hippocrates, Carn. 6.3: “the child in the belly” (ε—ν τῇ γαστρῷ); P.Lond. 1713, 30; SB 7288, 2: γαστρὸς ἔχουσα ὄγκον; Philo, Moses 1.19. The epitaph for Heroïs, dead at eighteen years: γαστρὸς ἔχουσα ὄγκον (SB 5718); cf. Euripides, Ion 15. Ps.-Phocylides 184 prescribes: “a woman shall not destroy the fetus in her belly”; likewise Sib. Or. 2.281.

⁶ With respect to Hagar (Gen 16:4, 5, 11), Samson's mother (Judg 13:3, 5, 7); cf. Gen 38:24-25; Exod 21:22; 2Kgs 8:12; 15:16; Isa 40:11; Hos 14:1; Job 21:10. It is also a secular usage, Hippocrates, Nat. Puer. 15.1; 18.4; 21.3; 30.3-5; Mul. 1.1, 3; Artemidorus Daldianus, Onir. 2.18; 3.32; P.Cair.Zen. 59328, 21; P.Wisc. 78, 21; P.Lond. 2053, 3; P.Magd. 4, 6 (the complaint of a klerouchos concerning the theft of eight pigs, not counting the piglets and a pregnant white sow that was killed by the criminals, τὴν ε—τέραν ἀπέκτειναν λευκὴν, ε—ν γαστρὶ ἔχουσαν); P.Tebt. 800, 29 (142 BC); P.Ryl. 68, 13 (89 BC); PSI 1440, 1 (second-third century AD); P.Flor. 130, 3 (third century).

⁷ Matt 24:19—"Woe to the women who are with child" (ταί—ς ε—ν γαστρὶ ε—χούσαις, Mark 13:17; Luke 21:23). At the Parousia, the woes of humanity are analogous to those of a woman who is going to give birth (ὡσπερ ἡ ὠδὶν τῇ γαστρὶ ε—χούση, 1Thess 5:3). In Rev 12:2, the Christian community, facing the dragon, "is pregnant (γυνὴ . . . ε—ν γαστρὶ ἔχουσα) and cries out in her labor pains." — The NT does not use the expression λαβεῖ—ν ε—ν γαστρὶ, "receive in the womb," i.e., "conceive, carry young" (Hippocrates, Nat. Puer. 13.1; Carn. 19.1; Aristotle, HA 9.50.8; Gen 30:41; 38:18; Exod 2:2, 22; Num 11:12; 2Sam 11:5; 2Kgs 4:17; 1Chr 7:23; Isa 8:3; 26:18; Philo, Prelim. Stud. 131, 135, 138), also written λαμβάνειν ε—ν γαστρὶ (Hippocrates, Nat. Puer. 15.4; Philo, Prelim. Stud. 130, 135).

⁸ Hippocrates, Dioscorides, Galen. Numerous references given in Hobart, Medical Language, 1882, pp. 91-92.

⁹ Luke 1:31. The formula is apparently pleonastic (for Elizabeth, we have only συνέλαβεν, Luke 1:24, 36). R. Laurentin (Structure et théologie de Luc I-II, Paris, 1957, p. 68) thinks that Luke wanted to emphasize the dwelling of Yahweh in the womb (Hebrew beqerem) of the Daughter of Zion, in the ark of the covenant (according to Zeph 3:15 b, 17 a; Isa 12:6). Cf. H. Quecke, "Lukas I, 31 in den alten Übersetzungen," in Bib, 1965, pp. 333-348; R. Schürmann, Das Lukasevangelium, Freiburg, Basel, Vienna, 1969, p. 46.

¹⁰ Joseph 154; Moses 2.156; Spec. Laws 1.174; Good Man Free 156; To Gaius 275

¹¹ Alleg. Interp. 1.86; 2.26, 76; 3.62, 114, 138, 141, 144; Cherub. 93; Sacr. Abel and Cain 33, 49; Flight 35; Joseph 61; Moses 2.23; Spec. Laws 1.150; 2.163; 3.43; Virtues 208

¹² Od. 17.228. P. Chantraine, "Remarques sur la langue et le vocabulaire du Corpus hippocratique," in La Collection hippocratique (Colloque de Strasbourg, 1972), Leiden, 1975, pp. 37–39. Cf. Jer 51:34—Nebuchadnezzar “has filled his belly.”

¹³ Γαστήρ ὅλον τὸ σω—μα . . . ἔρπον τοι—θ ὀδοῦσί ηρίον, J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 3 A, p. 418, n. 392 a. For the Latin writers, cf. C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, p. 610; J. Taillardat, Suétone: Des Terms injurieux, Paris, 1967, pp. 62, 87.

γνήσιος

gnesios, authentic, dear, legitimate

see also ἀνυπόκριτος, γνήσιος; ὑποκρίνομαι, ὑπόκρισις, ὑποκριτής

gnesios, S 1103; TDNT 1.727; EDNT 1.225; MM 128–129; L&N 73.1; BAGD 162–163

As opposed to the adopted son or to the illegitimate child (nothos, Heb 12:8; Menander, Sam. 236–237; Philo, Dreams 2.47), gnesios modifies the child born of a legitimate marriage: “the title of legitimate child belongs to the one who is a son by blood.”¹ In practice, this juridical meaning becomes synonymous with “authentic, true, real,” and it is with this meaning that Paul addresses Timothy as “gnesios child in (the) faith” (gnesio tekno en pistei, 1Tim 1:2) and Titus as “gnesios child according to a common faith” (gnesio tekno kata koinen pistin).² In the Hellenistic period, this term takes on an emotional density attested notably in the papyri and the inscriptions, where it means “dear” or “much beloved.”³

I. — It is used for children, with a very affectionate nuance; Isaac is “son . . . gnesios, beloved, and only” (huios . . . gnesios, agapetos, kai monos);⁴ Meltinianos reserves a place in his tomb for “my dear children” (ta gnesia mou paidia, MAMA, VIII, 595; CII 739). It is used for women—mothers or wives—with a clear nuance of love: “in memory of my dear wife Agelais” (Agelaïdi gynaikei gnesia mneias heneken);⁵ for parents, “my sweetest and most gnesios father” (ton glykytaton kai gnesion patera, BCH, 1883, p. 274, n. 15; cf. Philo, To Gaius 62, 71; MAMA, I, 361, 365); for brothers and sisters: “do not trade a true brother for gold from Ophir”;⁶ and finally for friends, compatriots, companions, and “dear colleagues”: gnesios erastes; ⁷ “let them not forget their true friends.”⁸ This is the meaning when St. Paul writes, “For your part, Syzygos, true yokefellow, I ask you to come to the aid” of Euodia and Syntyche.⁹ In addition to the word-play, the designation is affectionate.¹⁰ To convey this nuance, 1Tim 1:2 and Titus 1:4 should be translated “dear and true child.”

II. — In addition, gnesios is used in a religious sense for the transmitters of revelation. Isis to Horus: “He made me swear not to pass on the revelation, except only to my child and dear friend” (ei me monon tekno kai philo gnesio).¹¹ More generally, it modifies the authorized interpreter of a teaching: Aristotle is “the most authentic disciple of Plato”;¹² in a more specialized sense, it refers to the legitimate heir to whom a father passes on his authority and command (Philo, Virtues 59; To Gaius 24; cf. Spec. Laws 4.184; Josephus, Ant. 17.45). It may stand comparison to the position at court of the “king’s friend”; for Eleazer, for example, King Ptolemy is a sincere friend.¹³ These latter nuances fit well with the case of the apostle’s representatives at Ephesus and Crete. Not only does their spiritual father show tender affection for them that will gain honor for them among Christians,¹⁴ but they are representatives vested with a legitimate authority that cannot rightly be contested; they are, in the final analysis, authentic interpreters of his doctrine, the faithful echo, as it were, of Paul’s voice (cf. Philo, Contemp. Life 72, and 2Tim 3:10).

III. — When modifying things, gnesios refers to those which are appropriate, well suited for their purpose;¹⁵ with respect to a service, rendering a service sincerely means rendering it effectively;¹⁶ thus should be understood the exhortation to the Corinthians to be generous toward the saints at Jerusalem (to tes hymeteras agapes gnesion dokimazon, 2Cor 8:8; cf. P.Ant. 188, 16: to gnesion endeixesthai; P.Lond. 1041, 2: gnesion agapen). They must prove the authenticity of their love, to be sure; but their alms are “normal.”¹⁷ The external, material gesture only gives “proper” expression to the internal urgency of love. But there is beauty and honor in showing oneself “true” (cf. Philo, Post. Cain 102), in demonstrating one’s intimate feelings: gnesios kai endoxos.¹⁸

¹ Demosthenes, C. Leoch. 44.49: τὸ μὲν γὰρ γνήσιόν ἐ—στιν, ὅταν ἡ γόνῳ γεγονός. The natural father is the πατήρ γόνῳ, the adoptive father ποιητός (Lysias, C. Agor. 13.91). P.Vindob.Bosw. 5, 11: πρὸς γάμου κοινωνίαν τέκνων γνησίων σπορα—ς ἔνεκεν (with the note of the editor); P.Oxy. 1267, 15; cf. F. Schulz, “Roman Registers of Births and Birth Certificates,” in JRS, 1942, pp. 78–91; 1943, pp. 55–64. M. Scheller, “Griech. γνήσιος, altind. játya und Verwandtes,” in Festschrift Debrunner, Berne, 1954, pp. 399–407.

² Titus 1:4. On spiritual begetting and the designation “son” as implying disciple and successor, cf. P. Gutierrez, Paternité spirituelle, pp. 225ff. et passim.

³ This meaning was noted and strongly emphasized by L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 13, Paris, 1966, pp. 218ff.

⁴ Philo, Abraham 168; cf. Moses 1.15: the daughter of Pharaoh takes pity on the infant Moses, “her heart full of maternal affection, as if he were her own child, ὡς ἐ—πὶ γνησίῳ παιδί”; Spec. Laws 4.203: “the sweet hope of begetting legitimate children”; Good Man Free 87; CII 2, 739; MAMA 8, 220: Λούκιος —Ιωάννη ἀναγνώστη φιλτάτῳ καὶ γνησίῳ υἱ—ῶ—; cf. 6, 358; 368; 7, 427: τοῦ γνησίου μου τέκνου; 565; H. Gregoire, Asie Mineure, n. 74, 310.

⁵ SEG 6, 232; cf. P.Eleph. 1, 3; MAMA 4, 305: τῇ γλυκυτάτῃ τεκούσῃ Μελτίνῃ καὶ γνησίᾳ γυναικί —Αμμία; 1, 358. The superlative glykytatos, synonymous with philtatos, “dearest,” recurs constantly as a feminine epithet (7, 162, 272, 274, 382, 390, 548; 8, 252; I.Side, 120; cf. H. Koskenniemi, Studien zur Idee und Phraseologie des griechischen Briefes, Helsinki, 1956, pp. 97ff.)

⁶ Sir 7:18. Cf. P.Gron. 10, 9: ἡ ἐ—μὴ γνεσιωτάτῃ ἀδελφῇ Σενεπόνυχος; P.Osl. 132, 8; P.Lond. 992, 5; 1007, 10; 1244, 5; P.Michael 45, 3: Κολλοῦθος γνήσιος αὐτοῦ ἀδελφὸς ἐ—κ τῶ—ν αὐτῶ—ν γονέων; P.Oxy. 48, 12: τοῦ μετηλλαχότος αὐτῆς γνησίου ἀδελφοῦ (AD 86); 2584, 30: πρὸς τὸν ὁμογνήσιόν μου ἀδελφόν; SB 9395, 12; 9770, 10; SEG 8, 621, 19: “dear Philhermes, who was an affectionate and true brother to me, not according to nature—for by nature he was my cousin—but by his tenderness”; C.P.Herm. 49,3.

⁷ “Dear lover,” an inscription from the area of Rome (published by L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 4, Paris, 1948, p. 33); BGU 86, 19: τὸν γνήσιον αὐτοῦ φίλον. F. Cumont, Pontica, n. 20, 26: ἐ—ν πα—σιν εὖστοργον καὶ γνήσιον φίλον . . . μνημονεύω.

⁸ P.Fouad 54, 34. M. Naldini, Il Cristianesimo in Egitto, n. 58, 5: φίλον γνήσιον; B. Latyschev, Inscriptiones Antiquae, vol. 4, n. 425: Callisthenes to Onesimos, τῶ— εἰ—δίῳ γνησίῳ φίλῳ; P.Apoll. 24, 1: “I have already written to your remarkable and noble Friendship, τῇ περιβλέπτῳ σου γνησία φιλία”; P.Ness. 47, 2: ἀσπάζω σε τὸν ἐ—μοῦ γνήσιων φίλων ὄντα, δέσποτα; 68, 2, 7.

⁹ Phil 4:3. On this text, cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, p. 587, n. 5. For the name Syntyche, cf. P.IFAO II, n. 7, 1.

¹⁰ Γνήσιος is a common term of affinity; cf. a decree of Tenos: γνησίαν ἔχοντι πρὸς πάντας φιλοστοργίαν (C. Michel, Recueil, 394, 49; middle of the first century BC); a decree of Sestos: πρὸ πλείστου θέμενος τὸ πρὸς τὴν πατρίδα γνήσιον καὶ ἐ—κτενές (ibid., 327, 7); a decree of Chersonese: ἀγάπαν γνασίαν ἐ—νδείκνυται, (B.Latyschev, Inscriptiones Antiquae, vol. 1, 359, 6 = L. Robert, Opera Minora Selecta, vol. 1, p. 311, n. 2); letter of Herakleotes to Hadrian: πάσαι σπουδα—ι καὶ πάσα φιλοστοργία κεχραμένοι γνασῖαι (L. Robert, ibid.); P.Lond. 1917, 14: ἀγαπητὰ ἡ γνησιώταται καὶ ἀξιώταται; I.Delos, 1512: γνησίως καὶ προθύμως.

¹¹ In M. Berthelot, Collection des anciens alchimistes grecs, 2d ed., London, 1963, p. 34, 6; cf. A. J. Festugière, L'Expérience religieuse du médecin Thessalos, in RB, 1939, p. 51; Hermès Trismégiste, vol. 1, p. 259.

¹² Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Pomp. 1: ὁ γνησιώτατος αὐτοῦ μαθητής; Claudius to the Alexandrians: “My brother Germanicus, addressing you γνησιωτέρας ὑμα—ς φωναί—ς” (P.Lond. 1912, 27; with the note of H. I. Bell, Jews and Christians in Egypt, p. 31); Philodemus of Gadara, Adv. Soph., frag. γ III, 5: γνήσιος ἀναγνώστης; cf. i3, 11–12.

¹³ Ep. Arist. 41: φίλω γνησίω (with the commentary of A. Pelletier, Josèphe adaptateur, p. 112; idem, Philon in Flaccum, Paris, 1967, p. 159); Dittenberger, Or. 308, 7–8, 13–15: the Attalid queen Apollonis and her sons.

¹⁴ Cf. this inscription of Palmyra: γνησίως καὶ φιλοτείμως παράσταντα, published by C. Dunant, Le Sanctuaire de Baalshamin à Palmyre, Rome, 1971, n. 45 A, 3, and J. T. Milik, Dédicaces faites par les dieux, Paris, 1972, p. 74.

¹⁵ P.Giss. 47, 4: ε—πὶ τω— κατὰ τὰς εὐχὰς γνήσια καὶ λείαν ἄξια εὐρήσθαι; 15: παραζώνιον γὰρ πρὸς τὸ παρὸν γνήσιον οὐκ εὐρέθη; cf. Philo, Prov. 2.24: “and who with the thought of the genuine [γνησίω] before them would not disregard the spurious for its sake” (LCL)

¹⁶ Philo, Unchang. God 116; Worse Attacks Better 21; 3Macc 3:19— γνήσιον βούλονται φέρειν. This is very often the meaning of the adverb γνήσιως; cf. 2Macc 14:8: “sincere (effective) care for the interests of the king”; Phil. 2:20—“I really have no one like him to take a sincere (effective) interest in your situation”; P.Tebt. 326, 11: προστήσεσθαι γνησίως τοῦ παιδίου = he will effectively protect the child; hence the meaning “regularly, conformably to the rule” (P.Fouad 6, 10); SB 7655, 33; 9935, 15: οἷς ἀπ ἀρχῆς τὴν τε φιλίαν καὶ τὴν συμμαχίαν γνησίως συντητήρηκα; Pap. Lugd.Bat. XI, 7, 15.

¹⁷ Cf. BGU 248, 21: τὰ ἔργα τω—ν ἀμπέλων ι—δίω γνησίως γενέσθω; I.Magn. 188, 9: ε—ν πάσαις ται—ς τῆς πατρίδος χρεῖαις γνησίως προνοήσαντα; Dittenberger, Syl. 708, 10: τειχοποιὸς ἀνδρηότατα μὲν καὶ γνησιώτατα τῆς ε—πιμελήας τω—ν ἔργων προέστη; SEG, vol. 4, 600, 11.

¹⁸ Dittenberger, Syl. 721, 42; SEG, vol. 15, 849, 3: “Having aided with nobility and generosity (γνησίως καὶ φιλοτείμως) the merchants, the caravans, and the citizens”; cf. Polybius 4.30.4: οἱ— γνήσιοι τῶ—ν ἀνδρῶ—ν = well-born men. In the sixth-seventh century, Γνήσιε = Your Brotherliness, a title of respect (P.Apoll. 37, 12; cf. P.Ant. 188, 1; P.Ness. 75, 1).

δειλία, δειλιάω, δειλός

deilia, faintheartedness, cowardice, fear; deiliao, to be fearful; deilos, fearful

deilia, S 1167; EDNT 1.281; MM 138; L&N 25.266; BAGD 173 | deiliao, S 1168; EDNT 1.281; MM 138; L&N 25.267; BAGD 173 | deilos, S 1169; EDNT 1.281; MM 138; L&N 25.268; BAGD 173

Associated with phobos (Wis 4:17), eklysis (2Macc 3:24), anandria (cf. 4Macc 6:20), atolmia (Philo, Virtues 25; Josephus, Ant. 4.298; 15.142; Aeneas Tacticus, Polior. 16.20), faintheartedness or cowardice can be defined as “a failure of spirit caused by fear.”¹ Rarely mentioned in the papyri, it is used for mere reserve or abstention,² a lack of courage and of reaction, a sort of torpor,³ and finally fright (tarasso, Ps 55:4; John 14:27; Josephus, Ant. 5.216) which can become panic and terror⁴ in the face of extreme danger.

I. — Jesus reproaches the apostles for this psychological fear when they are terrified by the storm (Matt 8:26; Mark 4:40), because it involves a moral deficiency:⁵ they no longer have faith, or they have but little faith in the presence of the Savior, who has to reassure them. Reference is made to the wisdom literature: when one relies on God, there is nothing to fear.⁶

II. — When Rev 21:8 places the fainthearted and the unbelieving in the lake of fire, it has in view Christians during times of persecution who, out of a fear of suffering, renounce their faith. It is a commonplace that human courage and cowardice are revealed in the face of death;⁷ the latter is expressed in flight before danger,⁸ but it also lays hold of the lazy farmer (Josephus, War 3.42; P.Tebt. 58, 27) and the athlete⁹ and every human heart that weakens (literally “melts,” Isa 13:7, Hebrew masas), even the hearts of apostles facing eschatological trials (John 14:27). Cowardice can then be defined as “a more serious disease than those which afflict the body, because it destroys the faculties of the soul” (Philo, Virtues 26) and seen as a major vice, characteristic of base souls.¹⁰

III. — “God has given us a spirit not of faintheartedness but of strength and love” (2Tim 1:7). St. Paul encourages his young and timid disciple not to be frightened at the difficulties of his post; more precisely, he stirs up “the good soldier of Jesus Christ” (2Tim 2:3) to undertake and pursue combat (1Tim 1:18) according to the traditional military maxim, dating back to Deuteronomy: “Conquer . . . fear not and be not disheartened.”¹¹ The fainthearted are excluded from the army;¹² cravenness was the vice most opposed to courage in combat (Sir 37:11; Philo, Moses 1.233; 1.235). It goes without saying that strength and hardiness are required above all in a leader: “faintheartedness and cravenness in private life bring dishonor to those afflicted by them, but in a general charged with responsibilities, they become a public calamity and a great disaster” (Polybius 3.81.7).

¹ Theophrastus, Char. 25.1.

² A prisoner condemned to die writes to the emperor: “I shall not be afraid to tell you the truth” (P.Paris 68 c 4); P.Giss. 40, 11; Philo, Good Man Free 21, 159; Josephus, Ant. 10.5: “Out of cowardice, he did not come himself but sent three of his friends.”

³ Lev 26:36—“I will cause them to have weakness of heart, . . . the noise of a falling leaf will put them to flight, they will flee as one flees the sword, and they will fall even when no one is pursuing them”; Prov 19:15; 2Macc 3:24. Menander, Sam. 125: “I am losing heart, now that the matter is at hand” (synonym of weakling, coward, ἀνδρόγυνος; 128). Plutarch, Fab. 17.5: “the cowardice and apathy of Fabius (δειλία καὶ ψυχρότης)”; Cleom. 33.7: the cravenness of Ptolemy. Cf. Plutarch, Ant. 93.4.

⁴ 1Macc 4:32—“Sow panic in their ranks, dissolve their confidence in their might, and let them be distressed by their defeat” (prayer of Judas Maccabeus in the face of the invasion of Lysias); Josephus, War 6.212: “Terrified in this circumstance alone” (an account of cannibalism); Quintus of Smyrna, Posthomerica 5.187. “Cowardice and faintheartedness” of the soldiers (Polybius 5.85.13).

⁵ For the textual variants, cf. V. Taylor, The Gospel According to St Mark, London, 1952, p. 276. The Palestinian and Curetonian Syriac suppress the reproach; Jesus simply says “Fear not” and says nothing about faith (cf. G. Gander, L’Evangile de l’église, Geneva, 1970, vol. 1, p. 57). According to Ben Sirach, the heart of the sage, set firmly upon thought-out convictions, will be fearless when the time comes (Sir 22:16); on the other hand, the timid heart, with its foolish convictions, will not stand firm before any fear whatsoever (22:18); cf. J. Hadot, Penchant mauvais et volonté libre dans la Sagesse de Ben Sira, Brussels, 1970, p. 117); 2:12—“Unhappy are the faint hearts and the limp hands,” which have no strength for combat. Cf. 2Chr 13:7—“Rehoboam, who was young and weak of heart [literally ‘slight,’ Hebrew raq) could not stand up to them.”

⁶ Hebrew pahad; Ps 14:5—“They shall tremble with fear where there is nothing to be afraid of”; 27:1—“Yahweh is the refuge of my life, of whom shall I be afraid?”; 78:53—“Yahweh leads them in safety, they do not tremble”; Sir 34:14—“The one who fears the Lord dreads nothing, he will not be weakhearted, for he is his hope”; T. Sim. 2.3; on the fear of the pilot in the storm, cf. Josephus, War 3.368.

⁷ Ps 55:4—“My heart is troubled within me, the fear of death is upon me”; 2Macc 15:8—Judas Maccabeus “urged those who were with him not to dread the attack of the Gentiles”; 4Macc 6:20–21—“It would be a shameful thing for us to prolong our lives for a few days during which our cowardice would make us a general laughingstock . . . if we incur through our faintheartness the scorn of the tyrant”; 14:4—“None of the seven young men trembled, none hesitated in the face of death”; Josephus, War 3.365: “it is cowardice to be unwilling to die when necessary”; 7.382; Ant. 6.215: Melcha fears for the life of her husband; Plutarch, De sera 11; associated with softness (19); with cravenness (De laude 13); Alex. 50.10–11; 58.4; Phoc. 9.2–3 (as a synonym of ἀνανδρος and the opposite of θαρσαλέος); Cat. Min. 22.3; 58.8; Diodorus Siculus 17.15.2: “Those who were not willing to die to save the city Phocion reproached for their lack of manliness and their cowardliness.”

⁸ Menander, Dysk. 123: “I beg you, flee! That would be faintheartedness (δειλία)”; Philo, Worse Attacks Better 37: “Our enemies treat this evasion (ὄκνον) as cowardliness; for our friends it’s prudence.”

⁹ Philostratus, Gym. 25: εἰ— θαρσαλέος ἢ δειλός.

¹⁰ Wis 9:14; 17:10; Philo, Husbandry 17; Sacr. Abel and Cain 15; Epictetus 4.1.109. Zeno (in Stobaeus, Ecl. 2.7.5a; vol. 2, pp. 57–58); an anonymous author of the first century comments: δειλός τὸν πόνον φεύγων (in J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 3 A, p. 368, n. 115f.). Cf. Lucian, Nav. 33: “I am too fainthearted and I would not able to bear being far from home.”

¹¹ The word of Yahweh to Moses before the conquest of the Promised Land (Deut 1:21); Moses to the people: “Be strong and courageous. Fear not, and tremble not before them” (Deut 31:6); to Joshua (Deut 31:8; Josh 1:9; 8:1); Joshua to the people (Josh 10:25).

¹² Deut 20:8; Judg 7:3; 1Macc 3:56—“He told those who were afraid to return home.” Disqualifying cowardice, Philo, Virtues 22, 25; Husbandry 154; Plutarch, Fab. 7.6: “Soldiers weakhearted enough to let themselves be taken by the enemy”; Aem. 19.4: “Heracles does not receive fainthearted sacrifices offered by the fainthearted”; cf. Onasander 14.1.

δειπνέω

deipneo, to dine

deipneo, S 1172; TDNT 2.34–35; EDNT 1.281–282; NIDNTT 2.520–521, 536; MM 138; L&N 23.20; BAGD 173

In instituting the Eucharist, the Lord blessed the cup meta to deipnesai (Luke 22:20; 1Cor 11:25), and he promised the church at Laodicea, “If anyone hears my voice and opens the door, I will come in with him and dine with him (deipneso) and he with me” (Rev 3:20).

Among the papyri are preserved a certain number of invitations to dinner either in a private home, or in a temple,¹ or above all at the kline of Sarapis,² to which have been compared the NT texts cited above and participation “at the Lord’s table” (1Cor 10:21). In effect, the pagan sacrifice was a meal offered to the god;³ sometimes the god was received at table, sometimes the god invited people to table in the Heraion to rejoice in the divine presence.⁴ For example, at the mystery of Panamara, the priest of Zeus writes to the Rhodians: “Although the god invites all men to his feast and to all he offers a common table and equally honorable roles, nevertheless, as he considers your city worthy of special honors . . . and on account of our having shared together in the same holy things, I invite you to come to the god, I urge all citizens of your city to take part in the joy that he offers you.”⁵ It is the god who offers the meal and presides; one responds to his call; the believer is closely united to his god.

These parallels are interesting from the point of view of linguistics and the history of religions, but the Pauline formulation may be more directly inspired by Mal 1:7, 12; Ezek 39:20; 44:16.

¹ P.Oxy. 111: “Heraïs asks you to dinner on the occasion of the marriage of his children, tomorrow the fifth, at nine o’clock”; P.Oxy. 2678 (in the temple of Sabazios).

² P.Oxy. 110, 523, 1484, 1755, 2592; P.Oslo 157; P.Yale 85: —Ερωτα— σε Διονύσιος δειπνήσαι τῇ κα ει—ς κλείνην Ἡλίου μεγάλου Σαράπιδος ἀπὸ ὥρας θ? ε—ν τῇ πατρικῇ ε—αυτοῦ οι—κία (cf. M. Vandoni, Feste pubbliche e private nei Documenti greci, Milan, 1964, n. 138, 140–143, 145); P.Fouad 76: “Sarapous invites you to dinner for the sacrifice in honor of Lady Isis, in his house, tomorrow, that is, the twenty-ninth, at the ninth hour”; P.Köln 57; SB 11049. Cf. J. F. Gilliam, “Invitations to the Kline of Sarapis,” in P.Coll.Youtie I, pp. 315–324.

³ A. J. Festugière, Monde gréco-romain, vol. 2, pp. 92ff. P.Oxy. 3164, 3: τ—ερά κλίνη.

⁴ Cf. Pap.Colon. inv. 2555: καλει— σε ό θεός ει—ς κλείνην γεινομένην ε—ν τω— θοηρείω αύριον άπό ώρας θ? (edited with commentary by I. Koenen, “Eine Einladung zur Klinedes Sarapis,” in ZPE, vol. 1, 1967, pp. 121–126). On the εὐφροσύνη of these communions, cf. A. Laumonier, Les Cultes indigènes en Carie, pp. 258, 315ff.; properly speaking, the joy of the dinner parties, cf. L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 10, p. 199, n. 7; vol. 11–12, p. 13, n. 1.

⁵ BCH, 1927, pp. 73–74, n. 11; cited and translated by A. J. Festugière, Monde gréco-romain, vol. p. 2, 173; cf. A. Deissmann, Light, p. 351. A. Bernand, El-Kanaïs, n. 59 bis. On the Theodaisia, the Proixenia, the xenika, the Theoxenia, cf. D. M. Pippidi, Scythica Minora, Bucharest-Amsterdam, 1975, pp. 139ff.

δεισιδαίμων, δεισιδαιμονία

deisidaimon, superstitious, religious; deisidaimonia, superstition, religion, reverence

deisidaimon, TDNT 2.20; EDNT 1.282–283; NIDNTT 1.450, 453; MM 139; L&N 53.3; BDF § 244(2); BAGD 173 | deisidaimonia, S 1175; EDNT 1.282–283; NIDNTT 1.450, 453; MM 139; L&N 53.2; BAGD 173

This adjective and this substantive, unknown in the LXX and the papyri, are among the numerous compounds featuring daimon as the second component.¹ Both have favorable and pejorative usages. Religious fear is always involved;² Theophrastus gives the best definition: “Superstition would seem to be a feeling of fear (deilia) toward the divine power (pros to daimonion)” (Char. 16.1).

The favorable meaning—religion and reverence toward the deity—is well attested: “The sovereign will be very zealous toward the gods, because the citizens are less likely to fear that they will suffer from illegal acts when they perceive that the one in authority is religious (deisidaimona) and solicitous toward the gods” (Aristotle, Pol. 5.11.25.1315a); “Those who fear the gods (hoi deisidaimones) are less afraid of men.”³ In the first century, calling punishment down on the guilty inspired “in the king a religious fear and a respect for the deity” (Diodorus Siculus 1.70.8). The repentant Manasseh wanted to show the utmost reverence toward God (peri auton deisidaimonia, Josephus, Ant. 10.42); when the Jews were not able to tolerate the emperor’s ensigns in the temple, Pilate was astonished at such zeal (to tes deisidaimonias akraton).⁴ Deisidaimonia refers to the Jewish religion. In 49 BC, the consul Lentulus Crus exempted Jewish Roman citizens from military service “on account of their religion.”⁵

The pejorative meaning—superstitious and punctilious—is much more commonly attested. It can be seen in Menander’s Deisidaimon (The Bigot), in Theophrastus’ Deisidaimon (Char. 16), and Plutarch’s Peri deisidaimonias (On superstition). Theophrastus portrays the deisidaimon as very attentive to omens and dreams, careful to avoid defilement, carrying out multiple purifications, reciting prayers suited for the given circumstances, going overboard with the worship of images. Plutarch denounces superstition as an excessive fear of divine signs: “just as unbelief (apistia) and disdain of divine signs is a terrible evil, so also is superstition, which, like water, always filters down to the lower levels” (Alex. 75.3). “Thanks to Anaxagoras, Pericles raised himself above superstition. Superstition is inspired by celestial phenomena in people who do not know their causes and because of their ignorance are disturbed and frightened regarding religion. Natural science, which banishes this ignorance, replaces timid and feverish superstition with solid piety” (Per. 6.1). This terror, which is passed on in traditions⁶ and stirred up by accidents (Marc. 6.11), bad omens (Tim. 26.1), wonders (Cleom. 39.3; Sol. 12.5), an eclipse,⁷ etc., is a product of human weakness (Cam. 6.6); it is a characteristic of barbarians (Sert. 11.6), women, and children.⁸ So superstition must be driven out from piety⁹ and from philosophy, which “Pythagoras (who attached great importance to divination through dreams) and his disciples filled with phantoms, fables, and superstitions” (De gen. 9). Upon the death of one of his daughters, Plutarch exhorts his wife to avoid exaggerated mourning and not to have recourse to superstition (Cons. ux. 1).

Philo sees “the crushing burden of superstition” (Giants 16) as a deviation that mars healthy piety (Rewards 40), “the queen of virtues...; adding to it, or on the other hand taking from it, in any way . . . deforms and distorts its appearance . . . because additions breed superstition, and suppression breeds impiety” (Spec. Laws 4.147). Eusebeia occupies an intermediate position between superstition and impiety (Unchang. God 164); deisidaimonia is a false respect for God (ibid. 103), an evil parasite that grafts itself onto worship and sacrifice (Plant. 107); it spreads in waves and “has submerged souls lacking in virility and nobility” (Change of Names 138). It is “a sister of impiety” (asebeia, Sacr. Abel and Cain 15).

With these two series of texts fresh in our minds, it is easy to see a favorable sense in desidaimon in Acts 17:22, the praise with which St. Paul begins his discourse on the Areopagus: “O Athenians, I see that in all things you are very religious” (kata panta hos deisidaimonesterous hymas theoro). No judgment for good or for ill is made of this piety; “the fear of the deity can according to its nature be either piety or superstition; this term—a vox anceps — . . . is quite fitting for a sentiment that is praiseworthy but directed toward an object that one does not approve.”¹⁰ The “very” alludes not only to the altar erected “to an unknown god” (Acts 17:25) but to all the representations of deities that abounded in this city (Acts 17:16), where Plautus’s bon mot is especially applicable: “It is easier to meet a god there than a mortal” (Plautus, Satir. 17). Besides, it was a commonplace to praise the Athenians as surpassing all other nations in the honors they rendered to the gods.¹¹

Deisidaimonia has almost the same meaning when Festus uses it in his explanation to King Agrippa of Paul’s situation: “His accusers were disputing with him regarding their religion and on the subject of a certain Jesus, who had died but whom Paul affirmed to be alive” (zetemata . . . peri tes idias deisidaimonias eichon, Acts 25:19). The word could not have meant “superstition,” for that would have been an affront to the Jewish king; coming from the Roman prefect, however, it seems to have some pejorative nuance, either like our word “sect” or like the Greek threskeia, which is used for aberrant cults¹² as well as for worship of the true God (Jas 1:26-27). This ambiguous meaning (suggested by idias deisidaimonias) is common.¹³

¹ Here, compounded with the verb δαίδω-. In Homer, δαίμων refers to “a divine power that one cannot name or does not want to name; hence the meanings of divinity and on the other hand destiny; a δαίμων is not the object of worship” (P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique, on this word; idem, “Le Divin et les dieux chez Homère,” in Entretiens sur l’antiquité classique, Fondation Hardt, vol. 1, Vandoeuvre-Geneva, 1952, pp. 50ff.); G. François, Le Polythéisme et l’emploi au singulier des mots ΕΟΣ, ΔΑΙΜΩΝ dans la littérature grecque, Paris, 1957. The documentation is assembled by P. J. Koets, Δεισιδαιμονία, Purmerend, 1929; C. Spicq, “Religion (vertu de),” in DBSup, vol. 10, col. 129ff. For the evolution of the meaning of δαίμων, which in part controls that of δεισιδαίμων, E. des Places, “Quasi superstiosiores’ (Actes XVII, 22),” in Studiorum Paulinorum Congressus (AnBib, vol. 18), Rome, 1963, pp. 183–191; idem, La Religion grecque, Paris, 1969, pp. 330–333.

² Hesychius explains the word δεισιδαιμονία as φοβοθεΐα and continues: δεισιδαίμων· ὁ τὰ εἰδῶλα σέβων, εἰ—δωλολάτρης. Ὁ εὐσεβῆς καὶ δειλὸς περὶ εὐός. The Suda: δεισιδαίμων· θεοσεβῆς· ἢ ἀμφίβολος περὶ τὴν πίστιν, καὶ οἱ—ονεὶ δεδοικώς. According to St. Augustine, Varro (frag. 29 a) “distinguishes the religious person from the superstitious person in that he says that the superstitious person fears the gods, whereas the religious person only reveres them as a father or mother rather than fears them as enemies” (Civ. 6.9).

³ Xenophon, Cyr. 3.3.58; “Agesilaus was always a religious man; for him, those who were living well were not yet blessed, but those who had died gloriously had attained to felicity” (Ages. 11.8).

⁴ Josephus, War 2.174. When a Roman soldier tore up and burned a copy of the Torah, “the Jews, being drawn together by their religion as by a spring, ran to Cumanus” (2.230); 1.113; Ant. 15.277.

⁵ Josephus, Ant. 14.228: δεισιδαιμονίας ἔνεκεν; cf. 237, 240. The edict of Claudius authorized Jews to observe their customs on the condition that they did not “vilify the religions of other peoples” (19.290); cf. the enclosure of a temple of Aphrodite that is declared to be “of the same right and the same religion” as the temple of Artemis at Ephesus (ἄσυλος ἔστω ταύτω—δικαίω ταύτῃ τε δεισιδαιμονία, 39 BC, Dittenberger, Or. 455, 11); the epitaph of a mime: πα—σι φίλος θνητοι—ς εἷς τᾶθανάτους δεισιδαίμων (G. Kaibel, Epigrammata, 607, 3).

⁶ Cf. Strabo 5.4.5, the steep slopes of the Avernus used to be covered with forests, which, “according to the superstition, plunged the whole bay in darkness”; Plutarch, Arat. 53.2: “an ancient law, fortified further by superstitious fear, forbade burying anyone within the walls.”

⁷ Plutarch, Nic. 23.1. Thus the general Nicias lost the Athenian army when he was slow to lift the siege of Syracuse because of an eclipse of the moon (Thucydides 7.50; Diodorus Siculus 14.76.4; 14.77.4). Cf. Samaritan Sabbath-observance (Josephus, Ant. 12.259), lucky and unlucky days (Plutarch, Cam. 19.12), unclean foods (Ep. Arist. 129); superstition does not stop at forbidding the killing of animals but extends also to the destruction of plants (Polybius, Abst. 1.6.3). In Egypt, there are superstitions related to sacred animals (Diodorus Siculus 1.83.8); the dress and jewelry of kings are “an object of terror and superstitious veneration for the people” (ibid. 1.62.4); 4.51.1 and 3; 17.41.6; 18.61.3; 19.108.2; 20.43.1; etc. Superstition borders on magic (cf. sidereal fatalism). Riess, “Aberglaube,” in PW, vol. 1, col. 29–93.

⁸ Plutarch, Dio 2.4: “Only small children, women, and men whose minds are disturbed by illness . . . have superstition within themselves like an evil genius”; Caes. 63.11: “Calpurnia, like so many women, was superstitious”;

δεισιδαμονία is synonymous with ἄλογον and μυθω—δες (De gen. 9.580 C; cf. H. D. Betz, Plutarch's Theological Writings and Early Christian Literature, Leiden, 1975, pp. 1–7, 44); Strabo 1.2.8: “A crowd made up of women and all sorts of uneducated people cannot be persuaded by philosophical logic or by this means led to piety, holiness, and faith; but only by the fear of the gods (διὰ δεισιδαμονίας), which is inseparable from legendary creations and recourse to the miraculous”; Polybius 12.24.5: “He is full of visions, prodigies, and incredible fables, in a word, of base superstition and womanish fantasies.” Agatharchides of Cnidos derides Stratonice’s superstition, which he cites as an example of weakness (Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.208).

⁹ Plutarch, De superst. 10–15; De aud. poet. 12; Cor. 24.2; Fab. 4.4; Marcus Aurelius 1.16.15: “With respect to the gods, no superstitious fear”; an example is Antoninus, θεοσεβῆς χωρὶς δεισιδαμονίας (6.30.14); Philo: “It is best not to mingle superstition with piety” (Worse Attacks Better 18). Cf. G. Schepens, “Polybius on Timaeus’ Account of Phalaris’ Bull: A Case of δεισιδαμονία,” in Ancient Society, 1978, pp. 117–148.

¹⁰ E. Jacquier, Actes (following A. Loisy).

¹¹ Sophocles, OC 258: “Athens, most religious of cities” (θεοσεβεστάτας; cf. θεοσεβῆς, Exod 18:21; Job 1:1, 8; 2:3; Jdt 11:17; Acts 2:5; 8:2); Josephus, Ag. Apion: “the Athenians, the most pious of the Greeks”; Philostratus, VA 4.19; Pausanias 1.17.1; 1.24.3: —Αθηναίοις περισσώτερόν τι ἢ τοι—ς ἄλλοις ε—ς τὰ θει—ά ε—στι σπουδῆς. At Athens there was an altar to Piety.

¹² Col 2:18; Wis 11:16; 14:17, 18, 27. Chariton, Chaer. et Call. 7.6.6: a sort of religious scruple naturally took hold of the barbarians, θρησκευία τω—ν βαρβάρων.

¹³ Plutarch, Lys. 25.2; Lysander wanted to make an impression on the citizens through the fear of the gods and superstition (φόβῳ θεοῦ τινὶ καὶ δεισιδαμονία); Num. 8.5: Numa hoped to humble the pride of the Romans through the fear of the gods (deisidaimonia), but using apparitions of demons, threatening voices, and the motive of fear; Diodorus Siculus 5.63.3, the wealth of a temple consecrated to Hemithea was protected by “a sort of religious superstition that had been transformed into a custom”; 11.89.6 and 8.

διαλάσσω

dialasso, to reconcile

see also καταλλαγή, καταλλάσσω

dialasso, S 1259; TDNT 1.253–254; EDNT 1.307; MM 151; L&N 40.2; BDF §193(4); BAGD 186

“If you are presenting your offering (to doron) at the altar and you remember that your brother has something against you (echei ti kata sou), leave your offering there and go first to be reconciled with your brother” (hypage proton diallagethi to adelpho sou, Matt 5:23-24). Even though the verb is an imperative (aorist passive, with dative of accompaniment), this is not a cultic rule or a liturgical law but a moral obligation incumbent on a person appearing before God to offer a sacrifice.¹ Apparently, a person who is the object of a brother or sister’s animosity must take the initiative in reconciliation; the offended party takes the first step. But J. Jeremias notes that “has something against you” (echei ti kata sou) corresponds to the Aramaic adjective ‘aketânâ (= the Greek mnesikakos) and refers to a brother who holds on to the memory of an offense of which he has been the victim.² Thus it is not surprising that the true offender should go to him and ask him not to hold a grudge and “gain reconciliation” (diallagethi).

Beginning with Moulton-Milligan, two papyri have been cited that use this verb with the same meaning. In the second century, a prodigal son writes to his mother, “I have written to thee that I am naked (hoti gymnos eimei = that I have nothing to wear). I beseech thee, mother, be reconciled to me (dialagethi moi). . . . I know that I have sinned.”³ A runaway slave begs his owner to be reconciled (hoste diallagethi hemein).⁴ We may add P.Mich. 502, 8, a letter from Valerius Gemellus, a soldier stationed at Coptus who seeks to end his quarrel with his brother: “I urge you to be reconciled to me, brother (parakletheis, adelphe, diallagethi moi), so that I may have your confidence while I am in the army.” Then there is the case of the concubine of the Levite from Ephraim, who had run away from him and been gone four months. Her husband “went to speak to her and persuade her to be reconciled.”⁵

The verb diallatto was used often in private law for the reconciliation of persons; diallaktai had the job of bringing about diallagai.⁶ Augustus urged Herod to be reconciled with his children (Josephus, Ant. 16.125; cf. 16.267, 269; 7.192); the reconciliation of Hyrcanus and Aristobulus took place in the temple (War 1.122). Conciliation also played a role in ending civil wars but was particularly common in international life between cities⁷ and warring states: the four hundred send heralds to Agis, king of Sparta, “to say that they wished to come to terms with him” (Iegontes diallagenai boulesthai).⁸ Titus said concerning the Jews, “Let us not wait for agreement to be re-established between our enemies; necessity will reconcile them all too quickly” (Josephus, War 3.496). Herod states, “We have learned from messengers of God to reconcile enemies to each other” (Ant. 15.136), which entails changing feelings and attitudes (11.54). It is thus that God takes pity on David and is reconciled with him (7.153); so reconciliation is then pardon (6.551).

¹ Cf. Philo, Spec. Laws 1.167: when approaching the altar and offering a victim, one must bring a soul “in a state of absolutely perfect purity, so that when God sees he will not turn away”; m. Yoma 8.9: “For offenses between a person and the Place, the Day of Atonement expiates them; but for those between a person and his neighbor, the Day of Atonement does not expiate them as long as the parties are not reconciled to each other.”

² J. Jeremias, “Laß allda deine Gabe,” in ZNW, 1937, pp. 150–154; republished in Abba, pp. 103–107.

³ BGU 846, 10 (cf. A. Deissmann, Light, pp. 187–188); cf. 665, col. II, 11: —Εγὼ τῷ πατρί μου γράψω . . . περὶ τῆς διαλλαγῆς (first century).

⁴ P.Giss. 17, 13 (republished by Chrest. Wilck. n. 481); cf. 1Esdr 4:31—κολακεύει αὐτὴν ὅπως διαλλαγῆ αὐτῷ—.

⁵ Judg 19:3 (Hebrew shûb); cf. 1Sam 29:4—the Philistines fear that David will turn traitor, for otherwise how could he be reconciled to his master? (ε—ν τίνι διαλλαγῆσεται [Hebrew rasâh] ου—τος τῷ κυρίῳ αὐτοῦ); 1Esdr 4:31. Diallage can always be obtained: “If you have spoken up against your friend, do not worry, reconciliation is possible” (Sir 22:22); “for the offense, there is reconciliation” (27:21). The LXX usually gives the verb diallasso the meaning “change, give in exchange, modify” (Wis 19:18; 2Macc 6:27—“If I exchange life for death”; cf. Job 5:12, Hebrew parar); the only meaning in Philo is “be different” (Sacr. Abel and Cain 137; Worse Attacks Better 164; Drunkennes 8; etc.); cf. a testamentary foundation at Thea: “None of the figures that are in the museum . . . shall be pawned or exchanged (μήτε διαλλάξασθαι) or alienated” (C. Michel, Recueil, n. 1001, col. II, 14).

⁶ Aristophanes, Lys. 1091; Euripides, Phoen. 431; Euripides, Med. 896; Plato, Prt. 346 b. A very common meaning in Josephus: Cassius “reconciled Bassus with Murcus and the separated legions” (War 1.219; cf. 454, 510, 530, 591; Ant. 16.26, 270, 335, 352, 356; 19.334); Machaeras, “having reflected on his offenses . . . succeeded in reconciling with Herod” (War 1.320; Ant. 14.438); certain wrongdoers “must think that the penitence of the wrongdoers should be followed immediately by the reconciliation of the victims” (War 4.221); even death could not easily reconcile the Jews with Alexander Jannaeus after all the evil that he had done (1.92). Cf. L. Gernet, Droit et société dans la Grèce ancienne, Paris, 1955, pp. 103–119, 134; C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, p. 437, n. 4.

⁷ Aristophanes, Pax 540, 1049; Isocrates, Paneg. 129, 157, 188; Phil. 5.30, 41, 45, 83, 88: Athens and Salamis, regarding cultic matters (F. Sokolowski, LSCGSup, n. XIX, 3, 80, 82).

⁸ Thucydides 8.70.2; cf. 4.20.2 and 3: “We must be reconciled (Athens and Sparta) by a moderate resolution of our misfortune . . . and bind ourselves with a firm friendship”; 4.59.4; 4.61.2. Y. Garlan (“Etudes d’histoire militaire et diplomatique,” in BCH, 1978, pp. 97–103) prefers the translation “conciliation” rather than “reconciliation,” because diplomatic, not legal, matters are involved, and the adversaries are under no compulsion.

διερμηνεύω, ε—ρμηνεία, ε—ρμηνεύω diermeneuo, to translate, interpret, explain; hermeneia, interpretation; hermeneuo, to translate, interpret

diermeneuo, S 1329; TDNT 2.661–666; EDNT 2.53–55; NIDNTT 1.579–581; MM 160; L&N 33.145, 33.148; BAGD 194 | hermeneia, S 2058; TDNT 2.661–666; EDNT 2.53–55; NIDNTT 1.579–582; MM 254; L&N 11.147; BAGD 310 | hermeneuo, S 2059; TDNT 2.661–666; EDNT 2.53–55; NIDNTT 1.579–581; MM 254; L&N 33.145; BAGD 310

According to Luke 24:27, Christ “explained [to the disciples of Emmaus], in all the Scriptures, that which concerned him.”¹ This is the only use of the verb diermeneuo in the Gospels. In earlier secular texts, it normally has the sense of “translate” from one language to another,² but Luke clearly intends it to mean “interpret,” as in 1Macc 1:36—“Nehemiah called the liquid nephtar, which is interpreted as purification (ho diermeneuetai katharismos), but most call it naphtha.” This usage is clearly attested by Philo, who knows the strict sense “translation,”³ but more often gives the word a broader meaning: “He will translate your thoughts” (Migr. Abr. 81); “that which language expresses” (Conf. Tongues 53; cf. Migr. Abr. 12). So diermeneuo means “express one’s thought in words.”⁴ Thus it is not permitted to express the name of God in literal terms (Philo, To Gaius 353; cf. m.Meg. 3.41); the precision of thought of a person well-versed in doctrine is expressed in his explications (Philo, Contemp. Life 31). To explain the genesis of light is to give its intelligence or to discover the unknown (Philo, Creation 31). Finally, for Philo, as for St.

Luke, this verb means “interpret,” and thus it is that Jesus, like Moses, is an interpreter of the holy books.⁵

In Acts 9:36 we have “a disciple named Tabitha, which translated (he diermeneuomene) means Dorcas.” In other NT texts, this idea—which could be put “that is” or “which means”—is expressed by the simple verb hermeneuo,⁶ which Philo uses extensively for the transcribing into Greek of the meaning of a Hebrew word.⁷

In the papyri, hermeneuo usually means the translation of an original text into another language. Thus the will of C. Longinus Castor, written in Latin, was translated into Greek: “I translated the preceding copy” (hermeneusa to prokeimenon antigraphon, BGU 326, col. II, 22 = SB 9298, 26); “copy translated into Greek” (antigraphon hermeneuthen Ellenikois grammasi, P.Oxy. 2231, 26–27); “to translate the letter you sent to me” (ta hermeneuthenai to grammation ho diepempante moi, P.Stras. 260, 1); “I translated from Latin” (hermeneusa apo Rhomaikon, P.Ryl. 62, 30); which presupposes a strict correspondence between the two texts. But the correspondence is broader when an attorney pleads for his client through an interpreter (di’ Anoubionos hermeneuontos eipen, SB 8246, 38, 46), and especially in the case of an explanation, as with Isidorus: “Having been given firm information by men who summed up what they knew, and having myself transcribed all these events, I explained to the Greeks the power of the god and of the prince.”⁸ Finally, to translate feelings is to express them.⁹

So there are translators. Joseph’s brother “did not know that Joseph understood, because they were speaking through an interpreter.”¹⁰ In a country like Egypt, where many races met,¹¹ the hermeneis (cf. Ep. Arist. 310, 318) were not merely multilingual, but seem to have been charged with official duties,¹² such as a certain Apollonius, interpreter for the Ethiopians in Egypt. They could be appointed either by private individuals (SB 10743, from the first century) or by the state,¹³ because in the first century interpretation was a public function.¹⁴ Furthermore, the papyri often attest to the presence and activity of a hermeneus tes komes.¹⁵ They are employed by individuals—not only a general (SB 9046, 308) but also private persons.¹⁶ They write (Stud.Pal. XXII, 101, 11), are associated with notaries (P.Oslo 183, 6, 8), translate from Greek to Latin or from Latin to Greek (BGU 140, 326; P.Stras. 253, 4; P.Ryl. 62, 30; P.Harr. 67, col. II, 11), and later from Coptic to Greek (P.Lond. 77, 69; vol. 1, p. 235; eighth century). They seem to be entrusted with fairly extensive authority, because they serve as intermediaries: “and we have written also to Apollonius the hermeneus concerning these things” (gegraphamen de kai Apollonio to hermenei peri touton, SB 7647, 7; cf. P.Ryl. 563, 7; P.Cair.Zen. 59065, 2; PSI 409, 15). They become parties to lawsuits. For example, to learn if a woman has the right to remain with her husband against the will of her father, the judge prescribes: ekeleusen di’ hermeneos autem (the Egyptian woman) enechthenai ti bouletai, eipouses para to andri menein . . . (P.Oxy. 237, col. VII, 37). In another case, the judge prescribes that the testimony of Ammonios, Antoninos, and the priest of Sarapis shall be examined di'hermeneos.¹⁷ Thus interpreters are numerous, influential, competent, having certain prerogatives, and indispensable in a cosmopolitan¹⁸ and multilingual¹⁹ society.

The special duty of the hermeneus is hermeneia. If the latter has an almost sacred character in Jewish writings when it designates the Greek version of the Scriptures (the Septuagint, cf. Josephus, Ant. 12.39, 87, 104, 106, 107, 108), it also suggests the “explications” supplied by the translator, who thus becomes an interpreter.²⁰ It is not that he could express his own thoughts:²¹ “the soothsayer said nothing personal, he only interpreted someone else’s words, when the divine presence seized him” (Philo, Moses 1.286); “interpreters of dreams are obligated to tell the truth, because they explain and proclaim divine oracles” (Joseph 95). Philo elaborated a theology of the hermeneus who carries out a religious function related to prophecy: “The prophets are God’s interpreters.”²² In fact, God equips “the perfect interpreter by making the springs of language gush forth for him and by revealing them to him” (Worse Attacks Better 44; cf. 68). “The wicked are not permitted to be God’s interpreters, so that any evil man is not inspired by God.”²³ Only the virtuous “are able to interpret the meaning of the Holy Scriptures” (Josephus, Ant. 20.264).

In summary, then, “interpreters” were numerous and important in the secular world of the first century, and they were especially so in Jewish theology. Signal honor was given to the translators of the Hebrew Bible, which had become unintelligible for their contemporaries, and Moses was seen as the outstanding interpreter of the divine revelation. Indeed, prophecy and interpretation were closely associated. With all this in mind, we can better understand 1Cor 12:30, where St. Paul makes the interpreter a charismatic, and 14:5, 13, 27, where he requires that speech in incomprehensible tongues be translated for the hearers and clearly explained by an interpreter, who transposes the divine revelation into accessible language.²⁴ If there is no diermeneutes (verse 28) in the assembly, the one speaking in tongues must be silent or pray for the ability to interpret (verse 13)—which presupposes that the ecstatic discourse has an internal meaning. In any event, it is the Holy Spirit who gives the gift of interpretation of tongues (1Cor 12:10, hermeneia glosson), and very likely the diermeneutes, did not stop at giving a pure and simple translation of that which was spoken by the glossalaliac; if necessary, he added explanations and timely clarifications so that the charism might bear all of its fruit for edification (1Cor 14:26).

¹ E. Delebecque translates: “He clarified for them, by means of all the Scriptures, the things that related to him” (Evangile de Luc, Paris, 1976).

² Ep. Arist. 15: “The code that we intend . . . to translate”; 308: “in the presence of the translators, παρόντων τω—ν διερμηνευσάντων”; 310: “Now that the translation has been done correctly, with piety, and with a rigorous attitude.” A single papyrological attestation: copies of Egyptian reports on the trial of Hermas were translated into Greek, ἀντίγραφα συγγραφο—ν Αι—γυπτίων, διερμηνευμένων δε—λληνιστί (UPZ 162, col. V, 4; from 116 BC). The verb does not occur in Josephus.

³ Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.87: “Isaac is translated: laughter of the soul, joy and happiness” (cf. Philo, Unchang. God 144); an “impeccable translation” (Migr. Abr. 73, τοῦ διερμηνεύοντες ἀπταίστως); “The high priest was busy choosing translators for the Law” (Moses 2.31).

⁴ This meaning is unknown in the NT. Cf. Philo, Change of Names 56: the word “incapable of expressing the least reality”; 208: the word was instructed to express in a holy manner “holy things in a manner worthy of God.”

⁵ Philo, Post. Cain 1; Spec. Laws 4.132. Cf. Change of Names 126: “Moses received a considerable gift: the interpretation (ε—ρμενείαν) and preaching of the holy laws”; Moses 1.1: “Moses, the interpreter of the holy laws”; Decalogue 175; Change of Names 125; Josephus, Ant. 3.87: Moses the hermeneut of God. The διερμενευτής of 1Cor 14:26 is the translator-interpreter for the charismatic who speaks an unintelligible language.

⁶ John 1:42—“You shall be called Cephas, which is translated Peter, ὁ ε—ρμηνεύεται Πέτρος”; 9:7—“The pool of Siloam, which is translated Sent”; Heb 7:2—“Melchizedek is translated (ε—ρμηνευόμενος) ‘king of justice.’” Cf. Ezra 4:7—the text of the letter to King Artaxerxes was written in Aramaic and translated (καὶ ἠρμηνευμένην); Job 42:18 (apocryphal verse): the text claims to be a translation from a Syriac (Aramaic) book—ου—τος ε—ρμηνεύεται ε—κ τῆς Συριακῆς βίβλου; Ep. Arist. 39: “elders who know their law well and are capable of translating it.” C. F. D. Moule (Birth of the NT, pp. 276–280) points to Papias: “Matthew joined together the logia [of Jesus] in the Hebrew language and each one interpreted them as he was able” (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 3.39.16). Cf. Heliodorus, Aeth. 4.11.4: “having him read the strip, which I translated scrupulously as we went along.” Often the verb μεθερμηνεύω is used: Matt 1:23; Mark 5:41; 15:22, 34; John 1:38, 41; Acts 4:36; 8:8 (unknown in Philo).

⁷ Nearly 150 times; cf. Moses 2.40; Migr. Abr. 20: “Hebrew is translated emigrant”; Prelim. Stud. 51: “Israel means ‘seeing God’” (= Dreams 2.173; Abraham 57; To Gaius 4). But there are translations that are free (Migr. Abr. 169) or broad (Alleg. Interp. 1.90), where the interpretation conveys a spiritual exegesis; cf. Prelim. Stud. 20. Likewise Josephus, Ant. 12.11: Ptolemy Philadelphos translated the Law; 114; Ag. Apion 2.46: He asks the Jews to send him men to translate the Law; War 7.455: “As to how this was rendered I leave to my readers to assess”; Ant. 6.156; but also Ant. 6.230: “I express my thought in words”; War 5.182: “It is impossible to give an adequate description of the palace”; 5.393: “I would be able to give an adequate account of your extravagances.”

⁸ —Εγὼ πάντῃ ἀναγραψάμενος ἡρμῆνησδ —Ελλησι θεοῦ δύναμιν τε ἄνακτος (Hymn to Isis; SEG, vol. 8, 51, 39 = SB 8141, 39; V. F. Vanderlip, Four Greek Hymns, p. 74, who understands the middle ἡρμῆνησσα as meaning that the author explains himself in his own language). Cf. line 33: “Interpreting his name, the Egyptians call him Porramanres.”

⁹ BGU 140, 20: cf. φιλανθρωπότερον ε—ρμηνεύω. Antinous replies with the aid of an interpreter (P. Vindob. Tandem, n. VIII, 2–4); cf. SB 10288, II, 15.

¹⁰ Gen 42:23 (ε—ρμηνευτής; the hiphil of the Hebrew verb lūs). Ἐρμηνεύς is unknown in the OT. Neither term appears in the NT. Philo never uses the first noun, and Moulton-Milligan cannot supply an example from the Koine, but cf. Josephus, Ant. 2.72; Papias: Μάρκος ε—ρμηνευτής Πέτρον γενόμενος (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 3.39.15).

¹¹ Ptolemy Euergetes II decided that there should be different tribunals for hearing cases of Egyptians against Greeks, Greeks against Egyptians, and Egyptians against Egyptians (P. Tebt. 5, 207–220); cf. A. Theodorides, “A propos de la loi dans l’Egypte pharaonique,” in RIDA, 1967, pp. 107–156.

¹² Cf. CIRB, Moscow-Leningrad, 1965, n. 698: Παιρίσαλος Σαυρόφου ε—ρμηνεύς. There is even a “chief interpreter,” δι ε—πιμελείας Ἡρακα—Ποντικοῦ ἀρχερμηνέως (CIRB 1053).

¹³ Like the ε—ρμηνεύς τω—ν Τρυγοδυτω—ν, a Berlin papyrus in G. Lumbroso, Recherches sur l’économie politique de l’Egypte sous les Lagides, 2d ed., Amsterdam, 1967, p.256.

¹⁴ Cf. IGUR, n. 567: Ἀσπουργος ε—ρμηνεύς Σαρματω—ν Βωσπορανός. R. Taubenschlag, “The Interpreters in the Papyri,” in Opera Minora, Warsaw, 1959, vol. 2, pp. 167–170 (citing Plutarch, Ant. 27.2); W. Peremans, “Über die Zweisprachigkeit im ptolemäischen Ägypten,” in Studien zur Papyrologie und antiken Wirtschaftsgeschichte. Festschrift Oertel, Bonn, 1964, pp. 58ff. On royal interpreters paid from the treasury, cf. U. Wilcken, Actenstücke aus der königlichen Bank zu Theben (Abhand. der kgl. Preuß. Akad. der Wiss. zu Berlin, 1886, n. 9). On translators in synagogues, cf. m. Meg. 2.1; 4.4; b. shabb. 115a; S. Safrai, The Jewish People in the First Century, Assen-Amsterdam, 1976, vol. 2, pp. 930ff.

¹⁵ P.Tebt. 450; P.Ross.Georg. V, 42, 4; ε—ρμενεύς Καρανίδος (P.Athen. 21, 11; P.Mich. 567, 15; BGU 985, 10); ε—ρ. Βακχιάδος (PSI 879, 12).

¹⁶ P.Mich. IV, 1841: Μύσθης ε—ρμηνεύς; V, 321, 20: ε—ν Ταλι ε—ρμηνέως; P.Stras. 41, 36: δι ε—ρμηνέως —Αμμώνιον καὶ —Αντωνίνον κτλ. P.Oxy. 1517, 6: έων ε—ρ.

¹⁷ P.Stras. 41, 3 (AD 25); cf. P.Thead. 14, 23: ύδροφύλακες άπεκρείναντο διε—ρμηνέως; PSI 1326, 4; SB 8246, 39–40. Cf. F. Cumont, L’Egypte des Astrologues, Brussels, 1937, p. 46, n. 3; cf. p. 177, n. 3, on ε—ρμηνεία γάμων.

¹⁸ We should keep in mind that ε—ρμηνεία in music refers to the execution (what we would call the interpretation) of a sung tune or a melody played on the flute or the cithara, cf. Ps.-Plutarch, De mus. 32 and 36. In Philo, ε—ρμηνεία is sometimes a verbal expression (του λόγου τας ε—ρμηνείας, Heir 108; Prelim. Stud. 17, 13; Dreams 2.262, 2.274; Virtues 193; Worse Attacks Better 39, 68, 79, etc.), sometimes a translation from one language into another (Moses 2.27; Post. Cain 74, 120; Dreams 2.242), like Ep. Arist. 3, 120, 308. This meaning recurs constantly in the papyri, notably for the translation of wills: ε—ρμηνεία διαθήκης (Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 14, 1; BGU 326, col. I, 1; 2, 15: ε—ρμηνεία κωδικίλλων διπτύχων; P.Oxf. 7, 12: ε—ρμηνείας αντίγραφον; SB 7640, 8); of receipts (ύπερ ε—ρμηνείας, SB 9355, col. I, 3; 2, 2; 10288, n. 2, 15), of a document: Διοσκουδίδου χάρτην η— ε—νεγράφη τά τε ρωμαϊκά καὶ ή τούτων ε—ρμηνεία (P.Oxy. 2276, 7; cf. 1466, 3: ε—ρμηνεία τω—ν Ρωμαϊκω—ν; 2472, 3; PSI 1364 A and B; P.Lund III, 9, 7, published in SB 8749, 7); of a letter like that of Diocletian to the inhabitants of the island of Elephantine: τω—ν γραμμάτων ε—ρμηνεία (SB 8393, 20); or of a hearing before a magistrate (P.Thead. 13, col. II, 1). In this sense, Sirach Prologue 20: “You are invited to read with care and . . . to show indulgence where we may seem—despite our laborious care in translation—to render certain expressions poorly.”

¹⁹ In Palestine, very diverse languages were spoken in the first century. Not only were Hebrew and Aramaic in use (cf. C. Rabin, “Hebrew and Aramaic in the First Century,” in S. Safrai, M. Stern, The Jewish People in the First Century, Assen-Amsterdam, vol. 2, pp. 1007–1040), but Greek was common: texts of Murabba’at, and inscriptions from Nazareth, tombs, ossuaries, and coins, the inscription on the cross; “Hellenists” have Greek names and speak Greek; more than 450 Jewish inscriptions written in Greek have been found in Palestine, etc. Cf. G. Mussie, “Greek in Palestine and the Diaspora,” ibid., pp. 1040–1064.

²⁰ Cf. the interpretation of visions: Mane, thekel, phares—ε—στι δὲ ἡ ε—ρμηνεία αὐτω—ν (Dan 5:1, LXX [title to Old Greek of Dan 5] = 5:7 NRSV); of Solomon: “For his songs, proverbs, parables, and interpretations the nations admired him” (Sir 47:17); cf. Ep. Arist. 32: “a precise interpretation of the text of the Law”; Josephus, Ant. 1.29: “I offer this explanation on this point.”

²¹ Philo, Moses 2.34: “What an immense matter, to give a complete translation of the laws dictated by the oracles, without being able to subtract, add, or change anything at all.”

²² Philo, Spec. Laws 1.65; 2.189. 3.7; 4.49; Rewards 55; Unchang. God 138; Moses 2.188, 191, 40: the translators of the Law are above all hierophants and prophets; cf. To Gaius 99; Worse Attacks Better 39–40; Migr. Abr. 84.

²³ Philo, Heir 259; cf. Worse Attacks Better 133. “Evil interpreters” (Migr. Abr. 72) are not always truthful (Spec. Laws 4.90); “the spirit of the hearers cannot follow explanations spouted forth at high speed and without pauses for breath” (Contemp. Life 76).

²⁴ Cf. J. G. Davies, “Pentecost and Glossalalia,” in JTS, 1952, pp. 228–231.

δίκαιος, δικαιοσύνη, δικαιοῶ, δικαίωμα, δικαίωσις, δικαστής, δίκη dikaïos, conforming to law or custom, right, virtuous; dikaïosyne, justice, righteousness; dikaïoo, to justify, pronounce just; dikaïoma, justification, righteousness, righteous decree, just requirement; dikaïosis, justification; dikastes, judge; dike, custom, justice, punishment see also λάθρα

dikaïos, S 1342; TDNT 2.174–178, 224–225; EDNT 1.324–325; NIDNTT 3.352–355, 358, 360–363, 365–370; MM 162; L&N 34.47, 66.5, 88.12;

BDF §263(a, b); BAGD 195–196 | dikaiosyne, S 1343; TDNT 2.174–178, 192–210; EDNT 1.325–330; NIDNTT 3.352–354, 358, 360–365, 369–372; MM 162; L&N 34.46, 53.4, 57.111, 88.13; BDF §§163, 219(4), 275(3); BAGD 196–197 | dikaioo, S 1344; TDNT 2.174–178, 211–219; EDNT 1.330–334; NIDNTT 3.352, 354–355, 358, 360–363, 365, 369–370, 372; MM 162–163; L&N 34.46, 36.22, 37.138, 56.34, 88.16; BDF §§148(4), 195(1e); BAGD 197–198 | dikaïoma, S 1345; TDNT 2.174–178, 219–223; EDNT 1.334–335; NIDNTT 3.352, 354, 361–363, 365, 371–372; MM 163; L&N 33.334, 56.34, 88.14; BAGD 198 | dikaïosis, S 1347; TDNT 2.174–178, 223–224; EDNT 1.335; NIDNTT 3.352, 354, 363, 371–372; L&N 34.46, 56.34; BAGD 198 | dikastes, S 1348; EDNT 1.336; MM 163; L&N 56.28; BAGD 198 | dike, S 1349; TDNT 2.174–182; EDNT 1.336; NIDNTT 3.92–93, 96; MM 163; L&N 12.27, 38.8; BAGD 198; ND 6.90

I. Dike. — It is generally agreed that dike, the basic term in this group, is related to deiknymi, “show, indicate.”¹ Thus its root meaning would be “that which is indicated, is in usage, is customary,”² and it is from this starting point that it ends up meaning “justice.” The first appearance of this meaning is as a mythical divine being: “There is a virgin, Dike, daughter of Zeus, honored and revered by the gods, inhabitants of Olympia,” who denounces the unjust deeds of humans before her father and calls for their punishment.³ But already in Homer, dike refers to a person’s due or share, what he has a right to (Il. 19.180; Od. 24.255) and also to just actions toward someone else (Od. 14.84), giving another person his due (Il. 23.542; Od. 9.215). Aristotle emphasizes mutuality and reciprocity (Eth. Nic. 5.7.1131b).

Meaning “right” (Homer, Il. 16.388; Hesiod, Op. 219) and “justice” (Josephus, War 5.2), dike is introduced in legal language, where it refers sometimes to a trial, a legal decision,⁴ sometimes to the result of a trial, namely, the execution of sentence, the penalty or punishment:⁵ “pursued by your justice” (Wis 11:20); “the slave and the master were stricken with the same punishment” (Wis 18:11). This latter meaning predominates in the LXX: “the avenging sword of vengeance” (Lev 26:25; cf. Exod 21:20); “punishment by fire” (Amos 7:14; cf. 2Macc 8:11, 13); “the punishment reserved for sinners.”⁶ The NT knows only this meaning: when St. Paul was bitten by the snake after escaping the shipwreck, the Maltese concluded, “Surely this man is a murderer, since after he has been saved from the sea, Dike (the avenging goddess) does not allow him to live” (Acts 28:4); those who do not obey the gospel “will in punishment suffer eternal loss” (2Thess 1:9); Sodom and Gomorrah have “suffered the punishment (the consequence of just judgment) of eternal fire” (Jude ¶¶).

II. Dikaïos. — This adjective modifies persons who conform to custom or law (Homer, Od. 6.120) and things that are “normal,” i.e., that are as they ought to be (a just judgment, Deut 16:18; John 5:30; Josephus, Ant.

9.4; just ways arrive at their goal, Rev 15:3; Josephus, Ant. 13.290). Aristotle defines the dikaios as “one who conforms to the law (nomimos) and is equal (isos).”⁷ But all of Greek literature includes in the obligations of the just not only their responsibilities toward humans⁸ but also toward the gods; the just are so only if they are pious.⁹ So if the just person has a political “virtue,” it is conceived as the virtue of establishing order and harmony among men (Plato, Resp. 4.443 c–e). To dikaion is an innate idea that belongs to human nature, like the beautiful, the good, and the fitting.¹⁰ Under Stoic influence, Philo makes it a cardinal virtue, but one whose role goes far beyond the legal realm.¹¹ Depending on the LXX, Josephus has a religious concept of the just person, who is not only faithful to divine commands,¹² but a person of honesty, rectitude,¹³ keeping to his place and acting according to the divine will. Thus it is the faithful Jew who is just (Ant. 9.33), “all the Jews among the Hebrews” (10.38; cf. 14.172). They illustrate the conception of Theognis (“All the virtues are included in justice. If you are just, you are a good person” (1.147–148) or of Isocrates (the best person is the just person, Nic. 20; cf. Hel. 1). “No sin is the result of justice” (Philo, Quest. Gen. 4.64); “Just ways do not know how to do wrong” (dikaios adikein ouk epistatai trophos, Menander, in Stobaeus, Ecl. 9.8, vol. 3, p. 438; T. Gad 5.3).

The LXX affirms and reaffirms that God is “just and upright” (Deut 32:4; Ps 11:7); a “just judge” (Jer 12:1; Ps 7:12; Tob 3:2), acting justly (Gen. 18:25; Judg 5:11; Ps. 145:17), rewarding or punishing with justice (Ps. 62:13); but this justice is linked with goodness: “Yahweh is merciful and just; our God is compassionate” (Ps 116:5). The Messiah is described as just, not only because he carries out God’s will, but because he possesses this attribute, which is proper to good sovereigns, and because he establishes justice on earth: “I will raise up from David a justseed. . . . He will practice judgment and justice in the land. . . . He will be called ‘Yahweh-our-Justice.’”¹⁴ As for the just person in the OT, he is first of all innocent, in contrast to the impious transgressor (Exod 23:6-8; Ezek 23:45); he is “the one who does the will of the Lord”(Sir 16:3). So he is essentially a religious and perfect person (Gen 6:9), especially impartial (Deut 16:19) and generous (2Kgs 10:9; 1Sam 24:18). Not only is he “just before God” (Gen 7:1), he is also a “son of God” (Wis 2:18), and “the souls of the just are in God’s hands” (Wis 3:1; 5:1, 15). Even when persecuted (Wis 2:10–18), the just are beloved of God (Ps 146:7) and living (Isa 26:2), and they will be exalted: “Glory to the just!”¹⁵

In the NT, several usages of dikaios match secular usage,¹⁶ especially the neuter to dikaion.¹⁷ The master of the vineyard promises the workers that he will give “whatever is just” (ho ean e dikaion) after the work is done (Matt 20:4). Each one can judge what is right (krinein to dikaion, Luke 12:57). Masters must give their slaves what is just and equitable (to dikaion kai ten isoteta, Col 4:1), and St. Peter considers it his responsibility (literally, considers it just, dikaion hegeomai) to keep Christians watchful.¹⁸ But our authors sometimes feel the need to Christianize this obligation, which has its source in God; Peter and John ask their judges “if it is just in God’s sight (ei dikaion estin enopion tou theou) to obey you rather than God.”¹⁹ Nevertheless, in the great majority of cases, dikaios retains its LXX meaning. First of all, in describing God as just in carrying out his promises of salvation, “God shows his justice . . . so that he may be just himself (eis to einai auton dikaion) and also make just those who have believed in Jesus.”²⁰ God is always just in his judgments, punishing the godless and rewarding the faithful.²¹ It follows that the law, which comes from God, expresses his will, and binds people to God and their neighbor, “is holy, and the commandment is holy, just, and good” (hagia kai dikaia kai agathe, Rom 7:12). This justice clearly goes beyond the realm of the legal or even the equitable; it is almost synonymous with perfection or integrity! Taking up the messianic designation in Isa 53:11; Jer 23:5, St. Peter says to the Sanhedrin, “You disowned the Holy and Just One” (ton hagion kai dikaion).²² Again, the modifier dikaios is used for a person of perfect rectitude, one who carries out the will of God;²³ a person set apart, contrasted with the breaker of the law.²⁴ This person is promised the highest reward: the resurrection of the just (anastasis ton dikaion, Luke 14:14; cf. Acts 24:15). Dikaios became a term for a Christian, first of all because Christians are purified from sin (Matt 13:43, 49) and acceptable to God (Jas 5:6); they are irreproachable, and their prayers are very powerful (Jas 5:16; 1Pet 3:12); they are also merciful (Matt 25:37, 46). If they are “saved with difficulty” (1Pet 4:18; a quotation from Prov 11:31) through many trials, they are sure of receiving “the recompense of the just” (Matt 10:41) and reaching God (Heb 12:23).

St. Paul enriched this OT idea of justice/righteousness. Whereas Ps 14:1 says, “There is no just person, not even one” (quoted Rom 3:10; cf. Eccl 7:20), the apostle adds on the one hand that it is not mere knowledge of the law that makes a person just, but putting it into practice, actualizing it in works.²⁵ And on the other hand he declares that a new form of justice/righteousness has appeared, no longer a legal or sacrificial justice, nor even moral, but a religious and internal righteousness. Whereas Adam’s transgression brought a death sentence for all humans (Rom 5:18), Christ instituted (kathistemi) a dispensation of justifying, life-giving grace: “Through one person’s obedience, all will be constituted just” (dikaioi katastathesontai hoi polloi, Rom 5:19); it is no longer Adam’s sin that is inherited, but Christ’s righteousness. Thus Christ establishes a new humanity of just people, antithetical to sinful humanity.²⁶ To be clothed with this righteousness, it is enough to believe: “The just will live by faith.”²⁷ It is the gift or the sharing of God’s justice/righteousness that makes the believer just, not so much on the moral plane of virtues as in the theological order: the dikaios is a new creation (2Cor 5:17), enters into communion with God, is a new being. So it is indeed faith that is the principle of the religious life (Rom 3:26; Gal 3:7-9) and justification that gives life (dikaiosis zoes, Rom 5:18; to pneuma zoe dia dikaiosynen, 8:10). This dynamic and life-giving principle indwells the Christian, who, led by the Holy Spirit (Gal 5:18)—whose role is to lead the children of God (Rom 8:14)—and by faith (Gal 3:11), knows how to discern between good and evil and wants what God wants, just as a child instinctively knows its father's desires and seeks to please him. The law, on the other hand, was established to set rules for sinners and to punish them. Thus "the law was instituted not for the just (those justified by Christ) but for the lawless and rebellious, the godless and sinful."²⁸

III. Dikaiosyne. — This substantive, unknown in Homer and Hesiod, first appears in Herodotus (1.96), and in the Koine it substituted more and more for dike. Certainly it retains a legal sense,²⁹ but its meaning is considerably broadened. Not only is it a virtue,³⁰ notably in sovereigns, lawmakers, and leaders,³¹ that sums up all other virtues;³² it seems to consist most of all in properly fulfilling one's role in society, at least beginning with Plato (Phd. 82 a: demotike kai politike arete). Little by little, it becomes a synonym of perfection³³ and an attribute of every honest person,³⁴ of good comportment (Josephus, Ant. 3.67; 4.223; 19.154). Hence its association with semnos (Isocrates, Panath. 249; Josephus, War 4.319), referring to a sort of nobility or at least dignity (Josephus, Ant. 11.217; 12.160). Dikaiosyne, which implies measure and moderation, goes along with leniency (praos, Dio Cassius 49.20) and epieikeia (Josephus, Ant. 14.13); so it is inclined to forgive (3Macc 7:6-7; I.Sard. 20.1-6). In addition, it is with increasing frequency characterized as being ready to serve³⁵ and dedicated to serving everyone; doctors who devote themselves to the service of all are praised for their dikaiosyne.³⁶ Finally, dikaiosyne is linked with beneficence and philanthropy. In the second century BC, Theodorus is praised "for his beneficence and his justice toward all" (euergesias heneken kai dikaiosynes tes pros hapantas, SB 9974, 7), as is Callicles,³⁷ and Musonius defines virtue thus: "Virtue (arete) is brotherly love and goodness and dikaiosyne and beneficence" (frag. 14, ed. C. E. Lutz, p. 92, 32; frag. 16, p. 104, 33; frag. 17, p. 108, 2; frag. 38, p. 136, 3; cf. frag. 11, p. 82, 33; frag. 13 b, p. 90, 13; cf. Philo, Quest. Gen. 4.66). Dikaiosyne had all of these characteristics when personified, honored, and even divinied,³⁸ worshiped,³⁹ given altars.⁴⁰

In the LXX, dikaiosyne translates the Hebrew seʿaqâh, the exact meaning of which is not discoverable but which seems to express fullness and abundance.⁴¹ The justice/righteousness of God, which in itself is indefinable, is always expressed in his relations with the world; it is a relational concept, one that has to do with activities. The believer confesses that on Yahweh's side, all is perfect: "his work is perfect, all his ways are justice" (Deut 32:4); "Justice belongs to the Lord our God" (Bar

1:15; 2:6; Ezra 9:15); “You are just with regard to all that has happened to us.”⁴² On rare occasions this legislative and retributive divine justice is purely judicial;⁴³ it is the attribute of an all-powerful sovereign: “You sit enthroned as a just judge” (Ps 9:5; 51:16; 96:13; 111:3; 129:3). He brings to pass exactly what he has announced,⁴⁴ but above all, his actions, which are so perfectly just, are always accompanied by goodness and mercy: “Yahweh will do justice to his people and will take pity on his servants” (Deut 32:36; Ps 88:13; 103:17; 116:5; Jer 9:23). He betroths himself to his people in justice, grace, and affection (Hos 2:21); “your great goodness will be remembered and your justice will be proclaimed” (Ps 145:7, 17). The “justices” of Yahweh are his divine favors (Judg 5:11; 1Sam 12:6ff.; Mic 6:3), a fullness of gifts (Deut 33:21; Amos 5:24), help (Isa 41:10—“I have upheld you by the right hand of my justice”; 42:6),⁴⁵ and above all, salvation (“a righteous God and Savior; there is none but me,” Isa 45:21; 46:13); “my salvation will soon come, and my justice will appear”;⁴⁶ “In your justice deliver me, free me, . . . save me” (Ps 71:2). Thus the Messiah, raised up by God’s justice and under his protection (Zech 9:9), will execute righteousness and justice (Isa 9:6; 11:4ff.; 32:1). He is the “Just One” who is to come (Jer 23:5) and will be called “Yahweh our Justice” (Jer 32:15).

Human justice/righteousness, which is contrasted with iniquity (anomia, Isa 5:7), is defined in relation to God (Zech 8:8, cf. Wis 5:6) and concretely as faithfulness to the law,⁴⁷ the proof of total dependence on and submission to the Lord, guaranteeing innocence (Ps 18:21, 25) and perfection (Ps 15:1ff.; 24:3). It is also a cardinal virtue, however (Wis 8:7) and a correct attitude in all human relationships, including, for example, the giving of alms.⁴⁸ There are constant appeals to seek (1Macc 7:12), pursue (Prov 15:9; 21:21; Sir 27:8), practice righteousness and justice (Hos 10:12; Jer 22:3; Ezek 45:9ff.; 2Sam 8:15). Also quite common are the mentions of the fruits of this justice: pardon for sins (Tob 12:8; 14:9), the way of life (Prov 12:28), and promises of reward: “The one who sows justice will have a guaranteed reward,”⁴⁹ for “when one lives with justice, one finds grace with God” (Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.77).

In the NT, we must immediately distinguish between the dikaiosyne taught by St. Paul and that of the evangelists and the non-Pauline epistles.⁵⁰ In this last category of writings, all the occurrences are conformable to the LXX,⁵¹ always with a nuance befitting the “ethics” of the new covenant. When John the Baptist objected to baptizing Jesus with a baptism of repentance, the Master replied, “It is appropriate for us to fulfill all righteousness,”⁵² that is, to conform to God’s plan, what God has decided, what is pleasing to God. The beatitude of those who hunger after righteousness⁵³ is the blessedness of moral integrity, the desire for spiritual goods; it is analogous to the beatitude of those “persecuted for the sake of righteousness” (Matt 5:10; 1Pet 3:14), religious persecution of the disciples, whose moral conduct condemned pagan depravity. But there are different righteousnesses: “If your righteousness does not go beyond that of the scribes and Pharisees you will not enter the kingdom of heaven.”⁵⁴ For them, righteousness was embodied in spectacular displays; but in the new covenant, it is the heart that counts: right intentions, and especially love. So there is a qualitative change. justice/righteousness in the new kingdom means fulfilling God’s will freely and joyfully, which goes beyond (perisseuo) material obedience. This is even clearer in Matt 21:32—“John came to you in the way of righteousness and you did not believe in him,”⁵⁵ whereas the publicans and the prostitutes came to be purified. Great sinners were made righteous by believing in the message of the prophet sent by God.

To say that “human wrath does not accomplish the justice/righteousness of God” (Jas 1:20, dikaiosyne theou; cf. Rom 10:3) means that it is foreign to the divine will and hence cannot be justice. The quotation of Gen 15:6—“Abraham believed God and this was imputed to him as righteousness”⁵⁶—remains on the Jewish plane: the patriarch is judged by God as being holy in his conduct, so that a nuance of reward is conveyed. Likewise Heb 11:7—Noah “became an heir of righteousness according to faith” (cf. Rom 4:11, 13) and not according to works or through a legal system. Similarly, training through correction (paideia), which procures the “peaceable fruit of righteousness,”⁵⁷ seems to internalize dikaiosyne; the “trainee” acquires this or that virtue as evidence of eternal salvation. This original nuance in the new covenant is found also at 1Pet 2:24—Christ was crucified “so that we might live for righteousness/justice.” Life is transformed by faith and baptism, which make the Christian ready to do God’s will, able to serve him, and thus to be genuinely just/righteous, for “whoever fulfills righteousness is born of him” (1John 2:29). In the new heavens and new earth “the justice/righteousness will dwell for which we wait as the fulfillment of his promise” (2Pet 3:13). This eschatological righteousness is a perfection in which nothing is lacking; here it is almost synonymous with glory, God’s gift if not God himself.

There remain the Johannine usages of dikaiosyne, first in the sense of “trial”: the Paraclete “will convict the world of guilt with respect to righteousness/justice.”⁵⁸ Like an advocate in an appeals court, the Holy Spirit will ask each person to make an individual assessment of the original judgment against Jesus: was he guilty or innocent? Everyone must take sides. The Paraclete will convict the original judges of injustice and will exalt the innocence of their convict. As for 1John 2:29, this verse presupposes the Pauline theology: “Since you know that God is just/righteous, you know also that whoever practices justice/righteousness is born of him.” This practice is the whole of Christian ethics (cf. Rev 22:11) and means above all the exercise of brotherly love (1John 3:10). But the way in which God’s righteousness is related to that of his children is remarkable: it is as divinely born ones that Christians resemble their Father. Those who are born of a righteous/just God cannot be other than truly righteous/just (cf. 1John 3:7).

For St. Paul, dikaiosyne is a new and crucial chapter in soteriology.⁵⁹ The former Pharisee eliminates the self-proclaimed righteousness obtained through observance of the law (dikaiosyne ek nomou),⁶⁰ by the “works” that it prescribes (Gal 2:16; Rom 3:20; 4:2; Titus 3:5). This righteousness, after all, would be purely legal, a personal victory and the rightful property of the obedient person;⁶¹ but this dikaiosyne cannot give life (Gal 3:21) and is therefore worthless, no longer valid, because in the divine plan the law was intended to be no more than a pedagogue, a transitory institution (Gal 3:15-26). Otherwise “Christ died in vain” (Gal 2:21). But in fact Christ is “the end of the law (telos nomou) that righteousness might be given to whoever believes” (Rom 10:4). So a new dispensation is substituted,⁶² that of a life-giving justice/righteousness, a participation in God’s righteousness (the antithesis of personal human righteousness, Rom 10:3; 2Cor 5:21). This righteousness is based on faith and is valid for all humanity (Rom 9:30ff.). In its very essence, therefore, this is no longer a human way of justification but justification through divine intervention. What then is this dikaiosyne theou?⁶³ It is known by its manifestations, because it is essentially active, dynamic,⁶⁴ communicating benefits proper to God, making, as it were, a new creation (2Cor 5:17); and its goal is the justification of humans (Rom 3:25-26). This “righteousness/justice of God” is first of all a divine attribute (Rom 8:33, “it is God who justifies,” theos ho dikaion), notably with respect to his role in retributive justice;⁶⁵ but it is seen especially as a merciful will that is gracious and forgiving (Titus 3:5). It is revealed in the cross of Christ, the source of salvation for all who believe.⁶⁶ “Christ has become our righteousness” (Christos egenethe dikaiosyne, 1Cor 1:30; Rom 10:4). Sin is abolished (Gal 2:17; Rom 4:7). This is not a simple acquittal, a verdict of justification (Rom 8:33); this is the merciful justice of God, “who gives life to the dead and calls the nonexistent into existence” (Rom 4:17) and transforms the one who participates in Christ’s death and resurrection. He infuses the believer with a dikaiosis zoes (Rom 5:18), the infusion of a pneuma zoe dia dikaiosynen (Rom 8:10; Gal 3:2, 5). It is consequently a gift received (dorea, Rom 5:17), a real justice/righteousness (4:4-5) that a person possesses beginning in the present,⁶⁷ thanks to Christ. “God made him who knew no sin to be sinforus, so that we might become the righteousness of God in him” (2Cor 5:21).

Saving faith is precisely this acceptance and this confidence in God acting in the mystery of Christ, in whom the future of salvation is summed up (Rom 3:22). justice/righteousness and faith are not identical; for it is not faith that justifies, but God who justifies through faith (cf. Lagrange, “La Justification selon saint Paul,” p. 140). In faith, a person appropriates Christ’s righteousness (Gal 2:17, the efficient cause of our own righteousness, thus becoming the “righteousness of God,” 2Cor 5:21).

Righteousness proceeds from faith, which is like a title for obtaining this gift from God. To talk about this relationship between faith and justice/righteousness, St. Paul uses the phrase ek pisteos (“from or of faith,” Rom 5:1; Gal 3:24; this is man’s part; cf. Gal 3:8); dia pisteos (“through faith,” Rom 3:30; with the genitive, dia refers to the active role of faith as used by God, Rom 3:22; 9:30; cf. Lagrange, ibid.); finally, the instrumental dative pistei (Rom 3:28; 5:2; cf. 5:20; Phil 1:27): a person is justified by means of faith, but the principal agent is God.

Understood thus, justice/righteousness by faith cannot be forensic. The sinner is transformed within, is prepared to life with God, prepared for eternal life (Rom 5:21; 8:10), granted a power (5:17) that allows him to triumph over sin (6:18ff.; 2Cor 6:4), outfitted with the “weapons of justice/righteousness” (Rom 6:13; 2Cor 6:7; Eph 6:14). Since the object of this initial justification is a living being, it must continue as an unending process;⁶⁸ so in concrete terms it is identified with the Christian life (1Pet 2:24; 1John 3:10) and with sanctification.⁶⁹

IV. Dikaioo. — The occurrences of this (relatively rare) verb in the secular literature shed no light on the biblical texts. In the literary documents, the predominant meaning is “judge to be good, appreciate, reckon to be just” and hence “pronounce personal judgment.”⁷⁰ The ten or so occurrences in the papyri have the same meaning,⁷¹ but almost all have a legal sense: “the court’s verdict was that we should reimburse the capital.”⁷²

In the LXX, the passive of dikaioo, translating the qal stem of the Hebrew verb sadaq, almost always means “be just,” as at Gen 38:26—“Tamar has been more in the right than I.”⁷³ Good judges “pronounce the just just”⁷⁴ and do not justify the guilty (Exod 23:7). This justice/righteousness consists in being in order, as by carrying out a vow (Sir 18:22); in being within one’s right (niphil of the Hebrew verb shaphath, Tob 6:12, 14; cf. Add Esth 10:9); and especially in being “innocent, beyond reproach.”⁷⁵ It is a gift given by God.⁷⁶ Often dikaioo means “defend, excuse,”⁷⁷ but this declaratory sense (2Sam 15:4)—which is rather often legal—is purely literary, because it presupposes that no one can effectively justify the sinner⁷⁸—except the Messiah: “My servant, the Just One, will justify the many (hiphil of sadaq); he will take on their iniquities” (Isa 53:11). Here the death of the servant expiates the sins of the people; to justify means to destroy sin, so that sinners recover a real innocence of soul.⁷⁹ This heralds Pauline justification.

The Gospels use the aorist passive edikaiothe in the same meaning as the LXX. In the parable about the recalcitrant children—representing people who refused to believe God’s message as communicated either by Jesus or John the Baptist—the Master concludes: “Wisdom has been justified by her works” (Matt 11:19) or “by all her children” (Luke 7:35). Far from blaming the precursor for his austerity or Jesus for his open-mindedness, the people and the publicans showed themselves to be teachable and conformed to the dispositions of divine wisdom. Thus they avenged and “justified” this wisdom, proclaiming the excellence and the authenticity of its providential interventions.⁸⁰ The “children of wisdom,” truly wise people, prove through their adherence that the means used by God to carry out his merciful plan of salvation were effective, well adapted to their goal. The justification in Matt 12:37, which is declaratory (but with cause), is perfectly traditional,⁸¹ as is Matt 16:15, which denounces “those who pass themselves off as just before people” (hoi dikaiontes heautous) but whose assessment is at variance with God’s.⁸²

The conclusion of the parable of the Pharisee and the Tax Collector, addressed to certain people who thought of themselves as just (hoti eisin dikαιοi, Luke 18:9), uses the perfect passive participle dedikaiomenos to express that the tax collector “went down to his house justified rather than the other (the Pharisee)” (verse 14) upon his return from the temple, thanks to his prayer and his humility.⁸³ Here it is a question of interior justification, which is much more than a verdict of acquittal: God grants that this “sinner” becomes just, he makes him just. This is already the Pauline sense attested in the discourse at Pisidian Antioch: “Through him (Jesus), everyone who believes is justified (en touto pas ho pisteuon dikaioutai) from everything that you could not be justified from (aorist passive, dikaiothenai) by the law of Moses.”⁸⁴

Several times St. Paul uses dikaioo in its forensic OT sense, “declare or acknowledge to be just,” especially when he is quoting the OT,⁸⁵ but it would be wrong to extend this meaning to all the texts. In the first place, this would be to forget that “verbs in -oo mean to make whatever the root indicates. Thus dikaioo should properly mean ‘make just.’ This meaning is not found in secular Greek for rather natural reasons.”⁸⁶ In the second place, it would overlook the fact that St. Paul, as a converted Pharisee, perceived as no one else did the opposition between the new covenant and the old covenant, law and grace, circumcision and baptism, and perhaps especially the inefficacy of the old legal dispensation compared to the efficacy and realism of the dispensation of salvation centered on the cross of Jesus. The consequence is a radical change in ideas concerning righteousness/justification, as is seen in the frequent linking of the verb “justify” with faith in Christ and in the explicit contrast between justification and works of the law; there is a different scheme or process for attributing justice/righteousness in the new covenant than in the old covenant. The apostle gives dikaioo a causative sense, as appears from Rom 3:24—“All have sinned and come short of the glory of God (cf. Rom 8:30; 2Cor 3:18; 5:21); (henceforth) they are justified (present passive participle, dikaioumenoι) freely by his grace, through the redemption (apolytrosis) that is in Jesus Christ.” God has shown his mercy, but not by pronouncing acquittal pure and simple; through Christ a price was paid, a ransom (lytron ) with expiatory value (cf. verse 25: hilasterion), so that “sinners” have become just, have been made truly righteous.⁸⁷ Another clear text is Rom 3:26—“to show his justice/righteousness (his salvific action), so that (it might be established that) he himself is just and that he justifies (present active participle, dikaionta) the one who has faith in Jesus”: the just God communicates his justice/righteousness and makes just.⁸⁸ Again: “We hold that a person is justified (present passive infinitive, dikaiousthai) by faith without works of the law”;⁸⁹ “There is only one God, who will justify (future active indicative, dikaiosei = will make just) the circumcised on the basis of faith and the uncircumcised by means of that same faith” (Rom 3:30).

The realism in this Christian justification is made explicit at Rom 5:1—“Having therefore been justified by faith (aorist passive participle, dikaiothentes), let us maintain peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ.”⁹⁰ Whereas sinners were enemies of God, they have now “become righteous/just,” i.e., reconciled with God (5:10) in an enduring way (5:2) and have a loving relationship with a holy God in the peace of a purified heart. Such is the standing of the present Christian life. Believers are made so thoroughly just that they are sure of their future glorification: “Those whom God has called he has also justified (aorist active indicative, edikaiosen), those whom he has justified he has also glorified (aorist, anticipating something that is certain, according to Lagrange)” (Rom 8:30). All these verbs are causative; all these acts of God connect to each other and are called by each other’s names. Justification is as real and as personal a gift as the gift of faith; the present state is as certain as the future glory.⁹¹ Finally, 1Cor 6:11 is decisive: “You have been washed (at baptism), you have been sanctified, you have been justified (aorist passive indicative, edikaiothete) in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ and in the Spirit of our God.” The three aorist verbs show that the events coincide; the two latter verbs in the passive express the reality of the interior change. E. B. Allo notes, “This is a classic passage against imputed righteousness.”

V. Dikaïoma. — Schrenk (TDNT, vol. 2, p. 219) correctly observes that the ending -ma indicates the result of an action, in this case the action expressed by dikaïoo, “to justify.” Thus dikaïoma will mean “justification” in Rom 5:16, 18, where St. Paul contrasts the death sentence (katakrima) that followed Adam’s transgression (di’ henos paraptomatos) with justification through Christ (di’ henos dikaïomatos), justification that gives life (eis dikaïosin zoes)⁹² and is valid for all humankind. Humankind takes on a new religious “status,”⁹³ not simply on the basis of God’s declaration, but because this justice/righteousness has become the property of former sinners who can take advantage of it.⁹⁴

On the other hand, “God’s righteous decree” (to dikaïoma tou theou, Rom 1:32), “the requirements of the law” (ta dikaïomata tou nomou, Rom 2:26, cf. 8:4), and “worship regulations” (dikaïomata latreias, Heb 9:1, 10) have the common OT meaning “ordinance, regulation.”⁹⁵ In accord with the ideal of Jewish piety, Zechariah and Elizabeth, “both just (dikaioi) before God, walked in all the commandments and regulations of the Lord” (Luke 1:6). It is more difficult to understand Rev 15:4—“All the people will see and bow down before you, because your justifications are manifest” (hoti ta dikaiomata sou ephanerotheresan). This could refer to the punishment of the ungodly,⁹⁶ but more likely it refers to brilliant manifestations of divine sovereignty (cf. Bar 2:17—in Hades the dead do not return “glory and justice to the Lord”; verse 19).

VI. Dikaiosis. — This rather rare substantive (unknown in Philo, Epictetus, and the papyri) normally means “that which is in accord with the right, the act of establishing justice,”⁹⁷ but none of the secular usages shed light on “conferring of justice, act of justification” in Rom 4:25 and 5:18. In the first text: “Jesus our Lord was delivered because of our sins (to do away with them) and raised because of our justification (to obtain it for us, dia ten dikaiosin hemon);”⁹⁸ dia indicates the goal, the instrumental cause, “with a view to our salvation”; Christ’s resurrection is the efficient cause of our justification, for if at baptism the Christian dies with Christ on the cross (Rom 6:4), he enters the new life with Christ emerging from the tomb. Our life is a participation in his, the “life-giving spirit.”⁹⁹ In Rom 5:18—“As through the trespass of one, condemnation fell on all people, so also the righteousness worked by one man (di’ henos dikaiomatos, the state or work of righteousness) procures for all people (in solidarity with him) the justification that gives life (eis dikaiosin zoes).” This can be understood either as participation in the very life of God or as the existence that concretely carries out justice¹⁰⁰ but necessarily depends on the infusion of grace; justification already means life, as with a fruit seed.

VII. Dikastes. — This substantive is used only by St. Stephen in the NT (Acts 7:27, 35), and it is a quotation from Exod 2:14—“Who set you up as a chief and judge over us?” (archonta kai dikasten, Hebrew shophet). This association suggests that dikastes is not exactly synonymous with krites: there are different kinds of judges. Dikastes may refer to a magistrate who sits at a tribunal to pass judgment,¹⁰¹ but also to “elected judges” (Philo, Unchang. God 112; Husbandry 116), delegates,¹⁰² arbiters chosen to settle disputes,¹⁰³ such as priests, whose duties include settling contested matters;¹⁰⁴ and finally the conscience, and God, the heavenly judge.¹⁰⁵

The office of judge is treated with the highest consideration.¹⁰⁶ There are “royal judges,” like Dionysius, “king’s friend become politikon strategon” (SEG XXIII, 617, 4; cf. P.Dura 18, 10, 31; 19, 18; from AD 87/88). There are above all those eminent persons who have a top-level role in the city administration,¹⁰⁷ who are members of a board or of commissions of the assembly charged with preparing for a festival or managing funds.¹⁰⁸ Cities invite foreign judges to “settle disputed contracts”¹⁰⁹ and honor them not only for the fairness of their decisions but also for their behavior.¹¹⁰

Here we may mention the biblical use of dikastes for a person of high rank, a ruler,¹¹¹ a leader of Israel (1Sam 7:1-2), having official authority and the required powers. Artisans are incapable of these functions (Sir 38:33).

¹ Cf. E. Boisacq, Dictionnaire étymologique; D. Hill, Greek Words and Hebrew Meanings, p. 98; P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique, p. 284.

² Homer, Od. 11.218; 14.59: “my custom is to honor guests.” Dike is “that which is established, set, fixed”; δίκη ε—στιν = it is customary (Od. 4.691; 19.43); Pindar, Ol. 2.18: “what is fitting (just) and what is not” (ε—ν δίκᾱ, παρὰ δίκᾱν); 2Macc 8:26—“the custom of the eve of the Sabbath” (Aquila); P.Hamb. 37, 8 (second century AD): τῇ δίκῃ parallel to τοῦ ἡθους σου; P.Flor. 295, 2: “the custom of strangers.” The greatest number of secular references are due to G. Quell, G. Schrenk, “δίκη,” in TDNT, vol. 2, pp. 174–182; cf. V. Ehrenberg, Die Rechtsidee im frühen Griechentum, Leipzig, 1921.

³ Hesiod, Op. 256; cf. 279–280: “Zeus has given humans the gift of justice (δίκην), which is by far the best of goods.” In Solon, δίκη always has a divine character (frag. 1.8; 3.14ff., ed. Diehl, I, 17 and 23); but Sophocles demythologizes it, representing Dike seated next to the infernal gods, “but the laws were not established for men by these gods. No one knows the day when they appeared; they are unwritten and unshakable” (Ant. 450–467). If the Erinyes are Dike’s auxiliaries and bring punishment (Heraclitus, frag. 94 = I, 96, ed. Diels), dike becomes the universal law, an immanent norm that is obligatory for all people and determines the conduct of each. In Philo, punitive justice is still associated with God: “Justice, seated next to God” (ἡ πάρεδρος θεοῦ δίκη, Change of Names 194; cf. Joseph 48), his follower or companion (Conf. Tongues 118: ἡ ὀπαδὸς τοῦ θεοῦ δίκη), judge or overseer of human affairs (ἔφορος, Joseph 170), unshakable and inflexible (Decalogue 95); “the only father of all things wields his power according to justice and the law over each of his creatures” (Spec. Laws 1.14). Cf. the gnostic amulet of the fourth-fifth century, πλήρος οὐρανὸς καὶ δίκης ἅγιος ὁ δόξης ανιααδα . . . Μιγαήλ (P.Princ. 107, 17).

⁴ Homer, Il. 18.508; Od. 11.570; Hesiod, Op. 225; Philo, Moses 1.46: “He kills without judgment (without trial).” Cf. δικίδιον, “minor case” (Aristophanes, Vesp. 511; Eq. 347). Cf. “the Day of Yahweh” (Joel 4:14; cf. judgment day in a Christian inscription: δίκης μετὰ λοίσθιον ἡμᾶρ, in G. Kaibel, Epigrammata, n. 173, 17). This meaning, trial-judgment, is constant in the inscriptions (I.Gonn. 77–81, 87, 90, 01; I.Lamps., 3, 4; 6, 5; 7, 41; I.Cumae, 1, 3; 4, 13; 5, 11; 7, 6; 8, 3; I.Ilium: a law against tyranny and oligarchy, 25, 90, 95, 102, 157, 164, 165) and is the most common meaning in the papyri. Cf. this summons in a civil suit in the fourth-third century: ἡ δίκη σοι ἀναγραφῆσεται ἐ—ν τω— ἐ—ν Ἡρακλέους πόλει δικαστηρίῳ, P.Hib. 30, 24; “my mother died before the trial” (P.Achm. 8, 26; cf. P.Oxy. 486, 28; P.Princ. 82, 14); P.Lille 29, 2 (fragment of a law code, third century AD): “If anyone because of a tort has filed suit against another person’s slave . . .”; line 7: “if he loses his case, let him pay a fine.” In an act of emancipation of three Jews at Delphi (second century BC): “They shall fear no trial nor any fine nor any punishment whatsoever” (CII 709); a borrower shall return what he owes “without lawsuit, contest, or chicanery of any sort” (ἀνευ δίκης καὶ κρίσεως καὶ πάσης εὐρεσιλογίας, P.Rein. 15, 21; cf. P.Lond. 298, 16; vol. 2, p. 206). At the time of the Jewish revolt at Alexandria, the insurgents “seek justice (δίκην ἐ—παιτοῦντες) violently and unjustly” (C.Pap.Jud., n. 435, col. III, 23; SB 5357, 15; P.Hal. 1, 38: ἡ δίκη ἔστω; 124; P.Rev. 33, 16; 97, 4; P.Mich. 530, 30; 531, 7; R. Taubenschlag, Law of Greco-Roman Egypt, pp. 15, 189ff., 330ff., 416; idem, Opera Minora, vol. 2, pp. 397ff.). A constantly used legal formula is καθάπερ ἐ—γ δίκης, “as if there had been a judgment (preceding writs of execution), as if there had been a formal court decision,” P.Ryl. 582, 20 (42 BC); 585, 38; P.Fam.Tebt. 2, 19; 4, 23; P.Bon. 25, 24; P.Oslo 37, 15; 39, 20; P.Mert. 6, 28; 10, 25; P.Sakaon 63–66; 72, 14; 74, 17; 96, 18; cf. H. Meyer-Laurin, “Zur Entstehung und Bedeutung der καθάπερ ἐ—κ δίκης—Klausel in den griechischen Papyri Ägyptens,” in RIDA, 1974, pp. 349–350; C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, p. 743; H. J. Wolff, Das Justizwesen der Ptolemäer, Munich, 1962, idem, “Some Observations on Praxis,” in Proceedings XII, pp. 527–535.

⁵ Dike is the goddess who avenges without pity (Hesiod, Th. 901; Op. 220ff., 256); she pursues the criminal (Dittenberger, Syl. 1176); Sophocles, El. 528: “justice has condemned him”; Ant. 538; Aeschylus (in Stobaeus, Flor. 125, 6; vol. 5, p. 1138); SB 5103, 13 (third century BC): ὁ θεὸς ἀντω—τὴν δίκην ἐ—πιθείη; Josephus, War 1.84; 7.34; Ant. 6.305; 14.28: punishment for an offense; 4Macc 4:13—“divine justice, angered at these crimes, drew upon them the hostility of Antiochus”; 9:9; 12:12—“Divine justice holds a more lively fire in reserve for you”; 18:22 (but 8:14, 22, this justice pardons a transgression blamed on compulsion). Cf. E. Gerner, “Zum Begriff δίκη im attischen Recht,” in Festschrift für Leopold Wenger, Munich, 1945, pp. 242–268.

⁶ Wis 14:31; Philo, Creation 80: “a punishment was instituted to punish impious conduct”; Josephus, War 7.453: God punishes the wicked; Ant. 6.288; 18.255: he inflicts punishments. P.Fay. 21, 24: a proclamation of the prefect Marcus Petronius Mamertinus, “that creditors might pay the penalties due to their disobedience” (ὅπως τῆς ἀπειθείας ἐ—κι—νοι τὴν προσήκουσαν δίκην ὑπόσχωσι). In the fourth century, δίκην τὴν ὑπὲρ τῆς

ἀμελίας ὑποσχει—ν (Chrest. Wilck., n. 469, 10). Cf. τίμημα τῆς δίκης θάνατος (H. Wankel, I. Ephes., Bonn, 1949, n. II, 11).

⁷ Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 5.2.1129a33 (cf. this edict of Germanicus: ε—άν γάρ δέη, αὐτὸς Βαίβιος ε—κ τοῦ ἴσου καὶ δικαίου τὰς ξενίας διαδώσει, SB 3924, 17). For Demosthenes (3.21), the δίκαιος πολίτης is the citizen who carries out his obligations toward the state; Philo, Spec. Laws 4.46; Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.293: “What is more just than obeying the laws?”

⁸ Cf. Aeschylus, Ag. 1604; Aegisthus declares: “I was marked out (κὰ γὼ δίκαιος) to plan this murder.”

⁹ Δίκαιος is constantly linked with ὅσιος, cf. Plato, Resp. 1.331 a; Grg. 507 b; Euthphr. 12 c–d: “all that is pious is just”; ibid. 12 e: “Here is the part of justice that seems to me to be pious and religious”; Polybius 22.10.8; Philo, Moses 2.108; Flight 63; Josephus, Ant. 8.295; 12.43: “the high priest Onias was surnamed the Just (ὁ δίκαιος) because of his piety toward God and his benevolence toward his compatriots”; 15.138. Aeschylus, Sept. 598: “What presage here links a just person with the impious?”

¹⁰ Epictetus 1.22.1; 2.17.6. Cf. Josephus, Ant. 1.158: Abraham was a δίκαιος ἀνὴρ (cf. 6.93), like David (7.110), Uzziah (9.216), and Hezekiah: φύσις δ ἦν αὐτῷ— χρηστὴ καὶ δικαία καὶ εὐσεβής (9.260). Cf. Aeschylus, Sept. 610. Δίκαιος is constantly linked with εὐσεβής (Euripides, Alc. 1147–1148; Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.10; Josephus, Ant. 6.265; 8.121, 394; 15.182; Ag. Apion 2.170ff. I. Did. 218, 1–2; I. Priene 46, 12, etc.). Cf. ἀληθω—ς δικαιοτάτου ἡγεμόνος (H. Wankel, I. Ephes., n. XVIII, 13).

¹¹ Philo, Alleg. Interp. 2.18: “A person described in terms of the virtues is called, according to the virtues, prudent, temperate, just, courageous”; Sobr. 38; Migr. Abr. 219; cf. ibid. 121: “The just person (ὁ δίκαιος) is the stay of the human race; he brings his personal property to the community and gives unstintingly for the good of those who find a use for it. He then seeks from God, who alone possesses all wealth, that which he does not have”; ibid. 124: “the just among the human race remain in place to push sicknesses away.” Worse Attacks Better 121, 123; a man of faith (Alleg. Interp. 3.228); “he discovers that absolutely everything is a gift from God” (ibid. 3.78). God alone is just in the highest degree (Dreams 2.194; Moses 2.279; Flight 82; cf. Josephus, War 7.223; Ant. 2.108; 11.55).

¹² When Samuel anoints David, he exhorts him to be just and to obey the commandments (Josephus, Ant. 6.165; cf. Solomon, Ant. 8.208). One can become just through repentance (6.210) and merit a reward (18.18). More particularly, dikaïos means “correct, punctual” (5.197; 15.106; 16.212), notably with respect to things that are well balanced, according to measure, like balances and weights (Lev 19:36; Deut 25:15; Ezek 45:10; Philo, Heir 162), a measuring (P.Hib. 90, 11; 91, 2; P.Oxy. 1126, 7; P.Lille 24, 9; P.Yale 51, 10; O.Amst. 91, 9), prices (SB 5175, 15: τιμὴν δικαίην; P.Tebt. 389, 17), the rising of the Nile as needed (δικαία ἀνάβασις, Dittenberger, Or. 666, 11), well-founded suspicions (ὑποψίας δικαίας, Life 93), “proper” benevolence of spouses (εὖνοια δικαία, Ant. 1.318), things that are appropriate (Ant. 2.272), conformable to the right (δικαία αἰ—τία, P.Stras. 22, 3; BGU 267, 8; SB 5174, 4).

¹³ Δικαίως, as opposed to ἀδόλως (Thucydides 5.18.9; 5.23.2; 5.47.8) means “loyally, without deceit”; cf. ε—πιμελω—ς καὶ πιστω—ς καὶ δικαίως (B. Latyshev, Inscriptiones Antiquae, I, n. 43, 10–11); ε—ποιήσαντο ὀρθω—ς καὶ δικαίως (SEG XIX, 327, 22); δικαιοσύνης καὶ πίστεως = justice and loyalty (Plutarch, Aem. 2.6).

¹⁴ Jer 23:5-6; 33:15; cf. Isa 53:11; Zech 9:9; Pss. Sol. 17.35—“He is a just king, taught by God, placed over them.” Cf. H. Dechent, “Der ‘Gerechte’: Eine Bezeichnung für den Messias,” in TSK, vol. 100, 1927–28, pp. 439ff.

¹⁵ Isa 24:16. God rewards this justice (Deut 6:24ff.; 24:13), while the one who turns aside from justice will die (Ezek 3:20; 18:5-26). “The justice of the just will be upon him” (Ezek 18:20) suggests this reward but also hints that this justice is a virtue immanent in the faithful. Cf. Philo, Sobr. 38–40; Sacr. Abel and Cain 54; Alleg. Interp. 2.18; Prelim. Stud. 90: “in the soul, that which is just (τὸ δίκαιον) is the perfection and true goal of the acts of Life.”

¹⁶ In the mouth of pagans: Pilate’s wife calls Jesus “the just” (Matt 27:19; cf. E. Fascher, Das Weib des Pilatus, Halle, 1951), and Pilate repeats the description (27:24), meaning that he is innocent. The centurion at the foot of the cross says “This was a just man” (Luke 23:47)—not guilty, a martyr bringing glory to God. Herod is more influenced by the OT when he respects John the Baptist “knowing that he was a just and holy man” (ἄνδρα δίκαιον καὶ ἅγιον, Mark 6:20); but altogether Greek are Phil 4:8—“whatever is true, honorable, just, pure . . . whatever is good and virtuous . . . think on these things”; and Titus 2:12—“Let us live σωφρόνως καὶ δικαίως καὶ εὐσεβω—ς in this present age” (cf. C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, vol. 2, p. 638). The adverb δικαίως is used for judging with equity (Deut 1:16; Prov 31:9; Sir 35:18), sinners justly punished (Wis 19:13; T. Sim. 4.3); legitimately, according to deserts (Josephus, Ant. 2.140), equitably, justly (Epictetus 2.1.3); acting correctly (P.Tebt. 702, 21; cf. 19, 14; P.Oxy. 653, 23; P.Fam.Tebt. 19, 4); legally in possession (P.Tebt. 335, 12); money justly due (P.Fouad 26, 54). Rather than translate ε—κνήψατε δικαίως (1Cor 15:34) “return to state of just sobriety,” we should understand “sober up rightly” or better “as is fitting, adopting right conduct.”

¹⁷ Cf. Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 5.2.1129a34: “the right (τὸ δίκαιον) is that which is conformable to the law and that which is equal”; Polybius 3.21.10; Job 8:3—“Does God pervert what is right?”; Prov 18:5; 21:7; Josephus, War 1.507: natural right; Ant. 12.121: citizenship rights; 8.296: legal obligation. Xenophon’s guests wish for the opportunity for moral conduct: τὰ δίκαια δύνασθαι πρήσσειν (frag. 1.15; ed. J. Defradas, Les Elégiaques grecs, Paris, 1962, p. 76).

¹⁸ 2Pet 1:13; cf. Sir 10:23; 2Macc 9:12 = it is fitting; Phil 1:7—“It is only just (legitimate, καθὼς ἐστὶν δίκαιον) for me to feel this way”; Philo, Husbandry 80: δίκαιον εἶναι = it is reasonable; Sacr. Abel and Cain 74; Menander, Dysk. 293, 763; IG IX, 1, 582, 22; C.Pap.Jud. 4, 3; P.Tebt. 50, 25; P.Oxy. 1117, 29; cf. 717, 10.

¹⁹ Acts 4:19; cf. 2Thess 1:6—“It is a just thing with God (δίκαιον παρὰ θεῶν) to return trouble to those who trouble us” (retribution at God’s judgment seat, cf. Isa 66:6; Col 3:25; cf. Elisha: “It is just to kill those who have been captured according to the laws of warfare,” in Josephus, Ant. 9.58); Eph 6:1—“Children, obey your parents in the Lord; this is just,” i.e., conformable to the divine will.

²⁰ Rom 3:26. Cf. 1John 1:9—“He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins.” In pardoning the guilty who repent, the just God is faithful to his promises of mercy.

²¹ The angel of the waters proclaims: “You are just, you who are and who were, the Holy One (ὁ ὅσιος)” (Rev 16:5); “true and just are your judgments” (16:7; 19:2); 1Pet 2:23—when Christ suffered violence he entrusted himself to “the One who judges with justice” (δικαίως, cf. Jer 11:20; John 8:50; Rom 12:19). Hence Πατήρ δίκαιε! (John 17:25; 2Tim 4:8).

²² Acts 3:14 (cf. 7:52—“the coming of the Just One”; 22:14; 1Pet 3:18—“Christ died . . . the just for the unjust.” 1John 2:1—“We have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the Just”; Enoch 46.3—“the Son of Man who possesses justice and with whom justice dwells”). Christ is a “saint,” a “holy one,” i.e., one consecrated to God (Ps 16:10; Mark 1:24; Luke 4:34; John 6:69). If he is “just,” he is so inasmuch as he fulfills the divine will, and also because he is totally innocent; but this designation also means that he is perfect to an absolute, limitless degree that belongs to the divine realm (cf. τελειώω in Heb 2:10; 5:9; 7:28; τελειωτής, 12:2).

²³ “Just Abel” (Matt 23:35; Heb 11:4); “just Lot” (2Pet 2:7-8; probably borrowed from a midrashic tradition, b. Ber. 54*b* ; cf. R. Le Déaut, Liturgie juive et Nouveau Testament, Rome, 1965, p. 52, n. 56; cf. S. Rappaport, “Der gerechte Lot,” in ZNW, 1930, pp. 299–304); “prophets and just ones” (Matt 13:17; cf. 10:41; 23:29; cf. 2*Apoc. Bar.* 85.1, 3, 12; D. Hill, “ΔΙΚΑΙΟΙ as a Quasi-Technical Term,” in NTS, vol. 11, 1965, pp. 297–302); Zechariah and Elizabeth, “just before God” (Luke 1:6), Simeon, δίκαιος καὶ εὐλαβής (Luke 2:25), Joseph (Matt 1:19—δίκαιος ὢν; cf. C. Spicq, “Joseph, son mari, étant juste . . . ,” in RB, 1964, pp. 206–211; A. Tosato, “Joseph, Being a Just Man,” in CBQ, 1979, pp. 547–551; cf. the graffito on a Hermes of Roman origin: χαί—ρε δίκαιος ὢν, cf. G. Susini, “Le iscrizioni greche di Bologna,” in Atti e memorie, Bologna, 1963, p. 76), the centurion Cornelius (Acts 10:22). Epitaph of Eleazar, “holy, just, loving his children, loving his brothers, loving the community” (CII, n. 321); Plutarch, Rom. 23.3. R. Mach, Der Zaddik in Talmud und Midrasch, Leiden, 1957.

²⁴ Δίκαιος as opposed to: ἁμαρτωλός (Matt 9:13; Mark 2:17; Luke 5:32; 15:7; Rom 5:19), ἄδικος (Matt 5:45; Acts 24:15), ἀπειθής (Luke 1:17), ἀσεβής (Rom 5:6-7; 1Tim 1:9; 1Pet 4:18), ἄνομος (Matt 13:41; 1Tim 1:9), πονηρός (Matt 13:49), ὑποκριτής (Matt 23:28; Luke 20:20).

²⁵ Rom 2:13—“It is not those who hear a law read that are just before God (δίκαιοι παρὰ θεω—), but those who put it into practice are recognized as just (δικαιωθήσονται)”; it is these latter who at judgment will be recognized and declared to be in effect the just, “that which they ought to be,” in conformity with what God willed.

²⁶ This means that this received justice is a gift of God. It is not acquired by individual effort; good “works” are only its manifestation and its fruit. Everything depends on the connection with Christ, like the connection of members to the head or branches to a vine. Cf. J. Coppens, “Le Saddiq-‘Juste,’ dans le Psautier,” in Mélanges H. Cazelles, Paris, 1981, pp. 299–306.

²⁷ Hab 2:4, quoted in Rom 1:17; Gal 3:11; Heb 10:38, in varied terms (cf. the commentaries). A. Feuillet (“La Citation d’Habacuc II, 4 et les huit premiers chapitres de l’Épître aux Romains,” in NTS, vol. 6, 1959, pp. 52–80) translates, “The one who is just by virtue of faith shall live” (“Celui qui est juste en vertu de la foi vivra”) and explains: the text shows “with what justice man must be clothed in order to live.” Cf. D. M. Smith, “ὁ δὲ δίκαιος ἐ—κ πίστεως ζήσεται,” in B. L. Daniels, M. J. Suggs, Studies in the History and Text of the N.T., Salt Lake City, 1967, pp. 13–25; G. von Rad, ‘Gerechtigkeit’ und ‘Leben’ in der Kultsprache der Psalmen, Göttingen, 1950.

²⁸ 1Tim 1:9 (cf. C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, vol. 1, p. 332). The two other Pauline texts agree with the usage of the LXX and secular usage: “Our bearing among you believers was holy, just, beyond reproach” (ὁσίως καὶ δικαίως καὶ ἀμέμπτως, 1Thess 2:10; cf. P. E. Langevin, “Le Seigneur Jésus selon un texte prépaulinien, I Th. I, 9–10,” in ScEccl, 1965, pp. 263–282; the linking of δίκαιος and ἄμεμπτος, as at Job 1:1; 9:10—ὁσίως καὶ δικαίως; SEG XIV, 676, 9; LSCG, n. 65, 8). The episkopos must be “sober, just, holy, self-controlled” (σώφρονα, δίκαιον, ὄσιον, ε—γκρατῆ, Titus 1:8); “just and holy” as at Deut 32:4; Ps 145:17; 1Thess 2:10; Eph 4:24; Philo, Good Man Free 83. In both cases it is a matter of irreproachable conduct (cf. ὁ βίος δίκαιος, Sallustius, De Deis et Mundo 10.2), but “holiness” is recognized in conformity to the will of God. For Antonius Liberalis, the just person is the balanced and proper person or, as we would say, “comme il faut”: Hierax, δίκαιος ἀνὴρ καὶ ε—πιφανής (Met. 3.1; same link, P.Dura XVIII, 1; I GLS I, pp. 13–41); Cragaleus, δίκαιος εἶναι καὶ φρόνιμος (IV, 2); Aegyptios ἦν μεγάλῳφρων καὶ δίκαιος (V, 1); Periphas “was just, rich, and pious” (VI, 1); Mounichos, “a just man” (XIV, 1); his children were all “ἀγαθοὺς καὶ δικαίους, and the gods loved them” (XIV, 2). Δίκαιος is constantly linked with καλός (Philo, Drunkness 197; Josephus, Ant. 13.431; Epictetus 1.22.1; 2.17.6; Musonius, frag. 3, ed. C. E. Lutz, p. 40; frag. 7, p. 58; frag. 11, p. 80; I.Priene 58, 12; 63, 21; 112, 6; I GLS 2740: “Martinus carried out καλω—ς καὶ δικαίως the service of lord Cronos and the gods”); with ἀγαθός (ibid. 14, p. 94); Luke 23:50; SEG XVII, 711, 15–18; I.Priene 58, 12; 63, 21; 112, 6 and 144; I.Bulg., n. 316, 7); with χρηστός (IG, II2, 12034; Josephus, Ant. 2.149; 6.294; 9.166; 11.183; Plutarch, De frat. amor. 6; Publ. 21.6).

²⁹ Aristotle, Rh. 1.9.1366b9ff.: “Justice is the virtue thanks to which each person possesses his property in accord with the law” (καὶ ὡς ὁ νόμος); cf. “the legal and just,” (τὸ νομικὸν δίκαιον, Eth. Nic. 5.12.1136a12). This is the dominant meaning in the papyri, where plaintiffs appeal to the justice of the strategos (BGU 1138, 4; 1824, 30; P.Oslo 128, 10; P.Oxy. 1873, 15) and mention their “rights” (P.Köln 100, 11, and 23; P.Petaus 11, 15; cf. Josephus, Ant. 14.403). “In the manner of a brigand and contrary to all justice, he fell upon my sheep and stole eighty-two of them” (P.Thead. 23, 9; republished P.Abinn. 44). The Christian papyri, which are late, are of no interest here; SB 6035, 17; 8763, 15; 8728, 18; 10522, 4: placing Δικαιοσύνη between —Αγάπη and Ει—ρήνη.

³⁰ Philo, Change of Names 197; Heir 243; Abraham 27, 56, 103, 104; Creation 80; Alleg. Interp. 1.63; 3.77. Josephus, Ant. 9.182; 14.176. An innate virtue (6.36) that is practiced from youth (1.53) and is the beauty of the soul (6.160) and confers prestige (Life 7).

³¹ Philo, Spec. Laws 4.56, 143, Prelim. Stud. 179; Josephus, Ant. 4.214; I.Did. 487, 5. In 111 BC, Queen Cleopatra III is described as “Thea, Philometor, Savior, Justice, Victory-Bringer” (P.Rein. 10, 9). Hence its frequent mention in the inscriptions, in honorific decrees. Cf. at Athens, in the fourth century BC, the praise for the commissioners of the Amphiaraiion of Oropus “for their justice and their zeal toward god and the people of Athens” (Dittenberger, Syl. 298, 31). At Delos in the second century, Aglaos of Cos is praised “for the integrity and justice that he shows in his life on all occasions” (F. Durrbach, Choix, n. 92, 18). Cf. R. Hutmacher, Ehrendekret, 1965, pp. 43ff. The Romans made justice into one of the four imperial virtues, along with virtue, piety, and clemency (cf. Dionysius of Halicarnassus 2.18.1–2; Diotogenes, On Kingship, in Stobaeus, Flor. 48; vol. 4, pp. 263ff.; Mon. Anc. 34). Cf. B. Lichocka, Justitia sur les monnaies impériales romaines, Warsaw, 1974.

³² Theognis 1.147: “Justice holds in itself all other virtues,” cited by Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 5.3.1129b30, who calls it the perfect virtue; it lacks nothing, and nothing surpasses it. Plato, Euthphr. 12 e: justice is concerned with relations between humans as well as with the gods; Prt. 330 bff. Epictetus 3.26.32; Plutarch, De fort. 2; Dittenberger, Or. 438, 8. Stobaeus cites Hermes Trismegistus: justice is a harmony in psychic equilibrium (Ecl. 1.49.4, vol. 1, p. 322, 10); Philo, Alleg. Interp. 1.72, a remedy for all ills (Worse Attacks Better 123), justice produces repose (ibid. 122), joy (Alleg. Interp. 3.247), and prosperity (Job 8:6; Joel 2:23). The just person is blessed (Ps 69:29; 112:4, 6).

³³ Philo, Quest. Gen. 1.97; Abraham 33; Josephus, Ant. 1.158. It is wisdom put into practice (Philo, Alleg. Interp. 1.72).

³⁴ Cf. Pollux in Lycia, in the second century AD: ἄνδρα καλὸν καὶ ἀγαθὸν καὶ πάση ἀρετῇ καὶ δικαιοσύνῃ διαπρέποντα (SEG XVII, 711, 15–18); διὰ τὴν τω—ν ἀνδρῶ—ν δικαιοσύνην τε καὶ φιλοτιμίαν (Dittenberger, Or. 339, 48); διενένκαντα πίστει καὶ ἀρετῇ καὶ δικαιοσύνῃ καὶ εὐσεβείᾳ καὶ περὶ τοῦ κοινοῦ συμφέροντος (ibid. 438,8).

³⁵ It acts in the interest of others (Philo, Migr. Abr. 11; Josephus, Ant. 11.183; War 7.263; Diotogenes, in Stobaeus, Ecl. 3.9.46, vol. 3, p. 360; Diogenes Laertius 10.150; I.Priene 63, 20). H. Bolkestein, Wohltätigkeit und Armenpflege im vorchristlichen Altertum, Utrecht, 1939, pp. 102ff.

³⁶ I.Thas. 180, 7: δικαίως καὶ φιλαγάθως καὶ ι—ατρεύοντα ε—πὶ σωτηρίᾳ τῇ πάντων; I.Car. 70 B, 9; I.Did. 391B, 1, 13–14: δικαίως καὶ φιλαγάθως; Dittenberger, Syl. 193, 19. Aristotle wrote that friendship “is the fullest realization of justice” (Eth. Nic. 8.1.1155a22).

³⁷ SB 10113. Cf. the epitaph of an anonymous person deceased at age eighteen: δίκαιος θεοσεβής, φιλόανθρωπος (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, Paris, n. 71, 8); Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.146; Ant. 11.139; cf. Wis 12:19—“It is fitting that the just should be philanthropic.”

³⁸ At Gerasa: “Diogenes dedicated a statue of Justice” (SEG 7.487; L. Vidman, Sylloge Inscriptionum Religionis Isiacae et Sarapiacae, Berlin, 1969, n. 6 and 365; NCIG, n. 32; L. Robert, Opera Minora Selecta, vol. 1, p. 603; vol. 3, p. 1507); at Delos (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1958, p. 289, n. 356); at Athens (IG, IV2, 407), at Alexandria (Dittenberger, Or. 83); cf. P.Lond. 46, 403 (vol. 1, p. 78: a magical papyrus, a hymn to Hermes). Justice is sometimes identified with Nemesis (a dedication on Cyprus, cf. J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1949, p. 152, n. 203), but more often with Isis: “At Hermopolis the first of the Muses is called both Isis and Justice” (Plutarch, De Is. et Os. 3; hymn to Isis in E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques 175, IV, 6; I.Delos 2079, 2103).

³⁹ At Iasos (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1964, p. 222, n. 461); at Termessos: ι—ερεὺς Δικαιοσύνης (ibid., 1939, p. 526, n. 501).

⁴⁰ In Lycia (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1939, p. 505, n. 384), at Byblos and at Pinara (L. Robert, Documents, pp. 25ff.); at Ephesus, on the agora, as was fitting, cf. C. Börker, R. Merkelbach, I.Ephes., Bonn, 1979, n. 503. — H. Lloyd-Jones, The Justice of Zeus, Berkeley–Los Angeles, 1971; J. Duchemin, “La Justice de Zeus et le destin d’Io,” in REG, 1979, pp. 1–54.

⁴¹ Cf. K. H. Fahlgren, Sedaqa, Uppsala, 1932; A. Descamps, “La Justice de Dieu dans la Bible grecque,” in Studia Hellenistica, vol. 5, Paris-Leiden, 1948, pp. 69–92; F. Nötscher, Die Gerechtigkeit Gottes bei den vorexilischen Propheten, Münster, 1915, ; F. Rosenthal, Sedaqa Charity, in HUCA, vol. 33, 1950–51; pp. 411–430; P. Wernberg-Møller, “Tsedeq, Tsadiq, Tsadoq, in the Zadokite Fragments, the Manual of Discipline and the Habakkuk Commentary,” in VT, 1953, pp. 310–315; J. P. Justesen, “On the Meaning of Sadaq,” AUSS 2, 1964, pp. 53–61; R. A. Rosenberg, “The Good Sadeq,” in HUCA, 1965, pp. 161–177; A. Descamps, L. Cerfaux, “Justice et justification,” in DBSup, vol. 4, col. 1417–1510; K. Koch, qdx. Theolog. Handwörterbuch zum A.T., vol. 2, pp. 507–530; J. M. Baumgarten, “The Heavenly Tribunal and the Personification of £edeq in Jewish Apocalyptic,” in ANRW 2, 19, 1, pp. 219–239; J. W. Olley, “Righteousness” in the Septuagint of Isaiah, Missoula, 1979; H. Cazelles, “Amore-Giustizia nella Bibbia,” in Giuseppe de Gennaro, Amore-Giustizia: Analisi semantica dei due termini, Aquila: Studio Biblico theological aquilano, 1980, pp. 577–590.

⁴² Neh 9:33; Dan 9:14; Ps 7:18; cf. Philo, Moses 2.237: God shows truth and justice (cf. Rom 3:25ff.); Unchang. God 79.

⁴³ Cf. Isa 43:6—to Israel, God says, “let us come together in trial”; cf. 50:8—“Who will be my opponent at trial?”; 1Sam 12:7—“Let me go to trial with you before Yahweh”; Isa 20:22—the destruction is “a surge of justice.” Josephus, Ant. 11.268: God punishes Haman’s wickedness.

⁴⁴ Neh 9:8—“You have brought your words to pass, for you are just”; Isa 45:19—“I am Yahweh, who says what is just, who announces true things.”

⁴⁵ Ps 119:40—“In your justice give me life,” pardon for sins (Ps 51:16); “Justice and peace will kiss” (85:11-14; cf. 36:6ff.; 145:7); “I am Yahweh, who does mercy, right, and justice on the earth” (Jer 9:23; cf. 23:6; Job 36:2ff.; Zech 8:8); the “sacrifices of justice” (Deut 33:19) assure the success of an undertaking (cf. Ps 4:6; Mal 3:3). P. Benoit describes the δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ in the OT correctly as “compassionate justice” (Exégèse et théologie, vol. 2, p. 37 = ET, vol. 2, p. 137); confirmed by H. Cazelles, “A propos de quelques textes relatifs à la justice de Dieu dans l’Ancien Testament,” in RB, pp. 169–188.

⁴⁶ Isa 56:1; cf. 42:6, 21—“Yahweh wanted, for the sake of his justice, to make his law magnificent and glorious”; Ps 65:6—“You will answer us with wonders of justice, God of our salvation”; 71:15—“My mouth will tell of your justice and your salvation all the day.” For a Greek ear, in the first century, salvation is a benevolent manifestation of the deity whose providence preserves and guides the universe (cf. H. Haerens, “Σωτήρ et σωτηρία,” in Studia Hellenistica, vol. 5, Paris-Leiden, 1948, p. 68). It is always mentioned that the LXX often translates the Hebrew hesed, “benevolence, grace,” as dikaiosyne (Gen 19:19; 20:13; 21:23; 24:27; 32:11; Exod 15:13; 34:17; Ps 40:11-12; 88:12; cf. at Qumran the pairing hesed, seʔaqâh; 1QS 2.24; 5.4; 8.2; 10.28) and that seʔaqâh is translated ἔλεον (Isa 56:1; Ezek 18:19, 21), ε—λεημοσύνη (Deut 6:25; 24:13; Ps 24:5; 33:5; 35:24; 103:6; Sir 3:14; 40:17; Isa 1:27; 28:17; 59:16; Dan 9:6. Cf. Tob 9:6—the just person gives alms). W. Nagel, “Gerechtigkeit oder Almosen?” in VC, 1961, pp. 141–145; H. H. Schmid, “Gerechtigkeit und Barmherzigkeit im A. T.,” in Wort und Dienst, 1973, pp. 31–41; at Qumran, justice is in parallel with goodness (Hebrew tôb), 1QH 9.11–12; 11.14. In rabbinic Judaism, seʿaqâh means justice, then the leniency of the just, and finally alms; cf. J. Bonsirven, Judaïsme palestinien, vol. 1, pp. 198ff.

⁴⁷ Deut 6:25; 24:13; Prov 11:5ff.; 21:3; Tob 1:3; 14:7; Wis 14:7; Ps 119:21; Ezek 3:10; 18:5-21; 33:14-19; Zeph 2:3; cf. Josephus, Ant. 8.21, 120; 12.291.

⁴⁸ Sir 3:30; cf. Matt 25:46. Justice consists in giving each his due (Amos 5:7; Isa 5:7, 23; Jer 22:13); in the city, it is the special responsibility of the judges (Deut 1:16; 16:18-20; Lev 19:15; Ezek 45:9) and of the king (Prov 16:13; 25:5), who must judge disagreements (Deut 25:15); for each person has a “right” (Deut 25:1; Prov 17:15; Isa 5:7, 23).

⁴⁹ Prov 11:18; Hos 10:12. justice/righteousness delivers from death (Prov 11:4) and saves (11:6), gives joy (Tob 14:7), gives a claim on prosperity and honor (Prov 21:21; Ps 112:3, 9). It is in this sense of reward that Abraham, who was acceptable to God because of his complete abandon, was credited with justice/righteousness (Gen 15:6); in a way, Yahweh created it (Hebrew hashab) in the soul of the patriarch. As commentary, cf. at least Hermes Trismegistus 13.9: “This level, my child, is the seat of justice. See how, without a trial, it has removed injustice. We have been made just (ε—δικαιώθημεν), child, now that injustice is no longer there.”

⁵⁰ Cf. A. Descamps, “Le Christianisme comme justice dans le premier Evangile,” in ETL, 1946, pp. 5–33; idem, Les Justes et la justice dans les évangiles et le Christianisme primitif hormis la doctrine proprement paulinienne, Louvain-Gembloux, 1950 (gives the bibliography). F. F. Bruce, “Justification by Faith in the Non-Pauline Writings of the New Testament,” in EvQ, 1952, pp. 66–77. B. Przybylski, Righteousness in Matthew and his World of Thought, Cambridge-London, 1980.

⁵¹ God and Christ judge the world as sovereigns (cf. Heb 7:2—Melchizedek, king of justice/righteousness; 11:33—judges and prophets) who distribute their benefits (2Pet 1:1), punishment, and rewards (Acts 17:31; 2Tim 4:8; Heb 1:9; F. Pfister, “Der Wendung ἀπόκειται μοι ὁ τῆς δικαιοσύνης στέφανος,” in ZNW, 1914, pp. 94–96). It is difficult to specify the content of the λόγος δικαιοσύνης in Heb 5:13—“Whoever drinks milk has no experience of a doctrine of justice/righteousness, for he is a baby.” This logos is parallel to the “oracles of God” (verse 12); thus dikaio-syne would be synonymous with theos (cf. 1QM 3.5–6, transforming the enemies of God in Num 10:35 into adversaries of justice), but we could also understand this substantive as the equivalent of dikaio-s: “good, perfect, proper.” At Caesarea, Paul “discoursed on justice/righteousness” (Acts 24:25), the rules of natural law and moral prescriptions violated by his hearers (Festus and Agrippa); Noah, the “preacher of justice/righteousness” (2Pet 2:5), opposed to the godless, by building the ark proclaimed the immunity granted to virtue and could be compared to the Qumran Teacher of Righteousness (cf. G. Vermès, “La Communauté de la nouvelle Alliance,” in ETL, 1951, pp. 72ff.). On the notion of justice at Qumran, cf. Words of the Heavenly Lights 6.2–4 (RB, 1961, p. 211), 1QS 11.14–15; S. E. Johnson, “Paul and the Manual of Discipline,” in HTR, 1955, pp. 160ff.; W. Grundmann, “Der Lehrer der Gerechtigkeit von Qumrân und die Frage der Glaubensgerechtigkeit in der Theologie des Apostels Paulus,” in RevQ, vol. 6, 1960, pp. 237–259 (reprinted in J. Murphy-O’Connor, Paul and Qumran, London, 1968, pp. 85–114). S. Schulz, “Der Rechtfertigung aus Gnaden in Qumrân und bei Paulus,” in ZTK, 1959, pp. 155–185; O. Betz, “Rechtfertigung in Qumrân,” in J. Friedrich, W. Pöhlmann, Rechtfertigung (Festschrift E. Käsemann), Tübingen-Göttingen, 1976, pp. 17–36.

⁵² Matt 3:15 (cf. A. Fridrichsen, “Accomplir toute justice,” in RHPR, 1927, pp. 245–252). This refers not to a legal obligation, nor to “fulfilling the ancient legal justice,” observing it to perfect it (A. Descamps, in DBSup, vol. 4, col. 1464), nor to the Pauline nuance: founding Christian baptism “according to the Spirit” (John 1:33; cf. H. Ljungman, Das Gesetz erfüllen, Lund, 1954, p. 97). Still less does it mean “It is appropriate for us to conform to the custom” (R. de Langhe, “Judaïsme ou Hellénisme en rapport avec le N.T.,” in Recherches Bibliques: L’Attente du Messie, Bruges, 1954, pp. 173–174). justice/righteousness is doing what God wants.

⁵³ Matt 5:6. Cf. J. Dupont, Béatitudes, vol. 3, pp. 341ff. A. Descamps, Les Justes et la justice, pp. 164–179.

⁵⁴ Matt 5:20. Cf. A. Descamps, Les Justes et la justice, pp. 180–186; idem, “Le Christianisme comme justice,” pp. 15ff.; J. Seynave, “‘La Justice nouvelle,’ (Matthieu V, 17–20,” in Message et mission, Publications de l’Université Lovanium de Kinshasa 23, Louvain-Paris, 1968, pp. 53–75); Matt 6:1—“Take heed not to carry out your righteousness (τὴν δικαιοσύνην ὑμῶν—ν ποιει—ν) before people to be seen by them.” This righteousness, which includes all good works and religious obligations (prayer, alms-giving, fasting) is worthless unless it is done to please God and not to require a reputation for holiness; hence very pure intentions and internal rectitude are required: A. George, “La Justice à faire dans le secret (Mt. VI, 1–6 et 16–18),” in Bib, 1959, pp. 590–598; B. Gerhardsson, “Geistiger Opferdienst nach Matth. VI, 1–6; 16–21,” in Neues Testament und Geschichte (Festschrift O. Cullmann), Zurich-Tübingen, 1972, pp. 69–77. “The reign of God and his righteousness” (Matt 6:33) that are to be sought mean both submission to God's sovereignty and also the collection of virtues implied by that submission; so this could be called an "institutional righteousness/justice," since it is coextensive with the kingdom and specific to its members—F. Nötscher, "Das Reich (Gottes) und seine Gerechtigkeit," in Bib, 1950, pp. 237–241; reprinted in Vom Alten zum Neuen Testament, Bonn, 1962, pp. 226–230; J. M. Fiedler, Der Begriff der δικαιοσύνη im Evangelium des Matthäus, auf seine Grundlagen untersucht, Halle, 1957.

⁵⁵ —Εν ὁδῷ δικαιοσύνης (cf. 2Pet 2:21). In the OT, the "way of justice" (Job 24:13; Prov 8:20; 12:28; 16:31; 17:23; 21:16, 21; cf. Rev 15:3; 19:2) was the observance of the law or conduct fixed by God; here it is John's teaching that is willed and guaranteed by God. Thus it was necessary to believe in this prophet, who was preparing and heralding the perfect righteousness given by Christ (cf. G. Strecker, Die Weg der Gerechtigkeit, Göttingen, 1962, p. 157: true righteousness leads to receiving God's gift). — The Lucan writings retain the OT meaning even more strictly: the coming of the Messiah will make it possible to serve God "in holiness and righteousness in his presence" (Luke 1:75; cf. Wis 9:3; Eph 4:24), i.e., to fulfill moral and religious perfection. Elymas, the "enemy of all righteousness," was a godless man (Acts 13:10); the one who fears God and practices justice/righteousness (εργαζόμενος δικαιοσύνην), i.e., who is loyal and virtuous, is pleasing to God (Acts 10:35).

⁵⁶ Jas 2:23; cf. Ps 106:3—"This was counted to him as righteousness"; 1Macc 2:52; Philo, Heir 90, 94; Abraham 262.

⁵⁷ Heb 12:1—καρπός δικαιοσύνης, cf. Amos 6:12; Isa 32:17; Prov 11:30; Phil 1:11; Jas 3:18; Philo, Post. Cain 118. T. C. de Kruijf, "Justice and Peace in the New Testament," in Bijdragen, 1971, pp. 367–383; E. Grässer, "Rechtfertigung im Hebräerbrief," in J. Friedrich, W. Pöhlmann, Rechtfertigung (Festschrift E. Käsemann), pp. 79–93.

⁵⁸ John 16:8, 10. Cf. M. F. Berrouard, "Le Paraclet défenseur du Christ devant la conscience du croyant (Jo. XVI, 8–11)," in RSPT, 1949, pp. 361–389; B. Lindars, "Δικαιοσύνη in Jn. XVI, 8 and 10," in Mélanges Rigaux, pp. 275–285; W. Stenger, "Δικαιοσύνη in Jo. XVI, 8, 10," in NovT, 1979, pp. 2–12.

⁵⁹ M. J. Lagrange, "La Justification selon saint Paul," in RB, 1914, pp. 321–343; 481–503; idem, "Note sur la justice de Dieu et la justification," in Épître aux Romains, pp. 119–141. E. Tobac, Le Problème de la justification dans saint Paul, 2d ed., Gembloux, 1941; K. Kertelge, Rechtfertigung bei Paulus, Münster, 1967; idem, "Zur Deutung des Rechtfertigungsbegriffs im Galaterbrief,” in BZ, 1968, pp. 211–222; P. Stuhlmacher, Gerechtigkeit Gottes bei Paulus, Göttingen, 1965; E. Käsemann, “La Justice de Dieu chez Paul,” in Essais exégétiques, Neuchâtel, 1972, pp. 242–255; J. A. Ziesler, The Meaning of Righteousness in Paul: A Linguistic and Theological Enquiry, Cambridge, 1972 (with the critique by N. M. Watson, in NTS, vol. 20, 1974, pp. 217–228); L. de Lorenzi, Battesimo e giustizia in Rom. VI e VIII, Rome, 1974; A. Lamonnier, “Justification,” in DTC, vol. 8, 2, col. 2043–2077; A. Lemonnier, L. Cerfaux, Théologie du Nouveau Testament, Paris, 1963, pp. 95–108; R. Y. K. Fung, “Justification by Faith in I and II Corinthians,” in Pauline Studies: Essays Presented to F. F. Bruce, Exeter, 1980, pp. 246–261.

⁶⁰ Rom 9:31; 10:3—ἡ ἰ—δία δικαιοσύνη; 10:5; Gal 2:21—διὰ νόμου δικαιοσύνη; 3:11, 20–21; Phil 3:6—δικαιοσύνην τὴν ἐ—ν νόμῳ.

⁶¹ Phil 3:9—“to be found . . . not having my own righteousness, but the righteousness through faith in Christ, the righteousness that comes from God”; cf. Rom 3:21—χωρὶς νόμου.

⁶² The Scripture had pointed out a new righteousness in the case of Abraham (Gen 15:6, quoted at Rom 4:3; Gal 3:6—God reckoned Abraham’s faith as righteousness). The LXX translated this with an aorist passive, ἐ—λογίσθη. The verb λογίζομαι, “credit to someone’s account,” expresses a real equivalency (1Sam 1:13; Ps 106:31; Isa 29:17; 32:15; 40:17; Hos 8:12; Rom 2:26; 9:8; cf. Acts 19:17).

⁶³ Rom 1:17; θεοῦ could be a attributive genitive (righteousness as a divine attribute) or a genitive of author or source (the righteousness that comes from God, which God confers on humans). Better yet: God attributes righteousness to the believer because God himself is righteousness, cf. A. Lemonnier, in DTC, vol. 8, col. 2058ff. J. Drummond, “On the Meaning of ‘Righteousness of God’ in the Theology of St Paul,” in HibJ, 1902, pp. 83–95; 272–293; A. Richardson, “δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ,” in JBL, 1964, pp. 12–16; A. Oepke, “Δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ bei Paulus in neuer Beleuchtung,” in TLZ, 1953, pp. 257–264; P. Bonnard, Anamnèsis, Geneva-Lausanne-Neuchâtel, 1980., pp. 169–176; D. H. van Daalen, “The Revelation of God’s Righteousness in Romans 1:17,” in E. A. Livingstone, Studia Biblica 1978 (VI Intern. Congress on Biblical Studies, Oxford, 1978, Sheffield, 1980, pp. 383–389).

⁶⁴ It is revealed (ἀποκαλύπτεται, Rom 1:17), manifested (πεφανέρωται, Rom 3:21), demonstrated (ἔνδειξις, Rom 3:25ff.), confirmed (συνίστησις, Rom 3:5), always as agape (5:8). A. Feuillet comments: “In the Pauline perspective, human sin spotlights first of all not the exactitude, but the exactitude of a God of love in the fulfillment of his promises of salvation” (“Le Plan salvifique de Dieu d’après l’Épître aux Romains,” in RB, p. 349, n. 1).

⁶⁵ Rom 3:5; Acts 17:31. Cf. J. Piper, “The Righteousness of God in Romans III, 1–8,” in TZ, 1980, pp. 3–16; K. Romaniuk, “La Justice de Dieu dans l’Épître de saint Paul aux Romains,” in Collectanea Theologica, vol. 47, Warsaw, 1977, pp. 139–148.

⁶⁶ Rom 3:25; 5:9; cf. “reconciliation” (2Cor 5:18; Gal 3:13). S. Lyonnet (“De notione ‘Justitiae Dei’ apud Paulum,” in VD, 1964, pp. 121–152); the justice/righteousness of God is his salvific action (p. 139). Cf. E. Beaucamp, “Justice divine et pardon,” in A la rencontre de Dieu: Mémorial A. Gelin, Le Puy–Lyon–Paris, 1961, pp. 129–144; J. Cambier, “Justice de Dieu, salut de tous les hommes et foi,” in RB, 1964, pp. 537–583; H. Hübner, “Existenziale Interpretation der paulinischen ‘Gerechtigkeit Gottes,’” in NTS, vol. 21, 1975, pp. 462–488; G. Strecker, Eschaton und Historie, Göttingen, 1979, pp. 229–259.

⁶⁷ Rom 3:26—“in the present time”; 5:1, 9: “now that we have been justified”; 9:30; 1Cor 6:11. But this immanent righteousness is a grounds for hope in heavenly glory (Rom 8:30), hence Gal 5:5—“We await the hope of righteousness”; texts that make earth and heaven continuous: those who have been justified will be glorified. W. H. Cadman, “Δικαιοσύνη in Romans III, 21–26,” in F. L. Cross, SE, vol. 2, Berlin, 1964, pp. 532–534; W. Thüsing, “Rechtfertigungsgedanke und Christologie in den Korintherbriefen,” in J. Gnllka, Neues Testament und Kirche (Festschrift R. Schnackenburg), Freiburg-Basel, 1974, pp. 301–324.

⁶⁸ Rev 22:11. As the fruit of the light (Eph 5:9), righteousness encompasses all the Christian virtues (Phil 1:11). The pastors of the church are “ministers of righteousness” (2Cor 11:15) and use the inspired Scriptures “for training in righteousness” (2Tim 3:16). They are themselves models of righteousness and piety (1Tim 6:11) and “pursue” it tirelessly (2Tim 2:22).

⁶⁹ Cf. the places where δικαιοσύνη is made the equivalent of ἁγιασμός (Rom 6:19; 1Cor 1:30; 6:11), ὁσιότης (Eph 4:24), peace and joy in the Holy Spirit (Rom 14:17), salvation (Rom 1:16–17), eternal glory (3:23; 8:30).

⁷⁰ Herodotus 1.89: “I think it just”; Thucydides 2.71: “Pausanias thought it right to leave us to live autonomously”; 4.122.6; Josephus, Ant. 9.187; 12.124: “he did not think it right to deprive the Jews of the rights that they possessed”; Philo, Abraham 142: the man “did not think it right to go into

this place”; 171: Abraham “thought it good that the victim should be laden with objects intended for the sacrifice”; Moses 1.44: Moses killed the Egyptian and thought that this was a just action and a pious deed. — The nuance “decide” or “wish” is rather common (Herodotus 2.172; 3.118; Thucydides 5.103.1; Philo, Drunkennes 51; Unchang. God 9, 159); more common are the nuances “pronounce judgment” in a trial (Dio Cassius 52.24; P.Oxy. 653 end) and “condemn, punish,” because “to do justice” is to treat in conformity with justice; cf. Herodotus 1.100: “He inflicted on him a punishment proportional to the offense”; 5.92: “A rolling stone . . . will punish Corinth”; Thucydides 3.40.4; Josephus, Ant. 17.206; 18.178; Dio Cassius 37.41: “they were handed over for punishment”; 41.28: “punished on the spot”; 49.12: “treated severely”; 54.15.19; 38.11: “Caesar had many to punish”; Plutarch, Cat. Mai. 21.4. — This meaning, “to give someone his due” (Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 5.10.1136a18 and 22; Polybius 3.31.9), tends to take on a realistic sense when the subject of the verb is God or the law: “God expects to be called Lord and absolute master” (Philo, Change of Names 19); “by natural law it is right (τοῦ φύσει δικαιοῦντος) for each one to be master of his own place” (Josephus, Ant. 19.305). — Ἐδικαίωσεν ὁ νόμος (Philo, Spec. Laws 3.180; cf. 1.67, 109, 140; 2.72; 113; 3.172; Josephus, Ant. 4.278) can be translated “the law has judged to be good, has reckoned to be right” but means “the law has established the right, that which should be done.” — In the religious sense, Corp. Herm. 13.9: “We have been made just (ε—δικαιώθημεν; cf. Rom 3:21-24), child (the initiate), now that the injustice is no longer there” (following the French of A. J. Festugière); but this language about being rid of injustice (or unrighteousness) is probably polemic against Christian justification (cf. G. Schrenk, in TDNT, vol. 2, pp. 211–212).

⁷¹ P.Giss. 47, 16: “I do not think that it is good to acquire this belt” (second century AD); P.Ryl. 654, 8 (minutes of a trial): the masons think that it is always right to consider only their own interests, despite the urgency and magnitude of the needs (cf. the republication by H. C. Youtie, Scriptiunculae, vol. 1, pp. 397–401).

⁷² P.Ryl. 119, 14 (first century); PSI 768, 9 (the decision of the tribunal); SB 9861b9 (third century BC); 7033, 30; 10285, 5; P.Mich. XIII, 659, 98: it was decided by the public arbiter; BGU 1849, 23 (first century BC), a widow writes to the strategos to obtain τὸ δίκαιον for herself and her child: οἱ—ι—ερεῖ—ς καὶ —Απίων ὁ γυμνασιαρχέσας δεδικαίωκαν, ε—άν φαίνεται προνοῆσαι ἡμω—ν; P.Tebt. 444 (first century): “the sums agreed upon by contract” (δεδικαιωμένα, fixed, declared right); P.Oxy. 2265, 7, a prefect asks the strategos to come to the aid of the collector of the vicesima libertatis, ε—ν οἷς ε—άν δικαίωσετε.

73 Cf. the demonstration by M. J. Lagrange, “La Justification selon saint Paul,” pp. 123ff. and N. M. Watson, “Some Observations of the Use of δικαίω in the Septuagint,” in JBL, 1960, pp. 255–266. Ps 19:9—“the judgments of Yahweh are true, they are just”; 51:4 (quoted at Rom 3:4); 143:2—“not one living being is just in your presence”; cf. Isa 42:21; Sir 18:2—“the Lord alone proves to be just” (δικαιωθήσεται).

74 Deut 25:1 (hiphil of sadaq); 1Kgs 8:32; 2Chr 6:23; Ezek 16:51-52: “You have made your sisters appear just by all the abominations that you have committed. . . . They are more just than you.” Bad judges justify (acquit) the wicked for a bribe (Isa 5:23).

75 Δικαιοῦν = Hebrew zajâh; Mic 6:11—“Shall I declare innocent deceitful balances and the bag of false scales?”; Ps 73:13—“I have kept my heart pure” (M. J. Lagrange, p. 121, sees this as “the only incontestable OT example of the meaning ‘make pure’”). Cf. najâh, Sir 9:12—“the godless will not be justified”; T. Sim. 6.1—ὅπως δικαιωθῶ—ἀπὸ ἀμαρτίας.

76 Isa 45:26—“In Yahweh the whole race of Israel will obtain justice (ἀπὸ κυρίου δικαιωθήσονται) and be glorified”; 50:8—“The one who justifies me is near at hand.”

77 Gen 44:16—“How shall we speak to justify ourselves?” (hithpael of the Hebrew sadaq); Jer 3:11—“faithless Israel is justified” (in the piel; in the same stem in Job 33:32—“I want you to be justified”); Sir 1:21; 7:5, cf. Isa 1:17—“defend the widow” (δικαιώσατε χήραν, the niphal of rib).

78 Sir 10:29—“Who will justify the one who sins against his soul?”; 12:22; 23:11; 26:29; 31:5; 42:2—“Do not be ashamed (before the pagans) of the law of the Most High and his covenant, the decree that justifies the ungodly”; it would be possible to interpret δικαιο—σαι τὸν ἀσεβῆ as meaning “condemn the ungodly,” but this would be the only instance in the OT. The Hebrew text discovered at Masada has the hiphil of sadaq: “When justice (asks) to justify the wicked.” Whether the accused is a pagan or a corrupt person, he has the same right to be rendered justice as the unfortunate or the poor (Ps 82:3). This impartiality must not be a cause for embarrassment or scandal.

79 Exactly as agape —which is in the first place a horror of evil (Rom 12:9)—covers (effaces) a multitude of sins (1Pet 4:8; cf. Jas 5:20).

80 Matt 11:19; Luke 7:29, 35. Same meaning in Philo, Change of Names 136: “The disposition of the soul that acknowledges God . . . is justified for the reason that I have not given it to any mortal.” Cf. Pss. Sol. 2.16—“I acknowledge you to be just, O God, in the uprightness of my heart, because your justice shines forth from your judgments"; 3.5—"the just person has proclaimed the Lord just"; 4.9; 8.7, 23. H. Ljungman ("Un texte de Sifrè éclairant Mt. XI, 18 sv.," in SEÅ, vol. 22–23, 1958, pp. 33–35) cites Sipre Deut. on Deut 1:12, representing Moses as being exposed to contradictory criticisms. Cf. A. Feuillet, "Jésus et la Sagesse divine d'après les Evangiles synoptiques," in RB, 1955, pp. 164–168. — We might compare the hymn or liturgical confession of faith in the risen Christ in 1Tim 3:16—ε—δικαιώθη ε—ν πνεύνατι (G. Richter, "Ist ε—ν ein strukturbildendes Element im Logoshymnus Joh. I, 1ff.?" in Bib, 1970, p. 543, also compares Odes Sol. 19.10–11). The exaltation of Christ in glory manifests his divine nature or power (Rom 1:4; 8:11; Heb 9:14; 1Pet 3:18) and is also a proof of the justice of Jesus' cause: he is recognized and acclaimed as just. "The return to the Father is God's imprimatur on the justice/righteousness manifested in the life and death of his Son" (E. C. Hoskyns, quoted by R. E. Brown, John, vol. 2, p. 713). Cf. C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, vol. 1, pp. 468ff. M. J. Fiedler, "Δικαιοσύνη in der diaspora-jüdischen und intertestamentarischen Literatur," in JSJ, 1970, pp. 120–143; R. H. Gundry, "The Form, Meaning and Background of the Hymn Quoted in I Timothy III, 16," in W. W. Gasque, R. Martin, Apostolic History and the Gospel (presented to F. F. Bruce), Exeter, 1970, pp. 203–222; K. Berger, "Zum traditionsgeschichtlichen Hintergrund christologischer Hoheitstitel," in NTS, vol. 17, 1941, p. 405; J. T. Sanders, The New Testament Christological Hymns, Cambridge, 1971, pp. 15–94; R. G. Hamerton-Kelly, Pre-existent Wisdom and the Son of Man, Cambridge, 1973, pp. 187ff.

⁸¹ "It is from your words that you will be declared just (future passive δικαιωθήση) and from your words that you will be condemned (καταδικασθήση)"; God examines, evaluates, and reveals people's words (and deeds) at the last judgment.

⁸² The Sadducees were precisely the "party of justice" and the Pharisees "pretended to be just" (Luke 20:20). As for the teacher of the law, who asked a question any child in catechism class could answer and was upset at the answer, he wanted to defend himself, justify himself (δικαιω—σαι ε—αυτόν; Luke 10:29; cf. the hithpael of sadaq, Gen 44:16).

⁸³ Cf. Prot. Jas. 10.15—Joachim "went down from the temple of the Lord justified" (δεδικαιωμένος).

⁸⁴ Acts 13:38, 39 (cf. Rom 3:20; 10:4; Gal 3:11). The present indicative passive δικαιούται, as opposed to δικαιωθήναι, proves that this justice/righteousness is already acquired by the believer, who is in a new state; not only do believers have a peaceful and loving relationship with God, but their conduct produces new “works,” because doing follows being: “let the righteous continue doing right” (Rev 22:11), or we might say “to be sanctified.” From an entirely different point of view, Jas 2:21, 24, 25 writes that “man is justified (δικαιοῦται) by works and not by faith alone,” and gives Abraham and Rahab as examples. This no longer means the initial justification, but remaining in that original state of righteousness which not only excludes sin but requires practicing the virtues so as to remain just before God (cf. Rom 2:13).

⁸⁵ Rom 3:4 (Ps 51:6); 3:20 (Ps 143:2); 4:2 (Gen 15:6). Cf. 1Cor 4:4—“I am aware of nothing against myself, but that does not mean that I am justified” (δεδικαίωμαι, acquitted, as by a legal verdict; or better, exonerated of any fault in my ministry). — There have been quite a few differing interpretations of Rom 6:7—ὁ γὰρ ἀπαθανὼν δεδικαίωται ἀπὸ τῆς ἁμαρτίας, “the one who has died is free (?) from sin.” What death does this mean? Can δικαίω be translated “liberate”? These comments have been offered: (1) The one who is dead (to sin) through baptism is justified, since his sins have been forgiven; (2) A sacrificial death (of a martyr) expiates offenses (K. G. Kuhn, “Röm. VI, 7,” in ZNW, 1931, pp. 305–310). (3) A general axiom: “Whoever is dead (meaning by natural death) is declared absolved from sin,” in the sense that sin can no longer get at him and claim him as its slave (J. Huby, S. Lyonnet, Saint Paul: L’Épître aux Romains, 2d ed., Paris, 1957, pp. 211–591, who cite analogous rabbinic pronouncements: “When a man is dead, he is free of the law and its commandments,” b. Nid. 61b ; b. shabb. 30a ; Str-B, vol. 3, p. 232). (4) The one who has died is first of all Christ (ὁ ἀπαθανὼν; C. Kearns, “The Interpretation of Romans VI, 7,” in AnBib 17, Rome, 1968, vol. 1, pp. 301–307; R. Scroggs, “Romans VI, 7,” in NTS, vol. 10, 1963, pp. 104–108). (5) It follows that the Christian, united to Christ in baptism, has stripped off his “body of death” (7:24), the body of sin (6:5), and must sin no more (verse 1); cf. 1Pet 4:1—“The one who has suffered in the flesh has ceased sinning”; 1John 5:18. M. J. Lagrange understands the perfect passive δεδικαίωται in the sense of “exonerated,” as at T. Sim. 6.1—ὅπως δικαιοθῶ—ἀπὸ τῆς ἁμαρτίας ὑμῶ—v. A. B. du Toit, “Dikaiosynè in Röm. 6,” in ZTK, 1979, pp. 261–291.

⁸⁶ M. J. Lagrange, “La Justification selon saint Paul,” p. 123; cf. A. Lemonnyer, “Justification,” in DTC, vol. 8, col. 2067ff. We might add that verbs in -όω denote abundance and plenty.

⁸⁷ “The sacrifice of Christ has satisfied once and for all the demands for outward justice which God had deposited in the Law, and at the same time it has brought the positive gift of life and inward justice which the latter was unable to give” (P. Benoit, Exégèse et théologie, vol. 2, p. 39, n. 2 = ET, vol. 2, p. 39, n. 1); cf. Rom 5:18—“justification gives life.” The best commentary is the Trinitarian baptismal text on the “bath of regeneration and renewal” (Titus 3:7), “so that having been justified by the grace of this (Jesus Christ) our Savior (ἵνα δικαιώεντες τῇ ε—κείνου χάριτι), we might become . . . heirs . . . of eternal life”; the aorist passive participle denotes the present state of this new and internal righteousness that permits entry into heaven, where nothing impure may go in. Cf. H. Rosman, “Iustificare (δικαιοῦν) est verbum causalitatis,” in VD, 1941, pp. 144–147.

⁸⁸ Cf. Rom 4:5—“The one who has no works, but who believes in the One who justifies (δικαιοῦντα) the ungodly, will have his faith counted as righteousness.” M.J. Lagrange (on this verse) comments: “δικαιόω in the active cannot mean ‘forgive’: it has to be ‘declare just’ or ‘make just.’ That God should declare the ungodly righteous is a blasphemous proposition. But in addition, when would this declaration be made?” H. W. Heidland (TDNT, vol. 4, pp. 288–292) explains λογίζεσθαι: “Justification is not a fiction alongside the reality. If God counts faith as righteousness, man is wholly righteous in God’s eyes. . . . He becomes a new creature through God’s λογίζεσθαι.”

⁸⁹ Rom 3:28; cf. Gal 2:16-17; 3:8, 11, 24; 5:4. W. G. Kümmel, “‘Individualgeschichte’ und ‘Weltgeschichte’ in Gal. 2:15-21,” in B. Lindars, S. S. Smalley, Christ and Spirit in the New Testament (in honor of C. F. D. Moule), Cambridge, 1973, pp. 157–173.

⁹⁰ Cf. Rom 5:9—“How much more, then, having been justified (δικαιωθέντες νῦν) in his blood, shall we be saved by him from wrath.” Through the efficacy of the Redeemer’s blood, the Christian possesses here and now a real righteousness that assures him of definitive salvation at the Last Judgment. M. Wolter, Rechtfertigung und zukünftiges Heil: Untersuchungen zu Römer V, 1–11, Berlin, 1978.

⁹¹ Cf. Rom 8:33—“Who will stand to accuse God’s elect? It is God who justifies them” (present active participle, dikaion). M. J. Lagrange quotes Isa 50:7-8 and interprets thus: “God presents himself as the defender, as the one who comes to make the righteousness of the accused shine out. . . . God takes up the cause” of the elect person, who is truly just. He can do so because he is the one who made him just.

⁹² On the death-life antithesis, solidarity with Adam and with Christ, the latter being the source of life, cf. A. Feuillet, “Le Règne de la mort et le règne de la vie (Rom V, 12–21),” in RB, 1970, pp. 481–521; a causality of grace (J. de Fraine, Adam et son lignage, Bruges, 1959, pp. 222ff.).

⁹³ This is the meaning of dikaioma in Exod 21:9—“the status of the daughters”; 1Sam 2:13—“the status of the priest”; 8:9—“of the king.” Cf. Josephus, Ant. 17.108: τὰ τῆς φύσεως δικαιώματα (J. Modrzejewski, “La Règle de droit dans l’Égypte ptolémaïque,” in Essays in Honor of C. B. Welles, American Studies in Papyrology, vol. 1, New Haven, 1966, p. 142). — In the secular literature and the papyri, δικαίωμα usually means a “right” to something; Josephus, War 7.110: the Antiochenes ask Titus to “destroy the bronze tablets on which the rights of the Jews were written”; Ant. 19.285: the edict of Claudius confirms the ancient rights of the Alexandrian Jews; Ag. Apion 2.37: “the stele that was erected at Alexandria contains the rights granted to the Jews by Caesar the Great” (actually by Augustus); Thucydides 1.41.1: “Such are our dikaionata, and according to the Greek rule, they are decisive”; Dio Cassius 37.51—“Clodius renounced his patrician title and entered the class of plebeians in order to share in their rights (or statutes),” (πρὸς τὰ τοῦ πλήθους δικαιώματα); 55.2.6—when a man or a woman has not had three children, a law—formerly by the senate, now by the emperor—sometimes grants them the rights of those who have had three children (τὰ τω—ν τρις γεγεννηκότων δικαιώματα). Cf. 2Sam 19:29—“What right would I still have to make claims with the king?”; Jer 11:20; P.Oxy. 1119, 15: “the exceptional rights (the status) claimed by our native city” (τω—ν ε—ξαιρέτων τῆς ἡμετέρας πατρίδος δικαιομάτων); 1890, 9; P.Grenf. 60, 23; Pap.Lugd.Bat. II, 1, 5 (first century AD), περὶ τούτων δικαιώματι; CPR I, 20, 20 (republished as Stud.Pal. XX, 54); P.Mich. XIII, 659, 49; SB 9154, 13; 9228, 11; 9462, 16.

⁹⁴ Rev 19:8—“Fine linen is the righteous acts of the saints” (τὰ δικαιώματα τω—ν ἁγίων ε—στίν); we are to understand that this garment of innocence is proof of the virtue of the faithful. Quite often δικαίωμα means “supporting document” (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1959, p. 226, n. 323). Litigants have to appear before the court armed with documents that support their claims (P.Enteux. Appendix D 5, p. 248). Archelaus sends Augustus τὰ δικαιώματα, the papers legitimating his royalty, including his father’s will (Josephus, Ant. 17.228; cf. 17.130: “without other means of justification”). The inhabitants of Priene prove their possession from time immemorial of a certain territory ε—κ τω—ν ἄλλων μαρτυριω—ν καὶ δικαιομάτων (Dittenberger, Or. XIII, 14; third century BC); SEG XVII, 415, 4. A code from the third century AD prescribes that judges should use torture on slaves if the trial documents (δικαιώματα) do not allow them to judge (P.Lille 29, 25). Stotoëtis has no property title on a slave who belongs to his mother (P.Lond. 360, 8; vol. 2, p. 216); Stud.Pal. XXII, 43, 32; BGU 113, 265, 847 (= Chrest.Wilck., n. 458–460); 1654, 1: notarized copy of a document: ε—κ κλημφθείσης ε—κ δικαιομάτων παρατεθέντων; P.Cair.Zen. 59368, 6; P.Oxy. 3023, col. II, 10; UPZ 162,

col. III, 21 and 23; col. V, 25; SB 3925, 5; 7696, 57: δικαίωμα ἔχουσιν οἱ—τρι—ς; 9339, 26; 10254, 14; 10288, 1 a 12; b 17.

⁹⁵ Gen 26:5—Abraham “observed by regulation, my orders, my precepts, and my laws”; Deut 4:1, 5, 8; 6:1; 7:11; 30:16; 1Kgs 2:3; Ps 119:8; Philo, Worse Attacks Better 67–68 (quotes Deut 33:10); Heir 8 (quotes Gen 26:3–5); Prelim. Stud. 163 (quotes Exod 15:23–25). The collection of laws and ordinances of P.Hal. 1 was published with the title P.Hal. (Berlin, 1913; cf. pp. 25ff.).

⁹⁶ Δικαίωμα in the sense of a just decree of condemnation; 1Kgs 3:28—All the Israelites saw in Solomon “a divine wisdom to pass judgment” (ποιει—ν δικαίωμα); 2Chr 6:35; Plato, Leg. 9.864 e: “he will be exempt from all other punishments.” A Jewish epitaph at Rome: “Lord, (grant that) according to your just judgment (ε—ν δικαίωματί σου) the repose of Justus, an innocent child, may be peaceful” (CII 361). A δικαίωμα is reparation for an unjust act and is the opposite of an ἀδίκημα (Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 5.10.1135a9–14; Rh. 1.3.1359a24ff. Cf. Cael. 1.10.279b9).

⁹⁷ This legal meaning is that of the OT hapax at Lev 24:22 (Hebrew mishpat): the same legal statute (literaly, sentence) for the guest as for the native (the lex talionis). Cf. Lysias 9.8: “I want to submit legal texts and grounds for rights to you” (νόμους καὶ ἄλλας δικαίωσεις παρασχέσομαι); Thucydides 1.141.1: “every act of claiming a right”; Plutarch, Demetr. 18.6. — More common is the meaning “condemnation, punishment”; Josephus, Ant. 18.14: the Pharisees believe that there are punishments for vices and rewards for virtue; 18.315; Plutarch, Art. 14.3: “He took care to punish those who were at fault”; De sera 22; Dio Cassius 40.43: Caesar inflicted punishments. Finally, there is “justification” in our sense of the word: “that which serves to justify, to present as just”; cf. Thucydides 3.82.4: “They changed the ordinary relationship of words to acts in the justifications that they gave”; Plutarch, De virt. mor. 9: “In their wording they seem to fabricate justifications and evasions”; Dio Cassius 41.54.3: “wrapping themselves in numerous pretexts.”

⁹⁸ Cf. F. X. Durrwell, La Résurrection de Jésus mystère de salut, 2d ed., Le Puy–Paris, 1954; D. M. Stanley, “Ad historiam exegeseos Rom. IV, 25,” in VD, 1951, pp. 257–274; S. Lyonnet, “La Valeur sotériologique de la Résurrection du Christ selon saint Paul,” in Gregorianum, 1958, pp. 294–318; J. M. González Ruiz, “Muerto por nuestros pecados y resucitado por nuestra justificación” (Rom 4:25), in Bib, 1959, pp. 837–858; A. Scrima, “La Résurrection comme centre de l’économie du salut,” in E. Dhanis, Resurrexit, Vatican City, 1974, pp. 546–553.

⁹⁹ 1Cor 15:45; “He justifies by sending us his Spirit and himself working within us as a spirit” (J. Huby, S. Lyonnet, Saint Paul: L’Épître aux Romains, p. 179); “this passage proves that in justification there is an internal element consisting of a life of which the resurrection is the cause” (M. J. Lagrange, on this verse, citing St. Thomas: “dicit esse causam justificationis nostrae, per quam redimus ad novitatem justitiae”).

¹⁰⁰ Cf. Rom 6:11, 13, 16, 18, 19, 22, 23; F. J. Leenhardt, Romans, pp. 147–148; cf. D. G. Lafont, “Sur l’interprétations de Romains, VI, 15–21,” in RSR, 1957, pp. 481–513.

¹⁰¹ Sir 38:33; Philo, Cherub. 11: the accused faces the judge; Alleg. Interp. 1.87; Decalogue 140; Spec. Laws 1.121, 277; 3.53, 69; Josephus, War 1.452, 618, 622; 2.571; Ant. 4.216; 9.3; Life 258, P.Oxy. 67, 17; 653; 3285, 5, 20, 35; P.Stras. 370, 3; P.Lond. 971, 19 (vol. 3, p. 129); P.Hamb. 168 a 13; b 2; C.P.Herm. 10, 14; P.Princ. 118, 8; PSI 1310, 15; SB 7033, 19; 9225, 3; 10494, 10; Dittenberger, Or. 499, 3; 528, 7. In the Ephesian law from 297 BC, the activities of judges are summed up: they go to the site, rectify distributions of property, evaluate, decide in the company of experts, commit their judgment to writing, etc.; cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 364; H. Wankel, I.Ephes., Bonn, 1979, n. IV.

¹⁰² Apokrimata 51: the praetorian prefect will be delegated as judge; 60; SB 7338, 8; 7264, 4: ἔδωκε Ἡρώνα δικαστὴν καὶ μεσεῖτην τοῦ πράγματος (a private letter from the second century AD).

¹⁰³ Philo, Abraham 168; Flacc. 106; Josephus, War 1.458: arbiter of my succession; 2.26; 4.265, 274; Diodorus Siculus 4.33.4: “a dispute in which Phylaeus was named judge.”

¹⁰⁴ Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.187 (citing Deut 17:8); cf. the parents, who have the authority to judge their son (Ant. 4.260; 6.318).

¹⁰⁵ “The conscience is established in the soul as a judge” (Philo, Creation 128), “sometimes chief and king, sometimes judge and arbiter in the conflicts of life” (Worse Attacks Better 23; Unchang. God 50, 128, 183; Flight 118; Decalogue 87). — God, the supreme judge, cf. 1Sam 24:16; Philo, Spec. Laws 3.205; Cherub. 72; Conf. Tongues 25; Heir 271; Abraham 133; Moses 2.217, 228; Josephus, War 1.630; 5.400; Ant. 4.46; 9.169; 18.268; Acts of Diogenes 21 (P.Oxy. 2664; republished by H. A. Musurillo, Pagan Martyrs, p. 27).

¹⁰⁶ C.P.Herm. 19, 13: ε—πὶ τὴν σὴν λαμπρότητα, φιλάνθρωπε τω—ν δικαστω—ν.

¹⁰⁷ Philo, Creation 11: “A city without ephors, or arbiters, or judges, upon whom the whole burden of administering and governing rests”; Joseph 63: “the magistrates, councillors, or judges who seek to safeguard the common good and security”; Spec. Laws 1.55: “councillors, judges, magistrates, members of the assembly.” At Sidon, an epigram for a winner in the Nemean games (200 BC): “Diotimius, judge, winner in the chariot race” is the city’s first magistrate (NCIG, n. XXXV, A 1).

¹⁰⁸ At Athens in the fifth century BC, a regulation concerning the Hephaistia (LSCG, n. XIII, 20); at Andonia (92 BC), the judges are part of a commission that manages the revenues of the mysteries (ibid. LXV, 52 and 62 = Dittenberger, Syl. 736); SEG II, 710, 4. L. Robert (Documents, pp. 53–57) studies the δικασταί and the κριταί in decrees from the Hellenistic period in Caria, at Thessalonica, at Temessos, etc.

¹⁰⁹ At Samos, a decree for judges from Myndos, in the third century BC (J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. XXI, 3).

¹¹⁰ A decree of Phalanna for judges from Metropolis (NCIG, n. XII, 12 and 25); J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1969, p. 463, n. 266; 1971, p. 477, n. 497. The physician Diodorus “spared himself no trouble to care for” the judges invited to Samos who fell ill (J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. XIV, 24).

¹¹¹ Josh 8:33—“All Israel, with its elders, scribes, and judges, were standing on both sides of the ark, facing the priests and Levites”; 23:2; 24:1; Isa 3:2—the Lord deprives Jerusalem and Judah of “hero and man of war, judge and prophet, diviner and elder”; Bar 2:1—the word of the Lord “against our judges . . . against our kings, against our princes”; Wis 6:1—“Hear, O kings . . . learn, O judges of the ends of the earth”; 9:7. On the judges raised up by God to deliver Israel, cf. R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel, vol. 1, pp. 93, 111, 215; vol. 2, pp. 277, 467. The δικασταί instituted at Tyre after the conquest of Nebuchadnezzar are not judges but governors (Menander of Ephesus, in Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.156–157), cf. J. Teixidor, “Les Fonctions de rab et de suffète en Phénicie,” in Sem 1979, pp. 12ff.

δίστομος

distomos, having two mouths or two edges

distomos, S 1366; EDNT 1.337; MM 165; L&N 79.94; BAGD 200

This adjective, which literally means “with two mouths” or “with two openings,” is applied to a cave with two entries (distomos petra, a rock pierced right through, Sophocles, Phil. 16), a road that splits (distoi hodoi, the point where two travelers’ routes meet, Sophocles, OC 900), the post of a door with two entries,¹ a river or canal with a “double mouth” (Polybius 34.10.5); “so that the canal also has two mouths” (hoste kai distomon einai ten dioryga, Strabo 17.4.35). In a letter of September 19, 251, the dioiketes Apollonius asks his steward Zeno to have four hundred birds sent to him to fatten, and one hundred chickens to Ptolemais, “which is on the double mouth.”²

Euripides speaks of thrusting in a “two-edged sword.”³ The OT uses distomos with either the machaira or the *rhomphaia*⁴ as a way of emphasizing its penetrating force.⁵ The NT uses the term only metaphorically: the word of God is “sharper than any two-edged sword” (tomoteris hyper pasan machairan distomon, Heb 4:12). The comparison is self-evident in Hebrew, first of all because a “word” is “what comes out of the mouth”;⁶ and secondly because the word is an offensive weapon,⁷ and God’s is irresistible.⁸ The qualification “two-edged,” meaning “sharpened on both sides,” emphasizes its piercing quality.

Rev 1:16; 2:12; 19:15, in order to symbolize the power of the divine word, have a sword coming out of Christ’s mouth and add that this rhomphaia is oxeia, that is, “sharp, penetrating.”⁹ No clearer expression for its force could be devised.

¹ P.IFAO II, n. 31, 8.

² Εις Πτολεμαίδα τὴν ἐπὶ τοῦ διστόμου, P.Mich.Zen. 48, 4; cf. D. Bonneau, “La Terre ‘arrosée par le Nil’: Neilobrochos,” in BASP, vol. 16, 1–2; 1979, p. 20. Cf. the double port: δίστομος οὕτως ἢ —Επίδαυρος ἐ—καλει—το, ἐ—πεὶ ἀμφιστόμῳ λιμένι ἐ—κέχρητο . . . συγγραφή (Hesychius). There is also τρίστομον (P.Tebt. 112, 3; 121 = p. 502; 208; cf. BGU 802, col. II, 8). The Nile delta is called “the mouth of the Nile” in Hebrew (Isa 19:7); today we refer to the “mouths of the Rhone.”

³ Euripides, Hel. 983: δίστομον ξίφος; Plutarch, Cleom. 26.1: “striking with large staffs in the shape of two-edged swords”; Pap.Graec.Mag. 13, 92 (vol. 2, p. 91): ἔχε ... μαχαί—ριν ὀλοσίδηρον δίστομον; in the sixth century, Nonnus of Panopolis applies the same term to an ax (30.141).

⁴ There is not too precise a distinction between these two slightly turned back swords or sabers (as opposed to the straight sword, the ξίφος), which were often confused by scribes (cf. the manuscript variants on Luke 21:24). The machaira is a soldier’s weapon (Polybius 3.114.2–3) but also a sacrificial knife (Gen 22:6, 10; Plutarch, De def. or. 41). Cf. the sharp sword of the cherubim (Philo, Cherub. 31) or the “sword of fire” (ibid. 20, 21, 25), a shortening of Gen 3:24—“the turning flame of the sword,” i.e., double-branched lightning.

⁵ Judg 3:16—“Ehud had a two-edged sword made for himself” (μάχαιραν δίστομον); Ps 149:6—“a two-edged sword in their hands” (ρόμφαι—αι δίστομοι); Prov 5:4—“sharper than a two-edged sword”; Sir 21:3—“iniquity is like ‘a two-edged sword (ὡς ρομφαία δίστομος); for its wound there is no remedy.’”

⁶ Deut 8:3; Matt 4:4. “Mouth” in Hebrew is peh; “word” or “utterance” is “opening of the mouth” (pit pi). “It is because the sword devours the flesh of the enemies (Deut 32:42; cf. 2Sam 2:26) that it is called a mouth and that a blow is struck ‘with the mouth of the sword.’ To represent the two edges, the plural piôt was used. The vocalization of this form varies in Judg 3:16 and Prov 5:4. Again, the word pi is doubled to produce pîphiyôth, ‘two-mouthed, two-edged’ (Ps 149:6)” (P. Dhorme, Emploi métaphorique, pp. 83–89).

⁷ Isa 49:2—“He made my mouth like a sharp sword”; Hos 6:5; Wis 18:5; Philo, Cherub. 28; Wisdom of Ahikar 7.100. Cf. Sophocles, Aj. 584: “words so cutting do not please me”; Plutarch, Lyc. 19.1–15.

⁸ Deut 33:29 compares Yahweh’s intervention to a sword that gives the victory to his people; Eph 6:17—“the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God” (cf. M. Barth, Ephesians, pp. 799–800). It is through this weapon that Peter’s hearers at Pentecost were “smitten to the heart” and persuaded to be converted (Acts 2:37). Cf. P. Benoit, “‘Et toi-même, un glaive te transpercera l’âme’ (Lc. II, 35),” in CBQ, 1963, pp. 251–261, reprinted in Exégèse et théologie, vol. 3, pp. 216–227.

⁹ —Οξύς, Isa 49:2; Ezek 5:1; Ps 58:5; cf. Wis 5:20; 18:15.

διχοτομέω

dichotomeo, to cut in two

dichotomeo, S 1371; TDNT 2.225–226; EDNT 1.337; MM 165; L&N 19.19, 37.12; BAGD 200

In a collection of “parables of the Parousia,” the responsible parties—who have the keys to the kingdom of heaven—are warned that they will be judged with particular rigor. Actually, the steward or servant who mistreats the household staff and carouses with his master's property will be severely punished by the master when he returns: dichotomesei auton.¹ Must we translate literally ("He will cut him in two") or figuratively ("He will remove him" from his service, will show him the door)?

Derived from temno, "to cut, cleave, slice," and hence "smite," the compound dichotomeo (unknown in the papyri and in Philo) literally means "cut or divide in two."² It is used for the moon (he selene dichotomousa), which divides the months into two equal parts.³ In geometry, it means "to bisect a figure into equal parts by bisecting lines, medians."⁴ But the meaning "to separate, to remove from a group or a person" is attested in the fourth century AD in a tomb inscription, probably Christian, at Lycaonia, in which Gordian is separated from his eldest son, Ambrose: "to my firstborn son Ambrose, who has cut me off from long life" (to hueio mou to prototoko Ambrosio to dichotomesanti me tou poloetion zen, MAMA VIII, 252).

These usages hardly correspond to the usage in the two Synoptics. On the other hand, Josephus, commenting on the judgment of Solomon (1Kgs 3:25), has the king say amphotera dichotomesai ta paidia ("cut both children in two," Ant. 8.31). The only occurrence of the verb in the OT has to do with sacrificial victims: "You shall cut the ram in pieces";⁵ and in 3Apoc. Bar. 16.3, the Lord commands, "and you shall cut them off with the sword and with death, and their children with demons" (kai dichotomesate autous en machaira kai en thanato, kai ta tekna auton en daimoniois). This is the best parallel to the NT texts.

This form of torture is already mentioned by Odysseus to Melantho: "I will tell Telemachus, so that he will carve you (tamesin) limb from limb" (Homer, Od. 18.339). According to Herodotus 2.139.2, an Ethiopian received in a vision the advice that he should "cut in two (diatamein) across the middle of the body all the priests of Egypt." The prophet Daniel threatens, "The angel of God will cleave you down the middle" (Sus 55, schisei sou, LXX). "When the master of the house comes and sees the steward insolently handing out orders, he drags him outside and cuts him" (helkysas etemen, Epictetus 3.22.3); Pyrrhus, with his sword, "cleaved the body of the barbarian in two parts that fell simultaneously on each side."⁶

Such a punishment for the servant in the Gospels is extremely severe, and already St. Jerome explained, "This does not mean that he will cut him in two with the sword, but only that he will cut him off from the society of the saints and will consign him with the hypocrites."⁷ So it is possible to treat the text in a more or less softened manner, theologically and morally speaking. But this is not a place for sensitivity. Cut off from the household of God, the unworthy one can only be in Gehenna, as Matt 24:51 notes: "where there is wailing and grinding of teeth" (cf. 8:12; 13:42, 50; 22:13; 25:30). This is the punishment reserved for the "worthless servant” in the parable of the Talents (Matt 25:30; cf. the parable of the Minas: “As for my enemies . . . slaughter them before me,” Luke 19:27) and is analogous to the fate of the sterile fig tree (Luke 13:9, ekkopseis auten). The verb dichotomeo seems to suggest God’s absolute rights and the requirements attached to his gifts.

O. Betz has shown a correspondence to the disciplinary formulations at Qumran,⁸ especially 1QS 2.16–17, which formulates a twofold curse: “God will separate him for evil and he will be cut off from the midst of all the sons of light . . . the error that led him astray will win him a place in the midst of those eternally accursed.”⁹ The dramatic death of Judas (“his body burst open,” elakesen mesos, Acts 1:18) could well be a reference to the punishment in Matt 24:51. Finally, the deaths of Ananias and Sapphira, hypocrites who lied to the Holy Spirit (Acts 5:1-11), show that the punishments of unworthy believers are not purely metaphorical.

¹ Matt 24:51; Luke 12:46. Cf. D. Buzy, “Y a-t-il fusion des paraboles évangéliques?” in RB, 1932, pp. 32–35; A. Feuillet, “La Synthèse eschatologique de saint Matthieu (XXIV–XXV),” RB, 1950, pp. 78–91.

² Plato, Plt. 302 e: “Legality and illegality are a principle of dichotomy”; Aristotle, Part. An. 1.3.1: “this is how those who practice dichotomy divide” (οι— διχοτομοῦντες); 1.4.9: “Dichotomy is sometimes impossible, sometimes not useful”; Polybius 6.28.2: “cut a line.”

³ Plutarch, De fac. 17.929 f; Dio 23.3; cf. Sir 39:12; διχότομος, the first and last quarter of the moon (Philo, Creation 101; Spec. Laws 1.178); διχότης, the half-moon (P. Mich. 149, col. XI, 34–35; second century AD).

⁴ C. Mugler, Terminologie géométrique, p. 147, cites the paradox of Achilles and the tortoise (the faster runner cannot catch the slower), which Aristotle (Ph. 6.9.239b18) compares to dichotomous reasoning.

⁵ Exod 29:17—cf. διχοτόμημα, parts of animals cut in two (Gen 15:11; Philo, Heir 215, 311); Herodotus 2.39.5: the Egyptians slit the throat and cut off the head (ἀποτάμνουσι) of animals that they sacrifice.

⁶ Διχοτομηθέντος, Plutarch, Pyrrh. 24.5. We might mention the “torture with saws” applied by David to the vanquished, according to the LXX (2Sam 12:31; 1Chr 20:3). At the time of the uprising of 115, the Jews of Cyrene “sawed [Romans and Greeks] from top to bottom down the middle of the body” (Dio Cassius 58.32). At the time of the Jewish War, a certain Jose Meshita was sawed by the Romans on a sawhorse (Gen. Rab. 65.22). Among other torments, the heroes of the faith “were sawn asunder”

(ε—πρίσθησαν, Heb 11:37), as Isaiah was by King Manasseh, according to Mart Isa 5:1, 11; Apoc. Paul 49 (cf. A. Caquot, “Bref commentaire du ‘Martyre d’Isaïe,’” in Sem, vol. 23, 1973, pp. 85ff.). The story of the martyrdom of St. Apa Sarapamon specifies that it was “with a saw of olive wood” (H. Hyvernat, Les Actes des martyrs d’Egypte, 2d ed., Hildesheim, New York, 1977, p. 309; fol. 175). This belief (cf. St. Justin, Dial. 120.5; Origen, Is. 1.5) figures in a marginal gloss on Codex Reuchlin on Isa 66:1 (cf. A. Sperber, The Bible in Aramaic, Leiden, 1962, vol. 3, pp. 129ff.) and probably originates with the Iranian tradition of the prophet sawn in two (G. Widengren, “Juifs et Iraniens à l’époque des Parthes,” in VTSup, vol. 4, 1957, p. 224; A. M. Denis, Introduction aux Pseudépigraphes grecs de l’Ancien Testament, Leiden, 1970, p. 171). P. Grelot (“Deux Tosephtas targoumiques inédits sur Isaïe LXVI,” in RB, 1972, pp. 510ff., 526, 534) found this legend attested in Codex Vatican. Ebr. Urbin. 1, which contains a targum on Chronicles (cf. R. Le Déaut, J. Robert, Targum des Chroniques, Rome, 1971), including a midrash on the martyrdom of Isaiah: the prophet took refuge in a carob tree, but “with iron saws the servants of Manasseh cut down the tree, so that Isaiah’s blood flowed like water.”

⁷ PL, vol. 26, p. 183. J. Jeremias (Parables, p. 57, n. 31) thinks that the Aramaic meaning underlying διχοτομήσει was “he will give him blows and treat him as a profligate.” E. Delebecque (Évangile de Luc) translates: “Il le réduira de moitié” and takes this to mean that the servant’s “ration” will be reduced by half, “cut in two.”

⁸ O. Betz, “The Dichotomized Servant and the End of Judas Iscariot (Light on the Dark Passages: Matthew 24, 51 and parallel; Acts 1, 18)” in RevQ, vol. 17, 1964, pp. 43–58.

⁹ Being cut off, separated, is mentioned constantly: “They must separate from all those who are not included in his covenant. . . . He will blot them out of the world; all their works are only defilement before him” (1QS 5.18); 6.24 excludes for one year from the purification of the “congregation” those who lie concerning their property; 7.1, 16 one who has slandered his neighbor; 8.13, 22: “Whoever transgresses one word of the law of Moses deliberately or through negligence shall be excluded from the deliberations of the community”; CD 8.8; 4QpPs 37, col. II, 12; col. III, 11 and 18.

δοκιμάζω, δοκιμασία, δοκιμή, δοκίμιον, δόκιμος, ἀδόκιμος dokimazo, to prove, test, verify, examine prior to approval, judge, evaluate, discern; dokimasia, verification, testing, authenticity; dokime, proof, trial;

dokimion, testing, proven worth; dokimos, proved, acceptable; adokimos, worthless

dokimazo, S 1381; TDNT 2.255–260; EDNT 1.341–343; NIDNTT 3.808–810; MM 167; L&N 27.45, 30.98, 30.114; BDF §§392(3), 405(2), 416(2); BAGD 202 | dokimasia, TDNT 2.255–260; EDNT 1.343; NIDNTT 3.808; MM 167; L&N 27.45; BAGD 202 | dokime, S 1382; TDNT 2.255–260; EDNT 1.341–343; NIDNTT 3.808–809; MM 167; L&N 27.45, 65.12, 72.7; BDF §110(2); BAGD 202 | dokimion, S 1383; TDNT 2.255–260; EDNT 1.343; NIDNTT 3.808–809; MM 167–168; L&N 27.45, 73.3; BDF §§23, 263(2); BAGD 203 | dokimos, S 1384; TDNT 2.255–260; EDNT 1.341–343; NIDNTT 3.808; MM 168; L&N 30.115, 73.4, 87.7; BDF §§23, 263(2); BAGD 203 | adokimos, S 96; TDNT 2.255–260; EDNT 1.33; NIDNTT 3.808–810; L&N 65.13, 88.111; BAGD 18

The exact meaning of these terms is subject to dispute because they are used in so many ways in literary, epigraphic, and papyrological texts. Even their etymology is unsure, although derivation from dokeo (dokao is not attested) is the best option and accounts for the intellectual value of the verb dokimazo: “put to the proof, test, discern, verify, examine before giving approval.”¹

In the inscriptions and the papyri, beginning with the third century BC, the verb’s first meaning is “examine, verify.” In a Samian law concerning the distribution of grain: “Let the chiliasteis examine mortgage guarantees and the personalities of the guarantors”;² a nomarchos is to examine a petition (P.Fam.Tebt. 43, 52; P.Ryl. 114, 35; P.Gen. 32, 8); an architect “shall visit the site, make an estimate (dokimasanta), and set the amount of the rent” (P.Bour. 20, 9). Similarly, private individuals estimate prices (P.Hib. 207, 8), verify the value of staters (P.Yale 79, 10), or evaluate an opportunity (P.Oxy. 2760, 17; Philo, Moses 1.263, 306; 2.177). Someone makes an examination in order to be able to judge and decide. This is why the formula “if your majesty approves him” (ean to megaleion sou dokimase touton) comes up so often in petitions to the prefect of Egypt;³ thus this mother from Theadelphia writes: “I take refuge at your feet, beseeching you on behalf of my minor children to order . . . either the strategos or whomever your majesty shall decide to force Annous to pay regular rent on the land” (P.Thead. 18, 17). When someone submits a case to an authority for examination, it is in order that the authority may evaluate it, decide, and finally approve (ean dokimazes).⁴ In a Macedonian law concerning the use of public land, “the councillors approved (edokimasan) that those who did the planting . . . should have a share in the harvest.”⁵ The verb has a religious meaning when a divinity tests, sanctions, and guarantees the virtue of a king and thus qualifies him in his functioning.⁶

In the LXX, the nuance of approbation is attested only once,⁷ as is the nuance “discern” (Job 34:3); but “put to the proof, examine” is quite common, especially with respect to metals,⁸ and is used for God’s examining, sounding, scrutinizing, and testing human hearts, which are purified by “testing”⁹—as silver is purified (Ps 66:10)—and emerge perfect (Sir 31:10). The meaning “verify” (Wis 2:19; 2Macc 1:34) is also a component of the meaning “test God” (Ps 95:9; Wis 1:3). Philo retains for this verb the meaning “put to the test,”¹⁰ an examining whose goal is to judge and verify;¹¹ but he especially emphasizes “evaluate”¹² and “discern values.”¹³ Josephus was apparently the first to give the word a moral meaning: the character of an Essene novice is put to the test (to ethos dokimazetai) for two years, and only then is he received into the community.¹⁴ God put Abraham’s attitude to the test (Ant. 1.233) and approved just laws (4.295; cf. 8.380; 14.195); virtue is tested (3.15); the correctness of the lawmaker’s conceptions is verified (1.15; 11.94); tribal chiefs are approved by the people as honest and just (3.71; cf. 13.183); Alexander “put to the test the virtue and faithfulness of all the peoples” (Ag. Apion 2.42). The meaning “judge, esteem” is also well attested.¹⁵

The first NT use of dokimazo is meteorological. With respect to the impending crisis, Jesus says to his contemporaries, “Hypocrites, you know how to evaluate (oidate dokimazein) the appearance of the earth and of the sky; how is it that you do not evaluate this present time?” (Luke 12:56). Kairos is the time when a decision is to be made, ought to be made. The Israelites do not “discern” the times and the person of the Messiah; the Master invites them to “verify” his coming and draw out its meaning.¹⁶ When 1Pet 1:7 specifies that faith is more precious “than perishable gold, which is nevertheless tried by fire” (dia pyros de dikomazomenou), not only does this mean that the fire selects, purifies, refines the material and gives the metal greater value; the text also uses the verb dokimazo in the sense that dokimasia is constantly given in the papyri (cf. below, dokimos), where gold, silver, or pewter is tested by fire to prove its authenticity and to remove impurities.¹⁷ This meaning—“verify, test”—also appears in 1Cor 3:13, where each apostle’s work “will be made manifest by fire” (at the Last Judgment) and “the fire will prove its value (quality).” Fire is the means of verification and control, as with precious metals: that which is worthless is destroyed, but that which is solid and eternal remains.¹⁸ It is through their generosity—and thus by concrete acts, by their behavior—that the Corinthians will verify, test, and prove their love to be genuine, of good alloy (2Cor 8:8).

Dokimazo means “discern” what it is important to do, the best course to follow, the decision to make,¹⁹ and especially to discern what is pleasing to the Lord (Eph 5:10), which presupposes spiritual renewal and the possession of love, which consequently gives a religious sense, a kind of spiritual instinct that allows a person to recognize true values (Rom 12:2).

The Pauline innovation is to apply this verb, with a moral and religious meaning, to Christians themselves: "Examine yourselves."²⁰ The authenticity of charismatic manifestations must be tested, put to the proof, verified: "Prove all things, hold fast that which is good" (panta de dokimazete, to kalon katechete),²¹ and thus reject whatever is suspect. St. Paul valued the zeal of the brother (St. Luke?) who accompanied the bearers of the collection; he has had many proofs of his zeal (2Cor 8:22, hon edokimasamen), just as the Corinthians have judged these bearers qualified (hous ean dokimasete, 1Cor 16:3). God himself had examined the apostle, tested his heart, and pronounced him qualified to preach the gospel (1Thess 2:4). Finally, candidates for the diaconate are to be examined before being installed in their function: "Let them be tested first (houtoi dikomazesthosan proton); then, if they are without reproach, let them carry out their office" (1Tim 3:10). If this dokimasia is not explicitly demanded for episkopoi, the criteria of discernment are enumerated at length (1Tim 3:1-7). The "proving" mentioned in these texts is in absolute conformity to Greek custom, whereby before entering upon the duties of public service (a magistrate, a strategos, a senator), a person was subjected to an examination (inquest, proof, trial period?) to determine if he met the conditions required for the office in question.²²

Dokimasia. — This word occurs only once in the NT (Heb 3:9), and there it is a quotation from Ps 95:7-11, where the Israelites are so bold as to put Yahweh to the test, and it is also a hapax in the LXX.²³ In Philo, the word means verification, control (Spec. Laws 4.106, 157), a testing (Flight 155), experience (149; Flacc. 130), criterion (Philo, Virtues 68: logia tes dokimantias, ritual formulas for testing); "the test of the soul is that of trouble and bitterness" (Prelim. Stud. 164). In the papyri, "six guaranteed gold solidi" (P.Ness. 18, 14), testing of gold to see if it is pure (P.Leid. X, 42-43) testing of bullion for fraud (ibid. X, 62), testing and approval for an office (P.Mert. 26, 11; cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 972, 29), judged and examined by a common arbiter (P.Mil. 659, 55; PSI 1105, 20; SB 7201, 11).

Dokimos. — This adjective, "proved, acceptable, tried," is abundant in the papyri, but is used almost exclusively for silver, gold, or coins;²⁴ often there occurs the phrase "three gold solidi of imperial coinage, checked for good minting" (P.Rein. 105, 1; SB 7996, 12, 22, 26; 9193, 18; 11239, 7) or "of imperial minting, authentic and legal."²⁵ Similarly, in the LXX, it is almost always a question of refined or purified gold or silver (1Kgs 10:18 = 2Chr 9:17; 1Chr 28:18; 29:4; cf. Zech 11:13); but also "four hundred silver shekels of merchants' currency" (Gen 23:16).

Philo was familiar with the use of the word for coinage of good alloy,²⁶ pure and tested metal (Sacr. Abel and Cain 137), but he uses this adjective so frequently that it is often impossible to specify its meaning. Often it is a case of something that after examination has been proven, recognized as authentic, and thus acceptable;²⁷ sometimes it is objects that are of good quality (Heir 180), well-reputed islands (To Gaius), a well-bred flock (Dreams 1.255), but especially souls that live according to the laws of nature and are accepted into God's circle of friends.²⁸ With regard to people, dokimos means qualified or competent: en pasi dokimon (Joseph 114), physicians (Unchang. God 65; Spec. Laws 3.117), scholars (Creation 128), artisans (Heir 158), priests who are particularly expert at examining animals (Spec. Laws 1.166), hence the best (Plant. 81) and the noteworthy (Spec. Laws 1.78). We could translate "distinguished," with the additional connotation "deserving the respect and esteem of all,"²⁹ with a nuance of honorableness and celebrity.³⁰ So Philo considerably enriched the idea of the dokimos, and these nuances are found also in Josephus: "the most eminent ones (hoi dokimotatoi) were slaughtered" (War 1.35); "the most eminent citizens by birth and intelligence" (2.482; 4.160); the most eminent Jews of Alexandria and of Rome (7.447; Ant. 14.21, 43; Life 55); Tiberius Alexander, "the most respected of the friends of Titus."³¹

The nuances of honor and celebrity are also found in St. Paul: "Greet Apelles, ton dokimon en Christo" (Rom 16:10), which is correctly translated "who has proved himself as a Christian" but must also be understood as praise for an illustrious believer, one of good repute. Likewise 2Tim 2:15—"Work to present yourself to God as an approved person (seauton dokimon), a worker who does not need to be ashamed" (cf. G. Therrien, Le Discernement dans les écrits pauliniens, pp. 218–259), tested by his excellent achievements in the gospel ministry but as a result excellent and recognized as such by all. For a Christian who serves Christ in righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit is not only pleasing to God but "approved of men," recognized by other people as a true or valuable disciple (Rom 14:18). Obviously these praises presuppose preliminary testing: hoi dokimoi are "qualified" Christians,³² not through their words, but demonstrably, through their deeds (2Cor 10:18; 2Cor 13:7). Thus tested, they receive the crown of life.

Dokime. — "Proof, trial" appears only in the Hellenistic period (Symmachus, Ps 68:11; Dioscorides 4.184 [but LSJ says the word is interpolated here—Tr.] and is used only by St. Paul in the NT. In an active sense, the testing of the Macedonian churches through multiple afflictions gives them abundant joy (2Cor 8:2). The Corinthians seek proof that Christ is speaking through St. Paul (13:3); they could verify his apostolic authenticity by the manifestations of power in their community, a proof that the Lord would approve. The other texts have a passive sense: "proven character" (Rom 5:4), a quality of one who has been put to the test (2Cor 2:9; Phil 2:22), proof (2Cor 9:13).

*Dokimion, dokimios.*³³ — In the papyri, the adjective is only used to describe refined gold or silver: "six minas of pure gold according to the Alexandrian standard."³⁴ Similarly the four occurrences in the LXX: "the words of Yahweh are pure words of refined gold";³⁵ but in Jas 1:3—"the testing (to dokimion) of your faith produces endurance”; faith that has been put to the test is purified, strengthened, verified, and on this account has become precious. In 1Pet 1:7, the neuter adjective used as a noun also shows the proven character of faith; when it has proved itself, it is worthy of praise; its worth is recognized after examination.

Adokimos. — This word, which means “worthless,” seems to have only one occurrence in the papyri, this in the Zeno correspondence: kai adokimou in an account of receipts and disbursements seems to mean “not taken into account, not included in the sum total” (P.Cair.Zen. 59176, 64). The LXX has only two usages: “dross” (Hebrew sîg) to be purged from silver (Prov 25:4); which in Isa 1:22 means “worthless” (“your silver has become dross”). This is the predominant meaning in Philo: the worthless words, desires, and deeds of the fool (Conf. Tongues 198); it could even be translated “void, of no account.”³⁶ This nuance is to be retained in many NT texts. In contrast to a fertile field, one that bears “thorns and thistles is worthless (adokimos) and in danger of being cursed” (Heb 6:8). Since it is void as far as fertility is concerned, it is not fit for the intended use; it is rejected, abandoned, since one is judged by one’s works. After asking “Test yourselves . . . examine yourselves,” St. Paul adds “at least unless you should be void” (ei meti adokimoi este, 2Cor 13:5), meaning that there would be no good to verify. This “incapacity” is that of the mind (adokimon noun) of the pagan philosophers, who cannot discern truth and virtue (Rom 1:28) or of latter-day heretics robbed by their corrupt intelligence of the capacity for sound judgment in anything concerning the faith and moral values (2Tim 3:8). Warped and disordered minds are radically incapable of any good work (Titus 1:16), whereas the apostle is not incapable of proving himself (2Cor 13:7). In the athletic context of 1Cor 9:27, the nuance is more precise: St. Paul beats his body and trains it as a slave “for fear lest after preaching to others I myself should be disqualified.” He is alluding to the preliminary test at athletic competitions, where the judge, after an examination, “eliminated” certain contestants who were “not acceptable,” or in the case of defeat, refused to award them a prize.

¹ P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique, p. 291.

² Dittenberger, Syl. 976, A 12–13; cf. 958, 14; 807, 9 (first century AD); SB 6734, 7 and 9; 6817, 6. In a receipt for military garments, a chlamys is δεδοκιμασμένη (P.Ant. 40, 6; cf. P.Tebt. 703, 86).

³ P.Oxy. 2133, 26; 2407, 5; P.Ryl. 659, 13; 701, 14; P.Col. VII, 169, 15; PSI 767, 50; 769, 4; P.Cair.Isid. 74, 18; 76, 18; P.Mert. 18, 31; 91, 18; P.Mich. 40, 5; P.Mil.Vogl. 25, col. V, 5; SB 9187, 15; 9188, 21; 11221, 10; cf. 9827 b 14; 10800, 19; 11223, 20; P.Oslo 148, 9–10.

⁴ BGU 1787, 11; H. Kling, P.Giss.Univ. 20, 38; P.Mert. 26, 12; P.Oxy. 2726, 22; SB 9467, 4: ὅπως δικιμάσας ἀντιγράψης μοι; P.Oxy. 3253, 8.

⁵ NCIG, n. 28, 17; cf. SB 9016, col. I, 7: ἡ βουλή δοκιμάζειν εἴωθεν τοὺς ὑπηρετοῦντας; P.Fay. 106, 23: the physicians who made an examination approve an exemption from public service; P.Eleph. I, 8 and 10: witnesses approve or confirm; cf. Menander, Dysk. 138: approve plans for marriage.

⁶ In 196 BC, Ptolemy Epiphanes was approved by Hephaestus, the Greek god of fire: ὃν ὁ Ἡφαιστος ἐδοκίμασεν (Rosetta Stone; Dittenberger, Or. 90, 3 = SB 8299); likewise Ptolemy IV Philopator (Chrest.Wilck., n. 109, 10 = SEG XVIII, 633, 5 = SB 10039).

⁷ 2Macc 4:3—“One of those who acted with Simon” (τινος τῶν δεδοκιμασμένων).

⁸ Gold and silver, Prov 8:10; 17:3; 27:21; Wis 3:6; Sir 2:5—“It is in fire that gold is proved” (δοκιμάζεται χρυσός); Zech 13:9; the potter’s vessels (Sir 27:5); cf. the “reckoned price” (Zech 11:13); Philo, Alleg. Interp. 1.77: “gold, a trusty substance, pure, purified in the fire, proved (δεδοκιμασμένη) and precious”; 3.168; Sacr. Abel and Cain 80; cf. Heir 308.

⁹ Judg 7:4; Jer 6:27; 9:6; Ps 17:3; 26:2 (cf. Jer 11:20; 17:10; 20:22); 81:8; 139:1, 23; Jer 12:3; Wis 11:10.

¹⁰ Philo, Worse Attacks Better 142; Moses 1.164: in the desert, God wanted to test his people “to know how they would keep up obedience.”

¹¹ Post. Cain 96; Unchang. God 128; Moses 1.226, 327: after the victory, “the combatants were judged to be without reproach”; 2.34; Virtues 32: to choose officers and soldiers, test is made of their state of health and mental balance; 60, 63, 66, 208: the rights of an heir are verified. Likewise Josephus (War 5.516; Ant. 9.261), a proven friend (War 1.516).

¹² Alleg. Interp. 2.7: “flavors are evaluated with the aid of the sense of taste”; Drunkenness 190; Migr. Abr. 48, 51.

¹³ Sacr. Abel and Cain 77; Post. Cain 62; Drunkenness 186; Joseph 118: “great natures do not take long to be discerned”; Virtues 54, 227; Spec. Laws 4.153: physicians are discerned through contact with experience; Good Man Free 24: it is through practice that a slave is discerned; To Gaius 220. A person is judged worthy (Abraham 253); athletes are disqualified (μὴ δοκιμασθέντες) and banned from the competition (Joseph 138).

¹⁴ War 2.138; cf. 161: the Essenes put women who are to be married to the test (δοκιμάζοντες) for three years and marry them only when they have shown their ability to conceive.

¹⁵ Ant. 2.176; 5.51: the Gabaonites sent ambassadors to Joshua, choosing those whom they esteemed most capable of acting in their people's interests; 7.321; 11.258: "he deems worthy of honor" (τιμῆς ἄξιον δοκιμάσει); 12.18: deem the moment favorable for presenting a petition; 13.51; Life 161. Cf. the meanings "prove" (War 4.153); "decide" (Ant. 1.177; 4.73; 14.209), "verify"; "the priests reconstitute genealogies and scrutinize the remaining women" (Ag. Apion 1.35).

¹⁶ The parallel text at Matt 16:3 has διακρίνειν. In the parable of the Great Banquet, one of those invited has bought five yoke of oxen and makes the excuse that "I am going to try them out" (Luke 14:19). Cf. Menander, Dysk. 816: "You want to make a friend? Try —and good luck."

¹⁷ P.Leid. X, 43, 42, 52; R. Helleux, Les Alchimistes grecs, Paris, 1981, vol. 1, pp. 52 et passim.

¹⁸ Cf. Rom 1:28—the pagan philosophers did not think it good to retain the knowledge of God; they tested it and rejected it.

¹⁹ Rom 2:18; 14:22; Phil 1:10; C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 2, pp. 233ff.

²⁰ 2Cor 13:5—to examine oneself to find out if one is in the faith and if Christ dwells within; Gal 6:4—each one must examine, getting behind deceptive appearances, what he has personally accomplished; this clarity will make for a well-founded evaluation; 1Cor 11:28—before taking communion, people must examine their conscience in order not to partake unworthily (ἀναξίως); they must discern the true nature of this sacred meal, which is entirely different from an ordinary repast. Cf. the only study (and a good one) on this notion, G. Therrien, Le Discernement dans les écrits pauliniens, Paris, 1973 (analyzes all the texts and gives the bibliography).

²¹ 1Thess 5:21; 1John 4:1. Cf. J. Guillet, "Discernement des esprits," in Dict.spir., vol. 3, col. 1222–1267.

²² Aristotle, Ath. Pol. 59.4; 55.2–5; 56.1; Dittenberger, Syl. 838, 13 (L. Gernet, Lysias, 2d ed., Paris, 1955, pp. 3ff., 288; cf. E. Caillemer, “Dokimasia,” in DAGR, vol. 2, pp. 324–328); the examination is for a life free of reproach (Aeschines, In Ctes. 14, 15; Dinarchus, C. Aristog. 17; Lysias, Mantith. 9), and so also with orators, who are not allowed in court if they have a bad reputation (Aeschines, In Tim. 28ff.), the attribution of the rights of citizenship (δοκιμασία δημοποιήτων); ephebes are enrolled on the registers of the deme only after examination by their fellow demesmen, then by the Council of Fifty-Five (Aristotle, Ath. Pol. 42, 1; 49, 1; Demosthenes, C. Eub. 9–14); the ι—σοτελει—ς at Rhamnus (SEG III, 122, 11; C. Pelekidis, Ephébie attique, Paris, 1962, pp. 65, 88ff.), the ὄργεω—νες, and the ε—ρανισταί: “No one may enter into the most venerable meeting of the ε—ρανισταί before being examined for piety, purity, and goodness; this examination must be conducted by the president, the ἀρχερανιστής, the secretary, the treasurers, and the syndics” (P. Foucart, Les Associations religieuses des Grecs, Paris, 1873, pp. 10, 146; LSCG, n. 59, 32, 34). There are examinations for professional capacity (P.Fay. 106, 26; PSI 1105, 4, 20; G. Zalateo, “Un nuovo significato della parola δοκιμασία,” in Aeg, 1957, pp. 32–40). The athlete’s constitution is submitted to examination (Philostratus, Gym. 26); Moses commanded that priests should be examined for office (τὴν τω—ν ι—ερέων δοκιμασίαν, Josephus, Ant. 4.54; cf. J. Martha, Les Sacerdotes athéniens, Paris, 1882, pp. 39ff.). At Qumran, the mebaqqer, the paqid, and the full assembly examine the postulant several times concerning “his works, his intelligence, his strength, his courage, his possessions” (CD 13.11; cf. 1QS 6.14–21; Josephus, War 2.137–138; M. Delcor, “Le Vocabulaire juridique, cultuel et mystique de ‘l’initiation’ dans la secte de Qumrân,” in H. Bardtke, Qumrân-Probleme, Berlin, 1963, pp. 117ff.).

²³ Sir 6:21—ὡς λίθος δοκιμασίας. The “stone of testing” is a large stone moved by athletes in contests (Zech 12:3); thus wisdom is a heavy burden for the ignorant and those lacking courage.

²⁴ Τὸ ἀργύριον δόκιμον (Stud.Pal. XX, 63, 17; 85 verso 7 and 10); P.Dura 29, 7: ἀργυρίου κάλου δοκίμου δηνάρια; P.Alex. 358 (p. 36): χρυσοῦ δοκίμου; SB 7816, 20; 8986, 19; 9566, 3 (C. Préaux, “Prêt d’or byzantin du Brooklyn Museum,” in ChrEg, 1961, p. 354); P.Tebt. 815; frag. IV, recto 25: χαλκοῦ δοκίμου; 970, 9.

²⁵ P.Fouad 53, 3: χρυσοῦ νομισμάτια ἀπλὰ δεσποτικὰ δόκιμα; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 1, 8; P.Mil. 56, 9; P.Michael. 40, 14; P.Oxy. 1891, 7; 1973, 11; 2237, 8; PSI 1239, 22; 1263, 20; 1340, 8; P.Charite 3, 14; P.Köln 102, 7; 151, 10; 155, 2; P.Rein. 105, 1. In the metaphorical sense: δεξιὸς ἀνὴρ ἀεὶ δόκιμος παιδείᾳ (SB 8542, 5; cf. 8211, 13); a paeon at Ptolemais: “Grant that we, joyful and approved (δοκίμους), may see the light of the sun” (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 176, 16).

²⁶ Philo, Alleg. Interp. 2.95; 2.104; 3.168; Conf. Tongues 159; Flight 19; Change of Names 208; Spec. Laws 1.104; Contemp. Life 41. Hence, the “good imprint” of modesty (Spec. Laws 3.176) or of constitution (4.47).

²⁷ Post. Cain 96; Heir 252; Spec. Laws 1.61, 214; 3.119, 120; 4.137; Dreams 1.202; Virtues 65; Flacc. 163: the proven worth of soldiers.

²⁸ Husbandry 66; Change of Names 124; Spec. Laws 4.196; Good Man Free 98; Plant. 18; Sobr. 20.

²⁹ Flight 63: a well-thought-of man; Moses 2.234: respected; Joseph 161, 201: qualified by wisdom; Abraham 180: the particularly respected Greeks; Conf. Tongues 4: “Homer, the greatest and most respected of the poets”; Change of Names 179; Etern. World 48: Chrysippus the most esteemed of the Stoics; Moses 2.28: the most esteemed of kings; 2.29: the Hebrews of highest repute; 2.187: the most highly respected of the prophets; Good Man Free 140: the most distinguished of the ephebes; Abraham 189: the child most worthy of respect.

³⁰ Cf. Dreams 2.20: the deeds most worthy of praise; Moses 1.221: Moses chooses a leader in each tribe, “those whom he judged the most dependable in order of merit”; 267; Spec. Laws 4.174; 2.125: choice of a spouse of real merit, enjoying the respect of all; Virtues 201: Noah, one of the truly remarkable people of that period (σφόδρα δοκίμων); Rewards 111: “the first grace is to show oneself worthy of respect and honorable”; To Gaius 107: “all that was honorable in each city”; 173: “of the most distinguished and most brilliant”; 144: “for leaders the most illustrious of the Romans”; Alleg. Interp. 1.66: prudence, the most estimable of the virtues.

³¹ War 5.45; Ant. 12.255: the most worthy of the people and the noblest souls; Ag. Apion 1.18: “the most competent (οι—δοκιμώτατοι) historians contradict each other”; Life 228: “the Galileans of highest repute”; 293: “two of the most reputable guards” because of their bravery and trustworthiness.

³² 1Cor 11:19—the divisions, oppositions, and schisms in the Corinthian community give “perfect” Christians the opportunity to manifest their love and patience and to overcome evil with good: they are doikmoi because they have been purified, strengthened, made better by their trials.

³³ Cf. A. Deissmann, Bible Studies, pp. 259ff.; P. Chantraine, La Formation des noms, Paris, 1933, p. 53; N. Turner, Grammatical Insights into the New Testament, Edinburgh, 1965, pp. 168ff.

³⁴ P.Mich. 262, 13 (in AD 35/36); 343, 3 (in 54/55); 662, 30; 664, 15; P.Tebt. 392, 22; BGU 1065, 6 (AD 97); P.Mil.Vogl. 71, 22 and 28; Stud.Pal. XX, 2, 6; P.Stras. 237, 15; SB 6951, 48; 9264, 7, 22, 28.

³⁵ Ps 12:6; Prov 27, 21; 1Chr 29:4; Zech 11:13. The term is unknown in Josephus; it occurs once in Philo: “the divine Word, having tested us . . . , gives us distinction (τὸ δοκίμιον), fame, and brilliance” (Dreams 1.226).

³⁶ Dreams 1.227: “acts that cannot be purified, worthlessness (τὸ ἀδόκιμον), nothing but works of darkness”; a false tetradrachma is worthless (Worse Attacks Better 162), like certain doctrines (Conf. Tongues 34; Dreams 2.284). “The word of the oracle spoken without judgment is adokimos (to be rejected), but tested by judgment is acceptable (dokimos)” (Alleg. Interp. 3.119). Cf. the hapax in Josephus: “Lysimachuses, Molons . . . worthless sophists (ἀδόκιμοι σοφισταί) who deceive the young” (Ag. Apion 2.236).

δόξα, δοξάζω, συνδοξάζω

doxa, expectation, opinion, reputation, honor, glory; doxazo, to think, hold an opinion, imagine, praise, glorify; syndoxazo, to sanction, agree to, glorify with

doxa, S 1391; TDNT 2.233–253; EDNT 1.344–348; NIDNTT 2.44–52; MM 168–169; L&N 1.15, 12.49, 14.49, 25.205, 33.357, 76.13, 79.18, 87.4, 87.23; BAGD 203–204 | doxazo, S 1392; TDNT 2.253–254; EDNT 1.348–349; NIDNTT 2.44–45, 874; MM 169; L&N 33.357, 87.8, 87.24; BDF §§235(2), 392(3); BAGD 204 | syndoxazo, S 4888; TDNT 2.253–254, 7.766–797; EDNT 3.299; NIDNTT 2.44; L&N 87.10; BAGD 785

The noun doxa derives from dokeo (future doxo, aorist edoxa), “think, admit, claim.” It means a subjective appraisal, an internal mental judgment, made by an individual or an assembly.¹ But, beginning with its first usages, doxa means “expectation, what is thought possible”; “In accord with our expectation, she goes straight to the mark”;² hence by far the most widespread meaning in secular Greek, “opinion, thought, sentiment,”³ as distinct from noesis (Plato, Resp. 7.534.a) and episteme.⁴ There are both true and false opinions,⁵ especially among the axiomata, the maxims of the philosophers (Resp. 3.413 a), the kyriai doxai,⁶ and also illusions produced by the imagination or a miscalculation.⁷

This “opinion” can also be that held by others concerning a person; so doxa is renown, reputation. Usually this is favorable: “Philip is in love with fame, he has a passion for it.”⁸ Hence in the Koine, especially in the inscriptions and the papyri, the meaning “esteem, honor” (expressed by the Latin gloria and our word glory), is often linked with time (Pap. Graec. Mag. 4, 1616), arete, epainos. In an honorific decree of Ptolemy IV for the Cretan auxiliaries (around 150 BC), Aglaos of Cos, through his deeds and his excellent counsel, showed himself “worthy of his country and of the glory (good reputation) that he enjoys.”⁹ Around the same period, in a decree at Miletus, “Eirenias has shown the finest zeal for the interests of the city and gives his cooperation to all that pertains to the renown and the glory of our country.”¹⁰ According to his epitaph, the officer Apollonius received from the benefactors “the garland, the sacred allotment of the glory that belongs to the king’s ‘kinsmen.’”¹¹ A prytanis is acclaimed as “glory of the city” (doxa poleos, P. Oxy. 41, 4).

The semantic evolution of doxa is probably the most extraordinary in the Bible. Not once in the LXX (except for Eccl 10:1) or the NT does this noun mean “opinion.” It translates most often the Hebrew kabôd, but also hôd, pe’er, tiph’ereth. Kabôd, from the root kbd, “be heavy,” evokes the idea of weight or that which confers weightiness (cf. 2Cor 4:17, an eternal weight of glory) and hence esteem or respect, especially power and wealth.¹² In this secular meaning, doxa can be translated sometimes “majesty” (2Macc 15:13) or “dignity,”¹³ sometimes “renown.”¹⁴

Because Yahweh is the supreme sovereign, he is described as the “king of glory.”¹⁵ The whole universe is full of his doxa,¹⁶ that is, the splendor of his majesty.¹⁷ We should understand this to mean his mighty deeds, his glorious interventions (Exod 14:18; 16:7) both in overturning his adversaries (Exod 15:7) and in saving his people.¹⁸ In fact, more than once it is said that “the glory of Yahweh appeared,”¹⁹ conceived sometimes as a manifestation of the deity (Isa 40:5), sometimes as an image of Yahweh;²⁰ it is visible.²¹ “The spirit of the glory of Yahweh was like a raging fire on the peak of the mountain in the eyes of the children of Israel” (Exod 24:17; Deut 5:24), a sparking of light (Ezek 1) that flames out (Isa 60:1-3). This is how biblical doxa, the manifestation of the presence and activity of the invisible and transcendent God answers to sense experience: even though its brilliance cannot be perceived by the eyes of the flesh (Ezek 33:22; Acts 22:11; Asc. Isa. 9.37), it is contemplated by the spirit.²² Biblical doxa therefore has a touch of luminescence.²³

It is worth noting that Hellenistic Jewish writers know nothing of the religious meaning of doxa. Nevertheless, the Letter of Aristeas has the word in the sense of splendor and brilliance.²⁴ Philo (in 180 occurrences) has only the meaning “opinion,” in accord with the classical tradition, whether true or false opinion (Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 2–3; Worse Attacks Better 32). This latter²⁵ is described as vicious (Sacr. Abel and Cain 5), atheistic (Alleg. Interp. 23; Post. Cain 42), and especially as vain or empty;²⁶ it is over against the truth.²⁷ Doxa (often synonymous with dogma) refers also to philosophical opinions²⁸ and especially to wealth, power, honor, and pleasure.²⁹ These are images and shifting shadows (Spec. Laws 1.28), they are uncertain (Rewards 29), intoxicating vapors and lies (Rewards 21).

For Josephus, doxa is opinion, conception, judgment,³⁰ but especially reputation, renown.³¹ In contrast to Philo, he almost always uses doxa in a favorable sense (“esteem”), linking it to piety and virtue;³² but neither of them seem to have been influenced by the LXX.

The NT writers are familiar with almost all of the above-mentioned secular and religious meanings. The Synoptics already attest the meaning “honor, distinction, reputation” for the guest placed by the host in the best place, resulting in “honor before all” (doxa enopion panton, Luke 14:10). The devil promises the Messiah royal glory—that attaching to domination, magnificence, splendor (Matt 4:8; Luke 4:6). This was the kind of glory Solomon had (Matt 6:29; Luke 12:27). This glory is luminous,³³ like that of Moses and Elijah at Tabor,³⁴ signaling a heavenly appearance, a divine manifestation. Peter and his companions, awakened by the dazzling light, “saw his (Christ’s) glory” (Luke 9:32). This is a divine state, a condition of honor, of preeminent dignity, of splendor; it belongs especially to Jesus (Mark 10:37), and contrasts with his earthly morphe and his passion (Luke 24:26). When the Son of Man appears at the end time as judge and sovereign, his glory will fill the heavens from one end to the other, instantaneously, like lightning.³⁵ Finally, God’s glory (kabôd) manifests his presence and his intervention, bathing the shepherds of Bethlehem in light.³⁶ Also, the angels who praise God (Luke 2:13) acclaim the intervention of God’s mercy and might to save humans: “Glory in the highest to God” (doxa in hypsistois theo).³⁷

St. Paul is the writer who uses the word glory most often. As a part of his largely Septuagint-based vocabulary, doxa has a depth of meaning that cannot be expressed by a simple translation. Certainly there is the quite basic sense of honor and repute,³⁸ even beauty and splendor: “If a woman wears her hair long, it is a glory for her”;³⁹ but there is also a religious nuance with those who “seek glory, honor (doxan kai timen) and immortality.”⁴⁰ To the Israelites “belong the adoption and the glory and the alliances and the temple worship and the promises” (Rom 9:4). There is the light of this doxa, like the shining forth of luminous rays, like the stars, which each have their brilliance and thus a variety of beauty.⁴¹ Thus Moses’ face, when he returned from speaking with God, shone brilliantly, even though the light was dissipating (Exod 34:29-35); but the administration of the new covenant according to the Spirit prevails with a preeminent and definitive glory (tes hyperballouses doxes),⁴² because its light comes from “the knowledge of God’s glory (shining) on the face of Christ.”⁴³ The two splendors are not comparable. There is so much variety in luminousness: “man is the image and glory of God, but woman is the glory of man.”⁴⁴ If Adam and Eve are both the image of God, then the man manifests the royal authority of his Creator and the honor of God (cf. Num. Rab. 3.15—“the honor [kabôd] of God ascends from men”) and the woman “procures honor [i.e., for her husband]” (Prov 11:17). These latter texts can be understood well only as a function of OT kabôd. “All have sinned and are deprived of the glory of God” (Rom 3:23) cannot refer to the good opinion that God would have of the righteous (Cajetan), nor to the grace that would be inaugurated glory (a later theological distinction), but to the splendor and beauty that shine out from the divine splendor and holiness.⁴⁵ The idolatrous pagans “exchanged the glory of the immortal God for images representing a mortal man.”⁴⁶

This glory is God in the splendor of his majesty and the omnipotence of his interventions,⁴⁷ “the Father of glory” (ho pater tes doxes).⁴⁸ But this predicate doxa, which is peculiar to God, is attributed also to Christ, the “Lord of glory.”⁴⁹ Heb 1:3 adds the description: “the Son (of God), the effulgence of his (the Father’s) glory (apaugasma tes doxes autou) and the image of his substance.”⁵⁰ If Christ is the refulgence of God’s doxa, it is because his origin is divine; he has the same nature as the Father while having his personal independence. The Council of Nicea would give the definition “light from light” (phos ek photos). In proclaiming Jesus as his Son at Tabor, God conferred honor and glory upon him (2Pet 1:17, timen kai doxan); but as a human, Jesus—after the shame of his passion—was glorified by his resurrection,⁵¹ and at the end of time he will appear as an almighty sovereign and in blinding light. His disciples await “the appearing of the glory of our great God and Savior Jesus Christ,”⁵² for they will participate in it (2Thess 2:14).

Actually, the great innovation of the new covenant is that it calls all believers to share the “eternal glory (of God) in Christ” (1Pet 5:10). The economy of salvation is order “for our glory” (eis doxan hemon, 1Cor 2:7). God calls us “to his kingdom and his glory” (1Thess 2:12; Rom 5:2; 8:18, 21), and the goal of Jesus’ advent on earth was “to lead many sons to glory” (Heb 2:10). Beginning in the present, these contemplate Christ’s glory and are metamorphosed in his image “from glory to glory,”⁵³ the objects of increasing illumination. The life-giving glory of Christ becomes ours and emphasizes our spiritual likeness to the Lord; through this refraction we resemble his image more and more “with unveiled faces.” Furthermore, “when Christ, our life, is manifested, then you will be manifested with him en doxe,”⁵⁴ that is, in splendor and in the greatest dignity (2Cor 4:17), symbolized as an incorruptible crown.⁵⁵ If doxa became almost synonymous with the heavenly state, the emphasis is on the nobility of this state and the light received from God. This insistence on dignity and eternity—whereas we think especially of “beatitude”—contrasts with the imperfections of earthly, mortal existence but also refers to the glorious condition of the first human being, clothed with God’s glory.

Finally, it is part of the light mysticism characteristic of inhabitants of the Orient and the Mediterranean.

There is nothing to do but give glory to God, after the fashion of Abraham (Rom 4:20), do everything for God's glory (1Cor 10:31; 2Cor 8:19), as an expression of our gratitude and adoration,⁵⁶ homage to the almighty and faithful God (2Cor 1:20; Phil 1:11; 2:11). The fact is that the whole economy of salvation in God's intention has as its goal to draw from the saved a hymn "to the praise of the glory of his grace."⁵⁷ Hence more or less developed doxologies acclaim either God's excellence, nature, and activity,⁵⁸ or Christ as king, heavenly priest, archegos, shepherd: "Jesus Christ, to whom be the glory for ever and ever."⁵⁹

In the Fourth Gospel, the term doxa is almost always placed in the mouth of Jesus, notably in the sense of honor, praise, repute, and to contrast honors given by humans with those that come from God.⁶⁰ But St. John worked out a theological concept of glory, Christianized it, attributing it to Jesus Christ, while setting it in relation to the glory of God. It was actually in order to reveal his doxa that God sent his Son here below,⁶¹ and because Jesus never failed to glorify God, God in turn glorifies him (8:50, 54; 17:5). In the "Prologue," which sketches a portrait of the person of Christ and the character of his mission, the evangelist first states that "the Word was God" (verse 1); then he was "the true light that illuminates every man, coming into the world" (verse 9); "he sojourned among us."⁶² All of this leads up to "We beheld his glory, glory as of the only Son of his Father."⁶³ Just as in the LXX, the apostles saw⁶⁴ the doxa, the luminous manifestation of the Word incarnate, that is, his divine stature, for this glory is precisely that of the Father.⁶⁵ Jesus possesses it by right in his capacity as only Son, that is, by virtue of his eternal filiation (cf. 2Pet 1:16-17).

This divine glory or power in Jesus was manifested perceptibly in the miracles⁶⁶ and first of all in the one at Cana: "He manifested his glory and his disciples believed in him" (ephanerosen ten doxan autou kai episteusan eis auton hoi mathetai autou, John 2:11). This doxa comprises three elements: (a) a manifestation (phanerosis), a light (phos); (b) the seeing (theoria) of this manifestation; (c) the faith and praise (time) of the witnesses.⁶⁷ Doxa is the outcome for Jesus of the faith of the disciples, who recognize him as Messiah or Son of God.⁶⁸ Through the miracle, Jesus accomplished a self-revelation; in this sign, the disciples discerned his very nature, his "glory," namely, that he was the Messiah (the Word incarnate).

For St. John, it is especially in his passion that Jesus is glorified, because his death is not only that of a martyr showing his patience, faith, and confidence in God, but is also the manifestation of God present and acting in him to save the world (2Cor 5:19) and ratifying the accomplishment of his mission: "Father, the hour is come; glorify your Son so that your Son may glorify you"⁶⁹ through the redemption of humanity, a common labor manifesting the love of the Father and of the Son. In carrying out the Father's thelema, Jesus glorifies him through his obedience and his love (John 17:4). Jesus wants his disciples to behold this heavenly glory openly, to see (theorosin, present subjunctive) the brilliance and splendor of his divine nature (John 17:24; Heb 12:14). Christ's last will is that his own may see and hence share his doxa, which he possesses in common with the Father; for in this order of reality, it is not possible to behold without in some way becoming a participant (2Cor 3:18). So Jesus asks that his disciples be made capable of receiving this vision face to face with his divinity, "as he is" (1John 3:2), which they have not seen here below except through the veil of his flesh (1:14). As St. Augustine says concerning spiritual realities, "to see them is to have them" ("videre est ea habere").

Jesus makes believers sharers in precisely this divine doxa, which in the OT was incommunicable: "I have given (dedoka) to them the glory that you gave me, so that they may be one as we are one" (John 17:22, both verbs in the perfect). This is a reference to divine filiation (1:2), high nobility. This participation in the divine nature (1Pet 1:23; 2:2; 2Pet 1:4) and thus in eternal life, this communion in Christ, imparts to all members the same life that belongs to him; obtained through Christ's passion and his Eucharist, it is the principle that unites all Christians with each other and with the three divine persons. Believers are ushered into the presence of the Holy Trinity, receive its splendor, and share in its glory.

So we understand that Jesus continues in heaven the ministry that he carried out on earth; he "finds himself glorified by his disciples" (John 17:10; dedoxasmai, perfect passive), as much through their faith as through their fruitful ministry (verse 8; 1Thess 2:20; Phil 4:1). Similarly, the Father is glorified by their spiritual fruit (John 15:8), after the fashion of a proud vineyard owner who derives honor from the fruitfulness of his vines. Moreover, in the time of the church, the Paraclete, the Spirit of Truth, will glorify Christ (John 16:14) by making his teachings ever better known, by illuminating them. He never stops re-announcing them, re-proclaiming them (anangelo). This manifestation will be simultaneously an interior light and a power of visible radiance. Finally, so that the Father may be glorified in the Son, Jesus promises to do whatever his own ask in his name (14:13). Thus the heavenly Christ continues to act as he did on earth, for the glory of his Father.⁷⁰

Doxazo. — In classical Greek this denominative verb expresses both meanings of doxa: "think, hold an opinion, imagine,"⁷¹ and "honor, exalt, praise, celebrate."⁷² This latter meaning is the only one in the LXX: human honors are offered to the king of Israel (2Sam 6:20; 10:3; 1Chr 17:18; 19:3) as well as to a slave (Jdt 12:13), to a father, a mother, a priest, a judge, the rich, etc.⁷³ But in the song of Moses after the crossing of the Red Sea, Yahweh is said to be clothed in glory (Hebrew ga'âh) and is exalted (hiphil of nawâh); he wins fame and demonstrates his magnificence by his might (niph'al of 'adar). "Who is like him, majestic in holiness?" (Exod 15:1, 2, 6, 11; cf. 1Macc 3:14). Since God manifests his glory in Israel⁷⁴ and glorifies his own,⁷⁵ it follows that his people will exalt and praise him.⁷⁶ This gratitude is the elect people's raison d'être.

In the NT, doxazo sometimes retains its secular meaning, "praise, acclaim,"⁷⁷ while here and there a shade of OT doxa is present.⁷⁸ But the meaning of "glorifying God" is exactly as in the LXX: like lights that shine and give forth light, the good works of the disciples "glorify the Father who is in heaven" (Matt 5:16). God is exalted and praised in view of the manifestations of his sovereignty and power,⁷⁹ especially in the miracles whose brilliance draws adoration and thankfulness.⁸⁰ If Christians are commanded to "glorify God in your bodies" (1Cor 6:20; imperative, doxasate), it is because the body is the temple of God; not only must it be preserved pure and holy, it is also the locus of sacred acts, of worship that praises and glorifies God (cf. Rom 12:1). All the faithful are joined together in this thanksgiving liturgy.⁸¹ "In everything let God be glorified (acclaimed) through Jesus Christ" (1Pet 4:11; a doxology follows).

As for St. John, he uses doxazo almost exclusively⁸² for Christ's glory and his relationship with the Father,⁸³ exactly as with doxa. If "the Spirit was not yet, because Jesus had not yet been glorified" (7:39, passive of doxazo, as at 12:16, 23), this must be understood as a reference to the reintegration into eternal glory after the passion and the resurrection, i.e., in the splendor of his majesty and sovereign omnipotence.

Syndxazo. — This extremely rare verb,⁸⁴ a biblical hapax, is only attested three or four times and in each case in a different meaning. Aristotle understands it to mean common approbation: "No profit will be had from the most beneficent laws, even if they are sanctioned by the unanimity of the citizens (syndedoxasmenon hypo panton ton politeuomenon), if these latter . . ." (Pol. 5.9.12). In Porphyry, it means "agree, consent to."⁸⁵ According to Rom 8:17, it is a matter of being "glorified with," together in heaven: "we will suffer with him (Christ) so that we may be glorified with him,"⁸⁶ united to him, eternally in his presence, participants in his honor, his joy, and the riches of his kingdom.

¹ Demosthenes, Fun. Orat. 60.5: "it seems to me that" (δοκει— μοι); Herodotus 7.103: "for myself, I think that"; Plato, Menex. 241 b: "The Persians seemed to be invincible by sea"; Sophocles, Trach. 718: "Yes, I feel that he will kill him"; Xenophon, Hell. 7.5.21: "He gave the enemy the impression that he did not want to join battle that day"; An. 2.1.17: "the advice that seems best to you"; Thucydides 2.11.3: "even if we seem (δοκοῦμεν) to be about to attack, having numbers on our side"; A. Bernand, Philae, n. 12 bis, 11: "we ask you, if it please you, to order" (δεόμεθά σου, εἰ—δοκεῖ—). A. Bernand, Fayoum, n. 112, 18; 113, 20; 114, 33; etc. Cf. Matt 3:9; 6:7; 17:25; Luke 1:3; Acts 15:22.

² Homer, Od. 11.344; cf. Il. 10.324: “I will not be a vain scout for you, nor will I fall short of your expectation”; Herodotus 1.79: “Croesus found himself in a very awkward position, his affairs having taken an unexpected turn, altogether different from what he had supposed”; 7.203: “whoever came to attack them had to risk being disappointed.” Josephus constantly uses παρὰ δόξαν, “contrary to all expectation,” for a surprising, unexpected happening: “having escaped alive, by some miracle, from the royal palace at Jerusalem” (Life 46; cf. 96; War 1.95, 614; 3.289, 518; 4.529; Ant. 2.280; 3.210; 5.40; 15.255, 316, 388; 17.330; 18.129, 219; 19.243). Cf. P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique, pp. 290ff. J. Schneider, Doxa: Eine bedeutungsgeschichtliche Studie, Gütersloh, 1932.

³ Plato, Plt. 260 b: “Have we made a just division? Yes, in my opinion at least”; Pindar, Nem. 11.30; Aeschylus, Pers. 29; Philostratus, Gym. 17: “following the opinion of certain people (ὥς μὲν δόξα ε—νίων), the Eleans tested during the summer to see if the gymnasts could resist vigorously and burn themselves in the sun”; P.Mich. XIII, 666, 27: ε—ν καιρω— τοῦ δημοσίου πρὸς τὰ δόξαν = as that seems good; Stud.Pal. XXII, 87, 12: ἀξιω— τὸ δόξαν σοι; SB 7558, 11: τὸ δόξαν σοι κελεῦσαι γενέσθαι; 9066, 23: τὸ δόξαν σταθῆναι.

⁴ Plato, Tht. 187 b. Cf. J. Sprute, Der Begriff der DOXA in der platonischen Philosophie, Göttingen, 1962, pp. 90ff., 109ff. H. D. Voigtländer, Der Philosoph und die Vielen, Wiesbaden, 1980, pp. 177–183; Y. Lafrance, La Théorie platonicienne de la doxa, Montreal, 1981.

⁵ Plato, Phlb. 36 c; Grg. 458 a: δόξα ψευδής; Resp. 4.423 a; Xenophon, Cyr. 1.6.22; Mem. 1.7.4.

⁶ Of Epicurus (Cicero, Fin. 2.7); cf. αἰ—κοινὰ δόξαι (Aristotle, Metaph. 2.2.996b28; 3.3.1005b29; K. Held, Heraklit, Parmenides und der Anfang von Philosophie und Wissenschaft, Berlin–New York, 1980, pp. 72, 469–471).

⁷ Herodotus 8.132; Aeschylus, Ag. 275; Thucydides 1.32.4–5: what formerly seemed to be wisdom appeared definitively as folly and weakness. Plato, Symp. 218 e; G. Kittel, “Δόξα,” in Forschungen und Fortschritte, vol. 7, 1931, pp. 457–458. On preSocratic δόξα, cf. M. Heidegger, Einführung in die Metaphysik, Tübingen, 1953, pp. 79ff. = ET, An Introduction to Metaphysics, trans. R. Manheim, New Haven, 1959, pp. 103ff. Parmenides used this word for the world of appearance as grasped by the senses, cf. E. Pax, “Ex Parmenide ad Septuaginta: De notione vocabuli doxa,” in VD, 1960, pp. 92–102.

⁸ Demosthenes, 2 Olynth. 2.15; cf. 3 Olynth. 3.24: “The Athenians through their actions have left a renown that defies the envious”; C. Lept. 20.10: “the present law deprives our city of this glorious fame”; Euripides, HF 157: Heracles has a reputation of bravery for his fights with wild animals; cf. Hec. 295: well-known or famous men (τω—ν δοκούντων) contrasted to obscure folk (ἀδοκούντων); Tro. 613; Diodorus Siculus 15.61.5; Josephus, Ant. 4.14: Korah thought that he had a greater right to honor than Moses himself; 19.307; Life 274: “They said that the esteem in which I was held was an honor to themselves.” Cf. G. Steinkopf, Untersuchungen zur Geschichte des Ruhmes bei den Griechen, Halle, 1937, pp. 60ff.

⁹ I.Delos 1517, 17 = J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. 17. The end of an (imperial) decree refers to a dispute concerning the names or rank of cities (πρωτεία). Certain ones are puffed up with a glory that is recent, new (καινή δόξη, MAMA VI, 6, 2) “because a title has been granted them” (L. Robert, “Les Inscriptions,” in J. des Gagniers, Laodicée, p. 287).

¹⁰ NCIG, n. 7, col. I, 3. Dittenberger, Or. 244, 20: “In the future he shall benefit from all the advantages that confer honor and glory (ει—ς τιμὴν καὶ δόξαν); this will be our concern” (= IGLS 992); Syl. 700, 35; 724 E 20; 796, 28; I.Priene 53, 15: ἀξίως ε—παίνου καὶ τιμω—ν (= C. Michel, Recueil, n. 468); 119, 9: μεγίστου τέτευχεν ε—παίνου καὶ δόξης ἀταράκτου; I.Olymp. 472, 12: ἀρετῆς καὶ σωφροσύνης καὶ παιδείας ἔνεκεν καὶ τῆς ὑπὲρ τὴν ἡλικίαν δόξης; I.Magn. 53, 48; 131, 3: γένει καὶ δόξη καὶ ἀρετῇ καὶ σωφροσύνῃ; 138, 5: ε—πὶ τε τῇ περισσῇ ἀρετῇ τε καὶ δόξη καὶ τῇ εὐνοίᾳ.

¹¹ E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 5, 5: συγγενικῆς δόξης ι—ερόν γέρας. According to Aphrodisia’s epitaph, her husband Ptolemaeus “raised to the heavens the glory of being king’s kinsman” (ibid. 35, 10). In the vision of Maximus, the god Mandoulis is “glad for the glory of the Romans,” i.e., rejoices in the temple that the imperial government built for him (ibid. 168, 27). “At Elea, the sacred olive tree retains its ancient glory free of profanation” (τὴν ε—κ παλαιοῦ δόξαν, Philostratus, Gym. 45). The gymnastai dream only of their profits and “do not care for the glory of the athletes” (τῆς μὲν τω—ν ἀθλητω—ν δόξης, ibid.). The winner in a chariot race notes that he “won a share of glory in life” (τῆς ε—ν βίῳ δόξης μετείληφα νεικήσας, P.Oxy. 3116, 5); cf. P.Oslo 85, 13; SB 8542, 2: μεγίστη δόξα διὰ βίου; 8639, 2; 9286, 5; P.Ross.Georg. II, 26, 2: ε—ν μείζονι δόξη; CIRB 57, 7: μεγάλης δόξης ὁ ἀνὴρ ἔτυχεν; 121, 1; 992, 8; P.Alex. 216 (p. 44); τῆς ὑμετέρας μεγαλοπρεποῦς δόξης; C.P.Herm. 2,26.

¹² Beginning with the first occurrence, Gen 31:1—Jacob “gained all this fortune from what was our father’s”; verse 6; 45:13—Joseph says, “You shall tell my father about all my power in Egypt”; Exod 28:2—“Aaron your brother in glory and in majesty” (same link between δόξα and τιμή, Ps 8:5—“You have crowned man with glory and honor” [cf. the Hebrew text of Sir 49:16—“Above every living thing is the glory of Adam”; T. Abr. A 11; 1QS 4.23; CD 3.20; 1QH 17.15]; Ps 21:6; Job 40:10; 1Macc 14:21; 2Macc 5:16); Num 27:20—Moses will confer on Joshua “a little of his majesty”; 1Kgs 3:13; 1Chr 29:12, 28; 2Chr 1:11-12; 17:5; 18:1; 32:27; Esth 6:3; 10:2; Ps 112:3; Prov 3:16; 8:18; 11:16; 22:4; Eccl 6:2; Sir 24:17; 1Macc 14:4, 9; 15:32, 36, “the wise shall have a share of honor” (Prov 3:35); “the beauty of heaven is the glory of the stars” (Sir 43:9, 12). There is “the glory of the great Raphael” (Tob 3:17), “the glory of athletes” (2Macc 4:15), and “Yahweh, you are my glory (my pride, my honor)” (Ps 3:3, 46:2; 106:20). Glory is like a garment (Job 19:9; 40:10; Sir 6:31; 27:8; 45:7; 50:11; Isa 52:1; Bar 5:1) or an adornment. So there is mention of a crown of glory (Jer 13:18; Bar 5:2) and of a throne of glory (1Sam 2:8; Isa 22:23; Jer 14:21; 17:12; Bar 5:6; Esth 5:1; Wis 9:10; Sir 7:4; 40:3; 47:11). Glory is preeminently a royal attribute: Solomon is clothed with royal majesty (δόξαν βασιλέως, 1Chr 29:25; cf. the liturgical acclamation Δόξα σοι οὐράνιε βασιλεῦ, SB 6584, 10; 7512, 2; 7906, 13; IGLS 294, 1; 318, 1; 426, 1; 587; 598); cf. Isa 8:7; 17:4; 21:16; 33:17; Dan 2:37; 4:26-33; 7:14; 11:20; Esth 1:4; Ps 45:13; Prov 14:28; 25:2.

¹³ Hos 4:7; Hab 2:16; Isa 16:14; 1Macc 1:40; 10:58, 64, 86; 11:42; 2Macc 14:7; Esth 4:17; Job 29:20; Wis 15:9; Sir 1:11, 19; 3:10-11; 8:14; 35:12; 45:2, 20, 23. In the plural, the ε-ξουσίαι καὶ δόξαι are high offices (Diodorus Siculus 15.58.1; cf. PSI 158, 24 and 41: πάντων ἄλλων δόξας ποιει-ς; 1422, 6), those high dignitaries of the heavenly court that angels are; Philo, Spec. Laws 1.45: “Your glory, I mean the Powers that stand guard around you”; T. Jud. 25.2—αι— δυνάμεις τῆς δόξης; Jude 8; 2Pet 2:10; P.Princ. 159, 10: κύριοι ἄγγελοι (= P.Oslo 1, 44 and 246), “the cherubim of glory” (Heb 9:5); Ezek 10:4; Sir 49:8), whose spread wings over the place of propitiation symbolize the presence of Yahweh and his powerful interventions on behalf of his people (J. Trinquet, “Gloires,” in Catholicisme, vol. 5, col. 55). Some have also understood the false teachers of 2Pet 2:10, who slander the “glorious ones” as those who reject the risen Christ, his extraordinary deeds (2:1—δεσπότην ἀρνούμενοι) or his teachings (κυριότητος καταφρονοῦντας); δόξας would then have its classical meaning “opinion, verdict, axiom, philosophical doctrine,” but the plural here would be obscure indeed.

¹⁴ 1Macc 2:51; 3:3; 9:10; 14:10, 29; 15:9; in all lands (1Chr 22:5), among the multitudes (Wis 8:10). The forest of cedars is the glory of Lebanon (Isa 35:1ff.; 60:13), Yahwh is the glory of Israel (Ps 3:4; 106:20; Jer 2:2); so also the ark (1Sam 4:22).

¹⁵ Ps 24:7-10; Isa 24:14; 26:10; 30:30. The glory of Yahweh “is above the heavens” (Ps 113:4); “great is the glory of Yahweh” (Ps 145:5, 11, 12); “Ascribe to Yahweh glory and power” (Ps 29:1-3, 9).

¹⁶ Isa 6:3; 59:19. Not only does God act for his glory (Isa 43:7; 48:11), but his faithful ones “tell of Yahweh’s glory to all the nations” (1Chr 16:24-28; Isa 42:12; 66:19; Ps 96:3, 7-8). Cf. H. Kittel, Die Herrlichkeit Gottes, Giessen, 1934; B. Stein, Der Begriff Kebod Jahwe, Emsdetten i. W., 1939; A. Plé, “La Gloire de Dieu,” in VSpir, n. 306, 1946, pp. 479–490; L. Brockington, “The Greek Translator of Isaiah and His Interest in δόξα,” in VT, 1951, pp. 23ff. P. Deseille, “Gloire de Dieu dans l’Ancien et le Nouveau Testament,” in Dict.spir., vol. 6, col. 422–436; J. Duplacy, “Gloire,” in Catholicisme, vol. 5, col. 47–54.

¹⁷ Isa 2:10, 19, 21; 4:2, 5; 40:1; cf. Bar 4:24—“The splendor of the Eternal.”

¹⁸ Isa 12:2; 35:1-4; 44:23; 46:13; Ezek 39:21-29.

¹⁹ Exod 16:10; Lev 9:6, 23; Num 14:10; 16:19; 17:7; 20:6.

²⁰ Num 12:8 (Hebrew temûnâh); Ps 17:15; cf. Ezek 1:28—“the vision of the surrounding brightness was the vision of the image of the glory of Yahweh. I saw and fell on my face.” In this epigram from Gofna, on the tomb of an old woman: εἰ—κόνα δόξης (GVI, n. 1185, 3).

²¹ Exod 16:7—“You shall see the glory of Yahweh” (who will save you); Exod 33:18-22: Moses asks, “Let me see your glory,” and God answers, “I will make all my goodness pass before you”; Deut 5:24—“Yahweh our God made us see his glory and his greatness”; Tob 13:16; Isa 40:5; 60:2; 66:18; Ezek 3:23; Ps 63:2—“I beheld your power and your glory”; 97:6; Sir 17:13; 42:25; 49:8.

²² Cf. Ezek 1:3; 2:2; 11:24; 2Cor 3:7; John 1:14—“We have contemplated his glory, glory like that belonging to a Father’s only Son”; 2:11—“He manifested his glory, and his disciples believed in him.” This doxa, which fills the earth (Isa 6:3; Ps 72:19) and the heavens (Ps 8:2; 19:2; 24:7), is manifested especially in the temple (1Kgs 8:11; Ps 26:8; 2Chr 5:13-14; 7:1-3; Isa 6:1; Ezek 10:4, 18; 43:4-5).

²³ Cf. Pap.Graec.Mag. 13, 189: τὴν δόξαν τοῦ φωτός; 298ff. Cf. C. Mohrmann, “Note sur doxa,” in Sprachgeschichte und Wortbedeutung: Festschrift A. Debrunner, Bern, 1954, pp. 321–328.

²⁴ Ep. Arist. 96, 98; or dazzling (196); the other occurrences have to do with reputation (3, 37, 226, 234, 242, 269, 283), honor (39, 45), dignity (218, 282, 290). Among all, kings are illustrious and glorious (79, 223, 224).

²⁵ Ψευδὴς δόξα, Cherub. 9, 66, 71; Post. Cain 52; Drunkenness 70, 76, 162; Unchang. God 172; Conf. Tongues 106; Heir 71; Dreams 1.218; Joseph 147; Spec. Laws 1.59; 4.53, 188.

²⁶ Κενὰ δόξαι, Unchang. God 172; Husbandry 56; Drunkenness 36, 38, 144; Sobr. 57; Migr. Abr. 21; Prelim. Stud. 6, 15; Flight 47, 128; Change of Names 92–94; Dreams 1.82; 2.95, 155; Decalogue 4; Spec. Laws 1.27; Good Man Free 66, 158; Contemp. Life 17.

²⁷ Alleg. Interp. 2.56–57; Cherub. 83; Post. Cain 13; Joseph 59; Spec. Laws 2.244; 3.164; 4.71; Rewards 28; To Gaius 279.

²⁸ Cf. Post. Cain 34; Giants 39, 62; Sobr. 67; Migr. Abr. 184; Heir 169; Abraham 70; Decalogue 65; Spec. Laws 1.328; Virtues 65, 214; Rewards 162; Good Man Free 3; Etern. World 7, 12, 47. The religious meaning is found only in the quotation of Exod 33:18 (Spec. Laws 1.45). There is a single instance in Josephus also (Ant. 1.155).

²⁹ Philo, Creation 79; Alleg. Interp. 1.75; 3.86; Cherub. 117; Worse Attacks Better 33, 122, 136, 157; Post. Cain 112, 117; Giants 15; Drunkenness 52, 57, 75; Sobr. 3, 61; Conf. Tongues 112; Prelim. Stud. 27; Flight 25, 33, 35, 39; Abraham 184; Moses 2.53; Decalogue 153; Spec. Laws 1.311; 2.208; 3.1.

³⁰ War 1.375; 2.154, 160; 4.288; 6.264; Ant. 2.286; 4.147; etc. (δόξαν παρασκευή—ν, cf. PSI 1422, 6), the doctrine of the philosophers (Ag. Apion 1.165; 2.169) and religious belief (2.179, 221, 224, 239, 254–256, 258).

³¹ War 1.108, 331; 3.358; 6.260, 267, 442; Ant. 1.2, 165, 275, 280; 2.78; 5.290, 351; 7.44, 52 (20.205; Life 193, 274); Ant. 8.43; 10.59, 272; 11.158; 12.350; 13.63; 17.226; etc. There is the glory of the Olympic games (War 1.426), of a victory (4.372; 5.498; Ant. 7.304; 8.24), of a success (Ant. 5.267; 12.49), of domination (2.175; 7.195), of past glories (1.121).

³² Ant. 2.205; 6.18, 80, 343; 8.196; 9.16; 10.264, 268; 11.121; 12.160; 18.297; 19.211; cf. δόξα καὶ τιμή, 2.268; 6.200; 10.266; 11.217; 12.118.

³³ Cf. Luke 2:32 (relying on Isa 42:6; 49:6): the Messiah is a “light (φω—ς) to lighten the nations, and the glory (δόξαν, honor and repute) of your people Israel.” Cf. Acts 22:11, Saul on the Damascus road: “I could not see because of the brilliance of that light” (ἀπὸ τῆς δόξης τοῦ φωτὸς ἐ—κείνου).

³⁴ —Οφθέντες ἐ—ν δόξῃ, Luke 9:31. Cf. H. Riesenfeld, Jésus transfiguré, Copenhagen, 1947; A. M. Ramsey, La Gloire de Dieu et la Transfiguration du Christ, Paris, 1965.

³⁵ Matt 16:27 (Mark 8:38; Luke 9:26); 19:28; 24:30 (Mark 13:26; Luke 21:27); 25:31.

³⁶ Luke 2:9 (περιλάμπω = shine about, illumine); like a shining garment. This Semitism appears in Acts 7:2—“the God of glory appeared to our father Abraham” (ὁ θεὸς τῆς δόξης ὤφθη). This brilliant light is characteristic of God (Ps 24:7, 9; 29:3; with the article) and shines out from God (M. Black, “The Recovery of the Language of Jesus,” in NTS, vol. 3, 1957, p. 312); Acts 7:55—Stephen, “his eyes fixed on heaven, saw God’s glory” (Exod 16:7; 24:17; Ezek 8:4; 43:2).

³⁷ Luke 2:14; there is no article and no verb; the style is lapidary (cf. E. Delebecque, Etudes grecques, pp. 25–38; cf. C. Westermann, “Alttestamentliche Elemente in Lukas II, 1–20,” in Tradition und Glaube: Festgabe K. G. Kuhn, Göttingen, 1971, pp. 317–327). On Palm Sunday, the crowd acclaimed the Messiah: “Glory in the highest” (Luke 19:38). After the healing of the ten lepers, “No one was found to return and give glory to (= thank) God except this foreigner” (Luke 17:18). Herod Agrippa, having uttered sacrilegious words and usurped God’s glory, is struck dead “because he did not give the glory to God” (Acts 12:23; cf. Rev 19:7).

³⁸ 1Thess 2:6—“We have not sought glory from people”; 2:20—“You are our glory and our joy”; Eph 3:13—“The trials that I endure for you are your glory”; the apostle commends himself in his ministry “in the midst of glory and dishonor” (διὰ δόξης καὶ ἀτιμίας, “scorn, shame,” 2Cor 6:8); “Their god is their belly, and their glory is in their shame” (ἡ δόξα ἐ—ν τῇ αἰ—σχύνῃ αὐτῶ—ν, Phil 3:19); “it is sown in shame, it is raised in glory” (the resurrection, 1Cor 15:43); “Jesus Christ will transform our body of misery (ταπεινώσεως), conforming it to his glorious body” (Phil 3:21). Cf. M. Carrey, De la souffrance à la gloire: La Doxa dans la pensée paulinienne, Neuchâtel, 1964; H. Schlier, “La Notion de doxa dans l’histoire du salut d’après S. Paul,” in Essais sur le Nouveau Testament, Paris, 1968, pp. 379–412.

³⁹ 1Cor 11:15 (for the textual criticism, cf. G. Zuntz, in RB, 1952, p. 15); cf. 1Pet 1:24—“All flesh is like grass, and its glory like a flower of grass” (= Isa 40:6); F. W. Danker, “I Petr. I, 24–II, 7: A Consolatory Pericope,” in ZNW, 1967, pp. 93–102.

⁴⁰ Rom 2:7, 10; 1Pet 1:7—“Let your faith . . . be found worthy of praise and glory and honor (ἔπαινον καὶ δόξαν καὶ τιμὴν) at the revealing of Jesus Christ.”

⁴¹ 1Cor 15:40-41: “the brilliance (doxa) of heavenly bodies is different from the brilliance of earthly bodies; there is the brilliance of the sun, and the brilliance of the moon, and the brilliance of the stars, for one star differs from another in its brilliance”; cf. Aratus, Phaen. 454; Philodemus of Gadara, Inf. 9.36; C. Mugler, Terminologie optique, pp. 191ff., 352ff.

⁴² 2Cor 3:7-11 (cf. S. Schulz, “Die Decke des Moses,” in ZNW, 1958, pp. 1–30; R. Le Déaut, “Traditions targumiques dans le Corpus Paulinien,” in Bib, 1961, pp. 43–47).

⁴³ 2Cor 4:6 (cf. C. M. Martini, “Alcuni temi letterari di II Cor. IV, 6 e i racconti della conversione de San Paolo negli Atti,” in AnBib 17, Rome, 1963, pp. 461–474; G.W. MacRae, “Anti-Dualist Polemic in II Cor. IV, 6?” in F. L. Cross, SE, vol. 4, Berlin, 1968, pp. 420–431); cf. 2Cor 4:4—“the illumination of the gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God” (τὸ φωτισμὸν τοῦ εὐαγγελίου τῆς δόξης τοῦ Χριστοῦ); 1Tim 1:11—“the gospel of the glory of the blessed God, which was entrusted to me personally,” an evocation of the transcendent character of the revealed message, the manifestation of divine power: the epiphany of the Son of God, the Savior. Cf. 2Cor 7:23—the emissaries of the churches “are the glory of Christ.”

⁴⁴ 1Cor 11:7 (Gen 1:26; 2:18-23); cf. the tomb inscription, “[here lies one who was] the glory of Sophronius, blessed Lucilla” (ἡ δόξα Σωφρονίου Λουκίλλα εὐλογημένη, CII 135). Cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, p. 130, n. 7; 690, n. 4; A. Feuillet, “L’Homme ‘gloire de Dieu’ et la femme ‘gloire de l’homme,’” in RB, 1974, pp. 161–182; idem, “La Dignité et le rôle de la femme,” in NTS, vol. 21, 1975, pp. 159ff. S. V. McCasland, “‘The Image of God,’ according to Paul,” in JBL, 1950, pp. 85ff. E. E. Ellis, Paul’s Use of the Old Testament, London, 1957, p. 63; P. Grelot, Le Couple humain dans l’Ecriture, Paris, 1962; K. Stendahl, The Bible and the Role of Women, Philadelphia, 1966.

⁴⁵ Cf. Job 19:9—“He has stripped me of my glory”; Bar 5:1—“Put on forever the beauty and glory of God,” 4 Ezra 7:122–125; 2Apoc. Bar. 51.1,

3; 54.15; cf. 2Thess 1:9—the condemned are “separated from the Lord’s presence and from the glory of his might.” According to rabbinic theology, the first man, created shining with splendor, shared in the divine kabôd; he lost this privilege through sin. Glory is one of the six things that were taken from Adam and will be restored to humanity by the Messiah (Gen. Rab. 12.5; Exod. Rab. 30.2; Num. Rab. 13.11, on Num 7:13; cf. b. Sanh. 38b). Naked, Adam and Eve were clothed with light; sin deprived them of this garment. After eating the forbidden fruit, Eve saw that she had lost the righteousness that had enveloped her and reproached the serpent thus: “Why did you do this? You have robbed me of the glory in which I was clothed” (Adam and Eve 20.1–2). Cf. P. Bonnetain, “Grâce,” in DBSup, vol. 3, col. 775–776; J. B. Frey, “L’État originel et la chute de l’homme d’après les conceptions juives au temps de Jésus-Christ,” in RSPT, 1911, p. 554; W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism, London, 1948, pp. 45ff.; L. Ligier, Péché d’Adam et péché du monde, Paris, 1961, pp. 209–210, 245.

⁴⁶ Rom 1:23; cf. N. Hyldahl, “A Reminiscence of the Old Testament at Romans I, 23,” in NTS, vol. 2, 1956, pp. 285–288; M. D. Hooker, “Adam in Romans I,” NTS, vol. 6, 1960, pp. 297–306.

⁴⁷ Eph 1:18—ὁ πλοῦτος τῆς δόξης; 3:16; Phil 4:19; Col. 1:27; Rom 9:23; 2Thess 1:9—τῆς δόξης τῆς ἰσχύος αὐτοῦ; Col. 1:11—τὸ κράτος τῆς δόξης. God has called us ἰδία δόξη καὶ ἀρετῇ (2Pet 1:3). Cf. L. Cerfaux, Théologie de l’Eglise suivant saint Paul, Paris, 1965, p. 35ff., 78, 309ff. Christ, who was raised by the glory of his Father (Rom 6:4), acts to secure the glory of God (15:7), which is manifested through his word, his truth, his faithfulness (3:7). This glory, which appeared on Tabor, is described as “magnificent” or “majestic” (2Pet 1:17).

⁴⁸ Eph 1:17; P. Benoit in the Bible de Jérusalem comments: “that is to say, who possesses in fullness and causes to shine on his elect (verse 18) this brilliant splendor of ‘glory’ in which all the wealth of the divine essence is expressed.” The formula is probably liturgical and of priestly origin (M. Barth, Ephesians, vol. 1, p. 148); cf. “God of glory” (Ps 29:3; Acts 7:2), “king of glory” (Ps 24:7), “Lord of glory” (1Cor 2:8); “Father of mercies” (2Cor 1:3), “Father of lights” (Jas 1:17).

⁴⁹ 1Cor 2:8; Jas 2:1. Here kyrios is a title of supremacy and even of divinity. Cf. Heb 2:7—“You crowned him with glory and honor” (δόξη καὶ τιμῇ, quoting Ps 8:5–7: a lordly crown; cf. F. J. Moloney, “The Re-interpretation of Psalm VIII and the Son of Man Debate,” in NTS, vol. 27, 1981, pp. 656–672); everything is put under the Messiah’s feet (cf. P. Grelot, Sens chrétien de l’Ancien Testament, Paris-Tournai, 1962, p. 473; W.H. Schmidt, “Gott und Mensch in Ps. 8,” in TZ, 1969, pp. 1–15). Christ’s glory is superior to that of Moses (πλείονος δόξης), for the builder of a house is more worthy of honor than the house itself (Heb 3:3).

⁵⁰ Heb 1:3 is reminiscent of Wis 7:25–26 (cf. Philo, Plant. 50; Dreams 1.72; Spec. Laws 4.123). —Απαυγάζω = shine out, emit rays of light and perceive emitted rays; ἀπαυγασμός = shining, rays of light (C. Mugler, Terminologie optique, p. 43). In its choice of the word ἀπαύγασμα, Hebrews suggests rays of light emanating from a bright fire, with the idea of splendor, magnificence, beauty: the brilliance of Majesty. Hence, in the passive sense: refulgence, defined by Littré: “the great brilliance formed by the expansion, the reflection of light,” perceptible by mortals.

⁵¹ 1Pet 1:11—the Holy Spirit attested in advance through the prophets “the sufferings in store for the Christ and the glories that would follow” (τὰς μετὰ ταῦτα δόξας); the plural suggests the multiplicity and the greatness of the glorious events following the passion: resurrection, appearances, ascension, session “at the right hand of the Majesty on high” (Heb 1:3; 1Pet 3:22). The object of Christian faith is God’s having raised Christ from the dead and having given him glory (1Pet 1:21; cf. Acts 3:13). At the ascension, Christ was received up (ἀνελήμφθη ε—ν δόξει, 1Tim 3:16). This triumph is not only a transfer to another location, nor the acquisition of almighty exousia, but a close communion with God (C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, vol. 1, p. 474; J. Coppens, “La Glorification céleste du Christ dans la théologie néotestamentaire,” in E. Dhanis, Resurrexit, Vatican City, 1974, pp. 31–55).

⁵² Titus 2:13 (C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, vol. 1, p. 640; M. J. Harris, “Titus II, 13 and the Deity of Christ,” in D. A. Hagner, M. J. Harris, Pauline Studies: Essays Presented to Professor F. F. Bruce, Exeter, 1980, pp. 262–277); M. E. Boismard, “Notre glorification dans le Christ d’après saint Paul,” in VSpir, 1946, pp. 502–517); 1Pet 4:13.

⁵³ 2Cor 3:18 (J. Dupont, “Le chrétien miroir de la grâce divine d’après II Cor. III, 18,” in RB, 1949, pp. 392–411. N. Hugedé, La Métaphore du miroir dans les épîtres de saint Paul aux Corinthiens, Neuchâtel-Paris, 1957; C. Mugler, Terminologie optique, p. 221; C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, vol. 1, pp. 130, 741); Col 1:27—“Christ in you, the hope of glory.” This immanent spiritual metamorphosis is progressive and will not be “manifest” until the final eschatological glory, of which it is actually the firstfruits and an anticipation. It is also the work of the “Spirit of glory” (1Pet 4:14), so designated because he procures the heavenly glory. For the textual criticism of this text, cf. K. Aland, Die alten Übersetzungen des Neuen Testaments, Berlin, 1972, p. 100.

⁵⁴ Col 3:4. We can translate ε—ν δόξῃ “full of glory” (P. Benoit) or “with glory” (C. Masson) or “in glory” (E. Osty). What is certain is that this will be in Christ’s glory (cf. Phil 3:21), that which surrounds the Lord at the Parousia (1Pet 5:1).

⁵⁵ 1Pet 5:4. The crown is the emblem of royalty, or conquerors, or of victors, a symbol of power, success, prosperity, and virtue, cf. J. Köchling, De Coronarum apud Antiquos Vi atque Usu, Giessen, 1914; C. Spicq, Épîtres de saint Pierre, p. 169.

⁵⁶ 2Cor 4:15 (B. Noak, “A Note on II Cor IV, 15,” in ST, 1963, pp. 129–132); cf. John 9:24—Δὸς δόξαν τω— θεω— (cf. Jos 7:19; 1Sam 6:5; Jer 13:16).

⁵⁷ Eph 1:6, 12, 14. Cf. A. M. Ramsey, La Gloire de Dieu et la Transfiguration du Christ, pp. 111–122; F. Dreyfus, “Pour la louange de sa gloire (Eph. I, 13, 14): L’Origine Vétéro-Testamentaire da la formule,” in L. de Lorenzi, Paul de Tarse apôtre de notre temps, Rome, 1979, pp. 233–248; D. Cohn-Sherbok, “A Jewish Note on τὸ ποτήριον τῆς εὐλογίας,” in NTS, vol. 27, 1981, pp. 704–709.

⁵⁸ Rom 11:36; 16:27—“To God be the glory for ever and ever”; Gal 1:5; Eph 3:21; Phil 4:20; 1Tim 1:17—“To the King of the ages, incorruptible, invisible, the only God, be honor and glory for ever and ever”; 2Tim 4:18; Jude 24—“To the one who is able to preserve you from stumbling and establish you spotless before his glory (his majesty and holiness) with joy”; the whole heavenly court acclaims God (Rev 4:9, 11; 7:12; 19:1). Cf. C. Spicq, Épîtres Pastorales, pp. 346ff.; A. Solignac, “Honneur de Dieu,” in Dict.spir., vol. 7, 704ff.; R. Deichgräber, Gotteshymnus und Christushymnus, Göttingen, 1967. Christian tomb inscriptions usually formulate their doxologies to the glory of the Trinity, SB 6035, 21; 7429, 19; 7430, 18; 7432, 21; 8235, 2; 8728, 23; 8765, 21; cf. O.Bodl. 415, 7; 2164, 8. Cf. E. C. E. Owen, “Δόξα and Cognate Words,” in JTS, 1932, pp. 132–150; M. Steinheimer, Die Δόξα τοῦ θεοῦ in der römischen Liturgie, Munich, 1951.

⁵⁹ Heb 13:21; 1Pet 4:11; 2Pet 3:18; Jude 25: “To the only God our Savior, through Jesus Christ our Lord, be glory, majesty, dominion, and power before all ages and now and for all ages”; Rev 1:6; 5:12-13. IGLS 2108: “To the glory of Christ our God”; 2157.

⁶⁰ John 5:41, 42; 7:18; 8:50; 12:43.

⁶¹ John 4:34; 5:30; 6:38; 7:16; 12:49; 14:24. St. John's Christ is a "divine, incarnate being who is always in the guise of a revealer," seen by his disciples; his Gospel is a revelation discourse, and this revelation is essentially that of the doxa that belongs to God (A. J. Festugière, Observations stylistiques sur l'Évangile de saint Jean, Paris, 1974, pp. 9ff.; B. Botte, "La Gloire du Christ dans l'Évangile de saint Jean," in Les Questions liturgiques et paroissiales, vol. 12, 1927, pp. 65–76; W. Thüsing, Die Erhöhung und Verherrlichung Jesu im Johannesevangelium, Münster, 1960; G. B. Caird, "The Glory of God in the Fourth Gospel," in NTS, vol. 15, 1969, pp. 265–277).

⁶² Glory is often linked to dwelling (Hebrew shajan, σκηνή; Num 35:34; Ps 85:10; Sir 24:8; Ezek 43:7). In addition, in Revelation the temple was filled with smoke because of God's glory and power (15:8); thus it was inaccessible; and the heavenly Jerusalem has within it the glory of God (his presence, his dwelling), and its brilliance is splendid like that of a precious stone (21:11). This divine glory illuminates the city (ε—φώτισεν αὐτήν) and its light is the Lamb (21:23); the nations come to it as pilgrims (vv. 24, 26); cf. the earth illuminated by the glory of the angel (18:1).

⁶³ —Ἐθεασάμεθα τὴν δόξαν αὐτοῦ, δόξαν ὡς μονογενοῦς παρὰ πατρός; John 1:14 (cf. A. Feuillet, Le Prologue du Quatrième Évangile, Paris, 1968; T. C. de Kruijf, "The Glory of the Only Son," in Studies in John Presented to Professor Dr J. N. Sevenster, Leiden, 1970, pp. 111–123). John 12:41—"Isaiah (6:1-5) saw Christ's glory and spoke concerning him." This can mean only Christ's glory before the Incarnation (1Cor 10:4), hence as God.

⁶⁴ εἶδομαι, see with the eyes of the body (1:32, 38; 4:36; 6:5; 11:45; 1John 1:1; 4:12, 14); but this verb can also suggest spiritual perception, for divine realities are not the object of physical sight. Nevertheless, the "Word made flesh" is revealed to the senses, at least in part; his divine power and splendor, veiled by the flesh, are perceptible to those who believe; cf. τοι—ς πιστεύουσιν, 1:12.

⁶⁵ Ὡς is not comparative, but here means "in the capacity of"; παρὰ πατρός is to be connected to δόξαν, not to μονογενοῦς. This doxa of the Son belongs to the historical Christ as well as to the Word, since he is the same Person.

⁶⁶ Σημει—α. These signs lead to faith and are revelatory; they must lead to the Son of God and elicit a decision (John 20:30-31); cf. J. P. Charlier, "La Notion de signe (sèmeion) dans le IVe Évangile," in RSPT, 1959, pp. 434–448; D. Mollat, "Le Semeion johannique," in Sacra Pagina, Paris-Gembloux, 1959, vol. 2, pp. 209–218; W. Nicol, The Semeia in the Fourth

Gospel, Leiden, 1972; L. Erdozáin, La función del signo en la fe según el cuarto Evangelio, Rome, 1968; S. S. Smalley, "The Sign in John 21," in NTS 20, 1974, pp. 275–288; X. Léon-Dufour, "Autour du semeion johannique," in Die Kirche des Anfangs, for H. Schürmann, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna, 1978, pp. 363–378; cf. H. C. Youtie, Scriptiunculae, "σημεῖον in the Papyri," in ZPE, vol. 6, 1970, pp. 105–116, 245ff.

⁶⁷ Cf. John 11:4—"This illness is not unto death, but it is for the glory of God (a brilliant manifestation of his power), so that through it the Son of God (the performer of the miracle and sharer in the divine power) might be glorified"; 11:40—"If you believe, you will see God's glory," the brilliant triumph of the divine omnipotence over death and corruption (verse 39); ὁράω is always used for a spiritual vision of heavenly realities (1:51). Martha's faith would enable her to see in the miracle the power of God made manifest in Christ.

⁶⁸ Cf. John 11:14; 17:10. The one glorified is glorified through an intermediary (instrument), in (ε—ν), through (διὰ) another: the man is glorified in the woman (1Cor 11:7), God in his creatures, the Father in the Son (John 14:13; Heb 1:3) and in Christians (John 15:8). The basis of this glorification appears to consist in this: the object that is manifested/seen/praised is taken for what it is, in its essence, but in its essence as an act of visibility, i.e., insofar as it is light (Eph 5:13-14). In the case of an intermediary, when A is glorified in B it is because B participates in A. In so participating, B manifests A to one who sees and praises, because the presence of a cause in its effect, of a principle in that which proceeds from it, manifests this cause or this principle and thus glorifies it; "Omne quod est ab alio, manifestat id a quo est" (St. Thomas Aquinas, In Jo. 16.14).

⁶⁹ John 17:1 (G. Ferraro, "L' 'hora' della glorificazione del Figlio dell'uomo," in Aloisiana, vol. 10, Rome 1974, pp. 178–201); cf. 13:31—when Judas went out, Jesus said, "Now the Son of Man has been glorified, and God has been glorified in him" (the aorist ε—δοξάσθη is a prophetic anticipation of the future; the Savior's victory over sin, death, and Satan would be completed in heavenly triumph; or better, the hour of death is already the hour of glory, that of the elevation on the cross and the exaltation/manifestation of the exousia of Jesus); 13:32—"If God has been glorified in him, God will also glorify him in them, and he will glorify him soon," not only in a brilliant manner, in a sovereign and final state, but in accepting him into his intimacy (ε—ν ἀντὼς, the glorification fulfilled in God himself, in his presence or pouring out into the Father's bosom); 17:5—"Now, O Father, glorify me with the glory that I had with you before the world was." This is no longer only the heavenly glory that followed the passion, but the specifically divine glory whereby the Son manifests the Father in an original fashion, the glory that Jesus had before the incarnation (1:1); it is the glory of the Son as the second person of the Trinity (παρὰ σοί), God's personal glory. This points to the identity of nature and the equality of the Father and the Son, who are "consubstantial." A. Laurentin (Doxa, Paris, 1972, 2 vols.) has collected nearly 400 texts from Greek, Latin, Syriac, and Armenian authors from the second through the thirteenth centuries that comment on John 17:5.

⁷⁰ In Revelation, "giving glory to God" means being converted to worship him, recognizing him as the only God, 11:13; 14:7; 16:9; 19:7.

⁷¹ Plato, Grg. 461 b: "Is that your real opinion?"; Tim. 46 d: "most think that . . ."; Resp. 1.327 c: "You do not think amiss"; Tht. 189 c; 201 c; Thucydides 1.120.5: "The formation of opinions is carried out in safety"; Philo, Creation 19: "one must think that . . ."; Alleg. Interp. 3.35; Sacr. Abel and Cain 95; Etern. World 106; Post. Cain 25: the fool "has different opinions at different times on the same topics"; Unchang. God 21: "professing such opinions"; Dreams 1.91, 185. Josephus, Ant. 10.281: "If a person wants to judge otherwise. . . ." The nuance "picture to oneself, imagine, suppose" is common; Plato, Resp. 2.363 e: "they pass for wicked"; Aeschylus, Cho. 844: "Am I to imagine that what I am told is truthful and real?"; Ag. 673: "we think his fate will be the same"; Suppl. 60: "he will think that he is hearing the voice of Tereus's wife"; Euripides, Supp. 1043: "she must be found here, I suppose"; Philo, Cherub. 37: "if you imagine such things with regard to us"; 69; Josephus, Ant. 4.49: "godless imaginings"; Ag. Apion 1.225: "these altogether impudent and foolish men . . . were used to false ideas concerning the gods."

⁷² Diodorus Siculus 16.82: Cephalus of Corinth, "celebrated for his knowledge and judgment"; Thucydides 3.45.6: "each one thought too highly of himself"; Josephus, Ant. 1.160: "Abram's name is still celebrated in the region of Damascus"; 4.183: "make yourselves more glorious than the foreign races." This author never gives a religious meaning to the verb δοξάζω; nor does Philo, who only uses it with this meaning in quoting Exod 15:1, 21 (Husbandry 82; Dreams 2.269). On the other hand, although they are late, the magical papyri; Moulton-Milligan cite P.Lond. 121, 502 (third century AD): Κυρία ΘΙσις . . . δόξασόν μοι (l. με), ὡς ε—δόξασα τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ υι—οῦ σου Ὡρου; Dittenberger, Or. 168, 56: ε—ν —Ελεφαντίνη δεδοξασμένου ἔτι ε—ξ ἀρχαίων (= SB 8883, 56; C.Ord.Ptol. 58, 10; second century BC). Cf. P.Oxy. 924, 13: ἵνα τὸ ὄνομά σου ἦ διὰ παντὸς δεδοξασμένον; 1874, 14 (Christian letter of condolence, sixth century): "We glorify God, because he has taken back that which he gave."

⁷³ Sir 3:4, 6, 10; 7:27, 31; 10:24, 30; 44:7; 46:2, 12; 48:4; 49:16; Prov 13:18; Mal 1:6; 1Macc 2:18, 64; 5:63; 10:65, 68; 11:42, 51; 14:39. Cf. Esth 3:1—King Xerxes honored Haman (elevating him in dignity); 6:6, 7, 9, 11.

⁷⁴ Lev 10:3 (niph'al of kabed); Isa 44:23; 49:3; 55:5; 60:7, 13: "I will give splendor to the house of my majesty"; 66:5; Ezek 39:13; 1Macc 14:15; 2Macc 3:2.

⁷⁵ Cf. Moses' face, shining after he has spoken with God (Exod 34:29, 30, 35). God honors those who fear him (Ps 15:4); "You have glorified us after calling us" (Wis 18:8; 19:22; Sir 3:2; 24:12). Cf. Isa 52:13—"My Servant will be raised and lifted up and exalted on high."

⁷⁶ Isa 5:16; 24:23; 25:1; 33:10; 42:10; Ps 22:13—"I will praise you in the midst of the congregation" (Sir 35:7; 43:28, 30); 50:15—"I will save you and you will honor me" (v. 23; Isa 43:23); 86:9, 12; Sir 3:20—"The Lord is glorified by the humble"; Dan 4:31 (Theodotion): "I praised and glorified the one who lives eternally"; verse 34. Cf. Judg 9:9—the oil with which gods and men are honored; 13:17; 1Sam 2:29-30; 15:30.

⁷⁷ Matt 6:2—the hypocrites do alms to be praised by people; Luke 4:15—Jesus is acclaimed for his teaching; 1Cor 12:26—when one member is honored, the other members rejoice; Heb 5:5—Christ did not arrogate to himself the honor of the high priestly office; Rev 18:7—however exalted and vaunted Babylon is, so much torture and grief shall she receive.

⁷⁸ 2Cor 3:10—in comparison with the preeminent glory of the new covenant, the administration of the old was not attended with glory (its illumination was too partial and transitory); Rom 8:30—"those whom God has justified, he has also glorified" (aorist ε—δόξασεν, certain anticipation; cf. M. J. Lagrange); 11:13—"I do honor to my ministry"; 1Pet 1:8—loving Christ, believers experience an ineffable and glorified (δεδοξασμένη) glory of the same sort as that experienced by the blessed, for it comes from the divine agape and is infused by the Holy Spirit (Rom 5:5; Gal 5:22; cf. 1John 4:7).

⁷⁹ Matt 9:8 (Mark 2:12; Luke 5:25-26); Matt 15:31; Luke 2:20; Rom 1:21—the heathen did not return to God the glory or thanksgiving that was his due; 1Pet 2:12; Rev 15:4—"Who, O Lord, could fail to glorify your name?"

⁸⁰ Luke 7:16; 13:13; 17:15; 18:43. The feeling of the divine presence (23:47); the gift of grace (Acts 11:18), the fruits of the apostolic ministry (3:13; 4:21; 15:48; 21:20; Rom 15:9; Gal 1:24), works of brotherly love (2Cor 9:13), faithfulness to Christ in persecutions (1Pet 4:16) are so many signs of God's action and cause him to be glorified.

81 Rom 15:6—"so that with one heart and one mouth you may glorify the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ"; 2Thess 3:1—"Pray for us, that the word of the Lord may complete its course and be glorified," i.e., may manifest its power to convert and be received with joy, drawing adoration from those converted. According to B. Rigaux (on this text), this is an instance of hendiadys: "'run gloriously' means 'successfully, triumphing over opposition.'"

82 With the exception of John 21:29, where it is said that Peter's death would glorify God, providing a witness to the Christian faith.

83 John 8:54—"It is my Father who glorifies me," by miracles that demonstrate that Jesus shares in the Father's power (11:4), especially in the passion and the resurrection (12:28; 13:31-32; 14:13); cf. Acts 3:13—"the God of our Fathers glorified his servant Jesus" by all the miracles that manifested his messiahship.

84 Unknown in Philo, the papyri, the lexicons (Hesychius, Phrynichus, Julius Pollux). J. J. Wettstein gives no references at all.

85 Διὸ ἐ-ν ται-ς καθάρσεσι τὸ μὲν μὴ συνδοξάζειν τῷ- σώματι, ἀλλὰ μόνην ἐ-νεργει-ς, ὑφίστησι τὸ φρονει-ν (in Stobaeus, Flor. 1.123; vol. 3, p. 91, 2-3).

86 Aorist passive subjunctive συνδοξασθω-μεν. Peace having returned to Antioch, thanks to the prayers of the church, Ignatius asks the Christians of Smyrna "to send one of your people . . . to celebrate with them (ἵνα συνδοξάσῃ) the calm that has been restored to than thanks to God" (Ign. Smyrn. 11.3).

δοῦλος, οἰ-κέτης, οἰ-κει-ος, μίσθιος, μισθωτός doulos, slave; oiketēs, slave or domestic servant; oikeios, family member; misthios, salaried domestic servant; misthotos, day laborer see also ὑπηρέτης, μισθός, μισθόομαι, μίσθωμα

doulos, S 1401; TDNT 2.261-279; EDNT 1.349-352; NIDNTT 3.592-597; MM 170; L&N 37.3, 87.76; BDF §162(5); BAGD 205 | oiketēs, S 3610; EDNT 2.495; MM 440; L&N 46.5; BAGD 557 | oikeios, S 3609; TDNT 5.134-135; EDNT 2.494; NIDNTT 2.247, 251; MM 440; L&N 10.11; BAGD

556 | misthios, S 3407; TDNT 4.695–728; EDNT 1.432; NIDNTT 3.138–139; MM 413; L&N 57.174; BAGD 523 | misthotos, S 3411; TDNT 4.695–728; EDNT 1.433; NIDNTT 3.138–139; MM 414; L&N 57.174; BAGD 523

It is wrong to translate doulos as “servant,” so obscuring its precise signification in the language of the first century. In the beginning, before it came to be used for slaves, doulos was an adjective meaning “unfree,” as opposed to eleutheros,¹ and this dichotomy remained basic in the first century: eite douloi, eite eleutheroi.² Gaius defines: “The principal legal distinction between persons is that of free and slave. Further, among free men, some are ingenuus, other are manumitted. The ingenii are those who are born free; the manumitted are those who are freed from servitude by a legal proceeding.”³

The word slave refers above all to a legal status, that of an object of property (Latin res mancipi). To be a slave is to be attached to a master (Greek despotes; Matt 13:27; Luke 14:21; 1Tim 6:1; Titus 2:9) by a link of subjection—you are the slave of that which dominates you (2Pet 2:19; cf. Rom 9:12). A slave is an article of personal property that one buys, sells, leases, gives, or bequeaths, that one can possess jointly;⁴ a slave can serve as a pledge or mortgage;⁵ is a res or a soma (male or female; Rev 18:13), is grouped with the animals⁶ as among those hypo zygon (under the yoke, 1Tim 6:1; cf. Gen 27:40; Lev 26:13; Deut 28:48; etc.); and this nuance of abjection is evoked by the morphe doulou of the Son of God Incarnate (Phil 2:7; cf. Matt 20:27). Given that Christians are bought and paid for by the Lord,⁷ St. Paul, the former rabbi, i.e., theologian-jurist or jurist-theologian, transposes this notion of servitude into the supernatural order, accentuating above all the nuance of the Lord’s radical seizure of the believer; the latter, being in submission to the discretionary will of his Master, becomes essentially a dependent individual. Furthermore, while only freemen and freedmen enjoy the right to tria nomina, the slave bears only a cognomen and is specified by the use of the genitive of his owner’s name,⁸ to which is often joined a title designating the job that he does for his master (oikonomos, dispensator, medicus, balnearius, etc.). So when St. Paul officially presents himself as “apostle, slave of Jesus Christ,” he proclaims that he belongs exclusively and totally not to any emperor here below but to the Lord of heaven and earth, who owns all rights to him; more precisely, he defines himself, his existence, his mission, all his activities, in terms of Christ, his master. In fact, if the slave is the object of a real right, the dominica potestas,⁹ then he himself has no legal status as a person,¹⁰ is entitled to no rights: “servile caput nullum jus habet” (Diogenes Laertius 17.32); it is the owner of the slaves who profits from their activity, who has the right to the fruit of their labor; their opera are his, just as the fruit of a tree belongs to the owner of the tree. Thus the master will gather the increase on his goods due to the industry of his douloi (Matt 25:14; cf. Luke 19:13), the apostle carrying out his ministry expects no salary (1Cor 9:16-17), and the douloi archeioi recognize that they are only slaves, whose only purpose in life is to carry out that which they are commanded to do;¹¹ doulos eis hypokoen (Rom 6:16).

If it is true that “slavery is an institution which has as its essential goal to make available to one person the activities of other persons,”¹² a link attaches the doulos to his function; the slave is a “worker”¹³ or a living tool (organon), and his most important role is carrying out his task to the profit of his master. This nuance can be seen in the declaration of the Virgin Mary—“behold the handmaid of the Lord” (idou he doule Kyriou)¹⁴; in the expression “his douloi the prophets” (Rev 10:7; 11:18; cf. 1:1; Acts 4:29; 16:17); in the texts in the Synoptics that evoke the deeds of slaves (Matt 13:28; 21:34; 22:3-4; 24:46; Luke 15:22; 17:7), “to each his own work” (hekasto to ergon autou, Matt 13:34); in the Pauline meaning of the verb douleuo—“complete a task, consecrate oneself to a work, devote oneself to a master” (Acts 20:19; Rom 6:6; 7:6, 25; 12:11; 14:18; 16:18; Gal 5:13; Col 3:24; Titus 3:2); and finally, in the ethic of servitude, urging Christian slaves not only to obey their master (Eph 6:5; Col 3:22; Titus 2:9), but to “serve” willingly (Eph 6:7; 1Tim 6:2).

Slaves are a very diverse lot, from laborers to philosophers, from farmers to physicians.¹⁵ In the imperial administration, the most capable could advance. The job of praegustator led to the post of tricliniarcha (CIL, XI, 3612, n. 10, 68), that of vestitor to procurator,¹⁶ etc. Even at the heart of the domestic setting there is a hierarchy: the master sets the faithful and prudent doulos over all his household (Matt 24:45, 47; Luke 12:41); this slave directs and oversees the subordinate personnel and can come to occupy the highest posts (Matt 28:23ff.). The ideal is liberation, and it is Christ who liberates slaves from sin,¹⁷ making each son of God an apeleutheros Kyriou (1Cor 7:22; cf. Jas 1:25; 2:12).

An oiketes is most often a slave as well,¹⁸ although in many texts it is not possible to say with certainty (Acts 10:7; P.Lund IV, 13, 4), and this term is sometimes substituted for doulos as being less dishonorable, as in this epitaph for an Ethiopian slave: “It is to the decurion Pallas, works superintendent of Antinoe, that the god led me as servant (oiketes) from the land of Ethiopia.”¹⁹ From its etymology (oikia), oiketes would be a “domestic” in the old sense of the word: one who tends to the house and is a part of the family (famulus), according to Philo’s definition—“the domestics (hoi oiketai) . . . are always with us and share our life; they prepare the bread, the drinks, and the dishes for their masters (tois despotais), they serve at table” (Spec. Laws 1.127). Oiketai are “people in service” (1Pet 2:18; cf. the collective oiketeia, Matt 24:45) including all the servants, male and female, free and slaves born in the household, in the service of the master of the house, from cooks and porters to stewards and tutors, but not directly agricultural or industrial workers.²⁰

The adjective oikeios used as a noun, however, only designates members of the same family: parents and close relatives.²¹ Eph 2:19 opposes this word to foreigners and aliens; 1Tim 5:8 places oikeioi among hoi idioi —“those of the household” are a closer group within “his own.”²² Gal 6:10 uses this term for participants in the same faith;²³ the papyri associate it with brother (BGU 1871, 4), son (SB 8416, 5), with friends;²⁴ as the object of philostorgia (P.Ant. 100, 2; cf. SB 7558, 35) and of “recommendation” to influential personages.²⁵

Among the domestics attached to a household, some are salaried (misthios, Sir 37:11); these workers, hired when there is work and discharged when they are no longer needed, are treated without consideration (Luke 15:17, 19); these are workers for hire²⁶ whose existence is tantamount to servitude (Job 7:1); but they can no more properly be called servants than can day workers who hire themselves out to some concern (Mark 1:20, misthotos), to tend a flock (John 10:12) or to till a field.²⁷ The emphasis is always on their compensation, and they accordingly have nothing in common with douloi. “The ergates (worker) has a right to his food” (Matt 10:10; 1Tim 5:18; cf. Jas 5:4).

¹ F. Gschnitzer, Studien zur griechischen Terminologie der Sklaverei, Wiesbaden, 1964, p. 6. The bibliography on slavery is copious. Apart from the articles in the dictionaries and encyclopedias, cf. J. J. Koopmans, De servitude antiqua et religione christiana capita selecta, Groningen, 1920; M. Lambertz, “Zur Etymologie von δούλος,” Glotta, vol. 6,1, pp. 1–18; W. L. Westermann, The Slave Systems of Greek and Roman Antiquity, Philadelphia, 1955; S. Lauffer, Die Bergwerkssklaven von Laureion, Wiesbaden, vol. 1–2, 1956–1957; M. I. Finley, Slavery in Classical Antiquity, Cambridge, 1960; idem, The Servile Statuses of Ancient Greece, in RIDA, 1960, pp. 165–189; G. Boulvert, Les Esclaves et les affranchis impériaux sous le haut-empire romain, 2 vols., Aix-en-Provence, 1964 (cites more than 3,000 inscriptions); L. Halkin, Les Esclaves publics chez les Romains, 2d ed., Rome 1965; C. Spicq, “Affranchissement juridique et liberté de grâce,” in Théologie morale, vol. 2, pp. 828–849; P. Petit, La Paix romaine, Paris, 1967, pp. 278, 374ff.; C. Schneider, Kulturgeschichte des Hellenismus, Munich, 1967, vol. 2, pp. 167ff.; P. Chantraine, Freigelassene und Sklaven im Dienst der römischen Kaiser, Wiesbaden, 1967; F. Kudlien, Die Sklaven in der griechischen Medizin der klassischen und hellenistischen Zeit, Wiesbaden, 1968; G. Ramming, Die Dienerschaft in der Odyssee, Erlangen, 1973; G. Boulvert, Domestique et fonctionnaire sous le haut-empire romain, Paris, 1974; Actes du Colloque 1972 sur l’Esclavage (Centre de Recherches d’Histoire ancienne, III), Paris, 1974.

² 1Cor 12:13; Gal 3:28; 4:22-31; Eph 6:8; Col 3:11; Rev 6:15; 13:16; 19:18 (adding the Jewish distinction, small and great; cf. Heb 8:11). C.P.Herm. 18, 5: δοῦλος εἶ ἢ ἐλεύθερος; IGLS 51, 46; the opposition δουλεία—ἐλευθερία (Rom 6:18-22; 8:21; 1Cor 7:21-22; 9:19; Gal 5:1; 2Pet 2:16, 19; Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 26; Abraham 251; Good Man Free 136, 139; Josephus, War 7.336). On the analogy of the relationships slave-Lord, disciple-Master, cf. Matt 6:24; 10:24-25; 18:27; 24:45-50; 25:14-30; Luke 12:37-47; John 13:16; 15:20 (slavery in Israel, cf. R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel, vol. 1, pp. 80–90).

³ Gaius, Inst. 1.9–11; cf. BGU 1730, 14; R. Taubenschlag, Law of Greco-Roman Egypt, pp. 50ff., 73ff.; Opera Minora, vol. 1, pp. 11ff., 105ff., 332ff., 601ff.

⁴ Matt 6:24; Acts 16:16 (τοι—ς κυρίοις); cf. m. Git. 4.5 (43a); b. Īag. 4a. Around AD 100, a slave belongs in common to three brothers (F. Durrbach, Choix d'Inscriptions de Délos, Paris, 1921, p. 213); a slave is shared between five owners (Stud.Pal. XXII, 43); in the third century a slave belongs in common to a brother and a sister, coming from the father's estate, which remains undivided (P.Oxy. 1030, 5–6; cf. 716, 722; BGU 1581; PSI 1115, 1589; cf. I. Biezunska-Malowist, "Les Esclaves en copropriété dans l'Égypte gréco-romaine," in Aeg, 1968, pp. 116–129). But, on the psychological level, Euboulos had already formulated the axiom of Matt 6:24—ἀμφίδουλος = οὐδαμόθεν οὐδεῖς, the slave of two masters is at any given moment no one's slave (cf. J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 2, p. 120).

⁵ A debtor agrees not to dispose of or encumber in any way a slave supplied as ὑπάλλαγμα until the debt is paid (BGU 1147; cf. Jur.Pap. 45, 28).

⁶ An inscription of Baetocaece: "Let slaves, cattle (ἀνδράποδα δὲ καὶ τετράποδα), and the other animals be sold on these sites, free of any tax or exaction or complaint" (IGLS, 4028, 37–39 = Dittenberger, Or. 262). Doulos is the term for the defeated bird in a cockfight: "I am a slave bird. — Were you bested by some cock?" (Aristophanes, Av. 70–71; cf. Vesp. 1490); P.Oxy. 3151, 5, with the note of the editor, M. W. Haslam, who cites Plutarch, Mor. 762 f; Pel. 29.11 (ἀλέκτωρ δοῦλος = defeated cock); Alc. 4.3, etc.

⁷ 1Cor 6:20; 7:23; Gal 3:13; 4:5; Rev 5:9; 14:3 (E. Pax, "Der Loskauf: Zur Geschichte eines neutestamentlichen Begriffes," in Anton, 1962, pp. 239–278; S. Lyonnet, "L'emploi paulinien de ἐξαγοράζειν au sens de 'redimere' est-il attesté dans la littérature grecque?" in Biblica, 1961, pp.

85–89; W. Elert, “Redemptio ab hostibus,” in TLZ, 1947, pp. 265–270); Rom 7:14—πεπραμένος ὑπὸ τὴν ἁμαρτίαν; cf. P.Hib. 203, 10: διὰ τὸ πεπρακέναι μου σώματα δύο; P.Abinn. 64, 12; P.Princ. 85, 11: τοῦ πεπραμένου δούλου.

⁸ In private households, the master of the slaves is designated by his nomen; with imperial slaves by Κύριος or Καί—σαρ, Dominus; ἄλαμος καὶ Χρηστὴ κυρίων Καيسάρων δούλοι (MAMA, vol. 1, 29; cf. 28; 31 a); Λούκιος δούλος οὐέρνας τοῦ Κυρίου (IGRom. IV, 529; cf. III, 256); Γενεα—λις Καίσαρος δούλος οἰ—κονόμος (CIL 3, 333); οἰ—κονόμος τοῦ κουρίου . . . Σεουήρου Περτίνακος (Chrest. Wilck., vol. 2, n. 81, 13–14; cf. 79); P.Oxy. 735, 6; P.Tebt. 296, 11–12; BGU 102, 1; cf. G. Boulvert, Les Esclaves, pp. 11ff., Domestique, p. 30). Likewise δούλος τοῦ ἀρχιερέως (Matt 26:51; John 18:26); ε—κατοντάρχου (Luke 7:2); τοῦ θεοῦ —Ιησοῦ Χριστοῦ (2Pet 1:1; Jude 1). Doulos is a proper name in a papyrus from the third-fourth century (G. Casanova, “Conto de Affitti,” in Aeg, 1974, p. 100) and BGU 802, col. I, 26; 3, 11, etc., from AD 42.

⁹ Cf. L. Westermann, The Slave Systems of Greek and Roman Antiquity, pp. 22ff.

¹⁰ The slave has no family, having been deprived of the right to marriage (conubium); his conjugal union is only a de facto union (contubernium; cf. E. Polay, “Die Sklavenehe in antiken Rom,” in Das Altertum, 1969, p. 86); even his children “born to the household” belong to his owner. The slave has no country—“our politeuma is in heaven” (Phil 3:20)—and is considered as a foreigner: no Roman can be a slave at Rome; in Israel, cf. Lev 25:44–45; Exod 12:44; Lev 22:11; at Alexandria (P.Hal. 1, 119); among the Germans, cf. Caesar, BGall. 4.15.5; Tacitus, Germ. 24.

¹¹ Luke 17:10 (Matt 25:30; cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, pp. 749ff.; A. M. Ward, “Unprofitable Servants,” in ExpT, 81, 1970, pp. 200–203); P.Lond. 1927, 3; cf. Matt 8:9.

¹² G. Boulvert, Domestique et fonctionnaire, p. 111; cf. pp. 180ff.

¹³ Cf. Gal 4:19; Phil 2:22; E. Boisacq, Dictionnaire étymologique, pp. 198, 1107 (from the Dorian δω—λος, activity). In Luke 17:7–8, the function of the doulos is to “serve” his owner.

¹⁴ Luke 1:38; the sense is that of consecration to the work of salvation, conformably to the will of God. But in Hebrew, ‘ebed is not only the designation for a social condition, but also a title of honor for those who dedicate themselves to liturgical service (Luke 2:29; Acts 2:18; 2Tim 2:24; 1Pet 2:16; Rev 22:3) and the subjects of a king (ministers, officers, cf. Matt 18:23) who are in his service, preeminently the 'ebed Yahweh (cf. G. Sass, "Zur Bedeutung von δοῦλος bei Paulus," in ZNW, 1941, pp. 24–32). In Iran, vassal kings were described as "slaves (bandak) of their sovereign," the king of kings. In conformity with Arsacid protocol, Tiridates says to Nero, "Master, I, descendant of Arsaces, brother of the kings Vologeses and Pacorus, am your slave.... My fate will be what you make of it, for you are my destiny and my fortune" (Dio Cassius 63.5.2).

¹⁵ Cf. the slave-steward, δοῦλος πραγματευτής (J. and L. Robert, "Bulletin épigraphique," in REG, 1963, p. 167, n. 227).

¹⁶ Cf. G. Boulvert, Les Esclaves et les affranchis, vol. 1, pp. 249, 605; W. L. Westermann, The Slave Systems of Greek and Roman Antiquity, p. 79; J. Schmidt, Vie et mort des esclaves dans la Rome antique, Paris, 1973, pp. 197–232.

¹⁷ John 8:32; 2Cor 3:17; Gal 5:1, 13; cf. Rom 6:18, 22; 8:2 (H. Francotte, Mélanges de droit public grec, 2d ed., Rome, 1964, pp. 207ff.; I. Biezunska-Malowist, "Les Affranchis dans les papyrus de l'époque ptolémaïque et romaine," in Proceedings XI, pp. 433–443; P. Petit, La Paix romaine, pp. 285ff.; J. Gaudemet, Institutions de l'antiquité, Paris, 1967, pp. 555ff.; H. Rädle, Untersuchungen zum griechischen Freilassungswesen, Munich, 1969; gives bibliography). Pauline Christians are freed slaves, cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, pp. 836ff.

¹⁸ Cf. Luke 16:13 and Matt 6:24; Rom 14:4—ἀλλότριον οἰ—κετην; Philo, Post. Cain 138: "Wisdom gives to the oiketēs the name of Kyrios"; Unchang. God 64: "Undisciplined and scatterbrained oiketēs deserve to have a master who scares them"; P.Hercul. 18, 4: οἰ—κέτης ε—στὶν Πατρίκιος = Patricius is a slave; P.Lille 29, 1–2. In the third century, a Roman citizen in his will freed two of the slaves born in his household (P.Oxy. 2474, 29, οἰ—κέτας). An inscription of Cyrene forbids functionaries to imprison slaves (οἰ—κέτας) without obtaining a warrant from the circuit judges (SEG 9, 5, 68); P.Vars. 30, 16. Mena is mentioned constantly (διὰ Μηνα— οἰ—κέτου) as acting on the orders of her owner, τω— ι—δίῳ δεσπότη (P.Oxy. 1896, 7; 1898, 11; 1976, 7; 1983, 5; 2420, 6; 2478, 6. Cf. F. Gschnitzer, Studien zur griechischen Terminologie der Sklaverei, pp. 16ff.

¹⁹ SB 8071, 3 = GVI, n. 1167 = E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 26. An analogous designation for the slaves of Priene taking part in the festivities offered for the people (I.Priene, Index, pp. 271, 287).

²⁰ Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.181: “Even the women and the servants would tell you”; Life 341: “your valet (ὁ σὸς οἰ—κέτης) found the deceased in this famous affair”; P.Oslo 111, 176: ἡ μήτηρ τοῦ ἀφήλικος καὶ οἰ—οἰ—κέται αὐτοῦ; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 18, 8: ε—κπλεονεξίαν ε—γενάμην διὰ τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ σου οἰ—κέτου.

²¹ The oikeios is defined by blood relation in Lev 21:2—“the closest flesh to him”; cf. P.Lille 7, 5: “I was conversing with Apollonia, my relative”; P.Magd. 13, 2: “Theodotus and Agathon are relatives of the mother of Philippos”; J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG 1953, p. 174, n. 194; 1965, p. 147, n. 306.

²² This equivalence of οἰ—οἰ—κει—οἰ—οἰ—ἴδιοι (already mentioned by A. Deissmann, Bible Studies, p. 123, n. 4) is constant. Cf. Anth. Pal. 16, 281; I.Car. 13, 14; 189, 8: ἡ Κιδραμηνω—ν πόλις ε—ξ οἰ—κείων ἀναλωμάτων. Aurelius Heliodorus had a tomb repaired for his wife Aurelia Flavia and for his freed slaves, καὶ τοι—ς οἰ—κείοις αὐτοῦ ἀπελευθέροις (MAMA VI, 18; cf. IV, 19c, 5: ε—ξ οἰ—κίων γὰρ πόνων). An act of adoration by members of a thiasos “remembering their own, μνησθέντες τω—ν οἰ—κείων” (E. Bernand, Philae, vol. 2, n. 157, 9; cf. 171, 5). Claudius Tiberius Polycharmos built rooms next to the synagogue “from his own resources” or “at his own expense,” ε—κ τω—ν οἰ—κείων χρημάτων (B. Lifshitz, Synagogues juives, n. X, 13 = CII 694); Josephus, Ant. 4.88: his own army, troops belonging to him; cf. L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 3, p. 33.

²³ Gal 6:10—μάλιστα δὲ πρὸς τοὺς οἰ—κείους τῆς πίστεως (cf. IGLS 1517: “Diogenes, relative [οἰ—κι—ος] of Eusebius and Antoninus, brothers [ἀδελφω—ν] to whom this sepulchre belongs in common”). Compare ε—ται—ρος, see Josephus, Life 183; P.Mil. 129, 3; cf. PSI 1414, 22; 1447, 5; SB 6799, 7 (cf. sodalis, “companion”; Res gest. divi Aug. 4.7; H. J. Mason, Greek Terms, p. 50). Members of the same religious community are ε—ται—ροί (Matt 26:50; cf. F. Rehkopf, in ZNW, 1961, pp. 109–115; W. Eltester, “Freund, wozu du gekommen bist,” in Freundesgabe O. Cullmann, Leiden, 1962, pp. 70–91); Philo, Plant. 65; Dreams 1.111; Contemp. Life 13; Flacc. 2; C.Pap.Jud. III, p. 46.

²⁴ SB 9532, 14; cf. Prov 17:9; Plutarch, Publ. 3.1; IGLS 281, 4; Dittenberger, Syl. 591, 59: περὶ τῆς τω—ν ἄλλων φίλων καὶ οἰ—κείων ἀσφαλείας; I.Magn., 33, 15: φιλίαν καὶ οἰ—κειότητα, friendship and the close relations that exist between the people of Magnesia and those of Gonnoi.

²⁵ P.Oslo 55, 5; PSI 383, 2; P.Princ. 101, 8; P.Oxy. 1869, 20; cf. Jean-Claude Fraisse, Philia: La Notion d'amitié dans la philosophie antique, Paris, 1974, pp. 128–149, 338ff.

²⁶ Lev 19:13 (Hebrew sakîr); 25:50; Job 14:6; Sir 7:20; 24:22; P.Cair.Isid. 74, 8; P.Mert. 91, 10; P.Oxy. 1886, 9; 1894, 12. It is also the soldier who serves for pay (2Sam 10:6; Jer 46:21), the mercenary (1Macc 6:29, μισθωτής).

²⁷ P.Ant. 89, 12; P.Oxf. 13, 37; P.Mich. 174, 13; P.Oslo 36, 2, 6; 91, 9, 30; but also employed in a public administration (C.P.Herm. 19, 6; P.Harr. 79, 19; Pap.Lugd.Bat. II, 6, 1), a tax collector (O.Wilb. 12, 2; O.Bodl. II, 461, 966, 967, 1066, 2224; S. J. de Laet, Portorium, Bruges, 1949, pp. 329, 361). Μισθωταί are usually farmers for the state (μίσθωσις, farm, SB 6800, 28; the hiring out of beasts of burden, IGLS 1998, 11) who farm leased tracts (BGU 1047, col. 3) and post surety (ibid. 599), cf. N. Hohlwein, Termes techniques, pp. 166ff. S. L. Wallace, Taxation in Egypt, Princeton, 1938 (index, p. 505); D. Behrend, Attische Pachturkunden: Ein Beitrag zur Beschreibung der μίσθωσις nach den griechischen Inschriften, Munich, 1970.

δύσκολος, σκολιός

dyskolos, difficult, causing frustration or unhappiness, disagreeable; skolios, crooked, difficult, perverse

dyskolos, S 1422; EDNT 1.361; MM 173; L&N 22.32; BAGD 209 | skolios, S 4646; TDNT 7.403–408; EDNT 3.255; MM 578; L&N 79.90, 88.268; BAGD 756

The adjective dyskolos and the adverb dyskolos are used in the NT only with respect to the rich, for whom access to the kingdom of God is difficult (Mark 10:24) or who enter it with difficulty (Matt 19:23; Mark 10:23; Luke 18:24). In contemporary literary texts, “the climbing of a wall is difficult” (Josephus, War 6.36); “it is difficult (dyskolos) and even impossible (adynaton) for the defiant mind to receive an education” (Philo, Rewards 49); “It is a difficult and hard cure (dyskolon kai chalepon) that philosophy undertakes for garrulousness” (Plutarch, De garr. 1). Inscriptions evoke difficult or troubled times (Dittenberger, Syl. 409, 33; Or. 339, 54) and how difficult, almost impossible, it is to express gratitude to match benefits received: “since it is difficult to give thanks to match such good deeds of his” (epeide dyskolon men estin tois tosoutois autou euergetemasin kat’ ison eucharistein, Or. 458.18). In the phrase ei dynaton

e dyskolon (“whether possible or difficult,” Josephus, Ant. 6.203), the difficult has the sense of the impossible (cf. 2.98; 3.72); but God’s help is sought in surmounting the difficulty (5.94; 11.134), and a noble soul succeeds in so doing (2.40).

In the papyri, the word is also used for a difficult approach to a city (dyskolos anerchometha eis polein, P.Princ. 102, 9, from the fourth century), for an action that eventually becomes impossible without help from others (“if you cannot open the box yourself, because it opens with difficulty, give it to the locksmith and he will open it for you,” P.Oxy. 1294, 10); but it is also used with the connotation of “frustrating, disheartening, causing unhappiness”: a son writing to his father and giving him the news of the household tells him, “there is nothing dyskolos at your house” (ouden dyskolon eni epi tes oikias sou).¹

With reference to persons, dyskolos describes a man who cannot be satisfied, who has a bad character or gloomy disposition:² the “awkward customer” (Xenophon, Cyr. 2.2.2). Philo evokes the “farmhand, struggling under a grumpy and disagreeable boss—dyskolos and dystropos—who often makes him do things that he does not want to do, which he carries out only painfully and unwillingly.”³ So dyskolos can be compared to skolios. St. Peter bids household servants: “be submitted to your master with profound reverence, not only to the good and indulgent (tois agathois kai epieikesin), but also to the difficult (kai tois skoliois)” (1Pet 2:18). Since skolios literally means “twisting, oblique,”⁴ we should take this to mean masters who are bizarre, capricious, even wildly eccentric.⁵ Skolia is the opposite of rectitude (eutheia) and could be translated: all speech or action that is wrong and perverse (cf. Prov 23:33), contrary to good sense. This might be the term for what we call impossible bosses—never content, always surly, and also, at that period of history, brutal. “Not a singleservant stayed; because, already a hard person by nature, he had become even more difficult (dyskoloteron) because of his illness” (Isocrates, Aeginet. 19.26).

The ethical connotation is often more pejorative. Beginning with Deut 32:5 (commented on by Philo, Sobr. 10–11) and Ps 78:8, skolios refers to a generation that is wayward, perverse, rebellious (Acts 2:40; Phil 2:15), from whom spotless children of God separate themselves.⁶

¹ P.Oxy. 1218, 5: “There is nothing frustrating (unpleasant or catastrophic?) at the house”; BGU 1881, 8; PSI 566, 2 (and again in SB 9220 b): ε—πει οὖν δυσκόλως οὕτως ἡμι—ν συναντω—σιν. Plutarch, Praec. ger. rei publ. 11.806 b; 19.815 c; Phoc. 2.2: “δύσκολον τὴν ἀκοήν, the ears are shocked.”

² Plutarch associates δύσκολος with βάσκανος (Fab. 26.3). The type was described by Menander, Dysk., translated by its first editor as l’Atrabilaire

("The bilious man," V. Martin, Coligny-Geneva, 1958) and by J. M. Jacques as Le Bourru ("The surly man," Paris, 1963, pp. 33ff.). Cf. C. Préaux, "Réflexions sur la misanthropie au théâtre: A propos du Dyscolos de Ménandre," in ChrEg, 1959, pp. 327–341. The dyskolos is a person of savage disposition, unsociable and solitary, hated by his peers (34); "I flatly told all the neighbors to stay away from me" (508); intractable and ungracious (184, 242), he is hard to put up with (747, 893); "a very inhumane person, hateful to everyone, . . . through his whole long life he has never uttered a friendly word"; always ready to punch someone, he frightens those around him (17, 205, 248, 517). This picture can be filled out with the observations of Josephus concerning the unpleasant speech (Ant. 8.278) or conduct (8.7, 217, 220; 11.96) of such and such a person toward his followers, and with citations from Plutarch: "One does not show oneself to be a disagreeable person by listening in silence without concocting praises contrary to the evidence" (De vit. pud. 6); "Life is hard" (Cons. ad Apoll. 6; cf. 28 [generally considered a spurious work—Tr.]); "Cato earned only a reputation for being disagreeable" (Caes. 13.6); "if you are unhappy with events" (ibid. 35.7); when anger persists and creates in the soul a negative disposition called irritability, the end result is "rage, bitterness, sullenness (δυσκολία)" (De cohib. ira 3; cf. 13: φιλαυτία καὶ δυσκολία; 15: τω—ν πικρω—ν καὶ δυσκόλων; 16: sullenness of judgment); Cicero had a reputation for being cantankerous and sullen (Cic. 41.6).

³ Philo, Dreams 1.7; cf. Spec. Laws 1.306. The prefix dys- is of course pejorative, like un- or mis- in English; cf. δυσγνωστός (P.Oxy. 2457, 19), δυσνόητος (2Pet 3:16), δυσφημία (2Cor 6:8).

⁴ Σκολιός is used for winding paths, full of detours (Prov 2:15; Isa 40:4; cf. Luke 3:5; J. A. Fitzmyer, "The use of Explicit Old Testament Quotations in Qumran Literature and in the New Testament," in NTS, vol. 7, 1961, p. 318); uneven terrain (Isa 42:16); Josephus, War 3.118: "pioneers with the job of straightening out the curving road"; a piece of twisted wood (Wis 13:13), the twisting serpent (Isa 27:1; Wis 16:5; Aratus, Phaen. 70). Cf. Bertram, on this word in TDNT, vol. 1, pp. 403–408.

⁵ Cf. Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.179: "The name of their town is altogether bizarre (πάνυ σκολιόν ε—στιν); they call it Hierusalame"; cf. Job 4:18 (taholâh; the verse is cited by 1Clem. 39.4, which A. Jaubert translates "he notes shortcomings in his angels"). The Wisdom writings stigmatize the crooked man (Job 9:20; Prov 16:28; 22:5; 28:18), his thoughts remove him far from God (Wis 1:3), his speech is only deceit and falsehood (Prov 4:24; cf. 8:8); cf. an ambiguous oracle (Diodorus Siculus 16.91).

⁶ In P.Stras. 578, 10, the hapax δυσκολωτάτω (neuter superlative) describes the breach of trust of the baker Serenos, who kept for himself grain that he had solicited for making bread (July 3, 505).

ἔγγυος

engyos, guarantor

engyos, S 1450; TDNT 2.329; EDNT 1.371; NIDNTT 1.372–373; MM 179; L&N 70.8

Derived from gye, “curve, hollow,” engye (with the prefix) means “a pledge put in someone’s hand,” and its first occurrences refer to divinities. When Poseidon declares to Hephaestus, “He (Ares) will pay all the expenses, I give myself as surety before the immortals” (Homer, Od. 8.348), Hephaestus answers, “For a poor payer, a poor guarantee” (8.351). At Aeschylus, Eum. 898, the Erinyes ask Athena to guarantee their cult in the city of Athens and to guarantee the people her protection: “This surety (engyen) is valid forever.” Theognis 286: “take the gods as guarantors of good faith.”¹ “From the idea ‘palm or hollow of the hand’ there developed an original legal group of meanings that were applied to the idea of a security deposit.”² A person stands surety for another by committing himself to a creditor to supply a guarantee for the execution of an obligation in the event that the debtor defaults.³ A guarantor is thus one who is responsible for another person’s debt; his responsibility becomes operative when the debtor declares himself insolvent with regard to the terms of the contract.⁴

The guarantor (a relative, a friend; cf. Josephus, War 1.460; Plutarch, Alc. 5.4: “He is my friend; I stand surety for him”) is normally an honorable person who has a fortune at his disposal;⁵ being an honest person, he sees to it that the contract is carried out and justice respected.⁶ Thus he is above all a person who may be trusted.⁷ Ben Sirach, who places standing surety between almsgiving and hospitality, sees it as a brotherly service: “Do not forget the kindness of your surety, for he has given his life for you. It is the deed of a sinner to waste the goods of his surety” (Sir 29:15–16). So there are swindlers and sharpers, or simply unfavorable turns of events, that make the surety’s job extremely burdensome: “Surety (engye) has ruined many upright people; it has tossed them like a wave of the sea.”⁸

The fact is that those who stood surety risked ruin and imprisonment, and even reduction to slavery, because they were “subject to the same penalties as those for whom they offered themselves as guarantees.”⁹ According to Philostratus, they could even incur the death penalty: “Among the Egyptians there was a law whereby one who was defeated after being the victor had to be publicly punished by death; actually, he was held in advance for death, or else he had to provide guarantors for his person (engyetas tou somatos). Since no one was willing to undertake such a guarantee for Attalus, the gymnastes himself fulfilled the legal condition [by standing surety]" (Gym. 24; cf. 8). In any event, we can understand the proverb "Surety calls ruin" (to engye para d'ate) and the comment of Theophrastus: "The untimely person goes seeking surety for himself to an unfortunate soul who has just been condemned as surety for someone else (engyes)" (Char. 12.4).

The inscriptions confirm these responsibilities of sureties. In a registry of real estate sales at Tenos, "the aforementioned sellers obligate themselves as a body and each for all."¹⁰ On Crete, "if a son stands surety during the lifetime of his father, he will answer with his person and with all the property that he possesses."¹¹ In an Athenian rental contract: "Exechias of Aphidna stands surety for the execution of the contract within the set time frame; for their part the administrators of the Kytherians guarantee the lease to Eucrates and his descendants; failing which, they undertake to pay him a thousand drachmas."¹² An inscription at Delos (I.Delos 502) mentions an engyos tou pseudous, a conditional surety that only protects the authorities against the risk of exorbitant bids.¹³ At Pergamum, "clients of the dormitory shall supply to the god guarantees for the salaries of the physicians to be paid during the year."¹⁴

In the papyri, the correspondence of Zeno in the third century BC (P.Cair.Zen. 59001, 43; 59173, 32; 59340, col. II, 17–18; SB 7450, 23; 7532, 19), and especially in the first century AD, the formula engyoi allelon eis ekteisin recurs constantly; it means that the guarantors are jointly responsible for the payment or settlement of a debt.¹⁵ Most often it is a matter of a monetary loan, but it can also be land leases, contracts for service (paramone, P.Mich. 70, 6; P.Oxy. 10, 11, 34; 13, 5), even the hiring of a nurse¹⁶ or the payment of a pension (P.Enteux. 25, 12). Sometimes it is recalled "that Pythocles has the right of execution on all the property belonging to Spokes and on the property of his surety for debts to the royal treasury" (P.Sorb. 17 a 17; cf. 10, 3); or that "this man has no right of execution against me ... let him be barred from bringing any suit against me or molesting either my own person or the above-named sureties, and let him put up security against the possibility of legal damages" (P.Rein. 7, 35; second century BC). Sometimes, on the other hand, the surety protests his good faith and obligates himself for the future.¹⁷

It follows from these texts that in the first century a guarantee was supplied most frequently (1) by a relative or friend of sufficient means; (2) it was always cited by name;¹⁸ (3) it was for the security of the debtor;¹⁹ (4) the surety is often the deity himself or one of his representatives (Moses, the prophets); (5) it expresses his solidarity—his guarantee is an act of benevolence, a charis (Sir 19:15); (6) engyos in literary texts sometimes has a metaphorical meaning.

Having thus given a certain density and vitality to the term engyos, we can understand its usage in Heb 7:22 (NT hapax), where the author, by assessing the quality of a diatheke as a function of the quality of its mediator,²⁰ proves the superiority of the priesthood of the order of Melchizedek over the Levitical priesthood by the unchangeableness of its founding: “It is established forever.” Hence “Jesus has become the surety of a better covenant” (kreittonos diathekes gegonen engyos Iesous). God has sworn (Ps 110:4), his decision is immutable (Heb 6:17); the new covenant will be eternal (Heb 13:20) and the new high priest permanent. Consequently, it is characteristic of Jesus to be an indefectible surety for the future, for he remains the same “yesterday and today and forever” (13:8).

The choice of the word engyos as much as the connected mention of the name of “Jesus” signals that the author is evoking the legal meaning of this term: if Jesus is given by God as a pledge of his eternal covenant, then he must take on himself all the obligations of a contract of guarantee and is possibly even called upon to give his life.²¹ Is he not in solidarity with the parties to the contract—ex henos pantes (2:11ff.) and the archegos of salvation (verse 10)? Moreover, Christianity is a hope (7:19; 1Pet 3:15), and salvation will be completed in its fullness only in the future; so it is to be expected that guarantees and sureties will be supplied for the obtaining of the covenant’s goods, the realization of the divine promises. The fact that it is Christ who is this living and permanent guarantee, the surety provided by God, who has literally put our salvation “in his hand” (en-gys), means that from here on the salvation of each believer is his responsibility (2:10). He has paid our debts. He has freed us from sin. Through his “precious blood” he has bought and paid for our emancipation.²² Our confidence, the best guarantee there is, must be absolute.

¹ Cf. 2Macc 10:28—the Jews join battle “having as their pledge of success (ἔγγυον ἔχοντες εὐημερίας) and of victory not only their valiance but their reliance on the Lord,” a heavenly guarantee.

² P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique, p. 240. Cf. two occurrences of ε—γγύη in the OT. “It is a bold man who strikes hands and stands surety for his neighbor” (Prov 17:18); “Do not be one who strikes hands and stands surety for a debt” (Prov 22:26). In Egyptian law, the act of guaranteeing is called “taking the hand” because to guarantee is an act of support or approval on the part of a third party.

³ Aristotle, Pol. 3.8.1280b11: “Law is a mutual guarantee (ε—γγυητῆς ἀλλήλοις) of rights and obligations”; Eth. Nic. 5.5.1131a; 5.8.1133b12.

⁴ P.Rein. 44. Cf. T. W. Beasley, Le Cautionnement dans l’ancien droit grec, Paris, 1902; A. Segrè, “Note sulla ε—γγύη greco-egizia,” in Aeg, 1929, pp. 3–24. E. Seidl, Der Eid im römisch-ägyptischen Provinzialrecht, Munich, 1933–1935; W. Erdmann, Die Ehe im alten Griechenland, Munich, 1934, pp. 225, 231, 267ff.; J. Triantaphyllopoulos, “Sponsor,” in RIDA, 1961, pp. 373–390; cf. 1957, p. 323; F. de Cenival, Cautionnements démotiques du début de l’époque ptolémaïque, Paris, 1973 (publishes the Lille Demotic papyri 34–96): a certain person (addressing the oikonomos of the meris, and the basilikogrammateus) stands surety for the payment of a colleague’s debt (to the treasury, the payment of a tax). Some guarantee documents include a paramone clause (legal obligation to remain in residence): a worker undertakes to remain in place at a set location, in his store, etc. This is the “guarantee of presence.”

⁵ Ps.-Aristotle, Oec. 2.22.1350a19: in Macedonia, it was always the rich who bought anchorage rights “because it was necessary to put up a talent of security to guarantee this total of twenty talents”; Isocrates, Trapez. 17.37: “As Stratocles asked me who would pay back his money . . . I presented Pasion to him, who obligated himself to return the principal and interest. Now if he had not had any funds belonging to me on deposit, do you suppose that he would have so readily stood surety for me for such a great sum?”; Demosthenes, C. Apat. 33.7: “I had no money available; but I was a client of the banker Heraclides. I convinced him to loan the sum, accepting me as guarantor.”

⁶ Demosthenes, C. Apat. 10: “I made arrangements both that I should be freed from my obligation as surety to the bank and that the foreigner should not be defrauded of what he had advanced to Apatourios through my mediation. I placed guards at the ship, and I notified the bank guarantors (ε—γγυηται τῆς τραπεζῆς) of the seizure.”

⁷ Philo and Josephus use not the noun ἔγγυος but ε—γγυητής. Philo uses it for one who guarantees the truth: “I shall propose a sure guarantor for my words, Moses, the holiest person of all” (Cherub. 45); “For this affirmation we have as guarantor not just any person at all but a prophet who can be trusted, the recorder of the Psalms” (Husbandry 50). According to Josephus, Samuel presents himself as guarantor of the promises of God (Ant. 6.21); God himself is guarantor of the future (7.72). On the payment of money as guarantee, cf. 14.81; 15.132.

⁸ Sir 29:17; cf. verse 19: “the sinner who casts himself (offers himself precipitously) as surety for the purpose of speculation (seeking gain and profit) casts himself into lawsuits (makes himself prey to legal convictions).” Cf. H. M. Weil, “Gage et cautionnement dans la Bible,” in Archives d’histoire du droit oriental, 1938, pp. 171–241; R. Sugranyes de Franch, Etudes sur le droit palestinien à l’époque évangélique, Fribourg, 1946; R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel, vol. 1, pp. 171–173; E. Szlechter, “Le Régime des sûretés personnelles à l’époque de la première dynastie de Babylone,” in RIDA, 1963, pp. 77–90; J. T. Sanders, “Ben Sira’s Ethics of Caution,” in HUCA, 1979, pp. 73–100.

⁹ Andocides, Myst. 1.44. In signing the contract, the engyos obligated himself (BGU 1915, 7; cf. 1961, 10; P.Amst. 41, 54 and 78; P.Cair.Zen. 59787, 100; P.Tebt. 815, frag. 2, verso II, 36; P.Thead. 8, 3; P.Bour. 19, 31, 42; P.Laur. 27, 15). On the clause of execution on the person, cf. A. B. Schwarz, Die öffentliche und private Urkunde im römischen Ägypten, Leipzig, 1920, pp. 298–309). On imprisonment for debt (Dittenberger, Syl. XLVI, 66; Matt 18:30; R. Sugranyes de Franch, Etudes sur le droit palestinien), slavery (P.Col. 480, 25; H. Liebesny, “Ein Erlaß des Königs Ptolemaios II Philadelphos,” in Aeg. 1936, pp. 257–291). In 237 BC, a prostagma of Ptolemy Euergetes I specifies the limits of responsibility of those who guaranteed others’ appearance in court (ε—γγύη παραμονής), cf. P.Mich. 70 = SB 7447 = C.Ord.Ptol. 27. Arrest for debt was banned in 118 by a series of royal edicts (P.Tebt. 5) and in AD 68 by the prefect Tiberius Julius Alexander (Dittenberger, Syl. 669, 15–17).

¹⁰ §36. RIJG, vol. 1, pp. 82 and 100.

¹¹ Leg.Gort. XI, 57; cf. RIJG, vol. 1, p. 382.

¹² Leg.Gort., ter, 5; cf. RIJG, p. 242; cf. the rental of a field in the fourth century, p. 202; cf. pp. 34ff., 383.

¹³ The opposite of ἔγγυος τῆς ἀληθείας; cf. J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1942, p. 345, n. 109. Cf. REG, 1973, p. 102, n. 236 at Melitaia in Thessaly, where ἔγγυοι τὰς προξενίας are officials who guarantee proxenia and the exercise of the attendant privileges. At Delphi, in the endowment of King Attalus II of Pergamum (second century BC): “Let those who wish to borrow . . . present a field as a surety having a value double that of the money received. Let the borrowers establish guarantees acceptable to the commissions; let the same persons be sureties and guarantors of the pledged properties” (J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. XIII, 26); cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 736, 72; 958, 5; 993, 7.

¹⁴ —Εγγύους τῶν ἰατρείων τῶν θεῶν, M. Vörrle, Die Lex Sacra von der Hallenstraße, line 29, in C. Habicht, Altertümer von Pergamon, VIII, 3: Die Inschriften des Asklepieions, Berlin, 1969, p. 169. At Epidauros, in the accounts for the building of the temple of Asclepius, in the fourth century BC, the names are mentioned of those who put up for tender and of the guarantors (C. Michel, Recueil, n. 584, 3, 6, 7, 12). At Thyrrheion, in Acarnania, the sums paid out by guarantors are specified (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1969, n. 322). The same citations in P.Cair.Zen. 59366, 24; 59504, 8; P.Oxy. 2992, 3; P.Mich. 190, 25; P.Hib. 30 d 16.

¹⁵ P.Corn. 6, 20 (AD 17); P.Mich. 632, 9 (AD 26); 586, 3 and 21; 633, 34 (= SB 10535; AD 30); 635, 4 (AD 71); BGU 2044, 12 (AD 46); P.Oxy. 2773, 27 (AD 82); P.Mert. 6, 29; 78, 3; 108, 7 (in 69–79); 118, 5; P.Warr. 8, 7 and 25; P.Fam.Tebt. 2, 9; 4, 9; 6, 10; cf. P.Phil. 15, 6; P.Oslo 131, 17; P.Amst. 41, 95; P.Alex. 7, 8–10; P.Athen. 23, 8; P.Col. III, 54, 23; PSI 1249, 33; 1311, 10 and 32; P.Bon. 25, 9; P.Gen. 24, 8; P.Oxy. 905, 17; P.Stras. 204, 15; 230, 11; 293, 9; P.NYU 22, 4, 11, 17, 24; P.Ryl. 586, 19; 587, 19; 600, 13; P.Cair.Isid. 97, 7; SB 10222, 15; 10248, 19; 19779; 10786, 5; 10804, 16; 11059, 9; 11248, 54 and 95; etc. H. W. Van Soest, De Civielrechtelijke ΕΓΓΥΗ (Garantieovereenkomst) in de griekse Papyri uit het Ptolemaeische Tijdvak, Leiden, 1963, pp. 27 and 67.

¹⁶ P.Rein. 103, 2 (AD 26): “Taseus, witnessed by her husband Petseiris as trustee and surety for all the clauses of this contract for payment”; cf. P.Vars. 10, col. I, 7 and 20; col. II, 15; col. III, 7 and 27; P.Mil. 60, 3; P.Oxy. 2134, 8.

¹⁷ P.Lond. 2045, 6 (correspondence of Zeno): Païs (imprisoned) promises that once he is released he will be faithful to his obligations as surety: ε—γὼ δέ σοι ε—ξελθὼν ε—γγύους σοι καταστήσω (according to Greek law, the guarantee is not paid as long as the accused is kept in prison, cf. F. W. Walbank, “Surety in Alexander’s Letter to the Chians,” in Phoenix, 1962, pp. 178–180), cf. 2054, 16: Techestheus makes a similar undertaking: ε—γγύους δέ σοι καταστήσομεν. In a contract of harvesters in the second century AD, these promise, “We will begin the thirtieth of the current month of Pharmouthi and we will not stop . . . being in solidarity with each other” (P.Sarap. 51, 17).

¹⁸ Cf. E. Kretschmer, “Beiträge zur Wortgeographie der altgriechischen Dialekte,” in Glotta, 1930, pp. 89–90.

¹⁹ Cf. in AD 49–50: δῖ ε—γγύου ε—μοῦ = for my security, P.Oxy. 38, 6; republished in Aeg, 1966, p. 237.

²⁰ As a Greek legal term, ἔγγυος is very close to μεσίτης (Heb 8:6; 9:15; 12:24).

²¹ Sir 29:15. J. Héring (L'Épître aux Hébreux, p. 71) notes that the covenant is established by means of a sacrifice, and O. Michel (Der Brief an die Hebräer, 10th ed., Göttingen, 1957, p. 174) sees here a reference to Christ's passion.

²² Cf. Christ ὁ ῥυόμενος (1Thess 1:10; Rom 11:26; 2Tim 3:11; 4:18; cf. Col 1:13). We might mention the analogy of ransom paid for the freeing of prisoners of war or the sum paid in acts of emancipation of slaves by sale to the deity, such that “no one may lay a hand on him throughout his whole life.” Cf. Fouilles de Delphes, vol. 3, fasc. 6: Epigraphie, Paris, 1939; MAMA IV, 279; SEG XVIII, 225–229; etc. P. Foucart, Mémoire sur l'affranchissement des esclaves, Paris, 1867; C. Cromme, “Personen- und Familiengüterrecht in den delphischen Freilassungsurkunden,” in RIDA, 1962, pp. 177–238.

ε—γκαινίζω

enkainizo, to renew, inaugurate

enkainizo, S 1457; TDNT 3.453–454; EDNT 1.377; NIDNTT 3.670, 673; MM 215; L&N 13.84; BAGD 215

This verb, which literally means “renew,” rarely used in secular Greek,¹ is a good instance of a Septuagintism in the NT, where it is only used twice in a religious sense. In Heb 9:18, the first covenant “was not inaugurated without blood”;² in Heb 10:20, Christ “has inaugurated for us a new and living way through the veil.”³

In the LXX, it translated either the piel of the Hebrew verb hadash or the verb hanak. The former, “produce something anew, redo,” is often used with the moral or psychological connotation of a new beginning;⁴ hence, “to install royalty” (1Sam 11:14), “renew the altar of Yahweh” (2Chr 15:8); “restore the house of Yahweh” (2Chr 24:4, 12). It is in this sense, it would seem, that the shedding of blood gives validity to the old covenant (Exod 24) and inaugurates it (Heb 9:18).

As for the verb hanak, it describes the earliest education of a child; one sets the child on the right path in life (Prov 22:6); hence, “begin to put into use.”⁵ The word is used for the dedication of the house of God (1Kgs 8:63; 2Chr 7:5), and in 1 Macc, enkainizo is used for the restoration of the altar (4:54), the repair of the entrances and chambers of the temple (4:57), and the restoration of the sanctuary to its former condition (5:1). Hence, the Enkainia, the Feast of Dedication (John 10:22) that Judas Maccabeus ordered celebrated from the 25th of the month of Kislev.⁶

So, since Christ the prodromos (Heb 6:20) himself opened a new route of access from earth to heaven and was the first to traverse this “new route,”⁷ his own can undertake to follow in his steps. So it can be said that he “inaugurated” it, because he opened it for traffic; but since this route leads to the heavenly sanctuary and is a “sacred way” that cannot be traversed except by believing souls purified from sin, enkainizo also signifies that Christ “consecrated” this route, which will be that of the liturgical pilgrimage to the heavenly Jerusalem.⁸

¹ Cf. the references given by Behm, on this word in TDNT, vol. 3, pp. 453–454. We might add UPZ 185, col. II, 6 from the second century AD, but this reading has been restored.

² Cf. M. McNamara, Targum and Testament, Shannon, 1972, p. 128.

³ Cf. A. Pelletier, “Le ‘Voile’ du Temple de Jérusalem,” in Syria, 1955, pp. 289–307; idem, “La Tradition synoptique du ‘voile déchiré,’” in RSR, 1958, pp. 161–180.

⁴ Ps 51:4—“Renew a firm spirit within me”; 104:30—the earth (in springtime); Lam 5:21—“renew our days as in former times”; Job 10:17—renewed hostilities; cf. Sir 36:5—prodigies and marvels.

⁵ Deut 20:5—“Who is the man who has built a new house and has not yet dedicated it?”

⁶ 1Macc 4:59; a reproduction of the ceremony instituted by Solomon, then by Ezra at the time of the completion of the sanctuary (2Macc 2:9; 2Esdr 6:16–17; Neh 12:27; cf. S. Krauss, “La Fête de Hanoucca,” in REJ, 1895, pp. 24–43; 204–219; Str-B, vol. 2, pp. 539ff.). Hanukkah is translated by ε—γκαινισις, ε—γκαινωσις (Num 7:88), or ε—γκαινισμός (Num 7:10–11, 84; 2Chr 7:10); the latter term is used for “the dedication of the statue that King Nebuchadnezzar had prepared” (Dan 3:2–3), and for the song for the dedication of the House (the title of Ps 30).

⁷ Cf. Heb 9:12. Trajan “had built the new Via Hadriana, from Berenice to Antinoöpolis, across safe and flat terrain . . . at certain distances along the way he built abundant cisterns, stations, and strongholds” (A. Bernand, El-Kanaïs, 1912, n. XII, 8, p. 61); M. Bouttier, La Condition chrétienne selon saint Paul, Geneva, 1964, p. 21.

⁸ Heb 10:20. Philo, Prelim. Stud. 114, applies to the soul that is thankful to God an “enkainia that is celebrated with the dignity appropriate to the sacred”; on this liturgy of spiritual worship, cf. A. Jaubert, La Notion d’alliance dans le Judaïsme, Paris, 1963, pp. 486–489.

ε—γκακέω

enkakeo, to conduct oneself badly, become weary, lose heart

enkakeo, S 1573; TDNT 3.486; EDNT 1.377; NIDNTT 1.561, 563; MM 215; L&N 25.288; BDF §§123(2), 414(2); BAGD 215

This verb is peculiar to the Koine, where, moreover, it appears only rarely.¹ It can be transitive or intransitive. Its exact meaning (“conduct oneself badly”) derives from its etymology,² but the nuance varies according to context. The first usage is in Polybius in the sense of doing ill, being at fault, committing culpable negligence: “The Macedonians neglected to send the prescribed help” (to pempein tas boetheias . . . enekakesen).³ In the second century AD, Didymarion writes to Paniskos that his brother was not the object of any reproach, and he draws the conclusion that he did not conduct himself amiss (Iego me enkakese, P.Petaus 29, 12). But with respect to Gen 27:46, where Rebekah declares, “I am tired of living (prosochthizo) because of these Hittite women,” Symmachus uses the verb enkakeo to mean “lose heart.”⁴

The first NT attestation is in St. Luke’s introduction of the parable of the Widow and the Judge, which says that the lesson is “that they should always pray kai me enkakein ” (present infinitive);⁵ that is, that in the most desperate circumstances, they must continue to ask doggedly and intensely and never desist. But how should the verb be translated?⁶ The best equivalent is “non segnescere” (Bengel), and better yet “not to slacken.”⁷ It is not so much a matter of omission as of relaxing one’s efforts, losing heart in the midst of difficulties, letting go, interrupting one’s perseverance before attaining one’s goal; giving up rather than continuing the fight. Hence, on the moral level, the exhortation is to overcome lethargy, boredom, duration, even distress in tribulation; one must not give in to the apparent uselessness of appeals to God and succumb to exhaustion, but on the contrary overcome fatigue and continue without yielding or softening.

The five other occurrences are in St. Paul and have the same basic meaning: “Brothers, do not slacken in doing well” (aorist subjunctive, me enkakesete, 2Thess 3:13), do not tire of doing what is good. “Having undertaken a good work, let us not slacken (present subjunctive, me enkakomen); at the desired time we shall reap, if we do not give up (me eklyomenoi; cf. Matt 15:32; Heb 12:3, 5)" (Gal 6:9). One's perseverance must not weaken in service to one's neighbor, since the harvest will result from our doggedness; a relaxation of effort would be disastrous. "Since we have this ministry, according to the mercy that was shown to us, we do not lose heart" (ouk enkakoumen, present indicative, 2Cor 4:1, 16), or "we do not weaken," "we do not give in"; this is the refusal of all negligence and all laxness. Finally, Eph 3:13—"Do not give in (me enkakein, present infinitive) to the trials (captivity) that I am enduring for you," which might scandalize (in the full sense of the word) believers who see their apostle reduced to inactivity and impotence, apparently abandoned by God. Are there not grounds for discouragement? Hence the exhortation not to lose heart: hold fast, without letting up; always be ardent.

In conclusion, the verb enkakeo in the NT is (a) found exclusively in the writings of Luke and Paul; (b) both made it a Christian technical term to express the unflagging pursuit of the goal of service to neighbor or of apostolic ministry as well as the "tautness" of the determined heart that does not let up, does not lose courage; (c) this absence of letting up is a precept of the new morality, a catechetical rule that each Christian must apply in his or her personal life; (d) in almost all of these contexts, notably Luke 18:1; Gal 6:9, this moral obligation is expressed as a function of eschatological peirasmos and of the Parousia. During the wait for deliverance, judgment, and glory, letting up and weakening are not permitted.

¹ It is unknown in the LXX, the Letter of Aristeas, Philo, and Josephus. Only three occurrences can be cited from the papyri, but BGU 1043, 3 (a letter from the third century AD) is so mutilated that the meaning of the term cannot be made out: μήτηρ παλλαιάν ε—νκακήσα[ντος? . . .

² Thucydides 2.87.3 probably favored the formation of the word: "given courage, inexperience is no excuse for any sort of misconduct" (έν τινι κακοῦς γενέσθαι).

³ Polybius 4.19.10. Cf. P.Lond. V, 1708, 92 (arbitration in the sixth century in a family dispute over a will), mistreat: ε—γκακηθέντα καὶ θλιβέντα τὸν ε—μὸν πατέρα.

⁴ Idem, on Num 21:5. Cf. be afraid, be frightened, or be in a painful situation; for example a woman giving birth: μή, ὡς αι— ὠδίνουσαι, ε—γκακω—μεν (2Clem. 2.2).

⁵ Luke 18:1. Cf. C. Spicq, "La Parabole de la Veuve obstinée et du juge inique aux décisions impromptues," in RB, 1961, pp. 68–90.

⁶ M. J. Lagrange, P. Joüon, E. Osty, N. Geldenhuys (Commentary on the Gospel of Luke, London, 1950), E. Delebecque (Evangile de Luc) translate “ne pas se décourager, sans perdre courage” (not become discouraged, without losing heart); the Bible de Jérusalem and W. F. Arndt (The Gospel According to St. Luke, St. Louis, 1956): “without growing weary” (cf. NJB, “never lose heart”); E. Klostermann (Das Lukas-Evangelium, Tübingen, 1929): “nicht nachlassen,” (without relaxing, slackening); A. R. C. Leaney (A Commentary on the Gospel According to St. Luke, London, 1958): “not giving up”; E.E. Ellis (The Gospel of Luke, London, 1966): “not lose heart.”

⁷ H. J. Schonfield, The Authentic New Testament, London, n.d.

ε—γκαταλείπω

enkataleipo, to leave, forsake, abandon enkataleipo, S 1459; EDNT 1.377; MM 179; L&N 13.92, 35.54, 68.36; BAGD 215

Of the ten occurrences of this verb in the NT, half are in quotations from the OT; consequently, its meaning must be understood in terms of the language of the LXX. First of all, Heb 13:5—“He himself has said, I will never leave you nor forsake you.” Exegetes rightly attempt to identify the citation,¹ which is very close to Josh 1:5 and Deut 31:6, 8; 1Chr 28:20; but neither the tenses nor the moods of the verbs are exactly the same. Moreover, our text is exactly identical to that of Philo (Conf. Tongues 166), which cites Josh 1:5. The inevitable conclusion is that either Philo or the author of Hebrews had read a recension of the LXX different from that which we possess.

On the literary level, we may note the fivefold pleonastic repetition of the negation, which reinforces the absoluteness of the thought and thus the certainty of divine help: never, never, never, in any circumstance whatsoever, God will not fail. On the theological level, it is impossible to state too emphatically that this OT assertion, in one form or another, is a statement of the unchangeableness of providence,² one of the most essential items of Israel’s faith. Citing Ps 16:10, St. Peter therefore affirms concerning the Messiah: “You will not abandon my soul in Hades” (Acts 2:27, 31), because being abandoned by God would mean rejection (1Kgs 8:57; 2Chr 15:2; Prov 4:6), a sort of desertion (Job 20:13) of which it is unthinkable that the Son of God could become the victim.

Nevertheless, on the cross, citing Ps 22:2, Jesus cried out: “My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?”³ This cry expresses the completeness of his dereliction at the point where his resistance was lowest (Ps 38:10; 71:9; Gos. Pet. 19: “My strength, my strength, you have forsaken me”) and death was imminent; but this is not despair:⁴ the Messiah was “abandoned to his enemies” (Ps 22:13ff.) and thus he can say that God “remained far off” (verses 12, 20), but his confidence remains complete (verses 21ff.). His trial is analogous to that of Hezekiah, whom “God abandoned to prove him, to learn all that was in his heart” (2Chr 32:31); and we know that the love and the power of God are sometimes expressed in the peirasmos of the just.⁵

Otherwise, enkataleipo, which usually translates the Hebrew ‘azab, often has, like that Hebrew verb, a toned down meaning: to loosen ties, to give out;⁶ in the passive: be left defenseless in the hands of an enemy. Expressing the contrast between the power of God and human weakness by four antitheses, St. Paul writes that he is pursued, harassed, pressed, and hunted down, as it were, by his adversaries (diokomenoi, all’ ouk enkataleipomenoi, 2Cor 4:9). If we take this as a metaphor for a race or a manhunt, we will translate “pursued but not overtaken”; but if the reference is to combat, the apostle is not so roughly handled that he gives in (cf. 1Macc 1:42), that he is put out of commission and abandoned, and in this sense “eliminated.”⁷

If you forsake a person, you also leave a place, notably when fleeing;⁸ the place is abandoned, and property is often left in disarray;⁹ the two go together.¹⁰ It even happens that people forsake worship.¹¹ This is what happened with certain “Hebrews” who got into the habit of excusing themselves from the meetings of the community,¹² through egotism (refusing to “give themselves” to the common life), through haughtiness (scorning the society of their brothers, cf. 1Cor 11:18-22; Jude 19, apodiorizontes), or perhaps for fear of advertising their faith in a time of persecution, fearing reprisals by the pagan authorities (Heb 10:32), and thus leaving the community to its risks and dangers without giving it the support of their numbers and their courage.¹³

It is probably this same refusal to compromise themselves that accounts for the abstention of the Roman Christians from St. Paul’s first hearing: “At my first defense, no one came to my aid, but all forsook me” (2Tim 4:16). This must have been a grave sin, since St. Paul immediately adds, “May they not be held accountable for this!” In fact, the five occurrences of enkataleipo in Malachi translate the Hebrew bagad, “betray, deceive, break faith” (2:10-16), and the OT always forbade forsaking a dear or honored person.¹⁴

No doubt it is with this moral flavor that we should understand 2Tim 4:10—“Demas has forsaken me, having preferred this present age.”¹⁵ My coworker walked out on me!

¹ P. Katz, “Ὁὐ μή σε ἄνω—, οὐδέ οὐ μή σε ε—γκαταλίπω, Hebr. XIII, 5: The Biblical Source of the Quotation,” in Bib, 1952, pp. 523–525.

² Yahwah to Jacob (Gen 28:15), to Joshua (Josh 1:5), to Solomon (1Kgs 6:13); Moses to Israel (Deut 4:31; 31:6), to Joshua (Deut 31:8); David to Solomon (1Chr 28:20); the professions of faith of the Psalmists: “You will not forsake those who seek you, O Yahweh” (Ps 9:11; cf. 27:9; 37:25, 28, 33; 38:21); “Elohim, you will not forsake me” (Ps 71:18; 114:14; 119:8); the teaching of the sages: “Wisdom did not forsake the just (Joseph) when he was sold” (Wis 10:13); “Who has persevered in the fear of the Lord and been forsaken?” (Sir 2:10; cf. 51:10, 20); the conclusion of history: “He never withdraws his mercy from us; while punishing them with adversity, he does not abandon his people” (2Macc 6:16; cf. 1:5; Isa 54:7). Unbelievers think that Yahweh has abandoned them (Isa 49:14; Ezek 8:12; 9:9) and they themselves abandon him (Judg 2:12, 13; 10:6, 10, 13; 1Sam 8:8; 12:10; 1Kgs 9:9; 19:10, 14; 2Kgs 17:16; 21:22; 22:17; 1Chr 14:12; 2Chr 7:19, 22; 12:1, 5; 24:18, 20, 24; Ezra 9:10; Sir 51:8; Isa 1:4; 65:11; Jer 1:16; 2:13; 5:7; 16:11; 19:4; Bar 3:12; Dan 11:30). But the God of Israel has promised not to forsake his own (Isa 41:9; 17; 54:7) and “Not Forsaken” will be the title of the elect nation (Isa 61:12; cf. 60:15); and believers confess that it is so (Ezra 9:9; Neh 9:17, 19, 31).

³ Matt 27:46; Mark 15:34; the text is closer to the Aramaic of the Targum than to the official Greek version (cf. the textual variants, in J. Vosté, De Passione et Morte Jesu Christi, Rome-Paris, 1937, p. 303; P. Glaue, “Einiger Stellen, die die Bedeutung des Codex D charakterisieren,” in NovT, 1958, p. 314, and the commentaries of M. J. Lagrange, on this verse; H. Sahlin, “Zum Verständnis von drei Stellen des Markus-Evangeliums,” in Bib, 1952, pp. 62–66; J. Gnllka, “Mein Gott, mein Gott, warum hast du mich verlassen?” in BZ, 1959, pp. 294–297). For the theological explication, cf. G. Jouassard, L’Abandon du Christ par son Père durant la passion, d’après la tradition patristique et les docteurs du XIIIe siècle, Lyon, 1923; L. Matthieu, “L’Abandon du Christ en croix,” in Mélanges de science religieuse, Lille, 1945, pp. 209–242; C. Journet, “La quatrième Parole du Christ en croix,” in Nova et Vetera, 1952, pp. 47–69; F. W. Danker, “The Demonic Secret in Mark,” in ZNW, 1970, pp. 48–69.

⁴ Cf. the excellent notations of L. Sabourin, Rédemption sacrificielle, Desclée De Brouwer, 1961, pp. 438ff. (provides bibliography).

⁵ 1Cor 10:13; Heb 12:5-11. It is when trial bears fruit—in the form of the salvation of sinners—that its benefits are recognized; cf. in Rom 9:29 the citation of Isa 1:9—“If Yahweh of hosts had not left us a remnant,” we would be like Sodom and Gomorrah (Ezra 9:15—“We remain as a remnant”).

⁶ Cf. “leave” (2Chr 24:25—“leaving him open to serious illnesses”; Ps 37:8), forsake (Sir 7:30), neglect (1Kgs 12:8, 13; 2Chr 10:13; Isa 58:2; Prov 4:2; 27:10).

⁷ Cf. 1Cor 9:27; C. Spicq, “L’Image sportive de 2Cor 4:7-9,” in ETL, 1937, pp. 209–229.

⁸ 2Kgs 7:7—“They abandoned their tents, their horses, their asses, and the camp just as it was, and they fled for their lives”; 2Chr 11:14—the Levites leave their towns and their possessions; one leaves land, house, or city (Lev 24:43; 2Kgs 8:6; Isa 6:12; 17:9; 24:12; 32:14; Jer 4:29; 9:18; 12:7; Ezek 36:4; 1Macc 1:38; 2:28); ε—γκ. τὴν γεωργίαν (P.Oxy. 1124, 5; AD 26), τὴν ι—δίαν (P.Oxy. 488, 22; P.Mert. 92, 12 = P.Cair.Isid. 138; cf. SB 10196, 7), τὴν ε—πικειμένην ἀσχολίαν (P.Tebt. 26, 16; 114 BC), τὴν παραμονήν (PSI 1120, 5; service contract from the first century), τὸ κτῆμα (P.Cair.Zen. 59367, 37), a payment (τὴν μίσθωσιν, P.Ross.Georg. II, 19, 44; PSI 32, 18; P.Mil.Vogl. 143, 17).

⁹ —Ἐγκαταλέλοιπαν τὸν παράδεισον ἔρημον καὶ ἀφύλακτον (SB 6002, 13; second century BC; 10476, 4). “Soueris changed her mind, left the olive grove, she is gone” (P.Ryl. 128, 11; from AD 30); “his departure left me stranded” (UPZ 71, 8).

¹⁰ Καὶ μήτε αὐτὸν καὶ τὴν χραίαν ε—γκαταλίπητε (P.Tebt. 712, 13; second century BC); ὁ ἀδελφός σου . . . ληστω—ν ε—πικειμένων ε—νκατελελοίπει με ἀποδημήσας (S. Witkowski, Epistulae Privatae Graecae 47, 8). In AD 20–50, a woman brings a complaint against her husband: “After mistreating, insulting, and beating me, he abandoned me, leaving me desolate” (P.Oxy. 281, 21). Josephus (Life 205) draws a connection between leaving the country and forsaking one’s friends.

¹¹ Stud.Pal. XX, 33, 11: ε—νκαταλελοιπέναι τὰς θρησκείας; Chrestomathie, vol. 1, 72.9: μηδένα δὲ τω—ν ι—ερέων ἢ ι—ερωμένων ε—νκαταλελοιπέναι τὰς θρησκείας.

¹² Heb 10:25—μὴ ε—γκαταλείποντες τὴν ε—πισυναγωγὴν ε—αυτω—ν.

¹³ A commentary on Heb 10:25 is provided by John Chrysostom, Discourse 6, which is addressed to “those who have forsaken the synaxis” (A. Wenger, Jean Chrysostome: Huit catéchèses baptismales, Paris, 1957, pp. 215ff.).

¹⁴ Sir 7:30—“With all your strength love the One who made you and do not forsake his ministers”; cf. Deut 12:19—“See that you do not forsake the Levite”; Tob 4:3—“Honor your mother and do not forsake her”; Prov 27:10—“Do not forsake your friend”; Sir 3:16; 9:10; 29:16—“the ingrate forsakes the one who has saved him.” —After the Roman conflagration in AD 64, the terrorized Christians had to go underground. Cowardice was common in such circumstances: Heliodorus refused to help Appian by appearing with him before the emperor (P.Oxy. 33, 7ff.). Libon, accused of plotting revolution, “went from house to house imploring the support of those close to him, seeking a voice that would be heard in his favor; everyone refused him on various pretexts, but in reality out of fear” (Tacitus, Ann. 2.29); “Who among us dreamed of defending Servius Sulla and Publius and M. Leca and C. Cornelius? Who of those here present offered their assistance? No one. Why? Because in other kinds of trials, people of good will think that they are obligated not to abandon even the guilty, when they are their friends; but with an accusation such as this, one would be guilty not only of thoughtlessness, but even in a sense of participation in the crime, if one defended a person that one suspected of being implicated in a coup against the country” (Cicero, Sull. 2.6).

¹⁵ Cf. Josh 22:3—“You have not abandoned your brothers.” Elisha to Elijah: “I will not leave you” (2Kgs 2:2); Joseph did not forsake virtue (Josephus, Ant. 2.40).

ε—γκομβόομαι

enkomboomai, to attach, fasten enkomboomai, S 1463; TDNT 2.339; EDNT 1.377; MM 180; L&N 49.9; BAGD 216

A denominative verb formed from kombos, “knot, buckle,” this biblical hapax means “attach, fasten.”¹ It evokes the large apron that workers or slaves fitted or fastened to their tunics to protect them.² 1Pet prescribes buttoning or fastening to oneself (the verb in the middle voice) humility in mutual relations.³ There is possibly a reminiscence of the symbolic gesture of Jesus in girding himself with a towel, in the manner of a slave, to wash the feet of his apostles.⁴ We might also remember the sash that slaves wore on their shoulder to distinguish them from freemen.⁵ In any event any Christian should present himself before his neighbor in an attitude of modesty, reserve, and self-renunciation,⁶ thanks to a humility that is solidly fitted and manifest.

¹ Epicharmus, frag. 7: εἰ—γε μὲν ὅτι ε—γκεκόμβωται καλω—ς (G. Kaibel, Comicorum Graecorum Fragmenta, p. 92). Apollodorus of Carystus, frag. 4: τὴν ε—πωμίδα πτύξασα διπλὴν ἄνωθεν ε—νεκομβωσάμην (J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 3 A, p. 186).

² Longus 2.33.3: “the child cast off his apron (or his coverall, ε—γκόμβωμα) and, light in his tunic, followed his course”; Julius Pollux, Onom. 4.18.119, describes one type: τῇ δὲ τω—ν δούλων ε—ξωμίδι, καὶ ἰ—ματίδιόν τι πρόσκειται λευκὸν, ὃ ε—γκόμβωμα λέγεται. Cf. the aprons (σιμικίνθια) of St. Paul at Ephesus (Acts 19:12). C. Bigg, Epistles of St. Peter, Edinburgh, 1901, pp. 190ff.

³ For the grammatical construction, cf. J. N. D. Kelly, A Commentary on the Epistles of Peter and of Jude, London, 1969, p. 205.

⁴ John 13:5 (cf. A. Charrue, Les Epîtres catholiques, Paris, 1938, p. 471). This would explain the choice of this exceptional verb, when the NT, following the LXX (Ps 109:18-19) uses ε—νδύω for virtues: to put on = to arm oneself with faith and love (1Thess 5:8; Col 3:12), with strength (Luke 24:49), to put on a panoply of weapons of light (Rom 13:12; Eph 6:11); here, it is a matter of enveloping oneself and keeping oneself tightly wrapped: “wrap yourselves. . . .”

⁵ Cf. E. G. Selwyn, The First Epistle of St. Peter, London, 1947, pp. 234, 423.

⁶ Rom 12:16. The connection humility-modesty-love of neighbor was recognized by the pagans (cf. S. Rehr, Das Problem der Demut in der profan-griechischen Literatur, Münster, 1961, pp. 136ff.) and the Jews (1QS 5.23–25; cf. M. S. Enslin, The Ethics of Paul, New York, 1957, pp. 254–276).

ἔθος, εἰ—θισμένος (ε—θίζω)

ethos, custom; eithismenos (ethizo), accustomed

ethos, S 1485; TDNT 2.372–373; EDNT 1.384; NIDNTT 2.436–438, 455; MM 181; L&N 41.25; BAGD 218–219 | eithismenos (ethizo), EDNT 1.381; MM 181; L&N 41.26; BAGD 2

The substantive ethos has at least four meanings in the NT.

I. — Personal custom. — On Thursday of the last week at Jerusalem, Jesus “went according to his custom (kata to ethos) to the Mount of Olives” (Luke 22:39; cf. 21:37; John 18:2). This meaning is common in the papyri: “as is your habit (hos ethos esti soi), use your influence” (P.Fay. 125, 5); “it is our custom”;¹ “even though it is not his custom” (P.Brem. 54, 8). Heb 10:25 denounces “the habit of some (ethos tisin)” of forsaking church meetings (ten episynagogen); many times they excuse themselves individually. Doing so has become a custom,² inspired by various motives, all worthy of censure.³

II. — Social, religious, traditional custom. — Propriety requires conforming to the uses and customs sanctioned by the usage of honest folk in certain circles and practiced since a certain time: that which is done in the usual manner.⁴ King Alexander sent to Jonathan “a gold buckle such as it is customary to give to the king’s relatives.”⁵ Banking transactions are carried out kata to ethos (according to custom);⁶ prices are established in advance by usage (ex ethous, P.Grenf. I, 48, 15). Rites and liturgical prescriptions set particular behavior of observant folk. It was custom that fixed the drawing of lots to determine which priest would offer the incense.⁷ When Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus took Jesus’ body, wrapped it with bandages and aromatic herbs, and John 19:40 specifies “as is the burial custom of the Jews” (kathos ethos estin tois loudaiois entaphiazein), we must translate “regularly,” just as circumcision is carried out kata to ethos (SB 15, 30; 16, 18; 9027, 21; BGU 2216, 28).

III. — Common usage and legal rule. — If there is a “force of habit” (Epictetus 3.12.6: to ethos ischyron proegetai; Philo, Joseph 83; Decalogue 137; Abraham 185; Spec. Laws 2.109) and if there is a moral obligation to conform to good usages,⁸ a custom that is universal and has long been traditional⁹ tends to take on more and more of the force of law. Denouncing the divinization of a dead child, Wis 14:16 notes, “This impious custom (to asebes ethos) was kept as a law (hos nomos ephylachthe).” Ethos is as obligatory as nomos. Moreover, “law did not exist in the time of Homer . . . peoples continued to follow unwritten customs.”¹⁰ The idea has been defended that in the papyri ethos has no normative value and usually expresses only a state of affairs with no constraining force;¹¹ but in Egypt it has the value of customary law, because judicial sanction raises usages based on practice alone to the rank of positive law.¹² Philo observed that “a custom introduced different legal principles from city to city, not the same principles for all” (Husbandry 43; cf. Migr. Abr. 90); “customs are unwritten laws, decrees taken by men of former times and inscribed . . . in the souls of those who belong to the same commonwealth” (Spec. Laws 4.149; cf. 150; To Gaius 115). Thus in AD 68, the prefect of Egypt, Tiberius Julius Alexander, prescribes that “no one shall be compelled to tax farming or to other leasing of inherited property against the general usage of the provinces” (para to koinon ethos ton eparchon —BGU 1563, 30; cf.

P.Princ. 119, 52; Philo, To Gaius 161). In the second century, the edict of the prefect T. Haterius Nepos commands of priests in charge of temples: “They shall avoid infringing customs, in keeping with [the dignity of the sanctuaries].”¹³ Contracts stipulate obligations in conformity with custom (P.Brem. 36, 17; P.Oxy. 1887, 11; P.Ross.Georg. III, 32, 10).

It is in this sense of Roman consuetudo (“repeated usage of a traditional juridical rule”) that we must understand Luke 2:42—when Jesus was twelve years old, his parents went up to Jerusalem “as was the custom for the feast (of Passover)”; kata to ethos tes heortes is, in fact, a legal obligation (Deut 16:16; cf. Exod 23:17; 34:23; m. Īag. 1.1), imposed only on men but extended by tradition to pious women. With the same meaning: “We must sacrifice today, in the customary fashion (kata to ethos) in this feast called Pascha” (Josephus, Ant. 2.313; P.Oxy. 1464, 4), again with Joseph and Mary taking the child Jesus to the temple “to accomplish the customary requirements of the law regarding him” (Luke 2:27); kata to eithismenon, literally, “according to the custom of the law”¹⁴ is the constant way of referring to a legal requirement.¹⁵

IV. — Roman law. — Festus, in explaining to King Agrippa the matter concerning Paul, says, “It is not the custom of the Romans (ouk estin ethos Rhomaiois) to hand over an accused person before he has, in the presence of his accusers, been given the opportunity to respond to the charge.”¹⁶ The formula kata Rhomaiois ethos or kata ta Rhomaion ethe is copiously used by Josephus¹⁷ and in the papyri,¹⁸ sometimes in the sense of a habitual way of acting, constant usage, sometimes—usually—in the technical sense for Roman law. Here we have a clear reference to normative and obligatory usage: that of Roman trial law. The juris studiosus that St. Luke was, according to the Muratorian Canon, would admire the equity of the imperial official, because not to take account of the custom would be to scorn aequitas.¹⁹ Given respect for legal form, it was absolutely necessary to have witnesses appear and give the accused the chance to defend himself.²⁰ In this case, ethos refers to an inexorable obligation.

V. — The “customs of Moses” and the “customs of our fathers.” — In Acts 6:14; 15:1, the ethe that Moses passed on to his people are in view. These became the “customs of the Jews” (Acts 26:23; Josephus, War 7.50), venerable because they were ancestral²¹ and national (Acts 16:21). Not to “walk according to these customs” (mede tois ethesin peripatein) is apostasy against Moses (Acts 21:21; Philo, Dreams 2.123). The constantly used plural could allude to religious or liturgical usages like the Sabbath (Josephus, Ant. 12.259; 14.245, 246, 258, 263), circumcision (BGU 82, 12: peritmethenai kata to ethos; Josephus, Ant. 1.214), ablutions and purifications (Josephus, Ant. 6.235), sacrifices (9.262, 263; 16.35), the distinction between clean and unclean animals, fasting (Ag. Apion 2.282), etc.²² In reality, it is a question of the fundamental institutions that the chosen people received from God, namely, the law and the traditional observances necessary for “being saved” (Acts 15:1), that is, for entering the messianic kingdom. These separate Israel from the whole sinful gentile world (Philo, Moses 2.193; Spec. Laws 3.29; Josephus, Ant. 4.137; 16.42). “The customs of the Jews” (P.Lond. 1912, 86) can, to be sure, point to a certain way of life, customs proper, and even certain legal provisions, but in actual usage it is a technical term for Israelite religion as practiced by its faithful,²³ opposed as such to the “customs of the Romans.”²⁴

¹ P.Laur. 1, 5 and 12; cf. PSI 1333, 12; SB 7993, 12; P.Mert. 5, 20; P.Oxy. 900, 7: “those who habitually fill this job” (cf. 471, 18, a lawyer speaking: “once accustomed to his shame”—ἄπαξ γὰρ ἐν ἔθει τῆς αἰσχύνῃς γεγόμενον); 3057, 27, a disturbed spirit: οὐχ ἔθος ἐχούσης ἡρεμειν; P.Ryl. 238, 6: “all that they are accustomed to receive”; P.Oxy. 2778, 5: “the custom is to give barley to asses”; Josephus, Ant. 6.226: it was David’s habit to eat with the king; 7.130, to take a walk at that hour; 8.186, to mount his chariot wearing white; 17.183: the habitual manner of Herod to eat an apple; T. Abr. A 2.2—“it was his custom to greet and welcome all.” SB 10989, 52: πονηρὸς ἔθος; 11240, 15: διδόναι τὴν συνήθειαν πρὸς τὸ παλαιὸν ἔθος (AD 6/7); P.Laur. 60, 5: “Day before yesterday, after being well closed, according to habit, our enclosure. . . .”

² Absolutely contrary to the exigencies of Jewish piety: “Those who love the assemblies of the saints” (οἱ ἀγαπῶντες συναγωγὰς ὁσίων) were diligent at attending synagogue meetings (Pss. Sol. 16.20; cf. 18). At Penticapaea in the Crimea, in AD 80, Chreste, the widow of Drusus, frees her slave Heracles, gives him complete liberty, “with the right to go freely wherever he pleases . . . except regarding the proseuche, which he shall owe devotion and diligence” (CII, n. 683; cf. 684). Cf. John Chrysostom, Discourse 6, which is addressed “to those who have forsaken the synaxis” (A. Wenger, Jean Chrusostome: Huit catéchèses baptismales, Paris, 1957, pp. 215ff.).

³ Through simple negligence, or deliberately; through egoism, refusing to “give oneself” to the common life and thus depriving oneself of the fruits of brotherly love; through pride or scorn for one’s brethren (cf. 1Cor 11:18-22; Jude 19); probably through fear of advertising their faith in times of persecution, not wanting to compromise themselves, they somehow abandon the community with its risks and dangers, not bringing it the support of numbers and of courage; these are “slackers” (ἐγκαταλείποντες).

⁴ P.Wisc. 34, 10; 35, 3; P.Rein. 115, 17: “as is the custom among you, supply the expenses of the soldier”; SB 9328, 5. Epitaph of Hermocrates, a gymnastic trainer: “I did not fail in this custom” (οὐκ ἀπέληγον ἔθους, E. Bernard, Inscriptions métriques, n. XXII, col. III, 3); Epitaph of Ammonia: “Say, as is the custom, ‘Greetings, excellent Ammonia’” (ibid. XXXIII, 9); epitaph of Makaria (Christian): “it is the custom of pious folk” (ibid. LX, 4). There are demands contrary to custom (P.Fam.Tebt. 15, 86: παρὰ τὸ αἶθος). Each people has its mores or its peculiar customs: the Persians (Philo, Spec. Laws 3.13); the Egyptians (Josephus, Ant. 1.66; Ag. Apion 1.317; 2.139); the Scythians (Ag. Apion 2.269); the Greeks (Ant. 12.263). These are “foreign customs” (Ant. 9.243, 290; 20.47, 81). “Our own Boeotian customs” (Plutarch, De gen. 33). Cf. Porphyry, Abst. 1.13.5: “This practice exists even among the barbarians”; 1.30.2: “people are impregnated with passions, mores, and usages that do not belong to their race and for which they have been inclined”; Strabo 1.2.8: “the habits of childhood”; Chariton, Chaer. 4.1.12: “Mithridates went to bed according to his custom.” Before Antiphon, “people were not yet in the habit of writing up their speeches” (Ps.-Plutarch, X orat. 832 d).

⁵ 1Macc 10:89; Josephus, Ant. 13.102. On fibulae, honorific distinctions, cf. L. Robert, Noms indigènes, pp. 445ff.

⁶ P.Oxy. 370; P.Ryl. 78, 17; P.Grenf. I, 48, 15; P.Lond. 171 b 19 (vol. 2, p. 176); P.Oxy. 2995, 2: “you have given the gold due according to custom” (δέδωκας τὸν ὀφειλόμενον ε—ξ ἔθους); Philo, Unchang. God 169.

⁷ Luke 1:9—κατὰ τὸ ἔθος τῆς ἱ—ερατείας; cf. m. Tamid 3.1; 5.2; m. Yoma 2.4; Josephus, War 6.299: “The priests, according to their custom (ὡσπερ αὐτοί—ς ἔθος), entered the temple at night for the ritual worship”; 6.300: “the feast [of tabernacles] for which it is customary that all pitch tents in honor of God”; cf. 1.25, 153; 2.410; 4.182: τω—ν ἱ—ερω—ν ε—θω—ν; 582; Ant. 3.129; Bel (Theodotion) 15: “The priests came during the night according to their custom with their wives and their children”; SB 9340, 7: “It is the custom of the priests of the great god Souchou”; P.Fouad 10, 10; BGU 250, 17; P.Oxy. 1848, 5; PSI 208, 6; P.Oxy. 2797, 3: a list of articles for a sacrifice: κατὰ τὸ ἔθος τῆς θυσίας. The custom is to reserve a part of the victim for the priests (inscription of Nimrud Dagh, in IGLS I, 152).

⁸ Cf. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Comp. 6.25.39: “long practice finally gave habit the force of nature.”

⁹ P.Lond. 2041, 10: “This is the custom everywhere” (ἔθος δε—στιν τοῦτο πανταχοῦ); Josephus, Ant. 15.288, τω—ν κοινω—ν ε—θω—ν; P.Köln 54, 15, πρὸς τὸ παλαιὸν ἔθος; I.Bulg. 1581, 28 and 31; P.Oxy. 3178, 7: “At my own risk and according to the previous custom (κατὰ τὸ προάγον ἔθος), I choose to serve the above-mentioned komarchia ”; epitaph of the scribe

Ammonius: “We invoke you . . . with very pure libations and offerings full of regret, according to the ancient custom of our ancestors” (ἀρχαίους ὡς πάρος ε—στὶν ἔθος, E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. XLIV, 16); κατὰ ἀρχαι—ον ἔθισμα Λινδίων (rule relative to the Sminthian Games at Lindus), in LSCG, n. 139, 14–15. Josephus, War 4.154: ἔθος ἀρχαι—ον. The inhabitants of Andromachis deprived the inhabitants of Theadelphia of water, though they had it by long custom (τοῦ ἀρχαίου ἔθους, P.Ryl. 653, 9; cf. 676, 12: τὸ ε—ξ ἀρχῆς ἔθος; P.Gen. 7, 8; SB 9016, col. I, 9; II, 14); κατὰ τὸ ἀεὶ ἔθος τοῦ κάστρου (SB 5276 a; 5589). We must not forget that for Aristotle habit “is a perfection that our nature is apt to receive” (Eth. Nic. 2.1.1103a23–25), the practice of the moral virtues supposes the convergence of nature, intelligence, and habit; hence the three sources of education: φύσις, ἔθος, διδασχῆ (M. Defourny, Aristote: Etude sur la “Politics,” Paris, 1932, pp. 276ff.). Musonius Rufus wonders which is more efficacious for the acquisition of virtue, theory or practice (ἔθος ἢ λόγος)? He answers: theory teaches what good conduct is, while practice is the habit of those who are accustomed to act according to this theory. Practice is more efficacious, as can be seen with physicians, pilots, and musicians who are learned or experienced (frag. 5, ed. C. E. Lutz, p. 48). “One would never go wrong in affirming that character is simply prolonged habit and that the so-called moral virtues are simple virtues acquired by habit” (Ps.-Plutarch, De lib. ed. 2 F-3 A); “One must get to the root of the disease of garrulity by creating a habit” (Plutarch, De garr. 19.511 E); “the respect of people who are his superiors in merit and in age and will give the garrulous person the habit of holding his peace” (ibid. 23.514 E); habit is a training: God helps us progress in virtue by making us “accustomed” to the virtuous life (De prof. in virt. 3.76 D; cf. Cons. ux. 9.611 B); “Habit and exercise already permit reason to extirpate a large part of the innate passions” (De gen. 15). Cf. E. Schütrumpf, Die Bedeutung des Wortes ethos in der Poetik des Aristoteles (Zemata 49), 1970.

¹⁰ Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.155. This author very often links ἔθη καὶ νόμιμα or νόμοι (Ant. 11.217; 14.216; 15.254, 328; 16.172; War 2.160, 195; 5.237; Ag. Apion 2.164; Life 198); cf. Ant. 9.243: Ahaz, in violation of the laws of his country, immolates his son according to Canaanite custom; 11.212; War 5.236, 402: “The Romans . . . out of deference for your law, transgress many of their own customs.” I.Bulg. 317, 7–8: ἀπογράφεσθαι κατὰ τὸν νόμον τῆς πόλεως καὶ τὸ ἔθος. In a lease related to a garden, προστάγματα, διαγράμματα, and customs are mentioned side by side as bases for the ways of paying charges (BGU 1118, 22; cf. C.Ord.Ptol. 114). These terms are constantly associated in Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.30, 43; Sacr. Abel and Cain 15; Worse Attacks Better 87; Post. Cain 181; Unchang. God 17; Drunkenness 193, 195, 198; Prelim. Stud. 85; Change of Names 104; Dreams 2.78; Joseph 29, 42, 230; Moses 1.324; 2.19;

Spec. Laws 4.16; Virtues 65, 219; Prelim. Stud. 106; Flacc. 52; To Gaius 134, 210, 360.

¹¹ H. D. Schmitz, “Τὸ ἔθος und verwandte Begriffe in den Papyri,” diss. Cologne, 1970 (reviewed and criticized by J. Modrzejewski, “Bibliographie de papyrologie juridique,” in APF, 1978, pp. 184ff.). Cf. the innumerable examples supplied by R. Taubenschlag, “Customary Law and Custom in the Papyri,” in JJP, 1946, pp. 41–54; republished, idem, Opera Minora, vol. 2, pp. 91–106. At Ephesus, the quaestor T. Flavius Vedius Apellas is the object of an honorific decree, λόγων καὶ ἤθους ἔνεκεν (I.Ephes., vol. 3, n. 678, 19).

¹² J. Modrzejewski, Loi et coutume dans l’Egypte grecque et romaine, Paris, 1970; idem, “La Règle de droit dans l’Egypte romaine,” in Proceedings XII, pp. 317–377, cites P.Oxy. 583, a constitution of Domitian, forbidding the requisitioning without imperial authorization of lodging and draught animals and denouncing “an ancient and persistent usage that is in danger of gaining the force of law,” παλαιὰ καὶ εἶθονος συνήθεια κατ’ὀλίγον χωροῦσα εἰς νόμον (IGLS, 1998, 15–16; cf. N. Lewis, “Domitian’s Order on Requisitioned Transport and Lodgings,” in RIDA, 1968, pp. 135–142). Local laws, surviving from provincial customs (consuetudo provinciae, mores regionis) were integrated into imperial law after the edict of Caracalla in 212 (Gaius, Dig. 21.2.6). Menander of Laodicea, Epidict., notes that the cities are henceforth governed by “the common laws of the Romans who govern us,” but that each nevertheless retains “customs that are peculiar to it and worthy of praise.”

¹³ P.Fouad 10, 13; cf. PSI 1149, 10: ἰ—ερατικὸς νόμος Σεμνουθι = ancient usage; P.Lund IV, 1, 6–7.

¹⁴ On the perfect passive participle εἰ—θισμένος (from ε—θίζω), a NT hapax, cf. 2Macc 14:30; Philo, Moses 2.205; Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.225, the Egyptians, who worshiped animals, “had been accustomed from the beginning to false ideas concerning the gods” (εἰ—θισμένοι δοξάζειν περὶ θεω—ν); Ant. 11.16; P.Oxy. 1454, 16; BGU 1073, 12.

¹⁵ Customary right, distinct from written law, is the ensemble of juridical rules made up by customs. These are collective habitual ways of acting, consented to at the outset by those who observe them, and transmitted from generation to generation. Customs are usages, practices, and behaviors rendered normative by their antiquity or frequency.

¹⁶ Acts 25:16. Cf. J. Dupont, “Aequitas Romana: Notes sur Actes 25, 16,” in RSR, 1961, pp. 354–385.

¹⁷ Josephus, War 3.15, Vespasian “arranges the marching order of his army according to the Roman custom”; 124, a centurion watches over him, according to this same custom; 4.13, 17; SB 10894, 2; 11233, 2.

¹⁸ Regarding the enrollment of a child “according to Roman law” (Pap.Lugd.Bat. II, 2, 4; 6, 2 and 8; P.Corn. 12, 10), the registering of an inheritance (P.Oxf. 7, 2), of the sale of a slave (P.Oxy. 2777, 11), of a grain deposit (3049 A 5; B 6–7), of a woman acting without kyrios to sell a part of her house (2236, 8; cf. 2566, col. I, 4; II, 4) or with a kyrios κατὰ τὰ Ῥωμαίων ἔθη in an act of emancipation (published by S. Daris, “Note su liberti,” in SPap, 1979, p. 7) or again pleading from the jus liberorum (P.Mich. 627, 4; P.Wisc. 58, 6; P.Stras. 264, 6; PSI 1067, 11; 1258, 4; BGU 96, 15; 1662, 4, 20; 2070, col. I, 6; P.Aberd. 180, 2; Stud.Pal. XX, 29, 14; SB 5832; 7838, 5; 7843, 4; 8940, 3; 9573, 5) or a marriage contract (ἔθει Ῥωμαικῶ— καὶ χωρεῖς πάσης ἀντιλογίας καὶ ζητήσεως, P.Ness. 18, 20; 20, 21) . . . absolutely everyone claims to conform to the requirements of Roman law.

¹⁹ Cf. Cicero, Verr. 3.60: “nihil valuisse aequitatem, nihil consuetudinem.”

²⁰ Some cite the trial of Coriolanus (Dionysius of Halicarnassus 7.26 and 52); Plutarch, C. Gracch. 3.7: “It is an ancestral custom among us that when a man accused of a capital crime does not appear, a trumpeter is sent to his gate at dawn and calls him with his instrument, and the judges cannot pronounce sentence before. So prudent and circumspect were our fathers in their judgments”; Appian, BCiv. 3.54: “The law stipulates that the accused should hear his accusers in person and not be judged before presenting his defense.” Claudius, in AD 46 (BGU 611 = R. Cavenaile, Corpus Papyrorum Latinarum, Wiesbaden, 1956, n. 236) defends the accused against the tyranny of the accusers; likewise Nero (BGU 628; R. Cavenaile, Corpus Papyrorum Latinarum, n. 237). Hence Dig. 48.17.1: “Et hoc jure utimur, ne absentes damnentur neque enim inaudita causa quemquam damnari aequitatis ratio patitur.” In truth, this is elementary justice: “Does our law condemn a man without first hearing him and finding out what he has done?” (John 7:51; cf. Josephus, Ant. 16.258).

²¹ Acts 28:17—τοι—ς ἔθεσι τοι—ς πατρώοις; 2Macc 11:25, Antiochus decides that the temple should be returned to the Jews and that they may live according to their ancestral customs (τὰ ἐ—πὶ τω—ν προγόνων ἀὐτω—ν ἔη); 4Macc 18:5; I.Magn. 100 b 12, κατὰ τὸ πάτριον ἔθος; Josephus, War 2.195, 220; 4.102, 136; 7.424; Ant. 5.90: ancestral institutions; 5.101, 113; 8.340. Dittenberger, Syl. 764, 11: κατὰ τὸ τω—ν προγόνων ἔθος (AD 45); 1073, 20: κατὰ τὸ πάτριον τω—ν ἀγώνων ἔθος.

²² Cf. Josephus, War 2.1, 143, 313, 425; 5.236; 6.300. In Israel, “usages that took on the force of law became traditions . . . God’s will, received by Moses, transmitted by him and since him in an unbroken chain” (J. Bonsirven, Judaïsme palestinien, vol. 1, p. 267).

²³ H. I. Bell, Jews and Christians in Egypt, p. 37; cf. Philo, To Gaius 115: “The Jews, having been taught from infancy, so to speak . . . by the holy laws (the Torah) and also by the unwritten traditions (τω—ν ι—ερω—ν νόμων καὶ ἔτι τω—ν ἀγράφων ε—θω—ν) to believe in one God alone”; Flacc. 48, 50, 53; To Gaius 201, 210; Josephus, Life 198: “If they invoked my knowledge of the laws, they would declare: Neither are we ignorant of the customs of our fathers”; Ant. 4.198; 9.95: τὰ πάτρια τω—ν Ἑβραίων ἔθη καὶ τὴν τοῦ θεοῦ θρησκείαν; 12.126, 261, 271; 13.397; 14.260; 19.283: “Augustus wanted the subject nations to remain faithful to their own customs (ε—μμένοντας τοι—ς ι—δίοιθ ἔεσιν) and not be compelled to violate the religion of their fathers (τὴν πάτριον θρησκείαν)”; 19.311; 20.75, 139; Ag. Apion 2.10, 179. It is known that Josephus never drafted the περὶ ἔθων καὶ αἰ—τιω—ν that he said he would write (Ant. 1.25; 4.198; 20.268).

²⁴ Acts 16:21. Cf. W. C. van Unnik (Sparsa Collecta, Leiden, 1973, pp. 374–385), who cites Valerius Maximus: the praetor peregrinus Gnaeus Cornelius Hispalus required the Jews who had tried to corrupt Roman mores (Romanos inficere mores) by the cult of Jupiter Sabazius to return to their country” (in T. Reinach, Textes d’auteurs grecs et romains relatifs au Judaïsme, 2d ed., Hildesheim, 1963, p. 259, n. 141); Dio Cassius 50.25.3, Augustus is angry before his soldiers: “Antony today is abandoning the customs of his country (τὰ πάτρια τοῦ βίου ἦθη) to adopt strange and barbarous customs, respecting neither us, nor the laws, nor the gods of our ancestors”; 67.14: Domitian “reproached (the consul Flavius Clemens, his cousin, who had as his wife Domitilla his relative) for impiety, for which also a number of citizens were condemned who were guilty of embracing the Jewish religion” (ε—ς τὰ τω—ν —Ιουδαίων ἔθη).

ει—κὼν

eikon, image, representation

eikon, S 1504; TDNT 2.381–397; EDNT 1.388–391; NIDNTT 2.286–288, 292–293; MM 183; L&N 6.96, 58.35, 58.61; BAGD 222

The noun “image” is the first word uttered by God in his relations with humans (Gen 1:26-27). It is not said that it was uttered in Hebrew. If its original meaning is difficult to determine, its doctrinal density in the NT is considerable as well, since it is essential to biblical anthropology, to Christology, to soteriology, and to eschatology.¹

I. — The first meaning of eikon is “image, effigy, representation,” whether a painting, a statue, or a figure stamped on a coin (Herodotus 2.130; Philo, Change of Names 93; Virtues 4; Matt 22:20). “Before a shining mirror, Glaucike arranged her hair, smiling at the lifeless image of her person.”² For Plato, those who observe an eclipse of the sun must look at the image of the star in water or some other substance of this type (Phd. 99 d). That is to say, the image is very different from the likeness, because it is very close to the shadow: “What I call image is first of all shadows (tas skias), then appearances that show themselves in the water and those that form on surfaces that are dense, attractive, and shiny, and every other representation of this sort” (Resp. 6.509 e; 510 e: skiai kai eikones; Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.96: “God is the image of his shadow, called shadow”—skia; cf. Heb 10:1).

In the LXX, eikon ’s dominant nuance is “representation, reproduction, figure” (1Sam 6:11—“the images [Hebrew selem] of the tumors” and is sometimes used in an artistic sense: an artisan casts a statue—Isa 40:19, Hebrew pesel; Ezek 16:17; Dan 2:31-35; 3:1-18); the images of the Chaldeans (Hebrew selem) drawn on the wall in vermilion (Ezek 23:14); the father “makes an image of his child who was too soon snatched away from him” (Wis 14:15). Sometimes it is synonymous with eidolon.³ In the Hellenistic period, in literary texts,⁴ the papyri,⁵ and especially the inscriptions, eikon refers to all kinds of art (P.Oxy. 3094, 44), painting or statuary, in the sense of “portrait.” Apion, a young recruit in the navy of Misenum in the second century BC: “I gave my little portrait to Euctemon to take to you” (epempsa soi eikonin mou dia Euktemonos, BGU 423, 21).

These portraits and statues are ordered out of filial devotion and usually with a religious intention,⁶ as is attested by acts of endowment, as in the third century BC Agasicratis established an endowment at Calauria in the Argolid: one adult victim was to be sacrificed to Poseidon and another to Zeus Soter, and “the altar shall be prepared near the statue of Sophanes, the husband of the testatrix.”⁷ “We have set up this portrait of Neiloussa, wife of Parthenopaios, our mother, in a sanctuary.”⁸

Honorific decrees ordering the erection of statues in honor of famous or important people are numerous. Athens ordered “a bronze statue” of the poet Philippides set up at the theater;⁹ the priests of Thebes ordered one for the general Callimachus;¹⁰ Miletus ordered one for Eirenias (“let a golden portrait of him be set up at the place designated by the people”);¹¹ the confederation of the Magnesians ordered one in honor of Demetrias, secretary of the federal council (“let his portrait be set up at a place that he shall choose”).¹²

Given that the sovereign, such as Ptolemy Epiphanes, is the “living image of Zeus, son of Helios,”¹³ numerous statues are raised (tas ton basileon eikonas).¹⁴ They are placed in the temples where they function in the cult.¹⁵ At Athens, during the imperial period, there was a zakoros, a religious official, a kind of sacristan, in charge of the “images” of the emperors (ton theion eikonon), that is, their portraits, or more precisely, busts, which were venerated.¹⁶ At Pergamum, hymnodoi are linked to the celebration of the imperial cult (hymnodoi eis eikonas ton Sebaston, I.Perg., 374). In 193 BC, Antiochus III instituted “high priestesses who shall wear gold crowns that shall have her portrait” for the cult of Laodice;¹⁷ that is, they bear the queen’s bust. It is easy to understand the indignation of the Jews when the Roman officials presume to set up imperial statues in the synagogues,¹⁸ as well as the denunciation in Rev 13:14-15 of the superstition regarding talking statues and images of the emperors: “all those who bow down before the image of the Beast shall be killed.”¹⁹

II. — Because an image not only implies the likeness of a copy to a model, but derives from an earlier reality, it implies a relation of dependency and of origination; and possessing to some extent the same “form,” it resembles its precursor. It is in this sense that God decides, “Let us make man in our image (Hebrew demûth) and according to our likeness (selem),” (Gen 1:26). He has a nature akin to God’s (Gen 9:6), like a son begotten by his father.²⁰ This is clearly a term of honor:²¹ man is crowned with glory (Ps 8:5; Sir 17:3ff.). He is sharply distinguished from the animals created before him; he rules the earth,²² probably because of his faculties of intelligence and volition.²³ In any event, “God made man the image of his own eternity” (Wis 2:23), so that we must at least conclude that “to be the image” means “to participate in the being” (Plato, Prm. 132 d) and the life; here, that of the “living God.”

III. — There are many degrees in representation. There is only one adequate image of God, his Son.²⁴ Here eikon means not so much resemblance as derivation and participation; it is not so much the likeness of a copy to its model, but the revelation and, as it were, emanation of the prototype.²⁵ The image of something is its expression, the thing itself expressed. Here, by the incarnation, Christ manifests the Father (cf. Col 2:9—“in him dwells bodily [by the incarnation] all the fullness of the godhead”). In and by his image, God becomes visible. The emphasis falls simultaneously on the equality, if not identity (consubstantial will be the word) of the eikon with the original, and on the authentic representativeness of Jesus, for the one who was en morphe theou (in the form of God) and einai isa theo (equal with God, Phil 2:6) could say “the one who has seen me has seen the Father.”²⁶

IV. — In the NT, a new anthropology is superimposed on the old; the elect are predestined to be conformed to the image of the Son of God,²⁷ associated with his glory (cf. Phil 3:21). On the model of the first creation, the “image” of the baptized is “conformed” to the prototype of the archegos, because it depends on him and reproduces him, and thus represents or manifests him, because it has the same “form” (cf. Gal 4:19), that is, a new existential condition.²⁸ The eikon takes on ontological meaning, because the person-image achieves a new spiritual state, we might even say a transformation of his being, which—as a living portrait—will share the glorious condition of the resurrected Son.

This eschatological reproduction will not be consummated until the resurrection; it is realized here below through a progressive assimilation to the one first glorified: “As we have borne the resemblance (ten eikona) of the one who was of the dust, so shall we bear the image of the one who is heavenly” (1Cor 15:49). The continuous process is evoked in 2Cor 3:18—“All reflecting on unveiled faces the glory of the Lord, we are metamorphosed into the same resemblance (ten auten eikona metamorphoumetha) from glory to glory, as by the action of the Lord, [who is] spirit.”²⁹ Glory (doxa) is participation in the divine nature (cf. 2Pet 1:4; Heb 1:3) and puts the emphasis on a luminous manifestation, analogous to that of the transfiguration (cf. Matt 17:2; Mark 9:2). This change or growth in quality is a spiritualization that transfigures Christians to resemble their Lord; they change in form (morphe), putting on that of Christ: “The one who cleaves to the Lord is one spirit with him” (ho kollomenos to Kyrio hen pneuma estin, 1Cor 6:17).

This conformity to Christ, by grace and by glory, cannot but fulfill the divine plan for the resemblance of man to God (Gen 1:26), according to Col 3:10—“You have put on the new man, that which is directed toward true knowledge in being renewed according to the image of its creator” (anakainoumenon . . . kat’ eikona tou ktisantos auton). The newness has to do with belonging to the Lord, which implies a vital participation and allows the believer to become an image÷reproduction, in the following manner: the Son of God, the firstborn of a multitude of brethren, having assimilated himself to the likeness of our human nature, passes on to us the conformity to his own “exemplary” filiation, by means of which we are authentic sons of God (John 1:12), “of his race” (Acts 17:28), and his heirs. This forms the basis of an entire ethic, that of purification, imitation, and progress.³⁰

¹ To the bibliography supplied by C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, pp. 689ff., add H. Willms, Εἰ—κὼν: Eine begriffsgeschichtliche Untersuchung zum Platonismus, Münster, 1935; K. L. Schmidt, “Homo imago Dei im Alten und Neuen Testament,” in Eranos, vol. 15, 1947; F. W. Eltester, Eikon im Neuen Testament, Berlin, 1958; J. J. Stamm, Die

Gottebenbildlichkeit des Menschen im Alten Testament, Zollikon, 1959; J. Jervell, Imago Dei: Gen I, 26f im Spätjudentum, in der Gnosis und in den paulinischen Briefen, Göttingen, 1960; J. Caravidopoulos, “Εἰ—κὼν θεοῦ” καὶ “κατ’ εἰ—κὼνα θεοῦ” παρὰ τῷ ἀποστόλῳ Παύλῳ, Thessalonica, 1964; H. Wildberger, “Das Abbild Gottes, Gen I, 26–30,” in TZ, 1965, pp. 245–259; O. Loretz, Die Gottebenbildlichkeit des Menschen, Munich, 1967; G. von Rad, Genesis, pp. 55–59; J. Barr, “The Image of God in the Book of Genesis,” in BJRL, 1968, pp. 11–26; L. Scheffczyk, Der Mensch als Bild Gottes, Darmstadt, 1969; J. Jervell, “Imagines und Imago Dei,” in Joseph-Studien (dedicated to Otto Michel), Göttingen, 1974, pp. 197–204; P. Lamarche, “Image,” in Dict.spir., vol. 7, 2, col. 1401–1406 (gives the bibliography).

² Euripides, Med. 1161, ἄψυχον εἰ—κὼν (in contrast to ἔμψυχον εἰ—κὼν). Portrait painted (of the king and his ancestors) in the temples: εἰ—κὼ—ν γράπτῃ (E. Bernand, Fayoum, n. 152, 15, cf. 114, 19; 135, 9. Cf. Plutarch, De Is. et Os. 43: “Apis is the living image of Osiris”; Aristaenetos 1.6; Eusebius, C. Marc. 1.4); Euripides, HF 1002: “then came an image, as Pallas seemed to appear brandishing her spear”; Gorgias, Hel. 17: visual perception stamps the images of seen objects on the intellect (cf. C. Mugler, Terminologie optique, p. 120). Plato, Phlb. 39 b: “a painter, who comes after the writer, draws in the soul images corresponding to the words”; Aristophanes, Ran. 537: “to be planted there like a painting γεγραμμένην εἰ—κὼν ε—στάναι.” —In rhetoric, εἰ—κὼν = comparison; Aristotle, Rh. 3.4.1406b20ff.; Aristophanes, Nub. 559: “borrowing my comparison of eels”; Plato, Resp. 6.487 e: δι’ εἰ—κόνων, to speak by comparison, similitude, metaphor; Philo, Rewards 45; Abraham 153: “vision was created as an image of the soul . . . that has no visible nature”; Wis 17:20—“image of darkness.”

³ Deut 4:16 (Hebrew semel); 2Kgs 11:18—the altars and statues (Hebrew selem) of the house of Baal are broken; 2Chr 33:7; Ezek 7:20; 8:5; Dan 3:1-18 (the gold statue prepared by Nebuchadnezzar); Hos 13:2; Wis 13:13, 16; 14:17; 15:5.

⁴ Philostratus, Gym. 36: “the statues of the fighter Maron” (τὰς εἰ—κὼνας τοῦ παλαιστοῦ Μάρωνος); Philo, Drunkennes 110: “man makes himself images of the sun, of the moon”; 132, 134; Herodian 8.6.2. There is a reproduction or correspondence, cf. Philo, Moses 2.51: “The laws are the image that most resembles the constitution of the universe.”

⁵ Sometimes εἰ—κὼν is the signature affixed at the end of a document (P.Cair.Zen. 59076, 6; SB 6782, 20; 6790, 6; 9223, 9), sometimes the description of a person (P.Oxy. 2349, 23: λαβόντες αὐτῷ—ν ὑπογραφὰς

καὶ εἰ—κόννας; from AD 70), a description (BGU 1059, 7; P.Tebt. 32, 21; P.Oxy. 1022, 8; P.Stras. 79, 10: ε—ν ᾧ αἰ— εἰ—κόνες αὐτῆς δηλοῦνται). P.Fay. 36, 23: εἰ—κόνικα means that the scribe “has drawn up” the act (cf. P.Oxy. 34, col. I, 12; P.Mich. 631, 18). But at the end of the first century εἰ—κονίζειν, literally “depict,” means “establish the identity of” and “sign up for a role” (UPZ 126, 12; discussion of the meaning, ibid., pp. 598ff., and C. Préaux, “La Preuve à l’époque hellénistique,” in La Preuve, Recueils de la Société J. Bodin, vol. 16, Brussels, 1965, p. 187). The εἰ—κονιστής is an official in charge of establishing descriptions (P.Oxy. XXXIV, col. I, 12).

⁶ Plutarch, De Pyth. or. 16.1: “Croesus commissioned a golden statue of his butcher and dedicated it here.”

⁷ C. Michel, Recueil, n. 1344, 7: Παρὰ τὰν εἰ—κόννα τὰν ἀνδρὸς αὐτὰς Σωφάνεος; cf. line 12: “the executors . . . shall clean the statues placed in the most visible place . . . and they shall crown them” (τὰς δὲ εἰ—κόννας καθαρὰς ποιει—ν); Dittenberger, Syl. 993, 13–14; 1106, 20: endowment of Diomedon, around 300 BC, καθαίροντῶ δὲ καὶ τὰς εἰ—κόννας τὰς τῶ—ν προγόνων τῶ—ν Διομέδοντος.

⁸ E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 113. A portrait painted of their mother (εἰ—κὼν γραπτῆ) was dedicated by the children “in the precincts of Pallas,” for whom this mother was a priestess (epitaph from the Cerameicus, in GVI, n. 1741). Some children of a physician dedicate his statue to Asclepius (IGUR, n. 102; cf. 103, 175, 264 B, 6); SB 6154, 10.

⁹ Dittenberger, Syl. 374, 63 (en 287 BC); cf. ibid. 493; II, 3; decree of Histiaeus in honor of the banker Athenodorus of Rhodes. At Balboura, an honorific decree mentions that Stephanus raised a gilded bronze image of his master Caesar Antoninus (C. Naour, “Nouvelles inscriptions de Balboura,” in Ancient Society 9, 1978, p. 171).

¹⁰ SB 8334, 27; cf. R. Hutmacher, Ehrendekret. The polemarchs of Thasos grant an image (εἰ—κὼν), a crown (στέφανος), and honors (τιμαί) to the two brothers Euphrillus and Micas (I.Thas., 192, 16). Some ἰ—ερω—ν εἰ—κόνων, statues or paintings, were given for the cult of the divinities of Samothrace (IG XII [8], 188, 14; cf. P. M. Fraser, Samothrace: The Inscriptions, New York, 1960, p. 112).

¹¹ NCIG, n. 7, col. II, 13.

¹² SEG XXIII, 447, 28. According to the honorific decree of Cyprus for the Dionysiac artists, the portrait of Isidorus shall be placed in the temple of Aphrodite at Paphos, SB 10097, 4.

¹³ Rosetta Stone: εἰ—κόνος ζώσης τοῦ Διὸς, υἱ—οὔ τοῦ ἡλίου (Dittenberger, Or. 90, 3); epithets and titles of protocol, SB 8232, 6, 8, 19; Plutarch, Them. 27.4: ὡς εἰ—κόννα θεοῦ τὰ πάντα σώζοντος; cf. L. Delatte, Les Traités de la royauté d'Ecphante, Diotogène et Sthénidas, Paris, 1942, p. 180.

¹⁴ T. Ihnken, Die Inschriften von Magnesia am Sipylus, Bonn, 1978, pp. 27, 106 = Dittenberger, Or. 229, 85; cf. 332, 10 (= I.Perg., 246); 383, 27; τὰν εἰ—κόννα τοῦ βασιλέως —Αττάλου (Dittenberger, Syl. 672, 63). A letter of Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus designates these imperial images (in silver: περὶ τω—ν ἀργυρω—ν εἰ—κόνων) as τὰς εἰ—κόννας τω—ν αὐτοκρατόρων (Dittenberger, Or. 608, 9, 11).

¹⁵ Rosetta Stone: “Let an image (for King Ptolemy, manifested as a god) be set up in each temple in the most conspicuous place” (Dittenberger, Or. 90, 38); cf. Syl. 1238, 5, τὰς τούτων τω—ν ἀγαλμάτων εἰ—κόννας. At Mytilene, the image of Augustus is designated as τὴν εἰ—κόννα τοῦ θεοῦ (JG, XII, 17). Confirming the privileges granted by Augustus, a letter from Claudius in AD 289 to the Dionysiac artists allows them to raise statues in his honor, thanks to their own devotion, τὰς μὲν ἰ—κόννας ὄν τρόπον εὐσεβούμετα μετὰ τῆθ πρεπούσηθ τιμῆθ ἀνιστάνειν ε—πιτρέπω (P.Oxy. 2476, 2). At Adada in Pisidia, a third-century benefactor offers sacrifices “to the imperial images” (προθύσας δὲ καὶ τω—ν θείων εἰ—κόνων καὶ ἄγω—να ε—πιτελέσας οἴκοθεν, CIG 4379, K,3).

¹⁶ L. Robert, Opera Minora Selecta, II, p. 316, cites Martyrdom of Pionius, 4, where the images of the imperial cult are associated with divine statues (cf. H. Musurillo, Christian Martyrs, p. 143).

¹⁷ L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 7, Paris, 1949, p. 10, line 25. Cf. two [portraits-statues] of King Ptolemy, offered to the god Soknopaios (SEG VIII, 577, 10); “I dedicated this statue of the great Amon” (SB 4243; cf. 7216, 15; 8031, 3; 8349 C 4). Honorific decree for Ptolemy IV Philopator, named εἰ—κόνος ζώσης τοῦ Διὸς, υἱ—οὔ Ἡλίου (SB 10039, 5; Chrest. Wilck., n. 109, 11).

¹⁸ Philo, To Gaius 134, εἰ—κόννας Γαΐου; 138, 334, 346; Philo, Flacc. 41. It is reported that Nahum of Tiberias had “never in his life looked upon an image [of the emperor or a divinity] on a coin” (b. 'Abod. Zar. 42c). Bar Kochba had scandalous images and inscriptions stamped; did not a denarius of Augustus bear the legend, “Emperor Tiberius, adorable son of the adorable god”? Because of Yahweh’s spiritual nature, the OT forbade material representations of him and prohibited images of him (Exod 20:4; Deut 27:15); cf. Kittel, “ει—κόν,” in TDNT, vol. 2, pp. 383–387. J. B. Frey, “Images (chez les Juifs),” in DBSup, vol. 4, col. 199ff. J. Gutmann, “The ‘Second Commandment’ and the Image in Judaism,” in HUCA, 1961, pp. 161–174; G. von Rad, OT Theology, vol. 1, pp. 212ff.

¹⁹ Cf. Rev 14:9-11; 15:2; 16:2; 19:20; 20:4. (J. Schwartz, “Tiberius Claudius Balbillus,” in BIFAO, vol. 49, 1950, pp. 53ff., identifies this prefect of Egypt and councillor to Nero with the “second Beast.”) People worshiped images representing divinities, e.g., Isis (P.Oxy. 1380, 13 g: αι—ει—κόνες καὶ τὰ ζω—α πάντων τω—ν θεω—ν; Dittenberger, Or. 56, 61; decree of Canopus) or Artemis, cf. the endowments of C. Vibius Salutaris, in AD 104, for silver and even gold statuettes of the goddess (H. Wankel, I.Ephes., Bonn, 1979, n. XVII, 24, 29, 149, etc.; XXVIII, 17; XXIX, 18; XXX, 17; XXXI, 18; XXXIII, 20; XXXIV, 18; XXXV, 17). Artabanus: “For us, the noblest law is that which orders that people revere the king and bow down before him as before the image of the god who rules the world” (Plutarch, Them. 27.4), because “resemblance signifies an exact replica that is presented as a real image” (Philo, Creation 72, 134), hence the explanation: “One who respects an old man and an old woman . . . shows that he is thinking of his father and his mother, seeing in them archetypes all of whose reproductions (τὰς ει—κόννας) he reveres” (Spec. Laws 2.237).

²⁰ Gen 5:3—“Adam brought forth a son in his likeness, in his image” (formula which expresses that man has the power to procreate living things); 1Cor 15:49—“We have borne the likeness of the one who was from the dust.” Cf. Plutarch, De Is. et Os. 53: “Every generation is an image in the matter of the impregnating substance, and the creature is produced in the likeness of the being that gave it life.”

²¹ Exploited in 1Cor 11:7—“man is the image and glory of God.” In distinction from woman, man, created directly by God, reflects the supreme authority of his Creator and does not have to veil his face when he addresses him (cf. C. Spicq, Dieu et l’homme, p. 186). Cf. Rabbi Aqiba: “Beloved is man because he was made in the image” (Pirqe ‘Abot 3.14); a saying attributed to R. Meir, Pirqe ‘Abot 39.8. A. M. Dubarle, “La Conception de l’homme dans l’Ancien Testament,” in Sacra Pagina, Paris-Gembloux, 1959, vol. 1, pp. 522–536. Theodoret comments on Gen 1:26—Man is the image of God, not according to the body, nor according to the soul, but only according to authority (κατὰ μόνον τὸν ἀρχικόν, Quaest. XX in Gen.) in PG, vol. 80, 108.

²² Gen 1:28 (cf. R. McL. Wilson, “The Early History of the Exegesis of Gen. 1:26,” in K. Aland, SP, Berlin, 1957, pp. 420–437; H. Wildberger, “Das Abbild Gottes, Gen. 1,26–30,” in TZ, 1965, pp. 245–259; G. Duncker, “L’immagine de Dio nell’uomo [Gen. 1,26–27]: Una semiglianza fisica?” in Bib, 1959, pp. 384–392; H. Gross, “Die Gottebenbildlichkeit des Menschen,” in Festschrift H. Junker, Trèves, 1961, pp. 89–109; 4Ezra 8:44; T. Naph. 2.5.

²³ Exegetes disagree (R. de Vaux, La Genèse, 2d ed., Paris, 1962, p. 42; G. von Rad, Genesis, pp. 55–59; C. Spicq, Dieu et l’homme, pp. 179ff.), but Sir 15:14–17; 17:3–8 adds to these privileges free will (διαβούλιον). The Wisdom writers, underlining the demands that result from the divine likeness, lay the foundations of an ethic on man “in the image of God.” It follows that the soul of the just continues to live after death, not in Sheol, but in true blessedness, in the vision of God (Wis 3:9; cf. M. J. Lagrange, “Le Livre de la Sagesse: La Doctrine des fins dernières,” in RB, 1907, pp. 85–104; B. Schutz, Les Idées eschatologiques du Livre de la Sagesse, Strasbourg, 1935). Philo often commented on Gen 1:26 (Heir 23; Alleg. Interp. 3.96; Spec. Laws 3.83, 207; Virtues 205). He distinguishes “two types of people: man born in the image of God and man formed from the earth . . . the image of God is an archetype” (Alleg. Interp. 2.4); “the man in the image is not earthly but heavenly” (Alleg. Interp. 1.90, 92, 94); “the heavenly man, inasmuch as he is born in the image of God, has no share in a corruptible substance . . . the earthly man is brought forth from a sparse material” (Alleg. Interp. 1.31; Heir 57); “intelligence, born in the image of God and according to the idea, shared in the breath (πνεῦμα)” (Alleg. Interp. 1.42, 53). The resemblance has nothing to do with physical traits; “God does not have a human figure and a human body does not have God’s form. The image here applies to the intellect, the guide of the soul” (Creation 69). The imprint or mark of the divine power—“Moses calls it by its proper name, ‘image,’ thereby showing that God is the archetype of rational nature, whereas man is only a copy and a replica” (μίμημα καὶ ἀπεικόνισμα, Worse Attacks Better 83, 86–87; Change of Names 223); “the one who receives the imprint reproduces perforce the image of the one who gives it out” (Plant. 19). God says to Hagar: “I am the God whose image you beheld earlier (the angel) and thought that it was I, and that you raised on a pillar” (Dreams 1.241). The most holy Logos is the image of God (Conf. Tongues 97, 146–147; Spec. Laws 1.81; Flight 101), because “an incorporeal being differs in no wise from the divine image” (Conf. Tongues 62) and “God has placed on the whole of the universe the seal of his image and idea: his own Word” (Dreams 2.45). Cf. J. Gibley, “L’Homme image de Dieu dans les commentaires littéraires de Philon d’Alexandrie,” in Studia Hellenistica, vol. 5, Louvain-Leiden, 1948, pp. 93–118. According to Wis 7:26: σοφία εἰ—κὼν τῆς ἀγαθότητος αὐτοῦ (cf. C. Larcher, Etudes sur le Livre de la Sagesse, Paris, 1969, pp. 383ff.). Diogenes of Sinope said τοὺς ἀγαθοὺς ἄνδρας θεω—ν εἰ—κόννας εἶναι, according to Diogenes Laertius 6.51. Corinth raised a statue to Regilla, εἰ—κὼνα σωφροσύνης

(I. Cor. VIII, 1; n. 86, 2; cf. 88, 4); Philo, To Gaius 210: “They bear in their soul, as people do with divine statues, the image of the commandments”; Husbandry 109. Under a seven-branched candelabrum, a funerary inscription says, εἰ—κὼν ε—νορω—ντος θεοῦ, “image of God who sees” (CII, n. 696).

²⁴ Εἰ—κὼν τοῦ θεοῦ ἀοράτου, Col 1:15; cf. S. Bartina, “‘Cristo, imagen del Dios invisible,’ según los papyros,” in SPap, 1963, pp. 13–33; A. Feuillet, Le Christ sagesse de Dieu, Paris, 1966, pp. 163–273. In a metaphorical sense, the virtues are the image of God (Philo, Virtues 205; cf. Rewards 114; Good Man Free 62); “the beauty of the senses is the image of intelligible beauty” (Plant. 50 and 44); the sun is the image and imitation of Wisdom (Migr. Abr. 40; Heir 112; cf. K. Prümm, “Reflexiones theologicae et historicae ad usum Paulinum termini εἰ—κὼν,” in VD, 1962, pp. 232–257); likewise for Plato, Resp. 509 a: Helios, image of the ἰ—δέα τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ; Hermes: the sun is the image of the heavenly creator god (in Stobaeus, Ecl. 1.293.21); “Man was made in the image of the world” (Corp. Herm. 8.5; cf. 1.31; 5.2); “Eternity is the image of God, the world is the image of eternity, the sun the image of the world, man the image of the sun” (ibid. 11.15; cf. 12.15). Plutarch, De E ap. Delph. 21: “Apollo and the sun are but one”; one contemplates its essence in honoring its image.

²⁵ Cf. Plato, Tim. 92 c: “The world . . . the sensible world formed in the likeness of the intelligible god, very great, very good” (εἰ—κὼν τοῦ νοητοῦ θεοῦ αἰ—σθητός).

²⁶ John 14:9; 12:45. The εἰ—κὼν is thus not identical to simple resemblance, ὁμοίωσις (cf. R. C. Trench, Synonyms, p. 51). Cf. Rabbi Baanah, visiting the tombs of the patriarchs. After seeing Abraham’s, he wants to see Adam’s; then he hears a voice: “You have seen the resemblance of my image, but my image itself you cannot see” (b. B. Bat. 58a). In an analogous sense, the law had “a shadow of good things to come, not the very image (essence) of the realities” (Heb 10:1); men “have exchanged the glory of the immortal God for images representing a mortal man” (ε—ν ὁμοιώματι εἰ—κόνου φαρτοῦ ἀνθρώπου—Rom 1:23; cf. Wis 13:13).

²⁷ Συμμόρφους τῆς εἰ—κόνος τοῦ υἱ—οῦ αὐτοῦ, Rom 8:29; Heb 1:3; cf. J. Kürzinger, “Συμμόρφους τῆς εἰ—κόνος τοῦ υἱ—οῦ αὐτοῦ, Rom. VIII, 29,” in BZ, 1958, pp. 294–299; A. R. C. Leaney, “‘Conformed to the Image of His Son’ (Rom VIII, 29),” in NTS, vol. 10, 1964, pp. 470–479. J. Caravidopoulos, “Εἰ—κὼν θεοῦ” καὶ “κατ’ εἰ—κὼνα θεοῦ” παρὰ τω—ἀποστόλω Παύλω; cf. 2Cor 4:4, 6. St. Thomas Aquinas comments: “Christus perfectissima imago Dei est; nam ad hoc quod aliquid perfecta sit imago alicujus, triarequiruntur et haec tria perfecta sunt in Christo: similitudo, origo, perfecta aequalitas.” Cf. E. Lohse, “Imago Dei bei Paulus,” in W. Matthias, Libertas Christiana: Festschrift Delekat, Munich, 1057, p. 156; S. V. McCasland, “The Image of God’ According to Paul,” in JBL, 1950, p. 87.

²⁸ B. Rey, Créés dans le Christ Jésus, Paris, 1966, pp. 173ff. E. Bailleux, “A l’image du Fils premier-né,” in RevThom, 1976, pp. 181–207.

²⁹ Cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, p. 131; vol. 2, pp. 741ff. J. Dupont, “Le Chrétien, miroir de la gloire divine d’après II Cor. III, 18,” in RB, 1949, pp. 392–411; N. Hugedé, La Métaphore du miroir dans les Epîtres de saint Paul aux Corinthiens, Neuchâtel-Paris, 1957; R. Koch, “L’Aspect eschatologique de l’Esprit du Seigneur,” in AnBib 17, Rome, 1963, pp. 131–141. A. Feuillet, Le Christ sagesse de Dieu, pp. 113–161. C. F. D. Moule, “II Cor. III, 18 b, καθάπερ ἀπὸ κυρίου πνεύματος,” in Neues Testament und Geschichte (Festgabe O. Cullmann), Zurich, 1972, pp. 231–237.

³⁰ Cf. T. Camelot, “La Théologie de l’image de Dieu,” in RSPT, 1956, pp. 443–472.

ει—λικρίνεια, ει—λικρινής eilikrineia, purity, unmixed quality; eilikrines, without mixture, sincere, candid

eilikrineia, S 1505; TDNT 2.397–398; EDNT 1.391; MM 183–184; L&N 88.42; BDF §119(4); BAGD 222 | eilikrines, S 1506; TDNT 2.397–398; EDNT 1.391; MM 184; L&N 88.41; BDF §119(4); BAGD 222

The first element of the compound eilikrines is obscure. It has often been derived from eile (halea, helios), “distinguished from the sun” (?), suspended in its rays, purified by them; hence, “pure, without spot, immaculate.” But P. Chantraine¹ notes that eile literally means “heat of the sun” and prefers to link the adjective to eilo, “cause to turn”; the metaphor would be that of grain or wheat, sorted and purified by rolling or bouncing in a screen.

What is certain is that its basic meaning is “without mixture,” hence “pure, distinct,”² as is attested by its association with amiges (“without mixture”),³ amiktos (“unmixed”),⁴ and constantly with katharos: “a pure and clear air” (katharon kai eilikrinea, Hippocrates, Vict. 2.38.5); “If we should bring back the other stars and the whole of heaven to a nature that is pure and without mixture (eis tina physin katharan kai eilikrine), delivered from change. . . . A mixture is an alteration; the primitive substance loses its purity (to eilikrines)” (Plutarch, De fac. 16); “that which is one is undefiled and pure (to hen eilikrines kai katharon); it is by the mixture of one substance with another that defilement (ho miasmos) comes about.”⁵

The classical texts are clear: “Steadiness, purity (to katharon), truth, and, as we say, integrity (eilikrines) in those things that abide always in the same state, in the same manner, free of all mixture (ameiktotata)”;⁶ “by means of thought in itself and by itself and without mixture (eilikrines, of the senses and the body), one pursues realities in order to gain the truth”;⁷ each element of the army “had its distinct place” (to eilikrine, separate).⁸

In the Koine, the meaning has evolved; eilikrines is used with people and means “sincere, of good faith, candid,” especially in the inscriptions and the papyri. Moulton-Milligan cite inscriptions from Didyma in the third century BC (eilikrine kai bebaiam poioumenous hymas pros tous philous apodexin, Dittenberger, Or. 227, 12) and from Miletus in the second century BC (exegoumenoi sympantos tou plethous pros hemas ektenestaten te kai elikrine ten eunoian).⁹ The adjective appears in the papyri only from Christian pens of the Byzantine era: prayers are addressed to the Lord from a sincere heart (en ilikrinei dianoia).¹⁰

Eilikrines is a hapax in the LXX: wisdom is a completely pure, unadulterated exhalation or emanation from the Almighty. Nothing unclean gets into it (Wis 7:25). Philo used this adjective for “the Being purer than the one, more primordial than the monad” (Contemp. Life 2), mind,¹¹ clear light without shadows (Heir 308; Joseph 145), truths (Dreams 2.74), piety (therapeia) that is sincere and entirely pure (Abraham 129). Josephus has only two occurrences: the most honest and sincere part of the people (War 2.345); Agrippa waits for his anger to abate so that he may give a dispassionate judgment (logismois eilikrinesi, Ant. 19.321).

When the author of 2Pet 3:1 gives the purpose of his letter as awakening the sincere mind of its recipients (ten eilikrine dianoian), he seems to be giving the adjective its Philonian meaning; but NT dianoia is the religious faculty of perceiving and understanding.¹² Here this faculty has to be healthy, without shadow or stain; it is more than faithfulness—perfect transparency of the spiritual mind, comparable to the candor of doves (Matt 10:16; cf. Luke 11:34). In Phil 1:10, the emphasis is especially on absence of sin: “so that, discerning true values, you may be pure and without reproach on the day of Christ” (hina ete eilikrineis kai aproskopoi).¹³ Eilikrines is here introduced into the vocabulary of salvation and a meaning that is both moral and religious; doing no wrong means not only not sinning but being in conformity to what God expects of the children of light, without participating in the least in the world of darkness. It is an entire spirituality (Rom 12:2).

As for the noun elikrineia, derived from the preceding adjective and much rarer, its two papyrological meanings, from third-century petitions, give it the sense “probity.”¹⁴ In its three Pauline occurrences, it means especially sincerity: the Corinthians are invited to celebrate the Pascha not “with the leaven of vice and perversity, but with the unleavened bread of elikrineia and truth.”¹⁵ The apostle presents himself thus: “Our pride is in this: the testimony of our conscience, that it is with God’s simplicity and purity (hoti en haploteti kai eilikrineia tou theou) that we have conducted ourselves in the world, particularly with regard to you.”¹⁶ Frankness and faithfulness are essential to the character of Paul and his apostolic ministry; each term reinforces the other: biblical haplotes, characteristic of the righteous, is always associated with uprightness; here it is reinforced by the transparency and candor of eilikrineia and finally confirmed by the superlative “of God”—a sincerity coming from God, derived from his own, given by him! This rectitude is referred to again in 2Cor 2:17—“We are not like many, who hawk about the word of God, but with God’s commission, in God’s presence, in Christ do we speak to you.” There is no higher way of describing the apostolic faithfulness, which can be referred to Matt 5:37 (“Let your yes be yes, your no, no”); but more precisely, the contrast with falsifications indicates that Paul neither adds to nor subtracts from the message received from the Lord. He transmits it whole, without adding heterogeneous elements, without mixing in his own personal ideas. He only gives voice to what he has heard from the Master and his first apostles. That is why he is trustworthy.

NT eilikrineia is “perfect purity” and describes the mind, the heart, one’s conduct. Better yet, it describes Christian existence in its relation to God and to people. It is not so much the absence of duplicity or hypocrisy as a fundamental integrity and transparency; it can be compared to innocence, the candor of children, to whom the kingdom of heaven belongs (Mark 10:14).

¹ P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique, p. 320.

² In the sense in which in current parlance “pure” is used for gold that is unalloyed, wine that is not mixed with water, air that is not fouled with fumes, style that is free of error, being that is in strict conformity to its nature and the law proper to it. Cf. the denominative verb ει—λικρινέω, “purify”; Ps.-Aristotle, Mund. 5.397a35: “all is purified (cleaned) below and above the surface.”

³ Plato, Menex. 245 d: “We are purely (ει—λικρινω—ς) Greek and without barbarian mixture (καὶ ἀμιγεί—ς);” Menander, Dysk. 604: “the pure Attic peasant”; Plutarch, Quaest. Rom. 26.

⁴ Aristotle, De An. 3.2.426b: “the sensible qualities cause pleasure when, being first pure and without mixture (ει—λικρινῆ καὶ ἄμικτα), they are brought to a certain proportion”; Plutarch, De def. or. 34: “image that is not undefiled and pure” (οὐκ ἄμικτον οὐδ εἰ—λικρινές); cf. De Is. et Os. 61: “heavenly things are pure and luminous, those below mixed and motley”; 77.

⁵ Plutarch, De E ap. Delph. 20; Philo, Alleg. Interp. 1.88: immaterial intelligence has “a constitution more pure and less composite” than terrestrial intelligence; Drunkenness 101: “the spirit that is mixed with nothing is perfectly pure”; Prelim. Stud. 143; Dreams 2.20, 74; Abraham 129; Joseph 145; Moses 2.40; Spec. Laws 1.99; Josephus, War 2.345; T. Benj. 6.15—ει—λικρινῆ καὶ καθαρὰν διάθεσιν.

⁶ Plato, Phlb. 59 c; cf. 53 a: “Among the pure (καθαρά) types, there is the white. In what does pure whiteness consist? In the size or quantity of it, or rather in such integrity (τὸ ἀκρατέστατον) that no part of any other color is mixed with it? —Obviously, the greatest integrity (τὸ μάλιστ' εἰ—λικρινές ὄν).”

⁷ Plato, Phd. 66 a; cf. 81 c: “Do you think that this soul should, in separating itself from the body, be in itself, by itself, and without mixture (ει—λικρινῆ)?”; Symp. 211 e: “a man to whom it would be given to see the good in itself, in the truth of its nature, in its purity, without mixture (τὸ καλὸν ἰ—δει—ν εἰ—λικρινές, καθαρὸν, ἄμικτον),” without being infected by human flesh, colors, mortal follies; Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 10.1176b20: “to taste a pleasure without mixture”; Gen. Cor. 2.3.330b: “the extreme and purest bodies are fire and earth”; Hippocrates, Vict. 1.35.2 and 8; 2.63.2: “pure air (τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ εἰ—λικρινές) that strikes (the clothed body) does not purify it”; Ps.-Plato, Ax. 370 c: “You will enjoy these goods more purely,” these pleasures not being mixed with the mortal body.

⁸ Xenophon, Cyr. 8.5, 14; cf. Stobaeus, Ecl. proemium 1.5: μόνον καὶ εἰ—λικρινές.

⁹ Dittenberger, Or. 763, 41. This is the meaning of the adverb εἰ—λικρινω—ς; ibid. 441, 5 (first century BC): ε—ν παντὶ καιρω— τὴν πρὸς ἡμα—ς πίστιν εἰ—λικρινω—ς τετηρηκότας; and honorific decree from Tenos in honor of a Roman (same date): εἰ—λικρινω—ς γνησίαν ἔχοντι πρὸς πάντας φιλοστοργίαν εὐχαριστεῖ— (C. Michel, Recueil, n. 394, 48). Cf. Epictetus 4.2.6: “Formerly, by loving sincerely (εἰ—λικρινω—ς) that which had no value, you pleased your companions.” Philo uses the adverb for seeing or knowing distinctly (Alleg. Interp. 2.82; 3.111; Drunkenness 189; Prelim. Stud. 143; Post. Cain 134; Spec. Laws 1.39, 219).

¹⁰ P.Lond. 1927, 15 (fourth century); 1711, 35; 1722, 9; 1733, 15. In a letter to some monks, St. Athanasius writes: ἵνα τὴν εὐσεβῆ πίστιν τὴν ἐνεργηθεῖσαν ἐν ὑμῖν θεοῦ χάριτι ἐλικρινῆ καὶ ἄδολον διατηροῦντες (SB 8698, 23).

¹¹ Creation 8; Drunkenness 190; Heir 98; Moses 2.40; but “there is nothing pure in the content of sensation” (Creation 31); cf. nevertheless the noblest and liveliest sensations (Spec. Laws 1.9). Education provides the purest and most useful service (Contemp. Life 82).

¹² C. Spicq, Epîtres de saint Pierre, on this verse.

¹³ It is impossible to give a precise translation for δοκιμάζειν τὰ διαφέροντα; surely the verb means “evaluate, examine, test” and διαφέροντα “differences”; but these have to be understood on the moral level. Often it is taken to mean the essential, the best; sometimes “what matters.” It seems that the idea is to evaluate, in the light of faith, each action, thing, or person, giving it its true value. The term is common in Plutarch (De audiendo 12; De adul. et am. 35) and in the inscriptions: διαφέροντα τῇ πρὸς τὸν δῆμον εὐνοίᾳ (I.Priene 247, 4); τὰ διαφέροντα αὐτοίς (IGLAM, vol. 2, 410, 2). Cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 2, pp. 238ff. G. Therrien, Le Discernement dans les écrits pauliniens, Paris, 1973, p. 137.

¹⁴ P.Oxy. 1252, verso II, 38: προσφεύγω ἐπὶ τὴν σὴν ἐλικρινεῖαν = I am obliged to have recourse to your probity; P.Aberd. 52, 8: Κύριε, τῇ σῇ ἐλικρινεῖᾳ, κελεύσας τω στρατηγῷ κτλ.

¹⁵ 1Cor 5:8. A targum fragment calls Abraham “the completely unleavened one,” perfectly pure and sincere, cf. R. Le Déaut, Nuit Pascale, p. 173, n. 110.

¹⁶ 2Cor 1:12. F. Hahn, “Das Ja des Paulus und das Ja Gottes: Bemerkungen zu IIKor. I, 12–II, 1,” in Neues Testament und Christliche Existenz: Festschrift H. Braun, Tübingen, 1973, pp. 229–239.

ἐιρηνεύω, ἐιρήνη, ἐιρηνικός, ἐιρηνοποιέω, ἐιρηνοποιός eireneuo, to be at peace, live in peace; eirene, peace; eirenikos, peaceful; eirenopoieo, to make peace; eirenopoios, making peace; a peacemaker

eireneuo, S 1514; TDNT 2.417–418; EDNT 1.394; NIDNTT 2.776, 780; MM 185; L&N 88.102; BDF §§227(2), 309(1); BAGD 227 | eirene, S 1515; TDNT 2.400–417; EDNT 1.394–397; NIDNTT 2.776–783; MM 185–186; L&N 22.42, 25.248; BDF §128(5); BAGD 227–228 | eirenikos, S 1516; TDNT 2.418–419; EDNT 1.397; NIDNTT 3.776, 780, 782; MM 186; L&N 25.249; BAGD 228 | eirenopoieo, S 1517; TDNT 2.419–420; EDNT 1.397; NIDNTT 2.776, 782; L&N 40.4; BAGD 228 | eirenopoios, S 1518; TDNT 2.419; EDNT 1.397; NIDNTT 2.776, 780, 782; L&N 40.5; BAGD 228

In secular Greek—classical and Hellenistic—eirene designates a political and social phenomenon, and first of all the state of a nation that is not at war.¹ It is contrasted with polemos.² War is enmity (Plato, Resp. 5.470 c) and peace is harmonization (Plutarch, De Alex. fort. 1.6.329 a-c). Treaties of alliance and of peace almost always link eirene and philia.³ In other words, peace is not only the elimination of war,⁴ but an organization of the future, because it guarantees tranquility (hesychia, Plato, Resp. 575 b), wealth (Homer, Od. 24.486), the cessation of banditry (Epictetus 3.13.9), an opportunity for all sorts of happiness and prosperity,⁵ at least if the peace is general: he koine eirene.⁶ It goes without saying that the king who is “philanthropic” will be interested in restoring order and guaranteeing the peace,⁷ because it is recognized that peace is better than war.⁸

If peace is the situation of a nation that is not at war, it also defines the public order, relations between citizens, and social peace, as opposed to discord, trouble, and sedition: “eirene tes staseos, the end of civil war.”⁹ This is the most common usage in the papyri: the strategos must take measures to guarantee peace and order (P.Petaus 53, 17; cf. P.Stras. 5, 8).¹⁰ An arrest warrant is addressed “to the epistates of the peace of the town of Teos” (epistate eirenes komes Teeos, P.Oxy. 64, 2; cf. P.Cair.Isid. 130; P.Oxy. 2714, 11; 3035, 2; 3184 a 17; b 14). So there were guardians of the peace, for example in a list of police officers including eirenophylakes (SB 4636), whose responsibility it was to see to it that no one disturbed the course of public services; they may be compared to the municipal functionaries epi tes eirenes.¹¹ Eirene, finally, refers to the state of a person who is not troubled or disturbed, who is tranquil: “There is nothing to keep you from speaking in peace (without opposition)” (Plato, Symp. 189 b). But it is quite remarkable that there are no texts evoking the state of soul of a person not troubled by any care, any disquiet, having blessed tranquility¹²—what we call “peace within.”

In reading the OT, one has the impression of entering another world, first of all because of the frequency with which peace is mentioned (about 280 times), then because of the new content of this idea,¹³ though it is always synonymous with tranquility.¹⁴ Eirene almost always translates the Hebrew shalôm; the sense of the root is “be well, complete, safe and sound,” and shalôm expresses “the state of a being who lacks nothing and has no fear of being troubled in its quietude; it is euphoria with security. Nothing better can be desired for oneself and for others.”¹⁵ There is also a nuance of plenty and prosperity (cf. 1Macc 14:8); this is how the good health and joyfulness of the woman in Cant 8:10 appears in the eyes of her fiancé (cf. the strong woman who finishes her years in peace, Sir 26:2). Furthermore, the Israelite greeting is a wish for peace, that is, for well-being and happiness.¹⁶ But the great innovation of the OT is to make peace a religious idea: it is a gift of God. “Gideon built an altar to Yahweh and called it Yahweh-Peace” (eirene Kyriou, Judg 6:24); “I am Yahweh—I bring peace” (Isa 45:7); “Great is Yahweh, who wishes peace for his servant” (Ps 35:27). If it is commanded to seek peace (Ps 34:14), much more often it is stated that it is God who secures peace (Isa 26:12; 57:19; 66:12) and that there is no peace for people except for that granted by God when they are in conformity with his will.¹⁷ There can be no peace for the ungodly,¹⁸ but it is granted to those “who walk with God in peace and uprightness.”¹⁹ That is to say that Israel will be the people of peace. Not only did God give Moses this formula of blessing: “May Yahweh lift his countenance upon you and give you peace” (Num 6:26); he gives it to the devotees of his temple: “Great will be the glory of this house . . . in this place will I put peace,”²⁰ and the faithful will implore “Peace upon Israel!” (Ps 125:5; 128:6; cf. Sir 30:23).

It is difficult to specify the content of Israelite eirene, but it is certain that without excluding the possession of human goods (Ps 4:8), it is in the first instance the fruit of trusting and loving relations²¹ with God, who comes to the aid of his own (1Chr 12:18), hence a characteristic of Israelite religion, a completely original quality of soul of its faithful. With “messengers of peace,”²² bearers of “good news,” peace is synonymous with salvation and victory. A number of these announcements are eschatological, linking justice, peace, and salvation;²³ a certain number are clearly messianic in character: “The government will rest upon his shoulders; his name will be called . . . Prince of Peace. For the growth of his government and peace will be without end.”²⁴ The death of the Messiah/liberator will be expiatory: “The punishment that earned our peace (salvation) has fallen upon him (the Servant of Yahweh)” (Isa 53:5). The NT writers would recognize that this religious peace was accomplished by the Savior Jesus.²⁵

The Synoptic Gospels retain the OT meaning of eirene —“security” (Isa 59:8), but they apply it to Jesus, who guides us “into the way of eirene” (Luke 1:79), that is, who introduces us to the messianic salvation. Simeon, having beheld the Savior, asks God—as a doulos asking his despotes —“Let your servant depart in peace.”²⁶ At Bethlehem, the angels sang, “Glory to God in the highest and peace on earth to people upon whom his favor rests.”²⁷ The Messiah henceforth present brings peace, the gift of God to all people. When Jesus makes his entry into Jerusalem, his disciples sing Ps 118:26 and acclaim the Messiah-king who “comes in the name of the Lord, peace in heaven and glory in the highest places” (Luke 19:38). Jesus, sent by God, carried out the mission that was entrusted to him; salvation is certain, and its author is glorified.²⁸ Clearly the point is the reconciliation of humans with God, on the spiritual level.

We know that the Israelite greeting was expressed in a wish for peace. Jesus prescribes this greeting to his apostles, but in so doing gives it a religious meaning, namely, benediction: “When you enter into the house, greet it; and if the house is worthy, let your peace come upon it.”²⁹ People also wished each other peace upon parting (1Sam 1:17; 20:42; 29:7), and there again this commonplace manner of taking one’s leave³⁰ can express not only brotherly love³¹ but also the salvation of the soul, the forgiveness of sins; Jesus says to the forgiven sinner, “Go in peace.”³²

In the Fourth Gospel, peace appears only in the “farewell discourse,” at precisely at the moment when Jesus is leaving his own, who will be so sorely tested and even terrorized by the passion of their Master. He does not wish them peace; he gives them peace, and not just any peace, but his very own peace,³³ which spreads among them like the sap of the vine to the branches by virtue of their ontological union (en emoi eirene). It is a legacy that is the fruit of his sacrifice, by which he is victorious over death and Satan; a legacy that will permit his own to know nothing of fright and panic even in the midst of the worst catastrophes.³⁴ When the resurrected Christ came upon his apostles, his greeting was not the ordinary wish, “Shalom,” nor even a benediction, but the confirmation of his gift: “Eirene hymin” (“Peace to you”).³⁵

The Acts of the Apostles mentions civil and political peace, like the unity following hostility within a group;³⁶ but it also mentions the religious, brotherly harmony in the Christian communities;³⁷ finally, and above all, it defines this peace in terms of Christ. St. Peter says to the centurion Cornelius: “God has sent the word to the sons of Israel, announcing peace by Jesus Christ. He is the Lord of all” (Acts 10:36); euangelizomenos eirenen evokes the OT messengers of peace, but this has to do with the gospel message, which is the salvation granted by God to all people. This reconciliation translates for them into peace of the soul, thanks to forgiveness of sins. This is already the teaching of St. Paul.³⁸

We might almost say that the apostle created a new concept of eirene, an altogether internal and very spiritual peace, since he locates it at the heart of the Christian life and connects it to each of the persons of the Holy Trinity. The most important text is Rom 5:1-2: “Being therefore justified by faith, let us keep peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ, to whom we owe our access by faith to this grace in which we stand and our glorying in the hope of the glory of God.” The first result of justification was obtaining peace, not only reconciliation with God, the end of a breach and a disorder, but the inauguration of new relations³⁹ that promise future blessedness: “May the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace, so that you may abound in hope, by the power of the Holy Spirit” (Rom 15:13). This Christian peace, which comes with the call to salvation and endures until the point of entering heaven, is the consequence of all the gifts of a God whom St. Paul describes as “the God of peace,”⁴⁰ because he alone creates peace.

This peace, almost synonymous with salvation, is obtained thanks to Christ, who by his cross reconciled all humans with God. He announces it, and his gospel would be described as the “gospel of peace” (Eph 6:15; cf. Isa 52:7). He effects peace: his own peace (John 14:27; 16:33) is a spiritual reality that rules the minds and hearts of his disciples, making harmony among them, as with the members of a single body: “May the peace of Christ rule in your hearts: this is indeed the goal of the call that has gathered you into one body (the church)” (Col 3:15). What is more, he is himself our peace, because he has not only reconciled us with God but also established peace between Jews and Gentiles, dissolving their indissoluble opposition (there is no longer Jew, nor Greek; they are one in him—Gal 3:28; Col 3:11). He has eliminated the partition (phragmos) or the fence (of the Mosaic law and of enmity) or the wall that separated them.⁴¹ This is the teaching of Eph 2:13-17: “You who once were far off have now drawn near, thanks to the blood of Christ. For he himself is our peace, who from the two has made one people . . . breaking down the enmity in his flesh. . . . to create in his person the two in one new man, he who makes peace (poion eirenen), and to reconcile them with God, both in one body, by the cross: in his person he has put the enmity to death. Having thus come he proclaimed peace (euangelisato eirenen) to you who were far off and to those who were near.”

This altogether spiritual peace resides in hearts and thus points to the Holy Spirit, who infuses it in the form of mutual love, harmony, and brotherly unity: “To set the mind on the Spirit is life and peace” (Rom 8:6); “the reign of God is righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit.”⁴² So we understand not only that “the peace of God passes all understanding” (Phil 4:7), but that the apostles ceaselessly exhort believers to seek and find peace between themselves, because peace is a distinguishing mark of their religion.⁴³ This is what gives the eirene of the apostolic salutations its density of meaning;⁴⁴ it includes peace with God, the benefits of salvation, harmony with all people, Christian blessedness, that is, peace of heart or calm in the soul which is purified from its sins; an interior well-being that follows justification by faith and is the work of the Holy Spirit.

In the secular literature, the denominative verb eireneuo, “be or live in peace,” is always used in contrast to a state of war,⁴⁵ meaning that a kingdom (Josephus, Ant. 11.214; 20.49, 133) a city (War 6.100), a region⁴⁶ is at peace, or that two sovereigns are reconciled (Dio Cassius 77.12; Dittenberger, Or. 199, 1; 613, 4). The same meaning occurs sometimes in the LXX,⁴⁷ but the verb is most often applied to individuals and means being tranquil,⁴⁸ having a human happiness.⁴⁹ The NT Christianizes this verb, giving it only a moral and individual meaning, always in parenthesis. In its four occurrences, three are in the present imperative and all command keeping harmony and unity. Without a direct object, eireneuete (“live in peace”) means “have only one heart and one soul” (2Cor 13:11); with en allelois (Mark 9:50) or en heautois (1Thess 5:13) it has to do with preserving good brotherly relations; Rom 12:18—“If possible, as much as lies within you, be at peace with all people”⁵⁰—extends the effort to live peaceably to every neighbor. In the context, it is a matter of not returning evil for evil, not getting revenge, suppressing the causes of discord, and especially overcoming evil with good; all requirements of authentic charity.

The adjective eirenikos takes on rather varied nuances:⁵¹ (a) an objective meaning: that which has to do with peace (“a man engaged in a peaceful action, not a violent one”);⁵² (b) disposed to peace, opposed to bellicosity, used of relations between peoples or between parties in a city;⁵³ (c) that which is calm and peaceable, whether a city or individuals;⁵⁴ (d) in Philo, a personal moral quality: serenity, or an inclination to peace, loved for itself—“virtue is of a particularly peaceable nature.”⁵⁵

In the LXX, the “man of peace” (Hebrew shalem) is a person who is benevolent and of a friendly disposition,⁵⁶ is sincere (Hebrew ken; Gen. 42:11, 19, 31, 33, 34) not only in speech⁵⁷ but also in conduct; he concludes “peaceful accords” (Zech 6:13; 8:16; 1Macc 5:25). The peace offering (Hebrew shelem) was translated eirenikos,⁵⁸ probably because of the idea of salvation, “safe and sound, well-being,” with all the semantic richness of the Hebrew shalôm: desiring peace and appealing to God to obtain it.⁵⁹

This nuance is not to be excluded at Heb 12:11, where the rigorous discipline of Israelite education leads finally to the peaceable fruit of righteousness (karpon eirenikon dikaiosynes).⁶⁰ The adjective eirenikos refers to the agon, to the rest of the victorious athlete after the competition (12:1) and to safety after the bloody combat (12:4). It retains the double meaning of biblical shalôm: interior peace with God, and (this-worldly) salvation.⁶¹ Jas 3:17 is in line with LXX usage: Wisdom is first of all pure (hagne, not stained, because it comes from God), very peaceful (eirenike), that is, judging from verse 16, opposed to disorder and intrigues (cf. Prov 3:17; Mal 2:6; Rom 8:6).

Unknown in the papyri, Philo, and Josephus, the verb eirenopoieo is the equivalent of poieo eirenen: “make peace, pacify, conciliate.”⁶² An OT hapax, “The one who criticizes boldly makes peace” (Prov 10:10), it is also found in the NT. Col 1:20 places this verb in parallel with apokatallasso: God was pleased to reconcile all creatures with himself, “making peace by the blood of his cross.” Christ is the instrument and the goal of reconciliation.

The adjective eirenopoios, which appears for the first time in Xenophon,⁶³ is a Koine term, synonymous with eirenikos,⁶⁴ but with an emphasis on nobility. Not only did Philo ask that thanks be given to “God who makes peace (tou eirenopoiou theou) and preserves peace (eirenophylakos)” (Spec. Laws 2.192); in addition, “peacemaker” was an attribute of the prince. Antony conferred it upon Caesar (ho eirenopoios, Dio Cassius 44.49), and Commodus applied it to himself (eirenopoios tes oikoumenes).⁶⁵

Certainly we cannot see this sovereign, political sense in the seventh beatitude of the Sermon on the Mount (makarioi hoi eirenopoioi, Matt 5:9); still less can we see the pacifici of the Vulgate.⁶⁶ Rather, it is pacificatori, that is, persons whose action or influence pacifies or restores peace, favors good understanding, settles quarrels, annuls conflicts, reconciles, and calms minds.⁶⁷ The right translation is literal—“peacemakers”—those who pursue it and spread it, establishing it around themselves (the Peshitta translates abe day shelâmâ, those who make peace), hence “artisans of peace.”⁶⁸ At the same time, however, it has to be understood in terms of the function of the messianic messenger who establishes peace (Isa 9:6; Ezek 34:25, 29) and of charity-love, which always tends to come to expression, to act. Peacemakers show themselves to be children of God—of the God of peace (1Thess 5:23; Phil 4:9; cf. Sir 4:10; Jub. 1.24–25).

1 “Peace was nothing other than a contractual interruption of war” (B. Keil, “Ἐι—ρήνη: Eine philologisch-antiquarische Untersuchung,” in Berichte über die Verhandlungen der königl. Sächsischen Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften zu Leipzig, 1916, p. 18). Cf. von Rad, Foerster, “Ἐι—ρήνη,” in TDNT, vol. 2, pp. 400–420; cf. bibliography in TWNT, vol. 10/1, pp. 1069ff. O. Waser, “Eirene,” in PW, vol. 5, col. 2128ff. C. Préaux, “La Paix à l’époque hellénistique,” in La Paix (Recueils de la Société J. Bodin, XIV), Brussels, 1962, pp. 227–231.

2 Isocrates, Paneg. 4.172; Ps.-Plato, Def. 413 a: Ἐι—ρήνη ἡσυχία ε—π ἔχθρας πολεμικός (“the stilling of warlike quarrels”); Philostratus, Gym. 19: “The Lacedaemonians used dance—the mildest peacetime occupation—for war.” The inscriptions endlessly contrast “in time of war and in time of peace,” whether using the genitive πολέμου καὶ εἰ—ρήνης (I.Gonn. 5, 8; 12, 5; 17, 4; 42, 24; 70, 7; 72, 2; 92, 2; Dittenberger, Syl. 217, 8; NCIG, n. XII, 36), or using the prepositional phrase ε—ν πολέμῳ καὶ ε—ν εἰ—ρήνῃ (I.Gonn. 2, 1; 7, 5; 9, 6; 10, 4; 11, 9; 19, 7; 30, 14; 31, 15; 33, 3; 34, 12; 39, 3; 40, 41; 41, 22; 58, 6; 72, 6; 91, 31; CIRB III, 4; IV, 2; SEG I, 363, 34).

³ Plato, Leg. 1.628 b: “That the death of one party and victory of the other should bring peace after civil war, or that thanks to reconciliation bringing friendship and peace . . .”; Polybius 21.43; Dittenberger, Syl. 142, 7: “The inhabitants of Chios, like the Athenians, shall maintain peace, friendship, the oaths, and the conventions in force . . . in no way failing of the texts of the steles relative to the peace.” Between the Aetolians and the Acarnanians a treaty establishes “peace and eternal friendship” (Syl. 421); “The Magnesians and the Milesians concluded peace on the following conditions. The ambassadors of the following cities came to reconcile them and restore the former friendship between them. . . . May there be eternal peace and friendship between the Magnesians and the Milesians” (Syl. 588).

⁴ Cf. the “peace of Phoenix” (Livy 29.12), between Prusias and Byzantium (Polybius 4.52), between Rome and Carthage (Polybius 3.22–25). Reconciliation or agreement is reached ε—ν τῇ ει—ρήνῃ (P.Oxy. 1866, 1; cf. SB 7667, 4). There is a nuance of benevolence in letters of commendation: συδέξασθαι αὐτὸν ε—ν ει—ρήνῃ (P.Oxy. 1162, 9; 2785, 6; P.Alex. 29, 8).

⁵ For Philemon (frag. 71; Stobaeus, Flor. 55.5; vol. 4, p. 373: anthology on peace). Eirene is a sort of goddess, loving and kind, who permits marriages, feasts, friends, wealth, health, pleasure. . . . Peace, sealed by oath (Demosthenes, Treaty Alex. 18.10; Dittenberger, Syl. 260), brings numerous privileges: intervention to help, ι—σοπολιτεία, ἀτέλεια, etc.

⁶ Decree establishing the second Athenian confederation (J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. 27, 13); Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 8, 5: “In the present situation, peace reigns everywhere.” Cf. Livy 34.57; E. Bickerman, “Le Droit des gens dans la Grèce classique,” in RIDA, 1950, pp. 99–127; T. T. Ryder, Koine Eirene: General Peace and Local Independence in Ancient Greece, Oxford, 1965. Cf. the Pax Romana. At Rome, an altar was dedicated to the goddess Pax in AD 9: Ara Pacis Augustae; her symbols were an olive branch, a caduceus, and a horn of plenty; cf. Ovid, Fast. 1.711–712; Tibullus 1.10.69f.; Virgil, Aen. 6.851–853.

⁷ Like Antiochus I at Ilion: “He reestablished peace and the former prosperity” (Dittenberger, Or. 219), King Silko (ibid. 201, 7: ε—ποίησα ει—ρήνην μετ̄ αὐτῶ—ν; 199, 28); Philip V of Macedon (Polybius 5.100, 102; 18.1–11), Emperor Claudius (SB 8899, 2); “O Caesar, in this fulsome peace that you created, what must I suffer!” (Epictetus 3.22.55); “the peace established by our master King Flavius Julianus, the eternal Augustus” (P.Cair.Goodsp. 15, 4; cf. P.Oxy. 3022, 14). Cf. E. R. Goodenough, “The Political Philosophy of Hellenistic Kingship,” in YCS I, 1928.

⁸ Andocides, De Pace 1: “Better a just peace than war; I believe, Athenians, that you all agree”; Ps.-Plato, Alc. 109; Aristotle, Pol. 1334 a; cf. W. E. Caldwell, “Homeric Conceptions of Peace,” in Studies in History, Economics and Public Laws (Columbia University, Faculty of Political Science, vol. 84, 1919). At the Athenian agora, there was a statue of the goddess Eirene (Pausanias 1.8.2; 9.16.2).

⁹ Plato, Leg. 1.628 b; Isocrates, Areop. 51: “the citizens live quietly, at peace with each other (ἡσυχίαν εἶχον) and at peace with the rest of the world”; Epictetus 4.5.35: “These judgments produce friendship in a house, concord in a city, peace among nations”; 3.13.13: “No evil can come to me; no brigand for me, no shaking of the earth; everywhere profound peace, everywhere tranquility (ἀταραξία)”; 4.5.24: “You live at peace with all people, whatever they do, and you mock especially those who think to do you wrong.”

¹⁰ —Επόπτη ει—ρήνης —Οξυρυγχίτου (P.Oxy. 1559, 3; cf. 41, 27: ει—ρήνη πόλεως), τὴν χώραν ε—ν ει—ρήνη διατετήρηκεν (decree of Canopus, Dittenberger, Or. 56, 12); διατηρήσας αὐτὴν (πόλιν) ε—ν τῇ πάσῃ ει—ρήνῃ (SB 8334, 6; 42 BC, cf. R. Hutmacher, Ehrendekret, 1965). An eirenarchos of Ptolemais asks the komarchos of Philadelphia to come to the city of Arsinoè for the feast of peace (P.Princ. 99, 5; cf. 20, 18).

¹¹ P.Achm. 7, 8; P.Oxy. 2121, 30; 2122, 5; SB 9409, VI, 43; 9421, 2; 10075, 34; 10270, XIII, 4–5.

¹² Probably because the Greeks expressed this security, this interior calm, even good humor, using εὐθυμία (cf. Jas 5:13; Plutarch, Quaest. conv. 1.1.4; Hipparchus, Περὶ εὐθυμίας, in Stobaeus, Flor. 34.81; vol. 4, p. 980; P.Grenf. 61; P.Lips. 111; P.Gen. 53; P.Giss. 54; P.Ross.Georg. III, 10, 5; V, 6, 26, etc.), or γαλήνη, “serenity” (Plutarch, De tranq. anim. 19). We may cite above all in a hymn to Isis: “the sovereign who reigns over Asia and Europe lives in peace, and before him accumulate the fruits that give all sorts of good things” (SEG VIII, 550, 14 = SB 8140, 14; cf. UPZ XX, 4), and the personification of peace by Aristophanes as a woman who has wooers (Ach. 32; cf. J. Taillardat, Images d’Aristophane, n. 651). We take no account of late Christian papyri (P.Oxy. 1865, 11; 2156, 23; P.Lond. 1917, 4; 1923, 33; P.Ross.Georg. V, 45, 4; P.Apoll. 5, 3; 7, 4; P.Ness. 68, 6; 70, 9; 74, 10; O.Bodl. 2166, 9; SB 9748, 1 and 4; 9752, 1; 10514, 1; 10705, 6; 10706, 1). The woman’s name is much attested beginning with Hesiod, Th. 901: “Equity (ἔμῖς) was mother of the Horae—Discipline, Justice, and flourishing Peace (Ει—ρήνην τεθαλυι—αν)—who watch over mortals.” Cf. P.Tebt. 818, 8; BGU 1102, 18; 1272, 5; C.Pap.Jud. 126, 11–

12; in Jewish epitaphs, either Ει—ρήνη (CII 21, 320, 333) or Ει—ρήνα (319, 651) or the Latin Irene (72, 240).

¹³ Of course, in the LXX we also find the secular contrast between peace and war: Joab “shed the blood of war during peace” (1Kgs 2:5); “When you draw near to a city to do battle with it, you shall offer peace” (Deut 20:10; cf. 1Kgs 20:18); “Joshua made peace with the Hivites and concluded a treaty allowing them to live” (Josh 9:15); “There was peace between Jabin king of Hazor and Heber the Kenite” (1Sam 7:14), between Israel and the Amorites (1Sam 7:14), between Hiram and Solomon (1Kgs 5:26); Ps 55:18; 120:6; Wis 14:22; Isa 27:5; Mic 2:8; Zech 8:10; 9:10; 1Macc 5:54; 6:49, 58; 7:13, 28; 9:70; 10:4; 13:37, 40; 2Macc 12:12; cf. Eccl 3:8—“wartime and peacetime.” The διαθήκη ει—ρήνης is inspired by secular covenants (Num 25:12; Isa 54:10; Ezek 34:25; 37:26; Mal 2:5; Sir 45:24; 1Macc 8:20, 22: “treaty of covenant and of peace”), just as the public order and social peace are mentioned at 2Macc 3:1—“The holy city was administered in complete peace and the laws were observed as closely as possible”; 4:6. Cf. IGLS 1320, 6: “Peace and mercy to all our holy community.”

¹⁴ 1Chr 4:40—“the land was calm and tranquil” (ει—ρήνη καὶ ἡσυχία, Hebrew shaqat); 22:9—“A son will be born to you who will be a man of peace, and to whom I will grant peace with all his enemies and all around, for his name shall be Solomon, and throughout his years I will give peace and tranquility” (ει—ρήνην καὶ ἡ[συχίαν δώσω); hence “be at peace” (Judg 6:23; 19:20; Lev 26:6; 2Sam 17:3), “go in peace” (Judg 18:6; 1Sam 1:17; 20:13, 42; 25:35; 29:7; 2Sam 3:21, 24; 15:9, 27; 2Kgs 5:19; 2Chr 18:16, 26, 27; 19:1), “return in peace” (Gen 26:29; Judg 8:9; 11:31; 2Sam 19:25; 1Kgs 22:17, 27, 28). H. Bietenhard, J. J. Stamm, Der Weltfrieden im Alten und Neuen Testament, Zurich, 1959.

¹⁵ A. Robert, Le Cantique des Cantiques, Paris, 1963, p. 145; cf. G. Gerleman, “shalôm,” in Theol. Handwörterbuch zum A. T., vol. 2, pp. 919, 935; J. Scharbert, “SLM im Alten Testament,” in Lex tua veritas: Festschrift H. Junker, Trêves, 1961, pp. 209–229; W. Eisenbeis, Die Wurzel “Slm” im Alten Testament, Berlin, 1969; H. H. Schmid, shalôm “Frieden” im Alten Orient und im Alten Testament, Stuttgart, 1971 (= shalôm: La pace nell’ antico Oriente e nell’ Antico Testamento, Brescia, 1977); J. Prignaud, “Un Sceau hébreu de Jérusalem,” in RB, 1964, pp. 381ff. The security of ει—ρήνη is expressed by the Hebrew betah: “the poor will sleep in safety” (Isa 14:30; 41:3); they shall be in their land” (Ezek 34:27; 38:8, 11, 14; 39:6, 26; cf. 1Macc 12:52; 16:10).

¹⁶ Dan 10:19; cf. 1Sam 20:7; 25:5; 30:21; 2Sam 8:10; 18:28-29; 2Kgs 4:23, 26; 1Chr 18:10; Jdt 15:8; Dan 3:31—"King Nebuchadnezzar to all peoples, nations, and tongues on the whole earth: may your peace be great"; 6:26; 2Macc 1:1. Those who draw near are asked if they come "for peace" (1Sam 16:4-5; 1Kgs 2:13; 2Kgs 9:17-22; 1Chr 12:17), but people also wish to "go down in peace to Sheol" (Gen 15:15; 1Kgs 2:6), to be "received in peace into the tomb" (2Kgs 22:20; 2Chr 34:28; Isa 57:2; Sir 44:14), i.e., undefiled, with the requisite decency, with "rest" guaranteed. Hence the wish that appears constantly in Jewish epitaphs: "May he rest in peace" (CII 7, 13, 18, 35, 44, 85, etc.); sometimes with the addition "with the saints" (n. 45) or variants: "May you lie in peace" (124), "May he sleep in peace" (365, 390), "The Lord [grant that] Justus's rest . . . may be in peace" (358); SEG XXVI, n. 1161, 1163, 1168, 1171, 1173, 1185, 1195, 1199, etc. The opposite of εἰρήνη is fear or terror (φόβος, Judg 6:23; Sir 30:5; Tob 12:17) and bitterness (πικρία, Isa 38:17).

¹⁷ Jer 29:7—"by his peace you will have peace"; Bar 3:13—"If you had walked in God's way, you would have dwelt in peace for ever"; 2Macc 1:4; Lam 3:17—"My soul is deprived of peace, and I have forgotten happiness."

¹⁸ Isa 47:12; cf. 2Chr 15:5; Jer 6:14; 8:15; 16:5; Ezek 7:25; 13:10, 16; Tob 14:4.

¹⁹ Mal 2:6; Ps 37:11—"the humble will delight in great peace"; 119:165—"Great peace have they who love your law"; 122:6-8; Zech 8:19; Prov 3:2, 17, 23; 4:27; Sir 1:18—"The fear of the Lord makes peace and perfect health flourish"; 38:8; 41:14.

²⁰ Hag 2:9; 1Kgs 2:33—"There will be peace forever from Yahweh"; Ps 29:11—"Yahweh will bless his people with peace"; 85:8—"The Lord God speaks of peace to his people and his worshipers"; 85:11—"justice and peace have kissed"; Isa 32:17; 48:18; 54:13—"Great will be the peace of your sons"; 40:17; Bar 5:4—"Your name will be with God: Peace of righteousness"; Tob 13:15—"They will rejoice because of your peace."

²¹ Cf. Ps 41:9—the "man of peace" is a close friend. Being or living in peace with others expresses good mutual understanding, goodwill, and harmony, cf. Job 5:23—"the wild beast will be at peace with you"; Sir 47:13, 16: "Solomon reigned in days of peace. God gave him rest all around. . . . You were loved with peace."

²² Isa 33:7; 52:7; Jer 28:9; Nah 2:1; cf. Rom 10:15.

²³ Isa 26:3; 32:17-18; Ps 29:11; 85:9-14.

²⁴ Isa 9:5-6; cf. Ezek 34:25—"I Yahweh . . . will establish a covenant of peace with my sheep . . . they will dwell in safety in the wilderness"; Mic 5:4—"By the power of Yahweh he will feed his flock . . . it is he who will be peace"; Zech 9:10—"He will command peace to the nations"; Ps 72:7—"In his days, righteousness and great peace will flourish."

²⁵ E. Brandenburger, Frieden im Neuen Testament, Gütersloh, 1973; E. Dinkler, Eirene: Der urchristliche Friedensgedanke, Heidelberg, 1973; K. H. Schelkle, Theologie des Neuen Testaments, vol. 3, Düsseldorf, 1970, pp. 141-156; H. Schlier, "Der Friede nach dem Apostel Paulus," in Geist und Leben, 1971, pp. 282-296; R. Penna, "L'Évangile de la paix," in L. de Lorenzi, Paul de Tarse apôtre de notre temps, Rome, 1979, pp. 175-199.

²⁶ Luke 2:29—ἀπολύεις τὸν δοῦλόν σου ἐ—ν εἰ—ρήνη. The verb ἀπολύω ("loose, unbind, dismiss") is used for the death of Abraham (Gen 15:2), of Aaron (Num 20:29), of Tobias (Tob 3:6), of a martyr (2Macc 7:9). The present indicative has a semi-modal nuance: Now you can let me die. Simeon had seen "the consolation of Israel." He was happy, like Jacob when he had seen Joseph again: "Now I can die, because I have seen your face and you are still alive" (Gen 46:30).

²⁷ Luke 2:14. The genitive of quality εὐδοκίας is the opposite of τέκνα ὀργῆς (Eph 2:3). It is not a question of souls well-disposed to benefit from salvation, which would limit salvation to a certain category of people and would limit the divine goodwill (cf. 1Tim 2:4). The Lucan expression should be compared to the benê resônô ("sons of his grace") in the Qumran hymns (1QH 4.32; 11.9), to whom God will give "eternal peace" (1QS 2.4), "full peace" (4.7) at the "time of their peace" (3.15). Cf. E. Vogt, "Pax hominibus bonae voluntatis, Lc. II, 14," in Bib, 1953, pp. 427-429; C. H. Hunziger, "Neues Licht auf Lc. II, 14," in ZNW, 1952-53, pp. 85-90; idem, "Einer weiterer Beleg zu Lc. II, 14," ibid. 1958, pp. 129ff. J. A. Fitzmyer, "Peace upon Earth among Men of His Good Will," in TS, 1958, pp. 225ff. R. Deichgräber, "ἄνθρωποι εὐδοκίας," in ZNW, 1960, pp. 132ff.

²⁸ This is the secular and OT theme of the king who brings, establishes, and guarantees peace. To the contrary, Jesus laments over Jerusalem: "If on that day you had known what was required for peace" (τὰ πρὸς εἰ—ρήνην, Luke 19:42), the conditions of reconciliation with God (contrasted with ruin). Cf. the king who with ten thousand men cannot contend with the one who is attacking with twenty thousand and "sends an embassy to ask for terms of peace" (ἐ—ρωτα— τὰ πρὸς εἰ—ρήνην, Luke 14:32). Tyrians and Sidonians asked Herod for peace (ἤτοῦντο εἰ—ρήνην, Acts 12:20); T. Jud. 9.7—τότε αἰ—τοῦσιν ἡμι—ν τὰ πρὸς εἰ—ρήνην. —In the small, allegorizing parable of Luke 11:21 (inspired by Isa 49:24-26; 53:12), the strong man guards his palace, and his possessions are secure (ε—ν ει—ρήνη ε—στὶν τὰ ὑπάρχοντα). This is Satan and those possessed by him; but Jesus, who is stronger and casts out demons, will despoil him; cf. S. Légasse, “L’‘Homme fort’ de Lc. XI, 21–22,” in NovT, 1962, pp. 5–9.

²⁹ Matt 10:12-13; ἄξιός is the soul open to the apostle’s preaching and to the peace that comes from God. Luke 10:5 specifies: “In whatever house you enter, say first of all, ‘Peace to this house!’ If there is a child of peace (υι—ός ει—ρήνης) there, your peace will rest upon him”; peace is effectively transmitted and possessed by the son of peace as an immanent spiritual good. M. J. Lagrange compares Hillel’s saying, which seems already to have a religious value: “The one who loves peace loves creatures, and the one who commands peace leads them to the law of Moses” (Pirge ‘Abot 1.12). Cf. F. W. Danker, “The υι—ός Phrase in the New Testament,” in NTS, vol. 7, 1960, p. 94; W. Klassen, “‘A Child of Peace’ (Luke X, 16) in First Century Context,” in NTS, vol. 27, 1981, pp. 488–506.

³⁰ The Philippian jailer, having received from the praetors the order to release Paul and Silas, frees them and says to them, “Go in peace” (πορεύεσθε ε—ν ει—ρήνη, Acts 16:36). The rich person who refuses to help the poor says to them, “Go in peace (ὑπάγετε ε—ν ει—ρήνη), be warmed and be filled” (Jas 2:16).

³¹ Judas and Silas “were sent back with wishes of peace” (ἀπελύθησαν μετ’ει—ρήνης) by the community at Antioch (Acts 15:33). The Corinthians are told to treat Timothy with deference and respect, supplying everything he needs to speed him on his way under the best circumstances: προπέμψατε αὐτὸν ε—ν ει—ρήνη (1Cor 16:11).

³² Luke 7:50—πορεύου ει—ς ει—ρήνην. Likewise the woman with the issue of blood, 8:48; Mark 5:34.

³³ John 14:27—“I leave you peace, I give you my peace . . . not as the world gives. Let not your heart be troubled, and do not be afraid”; 16:33—“I have told you these things so that in me you may have peace” (ἵνα ε—ν ε—μοὶ ει—ρήνην ἔχητε). The peace of Christ is a gift of his omnipotence that establishes the disciple in safety, an immanent possession of the “heart” fortified by the “overcomer of the world.” The Hebrews did not hesitate to voice a wish of peace at the most critical junctures; cf. the “shalom of war” (2Sam 11:7), or the Aramaic inscription wishing peace to widows, the most afflicted of all people (C. C. Torrey, The Excavations at Dura-Europos, vol. 8, 1, New Haven, 1956, p. 263 b, line 14).

³⁴ This is why the peace of Christ is so different from pagan or Israelite peace; it is entirely spiritual and abides even in renunciation or persecution: “Do not think that I have come to bring peace on the earth; I have come not to bring peace but a sword” (Matt 10:34); members of a family will take sides on account of Christ and will divide and separate themselves according to their choice. Cf. Luke 12:51—“Do you think that I have come to bring peace on the earth? No, I tell you, but dissension” (διαμερισμόν, civil war). Cf. the rider of Rev 6:4, who represents the scourge of war: “It was given to him to take away peace from the earth.”

³⁵ Luke 24:36. Although these words are omitted by D and the Latin manuscripts, it is hard to question their authenticity, which is confirmed by P75 (P. Bodm. XIV) and John 20:19, 21, 26.

³⁶ Acts 24:2. At Caesarea, Tertullus addresses the procurator Felix: “Enjoying, thanks to you, a profound peace (πολλῆς ειρήνης τυγχάνοντες) and the reforms that this nation owes to you foresight.” This is tranquillitas ordinis. Referring to Exod 2:13-14, St. Stephen evokes Moses’ intervening between the quarreling Hebrews: “Men, you are brothers; why do you wrong one another?” He unites them for peace (συνήλασεν αὐτοὺς εἰς εἰρήνην, Acts 7:26). This is the classic secular sense of peace: the cessation of hostilities. Cf. J. Comblin, “La Paix dans la théologie de saint Luc,” in ETL, 1956, pp. 439–460.

³⁷ Acts 9:31—“The church in all of Judea, Galilee, and Samaria enjoyed peace (εἶχεν εἰρήνην), being built up and walking in the fear of the Lord.” Eirene is first of all tranquility, the absence of persecution (Saul is converted), but also the harmonious union of souls that share the same faith, are united by brotherly love, and live in full submission to the will of God. This is truly the peculiarly Christian peace.

³⁸ St. Paul, in 43 occurrences of εἰρήνη, has some OT usages: “When they say, ‘Peace and safety,’ then shall ruin suddenly fall upon them” (1Thess 5:3; cf. Jer 6:14); Rom 2:10; 3:17—“They have not known the path of peace” (cf. Isa 59:8); cf. Heb 7:2—Melchizedek, priest of the Most High, was “king of Salem, that is, king of peace” (cf. Gen 14:18; Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.79; P. Winter, “Note on Salem-Jerusalem,” in NovT, 1957, pp. 51–52), hence a type of the Messiah, who establishes peace (Isa 9:5; 32:17; Zech 9:10). Rahab received the spies peaceably (Heb 11:31).

³⁹ Cf. 1Cor 7:15—“It is in peace that God has called you” (εἰν εἰρήνῃ κέκληκεν ὑμᾶς ὁ θεός, cf. Col 3:15; on the Pauline privilege, P. Dulau, “The Pauline Privilege: Is it Promulgated in the First Epistle to the Corinthians?” in CBQ, 1951, pp. 146–152; J. Dupont, Mariage et divorce dans l'évangile, Bruges, 959, pp. 59, 72, 109, 143; A. Da Ripabottoni, "La dottrina dell'Ambrosiaster sul privilegio paulino," in Laurentianum, 1964, pp. 429–447; H. U. Willi, "Das Privilegium Paulinum, I Kor. VII, 15f—Pauli eigene Lebenserinnerung?" in BZ, 1978, pp. 100–108); Gal 6:16—"Upon all those who follow this rule (of Christian conduct) be peace and mercy, and upon the Israel of God."

⁴⁰ Rom 16:20—"the God of peace will soon crush Satan under your feet"; 1Thess 5:23—"May the God of peace himself sanctify you wholly"; 2Thess 3:16—"May the Lord of peace himself give you peace at all times and in every way"; Heb 13:20—"May the God of peace equip you with everything good to do his will"; Rom 15:33—"May the God of peace be with you all" = 2Cor 13:11; Phil 4:9; cf. 1Cor 14:33—"God is not [a God] of turmoil (καταστασίας) but of peace"; T. Dan 5.2—ἔσεσθε ε—ν ει—ρήνη ἔχοντες τὸν θεὸν τῆς ει—ρήνης. G. Dellling ("Die Bezeichnung 'Gott des Friedens' und ähnliche Wendungen in den Paulusbriefen," in E. E. Ellis, E. Grässer, Jesus und Paulus, Festschrift W. G. Kümmel, Göttingen, 1975, pp. 76–84) considers "God of peace" a liturgical formula, almost equivalent to "God of all grace," analogous to "God of hope" (Rom 15:13), of patience (Rom 15:5), of compassion (2Cor 1:3), as at Qumran: "God of justice" (1QM 18.8), of mercy (1QH 10.14; 11.29), of grace (1QM 14.8), of knowledge (1QS 3.15; 1QH 1.26; 12.10), of faithfulness (1QH 1.19). There were angels of peace (T. Dan 6.2, 5; T. Benj. 6.6; T. Asher 6.6; Enoch 40.8; 60.24). The Messiah was "Prince of peace" (Isa 9:5; Mic 5:3). In the second century, Rabbi Jose Hagelili refers to the Messiah simply by the name Peace (Str-B, vol. 3, p. 587). Cf. Epictetus 3.13.2: ει—ρήνη ὑπὸ τοῦ θεοῦ κεκηρυγμένη διὰ τοῦ λόγου ("this peace proclaimed by God by means of reason [= philosophy])."

⁴¹ Τὸ μεσότοιχον (cf. Ep. Arist. 139; cf. Y. Congar, Le Mystère du temple, Paris, 1958, pp. 133, 156). G. Ghysens, "C'est lui qui es notre paix," in Bible et vie chrétienne, n. 24, 1958, pp. 28–36; J. Gnllka, "Christus unser Friede—ein Friedens-Erlöserlied in Eph. II, 14–17," in G. Bornkamm, K. Rahner, Die Zeit Jesu (Festschrift H. Schlier), Freiburg-Basel-Vienna, 1970, pp. 190–207; A. G. Lamadrid, "Ipse est pax nostra," in EstBib, 1970, pp. 101–136; 227–266; P. Stuhlmacher, "Er is unser Friede (Eph. II, 4): Zur Exegese und Bedeutung von Eph. II, 14–18," in J. Gnllka, Neues Testament und Kirche (for R. Schnackenburg), Freiburg-Basel-Vienna, 1974, pp. 337–358; M. Barth, Ephesians, vol. 1, pp. 260–314.

⁴² Rom 14:17; Gal 5:22—"The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace"; Eph 4:3—"be zealous to maintain the unity of the Spirit by this bond of peace (ε—ν τω—συνδέσμῳ τῆς ει—ρήνης). There is but one body and one Spirit."

43 Rom 12:18—“Be at peace with all people” (ει—ρηνεύοντες); 14:19—“We pursue that which contributes to peace and mutual edification”; 2Tim 2:22—“Pursue righteousness, faith, love, peace with all those who call upon the Lord from a pure heart”; Heb 12:14—“Pursue peace with all” (ει—ρήνην διώκετε, Ps 34:15); 1Pet 3:11; 2Pet 3:14—“Be zealous to be found by God in peace, without stain or blemish.” Sin, being precisely the cause of the separation and hostility with God, is the contradiction of peace (cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, p. 173; cf. pp. 153ff.; vol. 2, p. 796). The isolated aphorism of Jas 3:18—“A fruit of righteousness in peace is sown for those who spread peace”—means that workers for peace also share in its fruits (Heb 12:11; Hos 10:12; Ps 85:11; Prov 11:21, 30); cf. R. M. Díaz Carbonell, “Nota a Jac. III, 18,” in XXXV Congreso eucarístico internacional, Barcelona, 1953, vol. 1, pp. 508–509.

44 The first Pauline salutation is χάρις ὑμῖν καὶ εἰρήνη (1Thess 1:1); the last salutation of the NT is the Jewish personal wish εἰρήνη σοι (3John 15). In 2Thess 1:2 and following, the apostle develops χάρις ὑμῖν καὶ εἰρήνη ἀπὸ θεοῦ πατρὸς καὶ Κυρίου —Ιησοῦ Χριστοῦ (cf. 1Cor 1:3; 2Cor 1:2; Gal 1:3; Eph 1:2; cf. 6:23); Phil 1:2; Col 1:2; Phlm 3; Titus 1:4; Rev 1:4. Ἐλεος is inserted between χάρις and εἰρήνη in 1Tim 1:2; 2Tim 1:2; 2John 3; the optative passive of the verb πληθύνω is added at 2Pet 1:2; Jude 2. The formula of 1Pet 5:14 is original: “Peace to all of you [who exist] in Christ”; it seems to refer to John 14:27; 16:33.

45 Plato, Tht. 180 b: “Perhaps you have seen men in combat, but in their times of truce (ει—ρηνεύουσιν) you have not been with them”; Aristotle, Rh. 1.4.1359b39: “One must know with which peoples one can expect to have war so as to remain at peace (ει—ρηνεύηται) with those stronger than oneself.”

46 Polybius 5.8.7: “It is precisely on account of the peace that prevailed (ει—ρηνευομένης) so long in this country that the dwellings around the sanctuary and the surrounding places were full of wealth”; Josephus, Ant. 20.204; Life 78, 211; War 2.367: “forty long ships are sufficient to make peace prevail on the sea”; Dio Cassius 42.15: “although it had been pacified (καίπερ εἰ—ρηνεύσασα) was agitated”; Philo, To Gaius 204: “matters of common interest: the means of establishing and maintaining peace everywhere” (ὡς εἰ—ρηνεύεσθαι καὶ ἡρεμει—σθαι τὰ πανταχοῦ πάντα).

47 1Kgs 22:45—“Jehoshaphat made peace (hiphil of shalam) with the king of Israel”; 1Macc 6:60—“Lysias sent to them to sue for peace” (ει—ρηνεύσαι); 2Macc 12:4.

⁴⁸ 2Chr 14:5-6; 20:30 (Hebrew shaqat); Job 3:26—“I have neither peace (Hebrew shalah) nor calm”; 5:23; 15:21; 16:12; Sir 6:6; 28:9—“the sinful person brings about divisions among those who are at peace” (ει—ρηνευόντων); 28:13.

⁴⁹ Sir 41:9—death is bitter for “the man who lives in peace (ει—ρηνεύοντι) amid his property”; 44:6; Dan 4:1—“I, Nebuchadnezzar, I was tranquil in my house (Aramaic sheleh) and satisfied in my palace.”

⁵⁰ Μετὰ πάντων ἀνθρώπων ει—ρηνεύοντες (present participle). Ordinarily Epictetus 4.5.24 is cited: ει—ρήνην ἄγεις πάντας ἀνθρώπους. Better to look to a letter from Ammonius (first-second century) in which he exhorts his brother to keep peaceful relations in apparently difficult circumstances, lest we give others opportunity to show their enmity toward us (ει—ρηνεύειν καὶ μὴ διδόναι ἀφορμὰς ε—τέροις καθ ὑμω—ν, P.Oxy. 3057, 19).

⁵¹ Cf. S. Daniel, Recherches sur le vocabulaire du culte dans les Septante, Paris, 1966, pp. 289ff.

⁵² Plato, Resp. 3.399 b; cf. Leg. 5.729 d: “The Olympic contexts, those of war and of peace”; 7.814 e; 815 a–d; 816 d; 12.949 d: “sacrifices in peacetime” (περὶ θυσίας ει—ρηνικῆς); 950 e: “peace congresses” (ει—ρηνικαι—ς συνουσίας); Xenophon, Oec. 1.17: “labors of peace” (as opposed to labors of war); 6.1; Hell. 3.1.22: the army in peace formation; Josephus, Ant. 4.292, laws “for peacetime”; Plutarch, C. Gracch. 10.4: “a politics neither wholesome nor peaceable”; Sert. 6.9: ε—ν ται—ς ει—ρηνικαι—ς χρείαις; Dio Cassius 41.17: “the garment reserved for peacetime”; 67.7: “artisans skilled in various things useful in peacetime and wartime”; 69.3: Adrian Afer “claimed to know nothing of the arts of peace and of war”; 53.10: “the pacified provinces”; 56.18: “peaceful assemblies.”

⁵³ Isocrates, De Pace 136; Nic. 24; Phil. 5.46; Josephus, War 2.302: “the very peaceable sentiments of the people”; 3.30, 458; 4.84; 6.344; 3.448: offers of peace; 5.261, 356; Ant. 12.403; War 4.120: partisans of peace; 5.30: “Those who dreamed of obtaining peace”; 5.110 (cf. 2.135: ει—ρήνης ὑπουργοί, servants of peace); Philo, Dreams 2.166; Joseph 166; Moses 1.243; Spec. Laws 4.224.

⁵⁴ Plato, Leg. 8.829 a: “A good city will live in peace”; Philo, Abraham 27: “a calm, tranquil, stable, and peaceable life (ει—ρηνικόν βίον) is sought by those who hold virtue in honor”; 61: “a loyal and peaceable life”; Spec. Laws 1.224: a peaceable and serene existence; Virtues 47: “If you seek justice, holiness, and the other virtues, you will live a life without war in total peace”; Prelim. Stud. 25; Dreams 1.174: the peaceful repose of the athlete. In the papyri, εἰ—ρηνικός appears only in the fourth century; two νυκτοστράτηγοι are presented as officials responsible for keeping good order: τῶ—ν εἰ]ρηνικῶ—ν τὴν φροντίδα ἀναδεδοιημένοι (P.Oxy. 1033, 5); it was incumbent upon the police officer (τῶ— τὰ εἰ—ρηνικὰ ε—πιστα[τοῦντι?]) to recover the fugitives from a town (P.Thead. 17, 15). In the fifth century a Christian orphan writes to her aunt: “May the Lord keep you in good health through long and peaceful years” (P.Bour. 25, 17); in the sixth century, with regard to the repudiation of a fiancée, εἰ—ρηνικόν καὶ ἡσύχιον διάξαι (129, 8; P.Lond. 1680, 13; vol. 5, p. 77); P.Ness. 29, 1: the peaceable emperor Augustus; P.Cair.Masp. 121, 9; SB 10522, 11.

⁵⁵ Philo, Abraham 105; cf. Conf. Tongues 49; Joseph 167; Spec. Laws 3.125; Rewards 87: εἰ—ρηνικοὺς τὸ ἦθος, peaceable mores; Abraham 225: “the good man is not only peaceable and a friend of righteousness, but also courageous”; Drunkenness 76: “how to keep peace in one’s soul (εἰ—ρηνικῶ—ς), even in the midst of war?”

⁵⁶ Gen 34:21; 37:4; Jer 38:22; Obad 1; Ps 37:37; 2Macc 5:25.

⁵⁷ “Words of peace” (Hebrew shalôm), Deut 2:26; 20:11; Jer 9:8; Mic 7:3; Jdt 3:1; 7:24; Ps 35:20; 120:7; 1Macc 1:30; 5:48; 7:10, 15, 27; 10:3, 47; 11:2; T. Gad 6.2.

⁵⁸ 1Sam 10:8; 11:15; 2Sam 6:17-18; 24:25; 1Kgs 3:15; 8:63-64; 9:25; 2Kgs 16:13; Prov 7:14; cf. Josephus, Ant. 7.86, 7.333, 7.382.

⁵⁹ Cf. S. Daniel, Recherches sur le vocabulaire du culte dans les Septante, pp. 291ff.

⁶⁰ The contrast between the immediate affliction produced by discipline (Hebrew mûsar) and its spiritual fruitfulness is traditional, cf. Wis 3:5; 2Cor 7:8ff.; Philo, Prelim. Stud. 160, 175; Plutarch, De virt. mor. 12; Aristotle, cited by Diogenes Laertius 5.1.18: τῆς παιδείας ἔφη τὰς μὲν ῥίζας εἶναι πικράς, γλυκεῖ—ς δὲ τοὺς καρπούς.

⁶¹ Deliverance from evil and triumph over one’s enemies. Δικαιοσύνης, an appositive genitive, refers to moral rectitude as well as to union with God (cf. ἀγιότης, 12:10) and can even suggest eternal beatitude (11:7; cf. 2Tim 4:8). The formula καρπὸς δικαιοσύνης is common: Isa 32:17; Amos 6:12; Prov 11:30; Phil 1:11; Jas 3:18; Philo, Post. Cain 118.

⁶² Whereas the LXX translates Isa 27:5 ποιήσωμεν εἰ—ρήνην, Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion substituted the verb εἰ—ρηνοποιέω: “let them make peace with me.” Cf. Hermes Trismegistus: ὅταν δὲ εἰ—ρηνικοί, τότε καὶ αὐτὴ τὸν ἴδιον δρόμονει—ρηνοποιεῖ—ται (“when they [angels and demons] are peaceful, then the soul also makes its course peaceful” [on the earth]), in Stobaeus, Ecl. 1.49.45 (vol. 1, p. 409).

⁶³ Xenophon, Hell. 6.3.4. Discourse of Callias: “When Athens needs tranquility (ἡσυχίας) it sends us as negotiators of peace (εἰ—ρηνοποιούς).”

⁶⁴ Plutarch, Nic. 11.3: “There was opposition between the young, who were in favor of making war (πολεμοποιῶ—ν), and the old, who were in favor of peace (εἰ—ρηνοποιούς);” Quaest. Rom. 62.

⁶⁵ Dio Cassius 72.15; PSI 1036, 28: εἰ—ρηνοποιὸς τοῦ κόσμου (second century AD). Cf. H. Windisch, “Friedensbringer—Gottessöhne,” in ZNW, 1925, pp. 240–260. Procuring peace (εἰ—ρήνην παρέχειν) is an imperial duty: “the profound peace that Caesar seems to procure for us” (Epictetus 3.13.9–10). Augustus, ὁ εἰ—ρηνοφύλαξ, is the guardian of the peace (Philo, To Gaius 144–146) and glories in having pacified the earth and the sea (Res gest. divi Aug. 13, 25, 26). Cf. A. Momigliano, “Terra marique,” in Journal of Roman Studies, 1942, p. 64.

⁶⁶ The pacific person is originally “one who cannot be troubled in his possession,” hence peaceable; but it is also understood of those who love peace and aspire to peace; cf. meek.

⁶⁷ The rabbinic example is Aaron: “Hillel said: Be among the disciples of Aaron, who loved peace; pursue peace, love creatures, and lead them to Torah” (Pirqe ‘Abot 1.12; cf. t. Sanh. 1.2; Sipre Num. 42); “restoring peace between a man and his neighbor” profits a person in this world, and the capital goes with him for the world to come (m. Pe’ a 1.1; b. shabb. 127a ; b. Qidd. 40a ; cf. Str-B, vol. 1, p. 217). P. Fiebig, Jesu Bergpredigt, Göttingen, 1924, pp. 11ff.

⁶⁸ J. Dupont, Béatitudes, vol. 3, Paris, 1973, pp. 635ff. Cf. H. Huber, Die Bergpredigt, Göttingen, 1932, pp. 44ff. M. P. Brown, Jr., “Matthew as εἰ—ρηνοποιός,” in B. L. Daniels, M. J. Suggs, Studies . . . in honor of K. W. Clark, Salt Lake City, 1967, pp. 39–50; E. Dinkler, Eirene: Der urchristliche Friedensgedanke, Heidelberg, 1973.

εἰ—σακούω, ε—πακούω, ὑπακούω, ὑπακοή

eisakouo, epakouo, to hear, listen to, heed; hypakouo, to heed, obey; hypakoe, obedience

see also παρακοή; πειθαρχέω

eisakouo, S 1522; TDNT 1.222; EDNT 1.400; NIDNTT 2.172–173, 175, 177; MM 188; L&N 24.60, 36.15; BDF §173(3); BAGD 232 | epakouo, S 1873; TDNT 1.222; EDNT 2.17; NIDNTT 2.172–173, 175, 178; MM 228; L&N 24.60; BDF §173(3); BAGD 282 | hypakouo, S 5219; TDNT 1.223–224; EDNT 3.394–395; NIDNTT 2.179; MM 650; L&N 36.15, 46.11; BDF §§163, 173(3), 187(6), 202, 392(3); BAGD 837 | hypakoe, S 5218; TDNT 1.224–225; EDNT 3.394–395; NIDNTT 2.179; MM 650; L&N 35.15; BDF §163; BAGD 837

The verb akouo, “hear, understand,” occurs in combination with a number of prefixes (eis-, ep-, pro-, hyp-, etc.). Eisakouo, used without an object, expresses the idea “listen, heed”;¹ with an accusative or genitive of the thing, it emphasizes the attention or the results of the hearing;² with the genitive of the person, it means the communication, the passing of information from one person to another (one hears³ and so understands). Cf. the chorus to Tecmessa: “Listen to this man; he comes to tell us of the fate of Ajax” (Sophocles, Aj. 789). With the nuance of a favorable hearing: the ambassadors give a good reception to what Alcibiades has to say (Thucydides 5.45.4). Finally, the verb expresses the idea of taking heed of claims (idem I.126) and submitting to them: Olynthus had obtained the obedience of the closest neighboring cities.⁴

These meanings are also found in the papyri of the third century BC, especially sympathetic hearing and taking heed. In a letter addressed to a dioiketes: “We ask, if it seems good to you, that you summon certain ones of us and hear what they wish to tell you” (P.Lond. 1954, 8). Techesteus writes to Zeno, “Summon me and hear what I have to say; I have a proposal concerning how the water should be brought.”⁵ The usage is elevated in a hymn to Isis: “As for me, I heard from others of an extraordinary wonder”;⁶ and the goddess herself is the subject in the fourth century AD: “Do not let the gods sleep; Osiris will hear you, because you died prematurely, without child, without wife.”⁷

The translators of the LXX obviously knew these secular meanings, but they considered the ear to be the organ of understanding and a channel of teaching;⁸ they gave hearing a pedagogical meaning: “The wise listen to advice” (Jer 37:14; Prov 12:15; Hebrew shome‘a). Not only does the LXX call for paying heed to teaching,⁹ it attributes blessedness to the one who hears well (Prov 8:34). This hearing well involves having a positive moral disposition, paying heed, and being teachable. Eisakouo is thus in effect synonymous with believing, acquiescing, and complying.¹⁰ To hear is to accept a proposition¹¹ or to pay heed to what has been said, and so to obey.¹²

The great innovation of the OT is to consider revelation as the word of God to humans and to require that people give it a good reception and submit to it. The verb eisakouo (more than 280 occurrences in the LXX) becomes for this reason one of the most important in OT theology when God is its subject. First of all, it is said repeatedly that God hears someone's voice and pays heed,¹³ because he is merciful (Exod 22:26). He hears sighs (Exod 2:24; 6:15) as well as murmuring (16:7-9, 12), the cry of the poor (Job 34:28; Ps 34:6; 69:33), of the oppressed (Sir 35:13), of the widow (Jdt 9:4, 12), and the desire of the lowly (Ps 10:17). The faith of Israel is that "my God will hear me" (Mic 7:7), "his ear is not too heavy to hear" (Isa 59:1). It is precisely prayer that has this access to God, and eisakouein then means "grant an answer": "God hears the prayer of his servant in the temple";¹⁴ "You will call upon him and he will answer you" (Job 22:27); "Have pity on me—hear my prayer";¹⁵ "You will pray to me and I will answer you" (Jer 29:12). God shows himself propitious (Isa,9:22).

There are nevertheless cases in which God does not hear, refuses to pay heed (Deut 1:45; 3:26), for example when "your hands are bloody";¹⁶ likewise, the great sin of Israel is refusal "to observe (Hebrew shamar) my commandments and my laws" (eisakouein tas entolas mou, Exod 16:28), to hear his voice.¹⁷ This religious hearing is obedience to the divine precepts, the carrying out of God's will;¹⁸ better yet, it is loving God, becoming attached to him; "that is life for you" (Deut 30:20).

Given the importance of this theology, it is remarkable that Philo's eight occurrences of this verb are all quotations on the OT¹⁹ and the single occurrence in Josephus (Ant. 1.190) is likewise a quotation of Gen 16:11— Ishmael was so named "because God heard his supplication."²⁰

Of the five NT occurrences of eisakouo, four (in the passive) mean to have one's petition granted and, in accord with LXX usage, have to do with prayers addressed to God. The first regards the "Gentiles,"²¹ who think "that they will be heard (passive indicative future eisakousthesontai) thanks to their many words,"²² their verbiage (polylogia). This refers particularly to the multiplicity of titles attributed to the many-named divinity in attempts to win favor.²³ In the new religion, it is enough to call upon God as Father; this name alone already constitutes a prayer.²⁴

The angel said to Zechariah, "Fear not, Zechariah, for your prayer (the coming of the Messiah) has been heard" (aorist passive indicative eisekousthe, Luke 1:13), as to the centurion Cornelius: "Your prayer has been heard" (eisekousthe sou he proseuche, Acts 10:31). According to Heb 5:7, Christ in the garden of agony, having offered prayers and supplications to God with loud cries and tears, was heard because of his piety (eisakoustheis [aorist passive participle_ apo tes eulabeias]).²⁵ Eulabeia here is filial devotion, well translated by the Vulgate: "exauditus est pro sua reverentia."²⁶ It is often said that suppliants are saved thanks to their piety (dia ten pros theous eusebeian, Diodorus Siculus 12.57.4; cf.

11.12), that a miracle is obtained because of the piety of the sacrificing priest,²⁷ that an act of adoration is done eusebias charin; ²⁸ but here (apotes eulabeias) we have to take apo as indicating consequence (“because of”; cf. Exod 3:7; 6:9; Matt 18:7; Luke 19:3; etc.). It was because Christ’s piety was outstanding, because he submitted himself wholly to his Father’s will, that his prayer was heard with favor and answered.

1Cor 14:21 is a very free quotation of Isa 28:12—“The Lord will speak to this people through people that babble and in a foreign tongue . . . and they would not hear.”²⁹ St. Paul applies this text to glossalalia: “By people of a foreign land and by the lips of foreigners I will speak to this people, and even then they will not listen to me” (kai oud’ houtos eisakousontai mou, future middle indicative). Speaking in tongues is not a sign of divine blessing upon a community, not a “sign for believers”; this obscure, even unintelligible mode of expression is above all intended for pagans who will see in it divine revelation! What is clear is that this “hearing” of the glossalalia in the Christian community is to be understood according to its LXX meaning (Hebrew ‘anâh = respond): accepting the divine message, submitting one’s life to it, obeying.

Epakouo. — In classical Greek, this verb is in many cases synonymous with the preceding one and means simply “hear,”³⁰ but its particular nuance is rather that of paying heed, paying attention. “Men of Ionia, as much as you are able to hear me (epakountes), pay heed to what I say” (Herodotus 9.98); “Pay attention to the moment when you hear the voice of the crane call.”³¹ Hence: “take account, obey an order”; “Histiaeus, obeying the first order” (epakousas to proto keleusmati, Herodotus 4.141); “Listen to justice, forget violence” (Hesiod, Op. 274). In Homer, however, the verb has a religious meaning and is used for the deity: “Father Zeus, you who see all and hear all” (pant’ epakoueis, Il. 3.277). When used regarding prayer, it means “hear and answer”: “Hear my prayer, accept my offering” (Aristophanes, Nub. 274; cf. Aeschylus, Cho. 725).

This meaning is well attested in the inscriptions and the papyri. Atlasos, an altar is dedicated to Aphrodite: Aphroditēs epakououses kai epekoou.³² At Laodicea on the sea, a dedication reads “Karpeina, who was heard (epakousthisa) following a vow, has consecrated (this) to the propitious goddesses (theais epekoois).”³³ Invocation to Isis in the second century BC: “Come to me, god of gods, show yourself merciful; hear me; take pity on the Twins.”³⁴ This hearing and answering is also found in secular materials. After King Attalus II of Pergamum made a donation, the city of Delphi acknowledged it thus: “He gave an eager welcome to our requests” (epakousas prothymos, Dittenberger, Syl. 672, 6). In a letter to Zeno, the following occurs: “Write me concerning whatever you wish; I will be happy to carry it out” (hedeos epakousomenou, P.Mich. 103, 15; cf. P.Cair.Zen. 59080, 3). The meaning “listen attentively” is common: “Remain and listen for a while to one deceased.”³⁵

The translators of the LXX (Hebrew shamâ' and 'anâh) knew this secular meaning,³⁶ but they almost always used the word for God's hearing with favor³⁷ and granting an answer: "Isaac prayed to God . . . and God heard him."³⁸ Beginning with Jacob this granting of an answer is expressed as a response: "I made an altar to God who responded to me in my day of distress" (Gen 35:3); "Samuel cried to God for Israel, and God responded to him."³⁹ In a corresponding fashion the pious hear the words of the Lord and obey what he commands ("I heard the voice of the Lord" [Deut 26:14; 2Chr 11:4]) in all that he commands.⁴⁰

Philo knew this religious meaning of the word: "God hears suppliants" (Worse Attacks Better 93) and "heeds the prayers of Moses";⁴¹ but most of his occurrences mean simply to hear: "The governor of the land . . . pretended not to hear what he heard."⁴² The same commonplace meaning occurs in Josephus: "They were afraid of being heard by the enemy" (War 4.331); "Titus heard quietly what was said to him."⁴³

The verb is not only a hapax in the NT but a quotation of Isa 49:8 (LXX): "At the favorable time I answered you" (kairo dekte epekousa sou, 2Cor 6:2). The prophet envisioned the return from exile; St. Paul understands a reference to the messianic age and the apostolic preaching: a favorable time for action, since it is God's "accepted" (dektos) time for help—hence an opportune time.⁴⁴

Hypakouo. — In classical and Hellenistic Greek, this verb is often synonymous with the preceding forms ("pay heed, listen"), with the emphasis on the attention given. "I awakened Ulysses, I spoke to him, and he paid me heed at once" (Homer, Od. 14.485); "Pay heed, hear, O mother, I beg you."⁴⁵ The prefix has its force, however, both in Aristophanes, where one seems to bend the head down to listen ("At least listen to the little child," Lys. 878) and also in the meaning "listen at a door, answer"; which today is the job of a concierge or porter: "Upon our arrival, the porter (ho thyroros) came out to meet us—he was the one who used to answer (eiothei hypakouein)—and told us to stay there and wait for him" (Plato, Phd. 59 e); "Philip, the fool, knocked at the door and told the porter (to hypakousanti) to announce him" (Xenophon, Symp. 1.11); "If it is an aged man who answers the door (te thyra hypakeko') I say at once, 'My father, my dear father.'⁴⁶ Thus when St. Peter knocked on the door, "a young servant-girl named Rhoda went to answer" (Acts 12:13).

The dictionaries give another meaning, "obey," and it is indeed true that this meaning is clearly attested, especially in the political arena;⁴⁷ but the shades of meaning—difficult as they are to distinguish—are many. For example, it is obvious that the Samaritans did not "obey" the kings of Syria (Josephus, Ant. 13.275) but conformed to their commands (cf. 3.207), because hearing often means "answering an invitation"⁴⁸ and "taking into account" what is asked (Herodotus 3.148). Sometimes it is done willingly, one complies easily (Xenophon, Cyr. 2.2.3), and this is the case with the wife who owes obedience to her husband.⁴⁹ Sometimes you turn a deaf ear to appeals that are directed to you (Xenophon, An. 4.1.9) because to submit to someone else is to compromise your freedom,⁵⁰ so one obeys with difficulty;⁵¹ hence the frequent meaning “yield” in Thucydides.⁵²

The verb is often used in the papyri, meaning either strict obedience to an order or a law,⁵³ or an agreement to carry out one’s responsibility;⁵⁴ or even the spontaneous and loving submission of a wife to her husband (hypakououses moi kai phylattouses moi pasan eunoian, P.Lond. 1711, 35; 1727, 12). The commonest meaning, however, is “respond” and “correspond”: “I have sworn that I will respond to all questions concerning the vessel” (P.Oxy. 87, 19). In the considerations listed in an honorific decree of Athens for the poet Philippides: “He willingly responded to the desires of the people (hypekousen to demo ethelontes) and celebrated the traditional sacrifices at his own expense” (Dittenberger, Syl. 374, 39; third century BC; Ep. Arist. 44). In the judicial sphere, it has to do with answering an authoritative summons: “Since Cathytes, summoned before men, has not responded (ouch’ hypekousen), I have decided that for his disobedience (apeithias) he shall pay 250 denarii.”⁵⁵ In the third century AD, the verb is used for the identification of a person in court: “This is the person who answered when his name was called.”⁵⁶

The LXX gives no special meaning to this verb, treating it as a synonym of eisakouo and epakouo, in the sense of either hearing⁵⁷ or especially of obeying.⁵⁸ On the one hand, paying heed already means taking into account (Gen 27:13; Dan [Theodotion] 3:12; cf. Philo, Flight 21; Cherub. 9) and obeying (“When their ear hears, they obey me,” Ps 18:44). On the other hand, most of the usages are religious: hearing God’s voice means putting his commandments into practice.⁵⁹ Otherwise, hypakouo translates the Hebrew ‘anâh in the sense of “respond”: “I called and you did not answer me.”⁶⁰ Philo gives this verb especially the sense of “obey,” but he distinguishes between constrained, forced obedience (Creation 142; Moses 1.156) and voluntary obedience (Joseph 269), the latter being the obedience of children who accept being in submission to their parents’ orders (Spec. Laws 2.236). He recognizes that “it is very onerous to be compelled to obey a large number of commandments” (Husbandry 49) and that the subject (to hypakouon) always fears the power of the one who commands even delicately (Virtues 114), although people do not obey the commands of the first one to come along (Good Man Free 25). But obedience is learned (hypakouein mathonton, Conf. Tongues 55; Migr. Abr. 8; cf. Heb 5:8); it is the work of education (Drunkenness 198). Obeying someone else does not destroy freedom, as can be seen from the submission of children to parents or that of students to their teacher (Good Man Free 36, 156).

In conformity to this evolution, hypakouo in the NT always means “obey” (and takes the genitive or the dative) except at Acts 12:13 (cf.

above). Unknown in St. John, it is found in the Synoptics only for the winds and the sea (Luke 8:25; Matt 8:27; Mark 4:41) and for unclean spirits constrained and forced to submit to Christ's orders; also for the sycamore in Luke 17:6 that would not be able to resist the apostles' faith.

The theological meaning appears in Acts 6:7—at Jerusalem, a great multitude of Jewish priests obey the faith (hypekouon te pistei); this imperfect of repetition and duration suggests the continuity of the conversions of those who paid heed to the preaching of the apostles and committed themselves to it, that is, who submitted heart and spirit to what they heard: the doctrine and requirements of the Christian faith (cf. Rom 1:5; 16:26). This would again be called “obedience to the gospel” (2Thess 1:8; Rom 10:16). The gospel preached and transmitted took form in a “type of teaching” to which people became obedient from the bottom of their hearts,⁶¹ that is to say, with all their being—understanding, will, conduct. In effect, one is the slave of whomever one obeys (douloi este ho hypakouete, Rom 6:16). Whether the master be God or sin, one receives the master's orders and carries them out; serving two masters simultaneously is impossible. If sin is the reigning prince, then one's desires are conformed to it; one consents or yields to it (Rom 6:12). Believers, however, are defined as “those who obey” Christ, the bringer of eternal salvation (Heb 5:9). Thus they correspond to the obedience of the one who submitted to the Father even to the point of death (5:8). In all cases, it is clear that Christian “obedience” is the strictest obedience there is. More than a de facto submission, it is free, complete, and definitive commitment to the one recognized and confessed as a master with full prerogatives. As a subject, the believer is not only dependent upon the Lord's wishes but consecrated to him in life and in death. To have faith is to profess and to make real this “obedience.” A fine example of this faith is that of Abraham who “when called, obeyed” God's command right away (Heb 11:12); the juxtaposition kaloumenos hypekousen evokes more than consent. According to the usage of the papyri (cf. above) it expresses the exactitude of the human response to the divine will, whatever that will may be.

This religious obedience “in the Lord” is commanded to children with respect to their parents (Eph 6:1; Col 3:1; we can also take hypakouete in the sense of “pay heed”) and to slaves with respect to their masters ... as to Christ (Eph 6:5; Col 3:22), desiring to please them. Sarah, a model for Christians, obeyed Abraham, whom she recognized as her lord and master (1Pet 3:6). Envisioning the public reading of his epistles, St. Paul, after condemning the lazy who will not work, commands, “If anyone will not obey our word (expressed) in this letter . . . no longer have anything to do with him” (2Thess 3:14). Thanks to God, whether the apostle was present or absent the community at Philippi always obeyed him (Phil 2:12); we could almost translate that they always heard him.

Hypakoe. — This noun, unknown in classical Greek, seems to appear for the first time as a hapax in the LXX,⁶² where it translates the Hebrew ‘a<^>nawâh (“humility,” cf. Ps 18:36; Prov 15:23). In Gos. Pet. 42, it means “response.”⁶³ We could say that it was St. Paul who introduced hypakoe into the Greek language and gave it its meaning of strict obedience,⁶⁴ first of all with regard to the submission of every person to God,⁶⁵ and then of the obedience of Christ as contrasted with Adam,⁶⁶ the first disobedient man: “By the obedience of one, all will be constituted righteous” (Rom 5:19). This obedience refers to the mission on which Christ was sent into the world, and especially the crucifixion (genomenos hypakoos mechri thanatou).⁶⁷ Heb 5:8 specifies: “Even though he was a Son, he learned obedience by the things that he suffered” (emathen . . . ten hypakoen).⁶⁸ Just as the Savior’s whole life was characterized by his submission to God’s will, the Christian life is defined by the initial undertaking of baptism, the obedience of the faith (eis hypakoen pisteos).⁶⁹ We recognize and profess that Christ is the only master and Lord of our life; we submit to him our thoughts, will, and conduct better than prisoners of war bound hand and foot and turned over to a new authority: “We take every thought captive to the obedience of Christ (eis ten hypakoen tou Christou), and we are ready to punish all disobedience, when your obedience shall be complete.”⁷⁰

St. Peter’s three uses of this term are remarkable. First of all in the primitive definition of baptism: “Having perfectly sanctified your souls by obedience to the truth” (1Pet 1:22), the heart commitment and public proclamation of this commitment to the divine revelation, which brings definitive belonging to God (perfect participle). The letter is addressed “to the elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, in the sanctification of the Spirit, for obedience and the sprinkling of the blood of Christ” (eis hypakoen kai rhantismôn haimatos Iesou Christou, 1:2). By the obedience of the faith, the baptized are placed under the lordship of Christ and promise to submit their lives to his precepts. Just as blood seals the diatheke (Matt 26:28; Heb 10:19), the union of obedience and blood refers to the ratification of the old covenant (Exod 24:7-8); the consecration by faith of the person and of all existence is definitive. That is why 1Pet 1:14 calls Christians “children of disobedience that you were (hos tekna hypakoes), no longer be conformed to the former covetousnesses.”⁷¹

The frequency and the absoluteness of these NT expressions shows that primitive catechesis was designed to teach believers the idea, the meaning, and the fullness of Christian obedience.⁷² Philology alone cannot suffice to fill these out (even with the help of the synonyms peitho, hypatasso, etc.). In biblical theology, we would have to begin with Matt 11:29-30: the taking of the yoke of Christ and of the baptism in which the disciple recognizes Christ as Kyrios. But this submission must be put into context with the love that is the royal law (Jas 2:8), at the same time strictly required and a law of liberty (1:25; cf. 1Cor 10:23), and which thus governs not slaves but children. Obedience, then, will not consist in material conformity to precepts but in taking heed and being teachable, letting oneself be persuaded, in having a well-disposed heart,⁷³ and from that point submitting to a rule of life and complying with what is asked. The example of Christ proves that this obedience is the freest and the most spontaneous that there is.

¹ Homer, Il. 8.97: “divine Ulysses did not listen as he ran on toward the hollow ships.”

² Sophocles, El. 38: “such is the oracle that I heard”; Theocritus 24.34: “Alcmene heard cries and was the first to awaken”; Thucydides 4.34.3: “the cries of the enemy were too loud for them to hear the orders that were given them.”

³ Cf. Euripides, El. 416: “He rejoiced . . . when he heard that the child that he had saved was living”; Sophocles, OC 1645: “This is what we all heard”; El. 884: “From whom did you hear the news, that you believe it so strongly?”

⁴ Xenophon, Hell. 5.2.13. This meaning is particularly frequent with negation = refuse; Thucydides 3.4.1: the Mytilenians do not obey the generals’ message; Herodotus 1.214: Cyrus refuses to hear Tomyris.

⁵ P.Lond. 2054, 21; cf. PSI 377, 20: ἔγραψα οὖν σοι ἵνα εἰ—δῆς, ε—πειδὴ οὐ βούλει μου εἰ—σακοῦσαι. In the second century AD, Νικάριος εἰ—σήκουσα, ε—ξουσίας οὔσης μεταμισθοῦν (P.Mil.Vogl. 130, 9; cf. 131, 14; SB 9380, 1; 8210, 14).

⁶ E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 175, col. IV, 35 (= SB 8141). Cf. a proskynema: ε—σακοῦσαι θείου φθέγματος ἀπέρχομε (SB 8359, 2).

⁷ SB 11247, 18: εἰ—σακούσει σε ὁ Οὔσιρις ὅτι; cf. B. Boyaval, “Une malédiction pour viol de sépulture,” in ZPE, vol. 14, 1974, pp. 71–73 (compares Pap.Graec.Mag. 40, 14ff.). P.Lond. 1928, 2 is Christian, and εἰ—σήκουσέν μου is a quotation of Jonah 2:3. Cf. O. Montevecchi, “Quaedam de graecitate psalmodum cum papyris comparata,” in Proceedings IX, pp. 303ff.

⁸ P. Dhorme, Emploi métaphorique, p. 89. Cf. Deut 21:18—a rebellious son “does not hear the voice of his father or the voice of his mother; he does not listen to them when they correct him.”

⁹ Prov 8:6—“Listen, because I am going to tell you important things”; cf. Num 16:8; Isa 32:9; 42:23; Sir 39:13.

¹⁰ Exod 4:8-9; 5:2; Deut 9:23; 13:9. The hardened heart is obstinate, does not listen (Exod 7:13, 22; 11:9), like the uncircumcised ear (Jer 6:10; 7:26) and the hard forehead (Ezek 3:7).

¹¹ Gen 34:17, 24; 42:21-22; Judg 11:28; 19:25; 20:13; 2Kgs 10:6; Dan (Theodotion) 1:14.

¹² Hearing or not hearing the voice of Moses (Exod 3:18; 4:1; 6:9, 12, 30; 7:4; 16:20), of Joshua (Deut 34:9; 22:2), of the judges (Judg 2:17), of the angel (Exod 23:21).

¹³ Gen 21:17—“God heard the voice of the boy”; this is a play on the name Ishmael, which could be translated “God hears” or “May God hear” or “In calling upon God” or “Heard by God” (cf. Josephus, Ant. 1.190); Exod 22:22—“I will hear his cry”; Num 20:16—“We cried out to Yahweh and he heard our voice”; 21:3; Deut 9:19; 10:10; 26:7; Judg 3:9; 13:9; Neh 9:28; Ps 22:24; 31:22; 34:16, 18; 39:12; 40:1; 106:44; 141:1; Jdt 4:13—“The Lord heard their voice”; 8:17; Sus 35.

¹⁴ 1Kgs 8:29-30, 32, 34, 36, 39, 43, 45, 52; 2Chr 6:21, 23, 25, 27, 30, 33; 7:14; cf. Tob 3:16.

¹⁵ Ps 4:1; 5:3—“In the morning you hear my voice”; 6:8—“the voice of my weeping”; 17:2, 6; 27:7; 28:2, 6; 145:19; Jonah 2:3—“From the depths of Sheol I called, and you heard my voice”; Sir 34:24, 26; 51:11—“My prayer was answered; you saved me from ruin”; Bar 2:14, 16; Dan (Theodotion) 9:17, 19; (LXX) 10:12; 2Macc 1:8—“We prayed to the Lord and we were heard.”

¹⁶ Isa 1:15 (cf. Jer 7:16; 11:11, 14; 14:12; Ezek 8:18); that is, the sentiments of the one praying and the object of the request have to be in conformity to God’s will (Sir 3:5; 4:6; 2Macc 8:3).

¹⁷ Num 14:22; Deut 1:43; Jer 11:10; 17:23; 19:15; 25:4, 7; 26:5; 35:15; Bar 2:30; Neh 9:17; Zech 7:11-12.

¹⁸ Deut 11:13, 28; 13:19; 15:5; 19:9; 27:10; 28:1, 2, 9, 15, 45, 58; 30:2, 8, 10, 16, 17; 1Sam 12:15; Jer 17:27; Ezek 20:8, 39; Dan 9:10, 11, 14 (Theodotion); Zeph 3:2; Zech 1:4; 6:15.

¹⁹ Philo, Alleg. Interp. 2.88 (Exod 4:1ff.); Post. Cain 12 (Deut 30:20); Drunkennes 14 (Deut 21:18-21); Migr. Abr. 174 (Exod 23:20-21); Prelim. Stud. 70 (Gen 28:7); Dreams 1.92 (Exod 22:26-27); 2.175 (Deut 30:9-10).

²⁰ Διὰ τὸ εἰ—σακοῦσαι τὸν θεὸν τῆς ἰ—κεσίας. In the Apocrypha: “The Lord answers the prayer of everyone who fears God” (Pss. Sol. 6.8); “that this people might hear my voice and the decrees of my mouth” (Add Jer 7:32); “because they have not heard my voice nor kept my commandments” (3Apoc. Bar. 16.4); “take pity on me and hear me” (T. Abr. A 7); “what I asked you, you granted” (ibid. 9); “Lord, Lord, hear my voice” (ibid. 10); “They made this prayer and this supplication for this soul, and God answered them. . . . I have heard your voice and your prayer” (ibid. 14); the archangel to God: “I have obeyed your friend Abraham in all that he said to you” (ibid. 15).

²¹ In the pejorative sense of ε—θνικοί, Matt 6:7; cf. A. Pelletier, Josèphe adaptateur, pp. 79ff.

²² Matt 6:7. D. Buzy, Evangile selon saint Matthieu, Paris, 1935, pp. 74ff. C. Spicq, Dieu et l’homme, p. 64.

²³ Cf. the beginning of Cleanthes’ Hymn to Zeus: “Most glorious of the immortals, you who are invoked by so many names, eternally all-powerful one, Zeus, author of nature, who govern all things by law, I greet you” (Stobaeus, Ecl. 1.1.12; vol. 1, p. 25; cf. A. J. Festugière, Dieu cosmique, pp. 310ff.; E. des Places, La Religion grecque, Paris, 1969, pp. 263ff.), invocations to Isis (ὑπὸ δὲ τῶ—ν πολλῶ—ν μυριώνυμος κέκληται, Plutarch, De Is. et Os. 53; Dittenberger, Or. 695, 2; P. Ross. Georg. III, 4, 4; SB 4101, 2), to Osiris (cf. The Book of the Dead 142; ed. P. Barguet, Paris, 1967, pp. 186ff.). A Jewish-Aramaic amulet from Aleppo: “O Holy One . . . sublime, exalted God, my help, Elyeh, Ahmah, etc.” (C. Pap. Jud. 819, 2ff.).

²⁴ J. Lewy, “Some Observations Concerning Biblical Prayer,” in HUCA, vol. 22, 1961, pp. 79ff.

²⁵ The text is difficult. On the numerous explications of it, cf. C. Spicq, Hébreux, vol. 2, pp. 112ff. Cf. E. Rasco, “La oración sacerdotal de Cristo en la tierra según Hebr. V, 7,” in Gregorianum, 1962, pp. 723–755; T. Boman, “Der Gebetskampf Jesu,” in NTS, vol. 10, 1964, pp. 261–273; J. Jeremias, Abba, pp. 319–323.

²⁶ Cf. C. Spicq, “Religion (Vertu de),” in DBSup, vol. 10, col. 210–232; cf. C. Maurer, “‘Erhört wegen der Gottesfurcht,’ Hebr. V, 7,” in Neues

Testament und Geschichte (Festschrift O. Cullmann), Zurich, 1972, pp. 275–284.

²⁷ Πρὸς εὐσέβειαν τοῦ ι—ερέως, at Stratonicea in Caria, in L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 12, Paris, 1960, p. 543.

²⁸ SB 13, 1167, 8658; SEG VIII, 773; CIRB, n. 44, 13.

²⁹ Καὶ οὐκ ἠθέλησαν ἀκούειν. This transmission of the word of God by foreigners was as a punishment for the hardening of the elect people, who no longer listened to the voice of the prophets.

³⁰ Herodotus 2.70: “The crocodile hears the cries of the piglet and goes in the direction they are coming from”; Plato, Grg. 487 c: “One day I heard you deliberating on a point . . .”; cf. Menander, Dysk. 821: “I heard your whole conversation from the beginning, while going out the door”; Plutarch, Fam. 10.6: the spectators at the Isthmian games “did not all hear, nor hear distinctly, the proclamation” of the herald and ask for a second hearing.

³¹ Hesiod, Op. 448; Plato, Soph. 227 c: “Pay attention to me for what follows”; Sophocles, OT 708: Jocasta to Oedipus, “Hear me;” Aristophanes, Eq. 1080: “Hear this oracle again”; Homer, Od. 19.98: “Let the foreigner speak to me and listen to me; I wish to question him.” Hence: become informed, “You will learn the trials that await you” (Euripides, Tro. 166).

³² J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1973, p. 165, n. 429.

³³ IGLS 1262. The word of the prophet is listened to as that of a god, ε—πακούομαι ὡς θεός (Vettius Valens 63, 19; cf. F. Cumont, L’Egypte des astrologues, p. 120, n. 5; p. 158, n. 2). —Επήκοος is an Egyptian, Greek, and Roman adjective for deities that answer prayers; the classic collection is O. Weinrich, “εοὶ ε—πήκοι,” in Mitteilungen des kaiserlich-deutschen Archaeologischen Instituts, vol. 37, 1912, pp. 1–68; cf. Y. Grandjean, Arétalogie d’Isis, p. 17, line 7: “You have heard, Isis, the prayers that I addressed to you; come for the praises that I intend for you”; p. 30, n. 33; SB 4947, 6.

³⁴ UPZ 78, 28: ε—λθέ μοι, θεὰ θεω—ν, εἴλεως γινομένη, ε—πάκουσόν μου, ε—λέησον τὰς διδύμας; 81, col. II, 20; SEG VIII, 621, 4 (= SB 7871); BGU 1080, 6; cf. a Christian letter from the fourth century: “May God also hear your prayers” (P.Oxy. 1494, 7).

³⁵ Tomb inscription, in E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 97, 4 = SB 7871, 4. Cf. P.Oxy. 2562, 5: “You have heard the decision of my lord the most illustrious prefect of Egypt”; a pilgrim wishes to hear the voice of the Colossus of Memnon (SEG XX, 685, 3 - SB 101 = A. and E. Bernard, Memnon, n. 70, 3); SB 11043, 7.

³⁶ Isa 8:9—“Pay heed, all nations of the earth” (hiphil of the Hebrew ‘azan); 10:30 (hiphil of qashab); 55:3; Jdt 14:15—“no one listened”; Cant 5:6—“I called him, but he did not answer”; cf. listen to advice (2Chr 25:16).

³⁷ Gen 16:11; 17:20; 21:17; Josh 10:14; Judg 13:9; 2Chr 6:19; 30:20, 27; Ps 145:19; Jer 18:19; Dan 9:17-19; Prov 15:29—“God hears (answers) the supplications of the righteous”; Sir 4:6. Cf. 2Sam 21:14—“God showed favor to the land” (ε—πήκουσεν, Hebrew niphal of ‘atar); 24:25; 1Chr 5:20; 21:26; Isa 19:22. J. Barr, “The Meaning of ε—πακούω and cognates in the LXX,” in JTS, 1980, pp. 67–72.

³⁸ Gen 25:21—ε—πήκουσε δὲ αὐτοῦ ὁ θεός; 30:6, 17, 22; 2Sam 22:7; 2Kgs 13:4; 2Chr 33:13, 19; Isa 41:17; 49:8; Zech 10:6; Ps 22:24; Sir 48:20; 2Macc 1:5.

³⁹ 1Sam 7:9; 1Kgs 18:24, 37; Job 33:13; Ps 3:4; 17:6; 20:1, 9; 34:4; 65:5; 69:13, 17; 81:7; 86:1; 91:15; 99:6, 8; 108:6; 118:5, 21; 119:26, 145; 138:3; 143:1; Isa 30:19; 65:24; Hos 2:23; Zech 13:9. C. Cox, “Ἐι—σακούω and —Ἐπακούω in the Greek Psalter,” in Bib, 1981, pp. 251–258.

⁴⁰ Josh 22:2; Isa 45:1; 50:10; cf. Esth 4:17—to effect that which is asked.

⁴¹ Moses 1.47; 2.229; Spec. Laws 4.32; Flight 1 and 5 quoting Gen 16:11. Joseph 265: “God sees all and hears all” seems to be a citation of Homer, Il. 3.277.

⁴² To Gaius 132: ὧν ἤκουε μὴ ε—πακούειν; cf. Post. Cain 137; Dreams 1.129, 191; Moses 2.170; Conf. Tongues 8.

⁴³ War 7.104; 7.355, 385. In 16 occurrences, only 2 are religious: God hears (answers) prayers (Ant. 9.10; 10.41).

⁴⁴ Taking the context into account, L. Cerfaux (“Saint Paul et le ‘Serviteur de Dieu’ d’Isaïe,” in Miscellanea biblica et orientalia, R. P. A. Miller oblata, Rome, 1951, p.359) specifies that the point is the grace offered concretely, at that time, in Paul’s mission. The presence and ministry of the apostle, sent and protected by God, offers to the Corinthians “in that moment the irreplaceable opportunity for salvation, their last chance.”

45 Euripides, Alc. 400; Ps.-Homer, H. Aphr. 1.181: “He eagerly shook off his sleep to listen”; Xenophon, Cyr. 8.1.18: “Cyrus did not have the leisure to listen”; 8.1.20; 8.3.21; 8.4.9; 8.7.16; hence, answer and grant the request, Diodorus Siculus 4.34.5

46 Menander, Dysk. 494; Theophrastus, Char. 4.12: “If someone knocks on the door, he comes in person to answer”; 28.3—to the question “Who are the women who live in this house?” the slanderous person answers, “They are wantons, women who answer in person when someone knocks at the door”; P.Oxy. 2719, 14 (third century).

47 Herodotus 3.101: “These Indians were never subject to Darius”; the peoples accepted submission to Cyrus (Xenophon, Cyr. 1.1.3); the allies were “subjects of the empire” (Thucydides 6.69.3); people submit to the general (ibid. 3.3.11), to the president of a brotherhood (P.Lond. 2193 = SB 7835, 10), to the laws (Aeschines, In Tim. 1.49; Plato, Leg. 4.708 d; Dittenberger, Syl. 785, 18).

48 Athenaeus 6.247 d; Plutarch, Sol. 31.3: “the accuser did not appear” (οὐχ ὑπήκουσε). Cf. corresponding to a desire: Eleazar to King Ptolemy—“Every time it is a matter of serving your interests, we will follow your desires” (Ep. Arist. 44).

49 Philemon, frag. 132 K: ἀγαθῆς γυναικός ε—στιν, μὴ κρείττοῦ εἶναι τὰνδρὸς ἀλλ᾽ ὑπήκοον (Stobaeus, Flor. 74, 20; vol. IV, 23); Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.201: “the wife ought to obey her husband, not to humiliate herself but to be guided, because it is to the man that God has given the power.” Cf. Plato, Lach. 200 d: “You will know better how to make yourself listen (= obey).”

50 Thucydides 2.62.3; to submit is to expose oneself in the positive sense to the air (Theophrastus, Caus. Pl. 2.12.1), to the cold (ibid. 5.4.2), to the sun’s rays (Pindar, Ol. 3.44).

51 Said of certain diseases with regard to the cures, δυσκόλως ὑπακούοντα (Hippocrates, Epid. 3.8). Cf. Plutarch, Thes. 1.5: “Can we oblige the fables to submit to reason and take on the character of history.”

52 Thucydides 1.141: “You ought to yield before suffering harm”; 5.98; cf. 1.29.1: “The Corinthians did not wish to yield”; 1.26.4; 1.139.2.

53 P.Sorb. 63, 8: “Know well that if you do not obey my orders . . .”; P.Mich. 604, 16: submitting to the law of the strategos; P.Mil.Vogl. 237, 12 (oath of obedience to the prefect); SB 7835, 10; 9393, 12; 11222, 9;

P.Tebt. 24, 26 and 28; P.Oxy. 900, 9; P.Cair.Isid. 102, 10; 113, 10; P.Mil. 64, 12. Cf. P.Hamb. 169, 5: “Thus far they have not followed up” (241 BC); P.Cair.Zen. 59367, 15 = SB 6768.

⁵⁴ P.Oxy. 1889, 21: ὁμολογῶ— . . . ὑπακούειν; 1982, 21; SB 6266, work contract: ὑπακούειν ὑμι—ν ε—ν πα—σι καλοι—ς ἔργοις; 6643, 17; 6704, 12; 9503, 12; P.Aberd. 19, 11: “If Gaius Julius L., here present, consents to this decision and swears to it . . .”; P.Oxy. 2765, 10: present and consenting; SB 10205, 14.

⁵⁵ P.Achm. 8, 28; BGU 1826, 25; P.Mich. 534, 7, 13; SB 7368, 10; 7558, 10; 7696, 36; P.Fouad 24, 3: “If they do not respond [to my citation], I will let you distribute”; PSI 1100, 10; 1265, 8; P.Hamb. 29, 5: κληθέντων τινῶ—ν καὶ μὴ ὑπακουσάντων; P.Flor. 6, 24: κληθεὶς μὴ ὑπακούσης = if, having been summoned, you do not comply, the consequence will be . . . ; P.Stras. 41, 50; P.Oslo 80, 24; P.Oxf. 5 a 6; P.Oxy. 3117, 3; P.M. Meyer, Jur.Pap., n. 85.

⁵⁶ P.Oxy. 2892, col. I, 24; 2894, col. II, 35, 40; col. III, 32; 2895, col. I, 24; 2902, 8, 21, 24; 2922, 13; 2927, 2, 10, etc.; 2930, 7; 2931, 5; 2932, 4; 2936, 29, 31.

⁵⁷ Gen 16:2 (Hebrew shamá’); 27:13; 39:10; Sir 24:22; cf. 2Chr 24:19—“they do not heed” (Hebrew ‘azan).

⁵⁸ Gen 41:40—“At Joseph’s order, all the people submitted”; 1Chr 29:23—“all the Israelites obeyed Solomon”; everyone obeyed God (Dan 7:27; Bar 3:33; Sir 42:23) who hears prayers (Prov 15:29; 2Macc 1:5); obedience to the high priest, 1Macc 10:38.

⁵⁹ Gen 22:18; 26:5; Lev 26:14, 18, 21, 27; Deut 26:14; 30:2; Josh 22:2; Jer 3:13, 25; 11:10; 16:12; Dan 3:30.

⁶⁰ Cant 5:6; 2Sam 22:42: “They cry to Yahweh, and he does not answer them”; Isa 50:2; 65:12, 24; 66:4; Job 5:1; 9:3, 14, 16; 13:22; 14:15; 19:16; Prov 29:19.

⁶¹ Rom 6:17. It is difficult to specify the meaning of τύπος διδασχῆς, given the variety of meanings of the first word. Proposals include form of teaching, norm, rule, model, schema (A. Blumenthal, “Τύπος und Παράδειγμα,” in Hermes, 1928, pp. 391–414; G. Roux, “Le Sens de τύπος,” in REA, 1961, pp. 5–14). In the papyri, typos is a fixed rule, in contrast to custom (συνήθεια) and a legal term (P.Panop.Beatty 1, 130, 135, 136, 262); in architecture, it is the architect’s plan, the mock-up, or the wooden stamp that marks an imprint on the clay (A. Orlandos, Technique architecturale, p. 93). So we could interpret that Christian doctrine puts its authenticating mark on a life in conformity to the will of God and the model of Christ. Cf. J. Kürzinger, “Τύπος διδασχῆς und der Sinn von Röm. VI, 17f,” in Bib, 1958, pp. 156–176; F. W. Beare, “On the Interpretation of Romans VI, 17,” in NTS, vol. 5, 1959, pp. 206–210; C. H. Dodd, “The Primitive Catechism and the Sayings of Jesus,” in New Testament Essays, pp. 109–118; C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, pp. 723ff. U. Borse, “Abbild der Lehre: Röm. VI, 17,” in BZ, 1968, pp. 95–103.

⁶² 2Sam 22:36, a song of David: “Your gentleness (ὕπακοή) enlarged me.” In T.Jud. 17.3 there may be a Christian gloss, ἦν ἔδωκέ μοι Κύριος ε—ν ὑπακοῇ πατρός μου.

⁶³ Gos. Pet. 42: a voice from the heavens asks Jesus, “Have you preached to those who sleep?” And an answer was heard (ὕπακοῇ ἠκούετο) coming from the cross: ‘Yes’”; cf. Acts John 94; Const. App. 8.13.13. The term is unknown in the papyri until the sixth century, when it appears in a work contract: μεθ ὑπερτάτης ἀρετῆς καὶ ὑπακοῆς ε—ν πα—σι τοι—ς ὀφελίμοις ἔργοις τε καὶ λόγοις (P.Stras. 40, 41); P.Cair. Masp. 159, 24: μετὰ πάσης ὑποταγῆς καὶ ὑπακοῆς παρ ἁλλήλων ει—ς ἀλλήλους.

⁶⁴ Except at Phlm 21, where πεποιθῶς τῇ ὑπακοῇ could be translated “being confident in your teachableness” or “in your mildness.” Perhaps the ὑ[πακοῇ] of the Corinthians with regard to Titus and Paul (2Cor 7:15) is teachableness or humility rather than obedience in the strict sense (cf. 7:7, 11).

⁶⁵ Rom 6:16—When you are in someone’s service, it is in order to obey him (ει—ς ὑπακοῆν), that is, to carry out his orders, as a slave does for his master. Now when a person obeys God, this voluntary submission procures righteousness, ὑπακοῆς ει—ς δικαιοσύνην.

⁶⁶ Cf. K. Romaniuk, L’Amour du Père et du Fils dans la sotériologie de saint Paul, Rome, 1961, pp. 96–150.

⁶⁷ Phil 2:8; cf. P. Henry, “Kénose,” in DBSup, vol. 5, col. 33.

⁶⁸ It is a constantly recurring axiom that painful trials teach the wise (Aeschylus, Ag. 177; Herodotus 1.207; Moses 2.280; cf. J. Coste, “Notion grecque et notion biblique de la souffrance éducatrice: A propos de Hébr. V, 8,” in RSR, 1955, pp. 481–523; G. Bornkamm, “Sohnschaft und Leiden,” in Judentum, Urchristentum, Kirche: Festschrift J. Jeremias, Berlin, 1960, pp. 188–198; C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, p. 46; vol. 2, p. 117). How could the incarnate Son of God, the perfect model of all virtue from his birth on, enroll in the school of suffering to learn a virtue that was innate in him? The answer is that as a human being, Jesus had to experience the constraints, the weaknesses, the temptations of human nature. He had a concrete knowledge of the difficulties of obedience, in the most unhelpful circumstances, especially in the trial of the death that he suffered, a “passion.” Thus he acquired a psychologically enriching experience, a practical understanding, a personal appreciation of suffering that was indispensable for his ability to sympathize with his brethren (cf. verse 2). F. Raurell, “La obediencia de Crist, modelo de obediencia del hombre según San Pablo,” in Estudios Franciscanos, 1963, pp. 249–270.

⁶⁹ Rom 1:5; 15:18; 16:19, 26. This can be read as (a) submission to the objective faith set forth by the apostle, (b) obedience that leads to faith, or more probably (c) obedience that is faith: unreserved commitment to God, to what God has said and promised; cf. G. H. Parke-Taylor, “A Note on εἰς ὑπακοὴν πίστεως in Romans I, 5,” in ExpT, vol. 55, 1943–44, pp. 305ff. W. Wiefel, “Glaubensgehorsam? Erwägungen zu R. I, 5,” in Festschrift E. Schott, 1967, pp. 137–144.

⁷⁰ 2Cor 10:5-6. The neophyte is like a conqueror’s plunder. In the second part of verse 6 (ὅταν πληρωθῆ ὑμῶν ἡ ὑπακοή), J. Héring (La seconde Epître de saint Paul aux Corinthiens, Neuchâtel, 1958, p. 58; ET The Second Epistle of Saint Paul to the Corinthians, trans. A. W. Heathcote and P. J. Allcock, London, 1967, ad loc) thinks that the aorist is not the equivalent of a preterite or a future perfect but rather has an inchoative sense (cf. Phil 2:7-8; Heb 2:10) that may be translated, “at the moment when your obedience is to be complete.” Cf. 2Cor 2:9—εἰς πάντα ὑπήκοοί ε—στε.

⁷¹ Ὑπακοῆς is not a simple genitive of quality describing children of God (cf. verses 3, 17), suggesting the teachableness and submission that every child owes its father (Heb 12:9); it is a Hebraism, like “son of the kingdom” or “son of light,” expressing an essential property, a mode of being. We could say that the neophytes are obedient by nature, devoted to obeying God, made to obey.

⁷² Cf. O. Kuss, “Der Begriff des Gehorsams im Neuen Testament,” in Theologie und Glaube, 1935, pp. 695–702; G. Badini, “L’obbedienza nella Bibbia,” in Vita Cristiana, 1954, pp. 299–312; R. Cai, “L’obbedienza di Gesu Cristo,” ibid., pp. 313–329; J. Gnllka, “Zur Theologie des Hörens nach den Aussagen des N.T.,” in Bibel und Leben, 1961, pp. 71–81. R. Deichgräber, “Gehorsam und Gehorchen in der Verkündigung Jesu,” in ZNW, 1961, pp. 119–122; R. Schnackenburg, The Moral Teachings of the New Testament, trans. J. Holland-Smith and W. J. O’Hara, New York, 1965, pp. 110ff., 207ff.; C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, pp. 256, 384; vol. 2, pp. 532ff.; 593, n. 3; 623; 659ff. B. Schwank, “Gehorsam (ὕπακοή) im N.T.,” in Erbe und Auftrag, 1966, pp. 469–476.

⁷³ One is willing or not willing to be obedient, cf. Acts 7:39—οὐκ ἐθέλησεν ὑπήκοοι γενέσθαι.

ε—κδημέω

ekdemeo, to leave, be in exile

ekdemeo, S 1553; TDNT 2.63–64; EDNT 1.408; NIDNTT 2.788–790; MM 192; L&N 23.111, 85.21; BAGD 238

“Being at home (endemountes) in the body, we are in exile (ekdemoumen) from the Lord. . . . We prefer to be in exile (ekdemesai) from the body and be at home (endemesai) with the Lord. That is why whether we are at home in this body or away from it (eite endemountes eite ekdemountes) it is our desire to be pleasing to him” (2Cor 5:6, 8, 9). These three occurrences of ekdemeo, the only occurrences in the whole Bible, are rather difficult to translate, because this compound of demos (“land, territory”) is relatively uncommon and has varied meanings.

The first meaning is “leave” (with an accusative of the place or person): “Solon left the country and went to Egypt” (Herodotus 1.30); “Laius had left to consult the oracle.”¹ Next, it can mean “go away”: “The one who has killed will go away into some other country and to some other place, and he will stay there in exile.”² It can also mean “travel” and becomes synonymous with apodemeo (“leave on a journey,” Matt 25:14; Mark 12:1; Luke 20:9): “These are the conditions imposed on a trip abroad” (Plato, Leg. 12.1952 d); “The soul completed the journey, because it found a path” (Ps.-Aristotle, Mund. 1.391a11). In T. Abr., the verb is used for death, as in 2Cor: leaving the body to go to God.³

In the papyri, this verb is almost always used for changing one’s residence, going from one place to another,⁴ leaving one’s country or moving. In the first century AD, two ephebes state, “If we move or if we leave, we must notify the president.”⁵ “Ever since we left (aph’ hou exedemesamen) the monarchs have done nothing . . .” (P.Mich. 43, 5; third century BC). The meaning “be absent” is well attested: “Be so good as to write Epharmostos to be there and not to be absent (egdemountos) when the matter is judged.”⁶

The Pauline use of moving as a metaphor for death, expressed as a play on words, is clear: it is a matter of moving from one country to another, that is, moving out of here in order to move in elsewhere, leaving the body behind to gain heaven and see Christ. Here below, Christians are in exile “apart from the Lord.” They live as exiles (ekdemeo) so long as they dwell in this body, which is likened to a tent (skenos —2Cor 5:1, 4—a symbol of nomadic life) because their citizenship is heavenly (Phil 3:20). The idea could have been comprehensible to pagans: “A little earth envelops and hides his body; his soul, having escaped his members, is possessed by the vast ouranos.”⁷

¹ Sophocles, OT 114;

² Plato, Leg. 9.864 e; Philo, Spec. Laws 4.142: “The inscriptions engraved on the city gates remind those who go away and those who remain alike . . . of what they must say and do”; Josephus, Life 388: “An urgent personal matter obliged me to leave the king’s domain.”

³ T. Abr. A 1: The archangel Michael has the mission of telling Abraham that he is going to die: “You are about to leave this world of vanity and go out of your body (ε—κδημει—ν ε—κ τοῦ σώματος) to your own master among the good”; 7: “At this time you must leave the terrestrial world and go to God” (καὶ πρὸς τὸν θεὸν ε—κδημει—ν); 15: “You are to leave the body (ε—κ τοῦ σώματος ε—κδημει—ν) and appear before the Lord.”

⁴ BGU 1197, 7: ε—κδημήσαντος δὲ σοῦ εἰ—ς τοὺς ε—κτὸς τόπου (4 BC); P.Lond. 2019, 1: “Know that I have gone to Crocodilopolis to make a payment” (third century BC). An epitaph from the Decapolis in the third century AD mentions that a veteran who has taken part in two wars and traversed the world (τὸν κόσμον ε—κδημήσας; cf. IG, XIV, 905: δύσιν καὶ ἀνατολήν) has finally returned to his country (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1952, p. 180, n. 172). Cf. Philo, Abraham 65: “Those who have traveled . . . have become expatriates.”

⁵ P.Tebt. 316, 20: ε—άν δὲ μεταβαίνωμεν ἢ ε—γδημω—μεν μεταδώσωμεν.

⁶ P.Mich. 80, 4 9 (letter from Eutychides to Zeno); BGU 1916, 2; P.Oxy. 50, 16: There will be no lost time during the absence (ε—κδημηῆσαι) of the delegate; SB 6769, 23: καθ ὄν χρόνον μετὰ τοῦ βασιλέως ε—ξεδημοῦμεν; cf. 8940, 4: κατὰ τὴν ε—μὴν ε—κδημίαν. Nothing can be drawn from P.Yale 49, 4, which is quite mutilated.

⁷ Inscription from Lycabettus, in the Hellenistic period (G. Kaibel, Epigrammata, n. 104, 5; cf. 35; 90; 125; 243; 250); “The body has gone to the earth, its parent; the heavenly soul to an imperishable dwelling. The corpse sleeps in the ground; the soul that was given me sojourns in heaven” (ibid. 261, 7–10). A. J. Festugière, Idéal religieux, pp. 143–169. For Plutarch, death is like return from an exile (ε—ξ ἀποδημίας . . . ει—ς πατρίδα). The soul, driven from the body, wanders between the earth and the moon for a variable length of time; “one would speak of banished persons returning to their land after a long absence” (De fac. 28.943 c); “Socrates said that death was like . . . a great and long journey (ἀποδημία)” (Ps.-Plutarch, Cons. ad Apoll. 12; reference to Plato, Ap. 40 c: “Death is a departure, a passage of the soul from this place to another”; cf. Plato, Phd. 67 d: “The precise meaning of the word death is that a soul is detached and separated from a body”). Epictetus 1.9.16: “The time of the sojourn (τῆς οἰ—κήσεως) here below is short; we must remain at this post, but wait for God”; Marcus Aurelius 2.17: life is an exile, ξένου ε—πιδημία; Philo, Heir 82: “the whole bodily life is an exile (ἀποδημία)”; 267; Conf. Tongues 76–82: “The wise person sojourns in the sensible body as in a foreign land” (81); Dreams 1.180ff. Cf. F. Cumont, Symbolisme funéraire, pp. 177–253; idem, Lux Perpetua, pp. 175ff., 275–302; J. Dupont, Union avec le Christ, pp. 153–155, 160–165, 168.

ε—κτένεια, ε—κτενής, ε—κτενω—ς ekteneia, fervor, unflinching intensity; ektenes, ektenos, without ceasing, zealously, urgently

ekteneia, S 1616; TDNT 2.464; EDNT 1.422; MM 198; L&N 25.70; BAGD 245 | ektenes, S 1618; TDNT 2.463–464; EDNT 1.422; MM 198; L&N 25.71, 68.12; BAGD 245 | ektenos, S 1619; EDNT 1.422; MM 199; L&N 25.71, 68.12; BAGD 245

These terms express tautness and, in a moral sense, an effort that can be understood either as perseverance (“without respite, without letting up, assiduously”) or as intensity (“with fervor, urgently”). The two meanings are often joined together in a context that makes it difficult to distinguish between them. In the OT, which does not use ektenes (cf. 3Macc 3:10; 5:29), their usages are religious, notably with respect to the great cries of prayer that Israel voices, forcefully and one might almost say violently, toward God.¹

Luke also uses ektenos with respect to prayer: in the garden, Jesus prayed with more urgency,² and when “Peter was being guarded in prison, the church urgently prayed to God for him.”³ As for 1Peter, it bids the baptized “Love one another from the bottom of your hearts, intensely”⁴ and repeats, “Above all, have an intense love between yourselves,”⁵ meaning that this love should stretch and be as fervent as possible.⁶

In contemporary usage, especially in the inscriptions, ektenes and ektenos refer to a constant concern to be of service, exacting and untiring zeal, urgent affection, and even lavish gift-giving;⁷ things that would be attributed today to “fervent love” (cf. Rom 12:11). As part of the official vocabulary of chancelleries, ekteneia, ektenos, and ektenes are in copious supply in honorific decrees,⁸ where they enjoy a privileged association with prothymia, prothymos, prothymos, as Hesychius and the Suda note. In Thrace: “I have a fervent desire to benefit everyone” (prothymian gar ektenestaten echo tou poiein eu pantas, I.Thas. 186, 10). A decree from Lampsacus sends to the magistrates of Thasos the list of honors conferred upon Dionysodoros, who “shows himself full of ardor and zeal for the interests of the people” (ektene kai prothymon heauton eis ta tou demou paraskeuazei pragmata, ibid., 171, 14 = SEG XIII, 458 and the commentary of J. Tréheux in BCH, 1953, pp. 426–433); “he showed himself full of ardor and zeal for all” (pasi ektene kai prothymon auton pareicheto).⁹ Around 188, the Milesians honor the physician Apollonios, “he showed himself ektenes and prothymos likewise according to his art,” (ektene kai prothymon homoios heauton pareicheto kata te ten technen, Dittenberger, Syl. 620, 8, 13); the Erythreans fête their praetors, “they proved themselves ektenes and prothymos toward the defense of the city” (ekteneis kai prothymous autous pareschonto pros ten tespoleos phylaken, ibid. 442, 9; cf. SB 8855, 10). Around 200: “showing himself ektenes and prothymos in everything” (ektene kai prothymon em pasi paraskeuazomenos, I.Priene 82, 10–11; cf. ektene kai prothymon heauton . . . parechetai, I.Magn., 86, 12 and 20); a decree in honor of Boulagoras, “whereas having been chosen several times by the people as their representative during public proceedings, he was unflagging in his activity and zeal—ektene kai prothymos—and he has secured many advantages and profits for the city.”¹⁰ Around 130, an inscription of Pergamum, “so that ... now in a manner worthy of godlike honors he became most ektenes in his zeal” (hopos . . . nyn isotheon exiomenos timon ektenesteros ginetai te prothymia).¹¹

The association of zeal and ardor is similar. Cf. a hydrophore of Artemis: ektenos kai philoteimos (I.Did., 375, 8); “fulfilling the duties of hydrophoros in a matter worthy of his race, philoteimos, and performing the mysteries ektenos” (plerosasa de kai ten hydrophorian axios tou genous philoteimos kai ta men mysteria ektenos telesasa, ibid. 381, 8). A decree of the Athenian association of soteriasts (worshippers of Artemis Soteira) sets out to reward a certain Diodorus: “the synod having received his ekteneia and philotimia.”¹² The council and people of Sardis honor a priestess Claudia Polla Quintilla, who on the one hand had served the god and the community in an orderly and zealous fashion (kosmios, philoteimos) and on the other hand had generously (or constantly) funded public sacrifices out of her own pocket.¹³ In 218 BC, a letter-decree from the kosmoi (rulers) and city of Gortyn expresses the gratitude of the city to the physician Hermias of Cos, who for five years worked for “citizens and all inhabitants with zeal and constancy—philotimios and ektenios —in everything pertaining to his profession and all other cares.”¹⁴

From these usages it emerges that ekteneia in the NT is intensity without negligence or failing, whether in prayer or brotherly love. It would not seem that the accent falls on duration or persistence; it is rather fervor, authenticity, magnanimity, a certain lavishness of feeling¹⁵ that characterize Christian agape, eager and generous. To better situate 1Pet 1:22 and 4:8, we should note that in literary texts ektenos, often in conjunction with *philophronos*¹⁶ and ektenes, often modifies friendship.¹⁷ In fact, hoi ektenestatoi is used for the most fervent friends (Polybius 21.22.4). In 182 BC, Eumenes II invites the city of Cos to celebrate games in honor of Athena Nikephora, “with all those who are most ektenes to us among the Greeks.”¹⁸ Arcesilas informs his friend Thaumasis that he has drawn up a will in his favor, so greatly has the latter proven his zeal toward him (ton eis em’ ektenos houto pephilotimemenon, Diogenes Laertius 4.6.44). Attalus II, writing around 160 to Attis, priest of the temple of Cybele at Pessinus, declares “Menodorus, whom you sent to me, gave me your fervent and friendly letter.”¹⁹ Arbaces “eagerly forged close relations with the leaders of troops from various nations and succeeded in gaining their friendship” (Diodorus Siculus 2.24.3).

But St. Peter’s vision of such generous and constant brotherly love is only possible as a function of the divine rebirth of the children of God. They share in a divine love and give expression to its spontaneity and fervor.

¹ Jdt 4:12 (Hebrew behozqâh); 4:9; Joel 1:14; Jonah 3:8. Only in 2Macc 14:38, with respect to Razis, who had risked his body and his life for Judaism, does μετὰ πάσης ε—κτενίας have the meaning of constancy and assiduousness. Cf. Acts 26:7—hoping for the realization of God’s promise, the twelve tribes serve God ε—ν ε—κτενεΐα νύκτα καὶ ἡμέραν λατρεῦον.

² Luke 22:44—γενόμενος ε—ν ἀγωνία ε—κτενέστερον προσήχετο; M. J. Lagrange (on this text) notes that ἀγωνία is not agony, but “anxiety or anguish due to a threatening evil that is obscure enough that one cannot know what one is up against.”

³ Acts 12:5—προσευχὴ δὲ ἦν ε—κτενω—ς γινομένη ὑπὸ τῆς ε—κκλησίας. The adverb is well attested by P74, a A B (Vulg. sine intermissione), but a<^>2, E, H, L, P, Chrysostom read ε—κτενής, and D says ε—ν ε—κτενεΐα.

⁴ 1Pet 1:22—ἀλλήλους ἀγαπήσατε ε—κτενω—ς; cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 2, pp. 312–324 (p. 317 n. 5 points out the imprecision of the articles on this adverb in the lexicons and dictionaries).

⁵ 1Pet 4:8—πρὸ πάντων τὴν εἰ—ς ε—αυτοὺς ἀγάπην ε—κτενῆ ἔχοντες. The motive given is that love does more than an expiatory sacrifice to “cover a multitude of sins”; cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 2, pp. 332–338; C. Spicq, Epîtres de saint Pierre, p. 150; A. Perego, “I peccati sono rimessi e non coperti anche secondo il salmo 31,” in DivThom, 1960, pp. 205–215.

⁶ Cf. ὑπερεκτείνω (unknown before 2Cor 10:14), which E. B. Allo translates “se distendre” (Eng. slacken, stretch out, relax).

⁷ Citizens of the town of Elaia act with consideration toward King Attalus III, given the benefits that they have received from him, ὅπως ε—πὶ τοι—ς γεγενημένοις ἀγαθοι—ς τω— βασιλει— ε—κτενει—ς οἱ— πολι—ται φαίνονται (I.Perg., 246, 4); “who has continually given numerous and great proofs of his devotion toward us and our concerns” (letter of Antiochus III, in IGLS, n. 992, 4). King Seleucus, praising his “honored friend” Aristolochus, emphasizes that “he often worked with all possible good will in the service of my father, my brother, and myself, and, in the most critical circumstances, constantly gave tokens of his interest in the affairs of the kingdom” (M. Holleaux, Etudes d'épigraphie, vol. 3, pp. 199ff.). I.Car., 166, 7: ε—κτενω—ς ε—αυτὸν ε—πιδούς; I.Ilium, n. 53, 4: ε—κτενω—ς διάκειμαι; cf. 54, 4; I.Cumae, n. 13, 84, and 102.

⁸ Around 216 BC, an amphictyonic decree from Delphi: ε—κτενω—ς πα—σι τοι—ς παραγινομένοις ποτὶ τὸν θεὸν (Dittenberger, Syl. 538, 17). An honorific decree given by a city to a foreign citizen who has gone to particular trouble on its behalf: τὸ πρὸς τὴν πόλιν ἡμῶ—ν ε—κτενές (I.Thas. 166, 6; which the editors, C. Dunant and J. Pouilloux, compare to Dittenberger, Or. 339, 7: καὶ πρὸ πλείστου θέμενος τὸ πρὸς τὴν πατρίδα γνήσιον καὶ ε—κτενές). A decree of Samothrace awarding proxenia and official standing to Hestaios “so that the Thasians also may know . . . his zeal on behalf of our people, τὴν πρὸς τὸν δῆμον ε—κτένειαν, and the gratitude of our city” (I.Thas., 169, 26); an honorific decree of Rhodes for Dionysodoros, who constantly took care to supply all the needs of the ambassadors, ε—ποιεῖ—το τὰν ε—κτενέστατην πρόνοιαν (ibid. 172, 12). Around AD 283, the prefect Aurelius Mercurious ordered the general of Oxyrhynchus to take inventory of his stock of provisions: πρόνοιαν ποιήση ε—κτενω—ς αὐτὰ τρέφεσθαι (P.Oxy. 2228, 40; cf. 2861, 4; P.Panop.Beatty 1, 376). —Ἐπέστειλα τοι—ς ἀδελφοι—ς μου . . . πρὸς τὸ ε—κτενω—ς αὐτοι—ς ὑπάρχειν τὰ τῆς εὐθeneίας (P.Michael. 20, 2). A decree in honor of Eirenias, who “gives proof in all circumstances of the highest zeal for the interests of the city and gives his assistance in everything that pertains to the reputation and glory of our country” (NCIG, n. 7, 3). A decree for Isagoras, a Thessalian from Larissa who manifested untiring zeal, φανεράν ε—νδεικνύμενος τὰν ι—δίαν ε—κτένιαν (Fouilles de Delphes 3, 4, n. 49, 7; in 106 BC; cf. 57, 6); συνπροσγεινόμενος ε—κτενω—ς πολλὰ τω—ν συμφερόντων (I.Bulg. 43, 11; cf. 45, A 30); an honorific decree of Iotape: ἄγορανομήσαντος ε—κτενω—ς (L. Robert, Documents, p. 75 = G. L. Bean, T. B. Mitford, Journies in Rough Cilicia, n. 152, 6; 172a8); ε—κτενω—ς ποτιφερόμενος εἰς τὸν δα—μον (SEG XXII, 266, 7; cf. I, 180; XXIII, 447, 15; XXV, 105, 26; 112, 7, 42). According to a decree of the Athenian cleruchs, Euboulos of Marathon, “who was given responsibility for several diplomatic missions, often succeeded through sustained effort—ἀγωνισάμενος ε—κτενω—ς—in securing the interests of the Athenians of Delos” (J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. 5, 15). In 164 BC, P.Paris 63, 12 prescribes: “καλω—ς ποιήσεις τὴν πα—σαν προσενεγκάμενος ε—κτένειαν καὶ προνοηθεῖς—You will do well to bring all your zeal to bear and take every precaution”; line 46: ἀλλὰ μετὰ πάσης ἀκριβείας, τὴν ε—κτενεστάτην ποιήσασαι, in acting in the most correct fashion, you will exercise all diligence” (= UPZ 110).

⁹ F. G. Maier, Griechische Mauerbauinschriften, Heidelberg, 1959, n. 49, 46; cf. 44, 7; 46, 25; 48, 11.

¹⁰ SEG I, 366, 21; J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. 3.

¹¹ IGRom., n. 293, col. II, 38.

¹² Ἡ σύνοδος ἀποδεξαμένη τὴν ε—κτένειαν καὶ φιλοτιμίαν αὐτοῦ, Dittenberger, Syl. 1104, 28. Cf. I.Sinur., n. 41, 1.

¹³ Δημοτελει—ς θυσίας ε—πιτελέσασαν ε—κ τω—ν ι—δίων ε—κτενω—ς (I.Sard. 52, 11). The Koinon of the Cretans conferred proxenia upon the Samian legate, παρεκάλει δὲ ἀμὲ ε—κτενίως καὶ φιλοτίμως καὶ ἀξίως αὐτοσαυτω— (I.Cret. 1, 24, 2; ed. M. Guarducci, vol. 1, p. 282). In AD 43, the Corinthian Junia Theodora is honored by the Lycians for her philotimia, her philostorgia, and her ekteneia (SEG 18, 143, 4, 78).

¹⁴ I.Cret. 4, 168 (= J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. 15); cf. a decree found at Panamara, in L. Robert, Opera Minora Selecta, vol. 1, pp. 246, 256, 259 n. 6; vol. 2, p. 746 (a decree for a gymnasiarch of Samos). I.Bulg. 43, 11: φιλοτίμως καὶ συνπροσγεινόμενος ε—κτενω—ς πολλὰ τω—ν συμφερόντων ἡμεί—ν συνκατασκευάζεται; Dittenberger, Or. 767, 6: ι—ερατεύσας τε δις Καίσαρος τοῦ θεοῦ ε—κτενω—ς καὶ φιλοτείμως; IG, X 2, n. 4, 8–9; cf. n. 1, 6. —The intensity of feeling and effort imply eagerness: ε—ν πα—σιν ε—κτενῆ πεφηνότα καὶ σπουδαι—ον (I.Priene 114, 33); ὁ δῆμος ἀποδεχόμενος αὐτοῦ τὸ φιλόσπουδον καὶ ε—κτενές (Dittenberger, Or. 339, 40).

¹⁵ Cf. 3Macc 6:41—μεγαλοψύχας τὴν ε—κτενίαν ἔχουσαν; Dittenberger, Syl. 800, 13: ε—ν ται—ς λοιπαι—ς δαπάναις πάσαις ε—κτενω—ς καὶ μεγαλοψύχως; C. Michel, Recueil, n. 544, 4 and 6: ε—κτενω—ς καὶ μεγαλομερω—ς συνεστράφη (a decree of Themisonion in Phrygia, from 114 BC; cf. the synonyms listed by Julius Pollux, Onom. 3.118–119). Agatharchides of Cnidos judges that the Aetolians are more ready than other people to die, because they more than others have the habit of living intensely (in Athenaeus 12.527 c; cf. Hierocles, in Stobaeus, 4.25.53; vol. 4, p. 643). Marcus Aurelius would later observe that in order to benefit from the instruction of good teachers in the household, it was necessary to spend generously, δεῖ— ε—κτενω—ς ἀναλίσκειν (1.4.3).

¹⁶ The medium of Endor offers Saul generous and friendly sympathy and consolation, the only thing that she possessed in her poverty, ὡς ε—ν πενία τοῦτο παρέσχεν ε—κτενω—ς καὶ φιλοφρόνως (Josephus, Ant. 6.341). Polybius 8.21.1: —Αχαιὸς δὲ προσδεξάμενος ε—κτενω—ς καὶ φιλοφρόνως τὸν Βω—λιν ἀνέκρινε διὰ πλειόνων ὑπὲρ ε—κάστου τω—ν κατὰ μέρος. An honorific decree of Delphi in honor of Euxenos: διότι εὐχρηστον αὐτοσαυτὸν παρασκευάζοι καὶ ε—κτενῆ περι— τοὺς ε—ντυγχάνοντας αὐτω— τω—ν πολιτα—ν καὶ φιλόφρων ὑπάρχει τα— πόλει (SEG 2, 277, 5), to which should be compared the honorific decree from Busiris in AD 22–23, in favor of its strategos: ε—κτενω—ς καὶ φιλανθρώπως διακείμενος (ibid. 8, 527, 5; cf. C. Michel, Recueil, 544, 30: τοὺς οὕτως ε—κενω—ς τε καὶ φιλανθρώπως ἀναστρεφομένους).

¹⁷ In friendship, “one party may act generously and the other fall short; ὁ μὲν ε—κτενω—ς ποιῆ, ὁ δ ε—λλείπη” (Aristotle, Mag. Mor. 2.11.1201a27). The Stoic Hierocles with respect to mother and father, ἔνεκα τῆς ε—ν τοι—ς ὀνόμασιν ε—κτενεΐας (cited by Stobaeus 4.27.23; vol. 4, p. 673). In the third century BC, the comic poet Macon uses the adverb in conjunction with ἀγαπάομαι: ἦδει δ ὑπ ἄντῆς ἀγαπώμενος (in Athenaeus 13.579 e).

¹⁸ Σὺν ἅπασιν τοι—ς ε—κτενεστάτοις ἡμι—ν τω—ν Ἑλλήνων, C. B. Welles, Royal Correspondence, n. 50, 2; cf. ibid. 52, 40: the good will of the people toward Emenes II is profound and sincere, πρὸς ἡμα—ς ε—κτενεστάτην τε καὶ εἰ—λικρινῆ τὴν εὐνοϊαν.

¹⁹ —Επιστολὴν . . . οὔσαν ε—κτενῆ καὶ φιλικήν (C. B. Welles, Royal Correspondence, 58, 4). In an inscription of Cumae, n. xiii, 28, 54, 62, 78, ekteneia is associated with philagathia; with philanthropia, in L. Moretti (ISE, vol. 2, n. 55, 2), with eunoia (ibid. 33, 7), with epimeleia in ZPE 25, 1977, p. 270.

ε—κτρέπομαι

ektreptomai, to change direction, deviate, go astray

ektreptomai, S 1624; EDNT 1.423; NIDNTT 3.902–903; MM 199; L&N 13.155, 31.65; BAGD 246

Very rare in the papyri,¹ the verb ektrepo is used only in the middle or passive voice in the NT. It expresses a change of state or direction² and seems to have in the first century connotations that vary according to context. Used notably in the moral or religious sphere, it means that one withdraws, deviates, turns aside from one way to go astray, get lost, flee down another. It is in this sense that the word is used four times in the Pastorals, where it seems to have become a technical term of parenesis: the heterodox turn away to wander in empty verbiage, exetrapesan eis mataiologian (1Tim 1:6; second aorist passive); heretics turn their ears away from the truth, turning instead to fables, epi de tous mythous ektrapesontas (2Tim 4:4, future passive indicative); Timothy must flee this profane chatter;³ young widows go astray after Satan (1Tim 5:15, exetrapesan).

The first-century parallels, Jewish and pagan, have this ethical significance: the nouveaux riches do not see the route before them and go astray in areas in which no paths have been cleared, eis anodias ektrepontai (Philo, Spec. Laws 2.23); “Turn aside from eunuchs (gallous ektrepesthai) and flee the company of those who have deprived themselves of their virility” (Josephus, Ant. 4.290). The young “turn aside from the ways of their fathers, they take the opposite path” (ibid. 6.34). “Rehoboam went astray in unjust and impious actions, eis adikous kai asebeis exetrape praxeis ” (ibid. 8.251); eis indicates the direction toward which one turns; cf. 5.98—“If you turn aside to imitate other nations.” Hyrcanus, a disciple of the Pharisees, bade them take notice if he committed any fault or turned aside from the way of justice (tes hodou tes dikaias ektrepomenon) and correct him (ibid. 13.290). In his chapter on training, Musonius says to “do anything to avoid things that are truly evil.”⁴ T. Nägeli cites an inscription of Oenoanda in Lycia that is very close to the wording of 1Tim 1:6 and 6:20—ektrepesthai dei tous sophistikous logous.⁵

Ektrepomai is also used in medical and surgical contexts—“leave its place, disconnect, dislocate, separate,”⁶—and it is in this sense that we should understand Heb 12:13—“Let the lame person not deviate; let him be healed.”⁷

¹ I am aware of only three occurrences: a complaint to a priest of Tiberias in AD 33—there is a danger “that the neighboring fields, which are not small, may fall back into an uncultivated state, εἰς ἄσπορον ἐκτραπήναι” (P.Ryl. 133, 22). The same turn of phrase occurs in the second century (P.Stras. 259, 12). In the fourth century, the papyrus is mutilated: εἰς κτραπήναι τὰς . . . (SB 9136, 8).

² In its only OT occurrence, it translates the Hebrew hapaq: “turn, change, pass from one state to another”; God changes the shadow of the night to dawn (Amos 5:8). In optics, it designates the deviation of a body in motion from its trajectory (C. Mugler, Terminologie optique, p. 133). In a pejorative sense: “Turning aside in that direction (ἐκτραπόμενοι), they sat down and refused to go further” (Xenophon, An. 4.5.15); Josephus, War 1.614: “All turned aside, no one dared approach him” (Antipater at Caesarea).

³ 1Tim 6:20—ἐκτρέπόμενος τὰς βεβήλους κενοφωνίας. Here the present middle participle could be translated “refuse” as in Josephus (Ant. 1.194: the Sodomites refusing all relations with others; 1.246: the young girls refused to give them anything to drink) or better, this inscription: ἐνταῦθα δὲ ἐκτρέπεσθαι δει— τοὺς σοφιστικοὺς λόγους τούτους (published by H. Usener, “Epikureische Schriften auf Stein,” in RhMus, 1892, n. 29, 7).

⁴ In Stobaeus, Ecl. 29.78 (vol. 3, p. 650, 18; ed. C. E. Lutz, p. 54, 25). Cf. Epictetus 1.6.42: “letting himself be carried away (ἐκτρέπόμενοι εἰς) to complaints and reproaches against God.”

⁵ T. Nägeli, Wortschatz, p. 19.

⁶ Cf. Hippocrates, Off. 14, describing the treatment for a dislocated limb; it should be rested on a soft, regular surface, “so that there may be no protruding, no bending, no harmful turning (μήτε ἐκτρέπηται)”; Dioscorides, Mat. Med. 2.15. Cf. C. Spicq, “Alexandrinismes dans l’Épître aux Hébreux,” in RB 1951, p. 488.

⁷ The lame person is a sick person (cf. Philo, Change of Names 187; Prelim. Stud. 164ff.) called by 1QM “a shaker of the knees” (14.6). He represents the hesitant and fearful Christian, in danger of being completely dislocated by trials and incapable of following the narrow path.

ἔκτρομα

ektroma, stillborn child, child born abnormally before term

ektroma, S 1626; TDNT 2.465–467; EDNT 1.423; NIDNTT 1.182–183; MM 200; L&N 23.55; BAGD 246

After listing the appearances of the risen Christ to the apostles, St. Paul concludes: “And finally, as to a prematurely born child, he appeared even to me; for I am the least of the apostles” (1Cor 15:8-9). A NT hapax, ektroma is used three times in the LXX, and always in a comparison. Aaron pleads with Moses on behalf of Miriam when she is stricken with leprosy: “Let her not be like a stillborn child (hosei ektroma, Hebrew mût), that emerges from its mother’s womb with half its body eaten away” (Num 12:12). “Why was I not like a stillborn child (hosper ektroma), hidden in its mother’s womb, like the little ones who have not seen the light of day?”¹ The rich man, who has fathered a hundred sons and lived a long life, but whose soul is not satisfied and who does not receive a proper burial, is worse off than “the stillborn child, because in vanity it came and in obscurity it went, and in obscurity will its name be hidden; it has not even seen the sun and has not known it” (Eccl 6:3). In all three cases, the ektroma is a stillborn child, a physiological definition that sheds no light on the Pauline metaphor.²

There is a single occurrence in the papyri, dating from 142 BC. A pregnant Jewish woman complains that she was attacked by another woman, perhaps in a village of Samaria, and is in danger of having a miscarriage.³ In the secular literature, the term is not used by gynecologists and can be cited only in one text from Aristotle⁴ and in the definition of Hesychius: “a child born dead, untimely, something cast out of the woman” (ektroma: paidion nekron aoron, ekbole gynaikos).

Since the documentation is poor and worthless for shedding light in 1Cor 15:8, exegetes make the most of a notation by the twelfth-century polygraph J. Tzetzes, who saw the term ektroma as a derogatory label and understood the apostle to be taking up an insult used against him by his adversaries,⁵ like “ordure” (peripsema) in 1Cor 4:13. But J. Schneider (TDNT, vol. 2, pp. 465–467) has demonstrated that this polemical interpretation does not square with the kerygmatic material that precedes. Thus it seems preferable to see in this word an expression of humility, as it was understood by Ignatius of Antioch,⁶ the Greek Fathers, and a number of moderns.⁷

T. Boman points out the triply depreciative expression: the last of the series—like a stillborn child—the lowliest or most minuscule of the apostles (elachistos, imperceptible); and he cites the Latin abortivus (dwarfish, infantile, falling short in maturity) which was not unknown to Paul.⁸ In effect, St. Irenaeus knew an analogous meaning: “shapeless and formless, like an ektroma.”⁹ So ektroma, derived from ektitrosko (pierce, tear), literally means a fetus born before its time and violently; metaphorically, the Pauline image would be that of a body ripped by force from a woman's womb (the synagogue). The reference would be to the abnormal and sudden character of Paul's birth to the Christian faith and the apostolic ministry. His case is indeed different from that of the Twelve. He, Saul, was in a way a "premature birth," in an immature stage of his gestation in grace, "only a spiritual embryo" (T. Boman, p. 49). He immediately explains: "since I had persecuted the church of God" (verse 9). Moreover, in the occurrences of ektroma, the emphasis is always placed in the abnormal birth, before term, whether the baby is dead or living (Schneider). It required an omnipotent intervention by Christ to give this persecutor, in one stroke, both faith and the apostolic calling.¹⁰

¹ Job 3:16—ἔκτρωμα translates the Hebrew nepef, which b. Sota 22 a defines: "a child whose months (in its mother's womb) were not completed." Here it is the fetus that "falls" before term and does not live (cf. Ps 58:9; Eccl 6:3).

² More illuminating would be Philo, Alleg. Interp. 1.76: "When imprudence is in labor it never gives birth; by nature the soul of the wicked brings nothing viable to light; and that which it produces turns out to be abortions and premature births, ἀμβλωθρίδια . . . καὶ ε—κτρώματα," following a citation of Num 12:12.

³ P. Tebt. 800, 30: κινδυνεύει ὃ ἔχει ε—γ γαστρὶ παιδίον ἔκτρωμα γίνεσθαι μεταλλάξαν τὸν βίον; republished in C. Pap. Jud. 133. The corresponding verb is found in AD 362, in a similar context: "Thaesis was pregnant, and by their blows they caused the miscarriage of their child, αὐτῶ—ν ε—ξέτρωσεν τὸ βρέφος" (P. Cair. Goodsp. 15, 15). Cf. Apoc. Pet. 26: "Some women were seated, with pus up to their necks. Across from them, there were babies that had been brought into the world before term; seated, they were crying. . . . These were women who did not want to conceive and had abortions"; Diodorus Siculus 3.64.4 (the birth of Bacchus): "Semele fell dead and miscarried. Jupiter took up her premature son and hid him in his thigh. The body of the child there grew perfectly"; 4.2.3. Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 5.1.45: "It was a great joy for the virgin mother [the church] to receive alive those whom she had ejected dead from her womb, οὗς ὡς νεκροὺς ε—ξέτρωσε" (a text used by E. Schwartz in Nachrichten der Gesellsch. der Wissenschaften zu Göttingen, 1907, p. 276). A cultic rule from Ptolemais in Egypt in the first century considers a miscarriage (ε—κτρωσμός) as a defilement for the mother (LSCGSup, n. 119, 5 and 10).

⁴ Aristotle, Gen. An. 4.5.773b18: "The fetuses detach as in the case called miscarriage, τοι—ς καλουμένοις ε—κτρώμασιν"; cf. HA 7.3.583b12:

“Outflow (ε—κρύσεις) is the term for the abortion of the fetus during the first seven days, and miscarriage (ε—κτρωμοί) for expulsion within forty days”; cf. Hippocrates, Septim. 9 (ed. Littré, vol. 7, p. 448).

⁵ A. von Harnack, “Die Verklärungsgeschichte Jesu,” in Sitzungsberichte der preußischen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin, 1922, p. 72, n. 3; A. Fridrichsen, “Paulus Abortivus,” in Symbolae Philologicae O. A. Danielsson, Uppsala, 1932, pp. 78–85 (traces the history of the exegesis, noting that ἔκτρωμα refers to the result, not the action); G. Björk, “Nochmals Paulus Abortivus,” in ConNT, vol. 3, 1938, pp. 3–8 (on the basis of modern Greek usage, translates “monster, object of horror” making the word a synonym of τέρας and ἄμβλωμα); J. Munck, “Paulus Tanquam Abortivus,” in A. J. B. Higgins, New Testament Essays, pp. 180–193 (criticizes his latest predecessor). C. K. Barrett, A Commentary on the First Epistle to the Corinthians, London, 1968, p. 344, emphasizes that this expression of scorn on the part of adversaries could be based as much on Paul’s physique (“a man of three cubits,” according to Chrysostom; “small in height” in Acts Paul Thec. 3; cf. σαῦλος = a person who waddles when he walks) as on the externals of his presentation (cf. Acts 14:12; 2Cor 10:1, 10).

⁶ Ign. Rom. 9.2: “I blush at being reckoned among them (Syrian Christians) because I am not worthy, being the last of them and an abortive child (ἔκτρωμα).”

⁷ F. Field, Notes on the Translation, p. 179; F. Godet, Commentaire sur la première Epître aux Corinthiens, Paris-Neuchâtel, 1886, vol. 1, pp. 339ff. [ET A Commentary on St. Paul’s First Epistle to the Corinthians, Edinburgh, 1886, ad loc]; A. Plummer, First Epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians, Edinburgh, 1911, p. 339. J. Weiss, Der erste Korintherbrief, 10th ed., Göttingen, 1925, pp. 351ff.

⁸ T. Boman, “Paulus Abortivus,” in ST, 1964, pp. 46–50, and again in Die Jesus-Überlieferung im Lichte der neueren Volkskunde, Göttingen, 1967, pp. 236ff. Str-B (vol. 1, pp. 496ff.; vol. 3, p. 471) points out several occurrences of ἔκτρωμα to designate disciples of the rabbis.

⁹ Ἄμορφος καὶ ἀνείδεος, ὡσπερ ἔκτρωμα, Irenaeus, Haer. 1.4.7 (cf. Extracts of Theodotus 68—the Valentinians called matter ἔκτρωμα, transposing the Egyptian myth of the birth of Harpocrates, “born before term and weak with inferior limbs”; cf. A. Torhoudt, Een onbekend gnostisch systeem in Plutarchus’ de Iside et Osiride, Louvain, 1942, pp. 50–52, 96). Cf., in the first half of the first century, Ps.-Longinus, Subl. 14.3: “If an author was afraid of not being heard beyond his own life and his own times, the conceptions of his thought would necessarily turn out no better than incomplete and blind productions, like abortions (ὡσπερ ἀμβλοῦσθαι), completely unable to come to term and gain renown among posterity.” In French, avorton designates “a fetus that has emerged from the mother’s womb before term,” then “that which is arrested in its evolution or had not achieved the development normal for its species,” and finally “that which is puny, feeble, malformed, scrawny” (P. Robert, Dictionnaire . . . de la langue française, Paris, 1965, vol. 1, p. 376).

¹⁰ Cf. L. de Grandmaison, Jésus-Christ, 13th ed., Paris, 1931, vol. 2, pp. 378–379; J. Blank, Paulus und Jesus, Munich, 1968, pp. 187–190. —Ἐκτιπρώσκω = cause an abortion, in P. Tebt. Tait 40, 2.

ε—κψύχω

ekpsycho, to be short of breath, expire

ekpsycho, S 1634; EDNT 1.424; MM 200; L&N 23.99; BAGD 247

Instead of the classical apopsycho,¹ the Koine uses—though rarely—the verb ekpsycho, which has quite variable meanings. It appears for the first time in Epicharmus in the sense “dry out,”² but in Ps.-Aristotle it means “be short of breath” (Ps.-Aristotle, Pr. 882a36; 886b14). In Plutarch: “Cooling off (to ekpsychesthai) not only hardens bodies but also causes them to melt” (Quaest. conv. 6.8.6; 695 D).

In Judg 4:21, Alexandrinus translates the Hebrew ûp as exepsyxen (Sisera “fell motionless and died”),³ whereas the piel of kahâh in Ezek 21:12 has to be translated ekpsyxei pasa sarx kai pan pneuma (“all flesh and every spirit will weaken”).⁴ The only three occurrences of the verb (in the aorist indicative) in the NT are in St. Luke, and they all mean “give up the ghost.” Ananias “fell down and expired” (Acts 5:5); so also Sapphira (5:10) and Herod Agrippa I (“he was eaten by worms and expired,” 12:23). Perhaps this was the medical meaning in the first century,⁵ but its usages in Hippocrates (quoted by Hesychius) refer to “a patient who blacks out” (Aff. 1.5, 1.18).

¹ —Ἀποψύχω (a biblical hapax) means “exhale,” then “lose strength, faint,” and finally “expire”; Luke 21:26—“men fainting with fright and in apprehension at the things that are happening,” hence, “frozen with fear”; 4Macc 15:18—“the eldest expired.”

² P.Oxy. 2427, frag. 27, 6 = C. Austin, Comicorum Graecorum Fragmenta, n. 85,245.

³ Moulton-Milligan provides no papyrological occurrence but cites Herondas, Mimes 4.29: ε—ν τάχα ψύξειν.

⁴ Or “collapse”; kahâh is also used for a light that dims, an eye that becomes dull, darkens.

⁵ Cf. Hobart, Medical Language, p. 37, who cites texts from Hippocrates, Galen, and Aretaeus.

ἐλαττον (ε—λάσσων), ε—λαττονέω, ε—λαττώω elatton (elasson), smaller, lesser; elattoneo, to have less, have too little; elattoo, to diminish

elation* (elasson), S 1640: TDNT 4.648–659; EDNT 1.426; NIDNTT 2.427–428; MM 201; L&N 59.3, 67.116, 87.67; BDF §§34(1), 47(2), 61(1), 185(4), 263(3); BAGD 248 | elattoneo, S 1641; EDNT 1.426; MM 201; L&N 57.41; BAGD 248 | elattoo, S 1642; EDNT 1.426; MM 201; L&N 87.68; BAGD 248

If it is true that in the Hellenistic era the double consonant ss replaced the Attic tt.¹ this is not a general rule. it applies most of the time in the LXX,² but elatton is much more common than elasson in the papyri.³ The NT confirms this variety of usage, with elasson twice (John 2:10; Rom 9:12) and elatton twice (1Tim 5:9; Heb 7:7).

Elasson, very common in comparisons of size,⁴ functions as the comparative of mikros, “smaller, lesser.” and the opposite of meizon (to designate a younger sibling),⁵ of kreitton (“the lesser is blessed by the greater”),⁶ of kalon (the wine that is less good is served at the end of the meal),⁷ or of pleion (Exod 16:17; Num 26:54; 33:4; P.Mich. 636, 8); thus the neuter me elatton is used in 1Tim 5:9 —a woman is not to be enrolled with the widows until she is “at least sixty years old.”⁸

The denominative verb elattoneo, “have less or too little, lack.” a NT hapax (2Cor 8:15) is a citation of Exod 16:18 —“the one who had less manna did not go wanting.”⁹ It is rare in the papyri, but attested in 217 BC: a defrauder in a wine delivery will be required “to restore to us the difference, fourteen missing jugs” (to diophoron ton elattonounton id’ keramion, P.Magd. 26. 12). In 11 BC, the word is used for the lack of the price of 230 kotylai of oil (BGU 1195, 19); and in the third century AD: “it is my joy and my glory to produce more and lose nothing” (pleon exeurein kai me elattonin, P.Oxy. 2407, 54).

Elattoo also has the meaning “lack, be deprived of.”¹⁰ as well as “decrease,” like the present passive infinitive in John 3:30 —“he must become greater, but I must decrease.”¹¹ The decreasing can be monetary¹² or solar (Dio Cassius 45.17: “the light of the sun seems to diminish and go out”) or physical (Philo. Virtues 46; Etern. World 65); but also psychological or social. In 180 BC, Orthagoras of Araxa is the object of an honorific decree because “sent on a mission to the confederation, he so conducted the debates with words and with deeds that he gained advantages for our people and we avoided snuffing the least diminution, kai en medeni elattothenai.”¹³ It can refer to a decrease in quality (Sir 16:23; Philo. Giants 27); “the science of gymnastics is not inferior to any other art” (Philostratus. Gym. 1). It is in this sense that God made man slightly, hardly (elattosas brachy) lower than the angels (Heb 2:7, citing Ps 8:5).

¹ Cf. F. M. Abel, Grammaire, n. 4r.

² Cf. ἔλαττον, Exod 16:17-18; Lev 25:16; Num 26:54: 33:54; 35:8; Dan 2:39; 2Macc 5:5; 8:9.

³ —Ελάσσων is hardly found at all outside of SB 9225, 1 (fragment of a law from the third century BC). P.Paris 63, 28 (= P.Petr. III. p. 20, from the second century BC) and in the second-third century AD. P.Fouad (Crawford) 18, 5; P.Mich. 501, 16; BGU 1564, 12-13; 1663, 7; 1734, 12; P.Giss. 1, 61,18; PSI 187, 10 (fourth century); cf. E. Mayser, Grammatik, p. 223.

⁴ C. Mugler, Terminologie geometrique, p. 169. Gen 1:16; Exod 16:17-18; Prov 13:11; 30:24; Dan 2:39.

⁵ Rom 9:12 (citation of Gen 25:23; Hebrew sa'ir); cf. Josh 6:25; P.Ryl. 77. 39: ἀναδεξάμενος τὴν μείζονα ἀρχὴν οὐκ ὀφείλει τὴν ε—λάττον—ἀποφεύγειν. The term takes on a pejorative flavor: “the least, miniscule.” cf. 2Kgs 18:24; Job 30:1; Wis 9:5: “I am too small to understand judgment and the laws”; Isa 60:22; PCair.Isid. 73. 3: “we who are small farmers.” Cf. C.Ord.Ptol. 53, 70: “those who bear responsibilities in the least of the temples, ε—ν τοι—ς ε—λάσσοσιν ι—εροι—ς”; 53, 96: “they will be taxed at a reduced rate. Menander, Dysk. 679: “I cared less than nothing for the wounded one.” P.Tebt. 88, 61; 1117, 1 = the lesser priests.

⁶ Heb 7:7; cf. 1Sam 9:21; Prov 22:16, Philo. Afleg. Interp. 2.3; Plutarch, Praec. ger. rei publ. 8.804 a: ἡλαττοῦτο πολλῶ—v. In the first century BC, Geminus wrote indifferently ἔλασσον or ἔλαττον with respect to measures of space and time: “certain circles are sometimes greater, sometimes smaller” (Intro. to Astronomy 5.30.35; 6.27; 14.3), “the smallest displacement” (14.4-5; 17.17; 18.2); “the distance is sometimes smaller, sometimes greater” (5.47); “the signs of the zodiac take less time to rise, ε—v ε—λάττονι χρόνω”; (7.11; 14.2); “the smallest beginning of an eclipse.”

⁷ John 2:10. On this verse, cf. P. W. Meyer “John II,10” in JBL 1967, pp. 191–197; J. D. M. Derrett, Law in the NT pp. 228–246; B. Lindars, “Two Parables in John,” in NTS vol. 16, 1970, pp. 318–324.

⁸ The formula is common: οὐκ ε—λάττους = not less than a thousand people, than five thousand, than twenty thousand (2 Macc 5:5; 8:9, 35; 10:18; 12:4, 10; Diodorus Siculus 17.19.15; 17.21.26; 17.31.2; 17.36.6; 17.64.4; etc.) and in the papyri often designates a price less than the total or the agreed-upon sum: “not less than 800 drachmas” (Pop.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 14, 28; a will from the second century AD); P.Achm. 8, 17; P.Oxy. 237; col. VIII, 11: when threatened, those from who one is demanding repayment of a debt are tempted to agree to a “reduction” (AD 138); P.Lille 29, col. I, 31; 2, 34: “not less than two witnesses.” J. Pouilloux, Recherches sur l'histoire et les cultes de Thasos, Paris. 1954. vol. 1 n. 141: the polemarchs will give the boys greaves and breastplates . . . “the value of which shall be not less than three minas, μὴ ελάσσονος ἄξια τριῶ—v μνω—v.” The expression πλέον ἔλαττον means “more or less, approximately” (P.Oxy. 1895, 5, 8; 1907, 10; 2347,6; P.Vindob.Tandem, n. 28, 8; H. J. July, Die Klauseln hinter den Mängeln der Papyrusurkunden, Colonge, 1966, pp. 96ff.). The brother of Phoibammon must buy at Alexandria a robe of Antioch “worth ten keratia, more or less” (P.Fouad 74, 7); cf. BGU 1663, 7; C.P.Her. 34, 11; “two arourai, more or less, of arable land”; P.Cair.Isid. 103, 9; P.Mert. 17, 14, 20; P.Ross.Georg. II, 14, 2 (first century AD); 5, 25, 2; 42, 7; SB 9253, 9; 9293, 11; etc.

⁹ The verb is well attested to in the LXX where it is used for the subsiding waters of the flood (Gen 8:3, 5; cf. Philo, Etern. World 120); for the fifty righteous people, of whom five may be lacking (Gen 18:28); for the poor man who shall not pay less than a half-shekel (Exod 30:15; cf. Lev 25:16; Prov 11:24). A decrease in numbers is contrasted with an increase (Jer 30:19); “For the one who hates idle chatter will have less evil” (Sir 19:6-7). The verb is also used for military defeat 2 Macc 12:11; 13:19.

¹⁰ 1Sam 2:5; 21:16; 2Sam 3:29; Jer 51:18; Ezek 24:10; Ps 34:11 —“Those who seek Yahweh lack no good thing”; Sir 32:24. One is deprived or stripped of wisdom (Sir 29:23), of intelligence (19:24; 25:2; 47:23): one is freed of something (Sir 22:10; 28:8; 38:24).

¹¹ Cf. Sir 18:6 —“There is nothing to take away nothing to add”; 42:21—“jealousy and wrath shorten life”; 31:30 —“drunkenness diminishes strength”; 39:18. In the papyri, the perfect passive participle with negation μὴ ἠλαττουνένου (νης) is a clause that occurs constantly in contracts. It means that the lender or lessor will not be subject to any loss, damage, or prejudice in the recovery of that which is due him, cf. “associated with you in the business related to the city’s account, I recognize that you will be subject to no loss with respect to what my brother and I owe you, ὁμολογῶ— κατὰ μηδέν σε ε—λαττοῦσθαι περὶ ὧν ὀφείλωμέν σοι ε—γώ τε καὶ ὁ ἀδελφός μου”(P.Oxy. 2134, 5, 15); μὴ ε—λαττουμένου σου τοῦ —Απίωνος τοῦ καὶ Πετοσοράπιος ε—ν τῇ πράξει ὧν ἄλλων ὀφείλω σοι (P.Oslo 40, 63; cr. 123, 33); μὴ ε—λαττουμένου σου ε—ν οἷς ὀφείλησα τῶ— ἀδελφῶ— σου τῶ— μετηλλαχότι Πανυσανίς ε—ν τῇ πράξει(P.Mert. 14, 15); P.Alex. 7, 16; BGU 1573, 29; P.Ross.Georg. II, 18, 59; Pap.Lugd.Bat. VI, 9, 19; 20, 43 (= SB 6611; cf. 10787, 14; 10989, 35); 36. 7 (= P.Hamb. 67); 36, 18; P.Fouad 35, 13 (from AD 48; the rights of Thaesis are fully reserved in the recovery of eighty drachmas loaned by her, with guarantee, to Petsiris); P.Ryl. 677, 11; P.Sarap. 2, 19; 39, 7; P.Mich. 562, 15; 615, 31, 34; PTebt. 382, 13 (between 30 BC and AD 1); P.Vars. 10 (cf. Berichtigungsliste IV, p. 102, n. 10 I 25). Cf. G. Hage. “Die MH ΕΛΑΤΤΟΥΜΕΝΟΥ- Klausel in den griechischen Papyri Aegyptens,” in Proceedings XII. pp. 195–205; H. A. Rupprecht, Studien zur Quittung im Recht der graeco-ägyptischen Papyri, Munich, 1971. pp. 18ff.

¹² Num 26:54; 33:54. Cf. the request of the priests of the inner sanctum of Philae: “in view of the fact that these abuses are impoverishing the sanctuary (ε—λαττοῦσθαι τὸ ι—ερόν) and we run the risk . . .” (C.Ord.Ptol. 52 - SB 8396, 28 = A. Bernand, Philae. vol. 1, n. 19 and p. 190). —Ελασσώματος is a real-estate reduction, the nonproductive area deducted from the acreage on which one pays land tax (P.Bour. 42, 32; BGU 20, 8; APF, 1976, p. 106).

¹³ J. Pouilloux, Choix. n. 4, 53; cf. I.Magn. 90, 15. Plutarch, Dem. 11, 1; “to correct his physical defects (τοι—ς σωματικοι—ς ε—λαττώμασι) he resorted to exercises.”

ε—λεέω, ἔλεος

e/leo, to have compassion, show favor or mercy; e/leos, compassion, mercy

eleeo, S 1653; TDNT 2.477–485; EDNT 1.429–431; NIDNTT 2.594; MM 202; L&N 88.76; BDF §§90, 148(2), 176(1); BAGD 249 | eleos, S 1656; TDNT 2.477–485; EDNT 1.429–431; NIDNTT 2.593–597, 600; MM 203; L&N 88.76; BDF §51(2); BAGD 250

Eleos is an irregular noun. Normally masculine, it is most commonly neuter in the Hellenistic period.¹ It refers to a “feeling,”² namely, the feeling of one who is moved by the sight of another’s suffering and in a way shares in it: compassion.³ Such a sensitivity to misery is unacceptable without controls or objective motives.⁴ Furthermore, Aristotle specifies that “pity has as its object a being that does not deserve its misfortune” (Aristotle, Poet. 13.1453a4) and defines eleos as “a pain following upon the sight of a destructive or painful evil that strikes a person who does not deserve it and that one might expect to suffer oneself or see one’s own dear ones suffer. . . . To feel pity, one must obviously be able to think that one is exposed” (Rh. 2.8.1385b13-14). One must be moved only at the sight or the thought of someone suffering wrongly. This idea was taken up by the whole Greek tradition,⁵ notably by Polybius,⁶ and became even more categorical with the Cynics: “The Cynic must feel neither envy nor pity.”⁷ Of course, even philosophers sometimes show themselves more favorable to altruistic feelings,⁸ but even so, pity remains suspect, even a weakness.⁹

R. Bultmann (“ἔλεος,” in TDNT, vol. 2, p. 478) mentions the large role played by pity in the administration of justice. The litigant or the accused always seeks to gain the judge’s eleos; they bring before the court “pity, excuses, humanity, but no human law, no divine law, allows the accrual of profit from this unclean wretch.”¹⁰ “He begged and supplicated the judges with many tears . . . to stir their compassion.”¹¹ In the third century BC, an old man, victim of the theft of grain, asks for the king’s help and concludes, “Thus, thanks to you, O king, I will enjoy the effects of justice and mercy for the rest of my days.”¹²

With the LXX, we enter an entirely new world, in the first place because pity is exalted with considerable frequency, and secondly because it becomes a religious virtue¹³ and especially a divine attribute,¹⁴ so much so that Israel’s religion appears to be the cult of a God of mercy,¹⁵ which is an innovation —despite the altar raised by the Athenians to Eleos (Pausanias 1.17.1; Diodorus Siculus 13.22.7) and the Epidaurian belief (Eleos epieikes theos, IG IV, 1282). After all, eleeo and eleos are translation Greek; all, eleeo and eleos are translation Greek; they reflect the content of the Hebrew original. Most commonly the verb eleeo translates the Hebrew hanan, “show favor or grace,” with the nuance of a freely given favor, a generous gift.¹⁶ Thus the usages of the verb connote preferential love for a certain person that is shown in the generosity with which favors are granted.¹⁷ Fairly often eleeo translates the piel of the Hebrew raham, “have pity, show mercy,” but also “love tenderly.”¹⁸ On the other hand, there are 172 instances in which the LXX uses eleos to translate hesed, a word whose significance is varied and disputed¹⁹ but whose basic meaning is “goodness, benevolence, favorable disposition,” covering the spectrum from plain sympathy and goodness to mercy and clemency. It is fundamentally a species of love (and is often linked with love — “love hesed” [Amos 5:5] means to love tenderly); and most of its occurrences have to do with God’s mercy or lovingkindness. The description of God as rab-hesed, literally “great in favor,” is to be understood as meaning “abundant in mercy” (polyeleos, Num 14:18; Joel 2:13; Ps 86:5, 15). Translators of the NT must keep these nuances in mind wherever they must render the rich meaning of formally biblical eleos.²⁰

The NT takes up Israel’s faith in God’s mercy in exactly the same form and continues it. It gives much greater emphasis, however, to the precept of brotherly mercy,²¹ which it makes into an active, internal virtue, an indispensable condition of eternal blessedness²² and an imitation of the heavenly Father. In the parable of the Unmerciful Servant,²³ Jesus first contrasts two debts —one enormous (ten thousand talents), the other miniscule (a hundred denarii) —then the two creditors. The king is moved by a visceral compassion (splanchnistheis, Matt 18:27) when he hears his debtor’s supplications and forgives the whole debt; but the latter shuts out all feelings of pity and not only refuses to forgive the debt owed him but throws the debtor into prison. So this is the motivation for the king’s (God’s) judgment: “Contemptible servant,²⁴ ought you not also to have had pity on your fellow-servant, since I took pity on you?” (ouk edei kai se eleesai ton syndoulon sou, hos kago se eleesa, 18:33). And he hands him over to the torturers. Jesus explains the teaching of the parable: “So also will my heavenly Father do to you, if each of you does not forgive (me aphete) his brother from the heart” (18:35). On the one hand, “from the heart” contrasts with forgiveness merely spoken with the lips;²⁵ it is a matter of not only overlooking the offenses of which one has been victim, but of loving one’s neighbor, that is, of wishing and doing him well in every circumstance (Matt 5:44). On the other hand, God will treat us according to the way we treat our brethren. The motivation for brotherly compassion is imitation of God; which puts the emphasis on the interiority and sincerity of the forgiveness. The one who shows compassion has a good heart.

The good Samaritan is a model, because he was moved by compassion at the sight of the wounded stranger (idon esplanchnisthe, Luke 10:33) and helped him, showing himself to be the “neighbor” of the man who fell into the hands of the brigands.²⁶ Just the opposite of the priest and the Levite, who passed by the wounded man, remaining indifferent strangers and even turning aside for fear of contracting a legal defilement, the Samaritan was completely spontaneous, quick to act, disinterested, and efficient in his generosity simply because he was good-hearted and was moved (ho poiasas to eleos met' autou, 10:37), because he knew himself and showed himself to be the brother of the stranger.

The apostles praise this virtue: "The wisdom from on high is . . . full of mercy and good fruit" (meste eleous kai karpon agathon, Jas 3:17); a love that originates with God reflects the very wisdom of God and is made manifest in "good works." It is beneficent, especially toward the unfortunate. The one who carries out such a ministry in the church will radiate goodness: "Let the one who practices mercy (do so) with joy" (ho eleon en hilaroteti, Rom 12:8; cf. Prov 22:8 a, LXX), not only because God loves a cheerful giver (2Cor 9:7) or to build up the unfortunate with a smile but because "there is greater happiness in giving than in receiving" (Acts 20:35). Jude (21-22) addresses all Christians: "Keep yourselves in the love of God, awaiting the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ for life everlasting (prosdechomenoi to eleos tou kyriou hemon). Have pity on those who are deciding" (or "disputing," kai hous men eleate diakrinomenous—the textual variants are numerous). This whole catechesis was already contained in the promise of divine mercy to those who pardon their neighbor: "Blessed are the merciful, for they themselves shall be shown mercy."²⁷

As for God, his mercy is revealed in the coming of the messianic salvation and is sung by the Virgin Mary and the priest Zechariah in terms borrowed from the OT.²⁸ It is a gratuitous favor, a grace that presupposes God's love and the intervention of his omnipotence. In addition, it is manifested in Elizabeth's motherhood (Luke 1:58), as it is shown to the Gerasene demoniac (Mark 5:19), to St. Paul (1Cor 7:25; 2Cor 4:1; 1Tim 1:13, 16), to Epaphroditus (Phil 2:27), to the house of Onesiphorus (2Tim 1:16; cf. SB 1872). It extends to all believers (Gal 6:16) and together with Christ's mercy becomes the content of the apostle's wish for a whole church: "Grace, mercy, and peace from God the Father and Christ our Savior" (1Tim 1:2; 2Tim 1:2; Jude 2; 2John 3). Thus it is God's mercy that accounts for the conversion of a persecutor and his sending as an apostle, for the healing of a sick person, for the casting out of a demon, for purification from sin and a life united to God. Blind, epileptic, and leprous folk all appeal to Jesus' compassion, always with success,²⁹ and it is thanks to his intercession that believers can "approach the throne of grace to receive mercy and find grace to help in time of need" (Heb 4:16).

Certainly God is free to grant or deny his favors and his forgiveness (Rom 9:15-18; cf. Exod 33:19); but those who yesterday were "Not pitied" are today "Pitied" (1Pet 2:10; cf. Hos 1:6-9). St. Paul's innovation in the biblical theology of eleos is to locate God's mercy at the beginning and at the end of the plan of salvation: "Formerly you were disobedience so as to show mercy to all" (Rom 11:30-32). Universal mercy extends to Gentiles as well as Jews (Rom 15:9) and consists in the forgiveness of sins. It is made effective for each one in baptism ("He has saved us according to his mercy through a bath of regeneration and renewal in the Holy Spirit" (Titus 3:5), and it has an eschatological bearing (“God wished to make known the wealth of his glory in vessels of mercy that he has prepared for glory”).³⁰ The whole Christian life here below consists in “waiting for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ for life everlasting” (Jude 21).

¹ Τὸ ἔλεος; cf. F. M. Abel, Grammaire, n. 9 t. The verb ε—λεέω (“take pity”) is regular, but some of its forms presuppose a primitive parallel ε—λεάω — in the second person plural imperative ε—λεα—τε (Jude 23) and in the genitive participle ε—λεω—ντος (Rom 9:16). Cf. the adjectives ε—λεήμων (Homer, Od. 5.191: “My heart is all pity”; Aristophanes, Pax 425; Ps 112:4 —ε—λεήμων καὶ οι—κτίρων; Matt 5:7; Heb 2:17), ε—λεινός, “pitiable” (Menander, Dysk. 297; Thras. 387, 390; 1Cor 15:19; Rev 3:17), the substantive ε—λεημοσύνη (Callimachus, Hymn. 4.152: “for the pity that you show me”; P.Gen. 51, 26; Matt 6:4; Luke 11:41; Acts 9:36).

² Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 3.1.1109b32: “The domain of virtue is feelings and actions. . . . When these are involuntary, they may elicit forgiveness or even pity”; 3.2.1111a30.

³ Plato, Euthd. 288 d: “let them take pity on me (ε—λεήσαντέ με) and be compassionate (οι—κτίραντε)”; Sophocles, Phil. 308–309: “Those people took pity on me (ε—λεοῦσι) and even sometimes gave me food out of compassion (οι—κτίραντες)”; Euripides, IT 227–228; Hel. 944. The historian Phylarchus describes terrible scenes in order to “provoke the pity of his readers (ει—ς ἔλεος ε—κκαλει—σσαι τοὺς ἀναγινώσκοντας) and make them have feelings for his account (καὶ συμπασει—ς ποιει—ν τοι—ς λεγομένοις)” (Polybius 2.56.7). The linking of ε—λεήμων and οι—κτίρων is common in the LXX, Exod 34:6; Neh 9:17; Ps 86:15; 103:4; 111:4; Sir 2:11; etc.

⁴ Polybius 2.56.3: οὗτ' ε—λει—ν ευ\λόγως οὗτ' ο\ργίζεσσαι κασηκόντως. Seneca, Clem. 2.4.4: “Compassion is the morbid condition of souls that feel an excess of misery. Making it a responsibility of the wise person almost requires of him lamentations and obsequious groanings that would be foreign to him”; Philo, Joseph 144: “No one pities envious poverty”; Spec. Laws 4.76-77.

⁵ Ps.-Andronicus, Pass. 2: ἔλεος μὲν οὖν ε—στι λύπη ε—πὶ ἀλλοτρίοις κακοι—ς ἀναξίως πάσχοντος ε—κείνου (SVF, vol. 3, 414); Diogenes Laertius 7.1.111: “pity is a sorrow felt for one who suffers evils undeservedly”; Cicero, Tusc. 4.8.1: “Misericordia est aegritudo ex miseria alterius injuria laborantis.” Cf. Sir 12:13 —“Who will pity the charmer bit by a snake?”

⁶ “Their past attempts at rebellion (the cities of Hippocritae and Utica) leave no place for pity or pardon” (τόπον ε—λέους μηδὲ συγγνώμης, Polybius 1.88.2); “Those who owe their reversals to fortune find pity accompanied by indulgence and aid; but those who owe them to their own stupidity get only blame and reprobation from sensible people” (ibid. 2.7.3; cf. 2.58.11; 6.58.10; 9.10.7; 23.10.11; 25.4.4; 30.8.3; 33.11.3; 38.3.2; 38.16.7; 38.17.7). Cf. A. Nicev, “Questions ethiques et esthetiques chez Polybe: Ἐλεος chez Polybe et Aristote,” in REG, 1978, pp. 149–157.

⁷ Epictetus 3.22.13. Cf. 2.17.26: “The one who feels pity has received no philosophical education”; 4.1.4; 4.6.1ff. Plutarch alludes to this school: “Some philosophers criticize even pity inspired by misfortunes, thinking that it is good to help, not to feel compassion” (De tranq. anim. 7).

⁸ Epictetus 1.18.9: “If, contrary to the arrangements of nature, you absolutely need to have feelings regarding the evils suffered by another, pity him (ε—λέει) rather than hate him”; 1.28.9; 2.21.3 and 5; Marcus Aurelius 7.26.

⁹ Nero’s declaration is significant in his discourse of AD 67 granting freedom to the Greeks: “On this day it is not pity but only goodwill (οὐ\ δὲ ἔλεον ὑμα—ς, ἀλλὰ δὲ εὖνοιαν) that makes me generous toward you” (Dittenberger, Syl. 814, 21). That is also why ἔλεος is so rarely mentioned in the papyri and the inscriptions and hardly appears at all except from the pens of Christians, who know God’s mercy. For example, there is this graffito by Christian deserters in the Theban mountains in the fourth-fifth century: ἕως ἄν ε—λήσεν ὁ θεὸς καὶ ε—ξάγαγεν ἡμα—ς ε—ν σωτήριον χωρὶς ἁμαρτιω—ν καὶ σώσωμεν πάντα (SB 9802, 1); P.Ant. 198, 5: τὸ ἔλεος τοῦ θεοῦ; P.Erl. 120, 12; SEG 24, 1224; SB 7872, 11: δωῆ ἔλεος ὁ κύριος τω— —Ονησιφόρου οἴκῳ (= 2Tim 1:16). God’s mercy is invoked (IGLS 317, 412, 500, 601, 633, 747; at Ephesus, cf. J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin epigraphique,” in REG, 1953, p. 168, n. 177), or Christ’s (ibid. 2358, 1), “Peace and mercy to all our holy community” (ibid. 1320, 6; cf. Ps 84:8-9; Rom 9:6; Gal 6:16). People call themselves bishop, archpriest, archdeacon, and priest “by the mercy of God” (P.Ness. 50, 10; 51, 1; 57, 1-2, 24, 26, 27; 107, 3; P.Oxy. 1951, 4; 1989, 27; SB 9146, 22; 9590, 26-27). In a Jewish epitaph at Rachelis: “I have good hope of mercy” (ε—λέους ε—λπίδα ἀγασῆν ε—γὼ προσδέχομαι, C.Pap.Jud. 1513, 7 = SEG I, 573, 6; cf. P.Oxy. 2828, 7; 1Thess 4:13; 2Thess 2:16; Titus 2:13). E. Peterson (EIS ΕΟΣ, G^ˆttingen, 1926, pp. 164–167) compared the Christian Κύριε ε—λήσον to a Roman amulet (Πουβλικιανέ/Εἰς Ζεὺς/Σέραπις/ε—λήσον, IGIS 2413, 3; cf. UPZ 78, 24), to a medal (Κύρια Νέμεσι ε—λήσον, CIG 7036, e); Epictetus 2.7.12 on divination: “We hold the diviner’s hand and call upon him as upon a god; we pray, ‘Lord, have mercy on me’; Josephus, Ant. 9.64: δέσποτα ε—λέησον; Achilles Tatius 3.5.4.

¹⁰ Demosthenes, C. Aristog. 1; 25.81; cf. C. Mid. 21.100; Antiphon 1.21; 1.25: the guilty parties were “pitiless and merciless” in committing their crime and ought to be stricken by justice.

¹¹ Plato, Ap. 34 c, ἵνα ὅ τι μάλιστα ε—λεησείη; 35 b. Leg. 5.731 d: “The criminal deserves pity (ε—λεεινός) in the same way as any person afflicted with an evil”; Philo, Unchang. God 115: “Your suffering and groaning will help you find pity”; Josephus, War 1.637; 5.318; Ant. 14.172; Jos. Asen. 28.2-3.

¹² P. Magd. 18, 6. A colonus addresses a petition to his patron: παρακαλω— τοῦ ὑμετέρου ε—λέους τυχει—ν (P. Oxy. 2479, 23; cf. 3126, col. II, 11). A request for the deferment of a debt (PSI 767, 37); P. Lund II, 5, 15; P. Fay. 106, 16; P. Flor. 378, 3; I. Bulg. 2236, 95: ἵνα ε—λεησέντες διὰ τὴν θείαν σου πρόνοιαν (under Gordian).

¹³ Hos 6:6 —“I want mercy, not sacrifice”; Mic 6:8 —“What God requires of you is to love mercy . . .” or faithfulness (cf. B. Renaud, La Formation du livre de Michee, Paris, 1977, pp. 298ff.); Prov 14:21 —“Happy is the one who takes pity on the miserable”; Wis 6:6 —“The lowly person deserves pardon and pity”; 1Macc 2:57 —“David, for his mercy, inherited a royal throne.” “Men of mercy” (Sir 44:10; 46:7) have compassion on their sisters and on orphans (Hos 2:3; 14:5), on the poor and on adolescents (Prov 14:31; Deut 28:50), on old and weak people (Lam 4:16; Prov 19:17; 28:8; 4Macc 6:12; 8:20), and on themselves (4Macc 12:6). This is a benevolence that gives others a good welcome (Gen 19:19; 24:49; 40:14; Num 11:15; Josh 2:12, 14; Judg 1:24; 6:17; 21:22; 1Sam 15:6; Sir 18:13; etc.), in contrast to cruelty (Jer 50:42; Isa 13:18; 49:15; 2Macc 7:27) and insults (Tob 3:15); it is full of understanding (Job 19:21), is compassionate and sheds tears (2Macc 4:37; cf. 4Macc 9:4), prompts one to help (Sir 29:1).

¹⁴ One of the forms of God’s benevolence (2Sam 7:15; 15:20; 1Kgs 3:6; 8:23; 1Chr 17:13; 2Chr 1:8; 6:14; Ps 26:6; Wis 15:1; Sir 18:5), that shows grace to the thousandth generation (Exod 20:6; Num 14:19; Deut 5:10; 7:9). The pious give thanks to Yahweh “because he is good, for his mercy endures forever” (1Chr 16:34; 2Cor 5:13; 7:3-6; Neh 1:5; 9:32; Jdt 13:14; Ps 31:21; 88:1-2; 92:1-2; 100:5; 103:17; 106:1; 107:1; 118:1-4; 136:1ff.; Sir 51:8, 29; Jer 33:11; 1Macc 4:24). “I am Yahweh who shows mercy” (Jer 9:24); “I am merciful” (Jer 3:12); “God is compassionate” (Ps 116:5). “With an everlasting mercy will I have mercy on you” (Isa 54:8, 10; 60:10; 63:7); “Yahweh’s steadfast love does not cease; his mercies never come to an end” (Lam 3:22, 32).

¹⁵ Israel prays that the Lord will have pity (Tob 8:4, 17; Jdt 7:30; Ps 25:67; 26:11; 27:7; 30:11; 51:1, 3; 67:2; 86:3, 16; 119:58, 132; Isa 33:2), as do Joseph (Gen 43:29) and Habakkuk (“Yahweh, even in your wrath remember to have pity” —Hab 3:2) and the faithful in the temple (Ps 48:9; cf. 1Macc 3:44; 13:46; 2Macc 8:3). Believers hope and have confidence in God’s grace and mercy (Ps 13:5; 33:18, 22; 52:8; 147:11; Sir 2:9). They know that “all the paths of Yahweh are mercy and truth” (Ps 25:10; 26:3), that “the earth is full of Yahweh’s grace” (Ps 33:5; 119:64). In the past he has shown mercy and satisfied his servants with all good things (Gen 33:5, 11; 2Kgs 13:23; Tob 8:17; 11:16); his mercy is constant (Isa 49:10), and it is certain that he will always show himself to be merciful (Tob 6:18): “God will have pity on you” (Deut 30:3; Isa 14:1; 54:7; 55:7; Jer 12:15; 30:18; 31:20; 42:12; Ezek 39:25). Of course this mercy is completely free (“I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy,” Exod 33:19), and one cannot always be sure of its manifestation (“Perhaps Yahweh will have mercy on what remains of Joseph,” Amos 5:15; Mal 1:9; 2Sam 12:22). And so the reasons for intervention are specified: “Have pity on me, Yahweh, for I languish” (Ps 6:2; 9:13), “because I am alone and unhappy” (Ps 25:6; cf. Jdt 6:19); “because I am in distress” (Ps 31:9; 51:2; 123:3), “because I have sinned against you” (Ps 51:5). This merciful benevolence is the basis of the covenant (“I will betroth you to myself . . . in pity and in mercy,” Hos 2:19), the motive for providence (“The one who takes pity on them will lead them,” Isa 49:10), the source of salvation (“Save me, Yahweh, by virtue of your grace,” Ps 6:4; 17:7; 31:16; 85:7; 86:13; 109:26; 119:41), of liberation from enemies (Ps 143:12), of pardon for sins (Wis 11:23; 15:1; Bar 3:2; Sir 16:9; 18:14; 36:1; 2Macc 2:18; 11:10), of comfort (Isa 12:1; 49:13; 52:9; Zech 1:17) and of joy (Ps 31:8). Certainly it is the same God who chastises and who shows mercy (Tob 13:2, 5); but if he punishes, it is with mercy (Wis 11:9; 12:22; 2Macc 6:16), and his grace is always beneficent (Ps 69:16; 90:14; 94:18) and “better than life” (Ps 63:3). Since God dispenses his grace and truth so generously (Ps 57:3, 10; 59:10, 16, 17; 61:7; 62:12; 69:13; 84:11; 85:10; 88:14; 108:5; 138:2), we can understand the deep significance of the formula of benediction: “You shall bless the children of Israel in this way . . . The Lord be gracious to you” (Num 6:25).

¹⁶ The substantive hen has the aesthetic meaning of χάρις, “grace, charm, attractiveness,” and it often suggests an accommodating attitude, the source of favors and gifts. With God, it is mercy or lovingkindness. Cf. C. Spicq, Agape: Prolegomenes, Appendix II, pp. 125–129; P. Bonnetain, “Grace,” in DBSup, vol. 3, col. 727–737; W. F. Lofthouse, “Hen and Heseḏ in the Old Testament,” in ZAW, 1933, pp. 29–35; W. L. Reed, “Some Implications of Hen for Old Testament Religion,” in JBL, 1954, pp. 36-41; K. W. Neubauer, Der Stamm Chnn im Sprachgebrauch des Alten Testaments, Berlin, 1964.

¹⁷ A fourth-century inscription, translating the priestly benediction (Num 6:25), substitutes ἀγαπήσει (line 9) for ε—λεήσει in the original; an equivalence justified by the editors B. Lifshitz and J. Schiby, “Une Synagogue samaritaine a Thessalonique,” in RB, 1968, pp. 370ff.

¹⁸ In six passages, the LXX translates raham with ἀγαπάω. The singular noun rehem refers to the mother’s womb, the uterus (Jer 1:5), the locus of the mother’s pity for her children (1Kgs 3:26), the plural rahamim refers to the intestines, which are moved with compassion and love (Cant 5:4; Gen 43:30). Hence the anthropomorphic descriptions of God’s mercy: “Have the yearning of your entrails and your compassion toward me been withheld?” (Isa 63:15); “My entrails are still moved on [Ephraim’s] account; I truly pity him” (Jer 31:20).

¹⁹ Hesed is linked with righteousness but put in relation with the covenant; it expresses the idea of faithfulness. Cf. C. Spicq, Agape: Prolegomenes, Appendix I, pp. 120–124; I. Elbogen, “dsj, Verpflichtung, Verheibung, Bekraftigung,” in P. Haupt Festschrift, Leipzig, 1922, pp. 43-46; N. Glueck, Das Wort hesed im alttestamentlichen Sprachgebrauch als menschliche und gottliche gemeinschaftgemabe, Giessen, 1927; H. J. Stoebe, “Die Bedeutung des Wortes Hasad im Alten Testament,” in VT, 1952, pp. 244–254; U. Masing, “Der Begriff Hesed im alttestamentlichen Sprachgebrauch,” in Charisteria I. Kopp . . . oblata, Holmiae, 1954, pp. 27-63; C. Ryder Smith, The Bible Doctrine of Grace, London, 1956, pp. 8-55; A. R. Johnson, “Hesed and Hasid,” in N. A. Dahl, A. S. Kapelrud, Interpretationes ad Vetus Testamentum pertinentes S. Mowinckel . . . missae, Oslo, 1965, pp. 100–112; A. Caquot, “‘Les Graces de David’: A propos d’Isaie LV, 3 b,” in Sem, 1965, pp. 45-59; W. Zimmerli, “dsj im Schriftum von Qumran,” in Hommages a A. Dupont-Sommer, Paris, 1971, pp. 439–449; and above all Katherine Doob Sakenfeld, The Meaning of Hesed in the Hebrew Bible, Missoula, 1978. This bibliography may be filled out from that in TWNT, vol. 10, p. 1072.

²⁰ The Jewish writings add nothing to the OT meaning. Pity is a “generous feeling” (χρηστὸς πάσος, Josephus, War 4.384), “the most essential feeling, the closest to reflective thought” (Philo, Virtues 144), “the altar of mercy” (Rewards 154), which has as its object the indigent (Change of Names 40; Dreams 1.95-96) and the orphans (Philo, Worse Attacks Better 145; Spec. Laws 4.180; Josephus, War 1.556; Ant. 16.15, 17). It is above all a divine attribute (Philo, Flight 162; Spec. Laws 1.308; Josephus, Ant.

4.239, 269; Pss. Sol. passim), a saving mercy (τὸν σωτήριον ἔλεον, Unchang. God 74; Dreams 2.149) bestowed by God even upon the unworthy (Unchang. God 76). “In God’s mercy all things repose together” (Sacr. Abel and Cain 42). Cf. Ep. Arist. 208: “You shall be led to have pity (πρὸς τὸν ἔλεον), for God is merciful (ε—λεήμων)”; T. Zeb. 5.3 —Ἐχετε οὖν ἔλεος ε—ν σπλάγχνοις ὑμῶ—ν, ὅτι εἴ τι ἄν ποιήσῃ τῶ— πλησίον αὐ\του, οὕτω Κύριος ποιήσῃ; T. Abr. B 10.

²¹ Matt 9:13; 12:7 take up Hos 6:6 —“I desire mercy and not sacrifice” (cf. D. Hill, “On the Use and Meaning of Hosea VI, 6 in Matthew’s Gospel,” in NTS, vol. 24, 1977, pp. 107–119). In Matt 23:23, Jesus accuses the Pharisees of neglecting the most important points of the law, the fundamental, most serious, obligations that it imposes (τὰ βαρύτερα τοῦ νόμου): righteousness or justice, compassion (τὸ ἔλεος), and good faith; cf. Zech 7:9; Prov 14:21-22.

²² Jas 2:13 —“Judgment (condemnation) will be without mercy (ἀνέλεος) for the one who has not shown mercy; mercy triumphs over judgment.” It is the condition for the forgiveness of sins (Sir 28:2; T. Zeb. 8.1-3). The adjective ἀνέλεος, a biblical hapax, is found elsewhere only in the papyri, in the fourth century (P.Lips. 39, 12); cf. ἀνελεήμων (Rom 1:32).

²³ C. Spicq, Dieu et l’homme, pp. 54-61; J. D. M. Derrett, Law in the NT, pp. 32-47; W. J. Thompson, Matthew’s Advice to a Divided Community, Rome, 1970, pp. 203ff.; J. Dupont, Beatitudes, vol. 3, pp. 620ff.

²⁴ Δοῦλε πονηρέ is usually translated “wicked servant” (18:32), but πονηροί is the adjective used for sycophants (Demosthenes, C. Eub. 57.32), that is, the dishonest, and means “rascals, rogues” (cf. J. Taillardat, Images d’Aristophane, p. 241, n. 430), miserable types (Plutarch, De cupid. divit. 5), the villainous (De vit. pud. 11; De sera 11), vile (Josephus, Ant. 2.55; 16.296), foul individual (Josephus, Life 134).

²⁵ The insensitivity and cruelty of the unmerciful debtor contrasts with the so generous compassion of the king, who was moved by his servant’s distress. God’s heart (1John 3:20) and even “entrails” are stirred; cf. the father of the prodigal (Luke 15:20-21).

²⁶ Cf. B. Gerhardsson, “The Good Samaritan,” in ConNT, vol. 16, 1958; C. Spicq, Agape, vol. 1, pp. 137–148; H. Binder, “Das Gleichnis vom barmherzigen Samariter,” in TZ, 1959, pp. 176–194; W. Monselewski, Der barmherzige Samariter, Tübingen, 1966; C. Daniel, “Les Esseniens et l’arriere-fond historique de la parabole du Bon Samaritain,” in NovT, 1969, pp. 71-104; H. Zimmermann, “Das Gleichnis vom barmherzigen Samariter,” in G. Bornkamm, Die Zeit Jesu (Festschrift H. Schlier), Freiburg-Basel-Vienna, 1970, pp. 58-69; Bo Reicke, “Der barmherzige Samariter,” in Verborum Veritas (Festschrift F. Stahlin), Wuppertal, 1970, pp. 103–109.

²⁷ Μακάριοι οἱ—ε—λεήμονες ὅτι αὐτοὶ ε—λεησθήσονται, Matt 5:7. —Ελεήμων, in 25 of its 30 occurrences in the LXX, refers to an attribute of God (cf. of Christ, Heb 2:17) and usually translates the Hebrew hannun (cf. J. Dupont, Beatitudes, vol. 3, pp. 604–633). God punishes sin but also has mercy on the sinner (Jonah 4:2; Joel 2:13; Isa 55:7; Jer 3:12), especially on the person who is compassionate (Luke 6:36-38; Eph 4:32; Col 3:12) and forgiving (Matt 6:12; Luke 11:5-6); cf. the parable of the Last Judgment (Matt 25:31-46).

²⁸ Luke 1:50 (= Ps 102:17); 1:54 (Ps 97:3); 1:72 (= Mic 7:20); 1:78, διὰ σπλάγχνα ε—λέους θεοῦ ἡμῶ—ν.

²⁹ Mark 10:47; Matt 9:27; 17:15; Luke 17:13; cf. Luke 16:24 —the wicked rich man— “Father Abraham, have mercy on me.”

³⁰ Rom 9:23; 1Pet 1:3 —“The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, through whose great mercy we have been born again to a living hope”; 2Tim 1:18 —“May the Lord grant to Onesiphorus to find mercy with the Lord on that Day” (to Onesiphorus, who was so devoted to the church at Ephesus and so charitable toward St. Paul when he was imprisoned at Rome). Thus the prayers of the apostle and of Christians provoke God to compassion.

ε—λπίζω, ε—λπίς

elpizo, to hope; elpis, hope

elpizo, S 1679; TDNT 2.517–533; EDNT 1.437–441; NIDNTT 2.238–246; MM 204; L&N 25.59, 30.54; BDF §§14, 74(1), 187(6), 233(2), 235(2), 337(2), 338(3), 341, 350, 397(2); BAGD 252 | elpis, S 1680; TDNT 2.517–533; EDNT 1.437–441; NIDNTT 2.238–246; MM 204–205; L&N 25.59, 25.61, 25.62; BDF §§14, 235(2), 400(1); BAGD 252–253; ND 2.77

We note that the noun elpis is absent from the four Gospels and thus that the Lord did not use the word hope.¹ The verb elpizo is used only twice in its secular sense (“If you lend to those from whom you hope to receive . . .” [Luke 6:34; cf. elpizon . . . apodosei, L. Robert, Gladiateurs, n. 55]; “Herod hoped to see Jesus perform some miracle” [Luke 23:8]) and three times in its religious sense,² all in accord with the OT meaning.³ The more the proclamation of the gospel of salvation advanced in Asia Minor and in Europe, the more the apostles, especially St. Paul, came in contact with pagans, whom they defined as “those who have no hope.”⁴ These pagans are amazed by the unique elpis (Eph 4:4; Heb 3:6; cf. P.Brem. 1, 1: mia en elpis kai loipe prosdokia; UPZ 42, 39; C.P.Herm. 116; Josephus, War 5.64; 6.160) that animates all the members of the new religion.⁵ They cry for help (Acts 16:9—boetheson hemin), so that the preaching of the faith is oriented more and more toward a preaching of hope (cf. Heb 11:1), and the confession of faith becomes a homologia tes elpidos akline (“unwavering confession of hope,” Heb 10:23).

I. — Secular objects of hope. — If hope is defined as “expectation of something good,”⁶ then there are many good things (Sir 2:9): returning to one’s country (Jer 44:14; Philo, Spec. Laws 4.17; Polybius 3.63.7), freedom (Isa 25:9; cf. Jdt 6:9; Ps 112:7), receiving a teaching (Isa 42:4; cf. Philo, Change of Names 8), help (2Macc 3:29), a wage (Wis 2:22, misthon), money,⁷ a harvest (Philo, Virtues 159; Rewards 129; 1Cor 9:10); escaping an illness (2Macc 3:29; Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 123; Josephus, War 1.657; Ant. 17.172), a shipwreck (Acts 27:20), a disaster (Job 2:9); what in Greek is called salvation (Philo, Flacc. 11; To Gaius 151, 329; 4Macc 11:7). Philo specifies that people hope for useful goods, like wealth, health, reputation (Alleg. Interp. 3.86; Decalogue 91; To Gaius 11), pleasures (Dreams 2.209), favors and compliments (Abraham 128; To Gaius 137), a calm and tranquil life (Moses 1.214), a contemplative life (Migr. Abr. 70), wellbeing (Joseph 162), freedom (Alleg. Interp. 3.194; Moses 1.171, 193; Virtues 123), fatherhood (Alleg. Interp. 3.85; Spec. Laws 1.138; 4.203; Decalogue 126; Virtues 207), motherhood (Spec. Laws 3.62), marriage (Husbandry 158; Prelim. Stud. 5; Aristaenetos 1.21.14: elpizomenos estin ho gamos hedys), victory (Spec. Laws 4.28; Good Man Free 111; To Gaius 356; Husbandry 162; Joseph 138), booty (Cherub. 75), happiness (Flight 145; Abraham 7; To Gaius 82), perfection (Heir 311; Decalogue 113). St. Paul and St. John express several times their desire to visit a community, to prolong a visit, to be free to meet a disciple.⁸ This meaning is in conformity with common usage as expressed in the papyri: “Tell Longinus that I hope to meet him again.”⁹ The desire is expressed that a certain order will be carried out (P.Ant. 188, 10), that a guilty person will be imprisoned (SB 9616, 28), that a certain person will make an effort (P.Brem. 5, 8: dosein ergasian; a Latinism, cf. Luke 12:58), that someone will carry out our business (P.Oxy. 3147, 8, hoti poiei to pragma hemon), that a field will be sown (P.Ryl. 243, 8), that certain things will be pleasing (PSI 1242, 3: auta hedista; first century; cf. SB 9528). Someone counts on receiving money (P.Mich. 480, 15; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XI, 28, 10; P.Oslo 50, 7; P.Laur. 39, 8) or help.¹⁰ Soldiers hope for promotion.¹¹ In the midst of trials, the danger is that one will lose all hope.¹² Is a happy life not sustained by hope?¹³ In contracts for divorce by mutual consent, the spouses recognize that they were united in a legal marriage and in a common life “for the procreation of children, according to the human custom, with good hopes” (epi chrestais elpisin, C.P.Herm. 29, 10 = SB 9278; C.Pap.Jud. 513). In all these texts, we can conclude on the one hand that human hope is the expectation—uncertain, confident, or anguished—of a desired good; it glimpses as possible or probable the realization of that which it counts on. On the other hand, the birthright of every human being, man or woman, but above all of the poor and unfortunate, is to retain hope. “Thales, when asked what the commonest thing was, answered, ‘Hope—for even those who have nothing else still have this.’”¹⁴

Otherwise, in biblical as in secular Greek, elpizo (en) means to hope in someone, to place one’s confidence in people or in earthly realities: the people of Shechem put their hope in Gaal (Judg 9:26; cf. 20:36), Hezekiah put his in Egypt and his horsemen (2*Kgs* 18:24), the Assyrians put theirs in their shields and spears;¹⁵ Israel in Bethel (Jer 48:13) and Egypt (Ezek 29:16); but Jer 17:5 curses the person who trusts in a human (Philo, Flacc. 22). This same meaning, “placing one’s confidence,” is found in the papyri: “For we would not have expected him to perish (future infinitive of diapipto) in so short a time” (ou gar an elpisamen en houto brachei chrono diapesein auton, SB 6787, 39; third century BC); “but I hope that I shall be saved through your prayers” (elpizo de diasotheseisthai me dia ton euchon sou, ibid. 7872, col. II, 10; C.P.Herm. 5, 11). It is attested especially in Jewish and Christian tomb inscriptions: “I expect a good hope of mercy”;¹⁶ but then the verb has a religious meaning.

II. — Religious objects of hope. — Pagans placed their confidence in God to obtain earthly goods.¹⁷ In the first century AD, according to Orphic and mystery traditions,¹⁸ souls aspire to immortality, to a blessed survival after death, and it was thought that Dionysus would protect his faithful ones after death. But this hope was never named as such, and it is only Plutarch who states that the initiates into the mysteries undergo “a sudden thrill mixed with hope” (met’ elpidos idias echousi, De fac. 28; 943 c), when they are in the act of clinging to the moon.

A veritable semantic revolution is effected by the LXX, which gives elpis and elpizo a strictly religious meaning. Hope, which is always directed toward God, is no longer any expectation whatsoever, but a sure and certain confidence in Yahweh. It is not only the virtue of certain individuals¹⁹ but also the faith, piety, and spirituality of Israel, as these are expressed by the psalmists and the sages: “The hope of the righteous is full of immortality” (Wis 3:4). “The hope of those who fear God is placed in the one who saves them.”²⁰ No object is given to elpis. It is only a matter of finding one’s refuge in Yahweh²¹ and having full and complete confidence in him.²² The twelve prophets have throughout history strengthened the chosen people “by certitude and constancy of hope” (en pistei elpidos, Sir 49:10). Just as pagans denounce the vain and deceptive hope that animates humans without God—for destiny laughs at hopes (Josephus, War 1.233)—so does Israel affirm the blessedness of elpis based on the true God: “Happy is the one whose hope is in Yahweh, his God” (Ps 146:5; cf. Sir 14:2); “Yahweh of Hosts, blessed is the person who hopes in you” (Ps 84:12). “Blessed is the person who trusts in Yahweh; the Lord is his hope” (Jer 17:7); “The hope of the righteous is joy, but the hope of the wicked will perish.”²³

St. Paul—who would be imprisoned “because of the hope of Israel” (Acts 28:20)—is the faithful heir of this language, this lexicon, and this faith: “God, in whom we have placed our hope (eis hon elpikamen) . . . will deliver us, with you helping us through prayer.”²⁴ “It is for this reason that we toil and strive, that we have placed our hope in the living God (elpikamen epi theo zonti), who is the Savior of all people, especially of believers” (1Tim 4:10). The verb in the perfect emphasizes that the hope is immutable and is the source of all the efforts, like that of the widow who “has placed her hope in God” (elpiken epi theon, 1Tim 5:5) and whose prayer is almost constant, because God is her only help.²⁵ This is the example given by the holy women of Israel who “placed their hope in God” (gynaikes hai elpizousai eis theon, 1Pet 3:5). This is still the traditional contrast: expecting the pleasures that this world can offer or expecting from God alone the regard and recompense of virtuous conduct.

The object of this hope is rarely specified and never defined. 2Thess 2:16 is content to say that Christ and God our Father have given us “a good hope graciously” (elpida agathen en chariti),²⁶ but Heb 7:19 states that the new covenant introduced “a better hope (kreittonos elpidos) whereby we draw near to God”; not only is the certitude complete, but the things hoped for are far superior.²⁷ We may distinguish hope in the realization of the promises of the Messiah and his kingdom,²⁸ the fervent expectation of salvation,²⁹ eternal life,³⁰ glory, (Rom 5:2; 8:21; Eph 1:18; Col 1:27), resurrection,³¹ the appearing-epiphany of Christ³² and of all the good things implied in the concept of the heavenly inheritance (Rom 8:17; 1Cor 15:50; Eph 1:18; Titus 3:7) or kingdom (2Thess 1:5; 2Tim 4:18), notably the vision of God (1Cor 13:12; 1John 3:2), which is presently impossible (2Cor 4:18). The specific character of the Christian elpis is to expect not only a future good but “what we do not see” (ou blepomen elpizomen, Rom 8:25; cf. 2Cor 4:18).

Whatever the diversity of these objects of hope, they are all summed up in Christ “our hope” (elpis hemon, 1Tim 1:1), not only because his disciples await the coming (1Thess 1:10; Phil 3:8-13, 20; 1Tim 6:14; 2Tim 4:8) of the victorious one (Rev 2:21; 5:5; 6:2; 17:14), who will lead to glory the multitude of the children of God (Heb 2:10; 10:22; 12:22-24; “to be with him,” Phil 1:22-23), but especially because it is through him alone—and no longer through Moses (John 5:45)—that they may obtain the future glory (Col 1:27). They are “those who have placed their hope in Christ” (1Cor 15:19; cf. Rom 5:1) or in the grace that he has brought (1Pet 1:13). He is the “pioneer of salvation” (archegos tes soterias, Heb 2:10). Their religious life is summed up in the person of the one who is the “living hope” (Heb 10:23).³³

So NT hope is not only a personal feeling (peri tes en hymin elpidos, 1Pet 3:15), nor even the thing awaited (1Thess 2:19; Eph 2:12), but the whole economy of the new covenant, the dispensation under which all believers live, the goal and the meaning of their calling (Eph 4:4), whose full actualization they await (Gal 5:5). They are exhorted to “hold fast to the hope set forth” (Heb 6:18), to “keep their confession of hope unshakable” (ten homologian tes elpidos, Heb 10:23), that is, their profession of faith.³⁴

III. — Hope as a virtue. — A feeling of confidence, hope resides in the heart (Jdt 6:9; Ps 28:7); it is a virtue³⁵ infused by “the God of hope” (Rom 15:13) or the Holy Spirit (Rom 15:13; cf. 5:5)—the pledge of the world to come (2Cor 1:22; 5:5)—and by means of the Scriptures (Rom 15:4). It is associated with faith and charity.³⁶ Being confident of the future (chrestas peri ton mellonton echein elpidas, Josephus, Ant. 6.275), it is a source of optimism: “charity hopes all things” (1Cor 13:7), sure of the triumph of the good. This hope is always joyful,³⁷ since it already possessed the pledge of the promised blessedness (Rom 14:17; Gal 5:22). It eliminates timidity and hesitation and gives the hopeful person “great boldness,”³⁸ made up of assurance and pride, letting one keep the “head high” (cf. Lev 26:13) and remain unshakable before criticisms and even fearless before God’s judgment (1John 2:28; 3:21; 4:17). This certitude and confidence which belong to “sharers in a heavenly calling” (Heb 3:1) are for them a kauchema, a subject of pride and honor, a claim to glory, attributed again by Heb 3:6 to hope.³⁹ But this essentially dynamic virtue demands the sanctification and purification of the Christian, because the end demands the use of means to attain it: “Whoever has such a hope in God purifies himself, as he himself is pure” (1John 3:3). Only the pure, after all, will see God (Matt 5:8; Heb 12:14), and nothing impure will ever enter into the heavenly city (Rev 21:27; 22:11). So those whose entire hope is to draw near to God, and to see God, purify themselves from every evil (Acts 24:15-16; 2Cor 5:9).

IV. — The certitude of the Christian hope. — Unlike human hope, whose props are often weak, whose goals are often bad,⁴⁰ whose expectations are often disappointed,⁴¹ NT elpis is sure and certain first of all by virtue of its semantic origin in the LXX (Hebrew batah), where it means essentially having confidence, being assured. Then, by virtue of its object and its own nature, it is solid (bebaia, 2Cor 1:7; Heb 6:19), indefectible (aklines, Heb 10:23); since it places its confidence in God it cannot be disappointed. What is more, it is sure because it is based on many statements in inspired Scripture.⁴² Finally, it is sure because St. Paul expressly states it and justifies it: “Hope does not disappoint, because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Spirit that has been given to us.”⁴³ Hope’s certitude is the certitude of God’s unchanging and efficacious love and of his infinite mercy, in which he has willed that none should perish and set in motion the whole economy of forgiveness and salvation.⁴⁴ Now this divine agape comes to indwell the souls of the faithful—justification is already present, actual—because the Holy Spirit has poured it out in them, so that it becomes their possession. They abide in God (1John 2:5-6). So there is no break between earth and heaven (cf. the metaphor of the anchor, Heb 6:19). Divine love is like a spring that wells up to eternal life (John 4:14; 7:38).

Thus it is certain that hope placed in God will not be disappointed. The verb kataischyno, used almost eighty times in the LXX,⁴⁵ expresses the idea of disappointment in a context of confidence (Luke 13:17). The wicked person who plots evil but cannot actualize his plans is embarrassed by his failure, but the faithful person who waits on God for salvation will not be confounded—a litotes—will not regret having entrusted his whole life to God. A “dis-grace” means being rejected by one’s Lord—this would be opprobrium, shame (cf. aischynomai; Phil 1:20); it would mean becoming the object of mocking by unbelievers who would laugh at the unfortunate, disappointed righteous person. It is as with the man who wanted to build a tower and had laid the foundation, but was unable to complete the project: “everyone ridiculed him” (Luke 14:29, empaizo). For a member of the new and eternal covenant in Jesus Christ, such an emptying out of hope is unthinkable (cf. Rom 8:32), since it is God himself who has given us this “good hope.”⁴⁶

¹ That is to say that in working out a NT theology of hope we have to take other terms into account: ἀναμένω, ἀπεκδέχομαι, γρηγορέω, ε—κδέχομαι, ε—πέχω, προσδέχομαι, προσδοκάω, ὑπομονή, etc.; cf. ἀπελπίζω (Luke 6:35), προελπίζω (Eph 1:12). Cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, pp. 292–380; J. de Guibert, “Sur l’emploi d’ε—λπίς et ses synonymes dans le N.T.,” in RSR, 1913, pp. 565–569; A. Gelin, Les Idées maîtresses de l’Ancien Testament, Paris, 1949, pp. 27ff.; T. C. Vriezen, “Die Hoffnung im Alten Testament,” in TLZ, 1953, col. 577–586; J. van der Ploeg, “L’Espérance dans l’A.T.,” in RB, 1954, pp. 481–507; W. Grossouw, “L’Espérance dans le N.T.,” ibid., pp. 508–532; J. Guillet, Thèmes bibliques, Paris, 1954, pp. 160ff.; D. L. Fidele, La speranza cristiana nelle lettere de S. Paulo, Naples, 1960; C. F. D. Moule, The Meaning of Hope (Facet Books, 5), Philadelphia, 1963; H. Schlier, Essais sur le Nouveau Testament, Paris, 1968, pp. 159–170, 356ff.; K. Hanhart, “Paul’s Hope in the Face of Death,” in JBL, 1969, pp. 445–457; F. Raurell, La esperanza en la Biblia (XXX Semana Biblica Española), in Analecta sacra Tarraconensia, 1970, pp. 325–359; J. R. Flecha Andrés, Esperanza y moral en el Nuevo Testamento, Léon, 1975; H. Zimmermann, Das

Bekennnis der Hoffnung: Tradition und Redaktion im Hebräerbrief, Cologne, 1977; P. Grelot, L'Espérance juive à l'heure de Jésus, Paris, 1978.

² Matt 12:21 (Rom 15:12), a quotation of Isa 42:4—"My servant . . . in his name the nations shall place their hope"; Luke 24:21—the disciples from Emmaus hoped that Jesus would deliver Israel; John 5:45—the Jews place their hope in Moses (the perfect form ἠλπικατε has a parallel in P.Oslo 159, 18, ἠλπικα, in the third century).

³ —Ἐλπίζω is construed with the accusative, the dative (Thucydides 3.97.2: "Demosthenes hoped in his fortune," τῇ τύχῃ ἐ—λπίσας), or the infinitive; or with ὅτι and many prepositions: εἰ—ς τινα, ἐ—ν τινι, ἐ—πί τινα, ἐ—πί τι, ἐ—πί τινι. In the LXX, it translates the Hebrew words qawâh, "await, hope" (cf. P. A. H. de Boer, "Etude sur le sens de la racine QWH," in Oudtestamentische Studiën, vol. 10, 1954, pp. 225–246); batah, "have confidence in, feel secure"; yahal, "wait for someone"; hakâh, "wait with confidence or certitude"; hasâh, "entrust oneself to someone, find shelter (mah<Ø>a<^>seh, refuge, shelter), have recourse to someone." While in secular Greek ἐ—λπίς and ἐ—λπίζω especially mean wait for, count on, expect, suppose (notably in Josephus), hope for, in the LXX, the preponderant nuance is trust, have recourse to, place one's hope in someone.

⁴ 1Thess 4:13; Eph 2:12. Certainly the Romans had a cult of Hope, for whom they had many temples (PW, vol. 3, A, 2, col. 1634ff.; K. Thylander, Inscriptions du port d'Ostie, Lund, 1952, n. B, 335, 32); they thought that the cult of Hope restored courage (Cicero, Nat. D. 2.23; Dio Cassius 2.23). At Rome, A. Atilius Calatinus had built a temple to Spes (Hope) on the Forum Holitorium during the First Punic War; later a temple to Spes Vetus was erected on the Esquiline (Cicero, Leg. 2.11.28); but Elpis does not have a place in the index of Stoic technical terms or in that of E. des Places' La Religion grecque (Paris, 1969), since it is a passion and as such as little desirable as any other passion. According to the myth of Pandora, the jar from which escaped all the evils that spread among humankind was closed before Hope, which was still down inside it, could get out (Hesiod, Op. 42–105). Certainly some religious souls hoped in the gods' help (Philemon: οἱ— γὰρ θεὸν σέβοντες, ἐ—λπίδας καλὰς ἔχουσιν εἰ—ς σωτηρίαν, in J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 3 A, p. 82), but in the first century, sadness and discouragement are constant: "We can no longer bear either our vices or their cures" (Livy, preface). Archias of Mitylene thought that it was good to bewail the birth of sons, who would advance relentlessly among evils of all sorts, and that the dead were blessed in that they had left life and found in death the cure for all ills (Anth. Pal. 9.11; cf.

P.Oxy. 115). It has been observed that in the sculpture of the first century, the eyes often express sadness, “a sort of desperate numbness” (J. P. Milliet, “Les Yeux hagards,” in Mélanges Nicole, Geneva, 1905, pp. 357–366). A common epitaph: “I was not, I came to be, I am no longer; it amounts to nothing” (MAMA, vol. 8, 353; cf. R. Lattimore, Epitaphs). Cf. A. J. Festugière, Idéal religieux, pp. 163–164; idem, Vie spirituelle, pp. 159ff. C. Spicq, Vie morale, pp. 10ff. = ET, Trinity, pp. 3ff.; J. M. Aubert, “La Voix de l’espérance dans l’âme grecque antique,” in BAGB, 1961, pp.205–216.

⁵ 1Pet 3:15. Cf. E. Cothenet, “Le Réalisme de l’espérance chrétienne selon IPierre,” in NTS 27, 1981, pp. 564–572.

⁶ Ps.-Plato, Def. 416: ε—λίς: προσδοκία ἀγαθοῦ; cf. Xenophon, Cyr. 1.6.19.

⁷ Acts 24:26—ε—λίζων ὅτι χρήματα δοθήσεται αὐτῷ—; Luke 6:34—ε—λίζετε λαβει—ν; a profit (ε—ργασία, Acts 16:19; cf. κέρδος, Josephus, War 2.587; 6.383; Ant. 18.7; Life 325). The poor person who has hope (Hebrew tiqwâh; Job 4:16; Pss. Sol. 5.13; 15.2; 18.3; Philo, Abraham 47: “The one who hopes is poor”) directs his desire to what is due him (Deut 24:15). The hope for a tree is that it will renew itself (Job 14:7; 19:10); the merchant’s hope is profit (Philo, Rewards 11).

⁸ Rom 15:24—ε—λίζω θεάσασθαι ὑμα—ς; 1Cor 16:7—ε—λίζω ε—πιμει—ναι; Phil 2:19, 23; Phlm 22; 1Tim 3:14; 2John 12; 3John 14; cf. Tob 10:8—Tobias’s parents have no more hope of seeing him again. In the sense “expect, count on,” St. Paul uses the verb ε—λίζω to express his confidence in the good feelings of his correspondents (“I hope that you will understand . . .” [2Cor 1:13; 5:11; 8:5; 10:15; 13:6]) or in their faithfulness (2Cor 1:7). Cf. the letter of Sempronius in the second century: “I expect (ε—λίζω) that our brother Valerius realizes how deep the sorrow is that we feel” (P.Wisc. 84, 12).

⁹ P.Mich. 476, 25 (third century); 481, 14; P.Gron. 18, 7; P.Oxy. 1829, 7, 17; 1940, 3; 2190, 9. A son’s hope is that upon his return he will find his mother in good health (letter of Ammon, edited by W. H. Willis, in Proceedings XV, p. 108, l. 17).

¹⁰ P.Mich. 529, 15: Aurelius ε—λίζων τῆς τοῦ κυρίου μου βοηθείας, hoping for my lord’s assistance (the lord in question being the prefect of Egypt, Maevius Honoratianus); P.Tebt. 787, 15: ε—λίδα ἔχοντες τῆς σῆς ἀντιλήψεως.

¹¹ In 107, the soldier Apollinarus writes to his brother Sabinus that the consular Claudius Severus has told him: “I will make you a secretary of the legion, with hope of advancement” (ε—φ̄ ε—λπίδων, P.Mich. 466, 30); “I hope to be promoted soon” (BGU 423, 27). Cf. SB 6717, 7: ε—λπίζω σε στεφανωθήσεσθαι; P.Lond. 1941, 8.

¹² Ἀλλην ε—λίδα οὐκ ἔχομεν, P.Giss. (ed. H. Kling) 31, 14; P.Oxy. 1678, 7; P.Mich. 502, 12: μάλιστα δέ τις ἄλλη ε—λίς οὐκ ἔστιν ὡς ἡ παρησία τω—ν ἀδελφω—ν (second century); Josephus, Ant. 10.11: τω— μηδεμίαν ἄλλην ε—λίδα ἔχοντι σωτηρίας. An insolvent debtor saw his children seized by creditors; he himself was arrested; it could be said that he had been almost forced to lose blessed hope: ὥστε ὡς ἔπος εἰ—πει—ν ἀναγκασθῆναι τῆς μακαρίας ε—λπίδος (cf. Titus 2:13; Antiochus I of Commagene, in IGLS 1, 108); ἡμω—ν ἀποστερηθῆναι (P.Lond. 1915, 9). The legal ἀνάπαυσις was not respected in the assigning of a leitourgia to a complainant who thus lost “the time to have good hopes” (ἔχειν περὶ ε—μαυτω— χρηστὰς τὰς ε—λίδας, SB 10199). En route to Hades: εἰ—ς φλόγα καὶ σποδιὴν ε—λίδας ε—ξέχεεν (CIRB 141, 5). The author of a letter, in a difficult situation, has no hope other than the help of his correspondent: νῦν ε—ν σοὶ μοὶ εἰ—σιν αἰ— ε—λίδες τοῦ σωίζεσθαι (sic), P.Cair.Zen. 59844, 6. It is hoped that some evil will not happen: ὅπερ ε—λπίζω μηδὲν τούτων γενήσεσθαι (P.Mil.Vogl. 76,8).

¹³ Βίον ἀγαθὸν εἰ—ς ε—λίδα (Antiochus I of Commagene, in IGLS 47, col. VI, 14); ε—λίδα τοῦ βιώσεσθαι (Josephus, Ant. 15.204; cf. 17.1). New fruits give the best hopes (BGU 486, 6; cf. education, Philo, Post. Cain 97; Heir 310). SB 9528, 11; PSI 1312, 9 (letters of Chomenis to his brother): ἀγαθὰς οὖν ε—λίδας ἔχε; UPZ 13, 28.

¹⁴ ἀλης ε—ρωτῆεῖς τί κοινότατον, ἀπεκρίνατο· ε—λίθ· καὶ γὰρ οἶθ ἄλλο μηδέν, αὕτη πάρεστιν, Stobaeus, Flor. 110.46, n. 24 (vol. 5, p. 1001); Plato, Phlb. 39 e: “Throughout our lives, we do not cease to be full of hope”; Theocritus 4.42: “There is hope as long as one is living; it is when one is dead that there is no more hope”; Xenophon, An. 7.6.11: “When one is human one must expect everything” (cited by Bultmann, “ε—λίς,” in TDNT, vol. 2, pp. 517–518). Philo, Worse Attacks Better 138–139: “Is there is anything more properly human than the hope or expectation of possessing goods that God will give? . . . Those who do not hope in God do not share in a rational nature . . . only humans have hope . . . whoever despairs is not human”; Rewards 14: “No one could be taken for a human being who does not hope in God”; 72; Abraham 8, 10.

¹⁵ Jdt 9:7; Ps 44:6; Hos 10:13—“You hoped in the multitude of your valiant men.” A person may have confidence in dreams (Sir 34:7; cf. hope through magic, Rhetorius, ε—λίσι χρησμο—ν ἀναλαμβανομένους, in CCAG, VIII, IV, p. 165, 8), in a lie (Isa 28:15; Jer 13:25), wickedness (Isa 47:10: ε—λίς τῆς πονηρίας σου) or extortion (Isa 30:12). Fools put their hope in dead things: ε—ν νεκροί—ς = in idols (Wis 13:10; cf. 15:6, 10).

¹⁶ —Ελέους ε—λίδα ἀγαθὴν ε—γὼ προσδέχομαι, epitaph of a Jew of Rachelis, dead at age 30, CII 1513, 7 = SB 6650, 4. In classical Greek, ἔχειν τὴν ε—λίδα ε—πί = place one's hope in someone; cf. Euripides, Or. 1059; Diodorus Siculus 14.101.

¹⁷ —Ελπίζω σὺν θεω—, παρὰ θεοῦ, μετὰ θεόν, εἰ—ς θεόν. In the papyri, most of these attestations are Christian and late, P.land. 11, 2; P.Ant. 198, 6–7; PSI 301, 9; SB 7655, 15; 9139, 15; 10269, 5; IGLS 2546.

¹⁸ Cf. M. J. Lagrange, Les Mystères: L'Orphisme, Paris, 1937; A. Boulanger, "L'Orphisme," in REA, 1937, pp. 45–48; especially F. Cumont, Lux Perpetua, pp. 240ff., 401ff. A. J. Festugière, Etudes de religion, pp. 13–63. For Cicero (Leg. 2.14.36), Eleusis brought men nothing better than a reason to live with joy and to die "with good hope."

¹⁹ 2Kgs 18:5 (Hezekiah); Ps 21:7; 26:1; 28:7; 32:10; 34:8, 22; 56:2, 4, 11; 91:2; 147:11; Sus 60: "God saves those who hope in him"; 1Macc 2:61; Judas Maccabeus "holding an unshakeable confidence had full hope of obtaining help from the Lord" (2Macc 15:7); 4Macc 17:4.

²⁰ Sir 34:13; Dan 3:28—"His servants trusted in him"; Ps 22:4, 5; 25:20.

²¹ Ps 7:1; 13:5; 14:6; 16:1; 17:7; 18:2, 30; 31:1; 61:3; 62:7; 71:1; 73:28; 91:1-3, 9; 94:22; Prov 14:26.

²² Ps 4:5—Have confidence in Yahweh; 9:10; 40:4; 52:5, 11; 43:5; 71:5; 115:9-11; Isa 26:4; Bar 4:22; Sir 2:6. God is "the hope of all the ends of the earth" (Ps 65:5); even "the islands will hope" in him and will count on his arms (Isa 51:5). With Noah, "the hope of the world found refuge on a raft" (Wis 14:6). This confidence, which will not be disappointed (Prov 23:18) contrasts with the vain hope of fools (κενή ἢ ε—λίς ἀὐτω—ν, Wis 3:11, 18; 5:14), which is empty and deceitful (Sir 34:1), which is never fulfilled (Job 8:13; 27:8; Prov 11:7, 23; 26:12; 29:20). "The hope of the wicked is to breathe their last" (Job 11:20); that of the ingrate melts "like the wintry frost" (Wis 16:29).

²³ Prov 10:28. This hope-confidence is found in all the writers who share in the faith of Israel: Pss. Sol. 5.13; 6.8; 8.37; 9.19; 17.3, 38, 44. The Qumran psalmist hopes in the love, the goodness, the grace of God (1QH 9.10, 14; 10.16; 11.31; cf. 3.20; 6.6); Philo: “Only the one who has placed his hope in God is worthy of approval” (Rewards 13); “Holy and praiseworthy is the one who hopes” (Abraham 14–16); “Those who are truly well-born are full of hope” (To Gaius 195); “The greatest hope is hope in God” (Spec. Laws 1.310; cf. Virtues 67, 75; Flacc. 176). The faithful place their hope in God’s merciful nature (Spec. Laws 2.196; cf. Abraham 9; Flight 99). Josephus: to place one’s hope in God (τὰς ἐ—λπίδας ἔχειν ἐ—ν τῷ θεῷ, Ant. 8.282) is to have confidence in his help (βοηθὸν ἐ—λίξειν τὸν θεόν, 2.331; cf. War 2.391; 6.99–100) and to find salvation (Ant. 12.344). Moses had confidence that God would save his people (Ant. 2.276) and Darius hoped that the deity would save Daniel (10.258); cf. T. Job 37.1, 5.

²⁴ 2Cor 1:10–11. Prayer obtains God’s granting of the thing hoped for (Job 6:8); hence the association of ἐ—λίς and εὐχή, P.Berl.Zill. 14, 16: ἐ—λπίδας ἔχω εἰ—ς τὸν θεὸν καὶ τὰς εὐχὰς ὑμῶ—ν (sixth century); P.Oxy. 939, 9–10; P.Lond. 1928, 15: διὰ τῶ—ν ὑμῶ—ν εὐχῶ—ν προσδοκομένη ἐ—λίς; Dittenberger, Syl. 364, 5; Phlm 22. In 1Cor 15:19, the Christ-mediator or God-man is substituted for God as the basis of hope: “If we have hoped in Christ (ἐ—ν Χριστῷ— ἠλπικότες) in this life only, then we are of all people most to be pitied,” since we would be deprived of the very point: future blessedness (cf. IGLS 2546: “O Christ, help Helenis, your servant, for the one who hopes in you [will not perish?]”).

²⁵ Cf. 1Tim 6:17—“Command the rich in this age . . . not to place their hope in (μηδὲ ἠλπικέναι ἐ—πί) the uncertainty of wealth but in God who procures all things richly for our enjoyment.” Earthly goods are unstable and deceptive. A Christian must count only on God, who is the rich one par excellence (2Cor 8:9; Eph 2:4) and loves to give.

²⁶ The adjective ἀγαθή is constantly used to describe hopes of happiness; cf. Socrates (in Stobaeus, vol. 5, p. 1002, n. 26); Xenophon, Cyr. 1.6.19; Josephus, Ant. 1.325; 5.222; 8.214; 13.201; 14.96. (Cf. the numerous uses collected by F. Cumont, Lux Perpetua, especially in relation to the mysteries of Eleusis.) It alternates with καλή (Ep. Arist. 261; Plutarch, Brut. 40.1), γλυκει—α (Bion, in Stobaeus, vol. 5, p. 1000, 17), ι—λαρά (Critias, frag. 6, ed. Diels; Josephus, War 1.616; 2.106); cf. εὐελπις (Plato, Ap. 41 d; Phd. 64 a).

²⁷ Κρει—ττον (Josephus, Ant. 2.110; 3.83) alternates with μεγάλη (War 7.76; Ep. Arist. 18), βέλτιον (Dittenberger, Syl. 731, 35), χρηστή (Ant. 6.275; 7.234; 8.419; 13.421; 15.302; 18.284; P.Oxy. 1070, 10), and βεβαία (2Cor 1:7; 4Macc 17:4; Josephus, War 7.165, 413; Ant. 8.8), sometimes in the superlative βεβαιοτάτη (Philo, Plant. 88; Josephus, Ant. 8.280). 1Pet 1:3—“God has regenerated us εἰ—ς ἐ—λίδα ζω—σαν”; 1:13—τελειῶς;

Heb 10:23—ἀκλινής; Titus 2:13; P.Lond. 1915, 9: μακαρία. To express firm hope, one can say πολλή ε—λπίς (2Macc 9:22).

²⁸ Acts 26:6-7. Cf. Col 1:23—“the hope promised by the gospel”; Heb 6:17-18. Thus Abraham, trusting in God’s promise, hoped against all hope (παρ ε—λπίδα ε—πε—λπίδι, Rom 4:18). The expression “saved against all hope” (σωθείς . . . παρ ε—λπίδα), used with respect to Mithridates (Josephus, War 1.192; cf. Ant. 17.331), is common in this author (War 1.331, 580; 4.657, etc.).

²⁹ 1Thess 5:8—ε—λπίς σωτηρίας (objective genitive; cf. Job 2:9; T. Job 24.1; Aeneas Tacticus, prol. I. 14; Philo, To Gaius 329). The expression recurs constantly in Josephus, especially with regard to military victories (War 1.390; 3.194, 204; 4.312, 338; 5.64, 306, 512, 535; 6.160, 181; 7.165, 331, 413; Ant. 1.327; 2.140; 7.158; 13.399; 15.153; 16.238, 389); cf. 2Thess 2:13; Rom 5:9-10; 1Tim 4:10. In Rom 8:24 (τῇ γὰρ ε—λπίδι ε—σώθημεν), “hope” can be understood in the objective sense of a salvation fully realized, consummated (cf. Gal 5:5—“We await the hope of righteousness”); already saved now (the aorist ε—σώθημεν; cf. 1Cor 1:18), Christians are on the way to definitive salvation, to complete possession, what Heb 6:11 calls the πληροφορία τῆς ε—λπίδος. They live, then, under a dispensation of hope. Some understand “hope” in the subjective and instrumental sense: salvation is realized through hope-patience. For the discussion cf. M. F. Lacan, “‘Nous sommes sauvés par l’espérance’ (Rom. VIII, 24),” in A la rencontre de Dieu: Mémoires A. Gelin, Le Puy-Lyon-Paris, 1961, pp. 331–339; J. Cambier, “L’Espérance et le salut dans Rom. 8, 24,” in Message et mission: Recueil commémorative du Xe anniversaire de la Faculté de Théologie (of Kinshasa), Louvain-Paris, 1968, pp. 77–107.

³⁰ Titus 1:2—“Paul, an apostle . . . for the hope of eternal life (ε—πε ε—λπίδι ζωῆς αἰ—ωνίου), which God, who cannot lie, has promised”; 3:7; cf. Rom 6:22; 1Cor 15:22; Gal 6:8.

³¹ Acts 23:6—“It is on account of the hope of the resurrection of the dead that I am on trial”; 24:15—“Having this hope in God . . . that there will be a resurrection of the just and the unjust”; 2:26 (= Ps 16:9)—“My very flesh will rest in hope (of the resurrection)”; Phil 3:20-21; Rom 8:23. Even the creation, subjected to vanity, retains a hope of renewal (8:20). Cf. 1 Enoch 46.6—unbelievers “will have no hope of rising from their slumber.”

³² Titus 2:13 (cf. marana-tha, 1Cor 16:22; C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 3, pp. 83ff.; C. F. D. Moule, “A Reconsideration of the Context of Maranatha,” in NTS, vol. 6, 1960, pp. 307–310; S. Schulz, “Maranatha und Kyrios Jesus,” in ZNW, 1962, pp. 125–144). The Christian hopes for the coming of Christ

(1Cor 1:7; 1Pet 1:13) as the servant hopes for that of his master (Luke 12:36); it is his reason for living. His whole watchful and patient life is determined by this waiting (1Thess 1:10; Phil 3:12, 20; cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, pp. 311ff.).

³³ Jer 17:7 had stated: ἔσται κύριος ἐ—λπὶς αὐτοῦ (cf. P.Oxy. 1059, 1, a Christian prayer from the fifth century, κύριε θεέ καὶ ἐ—λπὶς μου); Ps 71:5—κύριος ἢ ἐ—λπὶς μου; Sir 34:14—“The one who fears the Lord will not be timid, for his hope is in him”; Thucydides 3.57.4: “You Lacedaemonians, our only hope.” According to 1 Enoch 48.4, the Son of Man “will be the hope of those who suffer in their heart.” Hesiod personifies —Ελπίς (Op. 96), like the allegorists who “call Moses’ sister Elpis because she observes from afar” (Philo, Dreams 2.142), and many women named Elpis are known (BGU 632, 20; GVI, n. 1103, 1; L. Robert, “Les Inscriptions,” in J. des Gagniers, Laodicée, p. 352) or Elpidis (L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1953, p. 188, n. 218). A physician of Corinth is named Gaius Vibius Euelpistus (I. Cor. VIII, 3, n.206); the same name in upper Pannonia, cf. V. Hoffiler, B. Soria, Antike Inschriften aus Jugoslawien, Amsterdam, 1970, I, n. 517, 4. In the fourth century, a Christian servant asks for prayers for his sick mistress, ἐ—ν γὰρ αὐτῇ πάντες τὰς ἐ—λπίδας ἔχομεν (P.Oxy. 939, 9; cf. 1Thess 2:19). For Theognis 1135 (“Elpis is the only deity who is beneficent toward humans”) people must count on her; for this parthene appears to them, like Artemis or Athena (Artemidorus Daldianus, Onir. 2.44). In 1Tim 1:1; Col 1:27, the personification of Hope = Christ seems to intend an anti-imperial apologetic, because the Romans applauded their sovereign as the hope of the universe: “Caesar Augustus at his appearing realized the hopes of our ancestors. . . . He leaves future benefactors of humanity no hope of surpassing him” (I.Priene 105; Dittenberger, Or. 458, 37–40). “. . . So that with greater confidence you may hope for everything (πάντα ἐ—λπίζετε), the salvation as well as the material happiness of the benefactor Augustus, Emperor Galba” (edict of Tiberius Julius Alexander; ibid. 669 = BGU 1563, 15). In 54, Nero is referred to as ὁ τῆς οἰ—κουμένης καὶ προσδοκηθεὶς καὶ ἐ—λπισθεὶς (P.Oxy. 1021, 6). In 37: ἐ—πεὶ ἢ κατ’ εὐχὴν πα—σιν ἀνθρώποις ἐ—λπισθει—σα Γαΐου Καίσαρος Γερμανικοῦ Σεβαστοῦ ἡγεμονία κατήγγελλται, οὐδὲν δὲ μέτρον χαρα—ς εὗρηκεν ὁ κόσμος (Dittenberger, Syl. 797, 5).

³⁴ 1Pet 3:15 (cf. the two lamps of Antinoöpolis bearing this inscription: Πίστις ἐ—λπίς [τοῦ ἁγίου Σεργίου?], in SB 6023). Hope is part of the description of faith: πίστις ἐ—λπιζομένων ὑπόστασις (Heb 11:1), cf. C. Spicq, Hébreux, vol. 2, pp. 336ff. To believe is to hope, Rom 4:18; 2Cor 1:9; 2Tim 1:12.

³⁵ Rom 5:4—“Virtue when tested produces hope.”

³⁶ In 1Thess 1:3; 5:8; 1Cor 13:13—“Now there abide (or remain valid; μένω, Rom 9:11; Isa 14:24; cf. W. Grossouw, “L’Espérance dans le N.T.,” RB, 1954, p. 517) faith, hope, and charity.” On this triad, cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 2, pp. 104ff., 365–378; trinitarian sequences are common in the Orac. Chald. (5.26; E. des Places, Jamblique: Les Mystères d’Égypte, Paris, 1966, p. 182, n. 2), in language, and in music (Philo, Husbandry 136–137; Alleg. Interp. 1.3; Abraham 122ff.; Quest. Gen. 4.8); cf. H. Usener, Dreiheit: Ein Versuch mythologischer Zahlenlehre, 2d ed., Hildesheim, 1966; E. von Dobschütz, “Zwei- und dreigliedrige Formeln: Ein Beitrag zur Vorgeschichte der Trinitätsformel,” in JBL, 1931, pp. 117–147. —On 1Cor 13:13, the Pauline triad taking precedence over justice, peace, truth, etc. (Christian inscription from Tafeh, in SB 8705); cf. F. M. Lacan, “Les Trois qui demeurent,” in RSR, 1958, pp. 321–348 (with the critique by A. Feuillet, in NTS, vol. 6, p. 513, n. 2); J. Moss, “I Cor. XIII,” in ExpT, vol. 73, 1962, p. 253; F. Dreyfus, “‘Maintenant, la foi, l’espérance et la charité demeurent toutes les trois,’” in Studiorum Paulinorum Congressus, Rome, 1963, pp. 403–412; W. Marxsen, “Das ‘Bleiben’ in I Kor. XIII, 13,” in Neues Testament und Geschichte (Festgabe O. Cullmann), Zurich, 1972, pp. 223–229; E. Miguens, “I Cor. XIII, 8–13 Reconsidered,” in CBQ, 1975, pp. 76–97.

³⁷ 1Thess 2:19; Rom 12:12—τῆ ε—λίδι χαίροντες; 15:13. Philo brings it up over and over again: Alleg. Interp. 3.87; Change of Names 161, 163; Worse Attacks Better 138; Rewards 161.

³⁸ 2Cor 3:12; Phil 1:20; Heb 3:6; P. Joüon, “Divers sens de παρρησία dans le N.T.,” in RSR, 1940, pp. 239–241. A. M. Denis, “L’Apôtre Paul, Prophète ‘messianique’ des Gentils,” in ETL, 1957, pp. 249–259; D. Smolders, “L’Audace de l’apôtre selon saint Paul: Le Thème de la parrèsia,” in Collectanea Mechlinensia, 1958, pp. 16–30, 117–133; W. C. van Unnik, “‘With Unveiled Faces’: An Exegesis of 2 Corinthians III, 12–18,” in NovT, vol. 6, 1963, pp. 159ff. (= idem, Sparsa Collecta, Leiden, 1973, pp. 200ff.). Cf. G. J. M. Bartelink, “Quelques observations sur Παρρησία dans la littérature paléo-chrétienne,” in Graecitas et latinitas Christianorum primaeva, Supplementa, vol. 2, Nijmegen, 1970, pp. 7–57. L. Engels, “Fiducia dans la Vulgate: Le Problème de traduction παρρησία-fiducia,” ibid., Supplementa, vol. 1, 1964, pp. 99–141.

³⁹ Heb 3:6. J. S. Bosch, ‘Gloriarse’ según San Pablo y teología de καυχάομαι (AnBib 40), Rome, 1970. E. Fuchs, “Gloire de Dieu et gloire de l’homme: Essai sur les termes kaukastai . . . dans la Septante,” in RTP, 1977, pp. 321–332.

⁴⁰ Cf. Josephus, Ant. 15.79: τὴν ε—λίδια τῆς πλεονεξίας.

⁴¹ Sir 13:6—the wicked rich person gives (deceptive) hope to the poor. The pejorative adjectives for this hope are many: κακή (Euripides, in Stobaeus, vol. 5, p. 999, 13; Menander, ibid., p. 998, 8), ἄδηλος (uncertain, 2Macc 7:34), ματαία (Isa 31:2; Lucian, Alex. 47), ἀπάτη (Philo, Rewards 147), πονηρά (Isa 28:19; 47:10; Socrates, in Stobaeus, 5, p. 1001, n. 21; Josephus, Ant. 11.247), κενή (Job 7:6; Wis 3:11; Sir 31:1; Philo, Moses 1.195), ἀτελής (Philo, Spec. Laws 4.158; Virtues 29; Rewards 149; CIRB 130, 16), ψευδής (Euripides, in Stobaeus, vol. 5, p. 1004, n. 5), ἀβέβαια (Philo, Flacc. 109), ἀλόγιστος (ill-considered, Josephus, War 2.346), ἀναιδής (ibid. 6.337), σφαλερά (1.357), μικρά (7.77; Ant. 15.232). A distant hope is abandoned (Plutarch, Arat. 4.3).

⁴² “Your expectation (Hebrew tiqwâh) will not be disappointed” (Prov 23:18; 24:14). God does not look upon us with scorn (Jdt 8:20; cf. 2Macc 2:18). Those who hope in him have not been confounded (Ps 22:6; 25:3, 20; 31:1, 6, 14, 19, 24; 71:1; 119:116; Sir 2:6). He saves them (Sus 60; Bar 4:22; Isa 25:9).

⁴³ Rom 5:5 (a verse that was cited 201 times by St. Augustine; cf. A. M. Bonnardière, “Le Verset paulinien Rom. V, 5 dans l’œuvre de Saint Augustine,” in Augustinus Magister, Paris, 1954, vol. 2, pp. 657–665); Phil 1:20.

⁴⁴ Eph 2:4-5; Titus 3:4-5; 1Pet 1:3; John 3:6; 1John 4:9-10.

⁴⁵ In the sense “dishonor, taint” (2Sam 16:21; 19:6; Prov 19:26; Sir 22:4–5; 42:11; 1Cor 11:5, 22), humiliate and molest (Ruth 2:15), expresses simultaneously the ideas of punishment and derision: Mic 3:7 (linked with καταγελάω); Ps 44:8; 1Cor 1:27; 1Pet 3:16; cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 2, pp. 173ff.; J. M. Lochmann, Trägt oder trägt die christliche Hoffnung?, Zurich, 1974.

⁴⁶ 2Thess 2:15 (cf. P. Otzen, “Gute Hoffnung’ bei Paulus,” in ZNW, 1958, pp. 283–285). St. Thomas Aquinas glosses this text: “We look for a good hope, that is, the certainty of eternal goods” (“Expectamus spem bonam, id est bonorum aeternorum infallibilitatem”). On 2Cor 5:5—“He has given us the Spirit as a pledge,” St. Thomas comments: “That is, the Holy Spirit giving us certainty of this good thing with which we wish to be filled. . . . A pledge is kept and held as a surety that something will be had. That is how it is with the Holy Spirit, because the Holy Spirit is worth as much as heavenly glory, but the mode of possession is different in each case:

because we have the Spirit now as a surety that that glory will follow; in heaven, however, we will have that glory as something that is already ours and possessed by us.” (“Id est Spiritum Sanctum causantem in nobis certitudinem hujus rei qua desideramus impleri. . . . Pignus servatur et tenetur quasi pro certitudine rei habendae. Ita est de Spiritu Sancto, quia Spiritus Sanctus tantum valet quantum gloria coelestis, sed differt modo habendi, quia nunc habemus eum quasi ad certitudinem consequendi illam gloriam; in patria vero habebimus ut rem jam nostram et a nobis possessam.”) empipto, to fall into, run into, encounter

ε—μπίπτω

see also περιπίπτω; πίπτω

empipto, S 1706; EDNT 1.445; MM 207; L&N 15.121, 90.71; BAGD 256

In the NT, people fall physically into a pit¹ and metaphorically into snares,² notably the net of the devil (1Tim 3:7), that is, his power.³ Because the devil slanders the elect and claims the role of their torturer (Rev 12:10; 1Cor 5:5), it can be said that the proud “fall into the condemnation of the devil,” the latter being the one who carries out the punishment.⁴ At the same time, people fall into temptations or shame;⁵ so empipto means “encounter” or “appear, show up” whether with respect to things or persons.⁶ The French still say “I fell upon such and such” (“je suis tombé sur . . .,” the English expression being “I ran into . . .”),⁷ whether the encounter was favorable or not.⁸

“Fall into the hands of . . .” in the sense of being left at the mercy of, is a biblicism, from Samson dreading to fall into the hands of the uncircumcised (Judg 15:18) to the traveler who was helped by the Samaritan after falling into the hands of thieves (Luke 10:36). It is always preferable to fall into the hands of the Lord, who is merciful, rather than into the cruel hands of men.⁹ The cry of terror at the thought of the condemnation of the apostate in Heb 10:31 is exceptional: “It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.”

¹ Matt 12:11; Luke 6:39 (εἰ—ς βόθυνον), as in the OT, into tar pits (Gen 14:10), into a cistern (Exod 21:33), into a pit (Ps 7:16; 57:7; Prov 26:27; 28:10; Eccl 10:8; Sir 27:26; Isa 24:18; Jer 48:44), sometimes metaphorically (Prov 22:14). “Cnemon having fallen into the well” (Menander, Dysk. hyp. 7; cf. Josephus, Ant. 4.283; Life 403; PSI 829, 7).

² 1Tim 6:9—“Those who want to be rich ε—μπίπτουσιν ει—ς πειρασμὸν καὶ παγίδα.” The church fathers and moderns distinguish between the rich (1Tim 6:17ff.) and those who want to become rich (Sir 27:1—ὁ ζητῶ—ν πληθύναι; Anth. Pal. 11, 3: ἤθελον ἄν πλουτεῖ—ν = I wanted to be rich, as Croesus once was; Juvenal, Sat. 14.176: dives qui fieri vult). They fall (iterative present) into injustices, lies, extortions, deceptive schemes, thefts of all sorts, which are like so many snares (symbol of the allures of passion, cf. E. Feuillatre, Etudes sur les Ethiopiennes d’Héliodore, Paris, 1966, p. 80), whose deceits the greedy cannot resist; once taken, they cannot free themselves again. The Qumranians have those who act stupidly fall into snares (1QH 4.12; cf. 3.26); more specifically, “The three snares of Belial . . . luxury, wealth, profanation of the sanctuary. The one who escapes one will be caught by the other” (CD 4.15–19; cf. 1QM 14.9; H. Kosmala, “The Three Nets of Belial,” in ASTI, Leiden, 1965, pp. 91–113). For Lucian, the snares that accompany wealth are thieves, envy, and the hatred of the multitude (Lucian, Nav. 27).

³ The expression is from the Wisdom writings: “Aman fell into the snare” (Tob 14:10); Prov 12:13; Sir 9:3; 38:15—“The one who sins in the presence of the One who made him, may he fall into the hands of a physician!”

⁴ 1Tim 3:6—ει—ς κρίμα ε—μπέση τοῦ διαβόλου; cf. Sir 29:19—“the sinner who gives himself as security . . . gives himself to lawsuits, ει—ς κρίσεις.”

⁵ 1Tim 3:7; 6:9. This metaphorical usage of ε—μπίπτω ει—ς is common in biblical and secular language: one falls into trouble (Prov 13:17; 17:20; 28:14; Sir 3:26), into oblivion (Wis 16:11), into captivity (Isa 10:4), into discouragement (Xenophon, Hell. 7.5.6), difficulties (P.Edfou 5, 20), a painful condition (P.Brem. 48, 26; Josephus, Ant. 4.293; 7.322; 10.212; 18.118; Life 46, 409), sickness (P.Col.Zen. 10, 2; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 18, 16; honorific decree of Samos for a physician, second century BC, in J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. 14, 15; Josephus, Ant. 13.422; 17.146), folly (P.Tebt. 758, 4).

⁶ 2Macc 10:35—“They massacre whoever appears before them”; Prov 17:12 (Hebrew pagash); Amos 5:19 (Hebrew paga'); P.Oxy. 2148, 13: ε—άν δέ σοι ε—μπέση ὀψαρίδιν σιναπηρόν, ἀγόρασον (AD 27); Josephus, Ant. 16.194; War 1.31, 142; 4.180; 5.291; in the sense of “it falls one’s lot,” Judg 18:1; cf. P.Ant. 44, 6.

⁷ P.Tebt. 39, 20: “I met Sisois here, near the temple of Zeus” (second century BC); P.Phil. 35, 22.

⁸ —Εμπίπτω often means “attack.” Jos. Azen. 27.6: “They fell upon them”; Josephus, Ant. 19.14; War 2.508; 3.294; 6.368; P.Ryl. 68, 9: “attacking me in the course of an argument, they dealt me numerous blows” (89 BC); P.Tebt. 772, 2: grasshoppers invade and destroy everything. Cf. Menander, Dysk. 525: “I pounced on the task, ε—μπεσὼν πολύς.” The Bible provides no example of the financial sense “pay out, spend,” cf. P.Lille 16, 5: “He told me that it was impossible for the forty drachmas to be paid to the treasury, that they had to be paid to the account of Hermaphilos”; 1, col. II, 5, 17, 20; P.Tebt. 17, 9; P.Oxy. 494, 21.

⁹ 2Sam 24:14; 2Chr 21:13; 2Macc 10:17; Sus 23; Sir 2:18; 8:1; Gos. Pet. 48, the centurion and his entourage: “It would be better for us to be guilty of the most enormous crime before God than to fall into the hands of the Jewish people.” At Antinoöpolis in the sixth century AD: μὴ ε—μπεσει—ν ει—ς χει—ρας τοῦ δεσπότη μου (SB 9616, recto 7). For “those men who fall into our hands” in P.Tebt. 703, 220, we have simply τὰ ε—μπίπτοντα (third century BC); cf. 2Macc 12:24; Josephus, Life 303.

ε—νέχω

enecho, to hold a grudge, be unhappy, irritated, resentful; to be liable (to prosecution), be subject

enecho, S 1758; TDNT 2.828; EDNT 1.454; NIDNTT 2.142; MM 214; L&N 39.4, 88.169; BDF §308; BAGD 265

It is not easy to translate this compound verb in its two Gospel occurrences. To explain that Herodias was intent on killing John the Baptist, Mark 6:19 notes, “eneichen auto,” that is, she held a grudge against him, harbored ill feelings against him, or better yet, had it in for him. In effect, we understand the object cholon (“bile, choler, resentment, hatred”).¹ On the one hand, however, enecho has softened and even positive meanings;² and on the other hand, in Gen 49:23 it translates the Hebrew satam (“they harassed him by shooting arrows at him”). This could be the nuance in Luke 11:53—“The scribes and the Pharisees began to be terribly unhappy (deinos enechein) and to provoke him to speak on many topics, setting traps for him.”³ Osty’s translation, which harmonizes with Mark 6:19, is preferable: “they began to be very resentful” (“se mirent à en avoir assez”).

This verb, whether transitive or intransitive, expresses a certain fixity in a place or in feelings, especially in the passive: “sink into, be put or held in, keep oneself in,”⁴ hence “be bound by oaths” (Pausanias 3.24.7), “be subject to” (Aeschylus, Suppl. 169); and hence its legal usage: be subject to the law, be liable to prosecution, incur punishments.⁵ This meaning of being charged, the object of prosecution or sanctions, is the most common meaning in the papyri, especially in decrees of amnesty. For example, in 163 or 186 BC, there is this decree of Ptolemy VI Philometor (or of Ptolemy V Epiphanes): “charged with brigandage or other grounds for prosecution”;⁶ one from Ptolemy Euergetes II in 145/144: “those who fled . . . because they were objects of prosecution” (C.Ord.Ptol. 41, 4; cf. SEG IX, 5,39; XVI, 784, 7); or this one from Ptolemy Euergetes II and Cleopatra II (his sister) and III (his wife), in 118: “except for those guilty of murder or sacrilege.”⁷ According to another formulation: “Whoever denounces before the *stratego*i of the nome those who contravene these arrangements shall obtain a third of the property of the one charged.”⁸

There is no analogous usage of the verb enecho in the NT, but the legal-social meaning of the present passive imperative, “be engaged in,” is well attested in Gal 5:1—“Do not submit again to the yoke of servitude” (me palin zygo douleias enechesthe). The best parallels are: Ep. Arist. 16—the king “frees those held in servitude” (ton enechomenon); P.Flor. 382, 31—the one who is compelled to undertake leitourgiai (enechesthai tais leitourgiais); Josephus, Ant. 18.179—“he was bound with chains” (desmois eneicheto); cf. BGU 473, 7.

¹ Herodotus 1.118: Astyages, hiding his resentment against Harpagus (κρύπτων τὸν ε—νει—χε χόλον); 6.119: King Darius strongly resented them (Datis and Artaphernes, ε—νει—χέ σφι δεινὸν χόλον). Cf. Philodemus of Gadara, Ir. 30.21: ε—νέχομαι ὀργαί—ς = be consumed with anger. F. Field, Notes on the Translation, pp. 28f., 64.

² Herodotus 1.190: “Cyrus was at a loss (ἀπορίησι ε—νείχετο) because of the length of time that had passed”; 7.128: “Xerxes was greatly astonished” (ε—ν θαύματι μεγάλῳ ε—νέσχετο); 9.37: “marveled at his boldness” (ε—ν θώματι μεγάλῳ ε—νέχεσθαι); Pindar, Pyth. 8.59: receive favorable messages; Xenophon, Cyn. 10.7; Plutarch, Pomp. 71.8: ἠνείχοντο τὰς πληγὰς; PSI 1122, 17: ε—νέχομαι τὴν τοῦ οἴνου καλλωνήν.

³ After the French of M. J. Lagrange (“Les Scribes et les Pharisiens commencèrent à être terriblement mécontents et à le faire parler sur diverse choses, lui tendant des pièges,” Evangile selon saint Luc) who comments correctly: “Enechein was so little known that the ancient translators just made their best guess: Bohairic ‘observe maliciously’; Sahidic ‘provoke’; Sinaitic and Curetonian Syriac ‘it was painful’; Peshitta, ‘be unhappy’; Armenian, ‘irritated’—not to mention the Latin variants: Vulgate insistere, f contristare, b d q male habere, cei graviter habere, etc. There is no reason to depart from the meaning in Mark 6:19. In Gen 49:23, ε—νει—χον translates safam, which was translated ε—νεκότει (Gen 27:41) and μνησικακήση (Gen 50:15), hence ‘have something against,’ ‘feel irritation against someone,’ and since here there is no object, ‘be irritated.’” A. Loisy and P. Joüon translate “to press him hard” (“le presser vivement”); M. Goguel, H. Monnier “set at him fiercely” (“se mirent avec acharnement”); E. Delebecque (Evangile de Luc): “went at him with furious determination” (“commencèrent à furieusement s’acharner contre lui”).

⁴ Herodotus 2.128: “the thief is caught in the trap” (τῆ πάγῃ ε—νέχεσθαι); Plato, Tht. 147 d; Xenophon, An. 7.4.17: “some were caught, suspended by their shields from these stakes”; Plutarch, Quaest. conv. 2.3.1: “be a follower of Orphic doctrines” (ε—νέχεσθαι δόγμασιν); Josephus, Ant. 3.262; P.Oxy. 1867, 13–14: “Hold him back.”

⁵ Andocides, Myst. 1.44: “their guarantors were subject to the same penalties” (ε—νέχεσθαι); Aeschines, In Ctes. 3.175: “Solon thought that those who dodged service, deserters, and cowards should receive the same punishment”; Plato, Leg. 6.762 d: “he will be judged according to the same laws”; 9.881 d: “according to the law, he will incur Zeus’s curse”; 11.935 c; Critias 52 a; Plutarch, Them. 1.3: “Heracles found himself sullied by illegitimacy”; Ti. Gracch. 10.7: “Octavius fell at the law’s blow” (ε—νεχόμενον τω— νόμῳ); Josephus, War 1.505: “a man against whom serious accusations had been lodged” (ε—νεχόμενον); 1.537: “convicted (ε—νέχωνται), they deserved death”; 5.553; Ant. 2.320.

⁶ Διὰ τὸ ε—νέχεσθαι λείαις ἢ ἄλλαις αἰ—τίαις καταπορεύεσθαι, SB 9316, col. I, 3 = C.Ord.Ptol. 34; cf. ibid. 35, 3 = P.Kroll: “Whereas we have granted amnesty to all who have been guilty of involuntary or intentional infractions” (πάντας τοὺς ε—νεσχημένους); UPZ 111, 3.

⁷ P.Tebt. 5, 5 = C.Ord.Ptol. 53, col. I, 5; cf. 53 bis, 7; 53 ter, 6; BGU 1051, 34: ε—νέχισθαι τω— ὀρισμίνῳ προστίμῳ (period of Augustus); P.Oxy. 237, col. VIII, 18: τοι—ς τεταγμένοις ε—πιτίμοις ε—νεχόμενος = subject to legal penalties; P.Giss. 48, 14; Dittenberger, Syl. 279, 26: ε—νεχέσθων τω— ψηφίσματι; P.Köln 52, 40: οὐκ ε—νσχεθήσομαι = I will not be subject to this order; P.Oxy. 3113, 19: a man remains subject, held to the obligation to keep the children of a deceased person; SB 6152, 25; 6153, 27; 7404, 27; 10466, 4 and 7.

⁸ Decree of Cleopatra VII and Ptolemy VIII, in 79 BC, τῆς τοῦ ε—νσχεθησομένου οὐσίας τὸ τρίτον μέρος (BGU 1730, 12 = SB 7419 = C.Ord.Ptol. 73); likewise P.Tebt. 700, 51; BGU 1212, 19 = C.Ord.Ptol. 82; P.Ross.Georg. V, 36, 8.

ἐντευξις, ε—ντυγχάνω

enteuxis, audience, meeting, prayer, supplication, petition; entynchano, to meet, address, converse with, lodge a complaint, make a request

enteuxis, S 1783; TDNT 7.244–445; EDNT 1.458; NIDNTT 2.860–861; MM 218; L&N 33.347; BAGD 268 | entynchano, S 1793; TDNT 8.242–244; EDNT 1.461–462; NIDNTT 2.882; MM 219; L&N 33.169, 33.347; BDF §202; BAGD 270

The first meaning of entynchano is “meet, reach, appear before someone”;¹ hence, “address someone, have a conversation with someone on this or that subject” (Polybius 4.30.1; 4.36.9; Plutarch, Fab. 20.2). Thus, “Conformably to what you wrote about Zeno, I interviewed Aphthometos” the strategos (the latter being the military and civil governor of the nome, or province—P.Ryl. 568, 4 = SB 7651); “Someone wants to approach you . . . to ask for my daughter” (Menander, Dysk. 751; cf. 73); “He met [and asked a favor of] King Eumenes” (NCIG, vol. 7, 1, 4); the assembly of the Jews addresses Festus concerning Paul;² and before putting a prayer into words one puts oneself in the presence of God and addresses oneself to him.³ This interview, when it makes reference to a third party (notably in the course of an audience) most usually has the goal of complaining and accusing; ho enteteuchos is the complainant (UPZ 118, 23; cf. 1Macc 10:64—hoi entynchanontes; P.Oxy. 2281, 3: entychontos kai eipontos; 2340, 3; 2576, 3; 2730, 10; Dittenberger, Or. 664, 10), one who takes action against someone; we could translate “the accuser.”⁴ This person sometimes proceeds with a modicum of discretion, but usually with violence⁵ and the intention to cause harm (P.Ryl. 563, 5).

Coming before someone to speak with him can be motivated by a more precise intention, namely to express a request. Thus entynchano can mean “pray, ask, beseech”: “Moses met with God in an invisible fashion to ask him to save them . . .” (Philo, Moses 1.173); “I greet you, brother, and I ask . . .” (se, adelphe, aspazomai kai entynchano, P.Brem. 10, 5; second century AD); “We have besought your virtue before, Lord” (P.Thead. 20, 3); “night and day I plead with God on your behalf” (nyktos kai hemeras entynchano to theo hyper hymon, BGU 246, 12). It is with this connotation of intercession that Rom 8:27, 34 and Heb 7:25 say that the Holy Spirit and Christ as priest intervene on behalf of Christians (hyper hemon, auton, hagian). We can understand this to mean that they are personages who are particularly qualified to appeal for divine mercy; but given the semantics of enteuxis, and especially in Hebrews, the emphasis is on the audience that the Second and the Third Persons of the Trinity obtain with the First (cf. Rom 8:26—hyperentynchano). It is more than a meeting: it is a presence, an intervention with the maximum possible influence (asking can be synonymous with ordaining, P.Mich. 522, 4). It is precisely the eternal priest-king after the order of Melchizedek who has the credence with God to take in hand the cause of his disciples and solicit for them the gift of grace; the mere presence of his humanity in heaven is in itself a perpetual enteuxis.

The noun enteuxis also has the sense of a meeting or interview (2Macc 4:8; an OT hapax; cf. Diodorus Siculus 17.76.3; 17.114.2), but its two occurrences in the NT have the sense of “prayer, supplication.”⁶ 1Tim 2:1—“I ask in the first place that supplications (deeseis), prayers (proseuchas), intercessions (enteuxeis), and thanksgivings (eucharistias) be made for all people, for kings . . .” (cf. 1Tim 4:5). This relationship of prayer-enteuxis and gratitude agrees with the formula in the papyri.⁷ The official request, according to O. Guéraud (P.Entreux., pp. xxiiff.), would be in three parts: (a) a summary of the facts that motivate the petition,⁸ the applicant being the victim of an injustice: adikoumai hypo . . ., I have been wronged by ... (P.Entreux. 1, 1; 2, 2; 3, 1; etc.); (b) the petition per se: deomai oun sou, I therefore request of you;⁹ (c) a kind of thanks in advance, because in giving satisfaction to the applicant, the sovereign will be doing a deed of justice, benevolence, or “philanthropy.”

This petition was normally presented in writing¹⁰ by the plaintiff, who delivered it in person to the office of the strategos. The latter sent it with his instructions to the competent authorities (P.Sorb. 11, 1: “We have sent you the enteuxis that Kalippos delivered to us. . . . Look into the matter”), who follow the instructions given. Sometimes the epistates did what was necessary to obtain justice for the plaintiff, sometimes he attempted to reconcile the two parties. In case of a deadlock, he sent the matter back to the strategos, who could have the case heard by a tribunal; but in some cases the originator of the complaint did not show up when called (P.Mich. 534, 8, 10). All this took time, especially since petitions flooded in,¹¹ sometimes being repeated by impatient applicants.¹² We get the idea that the officials were negligent.¹³ But when they did take action, they had to take counter-complaints into account (P.Oxy. 2597; P.Mert. 59, 19), and even when they were condemned, the guilty often took no notice.¹⁴

These misadventures of human justice would be out of place in the petitions of Christians to God. When they pray, it is not to complain about a third party, but to plead for personal help. In their request, they can already express their gratitude for the expected answer.¹⁵ Thus their supplication is itself a form of worship.¹⁶ They are no longer asking favors of earthly “kings.” Rather, they are praying for them to the Lord of heaven! This is one of the greatest points of difference with enteuxeis here below.

¹ Dan 6:13—“They went to find the king”; 2Macc 4:36. Questioning an oracle in the first century, the applicant asks “Should I remain at Bacchias? Will I meet him?” (P.Fay. 137, 3); P.Col.Zen. 51, 9: ε—νέτυχον Διογένη; BGU 1774, 15 (first century BC); P.Harr. 62, 16 (second century AD); P.Fouad 24, 2; P.Ryl. 653, 2; Plutarch, Cleom. 32.2; C. Gracch. 6.4; Dem. 8.1.

² Acts 25:24; P.Mich. 74, 2: “I spoke with Chairon about the wine from Chios” (third century BC); Ep. Arist. 174: give an audience. One informs the person one is talking with (P.Thead. 13, 5; P.Panop.Beatty 2, 112). In this sense of “take cognizance” (P.Apoll. 29, 1; Chrestomathie 2, 372, col. V, 2), ε—ντυγχάνω becomes synonymous with “read” (2Macc 2:25; 6:12; 15:39). Cf. Philo, Spec. Laws 4.161; Josephus, Ant. 1.15: “I exhort those who read these books . . .”; 12.226; P.Michael. 26, 8; Chrestomathie 1, 26, 29: ἔντυχε βιβλειδίῳ δοθέντι μοι (second century AD). Cf. R. Laqueur, Quaestiones Epigraphicae et Papyrologicae Selectae, Strasbourg, 1904, pp. 15ff.

³ Wis 8:20—ε—νέτυχον τῷ κυρίῳ καὶ ε—δεήθην αὐτοῦ; 16:28.

⁴ 1Macc 8:32; 10:61, 63, 64; 11:25; Rom 11:2—“Elijah complained to God about Israel.” The papyrological attestations are myriad: a request is presented (P.Oxy. 1160, 19, 21; P.Oxf. 4, 14; P.Ryl. 678, 10) to the king (UPZ 15, 7; 42, 16; 111, 8; SB 7447, 4), to the prefect (P.Mert. 18, 29; P.Fam.Tebt. 24, 41; SB 8444, 5: an edict of the prefect Tiberius Julius Alexander, 28 September 68: “I have formally decreed, concerning each of these requests, that which I am permitted to judge and to do”; a decree of the prefect L. Lusius Gete, in 54: “The priests of the god Soknopaios presented me with a request, saying that they were being forced to farm; I exempted them,” SB 8900, 10 = Dittenberger, Or. 664); to the strategos (P.Fouad 26, 18), to the viceroy (P.Fam.Tebt. 37, 16; P.Oxy. 2563), to the king (ibid. 43, 41), to the procurator (P.Oxy. 533, 25; UPZ 113, 8), to the governor (SB 8947, 3; MAMA VIII, 554, 11). An argument for a client may take such a form as this: “This man is an Arsinoite. When he suffered blows, violence, and extortion, he brought a complaint against Chairemon . . .” (P.Mich. 365, 8; cf. 423, 2; 425, 10; 426, 12). Cf. F. Uebel, “Eingabe eines Grauensvormunds,” in P.Coll.Youtie, p. 218.

⁵ P.Rein. 7, 16: “My adversary attacked me before N . . . , the governor of the nome, and harrassed me, accusing me . . .” (second century BC); C.P.Herm. 20, 17: “I made this enteuxis against them to my lord . . . that they might be greatly punished”; P.Oxy. 2597, 7: οὐ κάμνει δέ σου ὁ ἀντίδικος ε—ντυγχάνων.

⁶ For secular literary usage, cf. Ep. Arist. 252: the king “gives satisfaction with discernment to the requests presented”; Philo, Worse Attacks Better 92: “the spirit permits us to address to the One Who Is requests and appeals (ε—ντεύξεις καὶ ε—κβοήσεις)”; Plutarch, Num. 14.12—the lawgiver wanted to get us used to not making our prayers to the divinity (μὴ ποιει—σθαι τὰ πρὸς τὸ θει—ον ε—ντεύξεις) when we are busy and in passing, like people in a hurry”; Ps.-Plutarch, Cons. ad Apoll. 1: ε—ντυγχάνειν σοι καὶ παρακαλει—ν. Clement of Rome defines his letter as an invitation (κατὰ τὴν ἔντευξιν) to peace and harmony (1Clem. 63.2).

⁷ “The use of this word in 1Tim 2:1, 4:5 is readily explained by its constant recurrence in the papyri and inscriptions as a kind of ‘vox sollemnis’ for a ‘petition’ of any kind” (see Moulton-Milligan on this word). Cf. P. Collomp, Recherches sur la chancellerie et la diplomatie des Lagides, Paris, 1926, pp. 51ff.; O. Guéraud, ENTEΥΞΕΙΣ: Requêtes et plaints adressées au roi d’Egypte au IIIe siècle avant J.-C., Cairo, 1931; M. T. Cavassini, “Exemplum vocis ε—ντεύξεις in ‘Repertorio papyrorum graecorum,’ quae documenta tradunt Ptolemaicae aetatis,” in Aeg. 1955, pp. 299–324; R. Böhm, L’Enteuxis de Warsaw (Papyrus Edfou VIII), Wiesbaden, 1955 (= SB 9302; cf. G. Manteuffel, “Quelques textes provenant d’Edfou,” in JJP, 1949, pp. 103–105); A. diBitonto, “Le Petizioni al Re: Studio sul formulario,” in Aeg. 1967, pp. 5–57; idem, “Le Petizioni ai funzionari nel periodo tolemaico: Studio sul formulario,” JJP, 1968, pp. 53–107; H. J. Mason, Greek Terms, p. 43.

⁸ These requests have to do with inheritances and wills (P. Enteux. 16–19), a dowry (23), usurpation of a dwelling (11), theft (28–32), salary (47–48), leases and contracts (54–63), acts of violence (82–83), ungrateful children (25–26), complaints against functionaries of the nome administration (C. Ord. Ptol. 76, 13), etc.

⁹ P. Enteux. 2, 6; 3, 6; 4, 7; P. Tebt. 769, 67; P. Yale 46, col. II, 2, etc. . . . The verb δέομαι is regularly used with respect to the sending of an enteuxis: δέομαι ἀποστειλαί μου τὴν ἔντευξιν (P. Fay. 11, 24; 12, 26; P. Tebt. 43, 33; 771, 22; P. Yale 57, 8; etc).

¹⁰ Cf. P. Hib. 205, 31; P. Paris 26, 5 (= G. Milligan, Selections from the Greek Papyri, Cambridge, 1927, n. 5). The requests were thus passed along from functionary to functionary (UPZ 107, 5; 108, 2; SB 8396, 14; 9897, recto 18; 10766, 5).

¹¹ On 28 September 68, Tiberius Julius Alexander declares, “Farmers from the whole country have often sent petitions to me” (SB 8444, 46). The same happens in 232–236, P. Mich. 529, 43ff. and the edict of Avidius

Heliodorus (P.Oxy. 2954, 14). The outstanding quality of Demetrios, secretary of the federal council of the Magnesians: “To those who needed a service and applied to him (ε—ντυγγάνουσιν), he never failed to show himself even-handed for all” (honorific decree, in SEG XXIII, 447, 10).

¹² An annotation by the strategos or one of his secretaries, “let him not present several petitions on the same topic” (P.Enteux. 75, 16). King Ptolemy VI, after ordering an amnesty, asks the strategos to “take care that when we have arrived people do not come to appeal to us as having been really wronged” (C.Ord.Ptol. 35, 9).

¹³ “I previously presented my request to Diophanes the strategos, informing him of various things. . . . My request was duly recommended. . . . Up to the present he has showed no interest at all in me” (P.Enteux. 85, 2–3). “I pray you, then, O greatest gods, do not show yourselves indifferent to the ambush in which this merciless man caught me, but take action on my behalf and, if you think it good, grant that my petition may come before Apollodoros, one of the king’s leading friends, the epistates . . .” (P.Rein. 7, 27). Cf. P.Oxy. 2754, 9.

¹⁴ “I complained about them to Statios the epistates, but they took no notice” (P.Enteux. 54, 7; cf. 63, 11). P.Hib. 205, 30–31; P. University of California, inv. 1583, 5, ed. J. G. Keenan, “Petition from a Prisoner,” in P.Coll.Youtie I, p. 97; cf. H. J. Wolff, Das Justizwesen der Ptolemäer, Munich, 1962, p. 174, n. 50.

¹⁵ There is no reason to see in the eucharistia of 1Tim 2:1 the celebration of the Eucharist. We must remember that thanksgivings came at the end of Jewish prayers (J. Bonsirven, Judaïsme palestinien, vol. 2, p. 149; J. M. Robinson, “Die Hodajot-Formel in Gebet und Hymnus des Frühchristentums,” in Festschrift E. Haenchen, Berlin, 1964, pp. 224, 231) and that Roman supplications were not only propitiatory or expiatory but conveyed thanksgiving; these latter were of considerable importance in the first century (L. Halkin, La Supplication d’action de grâces chez les Romains, Paris, 1953). Cf. S. Lyonnet, “Expiation et intercession,” in Bib., 1959, pp. 897ff. P. Wiles, Paul’s Intercessory Prayers, Cambridge, 1974, p. 18.

¹⁶ Cf. at the beginning of the first century the association προσκυνέω—ε—ντυγγάνω (P.Oxy. 2435, 61; SB 9788, 3).

ε—ντολή

entole, commandment, precept, instruction

see also παραγγελία, παραγγέλλω

entole, S 1785; TDNT 2.545–556; EDNT 1.459–460; NIDNTT 1.330–337; MM 218; L&N 33.330; BAGD 269

The imperative force of entole, “commandment, precept,” inherited from the OT (cf. Gen 26:5; Deut 8:1), is still present in the NT (John 11:57), even though “order” is better conveyed by epitage (Rom 16:16; 1Cor 7:6, 25; Titus 2:15). Still, in numerous Johannine texts, notable in the “farewell discourses,” where the commandment to love is given (John 13:34; 14:21, 23; 15:10, 14), it is tempting to weaken the word’s legal connotations.¹

The tension is mitigated by the observation that in literary texts entole sometimes means a pedagogical precept² and that in the Koine the term can mean “mandate.”³ In public law, it is applied to constitutions, laws, decrees, edicts, rules of the public administration, royal and imperial orders;⁴ sometimes it can mean a simple recommendation, like that of Cyrus to Chrysentas when he sends him on a mission (Xenophon, Cyr. 2.4.30) or like that which Ausonios received concerning the piety of his father Papnuthios (P.Lond. 1924, 3; cf. P.Sarap. 92, 14; SB 6823, 18; 7987, 9; 9156, 4). Sometimes it corresponds to the mandata principis of the Romans.⁵ Entolai are the instructions given by a city or a person to representatives,⁶ or communicated by a prince to his officers, either to delineate their responsibilities⁷ or to inform their subalterns and the populace, “to be carried out.”⁸

Clearly a number of the Johannine “commandments” (several times logos is substituted for entole, 1John 2:4-5; Rev 3:8, 10; 12:17; etc.) must be understood according to these meanings. Jesus received them from the Father, and he passes them on to his apostles, whom he installs in their office. These are precepts, to be sure, but they have as much to do with doctrine (1John 3:23) as with morality, and they are intended for publication among all believers so as to ground their thoughts and their conduct.⁹ Finally, since Christ has suppressed the “law of commandments” (Eph 2:15), the entole of agape epitomizes the institution of the new covenant, “the law of Christ.”¹⁰

¹ W. von Loewenich, “Johanneisches Denken: Ein Beitrag zur Erkenntnis der johanneischen Eigenart,” in Theologische Blätter, 1936, col. 273; L. A. Winterswyl, Mandatum Novum: Über Wesen und Gestalt christlicher Liebe, Colmar, 1941, pp. 11–12. But in the OT, “law” is the expression of the sovereign will of God in establishing a rule of conduct for humans (M. J. O’Connell, “The Concept of Commandment in the Old Testament,” in TS, 1960, pp. 361–403; on the link between νόμος and ἐντολή, cf. S. Aalen, “A Rabbinic Formula in I Cor. XIV, 33,” in F. L. Cross, SE, vol. 2, Berlin, 1964, pp. 513–525; N. Lazure, Les Valeurs morales de la théologie johannique, Paris, 1965, pp. 124–145). A precept applies just as much to internal sentiments as to external manifestations—ἀγάπη δὲ τήρησις νόμων αὐτῆς (σοφίας)—and mitzvah is often used with the meaning “charity”; cf. B. Lifschitz, Synagogues juives, pp. 75, 78.

² Plato, Chrm. 157 c; Pindar, frag. 54, 3 (ed. A. Puech).

³ P.Oxy. 2771, 4, 6, 10 (mandate given by a woman to her husband); P.Cair.Isid. 2, 5: “making this declaration on my mother’s mandate”; SB 7623, 5; P.Yale 40, 10; P.Lips. 38, col. I, 3–4: a mandate entrusted to an attorney who represents his client before tribunals (cf. N. Hohlwein, L’Egypte romaine, Brussels, 1912, p. 221; P. Collinet, La Procédure par libelle, Paris, 1922, pp. 70ff., 79ff.). It seems that Sir 39:31 should be translated “They derive joy from carrying out the Lord’s mandates.”

⁴ P.Tebt. 6, 10. At the market of Oxyrhynchus trivial rulings happen each day (P.Oslo 49, 8). Addressed to numerous recipients who take cognizance of them, these entolai are “circulars” (P.Lille 3, 55, 71; P.Sorb. 34, 13; UPZ 106; P.Cair.Zen. 59491; BGU 1794; P.Tebt. 26–27, 707). Cf. C. B. Welles, Royal Correspondence, p. 331; P. Collomp, “La Lettre à plusieurs destinataires,” in Proceedings IV, pp. 199–207; E. Bickerman, Institutions des Séleucides, p. 192. Idem, “Notes sur la chancellerie des Lagides,” in RIDA, 1953, pp. 251–267; M. T. Lenger, “Les Vestiges de la législation des ptolémées en Egypte à l’époque romaine,” in Mélanges F. de Visscher, Brussels, 1940, pp. 69–81.

⁵ UPZ 106, 109; P.Tebt. 703. R. Taubenschlag, The Law of Greco-Roman Egypt in the Light of the Papyri, New York, 1944, p. 9, n. 35 b; L. Wenger, Die Quellen des römischen Rechts, Vienna, 1953, p. 425. The Latin equivalent for entole is mandatum, cf. H. J. Mason, Greek Terms, pp. 43, 126, 131.

⁶ The people, sending Demades as ambassador to Alexander, gave him instructions (δοῦς ἐ—ντολήν) to ask . . . (Diodorus Siculus 17.15.4). In 160/159 BC, representatives “addressed (to Eumenes II of Pergamum) requests in line with the instructions that they had been given, κατὰ τὰς δεδομένας αὐτοί—ς ἐ—ντολάς” (Fouilles de Delphes, III, 3, n. 239, 10); in 216 BC, in a decree of the Acarnanians, the representatives comply with the instructions received, κατὰ τὰς δοθείσας αὐτοί—ς ἐ—ντολάς” (IG IX, I2, n. 583, 23); P.Cair.Zen. 59188, 7; P.Princ. 163, 5; 167, 7 (καθὼς ἐ—ντέιλιάς μοι); 188, 20; C.Pap.Jud. 442, 21; P.Paris 65, 18; P.Tebt. 413, 7: “Do not imagine, madam, that I am neglecting your instructions”;

C.P.Herm. 11, 4: “I am amazed at how you have forgotten my instructions”; SB 10529, 13, 27.

⁷ According to Dio Cassius 53.15.4, Caesar Augustus gave “several instructions (ε—ντολάς τινας) to the procurators, the proconsuls, and propraetors so that when they went to their provinces their functions would be well delineated” (cf. G. P. Burton, “The Issuing of Mandata to Proconsuls and a New Inscription from Cos,” in ZPE, vol. 21, 1976, pp. 63–68). These are directives or memoranda; cf. the “excerpt from the ordinances of Emperor Domitian addressed to the procurator Claudius Athenodorus: ε—ξ ε—ντολω—ν αὐτοκράτορος . . .” (IGLS, n. 1998, 1 and 22); B. Grenfell, A. S. Hunt, New Classical Fragments, Oxford, 1897, n. 37, 7: ὁ τὴν ε—ντολήν ε—πιδεικνύσας (for the installation of a functionary); E. P. Wegener, “The Entolai of Mettius Rufus . . . Note on A. Kränzlein’s Article in J. J. P. 1952, pp. 195–237,” in Eos (Symbolae R. Taubenschlag), 1956, pp. 331–353 (= SB 9050, V).

⁸ IGLAM 841 (reedited by L. Robert, Etudes anatoliennes, p. 301); P.IFAO III, n. 54, 1 (instructions from the office of the recorder); P.Hib. 205, 33; SB 9050, 5, 1. Augustus had chosen a council “to look after the interests of the Jews, according to the instructions given to Magius Maximus” (Philo, Flacc. 74). U. Wilcken (UPZ I, pp. 457ff.) compares ε—ντολή to πρόγραμμα: an ordinance given to a functionary with the order to publish it.

⁹ 1John 3:11 calls the commandment to love a message (ἀγγελία; cf. 1:5; παραγγελία, 1Tim 1:5, 18), which derives from the Lord himself (1John 4:21). A. Pelletier, (Josèphe adaptateur, Paris, 1962) differentiates between the different connotations of the various terms for commandment (ε—πιτάτω, προστάτω, κελεύω, παραγγέλλω, προστίθημι), notes the increased use of ε—ντέλλομαι-ε—ντολή in the Hellenistic era, and cites a text of Philo on obedience (preserved in a Vatican manuscript, Barberini VI, 8 f. 101): the first quality of the just is to carry out that which is commanded in a spirit of courage and piety toward God; the second degree is not to wait for God to command rather than invite, because “to command, give orders, is what masters do with slaves; but invite is what friends do (ε—ντέλλονται δὲ φίλοι)” (p. 284). This hortatory sense of entole derives from its being synonymous with παραίνεσις and opposed to “order” and “prohibition” in Alleg. Interp. 1.93–96 (commentary on Gen 2:16–17); cf. A. Pelletier, “Le Vocabulaire du commandement dans le Pentateuque des Septante,” in RSR, 1953, p. 522. Cf. P.Oxy. 1664, 11, where commands from a friend are considered to be favors, τὰς γὰρ ε—ντολάς σου ἥδιστα ἔχων ὡς χάριτας λήμψομαι (third century AD).

¹⁰ Gal 6:2; cf. 1Tim 6:14; 2Pet 2:21; Rev 12:17; 14:12. Entole reconnects the meaning of νόμος in the Pentateuch of the LXX and its Hebrew equivalent: divine revelation or covenant as teaching or instruction rather than as ordering or commanding, cf. L. M. Pasinya, La notion de "Nomos" dans la Pentateuque grec, Rome, 1973, pp. 141ff.

ε—ξαιρέω, ε—ξαιρέομαι

exaireo, to extract, cut out, destroy, exclude, set aside; exaireomai, to remove, take away

see also περιαιρέω

exaireo, S 1807; EDNT 2.1; MM 221; L&N 85.43; BDF §81(3); BAGD 271 | exaireomai, L&N 21.17, 30.90

Formed from the simple verb aireo, “take, remove, seize,” the verb exaireo is used five times in the NT. Only one of these occurrences is in the active voice, a second aorist imperative: “If your right eye offends you, pluck it out (exele auton) and cast it away” (Matt 5:29). The right eye was presumed to be more precious, so it was the one to go after in an enemy: “that I gouge out the right eyes of all of you” (1Sam 11:2); “May the sword strike his arm and his right eye” (Zech 11:17); “to gouge out their right eyes” (dexious auton ophthalmous exoryxai, Josephus, Ant. 6.71; cf. Plutarch, De Is.et Os. 55.372e: Typhon gouges out Horus’s eye). The best parallel is from the dream of Charicleia in the third century: “With a sword stroke, a man plucked out his right eye.”¹

This usage of exaireo with the meaning “extract, cut out” agrees with its classical meaning;² but in classical usage there is also the nuance “destroy, devastate” a city or a people,³ and finally “exclude, set aside,” which is the meaning in Matt 5:29. Cf. Herodotus 3.150: “They excluded their mothers and in addition one other woman from each household”; Plato, Phdr. 242 b: “I make an exception for Simmias of Thebes”; Menander, Dysk. 578: “pull the bucket back out from the well”; 626: “fish out the hoe and the bucket”; Josephus, War 2.293: “Florus sent to the temple treasury and removed seventeen talents”; Ant. 11.41: extirpate the memory of friends;⁴ Plutarch, De sera 26.565 b.

In the Koine, the middle exaireomai retains the classical sense “remove, take away,”⁵ often with an idea of violence,⁶ and especially the meaning “deliver.”⁷ That is the meaning of the aorist middle in Acts 7:10, 34, where God delivers his people from all their trials,⁸ and in Gal 1:4, where Jesus Christ “gave himself for our sins, in order to free us (hopos exeletai hemas) from the present evil age,” to liberate us from bondage.

This idea of extracting or removing⁹ is indicated by the reflexive meaning of the middle voice, which places the beneficiaries of the act of deliverance in the hands of the agent of deliverance;¹⁰ at least this is the theological meaning that the LXX gives the verb exaireomai (Hebrew nasal)—often synonymous with sozo and rhyomai—when God is the subject.¹¹

After all, it is for the purpose of constituting a people of his own that God “descends” and frees them from Egyptian (Exod 3:8; 18:4, 8-10; Jer 34:13) or Babylonian servitude (Isa 31:5; 48:10; Jer 42:10). The God who delivers is a Savior from all trials,¹² from distress (1Sam 26:24), from calamities (Job 5:19), and especially from sin (Wis 10:13), which is the obstacle to reconciliation: “It is he who will deliver Israel from all its sins” (Ps 130:8). This is the central object of Israel’s faith: “The salvation of the righteous comes from Yahweh. . . . Yahweh helps them and delivers them.”¹³ Ps 37:40; 116:8—“You saved my soul from death”; 2Kgs 18:28-34; 2Macc 2:18—“The God who has saved all his people . . . as he promised . . . will regather us in the Holy Place, because he has redeemed us from great evils and purified the temple.” The agents of this liberation are diverse: Joshua (Josh 9:26), Saul (1Sam 14:48), David (1Sam 30:8; 2Sam 19:10), the Messiah (Nah 2:2, ε—ξαιρούμενους ε—κ θλίψεως), Wisdom (10:1, 6, 9, 15) and even all the faithful: “Deliver the weak and the poor from the hand of the wicked, snatch him away” (Ps 77:4; Sir 4:9).{NOTEEND} If God in his righteousness sometimes refuses to deliver from the hand of their enemies (Zech 11:6), it is because this salvation presupposes a good moral disposition.¹⁴ Hence prayers for divine mercy and thanksgivings for liberation, for the believer knows that all deliverance is a free gift from God: “The sons of Israel say to Yahweh, ‘We have sinned Only deign to deliver us this day.’”¹⁵

Since God delivers those whom he loves (2Sam 22:20), exaireomai, “place in reserve” (Homer, Il. 2.690), finally means “choose for oneself” (ibid. 9.129; Xenophon, An. 2.5.20); “they chose a leader among the former priests of Heliopolis” (Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.261), hence separate, set apart from others (Ant. 15.164). Thus we should understand the present middle participle: “I drew you out (chose you, exairoumenos se) from the midst of the people and from the Gentiles, to whom I send you to open their eyes” (Acts 26:17).

² Heliodorus, Aeth. 2.16.1, τὸν ὀφθαλμὸν ε—ξει—λε τὸν δεξιόν.

³ Plato, Cra. 413 e: “If one removes the d from andreia . . .”; Tht. 162 d: “I remove every affirmation from my speeches and writings”; P. Oslo 150, 20: ἔξελε τὰ ἀρτίδια. The substantive ε—ξείρεσις means “extraction” of the entrails in Herodotus 2.40, but “quay, wharf” in the Alexandrian harbor in P. Tebt. 5, 26. Cf. SB 6712, 5, οἰ—περὶ Σωσίστρατον ε—ξείλοντο τὸν σίδηρον (the extraction of iron); 8444, 41, to dismiss from court a case not yet resolved (?).

⁴ Herodotus 1.103: Cyaxares “marched on Nineveh with the intention of destroying that city”; 8.140: “You would be the only ones ruined by the passing of the troops”; Thucydides 3.113.6: “If the Acarnanians and the Amphilocheians had wished to destroy Ambracia”; 4.69.1: to invest and take Nisaea; Xenophon, Hell. 2.2.19: “We must not negotiate with the Athenians but annihilate them”; Josephus, War 3.141: “Vespasian, impatient to destroy Jotapata” (Ant. 7.290), “sent Titus to destroy Jerusalem” (4.658); “Lucilius Bassus deemed it necessary to destroy the fortress of Machaerus” (7.164); exterminate the Canaanites (Ant. 5.120); take the city of Jazora (12.329, 347).

⁵ Cf. ε—ξαιρω—; Philostratus, Gym. 1: “I withdraw the conduct of government from the class of illiberal arts.”

⁶ Homer, Il. 8.323: “Teucros drew a bitter arrow from his quiver”; Herodotus 4.196: “they unloaded the wares”; Xenophon, An. 5.1.16: “They were unloading the cargo” from the captured ships.

⁷ Homer, Il. 24.754: Achilles takes Hector’s life (ε—ξέλετο ψυχήν); 15.460; 17.678; Od. 11.201: “It is not the torment of some disease that took my life” (ε—ξείλετο θυμόν); Il. 19.137: “Zeus took away my reason”; Plato, Ion 534 c. Capture a city or fortress (Josephus, War 1.316; 1.292; 6.314; Ant. 11.325; 12.363; 13.92, 405; Life 99), destroy anation (Ant. 13.245), exterminate a nest of brigands (15.345; War 1.398), the Canaanites (Ant. 4.305; 18.318), the royalty (9.181).

⁸ Aristophanes, Pax 316: “There is no one now who can deliver me”; Aeschylus, Suppl. 924: “I will bring these women, at least if no one delivers them from me”; Polybius 1.11.11: “The concern to spare the Mamertines war”; 2Apoc. Bar. 51.14: “They were liberated from this world of sorrow; they put down their burden of sorrows”; P.Petr. 36 a recto 21: ε—ξελοῦ με ε—κ τῆς ἀνάγκης; PSI 444, 2; P.Oxy. 1151, 9; Dittenberger, Or. 762, 8.

⁹ Cf. Keniaz called to restore Israel’s freedom (Josephus, Ant. 5.182; cf. Othniel son of Kenaz at Judg 3:9). This formula, ει—ς ε—λευθερίαν ε—ξαιρει—σθαι, literally “set (a slave) aside in order to free him, emancipate him” (see, e.g., Plato, Leg. 9.914 e; M. Harl, Quis rerum divinarum heres sit, Paris, 1966, p. 149, n. 1), is used at least eight times in Philo (Heir 124, 271; Sacr. Abel and Cain 117; Spec. Laws 2.218; Migr. Abr. 25; Conf. Tongues 93; Rewards 124; To Gaius 147). For the Alexandrian, ε—ξαιρέομαι refers especially to emancipation from the passions, the necessary condition for the true life with God (Unchang. God 47; Migr. Abr. 14).

¹⁰ Homer, Od. 14.232: “I removed things that pleased me”; Philo, Worse Attacks Better 16: “remove stones (from a house) to replace them with others”; Heir 59: “God freed me from Pharaoh’s hand”; Josephus, War 2.100: remove certain objects of art from an inheritance; Ant. 1.35: God removes one of Adam’s ribs to form the woman. In the inscriptions, the verb often has the financial sense of drawing out funds placed at the disposal of officials (Dittenberger, Syl. 144, 31; Michel, Recueil, n. 827, 35).

¹¹ Cf. F. M. Abel, Grammaire, pp. 244–247: “The dominant meaning of the middle is that of action remaining in the sphere of the subject. The action goes out from the subject to return to him or to work on an object in his sphere.” In the Koine, the shades of difference between active and middle are often blurred.

¹² F. Bovon, “Une formule prépaulinienne dans l’Épître aux Galates (Gal. I, 4–5),” in Paganisme, Judaïsme, Christianisme (Mélanges M. Simon), Paris, 1978, pp. 97ff.

¹³ Gen 32:12; 37:21-22; 1Sam 17:37; 2Sam 19:6; 22:1, 20; Ps 144:7.

¹⁴ According to Deut 23:15, the camp must be clean, pure, since God walks about there to deliver Israel from its enemies; 1Sam 7:3—“If with all your heart you return to Yahweh . . . direct your heart toward Yahweh and serve him alone, so that he will deliver you from the hand of the Philistines”; Sir 29:12—love delivers from every evil; 33:1. Freed from brigands, a man went away naked, ὅτι ε—ξίλησα (read ε—ξιλάσκομαι) ε—γὼ γυμνός (P.Stras. 233, 3).

¹⁵ Judg 10:15; 1Sam 12:10; Ps 50:15—“Call upon me in the day of distress; I will deliver you and you will honor me”; 91:15; 140:2. Moses prays to God to rid their thoughts of despair (Josephus, Ant. 5.41; cf. 6.43; 11.231). “Then my prayer was answered, because you saved me from perdition, you delivered me from evil times” (Sir 51:11); “Take us out from the nations that we may give thanks to your holy name, so that we may make your praise our pride” (1Chr 16:35); Dan 3:88 (Theodotion).

ε—ξαρτίζω, καταρτίζω

exartizo, to complete, suit to a goal; katartizo, to set in place, organize, dispose of, restore, mend

see also καταρτίζω

exartizo, S 1822; TDNT 1.475–476; EDNT 2.3; NIDNTT 3.349–351; MM 222; L&N 67.71, 75.5; BAGD 273 | katartizo, S 2675; TDNT 1.475–476; EDNT 2.268; NIDNTT 3.349–350; MM 332; L&N 13.130, 42.36, 75.5; BDF §§74(1), 126(1a); BAGD 417–418

Training in the Scriptures allows the person of God to become accomplished, equipped for every good work, hina artios . . . pros pan ergon agathon exertismenos (2Tim 3:17).

(a) The biblical hapax artios, rather rare in the Koine and unknown in the papyri, literally means “adapted” or “well equipped, in proportion, fitting together perfectly.” It is also used for intact faculties as well as for speech that is appropriate for a given situation. In medicine, it is used for the newborn whose whole body is well put-together and for vertebrae that are well aligned.¹ Ambidextrous athletes have equal force and aptitude to strike with each arm (Philostratus, Gym. 41). This adjective is also known to signify “even” (Epictetus 1.28.3); as Philo comments, “four is a number that is even, complete, full.”² The ensemble of external goods, body, and soul constitutes “a good that is balanced and truly complete” (Philo, Worse Attacks Better 7; cf. Marcus Aurelius 1.16.31: artion kai aetteton psychen). So artios in 2Tim 3:17 means that the minister of the gospel has “all that is necessary,” an adequate equipping, after digesting the word of God—as the end of the verse makes clear.

(b) “Being completely equipped (perfect passive participle) for every good work.” The compound form exartizo has two meanings: “to finish, complete”;³ and “to connect perfectly, fit to perfection,⁴ adapt to a physical or moral goal.”⁵ This purpose is constantly underlined in the papyri: for example, a machine is sold in good condition, i.e., capable of performing the service expected of it (P.Athen. 17, 9: syn te ousi mechanen exertismenen pasi tois skeuesi). Thus the person of God/biblicist is not only perfect, accomplished, but suited for all the tasks of ministry.

(c) Thus exartizo is stronger than katartizo, even though the two are sometimes synonymous.⁶ The first meaning of the latter verb is “put into order, arrange an object so that it can do its work”; thus the worlds were set in place, organized, and adorned by God’s utterance.⁷ Secondly, “put in order, dispose of,” like the vessels of wrath for perdition, i.e., ripe or completely ready for apoleia (Rom 9:22). Finally, “restore, mend” nets (Matt 4:21; Mark 1:19) or rebuild walls lying in ruins (2Esdr 4:12–13); that which is lacking is supplied, for example deficiencies of faith (1Thess 3:10), a Christian who is at fault is straightened out, corrected (Gal 6:1). If katartizesthe in 2Cor 13:11 is taken as an imperative passive, the verse will mean “let yourself be led to a spiritual condition in which nothing is lacking” or “accept correction.” If it is taken as a middle, “work at your restoration, cooperate in your remaking. . . .” The root nuance of artios —ordering, adapting, adjusting—is preserved in 1Cor 1:10, where the Corinthians, divided among themselves, are exhorted to agree, to be in harmony, as persons well fitted together in the same intelligence and the same way of feeling (ete de katertismenoi).

Thus the verb became a technical term in early parenesis. The Lord had said that “every disciple who is well formed (katertismenos) will be like his master” (Luke 6:40). Heb 13:21 asks “May the God of peace make you fit for every good work to do his will” and 1Pet 5:10 assures, “The God of all grace . . . will himself equip you,” will arrange everything for the best (cf. Ps 58:9; 80:16). The semantic evolution is perfectly homogeneous.

¹ N. van Brock, Vocabulaire médical, Paris 1961, pp. 191ff.

² Philo, Plant. 125: ἄρτιον καὶ ὀλόκληρον καὶ πλήρη.

³ Acts 21:5—“When we had completed those days” (at Tyre). P.Oxy. 296, 7: πέμψον ἡμεῖς—ν περὶ τῶν βιβλίων ἡ—ε—ξήρτισα = so that you may complete it (first century AD); P.Got. 15, 3: “μέρος ε—ξηρτισμένον, the portion delivered” (two kolophonia of wine, to Theonas); Josephus, Ant. 3.139. Hence “carry out, execute”: ὁ ἀνὴρ τὸ μνημι—ον ε—ξήρτισα ε—κ τῶν ι—δίων (IGUR, vol. 2, n. 303).

⁴ Cf. the shoulder pieces in Exod 28:7.

⁵ SB 7994, 30: εὐ—ρον κελλάριον ε—ξηρτισμένον (= 9834 b 24). Used for soldiers (Josephus, Ant. 3.4), athletes (P.Oslo 55, 12), triremes (Diodorus Siculus 14.19.3) that are perfectly well equipped (cf. Diodorus Siculus 19.77.3: ten ships fully outfitted for war), especially for machines in full working order: μηχανῆ ε—ξηρτισμένη πάση ξυλικῆ καὶ σιδηρώσι (P.Oxy. 2713, 10 = PSI 1072, 10); SB 7167, 8; 9921, 7 (= P.Harr. 79); 10529, 14; P.Mich. 611, 9; to be restored in BGU 2066, 13. On the moral level, “Moses fine-tuned this legislation . . . πρὸς τρόπων ε—ξαρτισμόν” (Ep. Arist. 144).

⁶ H. T. Kuist, “Now the God of peace . . . make you perfect” (in The Biblical Review, 1932, pp. 249–258; also included in Exegetical Footnotes to the Epistle to the Hebrews, New York, n.d., pp. 16–19), pointed out the uses of καταρτίζω in secular Greek: (1) with respect to the master of a house who offers a room to his guest, he prepares it as comfortably as possible, he adapts it perfectly for the well-being of his guest (εἰ—ς τὸν τῆς ἀύλης καταρτισμόν, P.Tebt. 33, 12; from 112 BC); (2) for a woman who assembles the pieces of fabric to make a garment—she uses the same word for her completed task: the garment is ready to be worn: ἄε—δωρήσατό σοι Παυσανίας ὁ ἀδελφός σου πρὸ πολλοῦ ε—κ φιλοτιμίας αὐτοῦ κατερτισμένα (P.Oxy. 1153, 16; cf. 19; first century AD; 2593, 17: “for the cost of preparation,” second century; P.Ryl. 127, 18; from AD 29); (3) by the mistress of a house who has prepared a dish for her family and announces that it is ready to eat (Dioscorides, Alex. pref.); (4) by the pharmacist who through a happy blend of ingredients has concocted a potion to heal a sick person describes the result as κατ.; its “composition” is perfect, the remedy is ready to take (Nicander, Ther. 954); (5) by the surgeon or bonesetter who puts back into place, sets a dislocated limb, thus restoring the use of the arm or leg to the patient (Galen, ed. Kühn, vol. 19, p.461); (6) by the potter who has fashioned a vase that is ready to be delivered and used (Rom 9:22); (7) of the musician who tunes his instrument just before playing; (8) for the sailor who prepares his sailboat, for the repair of a boat (P.Panop.Beatty 1, 167, 173, 181; 2, 17); for an admiral who arms a fleet or a general who outfits an army that is ready to go into action (Polybius 1.21.4; 1.29.1; 1.36.5; 3.95.2); (9) of a treasurer who is in a position to make a payment (P.Tebt. 6, 7; 24, 48; SB 8886, 10; 8889, 10); (10) the establishment of an endowment of oil for the sacred lamps of a temple of Herakleopolis (BGU 1854, 3; first century AD); (11) the educator who has given a finished paideia to a child can let him lead his adult life (Plutarch, Alex. 7; Them. 2).

⁷ Heb 11:3; cf. Ps 74:16; Pap.Graec.Mag. 4, 1147: ὁ θεὸς . . . τὸν κόσμον καταρτισάμενος. On Heb 10:5—“You have equipped me with a body, “ compared with the Masoretic original: “You hollowed out two ears for me” (Ps 40:7), cf. the commentaries and S. Kistemaker, The Psalm Citations in the Epistle to the Hebrews, Amsterdam, 1961, pp. 43–44, 87, 141, 150.

ε—ξηγέομαι

exegeomai, to recount, narrate, explain, interpret

exegeomai, S 1834; TDNT 2.908; EDNT 2.6; NIDNTT 1.573–576; MM 223; L&N 28.41, 33.201; BDF §396; BAGD 275

In the Bible this verb, which usually translates the piel of the Hebrew sapar, clearly means “recount, narrate.”¹ It is used for telling a dream to a companion (Judg 7:13), for telling how Elisha resurrected someone who had died (2Kgs 8:5); the voice of nature tells about the glory of God (1Chr 16:24; Job 12:8; cf. 28:27); “the story was told in these writings and in the Memoirs of Nehemiah” (2Macc 2:13); “every nation talked about the battles of Judas.”² In his five uses of the word, Luke knows no other meaning.³

There is therefore no reason to substitute another meaning in John 1:18—“An Only Son, God, who is in the bosom of the Father, he has told about him.”⁴ This is the culmination of the prologue: the Gospel can be opened, it is the exegesis, the laying open, the narration of the word of God by Christ for the world. The evangelist is probably thinking of Sir 43:31—“Who then has seen the Lord and can tell about him (ekdiegesetai)?”

Nevertheless, this is a religious teaching, and the verb has no object.⁵ Furthermore, exegeomai is used thus constantly for interpreting an oracle or a dream: “Asking the god about the right way of burying the brave [war dead] and the particular honors involved, we will bury them in whatever manner the god explains” (kai thesomen he an exegetai, Plato, Resp. 5.469a4). Exegetai are those who interpret things that the divinity has communicated obscurely or without explaining.⁶ The Apollo of Delphi is “this god, the traditional interpreter (patrios exegetes) for everyone in these matters (religion). . . . He gives his explications on the omphalos” (epi tou omphalou exegeitai, ibid., 4.427c1ff.). “Theseus instructed the nobles to get to know divine things . . . to interpret secular and religious customs (hosion kai hieron exegetas)” (Plutarch, Thes. 25.2). J. Pollux gives this definition: “Exegetes was the term for those who teach about omens and other religious matters” (exegetai de ekalounto hoi ta peri ton diosemeion kai ta ton allon hieron didaskontes, Onom. 8.124); and Philo already says “Another suggestion has been made by the interpreters of Holy Scripture” (tois exegetais ton hieron grammaton, Spec. Laws 2.159). He defines further: “The explications (hai exegeeseis) of the Holy Scriptures are made according to allegorical meanings.”⁷ Similarly, in Josephus exegeomai is a “technical term for the interpretation of the law as practiced by the rabbinate.”⁸

Literary texts and the papyri associate the functions of the hiereus and the exegetes; “the pontifex maximus has the duties of exegete and interpreter, or rather of hierophant.”⁹ Appius Gemellus is city priest and exegete.¹⁰ The exegetes has been called “a jurisconsult in sacred law.”¹¹ In Egypt the exegete was high in the ranks of the archai, a veritable executive of the municipality.¹² Nowhere does exegeomai mean “give a revelation,” but rather “narrate, lay open, describe” (A. J. Festugière, Observations stylistiques sur l’Evangile de S. Jean). Thus this verse means that the Son, by his person and his teaching, presented, expressed, and gave a human translation to the divine mystery.

¹ Once ε—ξηγέομαι translates the hiphil of yadâh —the one who acknowledges his faults (Prov 28:13); and once the hiphil of yarâh —indicate, show; instruct, teach (Lev14:57).

² 1Macc 3:26. —Εξήγησις is the interpretation of a dream (Judg 7:15, Hebrew mispar), once in the pejorative sense of the “explications” or ramblings of a fool (Sir21:16).

³ Luke 24:35—the disciples of Emmaus tell what has happened on the way; Acts 10:8—the centurion Cornelius tells his servant about his vision, without leaving anything out (ἅπαντα); 15:12, 14; 21:19—Barnabas and Paul tell about the miracles that God accomplished through their ministry among the Gentiles.

⁴ —Εκει—νος ε—ξηγήσατο. The Vulgate translates well (ipse enarravit) as do the Curetonian Syriac, Ephraem, Origen, Irenaeus, cf. Tertullian “ipse exposuit” (texts in M. E. Boismard, “Dans le sein du Père,” in RB, 1952, pp. 24–27; who, referring to the root idea of the verb ε—ξηγέομαι, “conduct, lead,” translates “It is he that has led,” namely, to the kingdom of God, p. 35). Cf. A. Feuillet, Le Prologue du quatrième évangile, Paris, 1968, pp. 134ff. A. Hanson, “John I, 14–18 and Exodus XXXIV,” in NTS, vol. 23, 1976, pp. 97ff.

⁵ Tatian and the Curetonian and Palestinian Syriac added ἡμι—ν. It is possible to assume that αὐτόν is meant (cf. A. J. Festugière, Observations stylistiques sur l’Évangile de S. Jean, Paris, 1974, p. 133); but the absolute construction is normal: “As for what the power of thinking well means, the author will explain [it] (ε—ξηγήσεται)” (Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.21).

⁶ On the institution of the Athenian exegetai, interpreters of the ancestral religious laws, the application of which they oversaw, and whom people consulted when they were in difficult straits, (Theophrastus, Char. 16.6) to learn what they should do, J. Defradas, Les Thèmes de la propagande delphique, Paris, 1954, pp. 194–207; P. Herrmann, “Ein ε—ξηγητής Εὐμολπιδω—ν in Eleusis,” in ZPE, vol. 10, pp. 79–85.

⁷ Philo, Contemp. Life 78. The Logos as ε—ρμηνεύς (Alleg. Interp. 3.207; Change of Names 208; Unchang. God 138; Worse Attacks Better 40, 127, 133; Migr. Abr. 81: the Logos is the interpreter of thought before men) can be compared to Moses ε—ρμηνεύς νόμων ι—ερω—ν (Moses 1.1), “because a prophet is an interpreter: God prompts him internally as to what he must say” (Rewards 55). Also Athenaeus 1.2 a: “As for the deipnosophistai who were supposed to be at the dinner, first of all there was Masurius, the interpreter of laws (νόμων ε—ξηγητής) . . . of encyclopedic knowledge.” But above all Gen 41:8, 24, where Pharaoh calls together the magicians of Egypt (Hebrew hartûmîm) to interpret his dreams, the LXX translates “all the exegetai. ” The term mehoqqeq in CD 6.2–11 has often been taken to mean an interpreter of the law (doresh hattôrah), because of the Peshitta, which translates this word “interpreter” (mbadqâna’), but Sir 10:5 translates it with γραμματεὺς, and the LXX never interprets darash in this way.

⁸ A. Schlatter, Der Evangelist Johannes, Stuttgart, 1948, p. 36, who cites Josephus, Ant. 17.149; War 1.649; 2.162.

⁹ Plutarch, Num. 9.8; cf. Dionysius of Halicarnassus 2.73; Dio Chrysostom 12.47: λέγω δὴ τὸν φιλόσοφον ἄνδρα, ἢ λόγῳ ε—ξηγητὴν καὶ προφήτην τῆς ἀθανάτου φύσεως ἀληθέστατον ἴσως καὶ τελειότατον.

¹⁰ P.Mich. 542, 17 (third century AD); P.Oxy. 56, 1; 477, 4; P.Tebt. 329, 4; 397, 3; P.Flor. 57, 76; BGU 1070, 1; SB 9264, 5 (second century); on the exegetes who is also enarchos and councillor (ibid. 9216, 9; 10200, 5; P.Oxy. 54, 5) or prytanis (P.Mich. 623, 2), archon (at Coptos; REG, 1932, p. 230, n. 9; cf. at Samos, ibid., 1965, p. 149, n. 312), charged with the ε—πιμελεία τῶ—ν χρησιμῶ—ν (Strabo 17, p. 797), cf. N. Hohlwein, L’Egypte romaine, pp. 224ff.

¹¹ P. Jouguet, Vie municipale, pp. 196ff.

¹² P. Jouguet, Vie municipale, pp. 293ff. Cf. Apollonios the exegetes and bouleutes in a list of cosigners of a decree (P.Oxy. 3171, 14); Aurelius Antoninus, exegete and ex-gymnasiarch (3187, 9). A crown is offered to Aurelius Serenus for his office of exegete (ε—ξεγητεία; 3177, 10; cf. 1413, 6); cf. ε—ξηγητεύω, 1112, 2; 3169, 171; 3198, 4; 3246, 7; 3248, 12; P.Stras. 634, 6; CPR V, 2, n. 5, 11; 6, 4; P.Vindob.Tandem, n. II, 2: Καλλινεΐκου ε—ξηγητεύσαντος Ἡρακλέους πόλεως τῆς ὑπὲρ Μέμφιν. I. de la Potterie, La Vérité dans saint Jean, vol. 1, pp. 213–228.

ε—ξίστημι (ε—ξιστάνω)

existemi (existano), to displace, cause to go out, relinquish, derange; move away, depart; to tremble, be stupefied or flabbergasted, be beside oneself, be out of one’s mind

existemi* (existano), S 1839; TDNT 2.459–460; EDNT 2.7–8; MM 224; L&N 25.220; BDF §§342(1), 198(6); BAGD 276

The semantic interest of this verb lies in its multiple meanings in various authors, times, and cultural settings—a variety to which the prefix lends itself. Transitive existemi has the etymological meaning “displace, cause to go out”: “setting aside those acts” (Demosthenes, Embassy

21.72); in style, “facts and persons that are most removed from the common life” (Aristotle, Rh. 3.2.3; cf. 3.8.1, divert the attention). In Euripides, it has a psychological meaning (“First derange his mind with a sudden madness”)¹ that is found also in Plutarch: Solon “placed on the same level deception and constraint, pleasure and suffering, as being equally capable of disturbing human reason.”² When intransitive, the verb means “move away, part from.” “They left the route” (Herodotus 3.76), leave the field free (Xenophon, An. 1.5.14), give place,³ abandon a country (Plutarch, Sull. 22.9; Pomp. 10.2), give up the burdens of empire (Thucydides 2.63.2), but also lose one’s mind (“I feel my reason take flight”).⁴

The LXX, which uses this verb to translate twenty-nine different Hebrew words, gives it the basic meaning “tremble” (Hebrew harad) but with very diverse nuances which can be specified only according to the context and the underlying Hebrew verb. Sometimes it is a simple rustling (Ruth 3:8), as the trees of the forest sway and shake in the wind (Isa 7:2, Hebrew nû‘a); it can denote astonishment (Gen 43:33; Job 26:11, Hebrew tamah), awe—that of Athenobius before Simon’s opulence (1Macc 15:32), identical to that of the comedian Philippides (ego men exesten idon, frag. 27, ed., J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 3 A, p. 178)—or wonder, as at the falling of the snow (Sir 43:18), and even the opening up of the heart in joy (Exod 18:9, Hebrew hadâh; Isa 60:5, Hebrew rahab). Trembling is synonymous with stupefaction (Jer 2:12; 4:9; 1Kgs 9:8; 2Chr 7:21, Hebrew shamem), but usually this “stupor” is agitation resulting from concern, disquiet, and anxiety;⁵ so the disturbance is profound,⁶ and existemi means “tremble with fear” (Gen 27:33) to the point of fainting (Gen 42:28); but here again the nuances are numerous. A person can be simply “alarmed” (1Sam 13:7) at the news of a catastrophe (Isa 32:11), be horrified (52:14), tremble greatly as at a volcanic eruption (Exod 19:18), be dazed and lose consciousness,⁷ experience all the varieties of fear: dread (Ezek 2:6; Hebrew yare’), horror (27:35; Hebrew sa‘ar), terror (26:16; Hebrew labash), panic (Josh 10:10; Hebrew hamam; Judg 4:15), to the point of fainting (Ezek 31:15; Hebrew ‘ulepeh) or being routed.⁸

If the LXX specifies rather frequently that it is the heart or the spirit that is moved and pants (Isa 42:14) or is overwhelmed,⁹ it also gives this verb a suggestive religious meaning: when the divine fire consumed the whole burnt offering, the people trembled with dread (Hebrew ranan, cry out with joy), they fell on their faces (Lev 9:24); this is holy dread, where reverential fear reigns. Rahab, having heard what Yahweh has done on Israel’s behalf, confesses “Our hearts have been terrified (niphâl of the Hebrew masas, dissolve, weaken); no one has any more courage before you” (Josh 2:11). When the Israelites shall return to God with respect and joy, “they will reverence the Lord and his benefits” (Hos 3:5; Hebrew pahad: shudder, tremble with fear or joy; 11:10; Mic 7:17). After the death of Holophernes, they are stupefied and worship God (Jdt 13:17); “I have revered your work, O Yahweh” (Hab 3:2). This psychological and religious meaning is found also in Philo. On Gen 2:21—“God provoked an ecstasy in Adam”—he comments “the intelligence is in ecstasy (a going outside of oneself) when it no longer busies itself with intelligible things . . . it is in ecstasy when it is diverted by God” (Alleg. Interp. 2.31; cf. Conf. Tongues 142; Heir 251); “the soul filled with grace, transported with enthusiasm, appears to be outside itself.”¹⁰

In the papyri, existemi, attested especially in the first century, almost always has a legal meaning;¹¹ such as the cessio bonorum, i.e., the relinquishment of property by a debtor to compensate his creditors in order to avoid execution of debt on his person. In AD 36, a widow of Tebtunis, acting as guardian for her three minor sons: “we relinquish all” (ekstenai hemas pantas, P.Mich. 232, 20 = SB 7568); in AD 37: “I acknowledge the relinquishment to my parents, named above, of everything that they have” (homologo existasthai tois progegrammenois mou goneusi . . . panton hon echousi, 350, 22; cf. line 7); in AD 44, Taorseus acknowledges that she has ceded all the parts of the old house at Tebtunis (351, 8 and 21); in AD 46: “we have ceded to our sister Soeris the whole house, the furnishings, and implements” (352, 3); in AD 58, Ophelous cedes to Antiphanes his share of all the property left by his deceased father Heraclas (P.Oxy. 268, 11). In AD 62, some farmers are forced to give up the farming of their five arourai (P.Oxy. 2873, 12 and 25); in AD 67, Thommous cedes to his brother Sambas all future rights in succession of their father, who is still living (P.Tebt. 380, 19). In 82, the use of a weaving shop is ceded by debtors in lieu of an interest payment (P.Oxy. 2773, 10). In AD 87, an act of donation between two citizens of Europus: “to cede to him according to the deed.”¹²

The NT uses existemi (and existano) in the strong sense of “be stupefied,” but there are many shades of meaning, first of all on the secular level: Simon Magus, seeing the great wonders worked by Philip, “was flabbergasted” (existato, Acts 8:13); he himself had “astounded the people of Samaria” (existanon to ethnos) through his magic (8:9). With almost the same meaning, when the child Jesus heard and answered the doctors of the law in the temple, they “were stupefied (and admiring) at his intelligence and his answers” (Luke 2:47—existanto pantes; cf. 2:48, his parents were disconcerted, stunned, exeplogesan). The astonishment arises from an inability to understand or justify something that is abnormal. At the end of Peter’s Pentecost speech, the Jerusalemites “were stupefied and astonished (existanto de kai ethaumazon) and said, ‘Are not all those who speak Galileans? How is it that we all hear them in our own languages?’” (Acts 2:7). And again: “Then they were stupefied and were at a loss (existanto de pantes kai dieporounto), saying to each other, ‘What can this mean?’” (2:12). Similarly, when St. Paul, right after his conversion, proclaimed at Damascus that Jesus was Son of God, “All those who heard were stupefied and said, ‘Is this not the person who was persecuting at Jerusalem those who called upon his name?’” (Acts 9:21). A person is troubled, even disturbed, absolutely disconcerted; such as “the believers of the circumcision” at Caesarea who witnessed the conversion of the centurion Cornelius: “they were stupefied to see that the gift of the Holy Spirit was also poured out on the Gentiles” (10:45); but here already there is a certain religious fear provoked by the manifestation of the divine. The “stupor” is not simply surprise, but incomprehension in the face of mystery, a sort of daze that engulfs the mind and leaves it stunned before the facts.

This psychology is that of witnesses to a miracle: after the healing of a blind and dumb demoniac, “the multitudes were stupefied (existanto) and said, ‘Could this be the son of David?’” (Matt 12:23). This astonishment before this manifestation of the Messiah is admiring and religious. Likewise after the healing of Jairus’s daughter: “immediately they were taken by a great stupor” (Mark 5:42); the parents’ terror was such that it did not even occur to them to give the daughter something to eat (Luke 8:56). God has intervened; fear does not rule out joy and gratitude. After the healing of the paralytic, “all were stupefied (existasthai) and gave glory to God” (Mark 2:12); the enthusiasm was general.

In cases where the disciples notice the power or the transcendence of Jesus, existemi is no longer simply religious terror, but retains its classical meaning: “to be beside oneself.” When Jesus walks on the water to rejoin his apostles, “they were beside themselves” (ek perissou en heautois existanto, Mark 6:51), just as on Easter morning, after hearing the holy women tell that the tomb was empty, that angels had appeared, etc. (Luke 24:22); and when Peter, miraculously delivered from prison, shows up at the home of Mary, John Mark’s mother: existesan (Acts 12:16).

The verb is pejorative in Mark 3:21, where “his own”—probably meaning his relatives—at Capernaum¹³ wish “to seize him, because they (probably meaning the crowd) said, ‘He is beside himself’”; exeste could be translated, “he has gone mad, he has lost his mind,” but even better, “he is a fanatic, he has lost his grasp on himself and concrete reality.”¹⁴ In something of the same meaning, there is the Pauline hapax: “If we are out of our minds,¹⁵ it is for God; if we are reasonable (sophronoumen, composed, sober), it is for you” (1Cor 5:13). Divine love is “ecstatic”; the lover no longer lives his own life but is beside himself, living the life of his Beloved (5:14). But with regard to the believers, Paul restrains himself and acts with prudence. He is of sound mind and adapts himself to the needs and circumstances of each one.

¹ Euripides, Bacch. 850: ἔκστησον φρενώ—ν; cf. idem, οἶνος ε—ξέστησέ με, in Stobaeus, Ecl. 18.19 (vol. 3, p. 517, 15).

² Plutarch, Sol. 21.4: ε—κστήσαι λογισμω—ν ἀνθρώπου; cf. Crass. 23.9: “hearing is of all the senses the one that most puts the mind outside of itself” (ε—ξίστησι τὴν διάνοιαν). Also in Plutarch: abandon a tactic (Fab. 5.4), unsettle the commonwealth (Cic. 10.5). Cf. T. Benj. 3.3: ε—ἀν τὰ πνεύματα τοῦ Βελίαρ εἰ—ς πα—σαν πονηρίαν θλίψεως ε—κστήσωσι ὕμα—ς.

³ Sophocles, Phil. 1053; Aristophanes, Ran. 354; Aristotle, Pol. 5.6.18: “democracies and oligarchies sometimes give place to variations of their genre”; HA 1.1.488b: “to be pure-bred means not to be degenerate” (τὸ μὴ ε—ξιστάμενος). Cf. transplanted ivy (Plutarch, Quaest. conv. 3.2.649d); “Many lose the memory of their old lessons” (Xenophon, Cyr. 3.3.54).

⁴ Euripides, Or. 1021: ε—ξέστην φρενω—ν; Sophocles, Aj. 82: “If he were of sound mind I would not avoid him”; Aristotle, Gen. Cor. 1.8.325a: “No demented person has lost his reason (οὐδένα τω—ν μαινομένων ε—ξεστάναι) to the extent that fire and ice seem to him to be one and the same thing”; HA 6.22.577a: “the mare is beside herself and maddened (ε—ξίσταται καὶ μαίνεται) by this scent”; Josephus, Ant. 10.114: Jeremiah is thought to be mad in the judgment of the leaders and the wicked (ὡς ε—ξεστηκότα τω—ν φρενω—ν); 20.83; cf. leave to others (3.68), cede property (3.284), power (20.59; War 1.121); evacuate fortresses (War 1.137; cf. 6.104); avoid open battle (Ant. 15.120); stop thinking of oneself (18.256), renounce (11.176; cf. War 3.74). The three occurrences in T. Job mean “lose one’s mind” (35.4; 36.6; 39.13).

⁵ 1Sam 4:13; 16:4—When Samuel arrives at Bethlehem “the elders of the city came trembling to meet him”; 21:2; 2Kgs 4:13; Jer 18:16—“whoever passes near the desolate country is amazed and shakes his head”; 49:23—Hamath and Arpad “are disturbed” (Hebrew mûg); after his visions, Nebuchadnezzar’s spirit was troubled (Hebrew pa’am) and sleep forsook him.

⁶ 2Chr 15:6—“God will trouble them (Hebrew hamam) with all sorts of calamities”; Exod 23:27; 2Sam 22:15; Jdt 11:16; 15:1; 1Macc 16:22—“John Hyrcanus was beside himself at the death of his father and his mother” (ε—ξέστη σφόδρα); cf. 1Kgs 1:49—“All Adonijah’s guests panicked, arose, and scattered.”

⁷ Judg 4:21; 2Sam 17:2 (Hebrew radam). Hence Job 5:13—“the plans of the wily become confused” (niph'al of the Hebrew mahar, act rashly); 12:17—“He makes the judges mad” (poel of halal, be confused, deluded); Isa 13:8—“Everyone will remain dumbfounded before his neighbor (Hebrew tamâh); 28:17—“priest and prophet ramble under the effect of the intoxicating drink” (Hebrew shagâh, stray, stagger); 29:9.

⁸ Judg 8:12. Hence flight, Isa 10:31 (Hebrew nadad); 16:3; 33:3; 41:2 (Hebrew radah); Jer 9:10. The most emphatic text is 1Sam 14:15—“terror (ἔκστασις) spread in the camp. . . . The garrison and the raiders were terrified (ε—ξέστησεν) as well. The earth shook, and there was a terror of God”; cf. 17:11—ε—ξέστησαν καὶ ε—φοβήθησαν σφόδρα; 28:5; Wis 5:2.

⁹ Jdt 12:16—“The heart of Holophernes was overwhelmed with ardent desire for Judith.”

¹⁰ Drunkness 146; cf. Dreams 2.89: “the sons of Heth, whose name means ‘outside of’ (ε—ξιστάντες)”; cf. Plutarch, De def. or. 40: “There came about an ecstasy (ε—ξίσταται) . . . that we call enthusiasm.” Hence the classical meanings: leave, abandon, go apart (Philo, Heir 69; Dreams 1.132; Spec. Laws 1.248; 2.37; 3.28; Contemp. Life 18; Flacc. 148; To Gaius 232), resign from a brilliant situation (To Gaius 327); spend money (Dreams 2.90); “We stand aside (ε—ξίστασται) for rulers and for beasts of burden” (2.91) out of respect for the former and fear of the latter; Spec. Laws 2.238: cede the place of honor; the right of the elder (Sobr. 26; Moses 1.242; Virtues 208).

¹¹ In AD 68, Tiberius Julius Alexander proclaims respect for final verdicts for matters submitted to the prefect: “Many people have preferred to abandon their own property (πολλοὶ γοῦν ε—ξίωσας ε—κστήναι μα—λλον) because they have spent more than its value due to the fact that at each conventus the same matters are brought back to court” in hopes of obtaining a judgment contrary to the one given before (Dittenberger, Or. 669, 37 = SB 8444, 37; cf. G. Chalon, T. Julius Alexander, p. 185). Cf. the commonplace meaning in a the minutes of hearings: ε—ξέστη ου—τος ὁ πρύτανις = the prytane went out (T. C. Skeat, E. P. Wegener, “A Trial before the Prefect of Egypt Appius Sabinus,” in JEA, 1935, pp. 224–247; cf. SB 7696, 77); but BGU 530, 13, a father to his negligent son: “I am at risk of losing the building site that I now possess.”

¹² —Ἐκστήναι εἰ—ς αὐτὸν κατὰ χρηματισμόν, P.Dura XVIII, 2, 4, 15, 19; cf. P.Fam.Tebt. XVII, 11: “I cede the half that is due me of the whole of the inheritance from my father.” A veteran cedes half of an olive grove and half of a house (P.Mich. 427, 5, 8, 23, 29; PSI 822, 14; 1019, 5; P.Ross.Georg. II, 30, 10; P.Ryl. 75, 6, 10, 16); 117, 22: Aurelia Tinoutis, having abandoned the inheritance of her brother, who died intestate and childless, cannot be responsible for his debts; 653, 18: “we are ready to cede to them.” People abandon rights (P.Oxy. 3105, 20), a field (UPZ 162, col. IV, 10; cf. VI, 9), pay back money (UPZ 200, 11 and 15); “I will not have the right to abandon my lease during the course of the year” (P.Thead. 6, 11; cf. 8, 20).

¹³ Cf. G. Hartmann, “Mk III, 20f.,” in BZ, 1913, pp. 249–279; J. E. Steinmueller, “Jesus and the οἰ—παῖ ἀὐτοῦ,” in CBQ, 1942, pp. 355–359; H. Wansbrough, “Was Jesus out of his Mind?” in NTS, vol. 18, 1972, pp. 233–235; D. Wenham, “The Meaning of Mark III, 21,” NTS, vol. 21, 1975, pp. 295–300; E. Best, Mark III, 20, 21, 31–35, NTS, vol. 22, 1976, pp. 309–319.

¹⁴ —Ἐξέστη here is synonymous with ἀνόητος (Luke 24:25; Gal 3:1), εἰ—ς μανίαν περιτρέπει (Acts 26:24); cf. μωρός (1Cor 3:18; 4:10).

¹⁵ —Ἐξέστημεν, out of the control of reason: conversion, visions, ecstasies, charismatic gifts.

ε—πανόρθωσις

epanorthosis, correction

epanorthosis, S 1882; TDNT 5.450–451; EDNT 2.18; NIDNTT 3.351–352; MM 229; L&N 72.16; BAGD 283; ND 2.84

Among the benefits that accrue to the careful student of Scripture, one is epanorthosis (2Tim 3:16). The term is frequent in the inscriptions, with respect to the repair of a statue, the restoration of a sanctuary (cf. 2Macc 5:20), the rebuilding of a city.¹ In the papyri, it is used for the correcting of a work, the rectification of an error in a document.² This sense of redressing errors or ignorance is well attested in literature.³

But it seems that this word has the meanings of both the English word correction (change to make better, remove and punish errors)⁴ and the word correctness (conformity to a rule, rightness or exactness, even perfection, in conduct). Thus Philo defines ethics: “ethics studies the epanorthosis of human morals” (Drunkenness 91). The epanorthosis biou or ethon is nothing other than the discipline of morals or the right conduct of life,⁵ or even that which is normally necessary for human subsistence and life.⁶

¹ 1Macc 14:34; I.Side 107, 4; Strabo 12.579; 13.594; C. Michel, Recueil, 830, 4 (restoration of the Artemision); J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. 29, 59 (τοῦ τ—ερού). The restoration of a wall (P.Ryl. 157, 13; Dittenberger, Or. 710, 4;

F. G. Maier, Griechische Mauerbauinschriften, Heidelberg, 1959, n. 44, 4), of a bridge or causeway (G. E. Bean, T. B. Mitford, Cilicia, n. 251, 3); the rebuilding of ruins (V. Ehrenberg, A. H. M. Jones, Documents Illustrating the Reigns of Augustus and Tiberius, Oxford, 1955, n. 20). Numerous epigraphical examples in L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 12, pp. 510, 521, with respect to the inscriptions of Pharos in Dalmatia: εἰ—ς ἀπανόρθωσιν τῆς πόλεως ἡμῶ—ν. Abolished laws are reestablished (2Macc 2:22; Philo, To Gaius 369).

² P.Oxy. 78, 29; 237, col. VII, 30; cf. Strabo, Prolegomena 2.4.8. The corrector is the ε—πανορθωτής (or the διορθωτής), the equivalent of the legatus Augusti ad corrigendum statum (H. J. Mason, Greek Terms, p. 44). This is the title of a commissioner eventually sent to the senatorial provinces, but also of a high-ranking imperial officer who substituted for a prefect (P.Ryl. 690, 7; P.Cair.Isid. 62, 24 = P.Mich. 220, 23; PSI 1076, 2; SB 8913, 5; 9167, 24; P.Mert. 26, 6, with the note of C. H. Roberts, pp. 157ff.). On Aurelius Achilleus, of low descent, named ε—πανορθωτής by the rebel leader L. Domitius Domitianus to be his delegate and represent him in upper Egypt, cf. A. Stein, “—Επανορθωτής,” in Aeg, vol. 16, 1938, pp. 234–243; J. Schwartz, L. Domitius Domitianus, Brussels, 1975, p. 120.

³ Polybius 1.35.1: “Teachings that help redress human errors, πρὸς ε—πανόρθωσιν”; Ep. Arist. 130: “If they live with intelligent and wise people, they remedy their ignorance and make progress in their way of life.” P.Ryl. 302: ε—πανορθωτῆ τῆς ἰ—ερα—ς. Plutarch, Ti. Gracch. 9.30: “However accommodating the reform, the people were content”; Dem. 6.2: “remedy compromised matters”; 8.2: touch up a discourse; Cic. 4.6: correct errors; Polybius 5.88.3: “the setbacks became the cause of the remedies.”

⁴ Philo, Conf. Tongues 171: “punishment restrains and corrects error”; 182; Spec. Laws 3.76: the violator “to redress his conduct, which is offensive and detrimental to the laws”; Decalogue 174: “Numerous laws . . . were decreed to amend those who are amenable to correction”; SB 7696, 103. In the edict of Tiberius Julius Alexander, the prefect “redressed innovations contrary to favors granted by the augusti ” and “corrected [abuses?]” (SB 8444, 44 and 46), but at line 7 he seems simply to have ordered current matters.

⁵ Philo, Alleg. Interp. 1.85; Change of Names 70; Moses 2.36. In Ep. Arist. 126, A. Pelletier translates πρὸς τὴν κοινὴν . . . ε—πανόρθωσιν “for the common advantage of all his compatriots”; cf. 283; Epictetus 3.21.15: “the mysteries were instituted for our instruction and the correcting of our life, ε—πὶ παιδείᾳ καὶ ε—πανορθώσει τοῦ βίου”; cf. Plutarch, Phoc. 6.1; 7.3–4.

⁶ Τοῦ τὸν βίον τω—ν ἀνθρώπων ε—πανορθώσαντος (the Rosetta Stone; Dittenberger, Or. 90, 2 = SB 8299). On ἀνορθόω, cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, p. 589, n. 1. On ὀρθωσις, ε—πανόρθωσις, cf. J. Holt, Les Noms d'action en -ΣΙΣ -ΤΙΣ, Aarhus, 1940, pp. 110, 125, 161ff.

ε—περώτημα

eperotema, declaration of commitment, pledge

eperotema, S 1906; TDNT 2.688–689; EDNT 2.21; NIDNTT 2.879–881; MM 231–232; L&N 33.162; BAGD 285

According to 1Pet 3:21, baptism is not the washing away of a physical defilement but the “eperotema of a good conscience to God” (syneideseos agathes eperotema eis theon). All the commentators try to specify the meaning of the biblical hapax eperotema and end up with quite varied definitions.¹ Many of them connect this noun to the verb eperotao (Ps 137:3, Hebrew sha'al) and translate “a request addressed to God,”² and it is true that this accords with the word’s meaning in literary Greek: “ask a question.”³

But, on the one hand, it is hardly possible to imagine where this “prayer” would fit in the baptismal ceremony; and on the other hand this interpretation does not agree with the indicators supplied by the OT and the inscriptions. Theodotion’s version of Dan 4:17—rhema hagion to eperotema (Aramaic she’alta’)—suggests that the word should have the sense of “decision, resolution.” Manuscript a of Sir 33:3 has the variant eperotema for erotema: “The law is as worthy of confidence as the response of the oracle.”⁴ This is not a “request” but a “declaration,” above all an “oracular response,” which is the meaning of eperotasis in P.Oxy. 1205, 9ff., P.Lond. 1660, 42; Dittenberger, Syl. 977, 1. In addition, most modern scholars understand eperotema in the legal sense of commitment, stipulation,⁵ corresponding to the agreement formula in contracts, eperotheis homologesa;⁶ this would be the equivalent of the homologia of baptism (Rom 10:10; 1Tim 6:12; Heb 4:14; 10:23), the commitment of the believer to the stipulations of the covenant, i.e., to submitting his whole life to God (cf. 1Pet 1:22—hypakoe tes aletheias; Heb 10:22). This oath of allegiance is antithetical to the disobedience of Noah’s contemporaries;⁷ it is the pledge of a person regenerated by the power of Christ’s resurrection, in which the believer shares through the baptismal rite (1Pet 1:3; Rom 6:4; Col 2:12).

¹ The best study is that of Bo Reicke, The Disobedient Spirits and Christian Baptism, Copenhagen, 1946, pp. 143ff., 182ff. Cf. T. Arvedson, “Syneideseos agathes eperotema,” in SEÅ, 1950, pp. 55–59; R. E. Nixon, “The Meaning of ‘Baptism’ in 1Pet III, 21,” in F. L. Cross, SE, vol. 4, pp. 437–441.

² J. Monnier, La Première Epître de l’apôtre Pierre, Mâcon, 1900, p. 183: “the free access that a good conscience finds with God”; H. Windisch, Die katholischen Briefe, 3d ed., Tübingen, 1951, p. 73; Greeven, on this word in TDNT, vol. 2, pp. 685–689; K.H. Schelkle, Die Petrusbriefe, Freiburg-Basel, 1961, p. 109.

³ Thucydides 3.68.1–2: “The Lacedaemonian judges thought that they could stick to the question asked (τὸ ε—περώτημα) about services rendered. . . . They called them to appear again and asked them again (ε—ρωρω—ντες) if they had rendered any service to Lacedaemonia.”

⁴ Moulton-Milligan cite P.Cair.Preis. 1, 16—ε—ἀν γὰρ μηδὲν ε—περώτημα ἡ— ε—νγεγραμμένον—in the sense of “stipulation” (second century AD), earlier than Codex Justin. 8.10.12.3b: ε—κ τω—ν συμφώνων ἦτοι ε—περωτημάτων; in the third century at Athens: τὰ ε—περωτημένα ὄ [τω—δοκει— τ]ω—ν καὶ ἰ—ερατευκότων . . . τω— θεῶ (SEG I, 52, 14; taken up and completed by L. Vidmann, Sylloge Inscriptionum Religionis Isiacae et Sarapiacae, Berlin, 1969, n. 30; list of priests of various divinities). The meaning “sanction, decision” is that of Dittenberger, Syl. 856, 6: κατὰ τὸ ε—περώτημα τω—ν κρατίστων —Αρεοπαγειτω—ν; 1008, 4: καθ’ ὑπομνηματισμὸν τῆς ε—ξ —Αρείου πάγου βουλῆς καὶ ε—περώτημα τὴν βουλῆς τω—ν Φ.

⁵ F. W. Beare, The First Epistle of Peter, Oxford, 1947, p. 149; E. G. Selwyn, The First Epistle of St. Peter, London, 1947, p. 205; W. J. Dalton, Christ’s Proclamation to the Spirits, Rome, 1965, pp. 225ff.; F. J. Leenhardt, Parole—Ecriture—Sacraments, Neuchâtel, 1968, p. 161; O. S. Brooks, “1 Peter III, 21: The Clue to the Literary Structure of the Epistle,” in NovT, 1974, pp. 290–305.

⁶ G. C. Richards, “1 Peter III, 21,” in JTS, 1931, p. 77; cf. the papyrological texts, in C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, p. 266, n. 3; C. Préaux, “De la Grèce classique à l’Egypte hellénistique: —Επερωτηθεὶς ὁμολόγησα et l’Alceste d’Euripide, vers 1119,” in ChrEg, 1967, pp. 140–144.

⁷ 1Pet 3:20 (cf. J. P. Lewis, A Study of the Interpretation of Noah and the Flood in Jewish and Christian Literature, Leiden, 1968, pp. 103, 168ff.). This stipulation of the baptized can be compared to that made by the Qumranians to be admitted to the community (1QS 5.8–10). They subscribed to the declarations of the priests and the Levites by repeating “Amen, Amen” (1.20, 24; 2.10, 18–19).

ε—πιείκεια, ε—πεικής epieikeia, clemency, moderation, generosity; epieikes, clement, reasonable, accommodating, generous

epieikeia, S 1932; TDNT 2.588–590; EDNT 2.26; NIDNTT 2.256–259; MM 238; L&N 88.62; BDF §31(2); BAGD 292 | epieikes, S 1933; TDNT 2.588–590; EDNT 2.26; NIDNTT 2.256–259; MM 238; L&N 88.63; BDF §31(2); BAGD 292

The dictionaries give this definition: clemency, benevolence, moderation, fairness, mildness; and Bible translators most often use leniency, clemency, indulgence.¹ In one sense, everything depends on context; but the usage of these terms in the Koine, where they are favorites, allows us to fathom their basic signification.

I. — In the OT, epieikeia is above all a quality of justice (Wis 12:18) and of God’s governing (2Macc 2:22; 10:4), which treats people with mercy (Ps 86:5; Bar 2:27; Dan 3:42); and St. Paul exhorts the Corinthians “through the praytes and epieikeia of Christ.”² In other words, justice goes hand-in-hand with clemency,³ a quality of judges,⁴ a virtue of legislators (Philo, Virtues 148; Spec. Laws 4.23; To Gaius 119) and of kings (Josephus, Ant. 15.14, 15.177); so much so that Aeneas Tacticus says to choose as leader the one who is most epieikes and most phronimos (Polior. 3.4). For those in positions of superiority, epieikeia is an easy-going quality that moderates the inflexible severity of wrath,⁵ a fairness that corrects anything that might be odious or unjust in the strict application of the letter of the law.⁶ Lawyers appeal to it,⁷ and in the third century clementissime became a term for the strategos.⁸

II. — This clemency, which mitigates sanctions, corresponds in part to Roman indulgentia and benignitas;⁹ but Hellenistic epieikeia emphasizes first of all moderation and just measure¹⁰ or, as we say today, “equilibrium.” This is why epieikes and metrios are so often linked,¹¹ and why in Greece aner epieikes has always meant “honest man” or “virtuous man”;¹² he possesses the tropon epieikeia.¹³ It seem likely that this basic value is that required in the candidate for the episcopate: he must be balanced in his mentality and his behavior; he radiates serenity (1Tim 3:3). It is also the quality of those who share in the wisdom from on high (Jas 3:17). Here again, usage allows us to flesh out this idea.¹⁴

III. — The person characterized by epieikeia is reasonable, a respecter of social norms.¹⁵ Sometimes the emphasis is on exactitude, loyalty, and fidelity in the accomplishment of a task;¹⁶ much more often on mildness; hence its connection with goodness (1Pet 2:18), peace (Jas 3:17; 1Enoch 6.5, Greek frag.), and mildness-leniency (praytes).¹⁷ So it becomes apparent that Hellenistic epieikeia is first and foremost a virtue of the heart—open, conciliatory, and trusting toward one’s neighbor (Strabo 6.3.9). Not only is it opposed to wickedness (Josephus, Ant. 10.83) and to violence (Philo, Cherub. 37), but being thoroughly mild and kind (cf. Philo, Virtues 81, 125, hemeros), it can be persuaded, and bends and even resigns itself when wronged.¹⁸ Positively, it is hard to distinguish from chrestotes,¹⁹ from an accommodating attitude,²⁰ and from “philanthropy,”²¹ the “habitual inclination of character in the direction of friendliness toward people” (Ps.-Plato, Def. 412 e).

IV. — Finally, NT epieikeia is not only moderation and measure, but goodness, courtesy, generosity. Furthermore, it suggests a certain amiability,²² good grace. Frag. 427 of Sophocles places epieikes and charis in parallel.²³ According to Origen, if Mary, greater in grace than Elizabeth, took the initiative to visit her, and when they met was the first to utter a greeting, the reason is that the Virgin Mary was “full of thoughtfulness (epieikes) toward others.”²⁴

So I suggest translating the neuter adjective epieikes used substantively as “friendly equilibrium”²⁵ in Phil 4:5, where the Vulgate uses the word modestia: “Let your friendly, well-balanced character be known to all.” This favorable reputation and especially this attractiveness are self-evident.²⁶ They remind us of the possession of the earth by the praeis (Matt 5:4).

¹ H. Hemmer was right when he wrote “Terms that are almost untranslatable into French in their complexity of meaning, and which express a happy blend of measure, moderation, balance, subtlety, and energy or force” (Clément de Rome: Epître aux Corinthiens, Paris, 1909, p. xxxvii). W. Barclay (NT Wordbook, p. 38), after noting that “it is extremely difficult to give a translation of epieikes,” observes that Moffatt used six different translations for seven occurrences. Thus in Plutarch: Marcia, Cato’s second wife, “passed for an honest woman, ε—πειικῆ δοκούσαν” (Plutarch, Cat. Min. 25.1, 25.3); “justice that gives in neither to complacency nor to favor, εἰ—ς ε—πειίκειαν ἢ χάριν” (4.2); “with mildness and moderation, ε—πειικῆ καὶ μέτρια” (26.4; 53.6); “in government majesty and goodness must be associated, τὸ σεμνόν . . . τω— ε—πειικει—” (Phoc. 2.8; cf. 7.2); “Menillos, a man of moderation” (28.1); “a man of healthy judgment” (35.3); “Tiberius was calm and mild, ε—πειικῆς καὶ πρα—ος” (Ti. Gracch. 2.5; 14.5; cf. Cleom. 1.2). —Επειικω—ς expresses cordial relations (Cleom. 36.2); Cic. 19.6; 21.2; etc. Cf. J. Haring, “Die Lehre von der Epikie,” in Theologisch-praktische Quartalschrift, 1899, pp. 579–600; 796–809; C. Spicq, “Bénignité, mansuétude, douceur, clémence,” in RB, 1947, pp. 333ff.; L. J. Riley, The History, Nature and Use of Epikeia in Moral Theology, Washington, 1948; G. Ciulei, L’Equité chez Cicéron, Amsterdam, 1972.

² Διὰ τῆς πραύτητος καὶ ε—πεικειίας τοῦ Χριστοῦ, 2Cor 10:1; cf. R. Leivestad, “The Meekness and Gentleness of Christ,” in NTS, vol. 12, 1966, pp. 156–164.

³ An order to govern the inhabitants δικαιοσύνη δὲ καὶ ε—πεικεία (I.Bulg., 1960e 44); Dittenberger, Syl. 880, 35; “the Corsicans live among them with more moderation and fairness—βιοῦσιν ε—πεικω—ς καὶ δικαίως—than are generally seen among the barbarians” (Diodorus Siculus 5.26); Plutarch, Alex. 43.4; Caes. 3.1; 15.4; 35.4; 54.4; 57.4.

⁴ Honorific decree of Iasos for foreign judges, in L. Robert, Opera Minora, vol. 3, Amsterdam, 1969, p. 229; SB 11223, 11, 22.

⁵ Seneca defines clementia as “mildness demonstrated by a superior to an inferior,” whereas mansuetudo is shown toward all and has more to do with the sentiments of the soul apart from any reference to other people (Clem. 2.3).

⁶ Plato, Leg. 6.757 d; Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 5.1137a31ff.; Rh. 1.13.1374a26; Onasander, Proem. 6: “It is not equitable (οὔτε ε—πεικός) to dismiss without punishment a general who has suffered a complete disaster under the pretext that Fortune (τύχη) is responsible for everything”; Onasander, Strategikos 2: “He should not be so indulgent that he is scorned.” Diodorus Siculus 19.100.1: “The barbarians would think that they received pardon not because of clemency (οὐ δι’ ε—πεικείαν) but because they could not be conquered.” The bibliography and a good elucidation of this idea are given by G. Kisch, Erasmus und die Jurisprudenz seiner Zeit, Basel, 1960, pp. 14ff., 475ff. Cf. E. Hamel, “La Vertu d’epikie,” in ScEccl, 1961, pp. 36–56.

⁷ The advocate Tertullus to his excellency Festus (Acts 24:4); in 193 a resident of Soknopaiou Nesos and a priest of the god Sobek address a centurion named Ammonios Paternos to obtain from him an equitable judgment, ἵνα δυνηθω— τῆς ἀπὸ σοῦ ε—πικίας τυχει—ν (P.Mich. 175, 22; cf. P.Cair.Zen. 59192, 4; 59626, 9; 59631, 11; P.Oxy. 67, 6; 2133, 4; 3126, col. I, 11; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 13, 14; P.Cair.Isid. 70, 12; Stud.Pal. XX, 86, 15; P.Panop.Beatty 1, 88, 264, 335, 349, 369).

⁸ —Επιεικεστάτος, P.Mich. 530, 24; P.Giss. I, 16, 9. In Diodorus Siculus, the epieikeia of Alexander is above all “moderation” or “level-headedness” (17.4.9; 17.36.1; 17.66.1), leniency (17.73.1), the clemency of the conqueror (17.91.7) and an extreme goodness (17.38.3; cf. 17.76.1) that grants favors (17.69.9; cf. 27.16.2).

⁹ The clementia Caesaris, Cicero, Marcell. 11; Lig. 6, 10, 15; Deiot. 34; Plutarch, Caes. 57, 4; Dio Cassius 44.6.4; Seneca, Polyb. 13.2ff.; Ben. 5.16.5; Dial. 4.23.4; H. Dahlmann, “Clementia Caesaris,” in NJahrb., vol. 10, 1934, pp. 17ff.; F. D’Agostino, Epieikeia: Il Tema dell’equità nell’antichità greca, 1973; T. Adam, Clementia Principis, Stuttgart, 1970; L. Wickert, “Neue Forschungen zum römischen Prinzipat,” in Festschrift J. Vogt, Berlin-New York, 1974, vol. 2, 1, pp. 67ff.; O. Leggewie, “Clementia Caesaris,” in Gymnasium, 1958, pp. 17–36; H. Gesche, “Datierung und Deutung der Clementiae-Moderationi- Despondien des Tiberius,” in Jahrbuch für Numismatik und Geldgeschichte, 1971, pp. 37–80; G. Downey, “Tiberiana,” in ANRW, 1975, vol. 2, pp. 95–105. Cf. W. W. Buckland, A Text-Book of Roman Law, 3d ed., Cambridge, 1963, p. 55; F. Burdeau, “L’Empereur d’après les Panégyriques latins,” in Aspects de l’Empire romain, Paris, 1964, pp. 41ff.

¹⁰ As when an adviser urges Antony to use all moderation, given his status as consul (Nicolaus of Damascus, Vit. Caes. 30.15). Ps.-Plato defines epieikeia: “Condescendence in giving in against one’s rights and interests; moderation in business relations; right measure of the reasonable soul in matters related to good and evil” (Def. 412 b; cf. J. M. André, L’Otium dans la vie morale et intellectuelle romaine, Paris, 1966, p. 186.)

¹¹ Hyperides, Eux. 12; Josephus, Ant. 15.182; Plutarch, Rom. 16.1; Sol. 29.14; Plutarch, Cor. 10.5; 15.4; De virt. mor. 12; L. C. Youtie, “Urkunden aus Panopolis III,” in ZPE, vol. 10, 1973, p. 143, 11; 144, 22; reprinted in P.Panop. In Lucian, Vit. Auct. 26: μέτριος ε—πιεικής, ἀρμόδιος τω—βίω, which ed. T. Beaupère (Paris, 1967) translates “measured, proper, he knows how to live” and comments “a gentleman.”

¹² Aristotle, Poet. 13.1452 b (in contrast to the wicked, τοὺς μοχθηρούς); Pol. 3.10.4.1281a11, 15; 1282a; Ath. Pol. 26.1; 28.1; Demosthenes, Cor. Trier. 51.17; Herodotus 1.85; Sophocles, OC 1127; Philo, Conf. Tongues 37: οἱ—ε—πιεικέστεροι = well-bred people; Jos. Asen. 5; Plutarch, De virt. mor. 8; Ages. 4.1; Ant. 23.2; 28.7.

¹³ “Morality is born in the soul when moderation and just measure (ε—πιεικείας καὶ μετριότητος) are introduced by reason into the faculties and passionate emotions” (Plutarch, De virt. mor. 12). The flute of the servant of Caius Graccus “had a sweet and measured sound, ε—πειικὴ καὶ πρα—ον” (De cohib. ira 6). On a sarcophagus, Troilus is praised for his legal learning and the mildness of his character, in J. E. Bean, T. B. Mitford, Cilicia, n. 48, 6.

¹⁴ Plutarch gives this definition: “the aner epieikes tries to show respect for his wife and maintain his relationship with her according to justice and sophrosyne” (Devirt. mor. 8). The honorific decree for the athlete M. Alfidus describes him asepieikestatos (ed. R. Merkelbach, in ZPE 1975, p. 145, line 6). The judges will recognize that the martyrs deserve to live, on account of their epieikeia (The Martyrdom of the Priest Pionius 5.3; De Conon 2.7; in H. Musurillo, Christian Martyrs, pp. 142,188).

¹⁵ Anth. Pal. 6.280.3: “she dedicated them, as was fitting, ὡς ε—πειικές.” For the association of ε—πειικῆς and πρέπον, Plato, Tim. 67 d; Plutarch, Quaest. conv. 1.1.4–5; (cf. Crass. 22.1). We must recall that ε—πειικῆς, derived from ἔοικα, expresses the basic idea of appropriateness in an intellectual and moral sense, and even a normative sense (cf. P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique, p. 355).

¹⁶ Functionaries and servants acquit themselves of their duties “appropriately” (ε—πειικω—ς, I.Priene 119, 13; first century BC), κοσμίως καὶ ε—πειικω—ς (honorific inscription of Pergamum; C. Habicht, Die Inschriften des Asklepieions, Berlin, 1969, n. 55, 3), μετὰ πάσης ε—πειικείας (P.Abinn. 9, 10), πίστεως καὶ ε—πειικίας χάριν (P.Mert. 90, 13); P.Oxy. 1414, 23; P.Tebt. 484 (from AD 14); PSI 666, 9; P.Ness. 33, 5. The pairing σπουδῆ-ε—πειίκεια appears late (E. Bernand, Philae, vol. 2, n. 194, 6; 216, 9; 219, 2; 229, 8; etc.).

¹⁷ The winds blow mildly (Philo, Cherub. 37). In the same sense of the word the alchemists recommend using “a mild flame,” i.e., a moderate one (ε—πειικῆς-πραέος; cf. M. Berthelot, Collection des anciens alchimistes grecs, 2d ed., London, 1963, vol. 2, pp. 73, 3; 78, 14; 86, 18; vol. 3, 350, 20). On the moral level, 2Cor 10:1; Titus 3:2; Philo, Worse Attacks Better 146; Creation 103; Diodorus Siculus 19.85.3: “This prince manifested mildness and extreme indulgence”; Plutarch, Cat. Mai. 20.3 (concerning Socrates: ε—πειικω—ς καὶ πράως); Per. 39.1; Pyrrh. 23;3; Caes. 57.2; Lucian, Alex. 61; Somn. 10 (cf. H. D. Betz, Lukian von Samosata und das Neue Testament, Berlin, 1961, pp. 209–210); Dio Cassius 53.6. At Aphrodisias, Antonius Zosas: βίῳ κεχρημένον καὶ χρώμενον πράῳ καὶ ε—πειικει— (MAMA, vol. 8, 524, 7; cf. L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 13, p. 223). P.Oxy. 3007, 20–21.

¹⁸ On the link between moderation-mildness and force, cf. Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 49; Wis 2:19—“Let us try him with violence and torture in order to see what will become of his epieikeia”; Epictetus 3.20.11: “My neighbor is wicked . . . but for me he is good; he exercises my mildness and my epieikeia”; cf. 3.23.4. Cf. the understanding and indulgent masters of 1Pet 2:18 and Plutarch, Cor. 24.8: “At that time, Romans treated their domestics with consideration.”

¹⁹ Ps 86:5; Pss. Sol. 5.14; Philo, Rewards 166; Husbandry 47; Plutarch, Cam. 14.2: “Marcus Cedicius, a wise and good man, ε—πεικῆς δὲ καὶ χρηστός”; Lucian, Alex. 4.

²⁰ According to Timogenes of Alexandria, Aristobulus was conciliatory and very obliging: ε—πεικῆς . . . καὶ πολλὰ χρήσιμος (Josephus, Ant. 13.319); cf. Plutarch, Cat.Mai. 16.6; P.Herm. 20, 11 and 14; 56, 2; Dittenberger, Or. 364: ε—πεικω—ς καὶ εὐεργετικω—ς.

²¹ 2Macc 9:27; Ep. Arist. 290; Philo, Virtues 81, 140, 148; Moses 1.198; Spec. Laws 2.110; Flacc. 61; To Gaius 352; 3Macc 3:15; Polybius 5.10.1; Plutarch, Alc. 4.6; Flam. 24; Rom. 31.2; Cor. 30.7; 31.6; Lucian, Im. 11; Diodorus Siculus 5.34: “Toward strangers, the Celtiberians are mild and humane, ε—πεικει—ς καὶ φιλόανθρωποι.” A physician of Heraclea, ζω—ντα καλω—ς καὶ ε—πεικω—ς καὶ φιλανθρώπως ἀξίως τῆς τω—ν προγόνων ἀρετῆς (I.Car. 70, 8 = MAMA, vol. 6, 114); Agreophon, a generous benefactor, is praised in the second century AD for his character and his virtues: ε—πεικῆς καὶ φιλόανθρωπος πρὸς τοὺς οἰ—κέτας (P. Herrmann, “Zwei Inschriften aus Kaunos und Baba Dag,” in P. Roos, Opuscula Atheniensia, vol. 10, 1971, pp. 36–39); cf. P. Herrmann, Ergebnisse, n. 3, 10–11 (on philanthropy, see C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, vol. 2, pp. 657–684; R. Le Déaut, “Φιλανθρωπία dans la littérature grecque, jusqu’au Nouveau Testament,” in Mélanges Tisserant, vol. 1, pp. 255–294). Cf. Plutarch, De tranq. anim. 7: ε—πεικει—ς καὶ χαρίεντες.

²² Cf. I. H. Marshall, The Challenge of New Testament Ethics, London, 1946, pp. 305ff. Plato, Symp. 210 b: a lovely soul dwelling in a body that is not attractive at all; Plutarch, Thes. 16.1: “Tauros, a man of rude and savage character, ἀνὴρ οὐκ ε—πεικῆς καὶ ἡμερος τὸν τρόπον”; Philo, Dreams 2.165–167.

²³ Cited by R. A. Gauthier, Aristote: L’Ethique à Nicomaque, Paris-Louvain, 1959, vol. 2, p. 432.

²⁴ Origen, frag. 18, on Luke 1:40. For the meaning of this term in Origen, cf. H. Crouzel, Origène: Homélie sur Luc, Paris, 1962, p. 51.

²⁵ [Spicq's French is sympathique équilibre. —Tr.] Cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, pp. 802ff. The harmonious disposition of character and frame of mind (Stimmung) becomes, in relation with neighbors, an accommodating attitude, a happy harmony (Übereinstimmung).

²⁶ The epieikeia of Cimon drew sympathy (Plutarch, Arist. 23.2; cf. 25.20); that of the orators inspired confidence and formed the basis for their credibility (Demosthenes, Prooem. 45.2; LTGR, p. 123).

ε—πίθεσις

epithesis, the action of placing something on someone or something, application, laying on of hands, assault

epithesis, S 1936; TDNT 8.159–161; EDNT 2.27; MM 239; L&N 85.51; BAGD 293

The semantics of epithesis —explained by Hesychius as “among the Pythagoreans, the number two” (ho ton dyo arithmos para tois Pythagorikois)—is quite curious. The literal meaning of the word is “the action of placing on”; hence (a) application (of a coating), or laying on of hands;¹ (b) the action of placing on,² applying, attributing to, for example an epithet (cf. Aristotle, Rh. 3.2.1405b21); (c) the action of laying hands on or attacking someone (cf. the effort to seize tyrannical power, Diodorus Siculus 13.92); hence assault, aggression.

This latter, pejorative meaning is almost the only one known in the OT. A conspiracy (Hebrew qesher, conspiracy, treason) is organized against Amaziah (2Chr 25:27); “when they perceived that the attack came from Lysimachus . . . they all resisted in a wild tumult” (2Macc 4:41); Jason leads a surprise attack against the city.³ This is the constant meaning of the word in the papyri, where it is not used very often, beginning with a letter from 14 BC that tells about an attack by two people against the epistates.⁴ In the first century AD, it is almost always⁵ a case of an official complaint, for example against the slave Euporos, who violently attacked and beat his victim in the year 45 (P.Oxy. 283, 15), or against slanders and violent attacks in 47–48 (P.Mich. V, 231, 7). Later, a woman denounces two hoarders who have outrageously attacked and despoiled her (P.Oxy. 1121, 7; in AD 295), and a victim of abuse of power protests before the ekdikos (PSI 872, 4; sixth century).

The four occurrences of epithesis in the NT have nothing to do with the above meanings. They all have a religious meaning and all are instances of the phrase he epithesis ton cheiron.⁶ By the “laying on of hands,” Jesus restored health to the sick,⁷ blessed children (Matt 19:13) or his disciples (Luke 24:50), as did patriarchs with their children and the high priest with the people (Gen 48:14; Lev 9:22; Sir 50:20). In the early church, this gesture became the rite for passing on the Holy Spirit (Acts 8:17-18; Heb 6:2) or a spiritual gift (1Tim 4:14; 2Tim 1:6), that of “ordination” of deacons and presbyters (Acts 6:6). Since it communicates to the subject something possessed by the donor,⁸ it is not only a protocol for legal installation to positions in the church hierarchy (1Tim 5:22) but a sacrament that guarantees the uninterrupted succession of ministers: the beneficiary receives the same power as the one who lays hands on him.⁹

¹ The only meaning of the word in the NT, cf. below; Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.90: Jacob crosses his hands and places the right hand (τὴν δεξιὰν ἐπιτίθεισι) on Ephraim, the younger, and the left on Manasseh, the elder; Philo, Spec. Laws 1.203: the laying of hands on a victim.

² Addition (cf. ἐπιθήμα = a higher bid); Ezek 23:11: Oholibah gave herself over to passions even more corrupt than those of her sister, διέφθειρε τὴν ἐπιθέσιν (Hebrew ‘agabâh, shameless lust) αὐτῆς ὑπὲρ αὐτῆν; Ep. Arist. 93: the priests place the victim on the altar.

³ 2Macc 5:5—ἐπὶ τὴν πόλιν συνετελέσατο ἐπιθέσιν; 14:15—“Informed of the aggression by the Gentiles (τὴν ἐπιθέσιν τῶν ἐθνῶν), the Jews . . . appealed to the One who had established his people forever”; Josephus, Life 293: “armed with daggers . . . in order to be able to defend ourselves in case of an enemy attack”; Ant. 18.7: “When raids are made by large hordes of brigands”; Ep. Arist. 101: “the defense of the precincts of the sanctuary . . . in case of attack, uprising, or enemy invasion.”

⁴ P. Tebt. 15, 24: τὰ κατὰ τὴν ἐπιστατείαν ἐπιθέσεως; cf. in 109 BC the complaint of Paeis against the brigands who have ransacked his house: “as I have reason to blame this attack on a machination (διὰ τῆς ἐπιθέσεως) of Konnos” (P. Rein. 17, 9).

⁵ The single exception is from 41, in a rental contract: “I will measure out and pay with no pressure or trickery” (P. Mich. 331, 1).

⁶ Acts 8:18; 1Tim 4:14; 2Tim 1:6; Heb 6:2. On the meaning of this phrase, cf. C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, vol. 2, pp. 722–730. To the bibliography add F. Cabrol, “Imposition des mains,” in DACL, vol. 7, 1, col. 391–413; P. Galtier, “Imposition des mains,” in Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, vol.

7, 2, col. 1302–1425; J. K. Parrat, “The Laying on of Hands in the N.T.,” in ExpT, vol. 80, 1969, pp. 210–214; K. Hruby, “La Notion d’ordination dans la tradition juive,” in La Maison-Dieu, no. 102, 1970, pp. 30–56; G. C. Vogel, “L’Imposition des mains dans les rites d’ordination,” ibid., pp. 57–72; K. Grayston, “The Significance of the Word Hand in the New Testament,” in Mélanges Rigaux, pp. 479–487; C. Maurier, “ε—πιτίθημι,” in TDNT, vol. 8, pp. 159–161; E. Lohse, “χείρ,” in TDNT, vol. 9, pp. 424–434.

⁷ —Επιτίθημι, Mark 5:23; 6:5; 7:32; 8:23, 25; Luke 4:40; 13:12.

⁸ 1Tim 4:14; 2Tim 1:6; cf. J. Jeremias, “Zur Datierung der Pastoralbriefe,” in ZNW, 1961, pp. 101–104; H. Maehlum, Die Vollmacht des Timotheus nach den Pastoralbriefen, Basel, 1969, pp. 69ff.; O. Hofius, “Zur Auslegungsgeschichte von πρεσβυτέριον I Tim. IV, 14,” in ZNW, 1971, pp. 128–129.

⁹ Cf. ε—πιτίθημι = give something to someone. Xenophon, Cyr. 4.5.41: “Command them . . . to bring you all this. . . . Strike fear in the heart of the one who does not give that which is prescribed”; BGU 1208, 4 (27/26 BC).

ε—πικαλέω

epikaleo, to give a name or surname, call, designate, invite; to appeal to, call upon, invoke epikaleo, S 1941; TDNT 3.496–500; EDNT 2.28–29; NIDNTT 2.874; MM 239; L&N 33.131; BDF §§157(2), 202, 268(1), 392(3,4), 397(3), 406(2), 412(2); BAGD 294

This compound verb, in the active and the passive, means “to name, to nickname (surname), to give the name, to invite,” but in the first century it quite often has the same meaning as the simple form kaleo, “call, designate,”¹ and has no distinctive meaning of its own. It is used only once in the Synoptics, with regard to the derisive label applied to Jesus: “If they have called the master of the household Beelzebul, how much more the members of the household.”²

I. — In Acts, St. Luke conformed to the style of surnames,³ inherited from the OT,⁴ which spread throughout the Roman Empire during the Hellenistic period,⁵ especially in Egypt,⁶ but also in Babylonia and Syria-Palestine,⁷ especially among the Jews,⁸ as well as in Greece and in Asia Minor.⁹ Hence the double name of the apostle, Saulos ho kai Paulos.¹⁰ These surnames were often chosen on the basis of a distinguishing physical, moral, or religious characteristic of a person, to specify his origin (Josephus, Ant. 14.4: Quintus Metellus the Cretan) or to distinguish him from others of the same name (Acts 10:5, Simon Peter and Simon the tanner at Joppa), sometimes as a nickname chosen by fellow members of a club or fellow players of a game (IG XIV, 1517, Geminus becomes Petrokorax). Nicknames were often chosen simply because they sounded like the original name¹¹ and made it easier for a foreigner to fit into a new culture.¹² In any case, surnames were used by princes and slaves alike¹³ and by all decent folk.

To unite these two names (X is also called Y), first of all the stereotyped formula hos kai or hos e (third century BC) was used, then ho kai.¹⁴ With increasing frequency, a verb was added (hos kai kaleitai, ho kai legetai),¹⁵ and, beginning with the end of the second century AD, the present passive or middle participle (ho epikaloumenos, ho epieklemenos, ho legomenos). These references allow us to locate St. Luke's usage in the language of the time. In four cases, the name and the surname are Semitic (Acts 1:23; 4:36; 15:22; 13:8—Bar-Jesus/Elymas); in other cases, the surname is Latin or Greek (10:5, 18, 32; 11:13; 13:1); this is the case with Tabitha, translated into Latin as Dorcas, which means gazelle (9:36), and with John, who is surnamed Mark (12:21, 25). The participle is always between the article and the name.

II. — In the active or middle voice, epikaloumai often means “reproach, blame, make a claim, accuse.”¹⁶ This is the case with Potiphar's wife: “I cried out to call those in the household to help”;¹⁷ with some Carians who appeal to Cyrus (Xenophon, Cyr. 7.4.1); and with the gymnasiarch Marcus Aurelius Nepotianus, who appeals to the prefect (epikaloumenos ton lamprotaton hegemonon Aideinion Ioulianon, P.Oxy. 3286, 11). Hence we arrive at the legal sense of the Latin provocare, “appeal” to a provincial official or a higher jurisdiction, like that of the emperor. Thus St. Paul appealed to Caesar.¹⁸

Our verb also means “take someone as witness,” notably God, as a guarantor of affirmations or of personal justification.¹⁹ This is an oath formula: May God punish me, cause me to die, if I am lying. In a letter to Yesu ben Galgola, Simon bar Kochba writes, “I call heaven to witness against me that . . . I shall put fetters on your feet.”²⁰ Abraham and Eliezer call God as witness for their future conduct.²¹ Thus St. Paul protests his devotion: “As for me, I take God as my witness (ego de martyra ton theon epikaloumai) that it was to spare you that I did not come again to Corinth” (2Cor 1:23).

III. — Epikaleo in the sense of “invoke, call upon” always has a religious meaning in the LXX, and a technical value in the formula “invoke the name of God,”²² which goes back to Enoch. It is first of all a profession of faith, because to utter the divine name over someone or something (Bar 2:15, 26; 1Macc 7:37) is to make it God's property and place it under God's protection. It is to set apart a people, a city, or a sanctuary to worship and serve God, on account of which God protects them.²³ At the Jerusalem Council (Acts 15:17), James quotes Amos 9:12, where “all the nations upon whom my name is invoked” are called to the messianic kingdom, but the pagans are precisely those “who do not invoke his name” (Jer 10:25).

In the NT, the name is that of Jesus Christ, recognized as Lord and God, such that the formula “invoke the name” is probably linked to baptism, where it is professed that “whoever calls upon the name of the Lord will be saved”²⁴ and where a person is purified of sins by “calling upon his name” (Acts 22:16). This is the designation of Christians according to Acts 9:14, where Saul has the power to “bind all those who call upon your name.”

This invocation becomes ecclesial and ecumenical in the epistles of St. Paul. First Corinthians is addressed to “those who call upon the name of our Lord Jesus Christ in any place” (1Cor 1:2), the church being the gathering of those who adore Christ, who celebrate his worship (cf. Ps 145:18) and pray to him from a pure heart.²⁵ Over against the religious individualism of the Greek cities, all believers are united in their adoration of Christ as Lord and God; their common “invocation” is the expression of their unity. “He is the same Lord for all (Jews and Gentiles), rich toward all who call upon him, for whoever calls upon the name of the Lord will be saved” (Rom 10:12–13; cf. Heb 11:16). If the invocation of the name is always salvific and implies worship in the NT, the call for help in the OT is less accentuated, with divine protection and generosity being more emphasized.

IV. — In the magical papyri, he epikaloumene is a technical term designating the woman who has made a charm, a “spell-caster,”²⁶ invoking Thoth-Hermes, who presides over funerals, and urging him to conquer the heart (the enkephalon) of the one whom she loves, precisely by means of this charm which she has executed. The one invoked can be either a demon (the nekydaimon) who is asked to intervene, or the spirit of the person for whom the action is done. Cf. Pap.Graec.Mag. 4, 1749: “Say this: I invoke you, the ruler of all becoming” (lege ton logon touton: epikaloumai se, ton archegeten pases geneseos, vol. I, p. 128); 1812: “I have called upon your great name” (epikeklemai to mega sou onoma); 1822: “give me the submission of every soul that I shall invoke” (dos de moi pases psyches hypotagen, hes an epikalesomai, vol. I, p. 218); V, 470: “I call upon you, the ruler of the gods ... it is I who call upon you” (epikaloumai se, ton dynasten ton theon . . . ego eimi ho epikaloumenos se, vol. I, p. 196); P.Leid. W, 9, 35: “call upon the god of the hour and the god of the day” (epikalou ton tes horas kai ton tes hemeras theon); P.Oxy. 886, 10, an appeal to the sun and all the gods concerning things with respect to which one wishes to receive an omen (third century AD).

¹ Notably in Philo: “The animal called (ε—πικαλούμενον) the serpent-fighting grasshopper” (Philo, Creation 163); “the seven stars that are called wanderers” (Decalogue 103); “a feast called the feast of Unleavened Bread” (Spec. Laws 1.181); “the feast called that of Tabernacles” (Spec. Laws 1.189); cf. 1.146; “this half-human, half-beast being that is called Minotaur” (3.44); “the districts called nomes” (Contemp. Life 21); Abraham 82. The distinction between the two verbs is clear in Acts 1:23— “Joseph called (τὸν καλούμενον) Barsabbas (patronymic name), who was nicknamed (ὄς ε—πεκλήθη) Justus (Latin surname).”

² Matt 10:25. Beelzebul is the dung-god, i.e., the god of idolatrous sacrifices; cf. Matt 12:24, 27; Str-B, vol. 1, pp. 631ff.

³ L. Cerfaux, “Le ‘Supernomen’ dans le Livre des Actes,” in ETL, 1936, pp. 74–80; republished in Recueil L. Cerfaux, vol. 2, pp. 175–182.

⁴ Gen 17:5, 15 (Abram, Abraham; Sarai, Sarah), 32:28 (Jacob, Israel); 41:45 (Joseph, Zephenath-Paneah). These new names were given by a higher authority or by God; cf. Simon, Cephas (Mark 3:16).

⁵ M. Lambertz, “Zur Ausbreitung des Supernomen oder signum im Römischen Reich,” in Glotta, vol. 4, 1913, pp. 89–143; vol. 5, 1914, pp. 99–170. Josephus, Ant. 18.206: Tiberius surnamed Gemellus.

⁶ R. Calderini, “Ricerche sul doppio nome personale nell’ Egitto greco-romano,” in Aeg, 1941, pp. 221–260; 1942, pp. 3–45 (at the time, the papyrological documentation comprised 2,400 examples). Philo, Moses 2.29: “Ptolemy, surnamed (ε—πικληθείς) Philadelphus”; Josephus, War 1.60: Zenon surnamed Cotylas; 1.65; Ant. 12.30—Ptolemy surnamed Epiphanes; P.Petaus XII, 7: “Phaesis, son of Mysthes, called (ε—πικαλούμενος) Kolluthos”; XIII, 62: Ptolemy surnamed Philometor; XXVI, 3: “Sarapion, son of Kephalos, surnamed Strouthein”; XXVIII, 20, Tmunache, who bears the name Kouiteleis; XLVIII, 16; XLIX, 21; BGU 1893, 514; 1896, 250; P.Phil. 4, 17; P.Oslo 17, 3; 111, 161; P.Mich. 174, 11; 241, 40 (in AD 16); 288, 4; 309, 2; 632, 13 (in AD 26); 537, 2; P.Oxy. 2231, 10 and 42; 2284 A 4; 2473, 4; P.Princ. 38, 1; 63, 9; P.Stras. 363, 14; UPZ 106, 1: “King Ptolemy, surnamed Alexander” = P.Fay. 12, 1; A. Bernand, Fayoum, n. 6; P.Köln 50, 17; 51, 1. A graffito: “Menelaus surnamed Oserapiakos” (A. Bernand, Pan, n. 36, etc.).

⁷ P.Dura 18, 7, 25; 19, 2, 3 (F. Cumont, Fouilles de Doura-Europus, p. 342); at Orchoi, in lower Mesopotamia, “Artemidorus, son of Diogenes (Greek names), also called Minnanaios” (a theophoric name from the goddess Nanaia, who was assimilated to Artemis—SEG XVIII, 596, 3);

Josephus, Ant. 12.223, Seleucus surnamed Soter; Ag.Apion 1.185, Demetrius surnamed Poliorketes.

⁸ Josephus, Ant. 18.95, Joseph surnamed Caiaphas; 18.16, John surnamed Baptist. Cf. H. J. Cadbury, “Some Semitic Names in Luke-Acts,” in Amicitiae Corolla (Volume of Essays presented to J. R. Harris), London, 1933, pp. 45–56.

⁹ “Democratia, who is also (ἡ καὶ) Parthenike” (N. Firatli, L. Robert, Stèles funéraires, n. 108; cf. n. 110).

¹⁰ Acts 13:9; cf. Str-B, vol. 2, p. 712; cf. Ricciotti, Saint Paul apôtre, Paris, 1952, pp. 188ff.

¹¹ Joshua was rendered in Greek as Jason or Jesus, Simeon as Simon, Silas as Silvanus.

¹² The two names could be interchangeable: John and Mark, Levi and Matthew, Nathaniel and Bartholomew, Cephas and Peter. Sometimes the “barbarous” name was the surname, P.Amh. 56, 1; 57, 1: Διόδωρος ὃς καὶ Πετεσοῦχος.

¹³ “Discorous, surnamed Sarapous, slave” (P.Brux. 19, 21; a census declaration of the second century AD); P.Oxy. 3117, 29.

¹⁴ Numerous examples in Mayser, Grammatik, vol. 2, 1, p. 60. Cf. —Απολλώνιος ὃς καὶ Σκέλετος (SB 286, 7; cf. P.Tebt. 109, 1, 11; 164, 6); for women, Ἀμμωνία ἡ καὶ Σεμνί—νις (P.Giss. 36, 10); Ἐμισιγήσις ἡ καὶ Βερενίκη (P.Rein. 11, 11; cf. 16, 41).

¹⁵ In literary texts, notably Josephus, there is often the aorist passive participle ε—πικληθείς, ε—πικληθέντα.

¹⁶ In the receipt for part of an inheritance in AD 78, “neither Maron nor any of his representatives made any claim or accusation against his brother” (P.Fay. 97, 20; BGU 350, 14). A malefactor, responsible for pillaging, is accused by Tnas son of Arnouphis (P.Hib. 62, 5; third century BC).

¹⁷ Philo, Joseph 51. Cf. 1Kgs 13:2—“He cried out against the altar”; Josephus, Ant. 5.58: call for help; 13.276, 277, 358; 15.262; 18.91, 97, 151, 230, 339; 18.169; 19.268. P.Oslo 7, 3: ε—πικαλούμενος = summoned. Applying judicial procedure, the strategos summoned him (ε—πεκαλέσατο αὐτόν, P.Cair.Isid. 70, 10; cf. P.Oxy. 2187, 19). In a legal fragment from the third century, δούλων ε—πίκλησις is “recourse against slaves” (P.Lille XXIX, col. I, 27).

¹⁸ Καίσαρα ε—πικαλοῦμαι, Acts 25:11, 12, 21; 26:32; 28:19; cf. Josephus, Ant. 16.104. Every Roman citizen had the right to be judged at Rome even with regard to a capital offense; “Si apud acta quis appellaverit, satis erit si dicat appello” (Dig. 49.1, 2). Plutarch, Marc. 2.7: Capitolinus appealed to the tribunes of the people, but they rejected his appeal; Ti. Gracch. 16.1, laws giving the people the right of appeal from judicial verdicts. BGU 628 (cf. A. Steinwenter, “Bibel und Rechtsgeschichte,” in JJP, vol. 15, 1965, pp. 10–16); P.Yale inv. 1606 (N. Lewis, “Un nouveau texte sur la juridiction du préfet d’Egypte,” in RHDFE, 1972, pp. 5–12); M. Adinolfi, “San Paolo e le Autorità Romane negli Atti degli Apostoli,” in Anton, 1978, pp. 464ff.

¹⁹ Pagans commonly called the gods as witnesses (μάρτυρες θεοί, μάρτυρας καλω—θεούς); cf. I.Did. 277, 10: διὰ θείων θεσπισμάτων πολλάκις ε—μαρτύρησεν; 243, 8. A Christian inscription at Denizli: μάρτυρα τὸν θεὸν δίδω ὅτι, “I call God to witness that I built this tomb at my own expense” (published by L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 11–12, Paris, 1960, p. 430, who cites p. 450: μάρτυς —Απόλλων). St. Paul invokes this divine testimony: μάρτυς γάρ μου ε—στιν ὁ θεός, ᾧ λατρεύω (Rom 1:9); μάρτυς γάρ μου ὁ θεός ὡς ε—πιπόω—πάντας ὑμα—ς (Phil 1:8; 2Cor 1:23).

²⁰ F. M. Cross, Jr., “La Lettre de Simon ben Kosba,” in RB, 1956, pp. 45–48.

²¹ —Επικαλοῦνται τὸν θεὸν μάρτυρα τῶ—ν ε—σομένων, Josephus, Ant. 1.243. Cf. the Christian petition from a colonist to his patron in the sixth century: μάρτυρα γὰρ ε—πικαλοῦμαι τὸν δεσπότην θεόν (P.Oxy. 2479, 24). People appeal to God for vengeance (ε—πικαλει—σθαι; cf. J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1938, p. 445, n. 246), to send punishment (Josephus, Ant. 17.64). “I invoke and appeal to God Most High . . . against those who betrayed and poisoned the unhappy Heraclea” (Dittenberger, Syl. 1181, 1 = CII 725).

²² Gen 4:26, cf. 12:8; 21:33; 26:25; 48:16; 1Chr 16:8; etc. Philo, Worse Attacks Better 138; Josephus, War 2.394: “How will you call upon God for your defense if you willingly abandon the worship that you owe him?”; 5.438: “Often they implored, they invoked the awful name of God, begging that some morsel be left them”; Ant. 4.222: they implored God to be merciful; 7.202; 8.283; 9.8. O. Cullmann, Vorträge und Aufsätze, Tübingen, 1966, pp. 605–622; P. E. Langevin, “Ceux qui invoquent le nom du Seigneur' (I Cor. I, 2),” in ScEccl, 1967, pp. 373–407, and in ScEs, 1968, pp. 113–126.

²³ Deut 28:10; Isa 63:19; Jer 7:10; 14:9; 25:29. Israel and the temple have “the honor of bearing the name that is exalted and majestic” (2Macc 8:15; cf. 1Macc 7:37); Jas 2:7—“The good name that is invoked over you.” The Jews call upon God to obtain his help (Ep. Arist. 193, 226; cf. 17); Jos. Asen. 25.7—“They will call upon the God of Israel, who will send fire from heaven that will consume you, and the angels of God will fight against you.” Likewise the pagans (Xenophon, Cyr. 7.1.35; Dittenberger, Or. 194, 18), invoking Demeter (Epictetus 3.21.12; cf. 2.7.12) or the goddess Lucina (Diodorus Siculus 5.73; cf. 5.79).

²⁴ Joel 3:5 = Acts 2:21—ὃς ἂν ἐ—πικαλέσηται; cf. the prayer of St. Stephen, “making this invocation and saying, ‘Lord Jesus, receive my spirit’” (cf. F. Zeman, “L’Eglise dans la perspective des Actes des Apôtres: ‘Tous ceux qui invoquent ton Nom’ [Act. IX, 14],” in Studia, 13, Paris, 1962, pp. 67–83). In 1Pet 1:17, one might hesitate between the present middle indicative ἐ—πικαλει—σθαι, “if you call upon me as father,” and the present active indicative καλει—τε (P72, Sahidic, Old Latin), which would be translated, “If you call Father the one who without partiality judges each one according to his works.” God the Father is the God of Jesus Christ.

²⁵ 2Tim 2:22; cf. 2Kgs 5:11; Zeph 3:9; Ps 102:2-3; 118:5; Sir 47:5; 51:9–11.

²⁶ G. Giangrande, “Hermes and the Marrow: A Papyrus Love-Spell,” in Ancient Society, vol. 9, 1978, pp. 101–116; cites Pap.Graec.Mag. 4, 1719: “Sword of Dardanos: magical action, called ‘sword’” (πρα—ξις ἡ καλουμένη ξίφος, vol. I, p. 126).

ἐ—πιμέλεια, ἐ—πιμελέομαι, ἐ—πιμελω—ς epimeleia, care, solicitude, attention; epimeleomai, to take care of, attend to; epimelos, attentively, diligently

epimeleia, S 1958; EDNT 2.31; MM 241–242; L&N 35.44; BAGD 296 | epimeleomai, S 1959; EDNT 2.31; MM 242; L&N 30.40, 35.44; BDF §§101, 176(2); BAGD 296 | epimelos, S 1960; EDNT 2.31; MM 242; L&N 30.41; BAGD 296

These terms present no difficulty with regard to meaning¹ and are abundantly used in the Koine, notably in the papyri and the inscriptions; at least the first two terms are. On the other hand, they are rare in the NT (which does not use epimeletes). Hence the need to bring them to life, as it were, by providing parallels from pagan sources.

I. — At the stopover at Sidon, “Julius treated Paul with courtesy (or amicably, literally with humanity) and allowed him to visit his friends and receive their care, epimeleias tychein.”² The commentators observe that this latter expression is excellent Greek,³ but should it be translated “care, treatment” or “good offices, solicitude”? The two meanings are equally attested. From Plato on,⁴ epimeleia is used for the attention and care given a sick or disabled person, and this meaning is retained by the medical writers, notably Hippocrates and Galen.⁵ In the third century BC, a decree of Cos honors a physician: “he performed epimeleian for the citizens according to the healing art” (epimeleian epoieito ton politan kata tan technan tan iatrikan). It goes on to praise him for his goodwill and epimeleia.⁶ At Gortyn, the physician Hermias for five years cared for the citizens, the metics, and the allies; “he performed epimeleia and saved them from great danger” (epimeleian epoiesato kai esose es megalon kindynon, I.Cret. IV, n. 168, 15; p. 231). Care can be provided for a patient not only by a physician but any devoted person in his entourage: “since you provided all epimeleia and refreshment for me in my illness and old age” (epeideper pasan anapausin kai epimeleian epoiesas moi en to emo noso kai gero, a will, P.Cair.Masp. 67154, B 19ff.) and so is used for all the kinds of devotion lavished on an aged or disabled person.

By extension, epimeleia is used for the effort and care expended on any task whatsoever: the librarian who completes his collection of books and repairs those that are in poor condition (Ep. Arist. 29, 317); the maintenance of canals and banks (P.Panop.Beatty 2, 223) and lands (1, 403), of vineyards (Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 16, 8), of palm groves (ibid. VIII, 21); vegetable farming (P.Panop.Beatty 1, 249–250), all agricultural labors (Ep. Arist. 107; P.Mert. X, 17: “let the entire remaining agricultural epimeleia be completed,” ten allen georgiken epimeleian pasan epiteleito, from 28 July AD 21; P.Tebt. 703, 66; from 260 BC), irrigation (P.Oxy. 2767, 10); the raising of horses (P.Oxy. 2480, 97: eis epimeleian ton hippon; cf. P.Alex. 12, 20), of cattle (Philo, Prov. 2.27); the setting up of a statue by the agonothetai (I.Car. 79, 11, ten epimeleian tes anastaseos poiesamenon; cf. I.Lind. 472, 10; 474, 8); any “business” whatsoever,⁷ whether concerning the duties of the king (Ep. Arist. 245; Dittenberger, Or. 383, 49: emais epimeleiais) or of statesmen (Aristotle, Pol. 3.5.10); or toward a deceased person (from a will: “for the epimeleia of my body,” pros ten epimeleian tou somatos mou; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 14, 28; P.Oxy. 2857, 19, from May 17, 134); to occupy one’s leisure time (Wis 13:13), “topreside at the service of the gods” (Demosthenes, C. Andr. 78: pros toustheous epimeleias), to keep a sanctuary in decent condition,⁸ to servethe ibis shelters (P.Fouad XVI, 5 = SB 9628, 1), to oversee functionaries,⁹ etc.

In a special sense, epimeleia is used for a public duty or function (Dinarchus, C. Phil. 3.15–16; 1Macc 16:14—“Simon, taking care of matters related to the administration of their cities”; P.Fouad 20, 5; P.Cair. Isid. 79, 8). It is not rare for those who are responsible to justify their inspection rounds on the grounds that it is their duty—“for this is my epimeleia ” (toutogar he epimeleia mou, P.Oxf. III, 3; AD 142; P.Oxy. 2560, 11: “according to his epimeleia ” (kata ten autou epimeleian)—and they are not free to neglect their responsibilities (P.Oxy. 2228, 43). For example, the epimeleia of the epebes¹⁰ and the obligation of officers to carry out their duties¹¹ are known, but in their honorific decrees the cities praise functionaries who have demonstrated diligence, like Agathocles at Istrus around AD 200, who proved himself “full of ardor in the exercise of magistracies, in publicservices, and in councils.”¹² If this “care in well-doing” (Ep. Arist. 18) is praised, it is because it implies a favorable disposition (ibid. 282), great carefulness,¹³ effort (Menander, Dysk. 862), solicitude (Philo, Prov. 2.99; P.Princ. 151, 18; SB 8858, 10), and zeal (Xenophon, Cyn. 1.17; P.Tebt. 769, 5).

This term was used especially for the care and devotion shown by parents or nurses to children. For example, Termouthis raised little Moses polles epimeleias (Josephus, Ant. 2.236); 21 May AD 26, in a nurse’s contract, “the declarer undertakes to give complete care and help to the infant, as is her duty” (P.Rein. 103, 17; cf. BGU 1106, 28, from 13 BC; SB 9534, 17: ta tekna hemon epimeleias tynchaneto, the conclusion of a letter of the third century AD). This Christian letter from the third-fourth century says it all; Thonis assures her dear Heracleus: “I will care for him as if he were my own son.”¹⁴ This reminder of the scope of the task,¹⁵ of the absolute devotion and self-giving required, should never be forgotten with reference to the charge to the Ephesian overseer (1Tim 3:5.)

II. — The verb epimeleomai also has a medical definition, attested only by St. Luke in the NT: the good Samaritan, after dressing the victim’s wounds, takes him to the hostelry where he takes care of him (kai epemelethe autou), probably by watching over him through the night; and when he leaves, he tells the innkeeper “take care of him, epimeletheti autou ” (Luke 10:34-35). Here the reference would seem to be not to remedies or medical treatment per se but rather to watchfulness, devotion, or health-care in the broad sense of the term. At least it is in this sense that the word is copiously attested in papyrological letters, in a quasi-stereotyped form: “take care of yourself so that you may be healthy” (epimelou seautou hin’ hygiaines).¹⁶ Sometimes the health of children is specified.¹⁷

One watches over persons,¹⁸ just as one “busies oneself” with this or that undertaking,¹⁹ whether it is someone copying a letter (1Macc 11:37); or God, who “busies himself with human affairs”;²⁰ or Abel, who has a concern for justice (Josephus, Ant. 1.53); or subjects, who must observe the laws (ibid. 8.297: ton nomimon epimelesomenous). In the vocabulary of the inscriptions, this nuance of completing a task predominates.²¹ In 287 BC, an Athenian decree honors the poet Philippides, who “has busied himself (epimelethe) with all the other games and sacrifices in the name of the city . . . drawing on his own personal revenues” (Dittenberger, Syl. 374, 45); “let the magistrates charged with administration busy themselves (epimelethenai) with the crown and the proclamation” (ibid. 374, 67). In 271/270, the taxiarchs are honored because “they all busied themselves with their own tribes” (SEG XIV, 64, 13). In AD 158, a regulation from Gazorus in Macedonia for the use of public properties notes: “There are people willing to do the work and receive a share of the harvest.”²²

Thus we can understand how Paul could write “If someone cannot govern his own household how can he look after a church of God?” (1Tim 3:5), because on the one hand episkopos —for that is the function he is discussing—is a title given to governors (in colonies), to certain magistrates (in autonomous cities), and to high-ranking functionaries of associations,²³ such as the episkopos -administrator of the association of Ameinicheitai at Delos;²⁴ and on the other hand episkopou means “take care” (P.Oxy. 2838, 9; from 4 February 62). This term probably says nothing about the object of stewardship and oversight, but it suggests the diligence and prudence of an official of the household of God and its worship.²⁵ Not only does the episkopos watch over and busy himself with the community, but he also sees to its spiritual needs and devotes all his energy to it.²⁶

III. — This is confirmed by the adverb epimelos in the Koine,²⁷ which emphasizes the attentiveness (of a hearer, Ep. Arist. 81), the diligence exercised in worship (Menander, Dysk. 37), efforts expended in a conversion (stele of Moschion, SB 8026, 16 = SEG VIII, 464), the care taken in raising children (Prov 13:24, piel of the Hebrew verb shahar: epimelos paideuei; Josephus, Ant. 17.12; cf. PSI 405, 20), in purifying a temple (ibid. 12.318), for a neighbor (P.Oxy. 1581, 14), to fatten cattle (P.Fay. 121, 7), the exact placement of a torture victim on the wheel so as to break his back (4Macc 11:18). In this last case, the term corresponds to the Aramaic ‘asparna’ of Ezra 6:8, 12, 13: “strictly.” This application (P.Oxy. 1675, 15), diligence, and zeal are exclusive; thus the object of the thoughts of man was only evil, in Gen 6:5, where epimelos translates the Hebrew restrictive adverb raq. This is how we should understand Luke 15:8; the woman who had lost a drachma “searched diligently (epimelos) until she found it” (zetei epimelos heos hou heure); she did only that, ceasing her other occupations—like the shepherd who left the ninety-nine faithful sheep—and gave total and exclusive attention to this search, until it was complete. . . .

¹ For the contract form of the verb and its use in the papyri, cf. B. G. Mandilaras, Verb, p. 472. On Diodorus Siculus 19.29.3—“Antipater had been designated epimeletes, ” i.e., regent, F. Bizière comments: “The term epimeletes, ‘commissioner, authorized representative,’ is rather vague and its meaning depends on the context, cf. W. A. Ferguson, Hellenistic Athens, London, 1911, p. 47, n. 3” (Diodore de Sicile: Bibliothèque historique, book 19, Paris, 1975, p. 157). Cf. in the construction industry, ε—πιμελητω—ν τοῦ ἔργου (P.Köln 52, 32 and 80; P.Oxy. 1450, 24).

² Acts 27:3. G. Mussies (Dio Chrysostom, p. 134) cites as parallels Dio Chrysostom 1.16–17; 3.55.

³ Plutarch, Thes. 27.6: “They say that the wounded Amazons were sent secretly to Chalcis by Antiope to be cared for there, τυγχάνειν ε—πιμελείας”; Philo, Spec. Laws 3.106: the victim of ill-treatment goes to bed and follows a suitable regimen (ε—πιμελείας τυχών) that allows him to get up and go out again. In 288, in an undertaking to reduce the administrative personnel in imperial domains (they do nothing and consume revenues), a responsible superintendent is to choose two or three collaborators who will turn their attention to the state of the treasury, αι—ταμιακαὶ οὐσίαι τῆς προσηκούσης ε—πιμελείας τεύξονται (P.Oxy. 58, 22); τετευχῶς πάσης ε—πιμελείας (P.Oxy. 91, 19; second century AD); P.Lips. 31, 20; SB 10621, 20 (third century); cf. other parallels in F. Field, Notes on the Translation, p. 143.

⁴ Plato, Leg. 4.720 d: the slave “frees his master from the care of the sick, τω—ν καμνόντων τῆς ε—πιμελείας”; Dittenberger, Syl. 943, 10: διὰ τὰν ε—πιμέλειαν . . . τω—ν καμνόντων. In Luke 10:34-35, ε—πιμελέομαι is used for the care of the corpse, cf. below, II, pp. 000ff.

⁵ Cf. W. K. Hobart, Medical Language, pp. 269ff., especially N. van Brock (Vocabulaire médical, pp. 236ff.), who notes that ε—πιμέλεια has the sense of “treatment” and sometimes “dressing” (Hippocrates, Artic. 11).

⁶ —Επαινέσαι . . . εὐνοίας ἔνεκεν καὶ ε—πιμελείας, Dittenberger, Syl. 943, 4, 16, 24; cf. L. Cohn-Haft, The Public Physicians of Ancient Greece, Northampton, 1956, p.90.

⁷ 2Macc 11:23—πρὸς τὴν τω—ν ι—δίων ε—πιμέλειαν; P.Amh. II, 64, 12; P.Oxy. 1070, 22. The commissioners of the Amphiaraiion of Oropos in 329/8, elected by the people “to see to the contest and anything pertaining to the festival (ε—πὶ τὴν ε—πιμέλειαν τοῦ ἀγω—νος) saw to their task diligently and with zeal (καλω—ς καὶ φιλοτίμως ε—πεμελήθησαν)” (Dittenberger, Syl. 298, 12; cf. Prov 13:4); P.Vindob.Worp 14, 6. Diodorus Siculus 17.7.2; 17.65.3; 17.114.1.

⁸ A decree of the Acarnanians in 216 BC that undertakes the care of the sanctuary of Apollo at Actium; J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. 29, 25.

⁹ A loan from 28 August 44: “Archidikastes, in charge of the oversight (τῆ ε—πιμελεία) of the chrematistai and other tribunals” (P.Fouad 44, 1; cf. P.Mil.Vogl. 26, 1); P.Lips. 10, col. I, 1; P.Oxy. 281, 2 (in 20–50); P.Mich. 528, 2; 614, 10; P.Fam.Tebt. 20, 3 (a friendly accord of 120/1); SB 9145, 1 (the purchase of a slave, under Commodus). Cf. the ε—πιμεληταὶ οἴνου (BGU 2296, 1; PSI 820; P.Ant. 108), the ε—πιμεληταὶ ε—σθήτος, who raise provisions for the army (P.Stras. 618; N. Lewis, Inventory of Compulsory Services, New Haven-Toronto, 1968, under this word); for this class of usages, an epimeleia is an office involving stewardship, cf. J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1976, p. 516, n. 549.

¹⁰ Aristotle, Ath. Pol. 42.2–3; IG X, 2, n. 236, 238: ε—πιμελουμένου τω—ν ε—φήβων; cf. C. Pelekidis, Ephébie attique, pp. 132–136. On ὁ ε—πιμελητής τῆς πόλεως of Athens in the first century, cf. P. Graindor, Athènes de Tibère à Trajan, Cairo, 1931, pp. 80ff.; on the ε—πιμέλεια ε—σθήτος, P.Lips. 60, 5, 11.

¹¹ Letter of Ptolemy IV Philopator to a provincial governor in the third century BC: σοὶ καθήκον ἦν ε—πιμέλειαν ποιει—σθαι (C. B. Welles, Royal Correspondence, n.30,12).

¹² —Εν τε ται—ς ἀρχαι—ς καὶ ται—ς ε—πιμελείταις (NCIG, n. VI, 7). Cf. the Hierothesion of Arsameia: τούτων ε—πιμέλειαν καὶ προστασίαν ι—ερεῦσιν ε—πέτραψα (in H. Waldmann, Die kommagenischen Kultreformen, Leiden, 1973, p. 84, 75). In first-century Latin, “cura is the attentive care of the princeps, his solicitude for the state” (J. Béranger, Principatus, Geneva, 1973, p. 187).

¹³ P.Wisc. 34, 22, 29; cf. the decree in honor of a phourarch in 170 BC, at Lepisia: “Let the people attend to him, εἶναι αὐτὸν ε—ν ε—πιμελεία παρὰ τω— δῆμῳ” (NCIG, n. IV, 19; cf. ibid. VII, B 12, at Miletus in 167–160). Plutarch, Ti. Gracch. 3.1: the exercise of magistracies.

¹⁴ P.Oxy. 1493, 10 = M. Naldini, Il Cristianesimo in Egitto, p. 165.

¹⁵ Menander, Dysk. 38: “she inspired us to care for her”; 228: “for us to protect this little girl.” A ready heart is apparent, P.Athen. 15, 1 (end of the first century).

¹⁶ P.Mert. 62, 13 (AD 6); P.Princ. 186, 16, (AD 28); P.Mich. 464, 16: “do not trouble yourself on our account, but take care of yourself” (AD 99); P.Fay. 119, 24 (AD 100); PSI 1312, 10 (second century BC); P.Lond. 42, 32; P.Ryl. 664, 3; P.land. 104, 11; P.Bad. 35, 27; P.Oxy. 294, 30–31; 1479, 13 (first century BC); 1154, 6; C.Ord.Ptol. 60, 16; P.Yale 40, 3, 42, 38; SB 7659, 8 (11 February AD 49); 8257, 5 (second century BC); 8754, 39 (49/48 BC); 9259, 38 (12 January 229 BC), etc., cf. N. van Brock, Vocabulaire médical, pp. 237ff. G. Zecchini, “Lettera de Sosibios ad Archias,” in Aeg, 1974, pp. 105–106. We can see how the medical sense of the word remained in popular usage from ε—πιμ. in Prov. 2.22, where Philo opposes medicine for the body to that for the soul, writing: “those who have devoted themselves to a counterfeit training have not followed the example of physicians, ὅσοι δὲ νόθου παιδείας ε—πεμελήθησαν. . . .”

¹⁷ P.Oxy. 744, 6: παρακαλω— σε ε—πιμελήθι (read -ήθητι) τω— παιδίω (first century BC); P.Rein. 109, 5: “Watch over your health and that of your children” (131 BC).

¹⁸ P.Athen. 60, 13: ε—πιμέλου δὲ Τιτόας καὶ Σφαίρου (Ptolemaic period).

¹⁹ C.P.Herm. 5, 18: ε—πιμελούμενοι τω—ν πραγμάτων ὁμοῦ καὶ τω—ν λειτουργημάτων (fourth century); P.Mert. 24, 13; P.Oxy. 2190, 21; P.Hib. 253, 8; SB 6768, 9.

²⁰ Philo, Prov. 2.112: τὸν θεὸν τω—ν ἀνθρωπίνων ε—πιμελει—σθαι πραγμάτων.

²¹ In a decree from the third century BC in honor of a market clerk of Parion: ε—πεὶ οὖν ε—στιν τοι—ς συνέδροις ε—πιμελει—σθαι τω—ν καλω—ν καὶ ἀγάω—ν ἀνδρῶ—ν (Dittenberger, Syl. 596 = I.Ilium, n. III, 19). “The expression ‘take care of someone (or something)’ —here IG, XII, 23–27: ε—πιμέλεισθαι αὐτω—ν—is used classically to characterize a function entrusted either to a sort of ‘commissioner’ (thus might we translate ε—πιμελητής, which is somewhat equivalent to the Roman curator), or to a magistrate, or to the council. It is encountered frequently in the honorific decrees of the fifth century [in a note, references to Aristotle, Ath. Pol. 42.2; C. Pelekidis, Ephébie attique, p. 107, n. 8; 132, n. 2; 135, n. 2; Dittenberger, Syl. 158, 16–17; 207, 17–18; 262, 17–18]” (P. Gauthier, Symbola, p. 254). On epimeletai in the papyri, cf. Prosop.Ptol., vol. 8, pp. 78ff.

²² NCIG, n. XXVII, 13; cf. VIII, 24: a decree of Argos in favor of the Rhodians: “Let the ambassadors see to it that the crown is proclaimed . . .”

let the treasurer and the Twenty-Four busy themselves with it.” Philip of Macedonia asks Agathocles to administrate Perrhaebia: διαφθεροῦντα Περραιβούς καὶ τῶν ἐκεῖ πραγμάτων ἐπιμελησόμενον (Theopompus, frag. 81, in Athenaeus 6.260). A city’s agoretēs saw to the regular stocking of the marketplace (ἐπιμελομένου τοῦ τῆς πόλεως ἀγορητοῦ; I GLS 4028, 35).

²³ H. Bellen, “—Επίσκοποι,” in DKP, Stuttgart, 1967, vol. 2, col. 323.

²⁴ I. Delos 1522; cf. P. Bruneau, Recherches sur les cultes de Délos, Paris, 1970, pp. 630ff. Philo, “commissioner of the great association of the great god Pramarrēs” (SB 1269, 10; in AD 104). At Ephesus, there was an “epimeletes of the secretariat of Julius Philometor” and an epimeletes of the Olympiad” (cf. L. Robert, “Sur des inscriptions d’Ephèse,” in RevPhil, 1967, p. 43), and at Olympus an “epimeletes of Zeus” (I. Olymp. n. 65, 3; 80, 5; 437, 11; 468, 3; SEG XVI, 199).

²⁵ Aristotle designated public responsibilities or functions as services (ἐπιμέλεια), Pol. 6.8.3ff., 1321a ff. Among the indispensable magistracies (ἀναγκαῖαι ἐπιμέλεια) are those responsible for religious affairs (1322b). See the references in C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, vol. 1, pp. 445ff. Priests, in particular, busy themselves with the temple and the sacrifices: ἐπιμελίσθωσαν αὐτῶν ἱερείς (Dittenberger, Or. 383, 187); ἐπιμελεῖσθαι τῆς θυσίας, (LSCG, n. 93, 35; 96, 19; 103, 11; 136, 5; 171, 6, 9, 12; 177, 6, 115). Cf. at Delos, “this duty (for the dividing up of the victims) shall devolve upon the successive commissioners in charge of the sacrifice, ἐπιμελεῖσθαι τοὺς ἀεὶ γινομένους ἐπιμελητὰς τῆς θυσίας” (F. Durrbach, Choix, n. 21, 29); at Athens, ὅπως ἂν οἱ ἀστυνόμοι οἱ ἀεὶ λαγχάνοντες ἐπιμέλειαν ποιῶνται τοῦ ἱεροῦ (Dittenberger, Syl. 375, 10). On the epimeletai of the temple (P. Stras. 463 ter, 2, etc.), cf. P. Roesch, Thespis et la Confédération béotienne, 1965, p. 202; J. Aubonnet, Aristote: Politique, Paris, 1973, vol. 2, 2, p. 304, n. 5. In Iberia, “the priests also see to legal affairs regarding the neighboring peoples, ἐπιμελοῦνται καὶ τῶν πρὸς τοὺς ὁμόρους δικαίων” (Strabo 11.3.6).

²⁶ Cf. Menander, Dysk. 212: “Take care of your father, ἐπιμελοῦ τε τοῦ πατρός”; 240: “Take care of my sister”; 618: “Take care of what is necessary”; P. Oxy. 2969, 8: πασαν ἐπιμέλειαν καὶ ὑπηρεσίαν . . . ἀδιαλίπτως.

²⁷ Attested from the third century BC (P. Heid. 196, 1, inv.; cf. E. Sidgmann, Literarische griechische Texte der Heidelberger Papyrussammlung, Heidelberg, 1956, p. 41). For its medical usages, cf. Dioscorides, Mat.

Med. 1.24; Galen, Aliment. Comm. 3.21: καὶ δεῖ— τὸν ἰ—ητρὸν ἀκριβῶ—ς καὶ ἐ—πιμελῶ—ς νοῦν προσέχειν. Cf. W. K. Hobart, Medical Language, p. 270.

ἐ—πιούσιος

epiousios, coming next, for tomorrow; for subsistence, necessary

epiousios, S 1967; TDNT 2.590–599; EDNT 2.31–32; NIDNTT 1.251; MM 242–243; L&N 67.183, 67.206; BDF §§123(1), 124; BAGD 296–297

The fourth petition of the Lord’s Prayer is formulated thus in Matt 6:11—ton arton hemon ton epiousion dos hemin semeron; in Luke 11:3—ton arton hemon ton epiousion didou hemin to kath’ hemeran. In the first text, the aorist imperative dos denotes punctiliar action and envisions only the present day; in the second, the present imperative didou has a nuance of continuity: do not cease to give us (daily) that which is necessary to us.¹

The difficulty lies in the translation of epiousios, the only adjective in this prayer, which is not only a biblical hapax but, according to Origen, “is not used by any of the sages among the Greeks, and is no longer used in current language; it seems to have been invented by the evangelists.”² Some have claimed to find the word in a Fayum papyrus from the fifth century AD;³ but one consideration is that the papyrus is very mutilated and our word is followed by a lacuna, then “a half-obol”;⁴ and another very important consideration is that the papyrus reads epioui, -on being a gratuitous addition.⁵ Since therefore usage is of no help, all that remains is recourse to etymology. Everything has been suggested.

Epiousios can derive from (1) epiemi, “take place, arrive,” yielding “the arriving day,” or daily (Chrysostom, Severus of Antioch); (2) epi, “upon,” plus ousia, “nature, substance,” either supersubstantial (St. Jerome, on Matt 6:11—“which is beyond all substances and surpasses all created things”; likewise P. Joüon, in RSR, 1927, p. 221), or “befitting our nature, sufficient to maintain us, required, necessary” (Cyril of Jerusalem, Mystagogical Catecheses 5.15; Theodore of Mopsuestia, Cyril of Alexandria); (3) epi, “to, on,” plus eimi, “be”; but the prefix epi should lose its iota when compounded with this verb, so that we would have epousios, not epiousios; nevertheless, there are exceptions to this rule in the Koine (J. Carmignac cites twenty-six exceptions; P. Oxy. 924, 2: tou epiemerinou; fourth century); (4) ep’ plus eimi, “go,” either from the participle epion, “coming,” hence, the bread that comes next, in the future; or from the feminine form epiousa, which is used precisely to mean “the next day, the coming day” (Acts 16:11; 20:15; 21:18), as the Coptic versions interpreted (Bohairic, crastinum; Sahidic, venientem). Asking for tomorrow’s bread would seem to contradict the ban on taking thought for the aurion; ⁶ but in the near east the day begins in the evening, and furthermore he epiousse hemera can mean the same day;⁷ hence “daily bread” (Tertullian, Cyprian, Augustine). Thus J. Carmignac, referring to St. Jerome, who read mahar, “tomorrow,” in the Gospel of the Hebrews,⁸ suggests translating Matt 6:11, “Give us day by day our bread until the next day.” This would be a reference to the daily manna.

This evocation of manna (Exod 16:4) is mentioned also by J. Starcky, who understands epiousios bread to mean “the daily ration” from day to day.⁹ Thus he agrees with the meaning of W. Foerster (TDNT, vol. 2, pp. 590–599), “the measure necessary for each one,” citing Prov 30:8—“give me my daily bread” (lehem huqi).¹⁰ This is also the meaning accepted by J.A. de Foucault,¹¹ who, after the fashion of Origen, connects epiousios and periousios (Exod 19:6; periousia is contrasted with anankaia, Polybius 4.21.1; 4.38.4; Isocrates, Bus. 11.15) and, taking account of the definition given by Hesychius (periousios: more than enough), concludes that epiousios could mean “for our subsistence.” This is what the exegesis of F. M. Braun finally amounts to. He adopts the Peshitta version, “bread of our necessity,” the food that is necessary for us for a day.¹²

In the last analysis, two translations are possible: “bread for tomorrow” or “the bread that is necessary.” E. Delebecque expresses amazement that commentators overlook the repetition of the article (ton arton . . . ton epiousion), which makes the adjective not predicative but attributive, emphasizing the meaning of the antecedent noun, and therefore necessarily nontrivial.¹³ He cites Plato, Resp. 7.525 c: “to facilitate the passage of the soul from the sensible world to truth and reality” (ep’ aletheian te kai ousian) and asks whether we should not read ton arton . . . ton epi ousian (two words); the first translators of the original semitic of a catechism (Jerusalemite? Antiochene?) would have taken epiousian as a feminine adjective, and surprised at the form after the masculine ton, would have corrected it to epiousion.¹⁴ There is nothing more attractive than this hypothesis, which explains the neologism and shows that it means “essential”: the bread that leads to life!

H. Bourgoin ends up with the same meaning, taking as his point of departure the grammatical phenomenon that he calls the “empty prefix,” which “having been emptied of all semantic content does not change the meaning of the root with which it agrees.”¹⁵ Thus in Greek epiphlego and the simple phlego have the same meaning: “consume with flames, burn.” Examples can also be found in French: chercher and rechercher, or the action of partir and départ. Hence, in epiousios, the prefix epi, expressing the idea of contact, can be rendered “touching” or “concerning”; the adjective amounts to the same thing as ousios, that which concerns the essence, is essential. Once the prefix is empty, the meaning is clear: “give us our essential bread today” (Matt), “each day” (Luke). Bread of life would be a possible equivalent; divine bread for eternal life. In any event, this is the petition of one who is poor, or better, of a child addressing the heavenly Father.¹⁶

¹ The Our Father was translated into Greek from Hebrew (J. Carmignac, J. Starcky) or from Aramaic (G. Dalman, Die Worte Jesu, 2d ed., Leipzig, 1930, pp. 326–332; ET The Words of Jesus, trans. D. M. Kay, Edinburgh, 1902, pp. 1–88; C. F. Burney, The Poetry of Our Lord, Oxford, 1925, pp. 113, 161; M. Black, Aramaic Approach, pp. 203ff.; J. Jeremias, Paroles de Jésus, Paris, 1963, pp. 72; Jeremias, The Prayers of Jesus, London, 1967, pp. 100ff.); both are possible, cf. P. Grelot, “La quatrième demande du ‘Pater’ et son arrière-plan sémitique,” in NTS, vol. 25, 1979, pp. 299–314. The exhaustive study on this prayer is J. Carmignac, Recherches sur le ‘Notre Père’, Paris, 1969, pp. 118–221. Cf. H. Schürmann, La Prière du Seigneur, Paris, 1965, pp. 65–74 (Our bread, which is necessary for us, give to us today); E. Lohmeyer, Das Vater-unser, 3d ed., Göttingen, 1952, pp. 92–110; especially W. Foerster, “ε—πιούσιος,” in TDNT, vol. 2, pp. 590–599.

² Origen, Prayer 27.7; PG 2.509.

³ SB 5224, 20. This is a grocery list (wine, oil, chickpeas) made up by a household steward. This papyrus can no longer be found today, cf. B. M. Metzger, Historical and Literary Studies, Pagan, Jewish and Christian, Leiden, 1968, pp. 64–66.

⁴ This could be expenses that “come in addition,” but given the very modest sum, it could mean “a ration.”

⁵ In I.Lind. 419, 18, from AD 22, εν[ια]υσιω was read επ[ιο]υσιω by G. Klaffenbach (“Zu griechischen Inschriften,” in MusHelv, 1949, pp. 215ff.), but the correction is arbitrary and has been rejected by A. Debrunner, “‘Epiousios’ und kein Ende,” MusHelv, 1952, pp. 60–62) and E. Vogt, in Bib, 1954, p. 274.

⁶ Matt 6:34. Cf. R. Eleazar of Modi (d. 135): “The one who has something to eat today and says, ‘What shall I eat tomorrow,’ is a person of little faith” (Str-B, vol. 1, p. 421).

⁷ Xenophon, An. 1.7.2: “After the review, at the dawn of day (τῆ ε—πιούση ἡμέρᾳ) . . . some deserters brought news”; Plato, Crito 44 a: “the ship will arrive not today but tomorrow” (οὐ τοίνυν τῆς ε—πιούσης ἡμέρας . . . ἀλλὰ τῆς ε—τέρας); Aristophanes, Eccl. 105.

⁸ St. Jerome, Commentary on Matt 6:11; PL 26.43. Likewise J. Jeremias, Paroles de Jésus, p. 66: “Give us today our bread for tomorrow.” The original Hebrew would have been lemahar, which the LXX translates εἰς τὴν αὔριον, “for tomorrow” (Num 11:18, 32; Josh 7:13; Esth 5:12).

⁹ J. Starcky, “La quatrième demande du Pater,” in HTR, 1971, pp. 411–409. P. Grelot (“La quatrième demande du ‘Pater’ et son arrière-plan sémitique,” in NTS, vol. 25, 1979, pp. 299–314) relies on the Targums and on Codex Neofiti 1. He thinks that manna is not directly intended by the text, even though the literal meaning does not exclude a symbolic meaning.

¹⁰ Cf. Aristophanes, Eq. 1125: “I myself take pleasure in devouring my daily pittance” (τὸ καθ ἡμέραν).

¹¹ J. A. de Foucault, “Notre pain quotidien,” in REG, 1970, pp. 56–62. He also thinks of manna and cites Exod 16:8; Ps 78:24; John 6:33–34, 48, 51.

¹² F. M. Braun, “Le Pain dont nous avons besoin: Mt. VI, 11; Lc. XI, 3,” in NRT, 1978, pp. 559–568.

¹³ E. Delebecque, Etudes grecques, pp. 167–181. This Hellenist rightly sees a tautology in “give us each day our daily bread” and a platitude in “give us today our bread for today” (p. 169).

¹⁴ —Ἐπί with the accusative indicates that the bread is given as a means, or as a route that “leads to,” “brings one to”—but to what? The answer: to life; ousia designating a share of the good (Luke 15:12–13; cf. the bread of life, John 6:41, 48, 50, 51, 58). This is close to the interpretation of J. J. von Allmen, Essai sur le Repas du Seigneur, Neuchâtel, 1966, p. 82: “Give us today (already now) the bread of eternal life.” But we must not too sharply distinguish the secular meaning “bread that nourishes the body” (= all that is necessary for the maintenance of the present life) and “bread that is the word of God” (Luke 4:4), “eucharistic bread”; cf. the “good things” (ἀγαθά) given by the Father (Matt 7:11), which becomes “Holy Spirit” in Luke 11:13. We come around to the interpretation solidly established by L.-M. Dewailly, who shows that the word artos is used not only for physical bread, but also for spiritual food, connected by the patristic and medieval tradition to the person of Christ under two principal forms: the word of God and the Eucharist (“Donne-nous notre pain’: quel pain? Notes sur la quatrième demande du Pater,” in RSPT, 1980, pp. 561–588). The bibliography is given by BAGD, p. 297.

¹⁵ H. Bourgoïn, “—Ἐπιούσιος expliqué par la notion de préfixe vide,” in Bib, 1979, pp. 91–96. The author arrived at this understanding by way of the Russian conjugation in which the empty prefix (there are a half-dozen of them) not only changes the sense of the verb but has the effect of perfecting it. It has the property of emptying itself of its own meaning to become a mere perfecting tool. Bourgoïn denounces the translations “of tomorrow” and “of today” and especially the detestable supersubstantialis, which links the two contradictory prefixes super and sub.

¹⁶ Str-B, vol. 1, p. 421, cites the saying of R. Simeon b. Jochai (b. Yoma 76a), where the gift of food by the king to his son is the expression of their loving relation.

ε—πιποθέω

epipotheo, to long for, desire intensely

epipotheo, S 1971; EDNT 2.33; L&N 25.18, 25.47; BDF §§70(1), 171(1), 392(1a); BAGD 297–298

The verb potheo is unknown in the NT. The Koine is well-known for its love of compound forms because of their supposedly greater “expressiveness,” even sonority,¹ but scholars disagree concerning the nuance conveyed by the preposition epi-, which signifies intensity or direction.² Moreover, if the meaning “sigh, languish after someone or something” is well attested by the LXX, the shades of meaning vary, as with the corresponding Hebrew terms.³ It is nevertheless noteworthy that this verb connotes not only eagerness, but anxiety and sometimes fear, and in any case the dissatisfaction proper to desire, which aims at acquiring that which it does not yet possess, the lack of which causes it to suffer.⁴

The variety or imprecision of the meanings of epipotheo in the NT is even greater than in the LXX. The meaning of the word depends on its context, but also on the individual personality of each writer. The meaning “desire intensely” is in evidence from the earliest NT writing:⁵ “God jealously desires this spirit that he has made to dwell in us.”⁶ He reclaims that which is his own, but his phthonos expresses the exclusivity of his love. On the human level, infants are eager for their mother’s milk (1Pet 2:2), just as the hart’s instincts draw it to fresh water.⁷ The seven other NT usages are Pauline, of which five express ardent desire, whether to see loved ones (1Thess 3:6; Rom 1:11; Phil 2:26; 2Tim 1:4; cf. epipothia, Rom 15:23) or to put on the glorious body without getting rid of the fleshly body.⁸

On this other hand, this meaning (“desire”) cannot be maintained in 2Cor 9:14, where the nuance is surely tender affection: the prayers of the saints of Jerusalem, who will be thankful for the collection from the Corinthians, will “manifest their tender affection for you (epipothounton hymas).” Even clearer is Phil 1:8, “God is my witness that I cherish you in the bowels of Christ Jesus” (martys gar mou ho theos, hos epipotho pantas hymas en splanchnois Christou Iesou).⁹ Hence, there is a good chance that in the complicated blend of feelings that animate the repentant Corinthians (fear, zeal, desire to punish the offender) their epipotesis may be not an ardent desire but rather a sincere or solid attachment to the apostle,¹⁰ with the nuance of anxiety or pain that the verb conveys in the LXX.

Thus St. Paul marked epipotheo and its derivatives with his personality, imbuing them with a lively sensibility. Sometimes they suggest an urge, an inclination; sometimes a fervent tenderness, an emotion that grips the heart; always love, always a favorable sense. These nuances are, moreover, those of potheo and pothos.¹¹

¹ Cf. M. Zerwick, Biblical Greek, §§481, 484. —Επιποθέω is unknown in the papyri (with the exception of a Christian letter of the fifth century: “To my dear lady and aunt, Tare, Κυρία μου καὶ ε—πιποθέτη θεία Τάρη, greetings in God,” P.Bour. 25, 1; cf. M. Naldini, Il Cristianesimo in Egitto, n. 78), and apparently in the inscriptions. A very mutilated epitaph from Daphne in the fifth century AD could with some difficulty be restored to refer to the deceased as τω—ε—πι[ποθουμένω], cf. L. Jalabert, R. Mouterde, IGLS, n. 997.

² C. Spicq, “—Επιποθει—ν, désirer ou chérir?” in RB, 1957, p. 186, n. 1; cf. F. M. Abel, Grammaire, n. 44n, R.

³ In the 11 occurrences of ε—πιποθέω in the OT, 9 correspond to 8 different Hebrew verbs. The mean “spare, show consideration for” (Deut 13:9; Sir 32:11, hamal), “tremble, hover,” like the eagle over its young (Deut 32:11, rahap), “pant for, long for,” like the hart after streams of water (Ps 42:2, arag), “languish” after the courts of Yahweh (Ps 84:3, kasap in the niphal), “be eager for” his commandments (Ps 119:131, yâ’ab), “trust vainly” in plunder (Ps 62:11, habal), “be crushed, eaten away” by the thought of divine judgment (Ps 119:20, garam). In Sir 25:21, γυναί—κα μὴ ε—πιποθήσης can be translated “do not covet the woman” or “do not become enamored of a woman”; this latter meaning would apply in Wis 15:19, which protests against the adoration of divinized animals: “There is nothing attractive about them, as with other animals, that one should become attached to them”; to translate ε—πιποθήσαι here by “desire” hardly makes sense, because the context has nothing to do with aesthetic or culinary attractiveness, but with worship. Philo takes this verb to mean a lively desire (Creation 10; Abraham 48, 195), but he connects it with agape: “Those who seek God and desire to find him (οι— γὰρ ζητοῦντες καὶ ε—πιποθοῦντες θεὸν ἀνευρει—ν) take delight (ἀγαπω—σι) in the solitude that is dear to him” (Abraham 87).

⁴ Cf. the futile regret of the king who wanted to have Dioxippe near him, the latter having committed suicide (Diodorus Siculus 17.101). In classical Greek, πόθος expresses the nostalgic feeling inspired by absence, cf. J. Gagnepain, Les Noms grecs en -ΟΣ et en -Α, Paris, 1959, p. 69.

⁵ Cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 1, p. 187.

⁶ Jas 4:5. This difficult verse is susceptible to quite a few translations (cf. RB, 1957, p. 189; C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 3, p. 105; J. Seitz, “Two Spirits in Man,” in NTS, vol. 4, 1959, p. 86; J. Michl, “Der Spruch Jakobusbrief IV, 5,” in Festschrift J. Schmid, Regensburg, 1963, pp. 167ff. S. S. Laws, “Does Scripture Speak in Vain? A Reconsideration of James IV, 5,” in NTS, vol. 20, 1974, pp. 210–215). My interpretation is the same as E. Schweizer’s (in TDNT, vol. 6, pp. 446–447); he gives as parallels CD 5.11; 7.3; T. Naph. (Hebrew) 10.9; b. shabb. 152b : “Our masters teach: the spirit returns to God who gave it. Give it back to him as he gave it to you; he gave it to you pure, return it to him pure” (cf. J. Jeremias, “—Επιποθει—,” in ZNW, 1959, pp. 137–138). The pneuma is the spirit of life infused by God: “the spirit returns to God who gave it” (Eccl 12:7); “Thanks to the spirit that you have placed in me” (1 QH 16.11; 15.22; 4.31: “the spirit that God created for him”); Josephus, War 3.372: “If anyone casts God’s deposit out of his own body (the soul that God deposited there) . . .”; Sent. Sextus 21: “Know for certain that your soul is as it were a deposit that you have received from God,” etc. At death one returns one’s spirit to God (John 19:30; cf. T. Boman, Das letzte Wort Jesu, in ST, 1963, pp. 103–119)

⁷ Ps 42:1; cf. Epictetus 3.24.53: ε—πιποθει—ς καὶ μάμμην καὶ κάμπτει; C. Spicq, Epîtres de saint Pierre, p. 79.

⁸ 2Cor 5:2. E. B. Allo (Seconde Epître aux Corinthiens, Paris, 1937, p. 124), emphasizing that the apostle groans because of his mortality (στενάζομεν), observes that ε—πιποθέω “in Paul always or almost always connotes pronounced regret at distance or absence.”

⁹ Cf. ε—πιπόθητος in Phil 4:1—ὥστε, ἀδελφοί μου ἀγαπητοὶ καὶ ε—πιπόθητοι, “and so, dear reverend brothers and beloved ones, my joy and my crown”; Appian, Hisp. 43: ε—πιποθήτους ε—ν τοι—ς ὕστερον πολέμοις πολλάκις γενομένους, parallel to Ῥωμαίων ἔσονται φίλοι. The Suda gives as a synonym: ε—πιποθία: ἡ ἀγάπη (Lexicon; ed. A. Adler, Leipzig, 1931, vol. 2, p. 374).

¹⁰ 2Cor 7:7, 11. It is Titus who announces to Paul this change of heart on the part of the Corinthians. This verb ἀναγγέλλω is a felicitous choice, because it “is normally used in the decrees for a report made by people returning from abroad, such as ambassadors or envoys or also citizens who are traveling” (L. Robert, Hellenica vol. 11, Paris, 1960, p. 115).

¹¹ Elektra embraces Orestes: “Well beloved, your name so dear and sweet, ὦ ποθεινὸν ἥδιστον . . . ὄνομα” (Euripides, Or. 1045; cf. 1082). Anacreon: “The loves of Canope, πόθους Κανώβου” (T. Bergk, Poetae Lyrici Graeci, vol. 3, p. 1053, n. XIII, 20); πόθος = love (Philo, Joseph 157; Musaeus, Hero and Leander 29; Menander, Mis. 214 = P.Oxy. XXXIII, p. 31). In a letter of recommendation from the sixth-seventh century, the recipient is addressed as μεγαλοπρεπή ποθεινότητα = To your much beloved magnificence (P.Gen. inv. 28; cf. V. Martin, “Letter of Recommendation,” in Journal of Egyptian Archaeology, 1954, p. 74); cf. ἀγαπητοί—ς καὶ ποθεινοτάτοις ἀδελφοί—ς ε—ν Κυρίῳ (G. Lefèvre, Recueil des inscriptions grecques-chrétiennes d’Égypte, Cairo, 1907, n. 380, 7–8; from the fourth century); ἡ γνησιωτάτη καὶ πολυπόθητος . . . θυγάτηρ (IG X, 2; n. 403); ἀγαπητὲ καὶ ποθεινότατε πάτηρ (P.Giss. 55, 17–18). On a Roman sarcophagus: τῷ— ποθεινοτάτῳ υἱ—ῳ— Κοκκήϊος —Ιουλιανὸς Συνέσιος (IGUR, n. 306, 2). On a marble plaque found in a Jewish catacomb at Rome, “Vernaclus et Archigenia filio desiderantissimo fecerunt” (CII, n. 35); in postclassical Latin the present participle desiderantissimus became synonymous with carissimus. In the Anth. Pal.: τέκνα πόθος = the children of a beloved one (9.360.7), “you taught me to love a bull” (9.456.1). According to the Phoenician myth of Sanchuniathon, translated by Philon of Biblos, the union of Kronos and Astarte produced Pothos and Eros = desire and love (Eusebius, Praep. Evang. 1.10.24).

ε—πιστομίζω

epistomizo, to muzzle, close someone’s mouth

epistomizo, S 1993; EDNT 2.40; MM 246; L&N 33.124; BAGD 301

Titus is to “shut the mouths” of those who are insubordinate, vain speechifiers, and deceivers of minds (Titus 1:11). The biblical hapax¹ epistomizo, literally “put something on the mouth,” means “put the bit in a horse’s mouth,” but it is used for people as well as for animals, like our verbs muzzle and gag. Metaphorically, to close a person’s mouth is to make him be quiet, impose silence on him.

This verb, unknown in the papyri, belongs to cultivated Greek. It has first of all a rhetorical meaning. In a discussion, the adversary is not allowed to defend himself, he is unable to respond: “‘While he should,’ he said, ‘close the mouths of us who were speaking against him’” (Demosthenes, Halon. 33); “He allowed himself to be so tangled up by your speech that he was silenced, for he dared not say what he thought” (Plato, Grg. 482 e); “I have to my credit a deed capable . . . of closing the mouth of my enemies.”²

The moral meaning of the word is that of Philo: “reason will bridle (epistomie) and restrain the impetuosity and the flow of passion” (Alleg. Interp. 3.155); “extreme joys, like great sorrows, leave us speechless” (Heir 3); moral sensibility “condemns us to the interior of ourselves, without letting us even open our mouths; holding and bridling the tongue (epistomizon) with the help of the reins of the conscience, it restrains its presumptuous and unbraked course” (Worse Attacks Better 23). Plutarch expresses a similar thought: “the bond is like a bit imposed on the irrational part of the soul. . . . When the Genius pulls back on the reins, he causes what we call repentance . . . ; the soul, feeling the pain of the blow, feels restrained from within by its lord; then, thus punished, it becomes docile and manageable, like a tamed animal” (De gen. 22; cf. Arat. 1).

In Titus 1:11, it is not just a matter of silencing the heterodox but also of reducing the “insubordinate” to obedience; so that the best parallel would be that of restraining a rebellion, in Josephus, Ant. 17.252, where Varus takes a legion to Jerusalem to stop the revolutionary agitation of the Jews, *ten loudaion neoteropoiian epistomiountas.*³

¹ Cf. φιμώω (Matt 22:34—Jesus silences the Pharisees), φράσσω (Rom 3:19—every mouth is closed by the testimony of the Scriptures). The heroes of the faith shut the mouths of lions (Heb 11:33; cf. Judg 14:6; 1Sam 17:34-35; 2Sam 23:20; Dan 6:23; 1Macc 2:60); this victory over wild animals is attributed by Quintus of Smyrna to thought and science (Posthomerica 5.247ff.).

² Aristophanes, Eq. 845. Cf. Lucian, Vit. Auct. 22: “The fabric of my reasoning, which lets me paralyze my interlocutors, close their mouths (ἀποφράττω), reduce them to silence (σιωπα—ν), by putting a real muzzle (φιμόν) on them.” Other references in LSJ under this word. Cf. Plutarch, Praec. ger. rei publ. 14.810 e; Philostratus, VS 2.30.2.

³ Cf. the role of the bit in taming an animal, bending it to your will, in Jas 3:3— “We attach reins to horses’ mouths to make them obey us”; cf. Ps 32:9; Sophocles, Ant. 477. —St. Paul does not say how to silence the esoteric windbags; but surely the correct exegesis of the Word of God is the most decisive argument: “Tales homines doctor ecclesiae, cui animae populorum creditae sunt, Scripturarum debet ratione, superare et silentium illis . . . imponere” (“The doctor of the church, to whom the souls of the people are entrusted, must overcome such men by scriptural argumentation and put them to silence”—St. Jerome).

ε—πισυναγωγή

episynagoge, meeting

episynagoge, S 1997; TDNT 7.841–843; EDNT 3.293–296; NIDNTT 2.33; MM 247; L&N 15.126, 15.128; BAGD 301

“With respect to the Parousia of our Lord Jesus Christ and our reunion with him” (hemon episynagoges ep’ auton, 2Thess 2:1), St. Paul calls upon the Thessalonians not to be shaken or alarmed. Heb 10:25 urges its readers not to forsake their meetings, “especially as you see the day approaching.” In both cases, the text or the context is eschatological, as in the case of the OT hapax: “the place (where the ark is hidden) will be unknown until God has accomplished the reassembling of his people” (heos an synagage ho theos episynagogen tou laou . . . genetai, 2Macc 2:7), the restoration of Israel after the Diaspora.¹

Episynagoge is only attested once BC in secular language² and hardly seems to differ from synagoge,³ which, after the fashion of oikos (1Tim 3:15), designates sometimes the community assembly,⁴ σομετιμεσ της πλαχε ωηερε τηισ μεετινγ ισ ηελδ.⁵ Χηριστιανσ σομετιμεσ υσεδ της ωορδ ιν τηισ σεנסε το δεσιγνατε τηειρ χηυρχη;⁶ βυτ ιν Ηεβ 10·25, *επισυναγογεις α ρελιγιουσ τερμ, δεσιγνατινγ νοτ α “γρουπινγ τογετηερ” ορ α σοχιετψ οφ ανψ σορτ, βυτ α μεετινγ φορ ωορσηπ, ατ μορε ορ λεσσ ρεγυλαρ ιντεβαλσ, οφ Ηεβρεω Χηριστιανσ ιν α σετ πλαχε, ιν α χερταιν “ηουσε” ιν αν υνκνοων χιτψ;*⁷ ιν 2Τηεσσ 2·1, της μεετινγ ωιτη Χηριστ ωιλλ τακε πλαχε ιν ηεαεν.

¹ Τηε ερβ ε—πισυνάγω, frequent in the literature, the inscriptions, and the papyri (P.Mich. 232, 14; P.Tebt. 704, 21; SB 6664, 11; etc.) is also used eschatologically in Matt 24:28 (Luke 17:37); 24:31 (Mark 13:27).

² In the sense of “collect” (money), in CIG, XII, 4; suppl. n. 1270; cited by A. Deissmann, Light, p. 103. In the second century AD, cf. Ptolemy, Tetr. 44; title of the third book of Artemidorus Daldianus, Onir.; cf. B. Rigaux, Thessaloniciens, pp. 647ff.

³ Cf. Schrage, on this word, in TDNT, vol. 7, pp. 799, 841–842.

⁴ 1Macc 14:28—“in the great assembly of the priests, the people, the princes of the nation, and the elders of the land, we were notified of this”;

cf. 2:42—“the congregation of the Hasideans”; 7:12; Sir 4:7. In the second half of the first century AD, the meeting or session of a σύνοδος was held in the place of prayer: ε—πὶ τῆς γενηθείσης συναγωγῆς ε—ν τῇ προσευχῇ (P.Ryl. 590, 1 = C.Pap.Jud. 138; cf. SB 8267, 3; from 5 BC; M. Hengel, “Proseuche und Synagoge,” in G. Jeremias, ed., Tradition und Glaube: Festgabe K. G. Kuhn, Göttingen, 1971, pp. 170, 182). Cf. the “regathering” for the Feast of Tabernacles: ε—πὶ συλλόγου τῆς σκηνοπηγίας; Berenice in Cyrenaica (CIG III, 5361); the will of Epictetus of Thera, on Crete: ὅστε γίνεσθαι τὰν συναγωγὰν ε—πὶ ἀμέρας τρεῖς ε—ν τῷ Μουσειῷ (IG XII, 3, n. 330, 118ff.; between 210 and 195). In 6 BC, the συναγωγή is the assembly of the σύνοδος of the Alexandrians to celebrate the cult of the emperor ε—ν τῷ Παρατόμῳ (BGU 1137, 2; this location in Alexandria has not yet been identified).

⁵ SEG XVII, 823, 3: συναγωγή τῶν Βερνικίδι—Ιουδαίων (AD 56).

⁶ Jas 2:2 (with the commentaries, notable J. B. Mayor, The Epistle of St. James, 3d ed., London, 1910, p. 82); cf. the discussion of J. B. Frey with respect to the inscription of Tafas (CII n. 861); J. Y. Campbell, “The Origin and Meaning of the Word ΕΚΚΛΗΣΙΑ,” in JTS, 1948, pp. 130–142.

⁷ Cf. H. Kosmala, Hebräer—Essener—Christen, Leiden, 1959, pp. 347ff. In distinction from the [συνα]γωγή Ἑβραίων of Corinth (A. Deissmann, Light, p. 103), ε—πισυναγωγή in Hebrews may refer to the meeting of Jewish Christians of Palestinian origin, as opposed to the meeting of all the believers in the same city (cf. C. Spicq, Hébreux, vol. 1, pp. 224–225); cf. the ε—πισυνάγειν of children and the elect as “hand-picked” (Matt 23:37; 24:31; cf. Luke 17:37). —We may contrast the Hebrews who forsook their meetings with Eleazar, “who loved the community, φιλοσυναγωγός” (CII 321).

ε—πιφαίνω, ε—πιφάνεια, ε—πιφανής epiphaino, to shine, light up, appear; epiphaneia, an appearing; epiphanes, manifest, glorious

epiphaino, S 2014; TDNT 9.7–10; EDNT 2.44–45; NIDNTT 3.317–319; MM 249–250; L&N 14.39; BDF §§72, 309(2) | epiphaneia, S 2015; TDNT 9.7–10; EDNT 2.44–45; NIDNTT 3.317–319; MM 250; L&N 24.21 | epiphanes, S 2016; TDNT 9.7–10; EDNT 2.45; NIDNTT 3.317–319; MM 250; L&N 79.22; ND 4.148

Apart from rare secular uses (Ezek 17:6; 2 Macc 12:22; 15:13), the verb epiphaino in the LXX has God as its subject. With the exception of Zeph 2:11, where this manifestation involves vengeance (Hebrew yare', niph'al), the divine interventions are beneficent and inspire gladness and rejoicing (2Macc 3:30; Philo, Dreams 1.71). Sometimes the appearance is a vision (Gen 35:7; Ezek 39:28; Hebrew galâh, hiph'il), sometimes a brilliant light (Deut 33:2, Hebrew zarah; Philo, Change of Names 6, 15), most often a shining (Ps 118:27, Hebrew 'ôr, hiph'il), and the prayer of the psalmists is that God will make his face to shine on his servants (Ps 67:1; 80:4, 6, 8; 119:135; Dan 9:17; Num 6:25).

I. — In the NT, this meaning (“shine, light up”), which is the meaning in secular Greek,¹ is attested by Acts 27:20, where during the storm neither the sun nor the stars appeared for several days; and the same meaning is present in the first of three other occurrences which are religious: Zechariah announces the appearance of the Messiah to “shine on (Ambrosiaster: illuxit gratia Dei) those who are in the darkness”² of sin; salvation is an illumination.

This nuance cannot be ruled out in Titus 2:11—“the saving grace of God has shined upon all people” (epephane he charis tou theou he soterios pasin anthropois)—which sums up the gospel and attests to the realization of the prophecy of the Benedictus. Grace—merciful favor (Hebrew hesed), gratuitous goodwill, active beneficence (1Cor 15:10; 2Cor 6:1)—is almost personalized in the saving intervention of Christ.³ The generous goodness of God, by nature invisible, appeared before the eyes of all humankind in palpable form (1John 1:1-2), was suddenly manifested at a precise historical moment. The second aorist passive epephane (cf. Titus 3:4), prominently placed in the sentence, suggests the suddenness of the appearing and the surprise it produced, like a light that all at once pierces the darkness.⁴ But since soteriological epiphany was understood in the Hellenistic era as the beneficent intervention of the king or of the gods,⁵ this nuance of gratuitous and gracious generosity may be suggested by the adjective soterios; it is surely evoked in Titus 3:4.

II. — The substantive epiphaneia in the first century simultaneously suggests light or splendor and effective help.⁶ In 2Macc it refers to heavenly manifestations (2:21; 14:15; 15:27), which augur well for the people of God (5:4) but are fearsome to their enemies (3:24; 12:22). Thus “the Lord Jesus will destroy the lawless one with the epiphaneia of his Parousia” (2Thess 2:8): his visible presence or second coming will be victorious, like that of an emperor who is visiting or making a joyous entry into a city, granting favors (philanthropa) to his subjects⁷ but also punishing his adversaries. This condemnation of the unfaithful is also included in 1Tim 6:14; 2Tim 4:1. But the courtly meaning is emphasized in the Pastorals: the essentially glorious (Titus 2:13), and thus shining,⁸ epiphany is that of the Kyrios, the Soter, the Megas and Monos Theos and his basileia.⁹ The Christian life consists of waiting for this manifestation (Titus 2:13), like preparing for a visit and awaiting punishment; but in this case the outlook is supremely joyful, because this coming of the Lord will mean sharing in his blessedness.

III. — The OT had already described Yahweh as truly epiphanes in a manner illustrated by the defense of his people.¹⁰ The adjective *epiphanes*¹¹ occurs only twice in the NT, with respect to the “Day of the Lord” (Acts 2:20); it retains the sense of the niphal of yare’ (Joel 2:11; 3:4; Mal 3:22)—awesome manifestation!—but also with the nuance of indisputable.

¹ —Επιφαίνω-ε-πιφάνεια, etymologically: “that which appears on the surface, which looks certain” (Timaeus of Locri, 101 d; Euclid, Elem. 1.15; Plutarch, Arat. 3; Papyrus Erzherzog Rainer I, col. VII, 11, 15; IX, 4; XII, 3; in MPER N.S. I, pp. 23ff., 42); “appearing” of the day (Polybius 3.94.3), of enemies (1.54), of Esther in the brilliance of her majesty (Esth 5:1 c); from someone loved or venerated (C.P.Herm. 6, 4; SB 9152, 8). —Επιφαίνεσθαι refers to “the beginning of an object to be visible, either because of its entry into an observer’s field of vision or because of a change in the amount of light that it is emitting or reflecting” (C. Mugler, Terminologie optique, p. 165). In Diodorus Siculus, the verb often has the sense of “show oneself, appear” (17.25.6; 17.68.7; 17.99.4).

² Luke 1:79 (H. Schürmann, Lukasevangelium, p. 92). Christ defines himself as “the light that comes into the world” (John 3:19; 8:12; 9:5; 12:45), and he has in fact “illuminated life” (2Tim 1:10).

³ Titus 3:4—ὅτε ἡ χρηστότης καὶ ἡ φιλανθρωπία ε-πεφάνη τοῦ σωτῆρος ἡμῶ-ν θεοῦ.

⁴ A. J. Vermeulen, “La Développement sémasiologique d’ε-πιφάνεια,” in Graecitas et Latinitas Christianorum Primaeva, Supplementa 1, Nijmegen, 1964, pp. 14ff. We may recall the bright light at Bethlehem (Luke 2:9); St. Paul was perhaps thinking of the shining vision that converted him on the road to Damascus.

⁵ εοῦ ε-πιφάνεια = help from God (Ep Arist); Diodorus Siculus 5.49.5; I.Magn. 32.14: the representatives from Magnesia “related to the Epirotes the appearing of the goddess”; Artemis is epiphanes (I.Cos; IG XII, 4; Dittenberger, Syl. 557, 5), Zeus Panamaros ε-πιφανέστατος (BCH, 1931, p. 98); with Hecate, they are ε-πιφανέστατοι θεοί (IGLAM, n. 519–520); SB 6152, 5; 6153, 6; Dittenberger, Or. 383, 65–67, 86; 194, 23; K. Kerényi, Apollon—Epiphanyen, in Eranos-Jahrbuch, vol. 13, 1946, pp. 11–48. Through his epiphanies at his temple at Epidaurus, Asclepius performed many healings (Dittenberger, Syl. 1169, 34; A. Deissmann, Light, pp. 370, n. 4). Miracles are ε—ναργει—ς ε—πιφάνεια (Dittenberger, Syl. 867, 35); cf. C. Spicq, Agarè, vol. 3, pp. 21–37; A. J. Festugière, Personal Religion. —Upon the death of his brother, Demetrius of Phalerum celebrated τὰ ε—πιφάνεια τοῦ ἀδελφοῦ, honoring him thus as θεὸς ε—πιφανής (Athenaeus 12.542 e). Julius Caesar is “god made manifest, [born] of Ares and Aphrodite, the common savior of human life” (inscription at Ephesus, Dittenberger, Syl. 760, 6), like Claudius (I.Magn. 157 c), Caligula (Dittenberger, Syl. 799, 9; M. Malaise, Les Conditions de pénétration et de diffusion des Cultes égyptiens en Italie, Leiden, 1972, pp. 396ff.), Constantine (P.Ant. 36, 3), Diocletian and Maximinus (ibid. 38, 25; 106, 8; P.Mert. 88, col. II, 3; P.Oslo 37, 27; Pap.Lugd.Bat. II, 5, 4; XVI, 2 and 22; cf. P.Mert. 31, 19; P.Princ. 79, 1; I.Erythr.Klaz., n. 520, 4; cf. n. 223, 5), Licinianus (P.Got. 6, 17), Crispus (P.Oxy. 1425, 2), Valerian (P.Ryl. 110, 21), etc.; there are about a hundred texts that describe a sovereign as epiphanes. “The god is ‘manifest’ as ‘savior’ in his beneficent interventions on behalf of humans. This religious language is naturally applied to divinized kings. They are θεὸς ε—πιφανεῖς, the concrete manifestation of the help that the divinity gives humans; they make visible the beneficent presence of the gods. Their visit (παρουσία) in a city is also an ε—πιφάνεια of the tutelary deity that they in some way incarnate. Thus the two terms παρουσία and ε—πιφάνεια come into relationship and, in the context of joyful Hellenistic entries, become almost synonymous” (J. Dupont, Union avec le Christ, p. 74). On the “shelamîm of your appearing, σωτηρίου ε—πιφανεΐας ὑμῶν” (Amos 5:22), cf. S. Daniel, Recherches sur le vocabulaire du culte dans les Septante, Paris, 1966, pp. 283–286

⁶ Life and light, and sometimes happiness, are nearly synonymous (John 1:4ff; Rev 21:23; 22:5); cf. F. N. Klein, Die Lichtterminologie, Leiden, 1962, pp. 61ff.; H. Conzelmann, “φω—ς,” in TDNT, vol. 9, pp. 344–358.

⁷ Dionysius of Halicarnassus 2.68; Dio Chrysostom 32.41. Cf. F. Pfister, “Epiphanie,” in PW, Suppl., vol. 4, 1924, col. 277–323; C. Mohrmann, Epiphania, Nijmegen-Utrecht, 1953, idem, “Note sur doxa,” in Festschrift A. Debrunner, Berne, 1954, pp. 321–328; E. Pax, Epiphaneia, Munich, 1955; E. Stauffer, Le Christ et les césars, Colmar-Paris, 1956, pp. 9–31; L. Cerfaux, J. Tondriau, Culte des souverains, pp. 422, 498; P. Beskow, Rex Gloriam: The Kingship of Christ in the Early Church, Stockholm-Uppsala, 1962, pp. 61ff.; D. Lührmann, “Epiphaneia,” in Festgabe K. G. Kuhn, Göttingen, 1971, pp. 185–199; Bultmann, Lührmann, “ε—πιφάνω,” in TDNT, vol. 9, pp. 7–10.

⁸ Cf. Rom 5:2; Col 1:27; 3:4; 1Pet 5:4; I.Sard. 42, 3; Dittenberger, Or. 763, 19–20; Epictetus 3.22.29; Plutarch, De tranq. anim. 11: δόξα καὶ ε—πιφάνεια.

⁹ 1Tim 6:14; Titus 2:13; 2Tim 1:10; 4:1, 8; cf. P.Oxy. 1357, 36. In 1Cor 8:5–6, St. Paul contrasts the Lord Jesus with earthly rulers; in his later epistles, the coming of Jesus, “manifestation of love,” is antithetical to imperial epiphanies (cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 3, pp. 34ff.); “there is another king, Jesus” (Acts 17:7).

¹⁰ 2Macc 15:34—τὸν ε—πιφανῆ κύριον (cf. 3Macc 5:35; F. M. Abel, J. Starcky, Maccabées, Paris, 1961, pp. 64ff.); Zeph 2:11; Mal 1:14. The word is used to modify a splendid temple (2Macc 14:33; cf. Josephus, Ant. 16.136), an angel of God (Judg 13:6), a city of the fearsome Chaldeans (Hab 1:7; Zeph 3:1), the magnanimity of Eleazar (2Macc 6:23).

¹¹ In the inscriptions, it is used constantly for the most visible and exposed place for posting a decree (MAMA, vol. 6, 5, 22; I.Thas. 170, 35; I.Gonn. 101, 12; the Rosetta Stone, in Dittenberger, Or. 90, 38). In the papyri, it refers to a sovereign (P.Mich. 636, 2; 643, 3; 645, 21; 646, 3), “god made manifest” (cf. above p. 66, n. 5; C. Picard, “EOI ΕΠΙΦΑΝΕΙΣ: Note sur les apparitions des dieux,” in ΕΕΝΙΑ. Hommage international à l’Université nationale de Grèce, Athens, 1912, pp. 67–84). From 87 to 160, it was part of the customary title of the kings of the Arsacid dynasty (P.Dura 18, 1 and 12; 19, 1; 20, 1; 22, 1; 24, 1); cf. P.Ryl. 617, 3, 6, 14; 656, 1, 4; 709, 2; etc. Hence the nuances of famous (Diodorus Siculus 17.78.1; 17.96.2), renowned, reputable (ibid. 17.34.5; 17.108.4), then glorious (17.65.5), splendid (17.89.1; 17.100.2). Neoptolemus, ἀνὴρ ε—πιφανής, is a distinguished officer (25.5; cf. 102.3; 107.6); cf. οἱ—ε—πιφανέστατοι τω—ν ἡγεμόνων, the elite of the officers (89.1).

ε—ρεθίζω, ε—ρίζω, ε—ριθεία, ἔρις

erethizo, to stimulate, excite, exasperate; erizo, to fight, contend; eritheia, paid work, intrigue or dispute aiming at gain, selfish ambition; eris, emulation, dispute, discord

erethizo, S 2042; EDNT 2.51; MM 253; L&N 88.168, 90.55; BAGD 308 | erizo, S 2051; EDNT 2.52; MM 254; L&N 33.447; BAGD 309 | eritheia, S 2052; TDNT 2.660–661; EDNT 2.52; MM 254; L&N 39.7, 88.167; BAGD 309 | eris, S 2054; EDNT 2.52–53; MM 254; L&N 33.447, 39.22; BDF §§47(3), 142; BAGD 309

These terms, rare or unattested in the papyri, belong to cultivated Greek; their frequency is noteworthy in the Bible, where they often take on a religious meaning, either favorable or unfavorable.

I. — Erithizo (“set in movement, provoke, excite”) has as its subject the zelos of the Corinthians’ love, which has “stimulated” the generosity of their brothers: “your zeal has stirred up most of them” (ho hymon zelos erethisen tous pleionas, 2Cor 9:2); but in a pejorative sense, overly finicky or irritating use of parental authority can exasperate children.¹

II. — The denominative verb erizo (“fight against, to quarrel, vie with”)² is used only once in the NT, with respect to the Messiah: in his great discretion and mildness, he refuses to provoke disputes and quarrels, ouk erisei oude kraugasei.³ In Sir 8:2; 11:9, the wise are told me erize; here, the sense is that of debates between schools, disputes between rabbis, personal rivalries.⁴

III. — Unknown in the LXX and the Greek language before the NT,⁵ eritheia is used seven times in the NT, including twice in the sin lists (2Cor 12:20; Gal 5:20) along with eris, which indicates that the former does not have the same meaning as the latter and is not derived from it. Like many abstract nouns in -eia, it was formed from a verb in -euo, in this case eritheuomai, “work for hire.”⁶ The erithos is a day laborer; the term is used especially for weavers and spinners.⁷ As a result, the term eritheia (“paid work”) originally had a positive sense; but it came to mean that which is done solely for interested motives (“What’s in it for me?”). Hence the meaning: contrive to gain a position or a magistracy not in order to serve the state but to gain honor and wealth. From that developed two other meanings: dispute or intrigue to gain advantages; or personal ambition, the exclusive pursuit of one’s own interests.

These connotations of intrigue, disputation, and chicanery appear in all the NT texts. In Rom 2:8—wrath and anger “to all those who are of eritheia and disobedient to the truth.”⁸ In 2Cor 12:20; Gal 5:20, eritheiai follows zelos, thymoi, and is thus linked with animosity. At Philippi, the spirit of factionalism and rivalry motivates Paul’s adversaries; their “apostolic zeal” is in fact a ploy aimed at displacing him and winning personal advantages.⁹ Jas 3:14 and 16 once again link zelos and eritheia; the text stigmatizes this “bitter zeal” and this “spirit of intrigue,” which are “opposed to the truth”¹⁰ and which so often disturbed the life of the early communities, where the ideal is nevertheless “that we may lead a peaceful and quiet life” (1Tim 2:2).

IV. — The Greeks divinized Dispute or Emulation, which they considered the energizing spirit of the world and one of the primordial forces.¹¹ They had a cult of rivalry.¹² But although in the secular language eris is sometimes positive (linked with neikos), sometimes pejorative (linked with zelos), and can mean “wrath” (Ep. Arist. 250; P. Grenf. I, 1, 21: “know that I have invincible courage when wrath takes hold of me”), its nine occurrences in the NT are all pejorative. Quarreling or discord, the fruit of over-excitement (cf. Sir 28:11), of jealousy or anger, became a Christian sin. Actually, they were already mentioned in the sin lists in Sir 11:4 (after thymos and zelos) and as punishment for sinners (40.9). The zelos-eris connection is found again in the Pauline sin lists;¹³ both of these are the fruit of paganism, the deeds of people not yet spiritualized by grace.¹⁴

These ereis are sometimes discussions that degenerate into quarrels (cf. Ps 139:20) and finally sects and schisms (Gal 5:20), sometimes discord that breaks out into opposition and open battle. In the Pastorals, it is the vice of false teachers; they are avid polemicists.¹⁵ Blinded by vanity, they are full of animosity and jealousy toward other teachers whom they consider to be rivals;¹⁶ hence the bitterness of their quarrels (1Tim 6:4).

¹ Col 3:21 (cf. Deut 21:20—Hebrew marâh, וי—òς . . . àπειθει— και ε—ρεθίζει); this is the reading of a, B, P46 vid; but a, A, C, D, G, L, and numerous miniscules read παροργίζετε, probably under the influence of Eph 6:4; the parallelism of the two terms shows that they are synonymous. —All the occurrences in the LXX are pejorative, either in the sense of “to anger, irritate” (Prov 25:23—ε—ρεθίζει πρόσωπον; 1Macc 15:40; 2Macc 14:27; cf. Josephus, Ant. 4.169: provoke wrath), or in the sense of preparing and stirring up for combat (Dan 11:10, 25; the hithpael of garâh; cf. Josephus, War 2.414; Ant. 20.175). Philo, Drunkennes 16: “to rebel (against virtue) is the height of evil.” In a bull-fight organized by a city of Caria, it is indicated that one of the beasts is excited (by some object or color or technique that makes it furious?), ἀπὸ τοῦ ε—ρεθιζομένου ταύρου (IGLAM, n. 499, 9).

² Hence ε—ριστικός: loving nitpicking discussion, disputatious. On the infatuation with eristic battle, cf. J. Duchemin, ΑΓΩΝ dans la tragédie grecque, 2d ed., Paris, 1968, pp. 15ff.

³ Matt 12:19. This is a quotation of Isa 42:2 (cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 1, p. 69, n. 3), but from another version of the LXX (cf. J. Grindel, “Matthew XII, 18–21,” in CBQ, 1967, pp. 110–145).

⁴ Josephus, War 4.396: both “vied to see who could secure the richest plunder”; cf. P.Oxy. 2230, 7: debate a price (AD 119); P.Princ. 118, 14: to contest (second century); BGU 1043, 5: ὥστε ἔτι μοι ε—ρίζεις (third century). Prov 31:19—her fingers move the spindle. The setting in motion takes the form of a rebellion in 1Sam 12:14–15; 2Kgs 14:10. An inscription from Deir el Menas: καὶ ἔριξε καὶ μὴ φθόνει (in E. Peterson, EIS' EOΣ, Göttingen, 1926, n. 84, 9).

⁵ Apart from two occurrences in Aristotle (Pol. 5.3.1302b4; 1303a14), where it is a question of intrigue aimed at obtaining an official post by suspect means. An analogous use in Philo, To Gaius 68: “The only stable government is one in which there is no strife and intrigue, ἀφιλόνηκος καὶ ἀνερίθευτος,” where the leaders have no personal ambition. —Ἐριθεία is not attested in the papyri except for P.Sorb. 34, 9 (third century), which is so mutilated that the sense cannot be determined.

⁶ J. H. Moulton, W. F. Howard, Grammar, vol. 2, p. 339; W. Barclay, NT Wordbook, pp. 39–41; F. Büchsel, in TDNT, vol. 2, pp. 660–661.

⁷ Cf. Tob 2:11—“My wife Anna worked at women’s tasks (ἠριθεύετο); Heliodorus, Aeth. 1.5.3: “There is where the women spin wool (ε—ριθεύουσιν);” P.Hib. 121, 34: ε—ρίθοις ε—ρίων; SB 9680, 4; cf. συνέριθος: “with my workmate” (P.Magd. 35, 3). By popular etymology, connected with ἔριον (wool); cf. the ban on priests’ wearing wool garments (Gnomon of the Idios Logos 71, 75) and in certain religious settings (LSCG, Suppl., n. 56, 2).

⁸ Τοι—ς δὲ ε—ξ ε—ριθείας καὶ ἀπειθοῦσι τῇ ἀληθείᾳ. The spirit of dispute leads to rebellion; “that is the serpent’s agenda in Gen 3:1—to dispute what God said in order to turn it on its head” (F. J. Leenhardt, Romans, p. 77).

⁹ Phil 1:17; 2:3; cf. J. Gnllka, “Die antipaulinische Mission in Philippi,” in BZ, 1965, pp. 258–276; A. F. J. Klijn, “Paul’s Opponents in Philippians III,” in NovT, 1965, pp. 278–284; A. E. Harvey, “The Opposition to Paul,” in F. L. Cross, SE, vol. 4, pp. 319–332; C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 2, pp. 244, 249.

¹⁰ On Gal 5:20, St. Jerome comments: “Est autem ε—ριθεία, cum quis semper ad contradicendum paratus stomacho delectatur alieno; et muliebri jurgio contendit, et provocat contendentem. Haec alio nomine apud Graecos φιλονεικία appellatur.”

¹¹ Antoninus Liberalis, Met. 11.3; on the twin aspects of Eris, cf. J. P. Vernant, in RevPhil, 1966, pp. 253ff. It was Eris who threw the apple that was supposed to go to the most beautiful goddess; cf. P. Grimal, Dictionnaire de la mythologie grecque et romaine, Paris, 1951, p. 147.

¹² “For any instance in which it was possible to make a comparison between two people on some particular point, the Greeks set up a contest and established rankings, if not prizes. If a battle took place, they compared the individual or collective valor of the combatants. If there were dramatic productions at the theater, a jury rated the poets, the actors, the chorus leaders. They went so far as to compare deaths. This spirit of striving was eminently favorable to the development of sports” (J. Delorme, Gymnasion, Paris, 1960, p. 460). The first Homeric sense of ἔρις, “eagerness for combat,” retained in the first century (cf. Josephus, Ant. 14.470, the nation gathered μετὰ πολλῆς δὲ προθυμίας καὶ ἔριδος), was used in an epigram for a victor at the Nemean games, around 200 BC: “All the competitors, from their chariots, urged their fast horses on for the race—εἰ—ς ἔριν ἀντ[ίπαλοι]” (NCIG, n. 35). J. Ebert prefers the reading εἰ—ς ἔριν ἀνί[οχοι], Griechische Epigramme, n. 64.

¹³ Rom 1:29; 1Cor 3:3; 2Cor 12:20; Gal 5:20 (M. J. Lagrange, “Le Catalogue de vices dans l’Épître aux Romains,” in RB, 1911, pp. 534, 549; S. Wibbing, Die Tugend- und Lasterkataloge im Neuen Testament, Berlin, 1959, pp. 113ff.). In Phil 1:15, Paul’s adversaries proclaim the word out of a spirit of rivalry, διὰ φθόνον καὶ ἔριν; cf. 1Tim 6:4. The pairing recurs constantly in rhetorical and political language to stigmatize the misdeeds of hateful envy; φθόνος “is always seeking to sully and denigrate” (Heraclitus, All. 6.3); “it rises up against all that is noble, those who are always over-wise” (Dionysius of Sinope, in Stobaeus 38.2; vol. 3, p. 708) and who are superior to us (Thucydides 6.78; cf. Josephus, Life 80, 122–123); “the worst of all evils” (Menander, in Stobaeus 38.29; vol. 3, p. 714). To the references given in C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 2, p. 246, n. 3–7, add Plutarch, Arist. 7.2; Cat. Mai. 16.4; Philo, Moses 1.247; Spec. Laws 3.3; Joseph 5; Josephus, Life 122–123; “ill-intentioned envy, φθόνου κακοζήλου” (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 114, 13; cf. n. 122, 4); W. C. van Unnik, ΑΦΘΝΩΣ. ΜΕΤΑΔΙΔΩΜΙ, Brussels, 1971, pp. 12ff.; idem De ἀφθονία van God in de oudchristelijke Literatuur, Amsterdam-London, 1973 (gives notably the references in Philo, pp. 40ff.).

¹⁴ Rom 13:13; 1Cor 3:3. Cf. U. Wilcken, Weisheit und Torheit: Eine exegetisch-religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung zu I Kor. 1 und 2, Tübingen, 1959; J. C. Hurd, The Origin of I Corinthians, London, 1965, pp. 96–107; N. A. Dahl, “Paul and the Church at Corinth according to I Cor. I, 10–IV, 21,” in W. R. Farmer, Christian History and Interpretation: Studies Presented to J. Knox, Cambridge, 1967, pp. 313–335.

¹⁵ Titus 3:9: linking ἔρεις and μάχας (cf. Philo, Heir 246: “the dogmatic disputes of the sophists”) as does Xenophon, Cyr. 2.3.15: “I invite you to join in this sort of battle with these [rivals], who are so well educated, εἰ—ς ἔριν ὄρμα—σθαι ταύτης τῆς μάχης.”

¹⁶ Dionysius of Halicarnassus marvels that in judging Plato rhetoricians and philosophers “did not give in to envy, nor to hatred, but to love of truth” (Pomp. 1; cf. 3). In Cispadana, the Umbrian population and Tyrrhenian elements carried on a struggle of sorts for dominance, and if one nation “undertook an expedition against a foreign land, the other, out of a spirit of rivalry (ἔρις), did not pass up the chance to invade in turn the same places” (Strabo 5.1.10).

ἔσοπτρον

esoptron, mirror

esoptron, S 2072; TDNT 1.178–180, 2.696; EDNT 2.60; MM 256; L&N 6.221; BDF §30(3); BAGD 313; ND 4.149–150

The most primitive mirror was a sheet of water in a bronze platter (cf. the Athens museum; Jos. Asen. 18.7; Iamblichus, Myst. 2.10). In the first century, the esoptron is a disk, round or slightly elliptical, polished,¹ made of an alloy of copper and tin (Exod 38:8; cf. Isa 2:23; Philo, Migr. Abr. 98; Moses 2.139), sometimes silver (P.Oxy. 1449, 19) and even gold,² with a handle of metal, ivory, or enamel,³ and used to reflect the images of objects or persons.⁴

In the Bible, esoptron is used only metaphorically: of wisdom, “the spotless mirror of God’s activity” (Wis 7:26) or of the wise person whose perspicacity succeeds in uncovering a neighbor’s true feelings in spite of false appearances, after the fashion of a “mirror polisher” who cleans the easily oxidizable metal, exposing the true nature hidden by the scaling or rust that hides it.⁵ On the same psychological level, Jas 1:23 compares the Christian who hears the word of God, but does not put it into practice, to “a man who considers in the mirror the face that he was born with (from his origin, meaning his true self, to prosopon tes geneseos autou). He has seen himself, but he goes away and immediately forgets what he is like.” So the mirror is an instrument of knowledge; but for this information to be morally useful, it has to be allowed to correct faults, to remove blemishes.⁶ 1Cor 13:12 contrasts our present (arti) knowledge of God “through a mirror” to the eternal vision after death, “then (tote) it will be face to face.” According to Kittel’s article (TDNT, vol. 2, pp. 696–697), the rabbis never mention the mirror as giving an indistinct image; for them it is the symbol of prophetic revelation, a spiritual vision; mirrors that are not defective give clear knowledge,⁷ and it is surely in this sense that the image is used in 2Cor 3:18.⁸ But we cannot neglect the Hellenistic texts that point out that a mirror image can differ from the reflected object, especially if the mirror is concave or convex, or simply tarnished.⁹ At any rate, the contrast with contemplation prosopon pros prosopon shows that for Paul seeing through a mirror is imperfect. In fact, one does not get at the object itself, but its reflection; not reality, but an appearance, an image, a reproduction (eidolon, Plutarch, Ad princ. iner. 5), a refraction (anaklasis, Plutarch, Amat. 20; De fac. 23) which may even be illusory. It is something quite different to see God “as he is” (1John 3:2); in any event, the image is inferior to the object, because it appears only fleetingly (Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.100–101); whereas to know God is to abide in him (1John 4:11–12). We might even say, at least in terms of the love described in 1Cor 13, that the mirror stands between the one who looks in it and effective capture by God,¹⁰ which is true biblical “knowledge.”¹¹

¹ 1QM 5.4–5: “All shall hold bronze bucklers, polished like mirrors”; 5.11: “These swords shall be made of premium iron, purified in the crucible, and shining like a mirror.”

² Cf. Netolicza, “Κάτοπτρον,” in PW, vol. 11, pp. 29ff.; Ganschietz, “Κατοπτρομαντεία,” in PW, vol. 11, pp. 270ff.; G. E. Mylonas, in Studies Presented to D. M. Robinson, St. Louis, 1951, pp. 565–567.

³ Cf. the reproductions collected by G. Benedite, Miroirs, Cairo, 1907; F. Endell, Antike Spiegel, Munich, 1952. The espotron is mentioned in lists of articles (P.Oxy. 978; third century), with two or three facets (δίπτυχος, τρίπτυχος; Stud.Pal. XX, 15, 10; P.Mert. 71, 4), the latter made of bronze being valued at 12 drachmas in 160–163. It is a woman’s personal article, more or less precious, sometimes given as a gift; in the second century, Dionysius writes to his sister: “Receive from our father Chaeremon a mirror, writing tablets, and a tunic from Tapsois” (P.Oxy. 2787, 4). After noting that one who looks at himself in a mirror does not need for anyone else to tell him what he looks like because he is his own witness, a Christian of the fourth century adds: καὶ γὰρ ὡς δι ε—σόπτρον κατίδες τὴν πρὸς σέ μου ἔμφυτον στοργὴν καὶ ἀγάπην τὴν ἀεὶ νέαν (P.Oxy. 2603, 17–19 = M. Naldini, Il Cristianesimo in Egitto, n. 47); which seems to share in the popular opinion that every mirror has the property of retaining some trace of that which has been reflected on its surface (cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 2, p. 97, n. 2; to the references given, add Bythus of Cyrrachium, in Pliny, HN 28.23).

⁴ The mathematicians ask “How do we see? What is the cause of the image in a mirror?” (Diogenes Laertius 7.1.133; cf. A. Lejeune, Recherches sur la Catoptrique grecque, Brussels, 1957). The bibliography is given by J. Behm, “Das Bildwort von Spiegel, I Kor. XIII, 12,” in R. Seeburg Festschrift, Leipzig, 1929, vol. 1, pp. 314–342; H. Riesenfeld, “Etude bibliographique sur la notion biblique d’ΑΓΑΠΗ,” in ConNT, vol. 5, 1941, pp. 30ff.; N. Hugedé, La Métaphore du miroir dans les épîtres de saint Paul aux Corinthiens, Neuchâtel-Paris, 1957; C. Mugler, Terminologie optique, pp. 146, 175; H. Urner-Astholz, “Spiegel and Spiegelbild,” in E. Dinkler, Zeit und Geschichte: Dankesgabe an R. Bultmann, Tübingen, 1964, pp. 643–

670; G. Kittel, “αἴνιγμα,” in TDNT, vol. 1, pp. 178–180; C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 2, pp. 95–100.

⁵ Sir 12:11—“Be (for your enemy) like an ε—κμεμαχῶς ἔσοπτρον; know that the rust will not remain until the end”; cf. A. Marmorstein, Le Miroir dans la vie religieuse juive (Studii e materiali di Storia delle Religioni, VIII), Rome, 1932, pp. 125ff.; H. L. Ginsberg, “The Original Hebrew of Ben Sira XII, 10–14,” in JBL, 1955, p. 93. —Some have seen in this text an allusion to a “magic mirror” (cf. in the third-fourth century, Zosimus, Περὶ ἀρετῆς πρὸς θεοσέβειαν, cited by H. Reitzenstein, Historia Monachorum, Göttingen, 1916, p. 247) which reflects secret attitudes and allows the user to distinguish between true and false friends: the mirror mists over or goes rusty when there is dissimulation (A. Delatte, La Catopromancie grecque et ses dérivés, Liège-Paris, 1932); cf. the Talmudic interpretation of Gen 44:5, in F. Cunen, “Les Pratiques divinatoires attribuées à Joseph d’Egypte,” in RSR, 1959, pp. 396–404.

⁶ A thought already expressed by Plato: “God is the best mirror of things human for someone who wants to judge the quality of the soul, and it is in him that we can best see ourselves and know ourselves” (Plato, Alc. Maj., in Stobaeus, Ecl. 3.21.24; vol. 3, p. 576 [but the Alcibiades dialogues are generally considered to be spurious—Tr.]); Euripides: “As for perverse mortals, time reveals them when he will, by presenting his mirror to them, as to a young girl” (Hipp. 429). Common with the Stoics; cf. Epictetus 2.14.21: “At least the mirror does no wrong to the ugly man, for it shows him just as he is”; 3.22.51: “Do you see how you ought to undertake such an important matter? Start by taking a mirror, look at your shoulders, your loins, your thighs . . .”; Bias: “Look at your own actions as in a mirror, ἵνα τὰς μὲν καλὰς ε—πικοσμῆς, τὰς δὲ αἰ—σχρὰς καλύπτῃς” (in Stobaeus, Ecl. 21.11; vol. 3, p. 558); Seneca, QNat. 1.17.4; Ira 2.36.1; Philo, Abraham 153; Decalogue 105; in Spec. Laws 1.219; Migr. Abr. 190, not only does the spirit “catch as glimpse of truth as in a mirror,” but it sees the future. The best parallels to Jas 1:23 are Joseph 87: “When it shines in our sight (the model of a virtuous life), we behold our depravity, as in a mirror, and we blush at what we see”; above all Moses 2.139: “Let the one who is going to do his ablutions remember that the raw material of this utensil (the bronze basin) was mirrors, so that he also may be able to see his own soul clearly, as in a mirror, and so that if he see any disgrace arising from unrestrained passion or lust . . . he may be able to care for it, cure it, and recover a beauty that is authentic and not illegitimate.”

⁷ Plutarch, De fac. 3: “The full moon itself, thanks to the smoothness and brilliance of its surface, is the most lovely and pure of all mirrors”; Quaest. conv. 8.3; 1Clem. 36.2; T. Job 33.8. Cf. N. Hugedé, La Métaphore du miroir

dans les épîtres de saint Paul aux Corinthiens, Neuchâtel-Paris, 1957. D. H. Gill, "Through a Glass Darkly: A Note on ICor. XII, 12," in CBQ, 1963, pp. 427–429 (cf. F. W. Danker, CBQ, 1964, p. 248), cites Plutarch, De Is. et Os. 76, bringing together mirror and enigma; but the adverbs αι—νιγματικω—ς, αι—νιγματωδω—ς refer to seeing in a confused, obscure manner (cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 2, p. 100). Knowledge through enigma is characteristic of the Pythagoreans; cf. R. Joly, Le Tableau de Cèbes et la philosophie religieuse, Brussels, 1963, pp. 55, 58, 66, 70.

⁸ Cf. J. Dupont, "Le Chrétien, miroir de la Gloire divine d'après II Cor. III, 18," in RB, 1949, pp. 392–411.

⁹ Ptolemy, Opt. books 3 and 4. Sextus Empiricus, Pyr. 1.48); Plutarch, De Pyth. or. 21; De fac. 23: "These mirrors, as everyone knows, are scratched, filthy, uneven." Concerning the silver krateres that Ptolemy Philadelphus had made for the temple at Jerusalem, "the image of any object brought near them was reflected more clearly than in a mirror" (Ep. Arist. 76; cf. Josephus, Ant. 12.81); cf. R. Ferwerda, La Signification des images et des métaphores dans la pensée de Plotin, Groningen, 1965, pp. 9–23.

¹⁰ "The expression panîm el panîm, which corresponds to the etymological meaning of vis-à-vis, means not simply face to face, but much more, as the two look at each other" (P. Dhorme, Emploi métaphorique, p. 43).

¹¹ The best commentary is still that of J. Dupont, Gnosis: La Connaissance religieuse dans les épîtres de saint Paul, Louvain-Paris, 1949, pp. 119–148; cf. S. Lyonnet, "L'Étude du milieu littéraire et l'exégèse du Nouveau Testament," in Bib, 1954, pp. 494ff.; H. Conzelmann, First Corinthians, pp. 226ff.

ε—ται—ρος

hetairos, associate, comrade, friend

hetairos, S 2083; TDNT 2.699–701; EDNT 1.65; NIDNTT 1.259–260; MM 256–257; L&N 34.16; BAGD 314

It is difficult to provide an exact translation for this term, which means "one who is associated with another,"¹ because the nuance depends on the context: companion, comrade, friend, dear or good friend. These labels are not exactly synonymous,² even though the LXX used hetairos to translate the Hebrew re'a ("neighbor") and its derivatives,³ with the exception of Cant 1:7, where the h<Ø>a<^>berîm are the companions or favorites of the king.⁴ There is a world of difference between the companion of the ostrich (Job 30:29), the confidants of Zimri (1Kgs 16:11), and the fleeting friendship of the hot-tempered person (Prov 22:24), on the one hand; and on the other hand, comrades in labor (Eccl 4:4) who are true friends, who love to get together (Sir 40:23), share their joys and sorrows,⁵ vibrant in their perfect harmony.

In the NT, this word is used only by St. Matthew, always in the singular and in the vocative: hetaire.⁶ In the parable of the workers sent to work in the vineyard, where the owner responds to the complaint of one of the workers, we must translate “comrade” (Matt 20:13), because hetairos was the common term for agricultural workers (P.Oxy. 1859, 2; 1911, 157; 2195, 134; PSI 955, 17), and the relationship between the two men is not particularly cordial.⁷ On the other hand, in the parable of the royal wedding, the emotive tone is definite: “Friend, why did you come here without wedding attire?”⁸

The Vulgate’s translation—“Amice, ad quid venisti?”⁹—caught on, and practically speaking Jesus no doubt called Judas, in the Olivet garden, “My friend!” Nevertheless, hetaire should be nuanced a bit. First of all, we should remember that hetairos is used for the disciple of a teacher (Xenophon, Mem. 2.8.1) and the adherent to a party (Josephus, Life 124). It presupposes a strict solidarity, often deep bonds. In the Talmud, it corresponds to the Hebrew haber and qualifies a member of a group of scribes: an associate, an assistant, or a colleague.¹⁰ Thus the Lord was able to remind the traitor that he was a member of the apostolic college,¹¹ and the nuance was closer to companion: “You kiss me, with what you have come to do!”¹²

¹ K. Rengstorf, “ε-ται-ρος,” in TDNT, vol. 2, p. 699; H. I. Kakride, Notion de l’amitié, pp. 47ff.; the manuscripts often confuse this term with ἕτερος; cf. Sir 11:6; 42:3; Matt 11:16; P.Lond. 1912, 105, 108; P.Ant. 107, 3; P.Mich. 428, 9; P.Mert. 39, 10. Plutarch, Cat. Min. 25.1, 25.4: “Munatius, Cato’s comrade and companion, ε-ται-ρον καὶ συμβιωτήν”; Ti. Gracch. 10.1: “Marcus Octavius, comrade and companion of Tiberius, ε-ται-ρον καὶ συνήθη” (cf. Plutarch, Demetr. 4.1). Tullus is one of Cicero’s closest friends (Plutarch, Cic. 29.3; cf. 42.1); but “Publius Nigidius, a companion to Cicero in the study of philosophy” (ibid. 20.3).

² Cf. Philo, Dreams 1.111: φίλος γὰρ καὶ γνώριμος καὶ συνήθης καὶ ε-ται-ρος ἡμι-ν ε-στιν (λόγος) = reason is for us a friend, a regular caller, an intimate, a companion. The connection of ε-ται-ρος καὶ φίλος is common (Sir 37:2, 4, 5; 40:23; Xenophon, An. 7.3, 7.30; Philo, Contemp. Life 13); cf. ε-ται-ρος καὶ ἀδελφός (PSI 973, 10; cf. 839, 8); συντρόφους καὶ ε-ται-ρους (Dittenberger, Syl. 798, 7; from AD 37). In Jos. Asen. 23.4–5, companions in arms (ε-ται-ροι) become ἀδελφοὶ καὶ φίλοι

(ε—ταιρία in the sense of “troop, band,” cf. our “company,” P.Princ. 169, 5; P.Vindob.Tandem, n. 2, 10). Very rarely, the possessive is added: τω—ε—μω—ε—ταίρω (SB 7951, 7; from the second century AD); cf. a letter from the fourth century, ἄσπασαι τοῦς ε—ταίρους καὶ τοῦς σοῦς πάντας (PSI 834, 8); P.Mich. 624, 4: “I sent the memorandum by our comrade Eudaimon.”

³ 2Sam 13:3; 1Kgs 16:11; Job 30:29; Prov 27:17; Eccl 4:4. Hebrew mere’a (Judg 14:11) = companion; re’eh (2Sam 15:37; 16:17) = friend; the hithpael of ra’âh (Prov 22:24) = associate.

⁴ Ἐται—ρος τοῦ βασιλέως (&B1Kgs 4:5; Dan 5:1; cf. Philo, Flacc. 2), referring to a functionary of Solomon or Belshazzar, would be equivalent to the “king’s friend” (φίλος τ. β.) of the Hellenistic period (Diodorus Siculus 17.57.1; 17.72.1; 17.77.5; 17.100.2; 17.114.2); cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 3, p. 240; πρω—τος ε—ται—ρων (ISE, n. 113, 3 and p. 107).

⁵ Sir 37:4–5; Epictetus 1.11.31; Plutarch, Demetr. 38.8; Ant. 28.7; 40.6. In the second century AD “his group of companions moaned over the fate” of an anonymous youth who died at age eighteen (SEG VII, 372, 9); the companions of Heras of Memphis buried him (SB 7423, 11). Cf. A. J. Voelke, Les Rapports avec autrui dans la philosophie grecque, Paris, 1961, p. 57.

⁶ The sprinkling of this word in dialogue is traditional (cf. Aristophanes, Vesp. 1238; Theognis 753: φίλ ε—ται—ρε; Philo, Plant. 65). Judas Maccabaeus addresses his troops ὦ ε—ται—ροι (Josephus, Ant. 12.302) just as Joseph harangues his companions ε—ται—ροι (Josephus, War 3.262), and Plutarch punctuates his Quaest. conv. (1.1.1: ὦ ε—ται—ρε; 2.10.1; 3.6.4) with the term.

⁷ “The master has cause to be unhappy; nevertheless, he uses a condescending expression, as when an engineer addresses a worker as ‘comrade’” (M. J. Lagrange, Matthieu, p. 389). “The word ε—ται—ρε is a mode of addressing someone whose name is unknown: it implies an attitude that is both friendly and reproachful: ‘my dear fellow, comrade.’ In all three places in the New Testament where the term occurs ..., the person addressed is in the wrong” (J. Jeremias, Parables, p. 137). Ἐται—ρος is used for the companions of Ulysses (Philo, Contemp. Life 40), for those who accompany a messenger (P.Ness. 66, 7; P.Apoll. 39, 2) or a traveler (SB 9399, 10). For general interest, cf. ε—ται—ρα (Menander, Dysk. 59).

⁸ Matt 22:12. We are no longer out in the countryside, and etiquette is essential. The ε—ται—ρος can become an enemy, cf. Sir 37:2; Philo, Alleg.

Interp. 2.10: “sometimes allies are traitors and renegades, and as in friendship, flatterers turn out to be not good companions but enemies, ἀντὶ ἐ—ται—ρων ἐ—χθροί”; 3.182.

⁹ Matt 26:50. On this ἐ—φ ὃ πάρει, cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 1, p. 177, n. 8; W. Spiegelberg, “Der Sinn von ἐ—φ ὃ πάρει in Mt. XXVI, 50,” in ZNW, 1929, pp. 341–343; A. Deissmann, Light, pp. 125–131; F. Rehkopf, “Mt. XXVI, 50: ΕΤΑΙΡΕ ΕΦ Ο ΠΑΡΕΙ,” in ZNW, 1961, pp. 109–115; W. Eltester, “Freund, wozu du gekommen bist,” in Neotestamentica et Patristica. Freundesgabe O. Cullmann, Leiden, 1962, pp. 70–91.

¹⁰ Cf. Rengstorf, “ἐ—ται—ρος,” in TDNT, vol. 2, p. 699; Str-B, vol. 1, pp. 496ff.; b. Sanh. 5a ; b. Sota 22b ; Dittenberger, Or. 573, 1 (cf. C.Pap.Jud. III, p. 46). In Philo, Dreams 2.245, τις τω—ν ἐ—ται—ρων Μωυσέως = someone from the entourage of Moses. Cf. J. Neusner, “The Fellowship, (ĭaburah) in the Second Jewish Commonwealth,” in HTR, 1960, pp.125–142; J. Jeremias, Jerusalem, pp. 242–243.

¹¹ In this sense, Gos. Pet. 26 (after the death of Jesus): “As for myself, I grieved with my companions (μετὰ τω—ν ἐ—ταιρω—ν), and smitten to the heart we went into hiding.” But here, with the tone of a superior to his subordinate (cf. Josephus, Ant. 1.101); “companion, a man who belongs to you” (H. I. Kakride, Notion de l’amitié, p.76). Probably with the sense of colleague in P.Stras. 330, 1; PSI 1445, 2: τω— ε—ταίρω. ... The treaty between Atarneus and Erythrea, in 342–341, was concluded by Hermias, the former employee of Eubulus in the Athenian theoric (financial) commission (cf. D. E. W. Wormell, “The Literary Tradition Concerning Hermias of Atarneus,” in YCS, vol. 5, 1935, pp. 57–92) καὶ οἱ— ἐ—ται—ροι (Dittenberger, Syl. I, 229, 1), which may refer to their associates in the financial administration, military leaders, and representatives of small neighboring states, but more likely political friends and (co)disciples, cf. R. Bogaert, Banques et banquiers dans le cités grecques, Leiden, 1968, p. 243; F. Sartori, Le Eterie nella vita politica ateniese del VI e V secolo a. C., Padua, 1957.

¹² “Tu m’embrasses, avec ce que tu viens faire!” This is the translation of M. J. Lagrange, Matthieu, p. 503.

ἐ—τεροζυγέω

heterozygeo, to mismate, be mismated

heterozygeo, S 2086; TDNT 2.901; EDNT 2.65; NIDNTT 2.739, 741, 3.1160, 1164; MM 257; L&N 34.9; BDF §§119(1), 193(3); BAGD 314

To the Corinthians, who were getting used to debasing contact, or rather compromise, with their pagan surroundings (going to temples, entering mixed marriages?), St. Paul gives this charge: “Do not be unequally yoked with unbelievers.”¹ The verb heterozygeo (literally, “pull the yoke in a different direction than one’s fellow”; figuratively, “make a mismatched covenant, mismate”) is a biblical hapax, rarely used by ecclesiastical writers;² it is the opposite of syzygeo. Its meaning is somewhat illuminated by the adjective heterozygos, attested once in the papyri: the property of Demetrius was confiscated, including “two unmatched vases” (Antipatridia heterozyga dyo, P.Cair.Zen. 59038, 12). As a grammatical term, heterozygos means “declined or conjugated irregularly.” There is another adjective heterozyx, “having lost its yoke-mate, unmatched”; Cimon urges the Athenians “not to allow Greece to become lame (cholen) or their city to be deprived of its rival” (mete ten polin heterozyga periidein gegenemenen, Plutarch, Cim. 16.10).

Just as in a yoked team the difference between two mismatched animals keeps them from pulling the yoke in the same way and with the same force, so also is an alliance between light and darkness unimaginable—between Christ and Belial, between pagans and believers in their practical living. This would be an incongruous collaboration,³ assuming that the pistoi are a “new creation” (2Cor 5:17), and that the imbalance would tilt in favor of the pagan ways;⁴ so that to join with unbelievers is in reality to bear a yoke that belongs to another, heterozygein.⁵ Hence the refusal of any compromise.

¹ 2Cor 6:14: μὴ γίνεσθε ε—τεροζυγοῦντες ἀπίστοις. This is an allegorical interpretation of Lev 19:19—“You shall not pair your cattle with [an animal made for] another yoke (τὰ κτήνη σου οὐ κατοχεύσεις ε—τεροζύγω, Hebrew kil’ayim)”; cf. Codex Neophiti I: “You shall not pair your livestock of two species.” This verse is cited by Philo, who sees it as prohibiting adultery: “Do not pair a beast with a partner of a different species, τὰ κτήνη μὴ ὀχεύειν ε—τεροζύγοις” (Philo, Spec. Laws 4.203); and by Josephus in his compendium of the Mosaic legislation: βουσὶν ἀροῦν τὴν γῆν, καὶ μηδὲν τω—ν ε—τέρων ζώων σὺν αὐτοί—ς ὑπὸ ζεύγλην ἄγοντας (Ant. 4.228). Deut 22:10 repeats this ban on mixing different species, and Str-B (vol. 3, p. 521) refer back to tractate Kil’ayim (mixing of two kinds), which prohibits mixing fabrics in a garment, seeds in a field, different animals (e.g., a horse and an ass) under a yoke (8.2–4).

² Cf. several examples in H. Windisch, Der zweite Korintherbrief, 2d ed., Göttingen, 1924, p. 213. “Because of ζυγός, which means not only ‘yoke’ but the bar of a set of scales, Theophylact understood this phrase to mean ‘Do not be too inclined toward the pagans’” (E. B. Allo, Seconde Epître aux Corinthiens, Paris, 1937, p. 184).

³ The exhortation to avoid trafficking with pagans is frequent: Rom 12:2; 1Cor 5:9; Gal 5:1—“Do not let yourselves be put back under a yoke of servitude” (cf. K. H. Rengstorf, “Zu Gal. V, 1,” in TLZ, 1951, col. 659–662); Eph 5:7, 11; especially 1Pet 4:2–4. This Christian separatism, analogous to that of the Qumranians, is one of the characteristics of this pericope (1Cor 6:14–7:1) that has so many affinities with the vocabulary and doctrine of the Dead Sea Scrolls; Cf. J. A. Fitzmyer, “Qumrân and the Interpolated Paragraph in II Cor. VI, 14–VII, 1,” in CBQ, 1961, pp. 271–280 (revised in J. A. Fitzmyer, Semitic Background, pp. 205–217); P. Benoit, “Qumrân et le Nouveau Testament,” in NTS, vol. 7, 1961, pp. 279, 282; E. Kamlah, Die Form der katalogischen Paränese im Neuen Testament, Tübingen, 1964, p. 28; J. Gnilka, “II Cor. VI, 14–VII, 1 im Lichte der Qumranschriften und des Zwölf-Patriarchen-Testamentes,” in Festschrift J. Schmid, Regensburg, 1962, pp. 86–99 (revised in J. Murphy O’Connor, Paul and Qumran, London 1968, pp. 48–68); H. D. Betz, “II Cor. VI, 14–VII, 1: An Anti-Pauline Fragment?” in JBL, 1973, pp. 88–108.

⁴ Cf. the dative ἀπίστοις (A. Plummer, Second Corinthians, p. 206); but this dative of accompaniment is normal with verbs of keeping company, conversing, gathering; cf. F. M. Abel, Grammaire, 45 k.

⁵ Cf. F. Godet, La Seconde Epître aux Corinthiens, Neuchâtel, 1914, p. 211. In this compound verb, the second element “governs” the first, cf. BDF §119(1).

εὐαγγελίζομαι, εὐαγγέλιον, εὐαγγελιστής euangelizomai, to announce good news; euangelion, good news; euangelistes, bringer of good news, evangelist

euangelizomai, S 2097; TDNT 2.707–721; EDNT 1.69–70; NIDNTT 2.107–114; MM 259; L&N 33.215; BDF §§69(4), 119(1), 152(2), 163, 206(4), 309(1), 311(1), 392(3); BAGD 317 | euangelion, S 2098; TDNT 2.721–736; EDNT 2.70–74; NIDNTT 2.107–114; MM 259; L&N 33.217; BDF §§119(1), 163, 224(2); BAGD 317–318 | euangelistes, S 2099; TDNT 2.736–737; EDNT 2.74; NIDNTT 2.107, 114; MM 259; L&N 53.76; BAGD 318; ND 3.12–14; 5.73–74, 78

In secular Greek, angelos was “messenger” (especially of the gods) and angelia “message.” Euangelos referred to “one who bears good news,” a messenger of joy. When transmitting oracles, this sacred messenger could announce the future or bring salvation (soteria) and success (eutychia, eutychema) and thus was considered a divine being (theios anthropos) whose coming stirred joy;¹ his announcements were full of promise.²

The verb euangelizomai, “announce good news,” is construed with the accusative or the dative of the person.³ It is always used in a context of joy, at least from the point of view of the messenger: “I bring good words, happy news (logous agathous pheron euangelisasthai) that I want to be the first to announce to you . . . they wanted to crown me for the good news (euangelia)” (Aristophanes, Eq. 643); “I am not the one who was seen, rejoicing and laughing at the success of the alien . . . announcing good news to others.”⁴ Usually, the announcement concerns victory and peace:⁵ the bringer of good news (euangelos) arrives from the battlefield, sometimes by ship,⁶ sometimes by horse or by letter,⁷ but also on foot, by a runner.⁸ Any political or private communication that is considered happy may be so designated. For example, tyranny is overthrown and liberty recovered (Lucian, Tyr. 9); two messengers announce to Marius his fifth election to the consulate and give him written notice thereof (Plutarch, Mar. 22.4); a wedding ceremony (Menander, Georg. 83; Longus, Daph. 3.33.1: ton gamon euangelizeto); the birth of a child: “If someone brings the morose man the good news of the birth of a son (pros ton euangelizomenon hoti), he replies, ‘There goes half my property’” (Theophrastus, Char. 17.7); the midwife encourages the pregnant woman “by announcing to her (euangelizomene) a lucky delivery” (Soranus, Gyn. 21); even an opportune death: “I begin by announcing this good news to you: Demaenetus is dead” (Heliodorus, Aeth. 2.10.1); finally, any kind of news at all,⁹ even false news.¹⁰

The LXX always uses euangelizomai to translate the piel of the Hebrew verb basar (only once in the hithpael, 2Sam 18:31); in all of the semitic languages, the root of this verb contains the idea of joy.¹¹ Εὐαγγελιζόμενος in the LXX corresponds to the Hebrew mebasser, a bringer of good news.{NOTEEND} On a secular level, the good news announced is what makes one happy, for example, news of the birth of a son¹² or of a victory.¹³ The messenger’s fervor is emphasized: he runs to make his announcement.¹⁴ But on a religious level, euangelizo becomes a religious, cultic, and messianic verb. The announcement, which is always oral (Ps 40:9—“I have not sealed my lips”), takes on a solemn character to proclaim God’s interventions and benefits: “Climb up on a high mountain, messenger of Zion, raise your voice forcefully, messenger of Jerusalem. . . . Behold, the Lord God is coming in power” (Isa 40:9). The good news of salvation is sung (Ps 96:2); it is a victory: “The Lord utters a word, he announces the good news to the great host: they flee, the kings of the armies flee” (Ps 68:11-12). “How beautiful on the mountains are the feet of the messenger who proclaims peace, who announces good news, who proclaims salvation, who says to Zion, ‘Your God reigns’” (Isa 52:7; cf. 60:6; Nah 1:15). The Messiah is the one who will be the bearer of the message of salvation: “Yahweh has anointed me; he has sent me to bring good news to the humble” (Isa 61:1; euangelizomai and kerysso are synonymous).

It is worth noting that Philo seems unaware of these texts. If on a rare occasion he gives a moral significance to euangelizomai (the happy messages for the soul in Dreams 2.281 are the destruction of Egyptian vices), he ignores the other terms from the same root, and he uses this verb especially in the sense of “promise” (a harvest, Creation 115; Moses 2.186), like the hope that “anticipates and announces the full joy that is coming”;¹⁵ but the messenger always hurries to announce favorable news (Joseph 245, 250; To Gaius 99). These same, exclusively secular, usages are found again in Josephus.¹⁶

It is only in Palestinian Judaism that basar once again takes on the religious meaning that it has in the prophets and in the Psalms: “When the lips of the man at prayer begin to move on their own, let him then receive the good news that his prayer is answered” (m. Ber. 5.9d 25); “You have brought me good news: tomorrow I shall take part in these things in the world to come” (Sipre Deut. 307, on Deut 32:4); “Let the one who recites the Shema morning and evening receive the good news that he is a son of the world to come” (m. sheqal. 3.47c 62); “Let them bring the good news that I have forgiven your sins.”¹⁷

In the papyri, the verb euangelizo is rare in the active voice.¹⁸ In the middle: Apollonius and Sarapias express their joy at the announcement of a wedding (charas hemas eplerosas euangelismene ton gamon tou kratistou Sarapionos, P.Oxy. 3313, 3; second century). A sixth-century Christian: “I announce once more to Your Honor that the blessed river that fertilizes Egypt has progressed (prosbainein) by the power of Christ.”¹⁹ It is the substantivized adjective euangelion,²⁰ most commonly used in the plural form euangelia (εὐαγγέλια, but frequently written εὐαγγέλιον, εὐαγγέλια), which considerably enriches the idea of evangel and confirms its religious and cultural meaning.²¹ An Egyptian functionary in the third century writes to his subordinate: “Forasmuch as I have become aware of the tidings of joy (epei genostes egnomen tou euangeliou) concerning the proclaiming as Emperor of Gaius Julius Verus Maximus Augustus, the son of our lord, most dear to the gods, the Emperor Gaius Julius Maximinus, pious, happy, and Augustus, it is necessary, O most honorable, that the goddesses be celebrated in festal procession.”²² In the introduction to the new calendar around the year 9 BC, I.Priene 105, 40 (= Dittenberger, Syl.

458) says, “The birthday of the god (Augustus) began for the world the good news that he brought” (erxen de to kosmo ton di’ auton euangelion he genethlios tou theou). J. Rouffiac, who edited this text,²³ comments: “That idea that an evangel began for the world with the birth of Augustus is one of the most remarkable points of contact between our inscription and the NT, because no other word received the imprint of Christianity more profoundly than ‘evangel.’”

What is more, if Greek euangelia expressed the gratuitousness, the richness of the gifts and the joy that they stirred,²⁴ they referred above all to the sacrifices celebrated when good news was announced: the phrase for these sacrifices was euangelia thyein.²⁵ In the imperial period, instances multiply.²⁶ On the occasion of the “salvation” of Thersippus, a three-day feast was celebrated, and the people “sacrificed evangels and salvations” (euangelia kai soteria ethyse, Dittenberger, Or., IV, 42; fourth century BC; cf. VI, 32; Syl. 352, 5). Someone vows to sacrifice (euangelia thyso) to the goddesses of vengeance and to Hermes if delivered from a certain Manes.²⁷ There are other examples. So the word “evangel” was perfectly suited to refer to the announcement of the birth of the Savior Jesus and of his death, just as much as the blessedness and thankfulness that were at the heart of the new religion, which was dedicated to the perpetuation of his memory. Euangelion was to become the ideal word in the Pauline kerygma for announcing salvation through Christ’s victory over Satan, sin, death, and superstition: the good news from God!

The verb euangelizomai, unknown in Mark, John, Jas, 2 Pet, and Jude, always in the NT expresses an oral announcement,²⁸ but because it is the word of God and of the Spirit (1Pet 1:12), it is accompanied by power and the working of miracles.²⁹ It brings about new birth (1Pet 1:23-25) and salvation (1Cor 15:1-2; cf. Acts 16:17 according to D), stirring joy (Acts 8:8). If God is at the origin of the revelation of the plan of salvation (Acts 10:36; Rev 10:7), it is the angels who announce the births of the Messiah and of his precursor (Luke 1:19; 2:10; cf. Rev 14:6), who are sources of delight (Luke 1:14). John the Baptist, in promising the advent of the kingdom of God (Luke 16:16), “evangelized” by announcing this good news to the people (Luke 3:18); but it is Jesus himself who declares himself the messenger of blessedness of the last times. At Nazareth he applies Isa 61:1 to himself (“He has anointed me to announce good news to the poor,” Luke 4:18), and in reply to those sent by John the Baptist he affirms that “good news is preached to the poor” (ptochoi euangelizontai, Matt 11:5; Luke 4:18, 43; referring to Isa 35:5; Isa 61:1; cf. Luke 16:16; Eph 2:17). Not only does he convey the joyous message, but he alone brings the content to fruition: salvation,³⁰ as confirmed by his preaching among the dead in 1Pet 4:6. After him, apostles and disciples are evangelists, fulfilling the prophecy of Isa 52:7—“How beautiful are the feet of those who announce good news” (ton euangelizomenon agatha).³¹

As for the good news itself (euangelion, 72 times in the NT, including 60 in St. Paul), it is mentioned eight times in St. Mark,³² including six times in quotations of Jesus; and there is no reason to suspect the authenticity of these occurrences or see in them an anachronistic anticipation of Paul,³³ even though this term already had its full meaning from the missionary kerygma: a message preached to all people concerning the person, the public life, and the teaching of Jesus, Son of God; i.e., a blessed event and a new doctrine concerning salvation, both expressed and realized in the advent of the Messiah-King. This evangel is the salvation of all people who believe (Mark 16:15-16).

St. Paul received as a revelation from God (Gal 1:11-12, 15; Rom 1:1) this euangelion, which must be made public³⁴ and is the “word of truth” (Col 1:5), having Jesus Christ as its object and author (euangelion tou Christou),³⁵ identical to the gospel of God (genitive of author, 1Thess 2:2, 8, 9; Rom 1:1; 15:16; 2Cor 11:7). The christological and soteriological content is never adequately spelled out,³⁶ and if various elements successively come to the fore in Paul’s preaching, there is no “transforming” evolution of his gospel,³⁷ even in his Pastoral Epistles.³⁸ This “good news” is therefore a treasure from which one may draw infinitely and which is identical with its content (Phlm 13): the new religion, a “mystery” unveiled (Eph 6:19), of which Paul is priest (Rom 15:16); that is to say, “Christ died for our sins” (1Cor 15:3; Rom 1:11), the euangelion produces soteria (Rom 1:16; 1Cor 15:2; Eph 1:13; 3:6), is a force (Rom 1:1; 15:16; 2Cor 11:7; 1Thess 1:5; 2:8-9; 1Pet 4:17) that bears fruit and makes progress (Col 1:6). It makes its course across the world (2Thess 3:1; 2Tim 2:9). It is personified, as it were (2Cor 10:14), and its characteristics can be noted: (1) it is revealed by God to humankind (Gal 1:11-12; 1Thess 2:2, 9; 2Thess 2:14), so it is true (Gal 2:5, 14; Col 1:5); (2) one must believe it (Phil 1:27), obey it (Rom 10:16; 1Cor 9:12; 2Cor 9:13; 2Thess 1:8; 1Pet 4:17; cf. 1:2), base one’s hope on it (Col 2:23), taste its peace (Eph 6:15), because it is good news of immortality (2Tim 1:10); (3) it must be proclaimed to others (Rom 15:9; 1Cor 9:14, 18; 2Cor 10:14; Gal 2:2; 1Thess 2:8); (4) no matter the cost (Rom 1:16; 1Cor 9:23; Phil 1:16; 2Tim 1:8; 2:9; 1Thess 2:2); (5) one serves it (Rom 1:1; 15:16; 1Cor 9:23; Eph 3:7; Col 1:23; Phil 1:12; 2:22; 4:3; 1Thess 3:2) and defends it by word, conduct, and action (Phil 1:7, 16, 27; 4:3; 1Tim 1:11); (6) because it is also possible to stand in its way (1Cor 9:12, enkopen), disobey it and forget it (Rom 2:16; 10:16; 2Thess 1:7-8; 1Pet 4:17), even falsify and corrupt it;³⁹ (7) but whoever holds fast to the gospel is begotten to eternal life (1Cor 4:15; cf. Jas 1:18; 1Pet 1:23) and shares in the sanctification of the Spirit (2Thess 2:14).

Altogether out of the ordinary in the Bible is the angel of Rev 14:6—“having an eternal gospel” (echonta euangelion aionion [hapax Rev]) to “evangelize those who are seated on the earth. . . .” There have been many ways of interpreting this “eternal gospel,” to which Joachim of Fiore was to give such notoriety! “Eternal” would mean that it was predetermined by God ab aeterno, or on the contrary that it has to do with the age to come, and thus means God’s definitive triumph, the inauguration of the reign of the Lamb at the end of the world. L. Cerfaux’s exegesis emphasizes the absence of the article before euangelion and refers to Isa 52:7-8 and to Pesiq.R. 35, where Elijah proclaims the salvation and blessedness brought by the coming of the Messiah.⁴⁰ But one hardly sees why this good news is announced to all the nations of the earth, and also its content, which is an exhortation to fear God (cf. Mark 1:14ff.) and call upon the Creator (cf. Acts 14:15; 1Thess 1:5, 9) does not deserve this description. Furthermore, it seems preferable to take aionion in the sense of “immutable” or “divine” and to follow E. B. Allo: “it is the gospel pure and simple, said to be eternal because it does not change, as opposed to the law of Moses,”⁴¹ and proclaimed universally (Matt 24:14).

The last evolution of euangelion: the gospel, which was always an oral message, becomes a writing: “the memoirs of the apostles, which are called Gospels.”⁴² As Eusebius would explain, missionaries “put their honor to preaching the word of faith to those who had heard nothing of it and transmitting to them the text of the divine Gospels” (ton theion euangelion, Hist. Eccl. 3.37.2). This tetramorphic (in four forms) gospel (Irenaeus, Haer. 3.11.8; 4.20.6; Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 6.24.6) is the four books of the Gospels which are the written form of the preaching of the gospel of Jesus Christ.⁴³

As for the term euangelistes (evangelist), it is unknown before the Christian era; its mention in an inscription at Rhodes is so disputable that nothing certain can be drawn from it.⁴⁴ Its uses in the papyri are all Christian and late, referring above all to the evangelist John (an amulet from the fifth century, P.Oxy. 1151, 45; sixth century, PSI 953, 82; CPR I, 30,4), sometimes to Mark (SB 6087, 18, Markou euangelistou). The three NT mentions are hardly more explicit. The word is attributed as a title to the deacon Philip in Acts 21:8 (“having entered [at Caesarea] into the house of Philip the evangelist”). St. Paul uses it as a functional description of his co-worker Timothy, whom he has just exhorted to “preach the word” (2Tim 4:2). He reiterates: “Do the work of an evangelist (ergon poieson euangelistou), fulfill your ministry (ten diakonian)” (4:5). Finally, in a list of charismatic gifts, evangelists are slipped in between apostles and prophets on the one hand and pastors and teachers on the other “for the work of ministry, for the edification of the body of Christ.”⁴⁵

This office of evangelist has been understood in quite diverse fashions,⁴⁶ but most often in an anachronistic fashion, with reference to later distinctions (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 3.37; 5.10.2), whereas in NT times this function did not as yet have a determinate character. All that we can say is that an evangelist is a messenger (cf. Isa 40:9; 52:7; 61:1) who preaches the gospel. He collaborates with the apostles and continues their mission, spreading their preaching without having their authority, even though this office is put ahead of pastors and teachers. His ministry is especially itinerant, but can also be fixed, and the evangelist—like Timothy, bishop of Ephesus—is stationed, if we may so express it, in the community where he carries out other responsibilities; which is commonly the case with charismatic gifts.

¹ Philostratus, VA 4.31; 7.21; 8.38; Iamblichus, VP 2.12; Lucian, Icar. 34; J. Schniewind, Euangelion, Gütersloh, 1931, pp. 185–196; cf. M. Burrows, “The Origin of the Term ‘Gospel,’” in JBL, 1925, pp. 21–33; G. Friedrich, “εὐαγγέλιον,” in TDNT, vol. 2, pp. 707–737.

² Plato, Tht. 144 b: εὐ̄ ἀγγέλλεις; Resp. 4.432 b.

³ F. M. Abel, Grammaire, 43 e; cf. 16 h. The recipient of the message is designated by πρὸς (Menander, Georg. 83), ε—πί (Rev 14:6—to those who), ε—ν (French chez, among, Gal 1:16). The content of the announcement is introduced by περί or ὅτι.

⁴ Demosthenes, Corona 18.323; Agrippina “announced to Nero that she had had the good fortune to save herself” (σώζοιτο εὐηγγελίκει, Dio Cassius 61.13.4).

⁵ J. Schniewind, Euangelion, p. 130.

⁶ Plutarch, Pomp. 66.3: “A number of people sailed for Lesbos, wishing to announce to Cornelia the good news (εὐαγγελιζόμενοι) that the war was over.”

⁷ Heliodorus, Aeth. 10.1.3: the mission of going to announce to those at Meroë the good news of victory.

⁸ Pausanias 4.19.5; Lucian, Laps. 3: ἡμεροδρομήσας.

⁹ PSI 768, 8; J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1955, p. 215, n. 95; 1965, p. 148, n. 309.

¹⁰ A house saved from a ghost (Lucian, Pseudol. 31); Lysias, C. Leocr. 18; Polyaeus, Strat. 5.7.

¹¹ Cf. O. Schilling, rcb, TDOT vol. 2, pp. 313–316; J. Bowman, “The Term ‘Gospel’ and its cognates in the Palestinian Syriac,” in Studies in Memory of T. W. Manson, Manchester, 1959, pp. 54–67.

¹² Jer 20:15—“Cursed be the man who announced to my father, ‘A son is born to you, a male!’ and thus brought him joy.”

¹³ 1Sam 31:9, the Philistines, upon discovering the body of Saul, “sent messengers to carry the good news all around, in their idolatrous temples, among the nations” (= 1Chr 10:9), but David forbade “carrying good news (of this death) in the streets of Ashkelon lest the daughters of the uncircumcised rejoice” (2Sam 1:20; cf. 7:9). Likewise at the death of Absalom (2Sam 18:19-20, 26, 31). The announcement of Solomon’s coronation was good news—though not for Adonijah and his guests (1Kgs 1:42). Cf. the announcement of peace (Nah 1:15 = 2:1).

¹⁴ 2Sam 18:19, 22, 25-27. The εὐαγγέλιον is the “tip” the messenger gets for bringing good news (2Sam 4:10).

¹⁵ Rewards 161. The other usages are conformable to classical Greek: announcing a victory (Virtues 41), the accession of Gaius to power (To Gaius 231), of the complete restoration of his health (18).

¹⁶ Announcement of a birth (Ant. 5.277, 282), of a victory (5.24; 7.245, 250; 15.209; War 3.503), of a favorable occasion (War 3.143), of the death of Tiberius (Ant. 18.228). The one who announces rejoices (War 1.607). The εὐαγγέλιον in War 2.420 is a godsend; favorable news (4.656), the accession of Vespasian to the imperial power, which is celebrated with sacrifices (4.618). At the death of Tiberius, Agrippa learns that “the lion is dead” and, in his rejoicing, he declares that for him it is good news (εὐαγγελία), Ant. 18.229.

¹⁷ Exod. Rab. 46, on Exod 34:1; cf. Pss. Sol. 11.2—“Publish in Jerusalem the word of the messenger of joy (the Messiah): That God has taken pity on Israel and visited him”; numerous texts cited by Str-B, vol. 3, pp. 5–11.

¹⁸ Having arrived from Memphis, a slave announces to the strategos Apollonius the victory of his army (ε—ρχομένω εὐαγγελίζοντι τὰ τῆς νείκης αὐτοῦ καὶ προκοπῆς) and expresses the wish that a thanksgiving feast be celebrated in honor of the gods (P.Giss. 27, 6; end of Trajan’s reign, beginning of Hadrian’s); P.Amh. II, 16 (Christian hymn from the fourth century).

¹⁹ P.Oxy. 1830, 3. Cf. T. Kock, Menandrea ex papyris et membranis vetustissimis, Leipzig, 1912, p. 106, 83: εὐαγγελίσασθαι πρὸς σὲ ταῦτ ε—βουλόμην.

²⁰ Used for the return of Ulysses (Homer, Od. 14.152, 166), then the announcement of victory “by a soldier who had taken part in the combat. He entered the stadium (at Olympia) to bring the good news of the victory” (Philostratus, Gym. 7); likewise Plutarch, Ages. 33.7; Demetr. 17.6; etc. Christian usages from the sixth and seventh centuries: τὸν ἅγιον εὐαγγέλιον (P.Princ. 180, 8; SB 9401, 4).

²¹ Εὐάγγελος—attested beginning with Aeschylus, Ag. 21 (the signal-fire as a messenger of joy), 475, 262 (the good messenger Hope invites you to sacrifice), 646 (“messenger of salvation in a city rejoicing in triumph”), and Euripides, Phoen. 1217: “a happy message”—is a proper name attested from the fifth century (Dittenberger, Syl. 77, 26), mentioned in the first century AD (BGU 583, 1; P.Lond. 260, 106; vol. 2, p. 50), in the second century (P.Haw. 312), in the second-third century (P.Amh. 76, 8), in the third-fourth century (P.Oxy. 989; BGU 816, 6), etc. Cf. BGU 496, 12, 908, 4ff., 1127, 2. Also used for a messenger of the gods, delivering an oracle (cf. Conon, in the first century, in F.Gr.H., vol. 1, p. 207, 8–14; an inscription from Samos, in J. Schniewind, Euangelion, p. 187); and as an divine attribute: of Hermes (cf. Hesychius 2.216; IG 5, 235); of Zeus himself (Aelius Aristides, ed. B. Keil, vol. 2, pp. 468ff., n.53). As proper names there are also Εὐαγγελει—ος (P.land. 51, 5; P.Oxy. 998), Εὐαγγελίων (I.Perg. 384, 3), and Εὐαγγέλιος (P.Hamb. 33, rect. II, 29; second century AD), which is also a month in the calendar of Smyrna in the third century (cf. PW, on this word).

²² Papyrus from the Royal Library of Berlin, ed. A. Deissmann, Light, p. 367.

²³ Caractères du grec, p. 74. Cf. J. Gagé, “La Théologie de la Victoire impériale,” in Revue historique, 1933, pp. 1–43.

²⁴ Cf. the inscription from Laodicea in which “the Romans and the Greeks of the province of Asia and the people of Laodicea honored Quintus Pomponius Flacius, who freely bestowed his generosity on the feasts for good news” (ε—πιδίδοντα ε—ν εὐαγγελίοις εὐψύχως, published in IGRom. IV, 860; republished with commentary by L. Robert, “Les Inscriptions,” in J. des Gagniers, Laodicée, pp. 265ff., line 12).

²⁵ Cf. Xenophon, Hell. 1.6.37: Following the naval victory won by Callicratidas, Eteonicus held a thanksgiving sacrifice (ἔθυε τὰ εὐαγγέλια);

4.3.14: “Agesilaus offered a sacrifice to celebrate the good news and made numerous distributions of parts of the victims”; Isocrates, Areop. 7.10: “sacrifice for good news”; Plutarch, Phoc. 23.6: “The city will celebrate this good news with feasts and unending sacrifices” (ε—ορτάζειν εὐαγγέλια συνεχω—ς, καὶ θύειν τοι—ς θεοι—ς); Sert. 26.6: when victory was announced, “Sertorius, full of joy, offered a thanksgiving sacrifice” (θύοντος εὐαγγέλια); Ages. 17.5; Plutarch, Cat. Min. 51.1: “the people offered a sacrifice for the good news” (εὐαγγέλια θυει—ν); Plutarch, Demetr. 11.4: after the naval victory, Stratocles decreed sacrifices for the good news; Philostratus, VA 5.8; Heliodorus, Aeth. 10.2 (τὰς εὐχαριστηρίους θυσίας); Diodorus Siculus 15.74.2. Cf. J. Schniewind, Euangelion, pp. 168–183.

²⁶ L. Robert cites a dozen in “Notes d’épigraphie hellénistique,” in BCH, 1936, p. 187, and adds new ones in I.Sard.Rob., pp. 14–15.

²⁷ C. Michel, Recueil, n. 1325, 7. Cf. IG, VII, 17; II2, 1224.

²⁸ Cf. κηρύσσω (Acts 8:4ff.), λαλέω (8:25), διδάσκω (5:42, 15:35), ἀναγγέλλω (1Pet 1:12).

²⁹ Cf. A. George, “Paroles de Jésus sur ses miracles,” in J. Dupont, Jesus aux origines de la Christologie, Gembloux, 1975, pp. 283–292.

³⁰ The realization of the divine promises (Acts 13:32ff.; Heb 4:2, 6), the establishment of the kingdom (Acts 8:12), the lordship of Christ (Acts 5:42; 8:35; 11:20; 17:18; Gal 1:16; Eph 3:8; 1Pet 1:11ff.).

³¹ Rom 10:15; cf. the Twelve (Luke 9:6; Acts 5:42; 8:4), deacons (Acts 8:12, 35, 40), St. Paul (Acts 10:36; Eph 2:17), who will be the evangelist to the pagans (Acts 11:20; 14:7, 15, 21; 16:10; 17:18; Rom 15, 20; 1Cor 15:1ff.; 2Cor 10:16; 11:7; Gal 1:8, 16; 4:13). His grace (Eph 3:8) and his calling is to “evangelize” (1Cor 1:17), after the fashion of the prophets (Amos 3:8; Jer 1:20; Ezek 3:17ff.)—hence it is an obligation (1Cor 9:16).

³² Mark 1:1—“The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, Son of God” (cf. L. E. Keck, “The Introduction to Mark’s Gospel,” in NTS, vol. 12, 1966, pp. 352–370; J. Delorme, “Aspects doctrinaux du second Evangile,” in I. de la Potterie, De Jésus aux Evangiles, Gembloux-Paris, 1967, pp. 79ff. R. Pesch, “Anfang des Evangeliums Jesu Christi,” in Die Zeit Jesu: Festschrift H. Schlier, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna, 1970, pp. 108–144); 1:14—“Jesus went into Galilee proclaiming the gospel of God” (salvation realized, in the name of God); 1:15—“Repent and believe the gospel”; 8:35—“Whoever loses his life because of me and the gospel (for the cause of the gospel) will save it” = 10:29; 14:9—“Everywhere the gospel shall be preached in the whole world, what she has done (Mary of Bethany) will be told in memory of her” (J. Jeremias, Abba, pp. 115–120); 16:15—“Go through the whole world, preach the gospel to every creature.” G. Strecker, “Literarkritische Überlegung zum εὐαγγέλιον-Begriff im Markusevangelium,” in Neues Testament und Geschichte (Festschrift O. Cullmann), Zurich, 1972, pp. 91–104; reprinted in Eschaton und Historie, Göttingen, 1979, pp. 76–89.

³³ J. A. E. van Dodewaard (“Jésus s’est-il servi lui-même du mot ‘Evangile’?” in Bib, 1954, pp. 161–173) remarks that for Mark, the evangel (1) has God as its author (1:14); (2) announces Jesus Christ as Son of God (1:1) and the kingdom (1:15); (3) is good news that is intended for universal promulgation (13:10; 14:9; 16:15); (4) εὐαγγέλιον — Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ (1:1) and τοῦ θεοῦ (1:14) are synonymous. —The word (in Greek, or its Aramaic equivalent) was current in Hellenistic Judaism. Thus it has been transmitted correctly by the oral tradition (which is the basis of our Gospels) and not by communities expressing themselves through anonymous redactors. It is urgent to examine anew the usage of Greek in Palestine in the first century and to complete the fundamental work of S. Liebermann (Greek in Jewish Palestine, 2d ed., New York, 1965), especially since the discovery of the Greek letter of Bar Kochba (cf B. Lifshitz, in Aeg, vol. 42, 1962, p. 243) and the Murabba‘at papyri. Cf. H. Birkeland, The Language of Jesus, Oslo, 1952; H. Schürmann, “Die Sprache des Christus,” in BZ, 1958, pp. 54–84; H. Ott, “Um die Muttersprache Jesu,” in NovT, 1967, pp. 1–25; H. P. Rüger, “Zum Problem der Sprache Jesu,” in ZNW, 1968, pp. 113–122; J. Barr, “Which Language Did Jesus Speak?” in BJRL, 1970, pp. 9–29; P. Lapide, “Insights from Qumrân into the Languages of Jesus,” in RevQ, vol. 8, 1972, pp. 483–501; A. W. Argyle, “Greek among the Jews of Palestine in New Testament Times,” in NTS, vol. 20, 1973, pp. 87–89; J.A. Emerton, “The Problem of Vernacular Hebrew in the First Century A.D. and the Language of Jesus,” in JTS, 1973, pp. 1–23; H. Leclercq, “Note sur le grec néotestamentaire et la position du grec en Palestine au premier siècle,” in Etudes classiques, 1974, pp. 243–255; M. Hengel, Judaism and Hellenism: Studies in their Encounter in Palestine during the Early Hellenistic Period, 2 vols., Philadelphia, 1975; G. Mussies, “Greek in Palestine and the Diaspora,” in S. Safrai, M. Stern, The Jewish People in the First Century, Assen-Amsterdam, 1976, vol. 2, pp. 1040–1064; M. Silva, “Bilingualism and the Character of Palestinian Greek,” in Bib, 1980, pp. 198–219.

³⁴ Γνωρίζω, (1Cor 15:1; Eph 6:19), διδάσκω (Gal 1:12; 2Tim 1:11), ἀνατίθημι (Gal 2:2), εὐαγγελίζομαι (1Cor 15:1; 2Cor 11:7; Gal 1:11), καταγγέλλω (1Cor 9:14), κηρύσσω (1Thess 2:9; Gal 2:2; Col 1:23), λαλέω (1Thess 2:2). Cf. A. Goffinet, “La Prédication de l’Evangile,” in ETL, 1965, pp. 412ff. B. Moreau, “La Notion d’évangélisation chez saint Paul,” in LTP, 1968, pp. 258–293.

³⁵ “Comprehensive” genitive (both subjective and objective), Rom 15:19; 1Cor 9:12; 2Cor 2:12; 9:13; 10:14; Gal 1:7; Phil 1:27; 1Thess 3:2; 2Thess 1:8). Cf. G. Strecker, “Das Evangelium Jesu Christi,” in Jesus Christus in Historie und Theologie: Festschrift H. Conzelmann, Tübingen, 1975, pp. 503–548. St. Paul also says “my” (Rom 2:16; 16:25; 2Tim 2:8) or “our gospel” (1Thess 1:5; 2Thess 2:14; 2Cor 4:3).

³⁶ The preexistent Son of God, born of the house of David, resurrected and Lord (Rom 1:3-4), dead, resurrected, and having appeared (1Cor 15:1), accomplishing the promises (1Cor 15:1 and Rom 16:25ff.), bringing peace (Eph 6:15), judgment (Rom 2:16), eternal life (Titus 3:1-8), salvation (2Tim 1:8-10). Cf. J. Schniewind, Die Begriffe Wort und Evangelium bei Paulus, Bonn, 1910. J. Bonsirven, L’Evangile de Paul, Paris, 1948; H. Schlier, “Εὐαγγέλιον im Römerbrief,” in Wort Gottes in der Zeit (Festschrift K. H. Schelkle), Düsseldorf, 1973, pp. 127–142.

³⁷ Cf. E. B. Allo, “L’Evolution’ de l’Evangile de Paul,” in Mémorial Lagrange, Paris, 1940, pp. 259–267.

³⁸ 1Tim 1:11—“The gospel of the glory of the blessed God, which was entrusted to me personally” is the norm of faith (cf. C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, vol. 1, pp. 336ff.); 2Tim 1:8—“Take part in the sufferings of the gospel according to the power of God”; 1:10-11: “Christ Jesus brought life and incorruption to light by the gospel, for which I was established as herald, apostle, and teacher”; 2:8-9: “Remember Jesus Christ, resurrected from the dead, of the race of David, according to his gospel. For him, I endure sufferings to the point of imprisonment as a criminal”; cf. P. Trummer, Die Paulustradition der Pastoralbriefe, Graz, 1976, pp. 234ff.

³⁹ 2Cor 11:4; Gal 1:6-7; cf. W. Barclay, NT Wordbook, London, 1955, pp. 41–46. On the gospel regula fidei, cf. the formula πιστὸς ὁ λόγος κ.τ.λ. (1Tim 1:15; 3:1; 4:9; Titus 3:8; 2Tim 2:11). P. C. Empe, Teaching Authority and Infallibility in the Church, Minneapolis, 1980, pp. 14ff., 186ff.

⁴⁰ L. Cerfaux, “‘L’Evangile éternel’ (Apoc. XIV, 6),” in ETL, 1963, pp. 672–681.

⁴¹ E. B. Allo, Saint Jean: L’Apocalypse, 3d ed., Paris, 1933, on this verse. For C. Masson (“L’Evangile éternel de Apocalypse XIV, 6 et 7,” in Hommage et reconnaissance à Karl Barth, Neuchâtel-Paris, pp. 63–67), it would have to do with the word of God in creation, the word of joy and love, which must resound until the last day.

⁴² Justin, 1 Apol. 66.3. 1Cor is already called Paul's "gospel" by Clement of Rome (1Clem. 47.1–2). "Luke, Paul's companion, put into a book the gospel preached by the apostle" (Irenaeus, Haer. 3.1.1). The Muratorian Canon refers to Luke's Gospel as tertius evangelii liber and to John as quartum evangeliorum.

⁴³ J. Huby, L'Évangile et les évangiles, Paris, 1954; R. Schnackenburg, "Das Evangelium' im Verständnis der ältesten Evangelisten," in Orientierung an Jesus . . . für J. Schmid, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna, 1973, pp. 309–324; H. Merkel, La Pluralité des Évangiles comme problème théologique et exégétique dans l'Église ancienne, Bern-Frankfurt, 1978.

⁴⁴ Published as IG XII, 1, 75; republished by H. Grégoire (Recueil des inscriptions grecques chrétiennes d'Asie Mineure, Amsterdam, 1968, n. 124), discussed by A. Dieterich ("Ἐὐαγγελιστής," in ZNW, 1900, pp. 336–338) and especially by J. Schniewind (Euangelion, p. 189, which mentions the name Euangelis, a priestess of Hera, on an inscription at Samos, p. 187): Δάφνας καὶ θεοῦ ἀρχιερεὺς . . . ΟΗΡΟΣ (= ὁ ἰ—ερός? or ὁ ἥρωος? or Οὐήρος) εὐαγγελιστής ("the chief priest of Daphne and of God, who must announce the oracle . . .").

⁴⁵ Eph 4:11; cf. D. Y. Hadidian ("Tous de euangelistas in Eph. IV, 11," in CBQ, 1966, pp. 317–321), who supposes that evangelists put into writing the preaching of the apostles. This would be the case with Mark and Peter (cf. Irenaeus and Eusebius, the latter citing Papias; PG 7.845; 20.300), and especially certain of the πολλοί who drew up a διήγησιν of the gospel facts (Luke 1:1), notably St. Luke (2Cor 8:18).

⁴⁶ N. E. Hugedé, Ephésiens, p. 159.

εὐγενής

eugenes, noble, well-born

eugenes, S 2104; EDNT 2.74; NIDNTT 1.187–188; MM 259–260; L&N 27.48, 87.27; BAGD 319

I. — In the parable of the minas, a man of noble birth (anthropos tis eugenes) goes off to a distant country to receive a kingdom (Luke 19:12), after the fashion of Archelaus, the claimant to the throne, who went off to Rome but only brought back the title of ethnarch (Josephus, Ant. 17.299ff.). In the parable of the talents, the anthropos is not otherwise described (Matt 25:14), but he must be a very rich man, a big-time merchant, a major businessman, a banker or ship owner, who has considerable sums at his disposal. A comparison of the two texts suggests that we should not assign too much weight to the juridical value of eugenes, which, for Palestinian hearers of that period, could equally well suggest grandeur (cf. Job 1:3, Hebrew gadôl), the nobility of a dignitary (2Macc 10:13), and wealth (cf. Matt 25:14). Since Luke puts a claimant to a throne on the stage, eugenes has to mean “noble, of royal descent.”¹

II. — In Hellenistic Greek, eugenes is used not only for noble birth² but also for noble sentiments, character, morals. Cnemon says: “Gorgias opened my eyes, his behavior was that of the noblest heart,”³ because he acted in a disinterested fashion and with sympathy. Among the Jewish people, those of noble soul despised the orders of Antiochus Epiphanes (Josephus, Ant. 12.255). There are obviously degrees in virtue and ability;⁴ hence the frequent use of the comparative and superlative forms.⁵ Thus the Jews of Berea “were more noble [in character] than those of Thessalonica”⁶ in their welcome and cordial treatment of the apostles.

III. — The community at Corinth was for the most part⁷ recruited from the poor and obscure social classes. In one of the most oratorical sections of his first letter,⁸ St. Paul emphasizes: “Look at your own call, brothers; not many wise according to the flesh (sophoi), not many powerful (dynatoi), not many well-born (eugeneis)” (1Cor 1:26). The converts are for the most part not intellectuals, not in positions of authority, not descendants of the old families of the city. To begin with, the nobles were identified with the eupatrides, the “well-born”; the eugeneis, “sons of noble fathers,” for a group (genos), a sort of familial corporation—like the Bacchiades at Corinth, who made it a rule to marry among themselves—gifted with religious and even military privileges.⁹ Little by little, this class acquired power and wealth, especially in land (cf. the geomoroi), although they did not consider it beneath their dignity to supplement their resources with income from maritime trade; their political influence grew.¹⁰ In the first century, the well-born comprise the urban bourgeoisie, a patrician nobility or aristocracy, who wield patronage and form the dominant, governing class of the city with all the accompanying social prestige. These are the “known” people (cf. nobilis) in a complimentary sense, “the good people, the best people” (aristoi), who take precedence over the others (phronimoi, ischyroi, endoxoi, 1Cor 4:10).

Eugenes and eugeneia, which recur abundantly in the inscriptions, refer not to a political quality but to a social standing. Aristotle had asked, “what are they that they should be called noble (eugeneis)”—and what is the value of nobility? He cites the opinion of the sophist Lycophron: “there is no difference at all between those who are noble and those who are not”;¹¹ then Socrates: “the noble are those whose parents are respectable people”; and finally Simonides: “the eugeneis are the descendants of rich people of the past.” Finally, the Stagirite concludes: “nobility is excellence of lineage” (Stobaeus, Flor. 86.29 A 25; vol. 5, p. 712). More specifically, he continues: “Those who have a long line of virtuous or wealthy ancestors are considered to be of better birth (eugenesteroi) than those whose possession of these qualities is recent. . . . The noble can be the good man (eugenes ho agathos aner), but more precisely nobles are those who have a long line of rich ancestors or virtuous ancestors” (ibid., C 52; vol. 5, p. 723; cf. Rh. 2.15.1390b21ff.; Pol. 3.13.1283a34ff.). This moral sense alone is retained by Philo: nobility is the practice of virtue.¹²

The rare Corinthian eugeneis are then those who were called in turn-of-the-century France “les gens bien,” a class based on dignity and treated with consideration;¹³ the moral element is intimately interconnected with the social element.

¹ In Palestine, nobility is represented (a) by the Herodian dynasty, “the court”; (b) by the lay aristocracy, such as the “excellent men” (Hebrew neḥibîm, Num 21:18; Prov 8:16), powerful and rich; those “of good birth” (horîm, Isa 34:12; Eccl 10:17), notables and dignitaries of all sorts, civil or military officials, leaders who sit at the city gate (sarîm, Job 29:9; cf. R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel, vol. 1, pp. 69ff., 152ff.), magistrates (ἄρχοντες; Josephus, War 2.237), “the first of the dwellers in Jerusalem according to dignity and birth” (Josephus, Ant. 20.123); for example, Joseph of Arimathea, a distinguished member of the Sanhedrin (Mark 15:43, εὐσχήμων; a term that the papyri also apply to wealthy landowners); “Jews of quality” of “of high class” (Josephus, War 6.113), “Jerusalemites of high rank,” whose sons participated in the song of the Levites during the daily sacrifice (t. 'Arak. 2.2); cf. the Jerusalemites of high rank who feed and entertain children for the service of the red heifer (b. Ketub. 106a) or present an anesthetic drink to those condemned to death (b. Sanh. 43a); above all the elders, heads of the most influential families: οἱ—πρωτοὶ τοῦ λαοῦ (Luke 19:47); (c) by the priestly aristocracy, as opposed to the ordinary priests, i.e., the high priest and the “chief priests” of Jerusalem, members of high-priestly families, ἐ—κ γένους ἀρχιερατικοῦ, (Acts 4:6). The eugeneis are associated with the high priests by Josephus (War 6.114). Cf. J. Jeremias, Jerusalem, pp. 96ff., 147ff., 175ff., 181ff. For Jeremias, the parable of the minas is most likely aimed at the Jerusalem aristocracy, particularly the scribes who hold the keys to the kingdom of God.

² Xenophon, Hell. 4.1.7: “His father was of excellent lineage (πατρός δ εὐγενεστάτου), powerful”; Theophrastus, Char. 28.2: “His mother is a Thracian noble ... ; at any rate, all women of that sort are nobles in their country”; Philo, Joseph 106: “The king recognized when he appeared that in his presence stood a free man of noble origin, ἄνδρα ἐ—λεύθερον καὶ

εὐγενῆ”; Josephus, Ant. 10.186: “Nebuchadnezzar took the young Jews who were of most noble birth, εὐγενεστάτους”; Diodorus Siculus 4.21.2 (εὐγενής corresponds to the Latin patricius, cf. H. J. Mason, Greek Terms, p. 50); P.Oxy. 1206, 11: a boy of two years when adopted “shall not be reduced to slavery, because he is well-born and the son of free, well-born parents, διὰ τὸ εὐγενῆ αὐτὸν εἶναι καὶ ἐξ εὐγενω—ν γονέων ἐ—λευθέρων” (in 335); 2177, 56; SEG II, 294, 11, a decree from Delphi in the first century AD: “Let Telesagoros have access to the exercise of every magistracy or priesthood whatsoever that the noble families of Delphi have access to”; SB 6258, 1; IGLS 281, 2: “Gregorios, pious offspring of a noble race,” etc.

³ Menander, Dysk. 723: ἀνδρὸς εὐγενεστάτου; cf. F. W. Danker, “Menander and the New Testament,” in NTS vol. 10, 1964, p. 366; SB 9077, 12; P.Princ. 169, 2. When a third-century assembly cries three times “noble syndic,” they are praising not his origins but his good administration (P.Oxy. 2407, 3, 11, 18). The epithet is conferred upon women (SB 6951, 7; 7519, 1; 9077, 12; P.Stras. 279, 10; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XVI, 8, 7; P.Ness. 21, 11; 22, 24, 33; 46, 7), to the noble tomb of Ioannia (SB 8085, 3), and the adverb εὐγενω—ς means that public functions have been carried out nobly (SB 7871, 5; 8334, 19, from 39 BC; cf. R. Huttmacher, Ehrendekret) or that the person in question died beautifully (2Macc 14:42; 4Macc 6:22, 30; 9:22; 12:14; 13:11).

⁴ Toubias sends to Apollonios four slaves of a superior class, καὶ τω—ν εὐγενω—ν τέσσαρα (P.Cair.Zen. 59076, 5).

⁵ I.Car., n. 58: ἓνα τω—ν εὐγενεστάτων καὶ εὐσχημονεστάτων; L. Robert, Etudes anatoliennes, p. 299; εὐγενεστάτην Ἡράκλειαν (an epigram from Sparta); pp. 259, 304, 342: ἄνδρα εὐγενῆ καὶ τῆς πρώτης τάξεως (base of the statue of M. Aur. Apellas, in the second century); P.Grenf. I, 53, 33: τίνος εὐγενέστερος ἐ—στι (fourth century; cf. Chrest.Wilck., n. 131). SB 10074, 11: ἐ—πὶ τοῦ εὐγενεστάτου —Ιωσηφίου ἐ—ξάρχου Τάλμεως.

⁶ Acts 17:11: ου—τοι δὲ ᾗσαν εὐγενέστεροι τω—ν ἐ—ν ἑσσαλονίκη (cf. Eb. Nestle, in ZNW, 1914, pp. 91–92); with whom are associated distinguished Greek women, τω—ν Ἑλληνικῶν γυναικω—ν τω—ν εὐσχημόνων (verse 12; cf. verse 4; 13:50).

⁷ There were, however, some rich people (cf. 2Cor 8-9), and some Christians of high standing, like Erastus, the treasurer of Corinth (Rom 16:23; 2Tim 4:20; cf. C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, p. 822. Cf. Σώσιμον οὐ—κονόμος τῆς πόλεως, Thessalonica, in IG X, 2, n. 150, 16–18; G. E.

Bean, T. B. Mitford, Cilicia, n. 91) or Crispus the head of the synagogue (Acts 18:8; 1Cor 1:14).

⁸ Cf. J. Weiss, in Theologische Studien B. Weiss dargebracht, Göttingen, 1897, pp. 203ff.; J. Bohater, "Inhalt und Reihenfolge der 'Schlagworte der Erlösungsreligion' in I Kor. I, 26–31," in TZ, vol. 4, 1948, pp. 252–271.

⁹ The equites; on τιμή, the religious prerogative of the important families, cf. L. Gernet, Recherches sur le développement de la pensée juridique et morale en Grèce, Paris, 1917, pp. 295ff.

¹⁰ The association δυνατοί-εὐγενει—ς is common. Potestas is any form of legally recognized authority of one person over another person or over property. On the different social classes in Greece, cf. H. Jeanmaire, Couroi et Courètes, Lille, 1939, p. 119ff.; H. Strassburger, "Nobiles," in PW, vol. 17, 1, col. 781, 901. At Rome, cf. J. Gaudemet, Institutions de l'antiquité, Paris, 1967, pp. 304ff. (gives the bibliography): "The nobiles were distinguished by social standing, birth into curule families, wealth, a large following of clients and friends, and sharing in political power and de facto strength; but also by personal qualities, intellectual and moral (virtus)" (p. 305; cf. pp. 535ff.); J. Gagé, Les Classes sociales dans l'Empire romain, Paris, 1964, pp. 82–106, 390–399.

¹¹ In Stobaeus, Flor. 86.29 A 24 (vol. 5, p. 710). The fragments of the Aristotelian Περὶ εὐγενείας have been published by P. M. Schuhl, Aristote: De la richesse, De la prière, De la noblesse, Du plaisir, De l'éducation, Paris, 1968, pp. 83–133.

¹² Philo, Virtues 198. It is virtue and vice that differentiate the noble and the ignoble. The Alexandrian's Περὶ εὐγενείας comprise 187–227. Cf. Sobr. 56: The nobility "is the race of those whom God loves."

¹³ At the end of the second century, at Rome, a certain Appian addresses the emperor: "I appeal by virtue of my nobility and my rights—ὕπὲρ τῆς ε—μαυτοῦ εὐγενείας καὶ τω—ν ε—μοὶ προσηκόντων ἀπαγγέλλων." —The emperor: "How is that?" —Appian: "Because I am noble and a gymnasiarch, ὡς εὐγενῆς καὶ γυμνασίαρχος" (P.Oxy. 33, col. IV, 15–V, 4). In addresses: γράφω οὖν τῇ εὐγενείᾳ σου (P.Gen. 50, 14; P.Princ. 169, 2). Compare at Rome, under the empire, the honestiores, "people of quality," who occupy a higher level (gradus) of the social hierarchy, "personages" distinguished by an honor, a public function (splendidior persona, major persona, vir spectatae auctoritatis, altior); cf. G. Cardascia, "L'Apparition dans le droit des classes d' 'Honestiores' et d' 'Humiliores,'" in Revue historique de droit français et étranger, 1950, pp. 305–337, 461–485.

εὐδία, χειμών

eudia, good weather; cheimon, winter, bad weather

eudia, S 2105; EDNT 2.75; NIDNTT 3.1000, 1002; MM 260; L&N 14.1; BAGD 319 | cheimon, S 5494; EDNT 3.462; MM 686; L&N 14.2, 67.165; BDF §186(2); BAGD 879

“Good weather”¹ is only mentioned once in the NT, and in contrast with “bad weather,” as is not rare in secular texts.² “When evening comes, you say ‘Good weather (eudia), for the sky is red’; and in the morning, ‘Storm today (cheimon), for the sky is red and threatening.”³ Eudia refers to a calm sky and clear weather.⁴ Hence the derivative meaning, unknown in the Bible, “serenity of soul” (Epictetus 2.18.30), “the honey of blessedness” (Pindar, Ol. 1.98), the peace and tranquility of order in a city:⁵ “the multitudes seek to find calm, zetountes eudian heurein” (Philo, Spec. Laws 1.69).

As for cheimon —it has a double meaning. First of all “winter,” the opposite of summer (Enoch 3.1), from Cant 2:11—“Behold the winter (Hebrew setaw) is past”⁶—to John 10:22, where the feast of Dedication is celebrated during the winter. It is the cold season,⁷ when bathrooms (P.Flor. 127, 7) and the gymnasion are heated daily (I.Priene 112, 98; from the first century BC), when stored provisions are used (P.Alex. 1.7). All moving is hard and dangerous, and the Lord bids Christians pray that their flight may not have to be in such times (Matt 24:20; Mark 13:18); crossing the sea, even the Adriatic, is especially dangerous, and St. Paul asks Timothy to come before winter, pro cheimonos elthein.⁸

Cheimon also refers to bad weather in general (P.Hib. 198, 114): the cold rain that leaves you shaking (1Esdr 9:6) and from which you seek shelter (2Esdr 10:9, Hebrew geshem), rain showers (Job 37:6), the more or less violent storm,⁹ which became the symbol for human difficulties.¹⁰

¹ Εὐδία is an OT hapax: “like frost in good weather, so shall your sins melt” (Sir 3:15); the hoarfrost disappears when the first rays of the spring sun appear.

² Aristotle, HA 6.19.551a: certain insects are born from the dew that falls on leaves, “the phenomenon ordinarily occurs in the springtime, but sometimes happens in winter (τοῦ χειμῶ—νος), when the weather is good (ὅταν εὐδία) and the wind is from the south for several days”; 9.40.627b: “the bees know when bad weather (χειμῶ—να) is coming and head for the hive while the weather is still good (ε—ν τῆ εὐδία)”; Xenophon, Hell. 2.4.14: “In the midst of good weather (ε—ν εὐδία), the gods stir up a storm (χειμω—να ποιοῦσιν)”; An. 5.8.19–20: “I see good weather for you; but when there is a storm and the sea surges . . .”; Philo, Giants 51: “it is amazing that anyone could remain serene in the middle of a storm (ε—ν χειμω—νι εὐδίαν)”; Ps.-Plutarch, Cons. ad Apoll. 5: “moments when the sea is calm, others when it is agitated by the storm, εὐδαίαι τε καὶ χειμω—νες.”

³ Matt 16:2-3 (for the idea, G. Mussies, Dio Chrysostom, p. 70, compares Dio Chrysostom 7.70; 38.18). Palestinians can predict that if the western sky turns red at night good weather will hold, but if the eastern sky turns red in the morning a storm is coming. Cf. Josephus, Ant. 6.91; Diodorus Siculus 17.10.

⁴ Aristotle, HA 8.12.597a: “when the quails arrive, if the weather is good (ε—άν μὲν εὐδία) or the wind is blowing from the north, they go two by two and make good progress”; cf. Herondas, Mimes 1.28: in Egypt are found “power, serene heavens (or ‘peace,’ εὐδίη), glory.” Among sailors: Fishermen spot schools of fish “that seek their food at the surface when the surface of the sea is calm and the weather good” (Aristotle, HA 4.8.533b); P.Oxy. 1223, 12 (fourth century AD).

⁵ Aeschylus, Sept. 795. The partisans of Hyrcanus will be able to live in peace, ε—ν εὐδία διάζειν (Josephus, Ant. 14.157); Αἴγυπτον εἰ—ς εὐδίαν ἀγαγεῖ—ν = to bring serenity to Egypt (Rosetta Stone; Dittenberger, Or. 90. 11); P.Tebt. 700, 34 (second century BC = C.Ord.Ptol. n. 50).

⁶ Diodorus Siculus 1.41; P.Brem. 63, 31: “I remain naked for the winter.” Sir 21:8—“who collects stones for the winter,” not the right time for building; cf. nevertheless P.Cair.Zen. 59643, 3; P.Lille 1, rect. 14 (job plan and estimate from the third century BC): ε—άν μὲν κατὰ χειμω—να συντελῆται τὰ ἔργα = if work is ended during the winter; for the care of the vineyard, διὰ χειμω—νος (PSI 1338, 8).

⁷ P.Tebt. 278, 46 (beginning of the first century AD): χιμῶν γὰρ ε—στι, ψῦχος πολὺ = it is winter, very cold; cf. P.Mich. 514, 20; PSI 1420, 20.

⁸ 2Tim 4:21. Nevertheless, if the need arose people did not hesitate to brave the winter storms (Josephus, Ant. 14.376). The Alexandrians sent on an embassy to Rome in 39–40 crossed the Mediterranean in the middle of winter, not doubting that “a storm on land is a much more terrible adversary than a storm on the sea” (Philo, To Gaius 190). Megas asks Olympios to return before winter (C.P.Herm. 11, 27; cf. P.Ryl. 692, 18), but Terentianus asks his father to bring him various objects when he comes εἰς τὸν χειμῶσαν (P.Mich. 476, 30; second century AD).

⁹ Acts 27:20—χειμῶνός τε οὐκ ὀλίγου; Josephus, Ant. 14.377; χειμῶνι σφοδρῶς; P.Cair.Zen. 59052, 5 and 12; Menander, Sam. 376: “an unforeseen storm” opposed to navigation in clear weather (εἰς εὐδίαν).

¹⁰ 4Macc 15:32—“You nobly endured the storm for the sake of piety”; T. Zeb. 6.8; Philo, Prelim. Stud. 93: “Abraham brought calm where the storm had raged.”

εὐδοκέω, εὐδοκία

eudokeo, to approve, consent to, accept; eudokia, benevolence, favor, favorable disposition

eudokeo, S 2106; TDNT 2.738–742; EDNT 2.75; NIDNTT 2.383, 780–781, 817–818, 820; MM 260; L&N 25.87, 25.113, 30.97; BDF §§67(1), 119(1), 148(2), 196, 206(2), 392(3); BAGD 319 | eudokia, S 2107; TDNT 2.742–751; EDNT 2.75–76; NIDNTT 2.817–820; MM 260; L&N 25.8, 25.88; BAGD 319

The semantic history of this verb is curious, as much from the point of view of orthography¹ as from that of its varied, if not uncertain, signification. It appears not before the Hellenistic period and only in popular language (it remains unknown in Philo and Josephus), being attested for the first time in P.Rev., from 259 BC. In this collection of administrative documents, in col. 29, 2–21, the issue is the fixing of the sum of taxes in kind on fruits and vegetables. The tax collector must verify the estimate given by the producer (ean men eudoke ho telones).² The meaning is obvious: “If the tax collector approves.” It is in effect this meaning, “consent, accept,” that is constantly attested in the papyri, almost always in a legal or financial contract.³

In the second century BC: “You have accepted the price for the mummy.”⁴ In a contract for a division of property in AD 10–11, previously formulated clauses are subscribed to (eudoko te progegrammene diaresei,⁵ or in an equivalent form, eudoko pasi tois prokeimenois).⁶ In AD 48: “Thaesis, present in person, gives his agreement to all the dispositions taken by her husband Ptollion, conformably to the proxy.”⁷ When the agreement is that of a collective, the consent of all the members is insisted upon: “They approved unanimously, voluntarily, and spontaneously, with an irrevocable decision” (eudokesan ex homonoias hekousios kai authairetos kai ametanoeto gnome, P.Lond. 1913, 11; cf. Polybius 1.8.4:

“The Syracusans accept Hieron as their general with unanimous enthusiasm” [pantas homothymadon eudokesai]; Diodorus Siculus 14.110.4: “The Lacedaemonians were eager to give their consent”); but in private contracts people were content to write, “I accept these things”⁸ or “I accept everything.”⁹ In a single instance eudokeo has the sense of being content, taking pleasure: eudoko zelo douleuein (P.Grenf. I, 1, 17; from the second century BC; cf. Polybius 1.78.8: “Hamilcar was content to associate with his [the Numidian Naravas’] operations”; 2.38.7: “they became reconciled to their position”; Philodemus of Gadara, Mort. 36.4: he eudokoumene zoe). In a negative sentence in a marriage contract, the verb is used in a phrase that means “without the consent of the young bride,”¹⁰ so that the act is fully voluntary; it is also used to express displeasure (P.Tebt. 591), even a refusal (P.Mich. 474, 14: “up to the present you have not been willing to come”) or anger.¹¹

The LXX uses this verb often. Despite a degree of uncertainty as to its meaning, as is shown by the nine different Hebrew verbs that it translates,¹² there is an original theological sense. Of course, there is the common secular meaning “to accept” (Gen 33:10, Jacob to Esau, eudokeseis me; Tob 5:17; Judg 15:7), or “consent,”¹³ to which is added the meanings “to pay, discharge” (Lev 26:34, 41; 1Esdr 1:58; Job 14:6) and “prosper, succeed.”¹⁴ But the meaning “to be willing” is well attested;¹⁵ and furthermore, from David on, the verb is constantly applied to God, to his “will” and its efficacious manifestations.¹⁶ It seems to be a matter of love in the proper sense of the word,¹⁷ with the nuance of “take pleasure in”;¹⁸ hence “show oneself favorable”¹⁹ and “accept” (Ps 51:16; 119:108; Eccl 9:7). In his relations with humans, God is the sovereign Lord, benevolent and beneficent, absolutely free to dispense his favor; it is emphasized that he takes pleasure in doing good and that he is quite willing to accept the worship of the just, even as he refuses that of the godless.

The same theology is found also at Qumran, while the verb rasâh is most often used with respect to humans.²⁰ God is asked to grant “to the sons of your servant—as is your will for your chosen ones—that they may stand before you forever” (1QS 11.16), and especially: God loved the spirit of light for all eternity “and in all its works he takes pleasure” (4.1).

So when after the baptism of Jesus and the descent of the Holy Spirit “a voice from heaven says, ‘This is my son, my beloved, en ho eudokesa,”²¹ we may translate “in whom I have delighted,” or better, “in whom I take pleasure”;²² but we must take account of the affective meaning of the verb in the first century, since it has to do with the personal relations between the Father and the Son: the Father’s “pleasure” is the joy of the love that he bears for the Son. The French complaisance, which expresses a disposition to be accommodating, to acquiesce to the tastes or feelings of another, is much too feeble. The text uses eudokeo to exegete the divine agape; it has to do with delighting in someone, a form of beatitude. NT agape, a heavenly love, is a blessed love.

In the epistles, eudokeo with humans as subject has the sense “be willing, accept willingly,”²³ to express spontaneous initiative, undertaken gladly, or “take pleasure” in a bad sense, as in 2Thess 2:12—“so that they all may be condemned who did not believe the truth and took pleasure in iniquity”; but St. Paul’s love and hope is to “go and dwell with the Lord” (2Cor 5:8). This is much more than a willingness to die; it is a positive desire, a joyful hope.

With regard to God, Jesus and Paul use the verb exactly according to its OT meaning: “It has pleased your Father to give you the kingdom” (Luke 12:32); or it has pleased God to save those who believe by the foolishness of preaching (1Cor 1:21)—even if they are a small number (10:5); or to reveal his Son²⁴ and make all the pleroma dwell in him (Col 1:19); it is always a matter of supreme, gratuitous initiative, of God’s benevolent and effective will. He is free not to accept animal sacrifices (Heb 10:6 = Ps 40:7) and not to show kindness to the believer who falls away or lacks hypomone (endurance).²⁵

Eudokia. — This noun is not completely unknown in secular Greek²⁶ (in addition, secular Greek uses eudokesis, “consent, approval,” which is absolutely unknown in the Bible), but it is common in the LXX (where it almost always translates the Hebrew rasôn) and in the NT, where its meaning, corresponding to that of the verb eudokeo, is also uncertain and varied.

Up until the second century, with something like three exceptions,²⁷ the LXX uses eudokia only with regard to God, to express his benevolence (Ps 51:18; 1Chr 16:10; cf. 2Chr 15:15), his approval (Ps 19:14), his favor (Ps 5:12; 79:17) for his people (106, 4; cf. 69:13—kairos eudokias, the favorable time). It is the same in Sirach, where the Lord’s kindness (he eudokia autou) guarantees the prosperity of godly people (11:17), but eudokia is especially his good pleasure, that which pleases him, is acceptable to him,²⁸ emphasizing his free and sovereign will. With regard to humans, eudokia expresses contentment (Sir 29:23), consent (15:15), even in a bad sense: the good pleasure of the godless (9:12, eudokia asebon), the satisfaction of covetousness (18:31, eudokian epithymias).

In his hymn of jubilation (Matt 11:26; Luke 10:21), which is certainly authentic,²⁹ Jesus praises his Father for “hiding these things from the wise and learned and revealing them to little ones. Yes, Father, such was your good pleasure” (nai, ho Pater, hoti houtos eudokia egeneto emprosthen sou). The particle nai reaffirms the main verb, “I give thanks to you,” and accentuates God’s kindness and initiative, independent of any exterior circumstance: this is pleasing to him.³⁰

At Bethlehem, a large company of the heavenly host³¹ praised God, saying, “Doxa en hypsistois theo kai epi ges eirene (Glory to God in the highest and upon earth peace) en anthropois eudokias.³² The sentence has only two parts, linked by kai, and corresponding to doxa/eirene; en hypsistois/epi ges; theo/en anthropois eudokias.³³ If it is certain that eudokias is a genitive of quality, it is difficult to understand it as a reference to a human sentiment, and all the more difficult to translate it “good will,” in the sense that salvation is to be granted only to well-intentioned folk, thus limiting its range, whereas God “wishes to save all people.”³⁴ Doubt is no longer possible after the discovery at Qumran of the expressions benê resônô (1QH 4.32: “the multitude of his mercies toward the sons of his good pleasure”), benê resôneyka (1QH 11.9: “In your goodness is much pardon, and your mercy is for the sons of your goodwill”), behûrê rasôn (“the chosen ones of goodwill”).³⁵ According to the context, this would mean the members of the eschatological community are the object of divine favor. Other Aramaic parallels can be cited to prove that the locution was common.³⁶ In Luke 2:14, the angels celebrate the peace granted to the whole earth, thanks to the saving reconciliation of all humankind by the God’s absolutely free favor. There is no restriction on the beneficiaries of this salvation. They are all sinners;³⁷ God gives this gift to all. This paradox or scandal depends on the good pleasure and sovereign will of the Lord of heaven and earth and is explained by his infinite kindness.

In the epistolary corpus, only St. Paul uses this term. When applied to God, it is always with the meaning found in the OT and the Gospels. That is, God has determined ahead of time that we should be his adoptive sons by Jesus Christ: “such was the good pleasure of his will (kata ten eudokian tou thelematos autou), to the praise of the glory of his grace, whereby he has gifted us in the Beloved.”³⁸ The emphasis is not so much on love—although that is the supreme explanation—as on the absolute freedom of the divine decision. God’s will is a mystery, and no one can question his rulings: God acts as seems best to him. With respect to humans, eudokia sometimes means a good desire or will, a good disposition to do God’s will: “May our God fulfill (or accomplish) in you every good desire” (plerose pasan eudokian agathosynes, 2Thess 1:11; a meaning analogous to that in P.Grenf. I, 17, have goodwill for something). When the apostle is imprisoned, “certain ones preached the word of God out of jealousy, in a spirit of rivalry (to supplant Paul), others out of favorable sentiments (or with good attitudes)” (Phil 1:15). Here di’ eudokia expresses a right will, pure intentions, and benevolence toward Paul, whose work these preachers were continuing, but also a will to serve God and the gospel.³⁹ It is more difficult to translate Rom 10:1, he men eudokia tes emes kardias: “the wish (or intent) of my heart and my prayer to God is for their salvation.” Here eudokia expresses a heartfelt, gracious inclination, very close to the “desire” that is well attested in the LXX, or better, a complete disposition to do. A comparison has been made to Mordecai: “I was completely willing to kiss the soles of his feet (Haman's) for the salvation of Israel" (eudokoun philein pelmata podon autou pros soterian Israel).⁴⁰

¹ In classical Greek, the augment for verbs starting with εὐ- is ηὐ-; but in the NT, it most often remains εὐ-, although ηὐ- is not rare (1Thess 2:8; 3:1; Rom 15:26-27; 1Cor 10:5); it cannot be attributed to atticizing scribes, since it predominates in the papyri. Cf. B. G. Mandilaras, Verb, n. 266; J. K. Elliott, "Temporal Augment in Verbs with Initial Diphthong in the Greek New Testament," in NovT, 1980, pp. 3–5.

² P.Rev. 29, 8. Cf. B. P. Grenfell, Revenue Laws of Ptolemy Philadelphus, Oxford, 1896 (= P.Rev.); republished by J. Bingen, in Sammelbuch, Beiheft 1, Göttingen, 1952; J. Bingen, Le Papyrus Revenue Laws—Tradition grecque et adaptation hellénistique, Opladen, 1978; P.Ryl. 155, 17: εὐδοκι—ν τὴν μητέρα ἄσῃν; P.Tebt. 382, 3; BGU 1731, 4–1736, 11; 1793, 17: εὐδοκω—ν τὴν καθήκουσαν (first century BC).

³ Moulton-Milligan, on this word, already supply an ample documentation that distinguishes uses with the genitive, the dative, the accusative, or ε—πί.

⁴ Ηὐδόκησάς με τῆς τιμῆς, P.Lond. 3, 6 (vol. 1, p. 35); cf. P.Cair.Isid. 94, 25 (receipt for lease). εὐδοκω— τῆδε τῆ ἀποχῆ (= SB 9173, 25); PSI 1228, 42: εὐδοκω— τῆ γενομένη ει—ς τὸν Ἑρμοκλία ὦνῆ; P.Oxy. 1273, 40: "I approve the publication" (likewise in the act of sale and cession of three houses, published by C. Wehrli, in ZPE, vol. 12, 1973, pp. 77–80 = SB 11233, 49 and 53; cf. P.Mich. 614, 45), 3197, 20, 21, 23: εὐδοκω— τῆ τω—ν δούλων διαιρέσει ὡς πρόκειται; Polybius 2.12.3: "Teuta consents to pay the tribute imposed" (εὐδόκησε φόρους).

⁵ Εὐδοκω— τῆ προγεγραμμένη διαρέσει, P.Aberd. 53, col. II, 14 and 20; cf. P.Brem. 68, 14; FuadCrawf. 20, 11; 21, 32, 42; P.Fam.Tebt. 29, 16; P.Dura 23, 11; 26, 31; 30, 38, 39; 31, 51; P.Lond. 1168, 15 (AD 18); P.Gron. 10, 27; P.Köln 85, 10; 100, 28; P.Oslo 135, 28; PSI 1328, 19; P.Genova 35, 6; SB 9634, 24–26; 9763, 54, 56; 9889, 6.

⁶ P.Fam.Tebt. 11, 24 (= SB 11229, 14); 41, 19; P.Hamb. 101; PSI 740, 10; 1341, 20–21; P.Stras. 263, 4–5; P.Oxy. 3092, 19–20; P.Mich. 186, 35 and 40: εὐδοκω— πα—σι τοι—ς προκειμένοις καθὼς πρόκειται (division of property in AD 72); SB 8951, 20: εὐδοκω— πα—σι, ὡς πρόκειται. A nurse's contract in AD 26: εὐδοκω— τοι—ς προκειμένοις ("I agree to the clauses above," P.Rein. 103, 37; ibid., demotic papyrus, p. 203; cf. SB 7619).

⁷ P.Fouad 35, 10: εὐδοκεῖ— γὰρ πα—σι οἷς ε—άν ὁ ἀνὴρ Πτολίον περὶ τω—ν κατὰ τὴν σύστασιν οἰ—κονομήσῃ; a proxy for private business (cf. P.Mich. 165, 7: εὐδοκω— τῆαι—τήσῃ), for legal business: εὐδοκεῖ— γὰρ τῆδε τῆ συστάσι (“she gives her consent,” P.Oxy. 261, 17, in AD 55). The presence of the one giving consent is often mentioned: παρῶν δὲ καὶ Πάππος εὐδοκεῖ— ε—πὶ τούτοις (“Pappus, also present, accepts these conditions,” P.Enteux. 25, verso 2); cf. P.Oxy. 2349, 23 (AD 70); 2351, 65, 82; 3586, 57.

⁸ P.Aberd. 19, 11: εὐδοκῆ τοίτοις; P.Fouad 36, 17; P.Mich. 604, 23; SB 10205, 22; P.Oxy. 94, 15: εὐδοκεῖ—ν γὰρ ε—πὶ τούτοις (AD 83); 726, 22; 3261, 19; P.Tebt. 317, 33; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 24, 9. Cf. this act of King Attalus II of Pergamum in 160–159: “Let borrowers establish security agreeable to the commissioners” (οἰ— ε—πιμεληταὶ εὐδοκέωντι, Dittenberger, Syl. 672, 27; cf. J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. XIII, 26–27); Dittenberger, Syl. 683, 59: αὐτοὶ εὐδόκησαν; Or. 444, 14.

⁹ P.Oxy. 725, 47: ὁ δὲ Ἡρακλα—ς εὐδοκω—ν τούτοις πα—σι; BGU 1573, 22; SB 6294, 14; P.Fouad 33, 37: “I, Pausirios . . . am enrolled as legal guardian of my wife and approve of all these arrangements” (first century AD).

¹⁰ P.Oxy. 496, 8: χωρὶς εὐδοκούσης τῆς γαμουμένης; P.Fam.Tebt. I, 32; P.Vindob. Bosw. 5, 11 (with the editor’s commentary on the consent of spouses).

¹¹ Letter from Tabetheus with regard to his son Saturlinus, who in a fit of anger, not willing to tolerate being mocked, mortally wounded a certain Menas who had abused his confidence. Nevertheless Tabetheus had placed his son in police custody: οὐ εὐδόκηκα αὐτὸν τὸν υἱ—όν μου αὐτὸν πιστεῦσαι Μηνά—, “I rebuked my son for trusting Menas” (P.Mich. 473, 14; cf. 20–21; J. Modrzejewski, “Quelques remarques à propos de l’homicide et de la rançon dans le droit d’Egypte romain: Note sur P. Mich. VIII, 473,” in Iura, vol. 8, 1957, pp. 93–101).

¹² ’Abâh, “wish, consent, acquiesce, be in agreement with someone”; hamad, “decide, take pleasure in, be pleased with”; hapes, “want, desire, love”; qadad, “be inclined”; salah (hiphil), “prosper, succeed”; especially rasâh, “be pleased, be well-disposed, take pleasure, discharge.”

¹³ Judg 11:17—“the king of Moab did not consent” (A = ἠθέλησε); 2Chr 10:7; “if you will be kind to these people”; Esth 4:17 d: “I will consent to kiss the soles of his feet.”

¹⁴ 1Chr 29:23—“Solomon will prosper.” Εὐδόκησας (Hebrew natan) in Judg 14:18—“You have given this great victory”—must be an error for ἔδωκας (A).

¹⁵ Judg 19:10—“the man was not willing to stay the night” (οὐκ εὐδόκησεν; αἴτιον ἠθέλησεν); 19:25—“the men were not willing to listen” (οὐκ εὐδόκησεν; αἴτιον ἠθέλησεν); 20:13.

¹⁶ David sings the salvation effected by God: “He delivered me because he took pleasure in me” (ὅτι εὐδόκησεν ἐν ἐμοί, 2Sam 22:20).

¹⁷ Ps 44:3—“They obtained victory because you loved them” (ὅτι εὐδόκησας ἐν αὐτοῖς); cf. 1Chr 29:3—“in my affection (ἐν τῷ εὐδοκῆσαί με) for the house of my God”; Ps 68:7—“the mountain that God has loved (desired) for his dwelling”; 102:14—“Your servants love its (Zion’s) stones”; Sir 15:17; but there is a much attenuated meaning: “The Jews and the priests thought it good that Simon should be their prince” (1Macc 14:41, 46, 47).

¹⁸ Jdt 15:10; Ps 40:13; 49:13; 51:21; 147:10-11; 149:4; Sir 9:12; 25:16; 34:19; 37:28; 45:19; Jer 2:10, 12; Hag 1:8; Mal 2:17; 2Macc 14:35—“O Lord of all things, it pleased you to have a temple for a dwelling among us.”

¹⁹ Ps 77:8—“Will the Lord never again be favorable? Has his grace disappeared forever?”; 85:1—“Yahweh, you have been favorable to your country”; 1Macc 1:43; 6:23; 8:1; 10:47; 11:29.

²⁰ 1QS 9.24: “[the disciple_ shall willingly accept all that happens to him”]; 9.25: “he shall accept all the words” of God and his judgments (10.13; cf. 1QpHab 7.16), accepting his trials (literally, his blows, 1QH 9.10), opening his eyes “to choose that which is pleasing to God” (CD 2.15; cf. 4QpHos b 1.4), but not showing kindness till judgment is fixed” (1QS 10.20).

²¹ Matt 3:17 (in direct discourse—ἐν σοί—in Mark 1:11; Luke 3:22; the bibliography in H. Schürmann, Lukasevangelium, vol. 1, p. 189), repeated at the transfiguration (Matt 17:5; 2Pet 1:17) and even Matt 12:18—ὁ ἀγαπητός μου ὃν εὐδόκησεν ἡ ψυχὴ μου (“Here is my Servant whom I have chosen, my beloved, in whom my soul is pleased,” a quotation from Isa 42:1, where εὐδόκησεν has been substituted for προσδέξατο).

²² The aorist here would correspond to a semitic stative perfect, equivalent to a present; it expresses the persistence of a feeling that abides, cf. M. Zerwick, An Analysis of the Greek New Testament, trans. M. Grosvenor, Rome, 1981.

²³ Rom 15:26-27: “Macedonia and Achaia were quite willing to take a collection for those who are poor. They were quite willing, and in fact they were indebted to them”; 1Thess 2:8—“Our affection for you was such that would have been willing to give you not only the gospel of God but also our very lives”; 3:1—“We willingly consented to remain alone at Athens”; 2Cor 12:10—“I willingly accept” (εὐδοκῶ— = I consent to weaknesses, mistreatment, necessities, etc.).

²⁴ Gal 1:15; cf. the theme of divine benevolence, in A. M. Denis, “L’Election et la vocation de Paul, faveurs célestes,” in RevThom, 1957, pp. 409–415.

²⁵ Heb 10:38; cf. D. Lys, Nephèsh: Histoire de l’âme dans la révélation d’Israël, Paris, 1959, p. 152; T. W. Lewis, “. . . And if he shrinks back’ (Heb X, 38 b),” in NTS, vol. 22, 1975, pp. 88–94.

²⁶ It is wrong to write that εὐδοκία is never attested in secular Greek. E. Smothers (“ε—ν ἀνθρώποις εὐδοκίας,” in RSR, 1934, pp. 86–93) has noted three occurrences. In a Roman inscription on the base of a bas-relief of Priapus: Τρύφων —Ιθυφάλλω, κορυνηφόρω, κηποφύλακι, κλεπτομάστιγι, εὐεργεσίας καὶ εὐδοκίας χάριν Λαμψακηνω—ν κοινωνία (CIG 5960; its authenticity has been contested, but it seems likely). Hippocrates giving advice to his colleagues regarding amounts to charge: “I recommend not being too greedy and having regard to wealth and resources, even sometimes providing care without charge, recollecting either a prior obligation (μνήμην εὐχαριστίας) or a present kindness (ἢ παρεούσαν εὐδοκίην)” (Hippocrates, Praec. 6; several manuscripts read εὐδοκιμίην: the motive of reputation). Philodemus of Gadara sets out to demonstrate “what discourses the Epicureans have composed for the salvation of countries and for their happiness” (πρὸθ εὐδοκίαν ε—λογοποίησαν, Piet. 25).

²⁷ Ps 141:5—ε—ν ται—ς εὐδοκίαις αὐτῶ—ν refers to the pleasures or desires of the wicked; 145:16—“You satisfy the desires of every living thing”; Cant 6:3—“You are beautiful, my darling, as Tirzah (a Canannite city)” (in place of which the LXX [5:4] reads ὡς εὐδοκία).

²⁸ Sir 1:26—“What pleases the Lord (ἡ εὐδοκία αὐτοῦ) is faithfulness and mercy”; 3:16—“Those who fear the Lord seek to please him”; 34:18—“the gifts of wicked men are not acceptable to God”; 35:3—“What pleases the Lord is turning away from evil”; 35:16—“The one who serves God in the way that pleases him will be accepted”; 32:14; 33:13; 39:18—“On his order, all his good pleasure is accomplished”; 41:4—“What can a person refuse to the good pleasure of the Most High?” (ε—ν εὐδοκία ὑψίστου).

²⁹ Cf. H. Mertens, L'Hymne de jubilation chez les Synoptiques, Gembloux, 1957. On its relation to the OT, cf. Recueil L. Cerfaux, vol. 3, pp. 139–159.

³⁰ M. J. Lagrange: “C’est bien ainsi que s’accomplit ce qui t’agrée.” Cf. A. J. Festugière, “Une formule conclusive dans la prière antique,” in Etudes d’histoire, pp. 127–133.

³¹ 1Kgs 22:19; Jer 8:2; 19:13; Zeph 1:5; 2Chr 33:3, 5; cf. P. Winter, “Two Notes on Luke I, II,” in ST, vol. 7, 2, 1954, pp. 164–165.

³² Luke 2:14. The best manuscripts (a, A, B, D) have the genitive. The Greek fathers, the Syriac, the Bohairic (cf. R. Köbert, “Sabrâ tabâ im syrischen Tatian Luc II, 14,” in Bib, 1961, pp. 90–91) have the nominative εὐδοκία; on these variants, cf. A. von Harnack, Über den Spruch “Ehre sei Gott in der Höhe” und das Wort “Eudokia” (Sitzungsber. der kön. Preuß. Akad. 51), Berlin, 1915, pp. 854–875; M. J. Lagrange, on this text; and J. Jeremias, “Ἄνθρωποι εὐδοκίας (Lc. II, 14),” in ZNW, 1929, pp. 13–20; B. M. Metzger, New Testament Studies, Leiden, 1980, pp. 101–104.

³³ The best analysis of the Greek was by E. Delebecque, Etudes grecques, pp. 25–38. He reacts against the modern translation “to men whom he loves” because the Greek for that would have been οὐς ἀγαπα— or ἀγαπητοι—ς. He emphasizes both how very laconic the angelic song to the shepherds was in the Aramaic (no verb, and no article before the seven nouns) and also the two key words (“glory” in the first phrase, “peace” in the second); cf. A. Feuillet, “Les Hommes de bonne volonté ou les hommes que Dieu aime: Note sur la traduction de Luk II, 14 b,” in BAGB, 1974, pp. 91–92; E. Hansack, “Lk II, 14: ‘Friede den Menschen auf Erden, die guten Willens sind’?” in BZ, 1977, pp. 114–118.

³⁴ 1Tim 2:4; cf. Luke 2:32—“a light to illumine the nations.” It is objected that if God’s benevolence is intended, autou would have been given explicitly, but this is not correct. In Sir 15:15; 39:18, resônô is translated simply by eudokia (cf. N. Walker, “The Rendering of Rasôn,” in JBL, 1962, pp. 182–184); cf. 1QS 8.6: behîrê rasôn; Eph 2:3—τέκνα ὀργῆς; 1Pet 1:14—τέκνα ὑπακοῆς.

³⁵ 1QS 8.6; cf. 1Q34 bis, col. II, 5: “You chose a people for yourself at the time of your favor.” H. Braun, Qumrân und das Neue Testament, Tübingen, 1966, vol. 1, p. 83; G. von Rad, “Noch einmal Lc, II, 14: ἄνθρωποι εὐδοκίας,” in ZNW, 1930, pp. 111–115 (compares the word of the archangel Michael ʾish h<Ø>a<^>mudôt, in Dan 10:11, 19; cf. 9:23); cf. H. Hunzinger, “Neues Licht auf Lk, II, 14 ἄνθρωποι εὐδοκίας,” ZNW, 1952, pp.

85–90 (gives the bibliography; takes the phrase to mean God’s mercy); H. Hunziger, “Einweiterer Beleg zu Lk. II, 14 ἄνθρωποι εὐδοκίας,” ZNW, 1958, pp. 129–130; E. Vogt, “‘Pax hominibus bonae voluntatis,’ Lc. II, 14,” in Bib, 1953, pp. 427–429; G. Schwarz, “Der Lobgesang der Engel (Lukas II, 14),” in BZ, 1971, pp. 260–264.

³⁶ J. A. Fitzmyer (Semitic Background, pp. 101–104) cites 4Qh, ‘A’; frag. IX, 18, where Aaron is “the seventh among the men of his favor,” (b’ nwsh r’wth; re’û is the Aramaic equivalent of the Hebrew rasôn). This text is of interest in that it attests the noun d’nwsh, “men,” equivalent to ἄνθρωποις εὐδοκίας in Luke. Cf. R. Deichgräber, “Lc. II, 14, ἄνθρωποι εὐδοκίας,” in ZNW, 1960, p. 132.

³⁷ Rom 3:9, 23; 5:12, 19; 1John 1:8; cf. Matt 9:13 and parallels; 1Tim 1:15; John 1:29.

³⁸ Eph 1:5; cf. 1:9—“He has made known to us the mystery of his will, the benevolent design that he formed for us in advance, kata ten eudokian autou” (cf. N. Hugedé, Ephésiens, on this verse); Phil 2:13—“God works in you to will and to do, for the sake of his favorable purpose” (ὕπὲρ τῆς εὐδοκίας), that is, salvation.

³⁹ Cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 2, pp. 244–252.

⁴⁰ Esth 4:17d (Add Esth 13:13 in the RSV). Cf. P. Bratsiotis, “Eine exegetische Notiz zu Röm. IX, 3 und X, 1,” in NovT, 1962, pp. 299–300.

ε—υεργεσία, εὐεργετέω, εὐεργέτης euergesia, goodness, kindness, generosity; euergeteo, to do good; euergetes, benefactor

euergesia, S 2108; TDNT 2.654–655; EDNT 2.76–77; NIDNTT 3.1152; MM 260; L&N 88.7; BDF §163; BAGD 319–320 | euergeteo, S 2109; EDNT 2.76–77; NIDNTT 3.1147, 1152; MM 260–261; L&N 88.7; BAGD 320 | euergetes, S 2110; TDNT 2.654–655; EDNT 2.76–77; NIDNTT 1147, 1152; MM 261; L&N 35.15; BAGD 320

I. — In the OT, he euergesia is used for benefits conferred either by God (Wis 16:11; Ps 78:11, Hebrew ‘a<~>lîlâh = great deeds) even upon sinners (2Macc 6:13), or by the king.¹ So it is not surprising that St. Peter uses this word for the “miracle” of the healing of the lame man at the Beautiful Gate.²

But euergesia implies goodness, kindness, generosity,³ which can extend, with no distinction between persons, “to all people, eis pantas anthropous” (P.Oslo 127, 11; BGU 970, 8). It is thus that Christian slaves will serve with faithfulness and love their masters, who “benefit from their devotion” or “receive their good services.”⁴ While in the secular world a slave was a soma (body) or a res (thing), St. Paul makes Christian douloi capable of euergesia and transforms obedience from base servitude to noble deed. Euergesia, for that period, suggests a gracious gift, royal, imperial, or divine (cf. Polybius 5.11.16), the generosity of a superior (P.Fam.Tebt. 15, 72; P.Thead. 20, 7) or a patron.⁵ Publishing on 28 September 68 the edict of the prefect T. Julius Alexander, the strategos of the oasis of the Thebaide prefaces these remarks: “I have sent along to you a copy of the edict . . . so that by taking cognizance of it you may enjoy its benefits.”⁶ The prefect himself states that he is taking care that the city may continue to enjoy “the benefits that it gained from the augusti” (apolauousan ton euergesion, line 4), and concludes by referring to “the beneficence and constant foresight (of the emperors), to which we all owe our safety.”⁷ According to 1Tim 6:2, masters become obliged to their slaves!⁸

II. — The verb euergeteo, used eight times in the LXX, has only God for its subject: the Lord does good.⁹ This should be remembered in the exegesis of Acts 10:38, where there is a septuagintism: Jesus of Nazareth “went from place to place doing good (euergeton) and healing all those who were under the power of the devil.”¹⁰ The universality of this beneficence and this victory over evil are on another plane from those of the reigning emperor.¹¹

III. — In the Hellenistic period, euergetes sometimes obviously retains its banal sense, “benefactor,”¹² but it is becoming a technical term for the benefactor-protector of a city,¹³ of a people,¹⁴ of the whole human race (P.Oxy. 2342, 37; P.Ryl. 617, 6; SB 6674, 3). Thus it is attributed first of all to the gods and goddesses who are benefactors of their faithful (I.Magn. 62, 23; P.Ross.Georg. V, 6, 4), notably to Artemis, protector of the city (ibid. 31, 19, 23; 38, 35). A dedication of L. Ioulios Seoueros is consecrated “To Artemis and Apollo and Leto, euergetai.”¹⁵ In Egypt, in Syria, and at Rome, the title Theoi Euergetai is applied to kings. The decree of Canopus, 7 March 238: “May it please the priests of the land that the honors hitherto rendered in the sanctuary (of Osiris) to King Ptolemy and Queen Berenice, gods euergetai, and to the parents, gods adelphoi, and to their grandparents, gods soteres, be increased.”¹⁶ Usually, the prince is acclaimed as soter and euergetes, for example Antiochus in Syria.¹⁷ In 334 BC, the Prieniens confer this title on King Antigonos (I.Priene 2, 6). Caesar receives it from the inhabitants of Delos (I.Delos I, 1587), of Mytilene (IG XII, 2, 151), of Megara (IG, VII, 62), of Karthaia (IG XII, 5, 555; cf. Philo, Good Man Free 118); then Augustus, “the first, the greatest and universal benefactor” (Philo, To Gaius 149), at Thespieae in 30–27 (IG VII, 1836) and at Philae in 13–12 (SB 8897, 1); Claudius (SEG XIV, 703; I.Perg. 378); Nero;¹⁸ “the king of the Arsacid dynasty” in AD 87 (P.Dura 18, 1, 12; 19, 1; 20, 1; 22, 1; 24, 1,21); Vespasian;¹⁹ Trajan: “savior and benefactor of the whole world” (ton pantos kosmou soter kai euergeta, IG XII, 1, 978; I.Cor. n. 102, 7; cf. 503, 4. In SB 8438, 4, we must read eusebeias for euergesias; cf. ChrEg, 1967, p.212).

The label becomes more democratic, closer to our modern “decorations.” At Tralles, the prefect Fl. Caesarius is honored as soter and euergetes “in all things” (IGLAM, n. 1652 d, 7–8); exactly like the prefect of Egypt in 55–60 (SB 7462, 16); Laodicea honors the “legatus propraetor, patron and benefactor of the city, in return and recognition for his continual benefits” (IGLS n. 1258; cf. 4010, 8). At Sardis, the governor T. Julius Celsus Pelemaeanus, governor of Cappadocia, euergetes and soter of the city (I.Sard. 41, 10); at Lindos, the priestess of Athena, soter and euergetis (I.Lind., 394, 11; in AD 10); at Athens, Demetrius of Phalerum (Plutarch, Demetr. 8.7; 9.1); in Cyprus, the praetor and high priest Polycrates (SEG XX, 196) and the procurator Flavios Boethos (ZPE 1976, p. 135, line 8); at Mytilene, Potamos: euergetes, soter, and ktistes of his country (Dittenberger, Syl. 754; first century AD). A prytanes (P.Oxy. 41, 23–24), a harpistes (Dittenberger, Syl. 738, 14–15), and a donor who supplies oil to the gymnasium are graced with this designation (I.Car. n. 11, 7; 175 a 3; MAMA VI, 105, 165). Even so, the category of euergetai is the object of honors;²⁰ sacrifices and public games are celebrated in their name to express gratitude for their devotion and generosity.²¹

Obviously, flattery and adulation were not strangers to these proceedings. “The subordinates of Flaccus called him master, benefactor, savior, and other similar titles” (Philo, Flacc. 126; cf. To Gaius 22). The high priest Apollonios did not shrink from saying to the Greeks of Asia concerning Augustus, “Providence has produced an emperor and filled him with virtue, in order to make of him a benefactor of humanity; thus has been sent to us and our people a savior who has put an end to war. . . . Not only has he surpassed previous benefactors, but he leaves no room for future benefactors to hope to outdo him.”²² This *isotheism*²³ or theia euergesia of the prince (P.Hib. 274, 7; P.Stras. 245, 17–18) can only shock an objective mind. Thus Germanicus says categorically: “I absolutely reject these odious acclamations which are addressed to a god. They are fitting only for the one who is the real savior and benefactor of the whole human race, my father (Augustus) and his mother.”²⁴

It is with this background that we must read Luke 22:25—“The kings of the nations govern over them as masters (kyrieuousin), and those who wield power over them are called ‘benefactors’ (euergetai).” The absence of criticism in this saying and the light irony mark it as the Lord’s own. This discretion²⁵ only heightens the absoluteness of the command that ministers of the church shall be lowly—like servants (verses 26–27).

¹ 2Macc 9:26; cf. 4Macc 8:17; Ep. Arist. 205: How can the king remain rich? “By attracting the affection of his subjects through his good deeds.” The Milesians want their friends at Cos to know about their good deeds: περὶ τῶν ὑπὸ τοῦ δήμου πεπραγμένων εἰς αὐτοὺς εὐεργεσιῶν (Dittenberger, Syl. 590, 34; around 196).

² Acts 4:9; cf. Josephus, Ant. 6.211: “not to do evil to a man who had done us the great favor of restoring our health.”

³ Wis 16:24; cf. I. Magn. 32, 16: “the services and benefits with which the people of Magnesia have graced the Greeks” (third century BC). A decree in honor of Pallantion, whose citizens “display the benefits that the two cities (Argos) have done each other in the past” (SEG XI, 1084, 8); Diodorus Siculus 19.67.1: “the good deeds of Cratesipolis made his soldiers adore him”; 19.67.2: “the prince was very generous, εὐεργετικός”; Alexander multiplies good deeds (17.24.1; 17.69.9; 17.94.3; 17.108.6), just like Ptolemy (17.103.7). Plutarch, Cor. 11.2; P. Mich. 521, 13; P. Ross. Georg. III, 16, 2; SB 8797, 7; Hermes Trismegistus 1.30: “I engraved on myself the good deed of Poimandres.” It is common in petitions for the petitioner to appeal to the benevolence of the one whom he is soliciting, as does this lawyer, who in AD 85 addresses the euergesia of the prefect in favor of his client: τῆς σῆς εὐεργεσίας δεόμενος ἐντυγχάνει σοι (P. Flor. 61, 14; cf. P. Oxy. 899, 19; 2133, 5; 2342, 33; P. Fay. 20, 16; P. Ryl. 96, 10; P. Fouad 26, 31; 27, 34; SB 9421, 31; 9489, 8); C. Gatti, “Aspetti della εὐεργεσία nel mondo ellenistico,” in Parola del Passato, 1967, pp. 192–213.

⁴ 1Tim 6:2. It is not easy to translate οἱ τῆς εὐεργεσίας ἀντιλαμβανόμενοι; in the LXX this verb translates forty different Hebrew words. Etymologically, it suggests a correspondence or a reaction (opposed or harmonious, Gen 48:17; Isa 49:26; Ps 3:5; cf. Josephus, War 7.316; Ant. 5.194); hence “cooperate, take part, lend one’s support” (1Chr 22:17; cf. Thucydides 2.61.4; Dio Cassius 46.45; P. Tebt. 709, 12; 786, 20), and finally “busy oneself with, consecrate oneself to a task” (1Kgs 9:9; cf. P. Bour. 10.4; P. Oslo 93, 21; P. Sarap. 2, 13; SB 7558, 20; 8855, 10; 9049, 8). The two NT occurrences of ἀντιλαμβάνομαι mean “take responsibility for, provide for” (Luke 1:54; Acts 20:35), which is the most common meaning in the LXX (Lev 25:35; 2Chr 28:15; Ps 18:36; 20:2; Sir 3:12; 29:9, 20; Jdt 13:5 = 2Macc 14:15; etc.).

⁵ Hence its frequent occurrence in honorific decrees: εὐεργεαίας ἔνεκα (I.Thas. 183, 3; cf. 192, 11: a model for ages to come; 237, 5; I.Car. 56, 8: εἰ—ς τὴν πατρίδα εὐεργεσίας, in AD 73–74; SB 7738, 7; 8383, 4; G. Pfohl, Griechische Inschriften, Munich, 1965, n. 68, 2; 70, 4). Delos honors Aglaos of Cos, who uses “the advantages offered by his own personal worth but also those offered by fate in order to do as much good as possible for people” (F. Durrbach, Choix, n. 92, 29). I.Illium, n. 62, 5: ἀρετῆς ἔνεκεν καὶ εὐσεβείας τῆς εἰ—ς τὸ ἰ—ερὸν καὶ εὐεργεσίας τῆς εἰ—ς τὸν δῆμον; cf. 72, 4; 75, 4; 81, 5; 85, 7. Augustus praises Agrippa, ται—ς ἰ—δίαις ἀρεται—ς καὶ εὐεργεσίαις πάντων ἀνθρώπων κατεκράτεις (P.Köln 10, 13); similarly Ptolemy II, IG, IX, 1, 12, 56 (cf. ChrEg, 1975, p. 313).

⁶ Ἴν εἰ—δοτες ἀπολαύητε τω—ν εὐεργεσιω—ν (SB 8444, 2 = BGU 1563; G. Chalon, T. Julius Alexander, p. 27).

⁷ Line 65; cf. SB 9489, 8: ἀποδοθῆναί μοι εἰ—ς τὸ δυνηθῆναι με ε—κ τῆς σῆς εὐεργεσίας. Plutarch, Demetr. 9.1: εὐεργέτην καὶ σωτήρα.

⁸ Seneca also demonstrated that the magnanimous sentiments of the servant transform his service into “good offices” and benefits (Seneca, Ben. 3.18–20).

⁹ Ps 13:6 (Hebrew gamal —12:6 in the LXX); 57:2 (gamar —56:3 in the LXX); 116:7 (114 in the LXX); Wis 3:5; 11:5; 16:2; 2Macc 10:38). Likewise Philo, Change of Names 18; Ep. Arist. 190, 210; but also the king (249; Josephus, Ant. 14.370; 4Macc 8:6), who thus imitates God, (Ep. Arist. 44, 281; Ps.-Longinus, Subl. 1.2: “He was right who stated that what gets close to heaven is beneficence and the practice of the truth”; Strabo 10.2.9: “They are quite right to say that humans attain perfection by imitating the gods when they do good”; Dio Chrysostom 2.26; Aelian, VH 12.59).

¹⁰ Εὐεργετει—ν = εὐ—ποιει—ν (cf. H. Bolkestein, Wohltätigkeit und Armenpflege im vorchristlichen Altertum, Utrecht, 1939, pp. 95ff., 144ff., 297, 392, 400, 433ff.). In petitions to the dioiketes, the exegetes, the strategos, or the prefect, this verb is used almost exclusively and abundantly in the papyri for the granting of justice, aid, or more or less gracious help: ὦν χάριν ἀξιούμεν περὶ πάντων τούτων διαλαβει—ν ὅπως τύχωμεν τω—ν παρὰ σοῦ δικαίων καὶ ὦμεν εὐεργετημένοι (P.Ryl. 119, 34–36; first century AD); 617, 11; P.Tebt. 302, 31 (in 71–72); 326, 16; P.Mich. 232, 28 (from AD 36); 422, 37: ὦ ὑπὸ σοῦ τοῦ Κυρίου εὐεργετημένος; 524, 16 (AD 98); 525, 44; 534, 3; 629, 15; P.Mil.Vogl. 27, col. I, 23; Pap.Lugd.Bat. VI, 37, 22; 43, 50; BGU 2012, 27; 2064, 21; Stud.Pal. 49, 22; P.Fouad 27, 34 (AD 44); P.Oxy. 899, 45; 2131, 18; 2133, 28; 2234, 25; 2411, 37; P.Thead. 20, 13: “We now ask to be treated benevolently, in conformity with the laws and ordinances of the governors and other functionaries.” “Knowing well that [all who are elected] will receive favors in proportion to their benefits” (J.Pouilloux, Choix, n. 20, 18–19, from the third century BC). B. G. Mandilaras, Verb, n.455.

¹¹ Nero: ὁ ἀγαθὸς δαίμων τῆς οἰ—κουμένης, σὺν ἅπασιν οἷς εὐεργέτησεν ἀγαθοί—ς τὴν Αἴγυπτον . . . ἔπεμψεν ἡμει—ν Τιβέριον Κλαύδιον Βάλβιλλον (Dittenberger, Or. 666, 2–7).

¹² Wis 19:14; P.Oxy. 38, 13 (from 49–50; republished in Aeg, 1966, p. 237); 486, 27; 2479, 1: τω—ε—μω—ἀγαθω—εὐεργέτη καὶ δεσπότη δέησις καὶ ι—κεσία. At Smyrna, a certain Antonia, perhaps the daughter of Mark Antony, is described as εὐεργέτις (Dittenberger, Or. 377); cf. the woman who gave help to Alexander (Diodorus Siculus 17.24.2). A. Passoni dell’Acqua, “Euergetes,” in Aeg, 1976, pp. 177–191.

¹³ 2Macc 4:2: εὐεργέτης τῆς πόλεως. Cf. I.Perg. 413, 414, 416, 425. A decree of Istros: “Whereas Agathocles . . . descended from a father who was a benefactor, does not cease to show himself a man of goodwill toward the city” (NCIG, n. 6, 3–4; 7, 13); Xenophon, Hell. 6.1.4, Polydamas makes this speech at Lacedaemon: “For myself, who from my ancestors from time immemorial hold the titles of proxenos and benefactor of your city.”

¹⁴ P.Enteux. 4, 11, rect.; 15, 10; 29, 15; 32, 14; 33, 10; 38, 11; etc. “Whereas King Eumenes, friend and benefactor of our people by ancestral tradition” (Fouilles de Delphes III, 3, n. 237, 3). In the third century, “the inhabitants of Philae and of the Region of Dodekaschoinos” dedicate a statue in honor of “their benefactor” Caracalla (A. Bernand, Philae, vol. 2, n. 179, 10). It is a common chancellery formula; cf. P.Collomp, Recherches sur la chancellerie et la diplomatie des Lagides, Paris, 1926, pp. 97ff.; C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 3, p. 41, n. 3; J. Aubonnet, Aristote: Politique, Paris, 1973, vol. 2, 2, p. 204.

¹⁵ —Αρτέμιδι καὶ —Απόλλωνι καὶ Λητοί—εὐεργέταις, F. Cumont, Studia Pontica, n. 165). The goddess Roma: θεὰν Ῥώμην τὴν εὐεργέτιν τοῦ κόσμου (R. Merkelbach, “Dea Roma in Assos,” in ZPE, 1974, p. 280). An Egyptian city takes the name Εὐεργέτις (P.Oxy. 1025, 2582; P.Princ. 126; P.Köln 55; SB 7338, 1 and 16). Naturally, the true God is σωτήρ τε καὶ εὐεργέτης, μακαριότητος (Philo, Spec. Laws 1.209; cf. Alleg. Interp. 2.56; Creation 169; Prelim. Stud. 38, 97, 171; Sobr. 55).

¹⁶ Dittenberger, Or. 56, 20–21 - SB 8858. Dedication to King Ptolemy III and Queen Berenice, “gods euergetai” (A. Bernand, Philae, vol. 2, n. 3, 3);

“To King Ptolemy and his sister Queen Cleopatra and Queen Cleopatra his wife, gods euergetai, and to all the gods and goddesses of Abaton” (ibid. n. 15, 1–3, around 135; 16, 2; 17, 2; 19, 21); C.Ord.Ptol. 51, 4–6; CII 1442, 5; SB 7453, 3; 8925; 10186, 3; C. Wehrli, “Un témoignage des ΕΟΙ ΕΥΕΡΓΕΤΑΙ dans le culte dynastique pour l’année 145/4,” in ZPE, vol. 15, pp. 8–10; B. Funck, “Die Wurzel der hellenistischen Euergetes-Religion im Staat und die Städte des Seleukos Nikator,” in E. C. Welskopf, Hellenische Poleis, Leiden, 1974, vol. 3.

¹⁷ Dittenberger, Or. 239. Antiochus I of Commagene, in an inscription of Sofraz Köy: ὁ κτίστης καὶ εὐεργέτης (ZPE vol. 20, 1976, p. 213, line 5). The people of Laodicea erect a statue “of King Antiochus VII Epiphanes . . . their savior and benefactor” (F.Durrbach, Choix, Paris, 1921, n. 122); cf. Esth 8:12n (LXX = Add Esth 16:13): “Mordecai our savior and perpetual benefactor”; P.Oxy. 2563, 47. Tarquin thought it was normal for a king to be called benefactor, father, and savior (Dionysius of Halicarnassus 4.32.1; cf. Polybius 9.36.5); cf. H. Bolkestein, Wohltätigkeit und Armenpflege, p. 399; E. Skard, Zwei religiös-politische Begriffe: Euergetos-Concordia, Oslo, 1932; A. D. Nock, “Soter and Euergetes,” in J. E. Johnson, The Joy of Study (Festschrift for F. C. Grant), New York, 1951, pp. 127–148.

¹⁸ Τω— σωτήρι καὶ εὐεργέτη τῆς οι—κουμένης (Dittenberger, Or. 668, 5, inscription from Arsinoë; 239, 5; 301, 3). In his speech at Corinth on November 28, 67, Nero says: “It is not pity, but affection alone that makes me generous toward you (δι’ εὐνοϊαν εὐεργετω—); and I thank your gods for giving me the opportunity of being so greatly beneficent (ὅτι μοι τηλικαῦτα εὐεργετει—ν παρέσχον)” (Dittenberger, Syl. 814, 21, 24), “Nero . . . the new sun that shines upon the Greeks, has resolved to be the benefactor of Hellas (προειρημένος εὐεργετει—ν τὴν Ἑλλάδα)” (line 35). P. Bureth, Les Titulatures impériales dans les papyrus, les ostraca et les inscriptions d’Egypte, Brussels, 1964, p. 35. Nero called Corbulon pater and euergetes (Dio Cassius, 68, 17, 5). For Agrippa, cf. H. W. Pleket, Rijksmuseum, pp. 13ff.

¹⁹ The population of Tiberias names him “savior and benefactor” (Josephus, War 3.459); likewise the inhabitants of Philae and the Dodekaschoinos, in 69–79 (SB 8901, 3). Cf. L. Cerfaux, J. Tondriau, Culte des souverains, in the index, p. 498.

²⁰ A speaker or writer who intervenes with the Roman authorities on behalf of his country is honored by it as a “new founder” with a cult and burial inside the city, at the agora or the gymnasion, and receives civic recognition at Rome (cf. L. Robert, Opera Minora Selecta, vol. 4, Amsterdam, 1974, p. 103); a benefactor who distributes grain or offers dinners is acclaimed as τροφεύς and ἀριστεύς (L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 11–12, pp. 569ff.). “Alone among the Greeks, the Thebans were honored as benefactors (ὡς εὐεργέτας τιμα—σθαί) at the Persian court, where in the presence of the Great King chairs were placed for the Theban ambassadors” (Diodorus Siculus 17.14.2). Because of the help they gave Cyrus, the people “originally called ‘Arimaspians’ now bear the name of ‘benefactors’ (εὐεργέτας)” (ibid. 81.1), with the honorific privileges that his title brings.

²¹ Cf. L. Robert, Opera Minora Selecta, vol. 1, pp. 63–64; Philo, Moses 2.198; Flacc. 81: “Magistrates who govern well do not pretend to honor the euergetai but give them real honor”; Good Man Free 118: “the faithfulness of whole peoples to their deceased benefactors has moved them to undergo deliberate annihilation.” “Let all know that the people of Histiaea know how to honor their benefactors” (Dittenberger, Syl. 493, 15); “the people know how to demonstrate to their euergetai the gratitude merited by the good deeds that they have done” (ibid. 374, 51; an Athenian decree in 287 BC for the poet Philippides). A decree from Istros in the third century BC honors three ambassadors: “May it please the council and the people to enroll them and their descendants among the benefactors of the people, to crown them” (SEG XVIII, 288, 13–15; cf. XIV, 647, 6; 650, 6; 651, 2). At Gonnoi in Thessaly: “It befits the people to neglect nothing respecting honors and recognition for those who choose to be benefactors of the people” (I.Gonn., n. 109, 17); “All the privileges that belong to other proxenoi and euergetai of the city” (ibid. 41, 23; cf. 3, 4; 18, 6; 20, 9; 33, 5; 34, 5). In the fourth century BC, Eudemios of Plataea is counted “among the number of the benefactors of the people of Athens, and also his descendants” (Dittenberger, Syl. 288, 25–28). I.Perg. 418, 419; SB 10026, 4; 10029, 4; 10034, 4; 10195, 12. Gelon “was greeted from all sides with one voice, so to speak (by the Syracusans), with the name of benefactor, savior, and monarch” (Diodorus Siculus 11.26). F. Optimus, τὸν εὐεργέτην καὶ σωτήρα τῆς ε—παρχίας (C. H. E. Haspels, The Highlands of Phrygia, Princeton, 1971, vol. 1, n. 87).

²² I.Priene 105, 34, 38; cf. J. Rouffiac, Caractères du grec, pp. 67–73; J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1968, p. 436, n. 135. “Caesar was celebrated for his benefits and his munificence” (Sallust, Cat. 54.2). The emperor Gaius was “seen as savior and benefactor” (Philo, To Gaius 22). The Romans called themselves οἱ—κοινοὶ εὐεργέται (Dittenberger, Syl. 630, 17–18; 705, 46; cf. L. Robert, Etudes épigraphiques, p. 25). In the time of Augustus, the people of Assos celebrate “divine Rome, benefactor of the universe, θεὰν Ῥώμην τὴν εὐεργέτιν τοῦ κόσμου” (I.Assos, n. XX, 2), like the Delians (Dittenberger, Or. LIX, 1) and at Lagina-Stratanikeia (ibid. 431, 135). Cf. Πτολεμαῖς

Εὐεργέτις, P.Tebt. 350, 3; 580, 587; P.Duke inv. G. 170 (P.Coll.Youtie I, p.177).

²³ Τοι—ς ἄλλοις θεοι—ς καὶ τοι—ς κοινοι—ς εὐεργέταις Ῥωμαίοις (Dittenberger, Syl. 705, 46; a senatus consultum of AD 112; cf. 117, 15). Numerous references in L. Robert, Etudes anatoliennes, p. 448.

²⁴ Sel.Pap. II, 211. Plutarch was even more absolute in this criticism, cf. De Alexandri Magni Fortuna aut Virtute 2.5.

²⁵ It is worth noting that Jewish inscriptions, which so often praise donors and benefactors, seem to intentionally avoid calling anyone a euergetes. Str-B does not comment on the verse.

εὐθυμέω, εὐθυμος, εὐθύμως euthymeō, reassure, comfort; euthymos, reassured, comforted, in good spirits; euthymos, willingly, gladly euthymeō, S 2114; EDNT 2.77; MM 261; L&N 25.146; BAGD 320 |

euthymos, S 2115; EDNT 2.77; MM 261; L&N 25.147; BAGD 320 |
euthymos, EDNT 2.77; MM 261; L&N 25.147; BAGD 320

While it is true that thymos refers to the soul or the heart as the life-principle or the seat of the emotions, the compound forms with eu- take their precise nuance from their immediate context and from contemporary usage. But it is hard to see why modern translations prefer to translate “courage” in Acts 27:22, 36. In the midst of the storm, Paul invites his companions to be confident—paraino hymas euthymein—because “there will be no loss of life among you, but only of the vessel.” They are not asked to be valiant, only to recover their composure. A little later, the apostle asks each one to take some food. He himself takes some bread and gives thanks to God; “then all were reassured (not ‘encouraged’; euthymoi de genomenoi pantes) and also took food.”¹ So euthymeō must be translated “reassure, comfort,”² as the papyri indicate.

At the beginning of the second century, Eutyichidis writes to his father: “With respect to the barley from Thallou, be reassured, for I have sold it” (P.Amh. 133, 4; republished in P.Sarap. 92). In the fourth century, Hermodoros writes to his brother: “Be reassured with respect to our children Anysios and Aptonios, because they are in good health.”³ But in letters, euthymeō is very often associated with hygiaino, and it is common to wish correspondents both good health and “good morale.” If Serenos Antonia ends his letter to his mother in the third century with the simple euthymei kyria (P.Ross.Georg. III, 2, 32; the editors translate “Sei gutes [sic] Mutes”; cf. P.Oxy. 2156, 24; PSI 1248, 2, 27), euthymei at the end of the epitaph for Artemidora, who died at the age of forty-eight, is translated by its editor E. Bernand “Be consoled” (Inscriptions métriques de l’Égypte, n. 58, 9). Compare this with the funerary epigram “EUTH . . .” (I.Cret. I, 292, n. 2), which should no doubt read euthymei (cf. R. Merkelbach, in ZPE, vol. 12, 1973, p. 206). In the fourth century, “I pray that you are in good health and euthymos” (euchomai hygiainonti soi kai euthymounti, C.P.Herm. 5, 3; cf. 29; 4, 6; 14, 5; P.Alex. 30, 5); “above all, I pray to God most high concerning your health and complete soundness, that my little letter may find you in good health and euthymos” (pro men panton euchomai to hypsisto theo peri tes ses hygias kai holoklerias, hina hygienonta se kai euthymounta apolabe ta par’ emou grammatidia, P.Lips. 111, 5); “May my letter find you in good health and in good spirits” (P.NYU 25, 4; cf. PSI 825, 4); “praying divine providence that you are well and in good spirits” (euchomenos te theia pronoia hygiainonti soi kai euthymounti, P.Lond. 409, 6–7, republished in P.Abinn. 10, 7; cf. 36, 7, taken up from P.Gen. 53); “healthy and in good spirits” (hygiēna ta se kai euthymounta, P.Ross.Georg. III, 9, 21; cf. 10, 5). From the Fayum, in the sixth century, “Above all I send up prayers and petitions to my God and our Savior Christ that they may preserve you in good health and good spirits like myself.”⁴ Not having had news from his mother and his brothers, the physician Eudaïmon writes them: “You have not consoled me by reassuring me concerning your health” (P.Fouad 80, 7). Euthymia is a medical term, used by physicians to encourage the sick person to recover strength and hope;⁵ it almost means “relaxation.”

Jas 5:13 should be translated with these nuances in mind: “Is someone among you suffering?⁶ Let him pray. Is someone in good spirits (euthymei)? Let him sing hymns. Is someone sick? Let him call the elders of the church...” Euthymia is not joy, but serenity, that which Prov 15:15 refers to as “the contented heart,” hopeful feelings, energetic and lively, readily breaking into song;⁷ which Seneca calls “stable bearing of the soul”;⁸ and which is as such an ethical ideal.⁹ Thus the Christian’s good humor or good morale is not only the absence of suffering or anguish,¹⁰ but a serene and confident psychological balance.

The adverb euthymos, unknown in the papyri, is used by St. Paul in his speech to Felix: “Knowing that for a number of years you have been judge of this nation, I make my defense with confidence” (Acts 24:10). The best parallel is that of the Persian Pheraulas: “one thing above all inspires courage in me for this battle against the chief nobles, namely, that we shall be judged by Cyrus, an impartial judge” (Xenophon, Cyr. 2.3.12). Perhaps the tone of voice determined the precise nuance, which could equally well be “willingly” or “gladly.”¹¹ In any event, it is a conventional captatio benevolentiae.¹²

¹ Cf. Antiochus advising Lysias to extend a hand to the Jews, so that “they may know the approach we are taking and be reassured, εὐθυμοί τε ὦσι” (2Macc 11:26). Similarly, by his optimistic propaganda at Tiberias “Petronius was doing his best to reassure the crowd, εὐθυμει—ν τὸ πλῆθος” (Josephus, Ant. 18.284). The Lord transforms that which troubles us into a comfort (P.Oxy. 1874, 19; cf. 939, 19; SB 6222, 10). Euthymia consists precisely of “freeing oneself from the tension that accompanies effort” (J. M. André, L’Otium dans la vie morale et intellectuelle romaine, Paris, 1966, p. 148, n. 12).

² Cf. Philo: “First of all Joseph had all the granaries opened, with the intention of reassuring the men with this sight” (Joseph 162); the steward “will reassure [Joseph’s brothers] by congenial and friendly words” (ibid. 198; cf. 199). Phasaël dies happy and serene again “since I am survived by an avenger to punish my enemies” (Josephus, War 1.272: εὐθυμος ἄπειμι = Ant. 14.369: εὐθύμως).

³ C.P.Herm. 5, 15: εὐθύμει ε—πί; cf. 6, 11; P.Ant. 44, 15; P.Mil. 84, 1 (=SB 9441). The nuance of contentment and joy is emphasized in P.land. 13, 18: ἵνα μετὰ χαρά—ς σε ἀπολάβωμεν καὶ εὐθυμῆσαι δυνώμεθά σε; P.Lond. 1244, 7 (vol. 3, p. 244): παρακαλω—ν τὸν θεὸν ἵνα σαι ἀπολάβω εὐθυμοῦντα καὶ εὐπυγμοῦντα; 1927, 10; cf. P.Lund II, 4, 8 (SB 8091, 18); P.Oxy. 1593, 2: εὐθυμοῦντί σαι καὶ εὐδαιμονοῦτι; P.Apoll. 70, 5: “I have not the heart to write except concerning the pains that distressme.”

⁴ Πρὸ μὲν πάντων εὐχὰς καὶ δεήσεις ἀναπέμπω πρὸς τὸν ἑόν μου καὶ σωτήραν ἡμῶ—ν τὸν Χριστὸν ὅπως ὑγιένοντας ὑμα—ς καὶ εὐθυμοῦντάς μοι συνῆως διατηρήσιν, P.Grenf. 61, 7–13; cf. P.Gen. 53, 7; P.Giss. 54, 3; P.Oxy. 2731, 19. The formula is especially used by Christians, cf. M. Naldini, Il Cristianesimo in Egitto, n. 38, 6; 44, 4; 57, 5; 65, 7; 73, 4; 77, 22; 78, 5; 90, 5; 97, 4; cf. n. 11, 18, 58, 7; 89, 15, 24; 92, 15.

⁵ The references are given by W. K. Hobart, Medical Language, pp. 279–280. For Hippocrates, notably in Epid. 2 and 6, euthymia is a good interior disposition, courageous good humor, an optimistic outlook that causes the heart to swell and preserves or favors the appearance of that internal equilibrium that constitutes health.

⁶ Ὁν κακοπαθέω, cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, p. 361, n. 3.

⁷ Cf. Plutarch, Quaest. conv. 1.1.4: “These plants communicate good humor and gaiety to the guests”; Ages. 2.5: drive; P.Ryl. 439: αὐθις μετ’ εὐθυμίας τὸ θεοφιλέστατον σου πρόσωπον ἀπολαβει—ν; Hymn to Isis: “Hearing my prayers and my hymns, the gods in exchange gave me happiness (εὐθυμίαν) as a token or recognition” (SB 8139, 34 = E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques 175 b; cf. V. F. Vanderlip, Four Greek Hymns, p. 35: ἀνταπέδωκαν ε—μοὶ εὐθυμίαν χάριτα).

⁸ Seneca, Tranq. 1.18ff.; 2.3ff. Εὐθυμία is tranquillitas animi. Panaetius (cf. A. Grilli, “La data di composizione del Περὶ εὐθυμίας di Panezio,” in Acme, vol. 9, 1956, pp. 3–6), Plutarch and the Pythagorean Hipparchus each wrote a περὶ εὐθυμίας (Stobaeus, Flor. 108.44.81; vol. 5, pp. 980–984; cf. H. Broecker, Animadversiones ad Plutarchi libellum ΠΕΡΙ ΕΥΘΥΜΙΑΣ, Bonn, 1954, pp. 20ff.; H. Thesleff, The Pythagorean Texts, Abo, 1965, pp. 89ff.). Similarly Democritus (Περὶ εὐθυμίας), who set the goal of “εὐθυμίαν—οὐ τὴν αὐτὴν οὐσαν τῇ ἡδονῇ, he specifies—καθ’ ἣν γαληνω—ς καὶ εὐσταθω—ς ἡ ψυχὴ διάγει, a state of serenity that he also calls εὐεστώ” (T. Beaupère, Lucien, Philosophes à l’encan, Paris, 1967, vol. 2, p. 71, citing Diogenes Laertius 9.45). For the Stoics, it was a question of quietude, peace within, even a happy life, or at least evenness of humor in diverse circumstances, and even a nuance of energy and even joy. This notion corresponds well with our “good humor.”

⁹ Marcus Aurelius 3.16.4: “The good person lives with uprightnes, modesty, and good humor (εὐθύμως).” Cf. A. Frilli, Il problema della vita contemplativa nel mondo greco-romano, Milan, 1953; R. Joly, Genres de vie, pp. 10ff.

¹⁰ It is noteworthy that the NT knows nothing of discouragement (ἀθυμία; cf. Thucydides 2.51.4), despondency (δυσθυμία, cf. Hippocrates, Epid. 3.62.5), depression (καταφορή, Epid. 3.82.16–17). Melancholics remain discouraged (ἀθυμοί, ibid. 112.11; cf. 134.5). Euthymia is contrasted with inquietude (cf. P.Oxy. 939, 19), as is ardor with discouragement (Xenophon, Hell. 7.4.24).

¹¹ SB 8444, 5: Egypt contributes gladly (εὐθύμως) to the provisions, . . . so that with greater confidence (εὐθυμότεροι) you may expect everything—safety, as well as the material good fortune of the benefactor Augustus.” Cf. Xenophon, Cyr. 2.2.27: “good soldiers will more willingly (εὐθυμότερον) adhere to virtue”; Josephus, Ant. 10.174: prisoners on the verge of being liberated are full of joy (εὐθύμως); 258: Daniel accepts his fate with serenity (εὐθύμως).

¹² Cf. M. Dibelius, Studies in the Acts of the Apostles, London, 1956, p. 171; E. Haenchen, Acts, p. 654, n. 1, who recalls the brutality of Felix: “per omnem saevitiam ac libidinem jus regium servili ingenio exercuit” (Tacitus, Hist. 5.9).

εὐκαίρεω, εὐκαιρία, εὐκαιρος, εὐκαίρως eukaireo, to find time, use one's time; eukairia, right moment; eukairos, favorable, propitious; eukairos, in season, at a favorable time

eukaireo, S 2119; EDNT 2.78; NIDNTT 3.833, 837; MM 262; L&N 67.4, 67.80; BDF §392(3); BAGD 321 | eukairia, S 2120; TDNT 3.462; EDNT 2.78; NIDNTT 3.833, 837; MM 262; L&N 67.5; BDF §400(1); BAGD 321 | eukairos, S 2121; TDNT 3.462; EDNT 2.78; NIDNTT 3.833, 837; MM 262; L&N 67.6; BAGD 321 | eukairos, S 2122; EDNT 2.78; NIDNTT 3.833, 837–838; MM 262; L&N 67.6; BAGD 321

All these terms, which belong to Hellenistic Greek, are used abundantly in the papyri, almost exclusively in private letters; thus they were part of the popular language. In the NT, the verb eukaireo, “find time, use one's time,” which does not occur in the LXX, is used for hearers of Jesus who do not have the time or the leisure to eat;¹ of the Athenians, who pass their time talking or hearing about whatever is newest (Acts 17:21); and of Apollos, who refuses to go immediately to Corinth: “he will go [to see you] when he has time,”² or “when he finds either the occasion or the opportunity.”³

The substantive eukairia is used sometimes for the “right moment,”⁴ the propitious juncture, the favorable occasion⁵—for example, Judas seeks a propitious moment for betraying Jesus.⁶ Sometimes it is used for the exact moment when help arrives (Ps 9:10; 10:1; Hebrew ‘et). It is used for time spent advantageously: leisure time (Sir 38:24), sometimes for a life “happily spent” (Ps.-Plutarch, Cons. ad Apoll. 17); which would in Byzantine and modern Greek come to mean “holiday” (cf. tes eiremenes eukairias, P.Ant. 94, 23).

The adjective eukairos is used in exactly the same sense, for the day that is propitious or on which aid and help are received,⁷ for a favorable position (2Macc 14:29; cf. Ep. Arist. 115) and for appropriate circumstances for putting plans into effect;⁸ one takes advantage of an opportune moment.⁹ Thus the “propitious day, genomenes hemeras eukairou” of Mark 6:21 was the favorable day awaited by Herodias for carrying out her plan to get rid of John the Baptist.

The adverb eukairos locates the action “at the desired time” (Sir 18:22), at the right moment (SB 6786, 28; P.Cair.Zen. 59498, 15; 59508, 5), when one has a chance of succeeding or being well received.¹⁰ When Timothy, who was timid, turned out to be too reserved in the exercise of his office, St. Paul told him to proclaim the word of God “in season, out of season,”¹¹ or without taking account of the favorable or unfavorable response of his hearers, favorable or unfavorable circumstances, even though humanly speaking, on the level of prudence, there are times for speaking and other times for abstaining from speech.¹²

¹ Mark 6:31; cf. P.Paris 46, 18: αὐτὸς δέ, ὡς ἂν εὐκαιρήσω, παραχρῆμα παρέσομαι πρὸς σέ (second century BC; republished by S. Witkowski, Epistulae Privatae Graecae 47; and UPZ 71); PSI 425, 28; 973, 8: ε—ἂν εὐκαιρήσης διὰ τὸ μικρὸν πρα—γμα; BGU 2064, 19; P.Oxy. 2979, 7 (3 BC). B. G. Mandilaras, Verb, n. 813.

² 1Cor 16:12: ε—λεύσεται δὲ ὅταν εὐκαιρήσῃ; cf. P.Cair.Zen. 59124, 7: αὐτὸς παραγενόμενος ὡς ἂν εὐκαιρήσῃ; 59045, 3: ὡς ἂν εὐκαιροῦντα λάβῃς εἰ—σαγαγὼν αὐτόν (republished SB 6788).

³ P.Lond. 1925, 3: εὐκαιρηθεῖς τοῦ συντείνοντος πρὸς τὴν θεοσέβειάν σου; P.Eleph. 29, 7: ε—ἂν δὲ μὴ εὐκαιρῆς τοῦ διαβῆναι; P.Giss. 67, 14 (with the note of the editor, P. M. Meyer). In P.Brem. 63, 29, ὅτε οὐκ εὐκαιρῶ— = here, I am not having a good time at all. Phrynichus defines Εὐκαιρει—ν οὐ λεκτέον, ἀλλ' εὖ σχολῆς ἔχειν, and cites Chio, Epist. 17; Plutarch, Apoph. lac. p. 215; Quaest. Rom. 41; Athenaeus, 6.109.553, etc.

⁴ Cf. Menander, Dysk. 129: “Know this well, that in everything, success requires choosing the right moment”; ZPE vol. 24, 1977, p. 128.

⁵ Demetrius to Jonathan: “I will shower you and your nation with honors when I find the right occasion, ε—ἂν εὐκαιρίας τύχω” (1Macc 11:42); sometimes an opportune good deed is the point (Ps 145:15, ε—ν εὐκαιρία; Josephus, Ant. 15.315: τὴν τῆς χάριτος εὐκαιρίαν), sometimes the occasion of a death (Ant. 18.54) or of an act of vengeance (Ant. 15.59; 20.76). In the Stoic vocabulary, εὐκαιρία is the opportunitas temporum, the right time for an action, cf. D. Tsekourakis, Studies in the Terminology of Early Stoic Ethics, Wiesbaden, 1974, pp. 56ff.

⁶ Matt 26:16; cf. Mark 14:11 (εὐκαίρως). Almost always, in the papyri, the writer seeks and finds the time to have his letter carried to the recipient (P.Brem. 15, 28: the departure of the boat; P.Oxy. 1300, 2; 1861, 1; P.Oslo 59, 1; PSI 299, 2; P.Apoll. 54, 1; P.Fouad 88, 1; 89, 1: “Having taken advantage of the opportunity of a messenger, I thought I should write you . . .”; P.Abinn. 8, 7: “Finding the opportunity of two or three camels to transport wine”; 30, 3; 38, 3; SB 6097, 6; 7247, 27; 8027, 11; 9287, 1; etc.). Or he does not find the time: “I write my letter during the night, having found opportunity, but I was unable to send it” (P.Mich. 476, 20; cf. SB 7872, 15), and he promises to write on another occasion (P.Ross.Georg. 21, 10). Under the reign of Trajan, a soldier promises to come if he finds the opportunity to carry out his plan, but he has not yet found the opportunity (P.Mich. 203, 7, 10, 20; cf. 214, 27; BGU 665, col. II, 4: εὐκαιρίαν δὲ οὐκ ἔχει, first century AD). Cf. the biblical hapax ἀκείρῳ (in the middle) in Phil 4:10—the feeling of the Philippians toward the apostle “come to flower again,” but they had lacked the opportunity to demonstrate them.

⁷ Ps 104:27; Heb 4:16: εἰ—ς εὐκαιρον βοήθειαν; cf. Dittenberger, Or. 762, 4: βοηθείτω κατὰ τὸ εὐκαιρον (second century BC), Syl. 693, 12: βοηθείτω ὡς ἂν ἦ εὐκαιρον (cf. O. Mentevecchi, “Quaedam de graecitate psalmodum cum papyris comparata,” in Proceedings IX, pp. 296ff.). The word is a favorite of the Stoics, cf. P.M. Schuhl, “De l’instant propice,” in Revue Philosophique, 1962, pp. 69–72.

⁸ 2Macc 14:29, Nicanor “found a favorable occasion for carrying out this order by means of a strategem.” Onasander 10.19: well informed, the general can deploy an opportune strategy (εὐκαίρῳ στρατηγία); cf. 36.6. Εὐκαιρος is, like the substantive, used for the occasion for sending a letter (P.Oxy. 2156, 3); but in the correspondence from Zeno (in the third century BC), the word has a much broader meaning, and we must translate εἰ— (or ε—ἂν) εὐκαιρόν σοι ἔστι (P.Cair.Zen. 59371, 11, republished SB 6770; 59416, 5; P.Mich. 51, 5; 72, 3; 487, 140) not “if you have the opportunity” but “if it is possible for you, if it is convenient, if it is feasible” (P.Ryl. 563, 5; republished SB 7646, 5); a nuance found again in P.Brem. 18, 8. The meanings “good time” (ibid. 63, 3; cf. 11, 3) and “good health” (P.Oxy. 1861, 3) are equally represented.

⁹ Cf. Menander, Dysk. 232: “This isn’t the moment (μὴ . . . εὐκαιρον) to be found in their way.” In Ep. Arist. 203, 238, the king does not ask questions until he deems that the moment is right. Demetrius III, surnamed Eukairos, “the opportune,” was called by his enemies Akairos, “the untimely” (Josephus, War 1.92). Diodorus Siculus 17.52.2: Alexandria is very favorably situated.

¹⁰ Cf. P.Lond. 33, 23 (republished in UPZ 39; cf. 40, 17); PSI 742, 5. Demosthenes, Proem. 37; Josephus, War 1.618: The visit of Varus was timely.

¹¹ 2Tim 4:2: ε—πίστηθι εὐκαίρως ἀκαίρως; the absence of the conjunction makes the oxymoron more energetic (cf. the Latin volens nolens, concordia discors, per fas et nefas). On ἀκαίρως cf. Sir 20:19—a “story (told) out of season”; Josephus, Ant. 12.6: an untimely superstition; Thucydides 5.65.2: “misplaced zeal”; Plutarch, Pomp. 67.5: “untimely candor”; 75.4. Leonidas of Alexandria: “For neither to labourers after harvest is rain out of season (ὄμβρος ἄκαιρος) useful, nor the Zephyr to mariners in port” (Anth. Pal. 11.9).

¹² John Chrysostom, Hom. 3 in Laz. et Div. Plato had asked about the opportuneness and inopportuneness of certain forms of discourse (Phdr. 272 a; cf. Isocrates 15.311); ε—υκαιρία became a rhetorical term designating moments when it was necessary to speak; cf. LTGR, p. 140; G. H. Whitaker, in ExpT, vol. 34, 1923, p. 333.

εὐμετάδοτος

eumetadotos, generous in giving eumetadotos, S 2130; EDNT 2.80; MM 263; L&N 57.97; BAGD 323

St. Paul requires the rich to “do good (agathoergein), be rich in good works (ploutein en ergois kalois), generous in giving (eumetadotous), socially minded (koinonikous)” (1Tim 6:18); these four expressions sum up the meaning of virtue for rich: generosity. They should be open-handed.

Metadidomi means to convey to someone else that which is one’s own (Rom 1:11; 1Thess 2:8). Given the love of the Koine for compound forms, it is possible that the prefix in eu-metadotos (a biblical hapax, unknown in the papyri) adds no special element of meaning to the simple form; but it is more likely that it emphasizes the nuance either of liberality,¹ or the ease, promptitude, and joy with which one makes one’s wealth useful to others (cf. Acts 20:35; Wis 7:13—wisdom passes on without regret [aphthonos metadidomi] that which it has gained, without afterthought). If this is indeed the meaning of the prefix, then it transforms simple “sharing” into a full-fledged virtue.

The teaching is Christian: John the Baptist had instructed people to give spontaneously to the needy,² and St. Paul had urged “working with one’s hands in order to be able to give to those in need” (Eph 4:28). But it corresponds with the ethic, as much Jewish as pagan, that distinguishes between blind wealth and clear-sighted or “clairvoyant” wealth. The latter goes along with wisdom³ and willingly shares of its goods (Philo, Flight 29). This ethic is that of a hero of Menander: “Money is a fragile thing. If you are sure that it will be at your disposal forever, then keep it and do not share with anyone (medeni toutou metadidou). But if you are not its master, and if you owe everything not to yourself but to Tyche, why should you be jealous of it? . . . You should use it generously, help everyone, enrich as many people as you can with your own means. That is what is imperishable. . . . Give open-handedly, share (metadidou) . . . willingly.”⁴

¹ Cf. Marcus Aurelius 1.14.4: the emperor learned from the Peripatetic Severus τὸ εὐποιοτικὸν καὶ τὸ εὐμετάδοτον; cf. 6.48: “when you want to gladden your heart, ponder the great generosity of one of your companions, τοῦ δὲ τὸ εὐμετάδοτον.” According to Rom 12:8, the one who gives of his own means (ὁ μεταδιδούς) must do so with liberality (ε—ν ἀπλότητι); cf. Vettius Valens linking γίνονται δὲ συνετοί, ἀπλοι—εὐμετάδοτοι, ἦδει—ς φιλοσυμβίωτοι κτλ. (46.24).

² Luke 3:11 (μεταδίδωμι); cf. H. Schürmann, Lukasevangelium, p. 168, which gives the references to the OT and the rabbinic writings. F. Field, Notes on the Translation, p. 213, cites a scholium on Plato: κοινὰ τὰ τω—ν φίλων ε—πὶ τω—ν εὐμεταδότων.

³ Plato, Leg. 1.631 c; Philo, Sobr. 40; cf. Husbandry 54; Abraham 25; Virtues 5; Prelim. Stud. 71: κοινωνικὸν ἀρετή; Epictetus: “Human nature is to do good (εὖ ποιει—ν), to be useful to others” (4.1.122), to have a social instinct and to be generous (τὸ κοινωνικόν, 4.11.1; cf. Philo, Decalogue 14).

⁴ Menander, Dysk. 797–819. At line 809, Sostratus adds: “If ever your fortunes change, someone will owe you the same treatment in turn. It is better to have a friend in the open than invisible riches that you keep buried”; which recalls the prudence that the steward advised: make friends with the money that one has, so that when it fails, they will receive us into eternal dwellings (Luke 16:9).

εὐνοέω, εὐνοία

eunoëo, to be benevolent, be accommodating, come to terms; eunoïa, benevolence, goodwill, friendship, devotion

eunoëo, S 2132; TDNT 4.971–973; EDNT 2.80; MM 263; L&N 30.23, 31.20, 56.3; BAGD 323 | eunoïa, S 2133; TDNT 4.971–973; EDNT 2.80; MM 263; L&N 25.72; BAGD 323

Noos, “intelligence, mind,” designates from Homer on a thought that may be mixed with a feeling¹ and emerges into an action.² This meaning is found in more than a hundred compound forms, including eunoëo and eunoïa. The verb is ordinarily translated “be well disposed toward, in agreement with,” and the noun “good feelings, benevolence,” but the nuances are so numerous that it is difficult to specify exactly what is meant in each text.

In classical Greek, eunoio expresses a disposition that is inclined to be favorable, to wish someone well.³ According to Cyrus, “It is difficult to show benevolence (eunoiein) toward the malevolent (kakonois)” (Xenophon, Cyr. 8.2.1). A servant shows himself to be devoted toward his master (to eunoiein emoi; Xenophon, Oec. 12.5). The affective sense is clear in the Delphic precept philois eunoiei (Dittenberger, Syl. 1268, 15), but a specific nuance is apparent with regard to social and political relations, where especially official friendship and loyalty are in view.⁴ In the papyri, beginning in the first century AD, the verb refers to conjugal attachment:⁵ the wife promises to live with her husband as gnesia gamete (true wife) and adds kai eunoiein soi (PSI 64, 4). Testators recognize their wives’ virtue: “being kind to me and showing me full faithfulness” (eunoouse moi kai pasan pistin moi ekdeiknymene, P.Oxy. 494, 9; 2474, 6; cf. P.Tebt. 326, 10). In business letters, the author supposes that his correspondent is well disposed toward him (P.Brem. 53, 18; P.Mich. 476, 14). Eunoio is used only once in the NT. The Lord commands, “be accommodating toward your adversary (isthi eunoion to antidiko, where antidikos is a legal term; cf. P.Wash.Univ. I, 6, 20, 26) while you are on the way with him” (Matt 5:25). Here the idea is to “come to terms,” to settle upon concrete measures to take. The parallel, Luke 12:15, uses the perfect passive participle of apallasso: deliver oneself from, have done with one’s creditors, get out of difficulty.

The noun eunoia is used much more and has more diverse meanings. Certainly it expresses benevolence,⁶ or more precisely “a benevolent feeling” (to tes eunoias pathos, Philo, Abraham 153, 168, 194) that does not exclude respect (eunoia kai time, Josephus, Ant. 6.257; 7.51; 8.386; 20.205; P.Princ. 74, 6 and 9; MAMA, VI, 115, 9–10; 119, 19), but it is a matter first of all of good intentions or good feelings, goodwill.⁷ This is the constant meaning in the LXX.⁸ The reader of Sirach is invited to read with “goodwill and attention” (met’ eunoias kai prosoches, Sir Prologue 15). King Demetrius writes to Jonathan: “We have decided to do good (to the Jewish nation) because of the goodwill that they have for us.”⁹ Likewise in Philo: among the wicked, “goodwill is nothing but hypocrisy” (Philo, Conf. Tongues 48); souls harmonize in good sentiments.¹⁰ It is fairly common in Josephus: it was with good intentions (kat’ eunoian) that Varus sent Philip (War 2.83); “those who are arriving were moved by goodwill and came as allies.”¹¹ This goodwill or favor is sometimes attributed to the Deity: eunoia theou (Ant. 5.95; cf. 4.106, 190, 213; 7.385; 14.455); “the goodwill of Lord Sarapis” (tas eunoias tou kyriou Sarapidos).¹²

As a virtue of the good citizen, eunoia balances life in community, causes one to share the joys and sorrows of others, and overcomes attachments;¹³ it is the basis of good relations (Josephus, Ant. 14.154; 19.51, 211) and becomes faithfulness and loyalty when it is a matter of the attachment of inhabitants or an army to a general or emperor (te pros ton hegoumenon eunoia).¹⁴ Hence the language of treaties of alliance and friendship (Ant. 12.417; 13.37) and political friendship, like that of Hiram and Solomon (Ant. 8.57) or Antipater and Hyrcanus (14.8; cf. 16.10, 60; 17.37, 39, 43, 123, 353). If Aristotle refused to assimilate eunoia to philia,¹⁵ this distinction is obliterated in the first century: “you have eunoian and philia for me” (P.Brem. 49, 5; Philo, Spec. Laws 1.52; Plant. 90; I.Priene 47, 25). In a wedding contract, the wife promises to keep all her affection and tenderness for her husband (P.Lond. 1711, 34). In any event, the term is often linked with storge (Josephus, Ant. 4.134; 15.84; P.Stras. 284, 13; SB 9622, 6) and philostorgia (4.273; 8.193; 15.68; 16.21; P.Oxy. 494, 6; P.Mich. 341, 9, from AD 47). It is used for the love of Pharaoh’s daughter for the child Moses (Philo, Moses 1.19, 33; Virtues 224) or of Sarah for the son of Hagar (Josephus, Ant. 1.215), of the love of husband and wife (Ant. 5.310; 17.49, 58, 85), the love of a father for his children¹⁶ and vice versa (1.222, 291, 297; 17.103), especially brotherly affection,¹⁷ that felt for a friend (War 1.416), even an affinity felt for other nations¹⁸ and for all people (Philo, Spec. Laws 2.167).

In every case, the feelings of benevolence imply fidelity (eunoia kai pistis)¹⁹ and are characterized by seriousness and ardor (eunoia kai spoude)²⁰ and even eagerness and zeal (prothymia kai eunoia, Josephus, Ant. 8.57; 19.51; SEG I, 363, 10). Eunoia is, in effect, a “will (boulesis) to see good things happen to one’s neighbor for his own profit” (Philo, Plant. 106); it is a preoccupation, something that one attends to: “exhibiting the same benevolence and attention” (ten auten eunoian kai epimeleian parechomenos, Dittenberger, Syl. 390, 18); “to all beneficence and benevolence” (pros pantas euergesia kai eunoia, P.Fam.Tebt. 15, 72). Put plainly, eunoia entails devotion.

This meaning was not unknown in classical Greek,²¹ but it is common in the Hellenistic period²² and constant in the inscriptions²³ praising magistrates, officials, physicians, officers, etc., for their virtue and devotion (aretas kai eunoias charin);²⁴ that is, for the loyalty, fidelity, and zeal that they showed in the exercise of their responsibilities or functions. In the second century BC, a proxenia decree for a Roman citizen: “It pleases the city to garland him . . . for his merit and the devotion that he unflinchingly shows toward our city” (I.Gonn., n. XX, 7; cf. 109, 14: “devotion and philanthropy toward the people,” ten pros ton demon eunoian kai philanthropian). In 46 BC, the dedication of a statue in honor of the strategos Ptolemaios, “for his merit and devotion.”²⁵ More simply, an honorific decree at Athens: “Whereas in every circumstance Philippides has unflinchingly showed his devotion to the people” (apodeiknymenos ten pros ton demon eunoian, Dittenberger, Syl. 374, 9). At Delos: “Whereas Aglaos has previously, in the most difficult circumstances, given numerous and brilliant proofs of his devotion to the king’s business.”²⁶ Around 60 BC,

“the horsemen among the colonists have observed the attitude adopted by their masters toward the power” (BGU 1185, 3).

Given the multiplicity of meanings, we may hesitate to offer a translation of Eph 6:7—“met’ eunoias serving as for the Lord”—which is part of the parenthesis addressed to slaves. But the apostle has already made appeal to their rectitude of heart (en haploteti kardias, 6:5), with a nuance of liberality in self-giving; then to the spontaneity and energy exercised in work done “with feeling” (ek psyches, 6:6). In 6:7, therefore, eunoia can no longer be simply “goodwill,” but indeed to serve masters “with devotion” and with respect. This is a call to faithfulness and loyalty in service—and these from the heart—because the word eunoia implies good intentions: the slave will therefore always be “well disposed” both in his relations with his owner and in regard to the orders that he receives. It is a wonderful thing that such interior perfection, which would be translated “devotion,” should be the virtue of slaves whom the pagans considered to be “things” or “bodies.” That is the perfection of Christian eunoia !

¹ John 12:40 (Isa 6:10): ἵνα νοήσωσιν τῇ καρδίᾳ; cf. 1Sam 4:20; Isa 32:6; 44:18; 47:7; Prov 16:23.

² P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique, p. 756.

³ Herodotus 7.237; 9.79: “I am grateful to you for your benevolence (to eunoeein) and interest toward me”; Sophocles, Aj. 689: “Ask Teucer to be good to you” (εὐνοεῖν ὑμι—ν).

⁴ Demosthenes, C. Arist. 23.181; Polybius 3.11.7: Hannibal’s father makes his son swear never to be the friend of the Romans (εὐνοήσειν); Plutarch, Sull. 10.6: Lucius Cinna undertakes to serve Sulla’s interests; Josephus, War 1.93: part of the army “remained faithful to Alexander” (= Ant. 13.130); War 4.214: John of Gischala swears that he will “always be faithful to the people”; Ant. 9.153: Jodas (Jehoida) makes the people swear to be faithful to the king; 17.42; 17.10: Herod had sworn that he would not be on good terms with Salome if . . .”; Ag. Apion 2.121: “We swear not to show benevolence before any foreigner.” In loyalty oaths, cf. Dittenberger, Or. 532, 10: ὁμνύω . . . εὐνοήσειν Καίσαρι Σεβαστῶ—; Syl. 524, 17; 797, 20ff.

⁵ In a will, Aurelius Colluthus refers to his wife as ἡ εὐνουστάτη μου γαμετή (V.Anangio-Ruiz, Fontes Iuris Romani Antejustiniani, Florence, 1943, vol. 3, n. 52). Cf. Dan 2:43—οὔτε εὐνοοῦντες ἀλλήλοις, “they shall not be attached to each other.” The verb translates the Hebrew , “be attached, cleave to, be faithful to.”

⁶ Plato, Prt. 337 b: “People discuss things with their friends with benevolence (διεϋνοίαν), but they dispute with rivals”; Grg. 487 a: to know whether a soul lives well or badly, it must be verified whether it has three qualities: “knowledge, benevolence, and frankness” (ε—πιστήμην τε καὶ εϋνοίαν καὶ παρρησίαν); Resp. 5.470 a: to show our benevolence to the other Greeks; Thucydides 2.10.4: the benefactor, by his benevolence (διεϋνοίας) toward his debtor perpetuates the debt of gratitude; Philo, Dreams 2.108: reconciling brothers exchange their hostility for benevolence, for example, that of parents for their children: τὴν φυσικὴν εϋνοίαν (Decalogue 152; Spec. Laws 1.250; 2.232; Virtues 192) or of good princes for their cities and peoples (Spec. Laws 4.184; Virtues 56; Rewards 97, 118); SB 8071, 8, epitaph for a black slave: “my soul drew to itself the benevolence of a wise master.”

⁷ Aeschylus, Suppl. 489: “It is always the weak who show goodwill” (εϋνοίας φέρει); Plato, Phdr. 241 c: in a lover, goodwill has no part in the beginning of fondness; Thucydides 4.65.5: under the guise of goodwill, bad counsel is given; Xenophon, An. 4.7.20: the Greeks’ guide did not accompany them out of affinity for them.

⁸ Except for Esth 2:23; 3:13—Mordecai’s devotion and faithfulness (6:4).

⁹ 1Macc 11:33; cf. 11:53; 2Macc 9:21—King Antiochus does not forget the honorand goodwill of the Jews (τὴν τιμὴν καὶ τὴν εϋνοίαν); 9:26; 11:19; 12:30; 14:26—Alcimus saw the goodwill between Nicanor and Judas; 14:37—Because of his goodwill (κατὰ τὴν εϋνοίαν) Razis was called Father of the Jews; 15:30.

¹⁰ Ἄρμοζομενω—ν εϋνοία, Heir 40; Moses 1.324; cf. Cherub. 33: “they pretend that their advice is dictated by goodwill alone” (ἅπ εϋνοίας); Flight 6, 40: calling him ‘child’ expresses kindness; 98; Spec. Laws 4.16; Virtues 132: “Whom will you approach with goodwill, you assassins of your own children?”; Moses 1.148: Moses showed goodwill toward all who ascribed to him the command and royal authority; 2.291. The prefect has Claudius’s letter to the Alexandrians posted, so that each one may “show gratitude for the emperor’s favorable disposition toward the city” (P.Lond. 1912, 10); “your very good friend Rullius knows the goodwill that you feel toward me” (P.Mich. 498).

¹¹ War 4.136; Ant. 10.268; 11.132, 303; 12.183; 13.127, 150, 189; cf. the great benevolence of Abimelech for Abraham (1.259), “goodwill” (8.215; 14.274, 307; 15.368; 16.125; 17.100, 328; 19.135, 299).

¹² P.Mich. 501, 20; Pap.Graec.Mag. III, 595, a prayer: πρὸς πάντα καὶ πρὸς πάντα πατρικὴν εὐνοίαν καὶ στοργὴν καὶ φιλίαν . . . ε—νεδείξω; I.Magn. 46, 37: μετὰ τὰς τω—ν θεω—ν εὐνοίας (= Dittenberger, Syl. 560); 73 a 20 (cf. the numerous uses of the ward in the index of these inscriptions, p. 263). Artemis is a protectress (εὐνοίαισι; Aeschylus, Sept. 450). For their part, humans are attached to God (Philo, Good Man Free 42, 84).

¹³ Plutarch, De virt. mor. 12; Praec. ger. rei publ. 28. In De frat. amor. 2, Plutarch links εὐνοία with συμφωνία, ὁμόνοια, ἄρμονία; he uses it for the affection of parents for children (chap. 9), between brothers (11) and friends (21). This mutual benevolence and affection (Amat. 2 and 21), the opposite of jealousy (De inv. et ot. 1), but where there is sometimes more sensitivity than affection proper (Cons. ux. 6; Mulier. virt. 256c–d). Cf. C. Panagopoulos, Vocabulaire, p. 203).

¹⁴ Josephus, War 3.238; cf. 2.569, 628, 646; 7.6, 64; Ant. 7.43; 14.212; 15.361; 16.83; 17.195, 205; 18.124, 206; Life 122, 125, 250, 353 (cf. Ant. 18.346: faithfulness to the laws). To this attachment of the people (War 1.107; 3.410; 4.411; Ant. 20.248; Life 94) which gives proofs of fidelity (Ant. 9.113; 14.384; 15.171, 308; 16.105; 17.201, 203; 18.292, 376; 19.323) corresponds ἡ πρὸς τὸν δῆμον εὐνοία (War 1.153; 4.316; Ant. 7.195). Cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 721, 13: τὰν εὐνοίαν ἃν ἔχει πορτὶ τὰν πόλιν; 330, 8: μετὰ πολλῆς εὐνοίας; C.P.Herm. 53, 16ff., concerning officials.

¹⁵ Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 9.5 1166b30: “Eunoia is a friendly sort of relation, but it is not friendship; for one may have goodwill both toward people whom one does not know, and without their knowing it, but not friendship. . . . Goodwill does not involve intensity or desire . . . and may arise all of a sudden, as towards competitors in a contest. . . . But goodwill can be the beginning of true friendship”; cf. 8.2.1155b31. Likewise Plutarch (Quaest. conv. 4; praem. 2.660 a–b), who distinguishes between philia, which takes time and virtue (De amic. mult. 93 f), simple affinity (τὸν εὐνοῦν), which “arises from relations, meetings, diversion, between members of the city; for these are so many occasions for the exercise of benevolent persuasion and friendship”; cf. Philo, Migr. Abr. 116: “friends who feel true sympathy (εὐνοία) express themselves with full frankness, without malice (ἄνευ τοῦ κακονοεῖ—ν)”; Spec. Laws 4.70: the judge takes into account neither affinity nor hate; Virtues 53.

¹⁶ Philo, Moses 2.236; Spec. Laws 2.239–240; Virtues 225; To Gaius 62; Josephus, Ant. 17.187; 20.20, 23.

¹⁷ Philo, Joseph 218, 232; Moses 2.176; Spec. Laws 1.114; 2.80; To Gaius 26, 84; Josephus, War 1.627; Ant. 2.161; 17.116, 120. Hence all natural bonds (War 1.77; P.Oxy. 2711, 4: τὴν ἐκ φύσεως ὀφειλομένην ἀποσφύζων εὐνοίαν . . . πρὸς τοὺς ὑέας τοῦ ἀδελφιδοῦ μου), but also the favor of a benefactor (Ant. 19.235).

¹⁸ Josephus, Ant. 6.276; 7.69, 160, 212; 11.217; 14.162, 216; 15.201; 17.31–32, 179; Life 84.

¹⁹ Josephus, War 6.365; P.Mil.Vogl. 73, 12: ἐπὶ τοσοῦτον πίστιν εὐνοίας μαθοῦσα; P.Oslo 51, 9.

²⁰ P.Oxy. 2227, 5; P.Giss. 56, 14: πασαν σπουδὴν καὶ εὐνοίαν ποιεισθαι; Josephus, Ant. 6.263, 355.

²¹ Aeschylus, Sept. 1007: “Eteocles, by virtue of his devotion (ἐπι εὐνοία) to the country”; Xenophon, Oec. 12.5–7: “without devotion, what good is the knowledge of a chief farmer? . . . the best recipe for inspiring devotion”; cf. Euripides, Hel. 1425: “be devoted!”

²² Philo, Spec. Laws 3.116, 155–156; 4.166; Flacc. 14; To Gaius 59, 286; Josephus, War 1.283: “the devotion that he had always shown them”; 1.667, 670: the soldiers promised their devotion to Archelaus; 2.3; Ant. 6.317; 16.46; 17.194; Life 103; SB 8854, 5; 8855, 4; 8874, 5; 8878, 11; 8883, 24; 9966, 4; 9969, 4; 1012, 5.

²³ Cf. the dedication to a dioiketes “for the devotion that he showed unfailingly toward the king and the queen” (A. Bernand, op. cit., n. XIII, 3); MAMA VI, 115, B 11–12; IGUR, n. 3, 20; 6, 9; cf. 2, 25; 367, 8. Cf. Josephus, Ant. 2.161: τῆς ἀρετῆς ὑμας καὶ τῆς εὐνοίας τῆς περὶ τὸν ἀδελφὸν ἡμῶν; 3.188; 6.292; 7.5.

²⁴ SEG VIII, 532, 7 (= SB 7787). In 5 BC, τοσαύτην εὐνοίαν ἐνδεικνύμενον καὶ φιλοτιμίαν εἰς τοὺς συγγεώργους (SB 8267, 16); SB 8274, 5 (Dittenberger, Or. 99): ἀρετῆς ἔνεκεν καὶ εὐνοίας; 8388, 2; 8389, 8; 9940, 5; 9958, 2; 9959, 4; I.Thas. 165, 5; I.Bulg. 315, 12; especially I.Priene 19, 35; 44, 19, 25; 47, 12; etc. (cf. the index at ἔνεκα and εὐνοία). G. Pfohl, Inschriften der Griechen, Darmstadt, 1972, pp. 159ff.

²⁵ E. Bernand, Fayoum, n. XIII, 7; cf. n. V, 7: dedication of a statue of the epistrategos Apollodoros, by the dignitaries of the court, “on account of the devotion that he showed them” (= SB 1568).

²⁶ I. Delos, 1517, 7–8 (150 BC) = J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. xvii. Epitaph of Apollonius, an officer: “His devotion led him to the hinterlands and to the ocean” (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. v, 5); epitaph of Aphrodisia: “My husband showed me affection and devotion” (ibid., n. xxxv, 18); I. Thas. 169, 15; 172, 29; 231, 3; I. Bulg. 13, 27; 388, 10.

εὐπειθής

eupeithes, open to reason, willing to be persuaded eupeithes, S 2138; EDNT 2.81; MM 263–264; L&N 33.305; BAGD 324; ND 4.152

This biblical hapax occurs in a list of the attributes of true wisdom: “The wisdom from on high is first of all pure (hagne), then peaceful (eirenike), moderate (epieikes; cf. above, pp. 34–38), conciliatory (eupeithes), full of mercy and good fruits” (Jas 3:17). The Vulgate translates suadibilis.

At first glance, it is the opposite of apeithes, “recalcitrant,”¹ and dyspeithes, “difficult to persuade, undisciplined.”² In Plato, it refers to the person who obeys the laws,³ and in Josephus, disciplined troops;⁴ but this obedience becomes more flexible in Philo⁵ and especially in Epictetus, where the wise person is open to reasonable persuasion (3.12.13: eupeithes to logo) and enters “into the role of brother, being deferent, characterized by complaisance (eupeitheia), benevolence in speech.”⁶ Thus eupeitheia in the first century implies goodwill and mutual understanding; it refers not to passive obedience but to an inclination to accept suggestions and conform to them willingly.⁷ In the papyri, eupeithes has the precise nuance of legal agreement or consent. In AD 44, Taorseus agrees to renounce in his half-sister’s favor his share in an old building bequeathed by his mother; she will not file any complaint “because she is in agreement.”⁸ In 58, a woman named Ammonarion and her daughter Ophelous, agreeing to accept from Antiphanus a certain sum of money as a dowry, stipulate: “We are in agreement with each other as to the following: A. and O. have given their consent and have received from Antiphanus . . .”⁹

The connection with epieikes in Jas 3:17 suggests that eupeithes should have a coordinate meaning; wisdom is open to reasons that are supplied; it is willing to be convinced, agrees to follow instructions, strives to be conciliatory. This is how Musonius conceived of it: the eupeithes son listens to his parents’ advice and follows it gladly (hekousios), when the advice is good and feasible.¹⁰ The papyri confirm this meaning: “to be in agreement, to be satisfied.” In an inscription for the ephebia of Bacchias in the second century, “I will see that the gymnasiarch is satisfied when he returns from his voyage.”¹¹ In the third century, a secretary is hired after his responsibilities and compensation have been established: “Valerius is satisfied with the salary and with all the outlays (arrangements for covering his expenses)” (P.Mich. 604, 22). An agreement concerning a substitution in the public service connected with the grain collection: “Aurelius Sarapion . . . is satisfied (eupithes) by Philosarapis regarding all the costs of the grain collection (seitologia)” (eupithes genomenos hypo Philosarapidos peri ton tes seitologias analomaton panton, P.Oxy. 2769, 26); “satisfied with everything done by Sarapion” (eupeithes kata pan gegonos hypo tou Sarapionos, BGU 1130, 5; from 4 BC).

¹ Luke 1:17; Acts 26:19; Rom 1:30; Titus 1:16; 2Tim 3:2. Josephus, War 2.577; Philo, Virtues 15. Eusebius, in Stobaeus, Flor. 46.5.29 (vol. 4, p. 204).

² Josephus, War 2.92: “the character of the people, impatient of all authority and recalcitrant toward their rulers”; Ant. 4.11: in setbacks, large armies become ungovernable and undisciplined.

³ Plato, Leg. 1.632 b: “The legislator . . . must distribute honors to those who obey the laws and inflict fixed punishments on the delinquent (δυσπειθέσι)”; 7.801 d. The constant meaning of εὐπειθεια occurs in 4Macc 5:16—“We recognize no more powerful constraint than that of obedience to our law (πρὸς τὸν νόμον ἡμῶν—ν εὐπειθείας)”; 9:2; 12:6; 15:9—“the virtue of her sons, their obedience to the law, increased all the more the affection” of their mother; cf. 8:6—“I shower benefits on those who obey me (τοὺς εὐπειθοῦντάς μοι).”

⁴ Josephus, War 2.577: since the Romans owed their invincible might to discipline (εὐπειθεία), Josephus tries to make his troops disciplined (εὐπειθές); 3.15; 5.122; Diodorus Siculus 17.53.4; 17.74.3.

⁵ Legislated instructions and directives “press people gently if they are acquiescent (εὐπειθει—ς), roughly if they are intractable (ἀπειθεστέρους)” (Philo, Virtues 15).

⁶ Epictetus 2.10.8; Plutarch, Ages. 2.2: “He showed such a cooperative spirit and such tolerance that it was never fear but honor that made him carry out orders.” Cf. Plato, Leg. 4.718 c: laws should be flexible toward virtue, ὡς εὐπειθεστάτους πρὸς ἀρετὴν εἶναι.

⁷ Cf. the edict from AD 49 reprimanding abuse by government officials: “I am forwarding to you a copy of the letter from the lord prefect with the attached edict, so that when you have seen it you may conform to it (ἴναι—δότες αὐτὰ καὶ εὐπειήτε) and do nothing contrary to its terms” (Dittenberger, Or. 665, 5); cf. Charondas, in Stobaeus, Flor. 44.2.24 (vol. 4, p. 152): πατράσιν εὐπειθοῦντας καὶ σεβομένους.

⁸ P.Mich. V, 351, 16: διὰ τὸ εὐπιθῆ γεγονέναι; P.Mil.Vogl. 26, 5: Dioscoros, persuaded without any compulsion by the buyer Serallion, signs this statement: εὐπειθῆς ὑπὸ τῆς Σεραλλίου γεγονώς, cf. P.Mich. 604, 22; BGU 1163, 7 (17 BC); 1104, 23 and 1155, 17 (10 BC); P.Oxy. 2769, 26; SB 6291, 6.

⁹ P.Oxy. 268, 6: συνχωροῦμεν πρὸς ἀλλήλους ἐ—πὶ τοι—σδε, ὥστε ἡ—Αμμωνάριον καὶ ἡ—Ὀφελοῦς εὐπιθει—ς γεγονυι—αι καὶ ἀπεσχηκυι—αι παρὰ τοῦ—Αντιφάνους.

¹⁰ Musonius, in Stobaeus, Flor. 79.51 (vol. 4, p. 634, 3ff.); cf. C. F. Lutz, Musonius Rufus: “The Roman Socrates” (YCS, vol. 10, 1947), p. 102, 18ff.

¹¹ Edited by R. Coles, New Documentary Papyri from the Fayûm, in JJP, vol. 18, 1974, p. 178.

εὐπερίστατος

euperistatos, surrounding, besetting

euperistatos, S 2139; EDNT 2.81; MM 264; L&N 30.32; BDF §117(1); BAGD 324

Compound forms with euperi- are frequent (-bleptos, -graphos, -koptos, -noetos, -treptos, etc.), but the only occurrence of euperistatos is that in Heb 12:1—the Christian life is compared to an endurance course, and—like every athlete—the believer must cast off on the one hand every load or burden (onkos) that would break his momentum and on the other hand the obstacles that could trip him up, ten euperistaton hamartian.¹

The many translations that have been proposed are all more or less glosses.

(a) The Peshitta (sin is always near us, tajjeb), Theophylact, Bengel, and Moulton-Milligan all see in the verbal adjective a derivative of peristasis in the sense of “regrettable circumstances,”² and they give full force to the article, ten . . . hamartian. This sin which seduces would be the surprise-attack sin that is a constant threat;³ cf. Gen 4:7—“Sin lurks at the door!”

(b) With good reason, following the Vulgate and Theodoret, moderns prefer to see in this adjective a derivative of periistemi (“surround”), not in the passive sense, “which we can easily get rid of, easy to avoid,”⁴ but in the active sense: the sin that encumbers us, that easily envelops us,⁵ that besieges or besets, that easily insinuates its way in through the eyes, the ears, touch, taste, thought.⁶

¹ P46, 1739, some manuscripts of the Old Latin, read εὐπερίσπαστον (cf. 1Cor 7:35), a variant endorsed by F. W. Beare (JBL, 1944, p. 390) and discussed at length by G. Zuntz, The Text of the Epistles, London, 1953, pp. 25ff.

² Cf. περιστασις in the pejorative sense of “calamity, distress”; 2Macc 4:16: “they found themselves in painful circumstances”; the translation by Symmachus of Ps 34:18 (the LXX has θλι—ψις: from all their distresses he delivers them. Cf. Polybius 2.48: θλιβόμενος ὑπὸ τῆς περιστάσεως.) In 168 BC, Isias writes to his brother Hephæstion: “you did not even glance at our miserable condition, εἰ—ς τὴν ἡμετέραν περίστασιν” (P.Lond. 42, 21 = vol. 1, p. 30 = UPZ 59 = Sel.Pap. I, 97). Epictetus 2.6.17: “We call this ‘hard circumstances’”; Marcus Aurelius 9.13: “Today, I have emerged from all trouble, or rather I have cast our all trouble”; cf. ἀπερίστατος, Epictetus 4.1.159: “the example of a man living alone (ἄνδρὸς ἀπεριστάτου) without wife or child to make him bend or turn aside from his plans”; Polybius 6.44: ἀπερίστατοι ῥαστω—ναι; Diodorus Siculus 3.51; cf. F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Hebrews, Grand Rapids, 1964, pp. 349ff.

³ “Potest intelligi occasio peccandi, quae quidem est in omne quod circumstat, scilicet in mundo, carne, proximo, daemone” (“This can be understood as meaning an occasion for sinning, which indeed lies all around: in the world, in the flesh, in neighbor, in demon”—St. Thomas Aquinas, on this text).

⁴ Hesychius, εὐπερίστατον· εὐκόλον, εὐχερῆ; cf. Chrysostom, τὴν εὐκόλως περίστασιν δυναμένην παθει—ν.

⁵ O. Michel, Der Brief an die Hebräer, Göttingen, 1957; H. Montefiore, A Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews, London, 1964, p. 124: “the sins which readily clings to us.” J. Héring (L’Épître aux Hébreux, Neuchâtel, 1954, p. 112) translates “which so easily handicaps us” and notes: “as this verse evokes contests in the stadium, we could compare the verb περιίστημι to the the expression ὑπερβαίνω, which is a technical term for fighters, meaning ‘straddle’ or ‘encircle the legs.’ See DAGR, vol. 3, 2, p. 1340.”

⁶ Theodoret, ὡς εὐκόλως συνισταμένην τε καὶ γινομένην.

εὐποιία

euroiia, beneficence

euroiia, S 2140; EDNT 2.81; MM 264; L&N 88.7; BDF §119(1); BAGD 324; ND 3.68

Whether used for beneficence per se, in association with koinonia (Heb 13:16; cf. Mark 14:7) or for the concrete gifts that beneficence produces, the word offers no difficulty. Julius Pollux, Onom. 5.32.140, offers as synonymns euergeteo, eupoieo, charizomai, doreomai, didomi; but apart from two decrees in honor of Zosimus (I.Priene 112, 19; 113, 76 [84 BC]), euroiia is unknown in the Christian era.¹ As Julius Pollux observes: “For euroiia is not much used; nor have I yet found philodoria in the classical writings” (to gar euroiia, ou lian kekritai; ou de philodorian oupo heuron en tois kekrimenois, ibid.). Philo (Change of Names 24) and Josephus (Ant. 2.261) connect euroiia with euergesia; and Josephus makes the former equivalent to our “charity” or “almsgiving” (Ant. 19.356; 20.52); while Epictetus associates it with justice (in Stobaeus, Flor. 46.5.80; vol. 4, p. 224).

It is attested in the papyri only from the third century, and then most notably in Christian letters.²

¹ Cf. H. Bolkestein, Wohltätigkeit und Armenpflege im vorchristlichen Altertum, p.102.

² P.Oxy. 1773, 34 (republished in M. Naldini, Il Cristianesimo in Egitto, n. 10); P.Lond. 1244, 8 (vol. 3, p. 244: your mother brought me up to date concerning your beneficence; fourth century); P.Oxy. 2194 fifth-sixth century, republished J.O’Callaghan, Cartas cristianas griegas del siglo V, Barcelona, 1963, n. 54). Cf. the pagan letter from the fourth century: “You should know that we have introduced the slave neither under your father nor because of your beneficence” (P.Ross.Georg. III, 8, 9). Cf. I.Perg. 333, 7 (an architect’s invoice): ε—ν βίῳ δὲ καλὸν ἔργον ε—ν μόνον· εὐποιία.

εὐπορέω, εὐπορία

euporeo, to have means; euporia, resources, wealth

euporeo, S 2141; EDNT 2.81; MM 264; L&N 57.27; BDF §101; BAGD 324
| euporia, S 2142; EDNT 2.81; MM 264; L&N 57.32, 57.201; BAGD 324

Euporeo, in biblical Greek, refers to that which is at one's disposal,¹ to have the means or be in a position to do something (cf. Lev 25:26, 49; hiphil of the Hebrew nasag, with "the hand"); and hence "achieve success, succeed" (Wis 10:10). According to Acts 11:29, the disciples at Antioch resolved (horisan) to come to the aid of the brothers in Jerusalem, "each according to his possessions, euporeito tis," meaning "each according to his means."

Such acting according to the possibilities, according to the resources that one possesses, is attested in late papyri; in the eighth century, "whoever detains a kalaphates (fugitive) or hides him will have to pay one thousand solidi, if he has the means" (P.Apoll. 9, 9; cf. PSI 1266, 8); in the sixth century, a mother who suffered and worked to support her daughter no longer has the wherewithal to provide for her (P.Oxy. 1895, 7). The word is used for supplies of food (P.Lond. 1674, 20; Josephus, Ant. 17.214), water (P.Oxy. 2410, 7, AD 120), belts (P.Mich. 464, 18; in AD 99), weapons (Josephus, Life 28), rights that one is able to exercise (P.Ryl. 162, 27; AD 159). In a general sense, euporeo means "be prosperous, rich,"² the nuance being that of our expression "to have means," an ease that allows the free use of one's possessions.

The substantive euporia has only this meaning of "resources, wealth." Demetrius notes in speaking to the silversmiths of Ephesus: "it is from this work that we derive our resources."³ In AD 185, the cosmogrammateus writes to the strategos: "I submit the following names to you as being financially capable of supporting public works."⁴ Nevertheless some of those subjected to such burdens protest, for example Orsenouphis, who protests that he does not have the requisite means: "my resources not having grown from that time until now."⁵

¹ P.Oxy. 1068, 3: "not finding a boat available in the nome of Arsinoè, I ..."; PSI 299, 18; cf. P.Ross.Georg. III, 9, 4: to have the desired opportunity; P.Flor. 367, 8, 17; BGU 2130, 4; SB 9690, 24.

² P.Ryl. 2815, fourth century: a slave or a pauper who prospers greatly (μεγάλως εὐπορήσει) after being destitute; Menander, Dysk. 284: "If you are very rich (ει—σφόδρ εὐπορει—ς), do not trust your riches too much"; 679: "It is especially in this role that a person is revealed, because even while being rich (εὐπορω—ν), he undertakes to be like a pauper"; cf. C. Michel, Recueil, 984, 9 (second century BC): ει—ς ταῦτα προεῖς εὐπορω—ν πλεονάκις ε—κ τω—ν ι—δίων; Dittenberger, Syl. 495, 66: ει—ς δὲ ταῦτα χρείας παρασχέσθαι τοῦς εὐπορουμένους.

³ Acts 19:25—ἡ εὐπορία ἡμι—ν ε—στίν; cf. SB 7696, 70: ὅποταν ἔχη εὐπορίαν; line 101: ὁ τῆς εὐπορίας λόγος; P.Oxy. 2238, 27: the guarantee of our resources and our possessions; P.Grenf. II, 72, 10: ε—ξέσται σοι χρήσασθαι κατὰ παντοίας μου εὐπορείας.

⁴ P.Mich. 536, 10: ὄντας εὐπόρους καὶ ε—πιδιδίους = P.Cair.Isid. 125, 8. On the adjective εὐπόρος (as opposed to ἀπορία, cf. Xenophon, An. 2.5.9), cf. Menander, Dysk. 39: “a young man, son of a father who is quite rich, μάλλ εὐπόρου πατρός”; 807: “enrich (εὐπόρους ποιει—ν) as many people as possible through your own means.” In Egypt, the euporoi are well-to-do people, capable of taking on responsibilities, whereas the aporoι are unable to pay the πορει—αι, the taxes and duties.

⁵ Μηδεμια—ς οὖν μοι, κύριε, εὐπορίας προσγενομένης ε—κ τότε μέχρι νῦν (N. Lewis, Leitourgia Papyri, Philadelphia, 1963, n. V, 39; republished in SB 10196; from AD 180). Cf. P.Phil. I, 46: “in the town, certain leitourgoi found their means exhausted (ε—ξασθηνησάντων), six arourai of royal land were allocated to those of the weavers who were well-to-do (τοι—ς εὐπόροις)”; P.Oxy. 71, col. I, 17: οὐδεμία δέ μοι ε—τέρα εὐπορία ε—στίν ἢ τὰ χρήματα ταῦτα (third century). Josephus, War 7.445: Catullus had the throats cut of “all the Jews who were known for their financial resources, εὐπορία χρημάτων.”

εὐπρέπεια

euprepeia, beauty

euprepeia, S 2143; EDNT 2.82; MM 264; L&N 79.13; BAGD 324

The fortune of the rich is just as uncertain as “the good looks of the face” of the flower that will be dried out by the searing wind: he euprepeia tou prosopou (Jas 1:11). This NT hapax is common in the LXX, where it expresses the majesty of God (Ps 93:1, Hebrew ge’ût; 104:2, hadar), God’s glory (Bar 5:1), the glory of God’s dwelling (2Sam 15:25, naweh; Job 5:24; 36:11, na’îm; Ps 26:8, ma’ôn), of his festivals (Sir 47:10), of his warhorse (Zech 10:3, hōd). Yahweh makes his people to share in his euprepeia (Ezek 16:14; Ps 50:2), and his wisdom is more brilliant (euprepesterá) than the sun (Wis 7:29).

These usages emphasize the brilliance of royal nobility,¹ the charm of beauty,² the splendor of an opulent life.³

¹ Wis 5:16—τὸ βασιλείον τῆς εὐπρεπείας; T. Job 33: νῦν ὑποδείξω ὑμι—ν τὸν θρόνον μου καὶ τὴν δόξαν καὶ τὴν εὐπρέπειαν τὴν οὖσαν ε—ν τοι—ς

ἀγίοις; Dittenberger, Syl. 880, 19: the euprepeia of the θειότατοι αὐτοκράτορες (third century); cf. P.Got. 37, 8: εὐπρεπεστάτου ἄρχοντος (seventh century); P.Mil. 77, 11 = SB 9509 (third century). Cf. Acts Thom. 80: τίνα ε—νθυμηθω— περὶ τῆς σῆς εὐπρεπείας —Ιησοῦ.

² Sir 24:14—“like a lovely olive tree in the plain”; Josephus, Ant. 4.131: the young Hebrews were captivated by the charm of the daughters of the Midianites. Diodorus Siculus 19.2.6: “The child became comely in appearance (τὴν ὄψιν εὐπρεπῆς) and robust in body”; 17.91.5: well conformed; 17.93.3; 17.108.1: an attractive bearing. The chamber of Aseneth was μέγας καὶ εὐπρεπῆς (Jos. Asen. 2.3); she herself was ὡραία καὶ εὐπρεπῆς (ibid. 1.6). In a Christian letter of the fourth century, which seems to allude to Jas 1:23, the person who looks in a mirror and thus knows his own appearance can compare his own perception to what other people say about his looks and his distinction (P.Oxy. 2603, 11; republished by M. Naldini, Il Cristianesimo in Egitto, n. 47; cf. Acts Thom. 36). In Philo, Etern. World 126 and Epictetus 1.8.7, elegance of language is referred to; in Plutarch, Pyrrh. 23.7 an honorable excuse.

³ Cf. εὐπροσωπέω, “cut a fine figure, have a proud bearing” or “make a good appearance, play an attractive role” (Gal 6:12), which many commentators declare to be unknown in secular Greek. A. Deissmann (Light, p. 98) pointed it out in a hexaplaric variant on Ps 141:6 and in the letter of Polemon to his brother Menches, in 114 BC, asking him not to decrease his returns “ὅπως εὐπροσωπώ—μεν, so that we may look good” (P.Tebt. 19, 12); cf. BGU 1787, 12: ε—ὰν δοκιμάζῃς ἀξίαν πρὸς τὴν ἡμετέραν εὐπροσωπίαν.

εὐπρόσδεκτος

euprosdektos, acceptable

euprosdektos, S 2144; TDNT 2.58–59; EDNT 2.82; NIDNTT 3.744, 746; MM 264; L&N 22.44, 25.86; BAGD 324

St. Paul knew the adjective dektos, “accepted, allowed by someone,” used for example with respect to Epaphroditus, who brought him the offering of the Philippians, “a pleasant-smelling perfume, a sacrifice that God receives and finds pleasing.”¹ It is used for a favorable or propitious time (Luke 4:19), and it is thus that the LXX translates by kairo dekte the time of God’s good pleasure, benevolence, favor (be’et rasôn) in Isa 49:8. But when the apostle cites precisely this text in 2Cor 6:2 and comments “Behold, now is the euprosdektos time, now is the day of salvation” (idou

nyn kairos euprosdektos, idou nyn hemera soterias), the choice of the compound form is surely intentional, and it must be given an intensive value (eu-prosdechomai): “Now, at the present, is a very favorable time, the most acceptable time there is.”²

Euprosdektos is used also for goodwill (prothymia), quickness to give, which is “quite well received” by God, whatever the size of the gift (2Cor 8:12); or for the charitable gift (diakonia) of the gentile churches, which was “much appreciated” by the saints at Jerusalem (Rom 15:31; the simple dektos here would be almost nonsensical); but especially for the offering that the pagans constitute, a prosphora that is “very acceptable” to God (Rom 15:16). Spiritual sacrifices are particularly well received by the Lord, thanks to the mediation of Jesus Christ, who secures easy and sure access to God for them.³ The superlative nuance of euprosdektos in the NT is confirmed by its substitution for the simple dektos that qualifies the old sacrifices (Lev 1:3; Isa 56:7) and by the emphasis in 1Tim 2:3—“this is excellent and acceptable (apodekton) in the eyes of God our Savior” (touto kalon kai apodekton enopion tou soteris hemon theou, verse 4). The essential thing is not the preparing and presenting of an offering, but that it pleases the One whom it is intended to honor, and that he accepts it.⁴

¹ Phil 4:18, ὁσμὴν εὐωδίας (Gen 8:21; Exod 29:18; Lev 2:2; Ezek 20:41; Eph 5:2), θυσίαν δεκτὴν, εὐάρεστος τῷ θεῷ. This last adjective is essential with respect to sacrifices, which must “please” God, have his assent, cf. Rom 12:1; Heb 13:16.

² It is not surprising that F and G neglected the compound form and read δεκτός.

³ 1Pet 2:5—εἰς . . . θύσιας εὐπροσδέκτους θεῷ διὰ —Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ. Usually Aristophanes, Pax 1054; but that is actually a late scholium on the text (cf. Plutarch, Praec. ger. rei publ. 801 c). A better citation is the rule about the cult of Men, in Attic, from the second century AD, cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 1042, 8: ε—ὰν δέ τις βιάσηται ἀπρόσδεκτος ἢ θυσία παρὰ τοῦ θεοῦ (republished by LSCG, n. 55); cf. τῶν εὐπρόσδεκτων—κ—ι—ερα—ς (cf. O.Bodl. I, C, 121). —Εὐπρόσδεκτος is not attested in the papyri until the sixth century, in two letters from monks, asking for the “all-holy and acceptable prayers—ε—ν πανοσίαις καὶ εὐπρόσδέκταις εὐχῆς” of their spiritual master (P.Fouad 89, 6; cf. 88, 6).

⁴ E. G. Selwyn, (The First Epistle of St. Peter, London, 1947, p. 162) observes that this acceptance of sacrifices by God was of great importance to the Jews. It was ratified by the fire that sometimes descended upon the victim (Gen 15:17; Lev 9:24) or symbolized by the fire that always burned on the altar (Lev 6:5); cf. Rev 8:3-4.

εὐσχημόνως, εὐσχημοσύνη, εὐσχήμων

euschemonos, honorably, respectably; euschemosyne, propriety, modesty; euschemon, respectable, noble

euschemonos, S 2156; EDNT 2.86; MM 266; L&N 66.4, 88.50; BAGD 327 | euschemosyne, S 2157; EDNT 2.86; MM 266; L&N 79.13; BAGD 327 | euschemon, S 2158; TDNT 2.770–772; EDNT 2.86; MM 266; L&N 79.15, 87.33; BAGD 327

Having a good schema could mean appearance, outward bearing, correct moral conduct, or high social class. The emphasis is sometimes on decent behavior, sometimes on order and beauty, sometimes on respectability and nobility.

St. Paul always insisted that Christians conduct themselves in a worthy and honorable manner, understanding euschemonos in a moral sense—which implies good behavior¹—whether in their private life;² or publicly, so that pagans might be able to appreciate the quality and propriety of their conduct;³ or finally in their assemblies for worship, where everything must be done “decently and in order.”⁴ Euschemosyne is a universally recognized value, at least according to Socrates, who sought only “that which it is honest to do” (to euschemon skopei, Epictetus 4.1.163; cf. 4.12.6); and Hellenistic opuscula and inscriptions vie with each other in praising it. Ps.-Hippocrates wrote a Peri euschemosynes (ed. Littré, vol. 9, pp. 226–244) to demonstrate that this virtue seals the honor and good reputation of the physician.⁵ Clement of Alexandria expects it of women (Paed. 2.31.1.; 2.33.1), with whom it becomes a sort of elegance. “And they made even the residence beautiful and euschemon and worthy of both cities” (epoiesanto de kai ten parepidemian kalen kai euschemona kai axian amphoteron ton poleon, I. Magn. 101, 15; second century BC); the virgins of Athens, in 98–97: “to parade according to the orders in the finest and most euschemon manner.”⁶ So the apostle can justify to the Corinthians his praise of virginity thus and need no further commentary or explanation: “I say this . . . for the sake of propriety, pros to euschemon” (1Cor 7:35). To his mind, it is less a matter of honesty than of dignity and honorableness, almost adornment; or, in any event, of an inclination to be steadily and unremittingly close to the Lord.⁷

Actually, the adjective euschemon is used very frequently in the papyri for a special class of citizens, the most well-thought-of and well-to-do in a town or city.⁸ The euschemones are the prominent people who are liable to support public works (leitourgiai);⁹ then the term becomes something of a title of nobility¹⁰ and finally of mere politeness: “I want to lease from you the property of the noble lady.”¹¹ A neokoros (temple warden) of Sarapis, a former strategos and senator from Alexandria, is described aseuschemon.¹²

It is in this sense that Mark 15:43 describes Joseph of Arimathea as a “distinguished member of the council,” and that the distinguished women of Pisidian Antioch and Berea are mentioned in Acts 13:15; 17:12.

¹ Secular texts often understand εὐσχημοσύνη in the sense of a decent exterior, appropriate behavior. Panthaea “surpassed all the women in the entourage by the nobility of her deportment” (Xenophon, Cyr. 5.1.5). The cupbearer Sacas “pours wine with skill and good manners” (ibid. 1.3.8; cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 717, 14: ἤραντο ται—ς θυσίαις τοῦς βοῦς εὐσχημόνως, 100 BC; I.Priene 55, 14). In this sense, the noble parts of the body, the head or the hands (τὰ δὲ εὐσχήμονα) do not need to be dressed, unlike the less noble members (τὰ ἀσχήμονα ἡμω—ν), which thus become decent (1Cor 12:23-24).

² Rom 13:13—ὡς ε—ν ἡμέρα εὐσχημόνως περιπατήσωμεν. According to the context, this “dignity” which is fitting for broad daylight is contrasted with the carelessness, neglect, and indecency of “night manners.” Cf. Epictetus 2.5.23: “You behaved well in the circumstances (εὐσχημόνως ἀνεστράφης)” is in contrast with ἀσχημοσύνη; Josephus, Ant. 15.102: to behave in a respectable manner in a given situation. Dittenberger, Syl. 1019, 7: ἀναστρέφεται . . . εὐσχημόνως (third century BC); C. Michel, Recueil, 1559, 3, 26 (decrees of the orgeones of the Piraeus, second century BC); SEG XXV, 597, 4: ε—ν τα— ε—πιδαμία τὰν ἀναστροφὰν ε—ποήσαντο εὐσχημόνως. Cf. Prov 11:25—the violent man lacks dignity; Polybius 5.110.11: to retreat without honor (οὐκ εὐσχήμονα).

³ 1Thess 4:12—ἵνα περιπατήτε εὐσχημόνως πρὸς τοὺς ἔξω. Cf. Ep. Arist. 284: “What is the right conduct to adopt in moments of relaxation? . . . To behold the spectacle of worthy and decent scenes from life, τὰ τοῦ βίου μετ’ εὐσχημοσύνης καὶ καταστολῆς”; Epictetus 4.9.11: “Convert yourself to honesty, ἀφελοῦ σαυτὸν εἰ—ς εὐσχημοσύνην.” The favor of Isis confers a life that is honorable or attractive: ἵνεὐσχήμων βίος εἶη (SB 8138, 7; republished V. F. Vanderlip, Four Greek Hymns, p. 17). With respect to children, PSI 1310, 20, 32, 44; cf. P.IFAO III, n. 52, 25. Εὐσχημόνως corresponds to honesta missione (H. J. Mason, Greek Terms, p. 50).

⁴ 1Cor 14:40—πάντα δὲ εὐσχημόνως καὶ κατὰ τάξιν γινέσθω; Musonius 8 (ed. C. E. Lutz, p. 62, 19): τάξιν δὲ καὶ κόσμον καὶ εὐσχημοσύνην περιποιεῖ—; cf. 4Macc 6:2—Eleazar, stripped of his vestments, “remained adorned with the nobility that shines forth from piety”; Dittenberger, Syl.

736, 42: ῥαβδοφόροι δὲ ἔστωσαν . . . ὅπως εὐσχημόνως καὶ εὐτάκτως ὑπὸ τω—ν παραγεγεννημένων πάντα γίνηται (92 BC; rule of the mysteries of Andania, republished by LSCG, n. 65). Honorific decree for a priest of Asclepius (second century BC): πεποιήται δὲ τὴν ἀναστροφὴν εὐσχήμονα καὶ ἀρμόττουσαν τει—ι—ερωσύνει (SEG XVIII, 24, 2; cf. XXI, 464, 9: συνετέλεσαν καλω—ς καὶ εὐσχημόνως). Diodorus Siculus 19.33.2: the women could not decently (εὐσχημόνως) abandon those whom they had first chosen as husbands. In the response of an oracle in the second century: ὁ βίος σου ε—πὶ τὸ βέλτιον ἔστε καὶ εὐσχημόνως τὸ ζῆν ἔξεις (P.Vindob.Sal. 1, 5). Servilia, sister of Cato, behaved no better (εὐσχημονέστερα) than his other sister (Plutarch, Cat. Min. 24.4).

⁵ With its Stoic and Epicurean affinities, this treatise should date to the beginning of the Hellenistic period, cf. C. Préaux, “Médecins de cour dans l’Egypte du IIIe siècle avant J.-C.,” in ChrEg, 1957, p. 314.

⁶ Πεπομπευκέναι κατὰ τὰ προστεταγμένα ὡς ὅ τι κάλλιστα καὶ εὐσχημονέστατα, Dittenberger, Syl. 718, 11; cf. 547, 36: προδιδούς ἀργύριον εἰ—ς ε—σθήτα, αἰεὶ προνοούμενος τω—ν ὑφ’ αὐτὸν τεταγμένων τῆς εὐσχημοσύνης (211 BC); Or. 339, 32; C. Michel, Recueil, n. 545, 9: τό τε ἦθος κοσμιότητι καὶ εὐσχημοσύνη (second century BC); a young girl, Nana, is the subject of an honorific decree by the inhabitants of Kidrama because she sojourned in their city in a worthy manner, διὰ εὐσχήμονα παρ’ αὐτοί—ς ε—πιδημίαν (J. and L. Robert, I.Car., no. 186, 7–8; cf. B. Lifshitz, “Inscriptions grecques d’Olbia,” in ZPE, vol. 4, 1969, p. 247). P.Mich.Zen. 46, 9; P.Cair.Zen. 59360, 6.

⁷ The nuance of beauty or honorableness appears in an honorific decree of the Ilians in favor of Nicandros, epistates of the Poimanenians, ὃς καὶ παραγενόμενος εἰ—ς τὴν πόλιν ἡμω—ν τὴν τε ε—νδημίαν ποιει—ται καλὴν καὶ εὐσχήμονα καὶ ἀξίαν τοῦ τε ἡμετέρου δήμου καὶ τῆς ε—αυτοῦ πατρίδος . . . εὐτάκτον παρέχεται καὶ ἄμεμπτον (I.Ilium, n. 73, 6–10; from 80 BC); cf. BGU 2347, 4; P.Flor. 228, 5: noble, worthy. The adjective εὐσχήμων sometimes has the nuance of “adapted, suited for.” In the second century AD, in a decree of the Athenian cleruchy of Lemnos, with respect to the raising of a statue: ὅπου ἂν δόξη εὐσχημον εἶναι (C. Michel, Recueil, n. 1510, 5).

⁸ BGU 381, 1; 926, 5; (= SB 8444, 6; AD 68): “supplicated by the petitioners . . . most distinguished people as well as well as cultivators of the country, who pleaded . . .”; cf. 1713, 3; title of the recipients of an official notice: εὐσχήμοσι καὶ πρεσβυτέροις (P.Stras. 245, 5); BGU 147, 1: —Ἀρχεφόσις καὶ εὐσχήμοσι κώμης; 926,5: ἵνα παραγενομένων τω—ν κρατίστων εὐσχημόνων μηδεμία μέμψις γένηται. O.Wilck. II, 1153, 3: πέμψατε τοῦς εὐσχήμονας τοῦς ε—πὶ τω—ν παρολκημάτων.

⁹ SB 8267, 20 (5 BC), 7534, 6 (republished Pap.Lugd.Bat. I, 5): “σὺν τοι—ς ε—ξ εὐσχημόνων, with the representatives of the prominent people”; they constitute a board that will supervise a lease; P.Brem. 2, 2; P.Oxy. 212, 23: “the designated prominent persons” (second century BC), e.g., to determine the layout of arable lands (Chrest.Wilck., n. 238, 2). P.Petaus 87, 1; BGU 194, 6; P.Lond. 301, vol. 2, p. 256: ε—ξ εὐσχ[ημόνων]; cf. the expenses incurred for the visit of “their excellencies,” no doubt the owners of an estate (P. J. Sijpesteijn, The Family of the Tiberii Julii Theones, Amsterdam, 1976, n. 7, 5); E. Rabel, W. Spiegelberg, Papyrusurkunden der öffentlichen Bibliothek der Universität zu Basel, Göttingen, 1970, n. II, 5: τοι—ς λοιποι—ς ε—ξ εὐσχημόνων χαίρειν. N. Hohlwein (Termes Techniques, p. 256), gives this definition: “Εὐσχήμων, adjective for anyone with sufficient income to be listed in the category of persons required to undertake liturgical (public service) functions.” These persons can be deleted from the list if their resources diminish.

¹⁰ P.Oxy. 2340, 18: “Epimachos declares that Isidorus is not a weaver but a perfumer, a person of quality, εὐσχήμονα ἄνθρωπον” (cf. H. C. Youtie, Scriptiunculae, pp. 311, 416). In the course of an appearance before the prefect, the sentence is pronounced: ἄξιος μὲν μαστιγωθῆναι, διὰ σεαυτοῦ κατασχὼν ἄνθρωπον εὐσχήμονα καὶ γυναι—καν (P.Flor. 61, 61; in AD 86–88); Dittenberger, Syl. 795 A 5: τὴν παρεπιδημίαν ε—ποίησατο εὐσχήμονα καὶ ἀξίαν τειμῆς (AD 29).

¹¹ RechPap, vol. 3, p. 64, line 5; cf. p. 56, line 11; p. 58, line 13: “for the account of the noble Antonius Philoxenos”; P.Flor. 16, 20; PSI 1310, 20, 32, 44 (second century BC); L. Robert, Documents, pp. 74–75. Εὐσχήμων is the title of a magistrate, the keeper of good order in the city (P.Ryl. 236, 15; P.Mich. 620, 41, 224, 272, 285).

¹² P.Alex. 12, 11, 17 (on the title κυρία given to a wife, mother, sister, aunt, etc., cf. A. C. Bancy, The Greek Christian Inscriptions of Crete, Athens, 1970, p. 70); cf. P.Yale 83, 16; P.Oxy. 2986, 12 (the editors translate “gentleman”); P.Lund IV, 13, 18; P.Athen. 56, 6 (the editor gives papyrological references p. 393); P.Hamb. 37, 7: Claudius Antoninus, σὺ γὰρ ἀληθινὸς φιλόσοφος καὶ εὐσχήμων γεγένησαι (second century AD); I.Magn. 164, 3: honorific decree of Moschion, ἄνδρα φιλότειμον καὶ ε—νάρεγον καὶ ἀπὸ προγόνων εὐσχήμονα καὶ ἦθει καὶ ἀγωγῇ κόσμιον. G. E. Bean, T. B. Mitford, Cilicia, n. 12 a 13): ἄνδρα εὐσχήμονα καὶ πρω—τον τῆς πόλεως; cf. ibid. b 4: ἀνὴρ εὐσχήμων καὶ ἀγαθός. At Iotape, a young man is honored: τάγματος βουλευτικοῦ, ἔτι καὶ πολείτην Σιδητω—ν, γονέων εὐσχημονεστάτων καὶ φιλοτειμών, ἀρετῆς ἕνεκεν καὶ εὐνοίας τῆς ει—ς ε—αυτόν (CIG 4412 b, cited by L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 13, p. 49). In a weaker sense, a cottage may be said to be “solid and good-looking” (Philostratus, Gym. 35). In sum, εὐσχημοσύνη is as much the fruit of family training (C. Panagopoulos, Vocabulaire, p. 212) as a civic virtue (ISE, n. 33, 25–26).

εὐτραπελία

eutrapelia, lively humor, wittiness, mocking derision

eutrapelia, S 2160; EDNT 2.86; MM 266; L&N 33.34; BAGD 327

Eph 5:4—“Obscenity (aischrotes), foolish talk (morologia), and eutrapelia . . . are improper (ouk aneken).” Thanksgiving (eucharistia) is to be preferred. All the commentators understand the apostle to be forbidding buffoonery and nonsense in conversation, but what exactly is eutrapelia (Old Latin and Vulgate: scurrilitas)? This NT hapax is unknown in the LXX and the papyri and is sometimes used in secular texts in a positive sense, sometimes negative.¹

Derived from trepomai, the adjective eutrapelos means literally “turning easily,” hence “supple, agile; versatile, treacherous” and “supple of mind, quick with a comeback,” which may mean either “of lively humor” or “mocking, derisive.” The first occurrences are pejorative: “Do not be duped, friend, by treacherous gain” (me dolothēs, o philei, kerdēs in eutrapelōis, Pindar, Pyth. 1.92); “I am twenty years old and have never spoken a word or done a deed that was improper” (oute ergon out’ epos eutrapelon, Pyth. 4.105; textual variant, entrapelon). Likewise Aristophanes: “Without pretext or specious reason (oute tin’ echon prophasin oute logon eutrapelon) you claim to rule alone” (Vesp. 469); and Isocrates: “They worked at being serious and not playing the buffoon (semnynesthai . . . ou boumolocheuesthai). Jokers and those who know how to mock (tous eutrapelous de kai tous skoptein dynamenous), who are now described as gifted (euphyeis), were regarded at that time as victims of fate” (Areop. 7.49). But this same Isocrates makes eutrapelia a spiritual and literary quality “that contributes not a little to education in speech” (Antid. 15.296).

Hippocrates recommends that physicians try wittiness (echein tina eutrapelien), because severity (to austeron) disheartens healthy folk and sick folk alike (Decent. 7). Plato observes that “the old, to try to please the young, make themselves light-hearted and funny (eutrapelias te kai charientismou empimplantai), and imitate them in order not to seem dour and authoritarian (aedeis einai mede despotikoi).”²

Aristotle, in defining the object of wittiness (namely, pleasure in moments of distraction), showed that there is eutrapelia and eutrapelia in the course of making this quality a virtue of the golden mean that cannot exist without tact and perspicacity:

_EXTRACT = Since life includes rest as well as activity, and in this is included leisure and amusement, there seems here also to be a kind of intercourse which is tasteful; there is such a thing as saying—and again listening to —what one should and as one should. The kind of people one is speaking or listening to will also make a difference. Evidently here also there is both an excess and a deficiency as compared with the mean. Those who carry humour to excess are thought to be vulgar buffoons (bomolochoi kai phortikoi), striving after humour at all costs, and aiming rather at raising a laugh than at saying what is becoming and at avoiding pain to the object of their fun; while those who can neither make a joke themselves nor put up with those who do are thought to be boorish and unpolished (agroikoi kai skleroi). But those who joke in a tasteful way are called ready-witted, which implies a sort of readiness to turn this way and that (hoi d'emmelos paizontes eutrapeloi prosagoreuontai, hoion eutropoi); for such sallies are thought to be movements of the character, and as bodies are discriminated by their movements, so too are characters. The ridiculous side of things is not far to seek, however, and most people delight more than they should in amusement and in jesting, and so even buffoons are called ready-witted because they are found attractive (kai hoi bomolochoi eutrapeloi prosagoreuontai hos charientes); but that they differ from the ready-witted man, and to no small extent, is clear from what has been said.

_EXTRACT = To the middle state belongs also tact (epidexiotes); it is the mark of a tactful man to say and listen to such things as befit a good and well-bred man; for there are some things that it befits such a man to say and to hear by way of jest, and the well-bred man's jesting differs from that of a vulgar man, and the joking of an educated man from that of an uneducated. One may see this even from the old and the new comedies; to the authors of the former indecency of language (aichrologia) was amusing, to those of the latter innuendo is more so; and these differ in no small degree in respect of propriety. Now should we define the man who jokes well (ton eu skoptonta) by his saying what is not unbecoming to a well-bred man, or by his not giving pain, or even giving delight, to the hearer? Or is the latter definition, at any rate, itself indefinite, since different things are hateful or pleasant to different people? The kind of jokes he will listen to will be the same; for the kind he can put up with are also the kind he seems to make. There are, then, jokes he will not make; for the jest is a sort of abuse (to gar skomma loidorema ti estin), and there are things that lawgivers forbid us to abuse; and they should, perhaps, have forbidden us even to make a jest of such. The refined and well-bred man, therefore, will be as we have described, being as it were a law to himself.

_EXTRACT = Such, then is the man who observes the mean, whether he be called tactful or ready-witted (eit' epidexios eit' eutrapelos legetai). The buffoon (bomolochos), on the other hand, is the slave of his sense of humour, and spares neither himself nor others if he can raise a laugh, and says things none of which a man of refinement would say, and to some of which he would not even listen. The boor (agroikos), again, is useless for such social intercourse; for he contributes nothing and finds fault with everything. But relaxation and amusement are thought to be a necessary element in life.³

In Rh. 2.12.1389b10–12, Aristotle gives this definition: “The young love laughter and so are also witty (philogelotes, dio kai eutrapeloi); wit is insolence tempered by education” (he gar eutrapelia pepaideumene hybris estin).⁴

Then eutrapelia becomes a mental refinement and a character trait commonly attributed by historians to their heroes. At Sparta, Cleomenes was eutrapelotatos in his private relations.⁵ The tyrant Dionysius of Syracuse could not help smiling at a funny remark (dia ten eutrapelian) by Philoxenus (Diodorus Siculus 15.6.4); Agathocles was a naturally witty character (20.3.3); Sulla said jokingly (eutrapeleuomenos) that he was always sure of winning the war (38–39.7). Plutarch recalls the charm of Antony’s humor (he peri tes paidias kai tas homilias eutrapelia, Ant. 48.5) and recalls in De virt. mor. 2.441 b that Chrysippus made a virtue of wittiness (eutrapelias aretas), alongside affability (euapantesias). “The Persians joked with each other on matters about which it was more agreeable to be teased than not. . . . How not to admire the refinement and wit of these men whose very mockeries pleased and charmed those to whom they were addressed” (agasthai ten eutrapelian, Quaest. conv. 2.1.1692 e-f). Similarly, Philo reports that at Gaius’s question, “Why do you abstain from pork? there was a great burst of laughter from his adversaries: Some laughed because they were truly amused, while others, with calculating flattery, pretended to find that he had spoken with wit and grace” (syn eutrapelia kai chariti).⁶¹ Philo, To Gaius 361; cf. Josephus, Ant. 12.173—Ptolemy Epiphanes took pleasure in the young man’s charm and wit (τῆ χάριτι καὶ τῆ εὐτραπελίᾳ νεανίσκου); 12.214: King Hyrcanus admired the cleverness of a reply (τῆς εὐτραπελίας ἀποδεχόμενος αὐτόν).{NOTEEND}

From this collection of texts—there are hardly any others before the Christian era—we can see that eutrapelia took on a more and more favorable sense, apparently the opposite of its Pauline meaning, but we must not forget the primitive pejorative sense of the word, and especially Aristotle’s observations: eutrapelia is a form of hybris and cannot be virtuous except among people who have tact and are well-bred; otherwise, it is unwholesome and tends to vulgarity, even obscenity. This distinction was noted in the first century in Plutarch’s words about Cicero: “His facility for sarcasm and eutrapelia was seen as a virtue and an attractive feature of his court speeches, but he used it to excess, thus injuring a number of people and gaining a reputation for meanness” (Cic. 5.6). There can be no doubt that the apostle—God knows he had a sense of humor,⁷²Cf. J. Jónsson, Humour and Irony in the New Testament, Reykjavik, 1965.{NOTEEND} and he had told the Colossians that their language should be “seasoned with salt” (Col 4:6)—intended to debar God’s children from this habitual lack of brotherly love and decency. Certainly his correspondents understood him.⁸

³ P. W. van der Horst, “Is Wittiness Unchristian? A Note on εὐτραπελία in Eph. V, 4,” in T. Baarda, A. F. J. Klijn, W. C. van Unnik, Miscellanea Neotestamentica, vol. 2, Leiden, 1978, pp. 163–190.

⁴ Plato, Resp. 8.563 a. Cf. Thucydides 2.41.1: A personality complete enough to be equal “to so many roles and show in them such graceful adaptability” (μετὰ χαρίτων μάλιστ’ ἂν εὐτραπέλως).

⁵ Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 4.8.1127b34–1128b4 (trans. W. D. Ross, in Richard McKeon, ed., The Basic Works of Aristotle, New York, 1941, pp. 1000–1001); 8.3.115a13–14 (one kind of friendship is the appreciation of the other not for what he is in himself but insofar as he is useful or amusing); 8.4.1157a3–6 (good friends are amusing absolutely speaking and also for each other); 8.6.1158a30–33; Aristotle, Eth. Eud. 3.7.1234a4–23; 7.5.1240a2–3. St. Thomas Aquinas took over this doctrine from Aristotle: there can be virtue with regard to jesting (II-III q. 168, a. 2); abstinence from jesting is a vice (a. 3).

⁶ Cf. Aristotle, Rh. 2.13.1390a21–23: old men “do not like wittiness and laughter; loving to lament is the opposite of loving to laugh.”

⁷ Polybius 9.23.3; cf. 12.16.15: “With this witticism (eutrapeleusamenos) the young man brightened up the audience”; 23.5.7. According to the rhetor Demetrius of Phalerum, the Attic dialect has something well-turned and popular (συνεστραμμένον τι ἔχει καὶ δημοτικὸν) that makes it apt for the expression of witticisms (καὶ ται—ς τοιαύταις εὐτραπελίαις πρέπον, Eloc. 3.177); cf. 3.172: when nicknames imply a comparison, they can provide a play on words, ἢ γὰρ ἀντίθεσις εὐτράπελος.

⁸ Sins of language were severely punished at Qumran. 1QS 7.9: “One who utters an obscenity [shall be punished] for three months.”

εὐχομαι, εὐχή

euchomai, to affirm, vow; pray; eucho, vow, votive offering, wish, prayer

euchomai, S 2172; TDNT 2.775–806; EDNT 2.88–89; NIDNTT 2.861–862, 867, 873; MM 268; L&N 25.6, 33.178; BDF §§67(1), 180(4), 187(4), 359(2), 392(1c); BAGD 329 | eucho, S 2171; TDNT 2.775–806; EDNT 2.88–89; NIDNTT 2.861, 867; MM 268; L&N 33.178, 33.469; BAGD 329; ND 3.65

There may be diverse uses of euchomai, relating to vows, promises, wishes, or prayers, but the basic meaning is to affirm out loud, to make a solemn declaration.¹ It appears for the first time, with one legal exception, in the Mycenaean form e-u-ke-to in a Pylos Linear B tablet: “Eritha the priestess has and protests that she has a frank fee in the name of her god.”² This is a claiming of property rights.

In a secular context, the nuances are multiple. The most common construction (euchomai followed by the infinitive) means (a) to affirm boldly and proudly: “We affirm proudly (we flatter ourselves) that we are more valorous than our fathers” (Homer, Il. 4.405); Athena to Ares: “I boldly affirm (I flatter myself) that I am stronger than you”;³ (b) to make oneself known: “Behold my race, the blood of which I boast to be an offspring” (Il. 6.211; 20.424); “I have the honor of being the son of wise Antiochus”;⁴ (c) to boast and glorify oneself: “None of the Danaeans can boast to have held his horses ahead . . .” (Il. 8.253–254); “no one dares boast to contend with you.”⁵

In a religious context, the meanings of euchomai are just as nuanced: (a) make a vow or promise (in order to obtain a favor): “Make a vow (to Lycian Apollo) to sacrifice a hecatomb of first-born lambs” (Il. 4.101; Od. 17.49); “Anacharsis vowed to the mother (of the gods) to offer her a sacrifice”;⁶ (b) express a vow as a prayer: the priestess Theano, “addressed this prayer as a suppliant to the daughter of great Zeus” (Il. 6.304; 311–312); “Pallas Athena heard their prayer” (10.295); “Thus he prayed, and Athena heard him” (Od. 3.385); (c) prayer of request: “to pray is to address requests to the gods” (to d’euchesthai aitein tous theous);⁷ “Poseidon, when I pray you do not refuse to carry out what we want”;⁸ (d) wish: “A man wishes that someone close to him will remain in his house to protect it against misfortune”;⁹ (e) give thanks: when the divinity has acted, thanksgiving is expressed in prayer; “Let us go offer thanksgiving in the assembly of the gods” (euchomenai theion, Homer, Il. 7.298); the Greeks, learning of the enemy’s shipwreck, address prayers to Poseidon Soter;¹⁰ (f) finally, to invoke, pray (with no further specifics): “when the king had prayed” (Il. 19.257); “the prayer to Father Zeus was completed.”¹¹ If sometimes prayer is silent,¹² it is normally spoken aloud¹³ and is heard (Il. 16.236; Aeschylus, Cho. 720), because it rises to the level of a cry¹⁴ and is even accompanied by tears (Il. 8.364; Od. 9.294).

In the Hellenistic period, the polyvalence of euchomai is reduced, but its religious use is accentuated and even becomes “canonical” in the inscriptions, and above all in cultic rules, where prayers are made, for example, for the senate, the people of Rome and of Ephesus,¹⁵ and sometimes with a nuance of thanksgiving (euxachariston: “following his vow and giving thanks,” I.G.L.S. 2744; cf. I.Bulg. 1184, 1476); but by far the most common sense is “vow”: “by carrying out our vows for the salvation of all of them” (I.G.L.S. 1322–1328, 1337, 1336); “Asianus completed this edifice according to the vow that he had made” (2006; cf. 2039); “Valerianus . . . following his vow, raised this column at his own expense.”¹⁶ The formula euxamenos anetheken (having vowed, he offered) is used in dedications.¹⁷

In the papyri, our verb is used only in official or private correspondence, first of all at the beginning of the letter, where the author prays for the recipient: euchomai to theo (P.NYU 25, 2; P.Oxy. 3314, 3), te theia (Pap.Brux. XVII, p. 94). Often, the prayer is linked with an act of worship (proskynema, P.Oxy. 2598 a 2–4; b 2–3; P.Genova 49, 3); its object is almost always the good health of the recipient: “I pray that you are well.”¹⁸ Christians took over this usage¹⁹ as a matter of politeness, and euchomai often retains the sense “wish.”²⁰ This latter meaning seems to be that of the formula errosthai se (hymas) euchomai, which recurs endlessly in the letters; it is no longer a prayer (at least not usually) but a wish: “I wish you good health.”²¹

The LXX uses the verb often, but knows barely two meanings for it: either “pray,” in the sense of implore, supplicate,²² or intercede;²³ or “utter a vow.”²⁴ The same meanings occur in Philo, though the uttering of vows is rarer,²⁵ while “pray and supplicate” recur frequently with respect to God,²⁶ together with sacrifice (Unchang. God 8; Plant. 161–162; Decalogue 72) and the blessing of the people (Change of Names 127), sometimes with a nuance of thanksgiving.²⁷ The emphasis is on the “request” in prayer.²⁸ But while the LXX does not use euchomai in the sense of “wish,” Philo does so often: “Joseph wished to raise his subordinates to the level of blameless folk.”²⁹

The six occurrences of the verb in the NT confirm its decline;³⁰ it is unknown in the Gospels. In 3John 2 (“I hope that you are prospering in every way and are well”), the present euchomai and its object are in complete conformity with the epistolary papyri (cf. above). Its banal (if we may put it so) meaning of “prayer” or “request” is only found twice in the NT.³¹ The three other texts express a desire or wish: during the storm, the sailors wished or were calling out their desire (durative imperfect euchonto) that the day would come (Acts 27:29). During his appearance before King Agrippa, St. Paul cries out, “Would God (euxaimen an to theo) that you might become as I am, except for these chains” (Acts 26:29). The verb here is an aorist optative middle. We know that the optative is a potential mood for the uncertain future and for wishes, here an optative of courtesy (euxaimen an = “I would like to pray God”).³² After the fashion of Moses’ pleading for Israel (Exod 32:32), St. Paul does not hesitate to sacrifice all for his compatriots: “I would wish to be anathema myself for my brothers, for my kinsmen according to the flesh” (Rom 9:3). Here, the imperfect has the value of an optative: “I would wish, if it were possible. . . .”³³

Euche. — This abstract noun (naming an action expressed by euchomai) occurs only once in Homer (Od. 10.525), but it is common in classical Greek in its first meaning, “vow” and “votive offering”;³⁴ this is the predominant meaning in the LXX,³⁵ which uses the word for religious obligations,³⁶ a votive offering (Deut 12:17), sacrifices (Lev 22:21, 23, 29; Num 15:3, 8; 29:39; Jer 11:15; Mal 1:14), and Nazirite consecration to God.³⁷ This is the vow made by St. Paul (eichen euchen, Acts 18:18) and four other men (Acts 21:23).

Euche often means “wish”: “For young people action, for adults deliberation, for old men wishes” (Hesiod, frag. 220); “Such are my wishes for us.”³⁸ This is the commonest meaning in the papyri: “so strong is my desire to greet you” (P.Mich. 494, 6); “My wish, master, is to carry out my service at your feet” (P.Rein. 113, 5; BGU 531, 5), “the desire of the debtors is to supply wine” (P.Michael. 29, 18). Then euche is used for a prayer of entreaty.³⁹ A usage that is found only rarely in the LXX,⁴⁰ but commonly in Philo:⁴¹ euche is defined as “a prayer (aitesis) addressed to God in order to obtain goods” (Unchang. God 87; cf. Sacr. Abel and Cain 53). Thus “wish-prayers” were made for others,⁴² notably for the emperor.⁴³ One of the duties of priests of Dionysus in the second century BC consisted of praying: “and he shall pray prayers for the city of the Prieniens” (kai tas euchas euxetai hyper tes poleos tes Prieneon).⁴⁴ According to Jas 5:15, the prayer of faith (he euche tes pisteos), made by the elders of the church, will save the sick person.⁴⁵

¹ Pindar, Ol. 6.53: “They affirmed aloud that they had never seen or heard the child.” “The thematic present εὐχομαι is identical to the Avestan aoÊaite, ‘announce solemnly, invoke,’ Sanskrit ôhate, ‘boast, praise oneself, etc.’” (P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique, p. 389; A. Corlu, Recherches sur les mots relatifs à l’idée de prière d’Homère aux tragiques, Paris, 1966, pp. 17–18; L. C. Muellner, The Meaning of Homeric εὐχομαι through its Formulas, Innsbruck, 1976, pp. 107–140); J. K. Elliott, “Temporal Augment in Verbs with Initial Diphthong in the Greek New Testament,” in NovT, 1980, p. 6. Cf. Z. Ritoók, “Εὐχομαι,” in Acta Antiqua Academiae Scientiarum Hungaricae, Budapest, 1955, vol. 3, pp. 287–299; A. Citron, Semantische Untersuchung zu σπένδεσθαι–σπένδειν–εὐχεσθαι, Winthertur, 1965; A. W. Adkins, “Εὐχομαι, εὐμολή and εὐχος in Homer,” in Classical Quarterly, 1960, pp. 20–33.

² PY, Ep 704, 5 and Eb 297, 1. Cf. C. Gallavotti, A. Sacconi, Inscriptiones Pyliae, Rome, 1961, p. 56; J. L. Perpillou, “La Signification du verbe εὐχομαι dans l’épopée,” in Mélanges de linguistique et de philologie grecque offerts à Pierre Chantraine, Paris, 1972, pp. 169–182. Cf. the legal context in Homer, Il. 18.499, where the murderer is face to face with the victim’s parent (lex talionis): “Two men discuss the blood price for another man who has been killed. One solemnly affirms that all has been paid (ὁ μὲν εὐχετο πάντ’ ἀποδοῦναι) and so declares to the people” (analysis in A. Corlu, Recherches, pp. 331–336; L. C. Muellner, Meaning, pp. 100–106).

³ Il. 21.411 (cf. Od. 5.211); 23.669: “I flatter myself that I am the best”; Od. 3.362: “I have the honor of being an elder, and the only one” (cf. Il. 9.60, 161); 5.450; 16.67; 22.321; 24.114; Achilles: “I pride myself on being of the generation of Zeus” (Il. 21.187; cf. 5.246; 14.113); “I am the son of Zeus; I glory that I am Apollo” (Ps.-Homer, H.Apol. 1.480; cf. Il. 13.54); “I boast that I am her handsome young husband” (Il. 8.190); Plato, Grg. 449 a; Aeschylus, Suppl. 536; Anth. Pal. 10.15.7.

⁴ Od. 1.180; cf. 187; 14.199; 15.425: “I am from Sidon, the great bronze market”; 24.269; Euripides, frag. 696, 3; Sophocles, OC 59.

⁵ Il. 5.173; cf. 1.91; 2.82; 3.430; 13.447: “See who will teach you to boast too highly, poor fool”; 15.296; 16.844; 21.476; Pindar, Ol. 7.23; Aeschylus, Ag. 1341: “Who then could boast? . . .”; Aeschylus, Suppl. 19, 313; Euripides, Heracl. 563: “I am truly born of the father of whom I boast”; Sophocles, OT 894: “Can such a man, so desperate, still boast he can save his life from the flashing bolts of god?”; OC 1318: “Capaneus boasts that he will raze Thebes”; Polybius 5.43.2: “Mithridates glorifies himself.”

⁶ Herodotus 4.76; Aeschylus, Ag. 933: “Would you, in danger, make such a vow to the gods?”; Aristophanes, Av. 1618: “after vowing a sacrifice to some divinity”; Xenophon, An. 4.8.25; Dittenberger, Syl. 181, 6 (from 362–1). In epigraphy, the vow frequently consists in an offering pleasing to the divinity: εὐξάμενος δεκάτην (“having promised the tithe,” I.Delos 17; IG 12, 627; cf. 529; 543; 623; 684; etc.).

⁷ Plato, Euthphr. 14 c; Homer, Od. 3.394, 446; 13.231; Il. 1.450, 457; 16.231, 249; Herodotus 1.31; 7.54; Hesiod, Op. 465.

⁸ Homer, Od. 3.56; 3.47: “He must also pray the immortals”; 15.353: “Laertes prays Zeus each day to extinguish life in his members”; Il. 18.75; 24.287: “Make a libation to Father Zeus; ask him that you may come back home from your enemies”; Pindar, Pyth. 8.67; Nem. 9.54; Sophocles, Aj. 393; Menander, Dysk. 661: “You other women, make libations for their safety and pray that the old man may be saved”; Dittenberger, Syl. 352, 7; 1025, 19; Or. 214, 20: βούλομαι καὶ ὑμεῖς— εὐχέσθε; 378, 8.

⁹ Homer, Il. 14.484; cf. Od. 14.463; 21.211: “I did not hear any of the others wish for my return home.” This meaning is developed more and more; Herodotus 1.27; Theognis 1155; Pindar, Pyth. 4.293; Nem. 8.37; Sophocles, Ant. 641; Euripides, Alc. 669: “It is in vain that old men wish to die”; Dittenberger, Syl. 1176, 4. An Alexandrian graffito: εὐχομαι καὶ γὰρ ε—ν τάχῃ σὺν σοὶ εἶναι (in Moulton-Milligan, on this word).

¹⁰ Herodotus 7.192; cf. Aeschylus, Suppl. 980; above all, after victory (Euripides, El. 764); hence the nuance of resounding triumph with εὐχομαι used absolutely (Homer, Il. 5.106; 13.519; 14.486, 500; 21.183).

¹¹ Il. 16.253; Od. 3.56; Ps.-Homer, H. Apol. 1.238, 492, 495, 510; Ps.-Homer, H. Diosc. 9; Hesiod, Op. 738; Herodotus 2.65; Sophocles, OC 41.

¹² Prayer made “without opening the mouth” (Homer, Il. 7.195), “in his heart” (23.769; Od. 5.444).

¹³ Homer, Il. 1.450; 3.275, 296ff.; 7.200ff. Demosthenes: “The first prayer, Athenians, that I address to all the gods and all the goddesses (πρω—τον εὐχομαι), is that in the present debate you will reserve for me such sympathy as I have unfailingly shown for the state and for you all” (Corona 1); cf. Acts 26:29.

¹⁴ Homer, Od. 8.305; 12.124; Herodotus 7.191.

¹⁵ LSCGSup, n. 121, 15: εὐχέσθαι ὑπὲρ ι—ερα—ς; cf. n. 6, 5 and 11; 14, 33; LSCG, n. 46, 20: εὐχονται τὸν ι—ερέα ; 72, 7; 151 A 18 (cf. J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1964, p. 217, n. 421); MAMA, VI, 124: εὐξάμενος τοι—ς θεοι—ς; IGLS 625: εὐξάμενος τω— θεω— ὑπὲρ σωτηρίας αὐτοῦ; 674: “Pray for us”; 727: “for me”; T. Drew-Bear, Phrygie, n. III, 3: εὐξάμενοι περὶ τω—ν ι—δίων πάντων σωτηρίας. Cf. Xenophon, Cyr. 7.1.1: οἱ— εὐξάμενοι τοι—ς θεοι—ς; Epictetus 1.29.37: εὐχονται τω— θεω—; Plutarch, Per. 8.6.

¹⁶ IGLS 2152; cf. 2205, 2729, 4036, 4037. Cf. B. Lifshitz, Synagogues juives, n. 18: “I, Aurelius Polyippos, being pious and having made a vow, have carried it out”; n. 76: “. . . had this done to carry out a vow”; CII 683, 12 and 684, 18: at Panticapaeum, a mistress gives freedom to her slave in fulfillment of a vow. In the third century BC, the people of Ilium decide to offer their vows (εὐξασθαι) and sacrifices for the success of the campaign of King Antiochus I, the queen, friends, and troops. These vows are to be presented by the priestess to the village goddess, Athena Ilias, by the hieronomoi and the prytaneis (Dittenberger, Or. 219 = I.Ilium, n. XXXII, 20, 25; cf. L. Robert, “Sur un décret d’Ilion et sur un papyrus concernant les cultes royaux,” in Essays in Honor of C. B. Welles, New Haven, 1966, pp. 175–210). Similarly in AD 37, the people of Assos designate five delegates who will formulate vows to Capitoline Jupiter for the health and prosperity of Emperor Caligula (ὕπὲρ τῆς σωτηρίας εὐξάμενοι) and will offer a sacrifice in the name of their city (Dittenberger, Syl. 797, 32 = I.Assos, n. 26). Cf. Josephus, War 2.179, 313; 3.382; 5.28; 7.8, 67, 316; Ant. 17.127; 20.27.

¹⁷ CIRB 35, 2; 1015, 1; 1043, 2; 1048, 7; 1115, 6; 1239, 8; 1260, 24; I.Bulg. 539, 561, 770, 1709, 1807, 1819, 1859, 2025, 2065, etc. I.Gonn. 160 (a dedication to Apollo), 164–166, 169, 171, 174, 179, 183 (to Artemis).

¹⁸ P.Aberd. 71, 3; P.Mert. 28, 3; 81, 2; 82, 2, 3, 5; 85, 2; P.Yale 78, 3; P.Wisc. 71, 3; 72, 4; P.Oslo 52, 3; P.Alex. 24, 3; 30, 4; BGU 1673, 3; P.Laur. 20, 3. Cf. P.Lond. 2193, 9: σπένδοντες εὐχέσθωισαν (= SB 7835).

¹⁹ P.Got. 11, 8: “I hope that you are well in the Lord”; 13, 15; P.Fouad 89, 19: “I do not cease day and night to pray Christ our Master for the safety and preservation of our good master.”

²⁰ P.Phil. 34, 7: “We greet you and send you our best wishes”; 34, 12: “My brother . . . I greet you and wish you prosperity and happiness”; 35, 2: “above all, I hope that you are well”; P.Fouad 77, 3; P.Rein. 118, 4; P.Mert. 63, 18: εὐχόμετά σε ἵνα καλω—ς ἔχην (AD 58).

²¹ Letter of a governor of Achaëa (SEG XI, 121, 17); P.Achm. 8, 19 and 34; P.Athen. 69, 7; P.Ant. 31, 13; 43, 24; 192, 18; BGU 1568, 17; 1671, 19; 1676, 17; P.Bon. 44, 9; 46, 13; P.Panop.Beatty 1, 147; 2, 9; etc.; P.Erl. 113, 112; 116, 17; P.Fouad 78, 10; 81, 13; Pap.Lugd.Bat. VI, 15, 41 and 96; 42, 33; P.Oxf. 2, 41; 3, 14; 18, 8; P.Mich. 622, 15; P.Wisc. 63, 3; P.Köln 106, 9; 108, 16; P.Petaus 17, 15 and 21; 18, 7 and 16; 20, 11; P.Oslo 52, 22; 54, 10; P.Yale 79, 28; 83, 27; 84, 9; O.Amst. 23, 12; P.Rein. 110, 13; 112, 12; 114, 7; 115, 18; 118, 18: “I wish that you may be well for a long time” (as P.Oxy. 2982, 27; 3065, 21; 3147, 25; 3314, 24; Pap.Brux. XVII, p. 95), etc.

²² Hebrew ‘atar; Exod 8:4, 5, 24, 25, 26; 9:28, 10:18; Job 22:27—“You will call upon him and he will answer you”; 33:26; Wis 7:7—“I prayed (εὐξάμην). I implored (ε—πεκαλεσάμην)”; Sir 34:24—“one prays, the other curses”; 38:9—“Pray to the Lord and he will heal you.” 2Macc 12:44—the expiatory sacrifice is a prayer for the dead; 15:17; T. Abr. A 5.

²³ The hithpael of the Hebrew verb palal: “Moses interceded with Yahweh” (Num 11:2; cf. 21:7; Deut 9:20, 26; 2Kgs 20:2); “Job will intercede for you” (Job 42:8, 10; 4Macc 4:11, 13; Par. Jer. 2.3).

²⁴ Hebrew nadar: such as Jacob (Gen 28:20; 31:13; cf. Num 6:2, 21; 21:2; 30:3-4; Lev 27:8; Deut 12:11, 17; 23:22-24; Isa 19:21; Jonah 1:16; 2:10); Jephtha (Judg 11:30); Anna (1Sam 1:11); David (Ps 132:2); Absalom (2Sam 15:7-8). “Perform your vows and carry them out” (Ps 76:11; cf. Eccl 5:3-4; Sir 18:23; 2Macc 9:13); cf. the hiphil of the Hebrew pala’: “When a man fulfills a vow” (Lev 27:2).

²⁵ Philo, Alleg. Interp. 1.17; Unchang. God 164; Husbandry 175; Drunkenness 2; Prelim. Stud. 99; Flight 115; Moses 1.252; Spec. Laws 1.252; 2.34–38.

²⁶ “Jacob prayed”; Alleg. Interp. 2.94, 96; 3.104; cf. Post. Cain 67; Husbandry 44–45, 94, 168; Plant. 46; Sobr. 59; Conf. Tongues 39; Heir 34; Prelim. Stud. 7; Flight 118; Moses 2.214; Change of Names 188, 204, 209–210, 213; Contemp. Life 27; To Gaius 306. Likewise Ep. Arist. 17, 196, 218, 305; Josephus, War 7.73, 128; Ant. 6.89, 231; 7.203, 290, 357; 8.124; 11.17, 119; 18.211; Ag. Apion 1.209: on the Sabbath, the Jews pray in the temples until evening; 2.196: pray for the common safety, etc.

²⁷ Cf. Dreams 2.72: “That which prays, gives thanks, offers truly blameless sacrifices . . . is the soul”; Spec. Laws 1.167: “Vows or acts of thanksgiving.”

²⁸ Sacr. Abel and Cain 124: “I ask in my prayers”; Conf. Tongues 163; Migr. Abr. 101, 124, 171; Husbandry 99; Drunkenness 125, 224; Sobr. 61, 64; Prelim. Stud. 38; Change of Names 216, 218, 252; Dreams 2.101.

²⁹ Joseph 88; cf. Alleg. Interp. 3.177, 179, 193; Worse Attacks Better 46, 103, 144; Sacr. Abel and Cain 99; Plant. 49, 52; Sobr. 62; Husbandry 156; Migr. Abr. 111; Prelim. Stud. 175; Flight 164: “he wished to learn”; Rewards 151; Good Man Free 57, 63; Flacc. 167.

³⁰ Resulting, in this case, from the richness of the biblical vocabulary for humans’ dealings with God (cf. αι—τέω, δέομαι, δοξάζω, ε—ρωτάω, εὐλογέω, εὐχαριστέω, λατρεύω, προσεύχομαι, etc.). The tradition was careful to express its original faith in adequate language, cf. 1Tim 2:1—δεήσεις, προσευχάς, ε—ντεύξεις, εὐχαριστίας.

³¹ 2Cor 13:7—εὐχόμεθα δὲ πρὸς τὸν θεόν, “we address this prayer to God”; 13:9—τοῦτο καὶ εὐχόμεθα, “what we ask for in our prayers is your being put right.” This is the meaning in Homer, the classics, the LXX, Philo, etc. Cf. G. P. Wiles, Paul’s Intercessory Prayers, Cambridge, 1974, pp. 241ff.

³² “The optative with ἄν presents the action as simply possible, or marks the uncertainty of the one speaking as to the realization of the action, and thus attenuates the affirmation” (F. M. Abel, Grammaire, p. 274, 61 a, who cites Aeschines, In Tim. 159: “I would wish [optarim] not to have such facts as the material for my speech” [τω—ν τουούτων ἔργων ἀπορει—ν ἄν εὐξάιμην ε—ν τω— λόγῳ].) Cf. P. Auvray, P. Poulain, Les Langues sacrées, Paris, 1957, pp. 67, 69.

³³ Cf. C. F. D. Moule, Idiom Book, p. 9; D. Coggan, The Prayers of the New Testament, 1967, p. 100.

³⁴ Herodotus 1.86: εὐχὴν ε—πιτελει—ν = fulfill a vow; 181; 2.65; Aeschylus, Sept. 819; Sophocles, Trach. 240; Euripides, IT 439: “in accord with my lady’s prayer”; Pindar, Pyth. 9.89: “having experienced a benefit in response to a vow”; Josephus, War 2.313: Berenice “had come to Jerusalem to fulfill a vow made to God”; Ant. 3.235; 4.72; 5.265; 11.58.

³⁵ Notably in the Hebraism “vow a vow” (εὐχεσθαι εὐχὴν), Gen 28:20; 31:13; Lev 27:2; Num 6:2; 21:2; Judg 11:30; 1Sam 1:11; 2Sam 15:8; Isa 19:21; Ep Jer 35; Dan 6:5, 8, 13; Jonah 1:16; 2Macc 8:15.

³⁶ Ps 22:25; 50:14; 61:8; 65:1; 66:13; 116:14, 18; Prov 7:14; Eccl 5:3; Sir 18:22–23; Nah 2:1.

³⁷ Num 6:2, 4ff.; 30:3–15. Philo calls this “the great vow” (Alleg. Interp. 1.17; Husbandry 175; Drunkenness 2; Spec. Laws 1.248, 251). Εὐχή is used for “the vows and undertakings of the soul” (Alleg. Interp. 2.63), the consecration of a stele (Dreams 1.252); vows for the emperor (To Gaius 280) and to the Savior God (Joseph 195; Moses 1.252, 292; Spec. Laws 2.12, 24, 32, 34, 115, 129). — In the inscriptions, εὐχή always has the sense of a dedication, an ex-voto, such as the act of adoration by Ammonius, “as an ex-voto to Isis and Sarapis” (E. Bernand, Philae II, n. 150, 2; cf. 177, 2); E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 105, 1; E. Bernand, Fayoum, n. 7, 11; 20, 9; 73, 7; 84, 9; 98, 4; A. Bernand, El-Kanaïis, n. 61: “To Pan of the Good Road, as an ex-voto”; A. Bernand, Pan, n. 3, 5; T. Drew-Bear, Phrygie II, 2; 3; 5; III, 1; 3–11; etc.; CII 730; IGLS 465, 467–470, 697, 1210; SEG XXVI, 1355, 1357, 1359, 1360, 1367–69, 1380, 1382, 1388–89, 1443–44; SB 6247, 6253, 6256, 6310, 7287

(ἀνάθημα κατ' εὐχὴν; cf. ἀνάθημα εὐχῆς, epigram on the stele of Moschion, in E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, 108, 22), 7749, 8133, 9812, 10046, 10671, 11095, etc. Cf. H. Beer, —Απαρχή und verwandte Ausdrücke in griechischen Weiheinschriften, Würzburg, 1914, pp. 75–118, 131–135.

³⁸ Aeschylus, Cho. 142; cf. Suppl. 626. Ag. 973: “Zeus, fulfill my wishes”; Pindar, Ol. 4.12–13; Euripides, IT 628: “foolish wishes that you conceive, wretched one”; Xenophon, An. 1.9.11: Cyrus wished to live long enough to pay back in kind those who did him good or ill. Prov 31:2—“Son of my wishes”; Philo, Flight 154: “in conformity with my wishes”; Joseph 206, 210; Moses 1.285; Decalogue 126; Virtues 53, 120; Josephus, War 5.255, 494; Ant. 17.88, 95; Life 292. There are rather often wishes which amount to curses of other people (Demosthenes, Embassy 19.130; Sophocles, OT 236–237; cf. Plato, Leg. 11.931 c, contrast between εὐχή and ἀρά; Philo, Heir 260; Decalogue 75); but also chimerical ones that could not possibly be fulfilled, such as children’s wishes (Plato, Soph. 249 d; Resp. 5.456 c; 6.499 c; 7.540 d), pious desires (Leg. 8.841 c); thus, establishing the best political community “according to the desire” of men (Aristotle, Pol. 2.1260b29, κατ' εὐχὴν)! In AD 139, the weavers complain to the strategos: their numbers are so few that they consider it “a mere wish (unrealizable) to be able to execute the orders received” (P.Phil. 10, 5). Lucian, in Πλοιο—ον ἢ Εὐχαί (The Ship or the Wishes), lays out the extravagant wishes of three strollers who cometo the Piraeus to see a commercial vessel that has arrived from Egypt (Nav. 16, 41, 45,46).

³⁹ Theognis 341; Euclid, Elem. 196; IT 276; Euripides, Tro. 889; Sophocles, El. 636; Aeschylus, Suppl. 1072: “if my prayer is heard”; Pindar, Isthm. 6.44. A mother prays for her children (P.Giss. 22, 10 and 23; cf. P.Fay., p. 32); prayer for the health of the addressee of a letter (P.Brem. 20, 6; 65, 6; P.Mich. 465, 9; P.Erl. 120, 6); “I offer prayers daily for your good health” (ὑπὲρ τῆς σωτηρίας σου εὐχὰς ποιοῦμαι, P.Mich. 499, 5; cf. 484, 10; 500, 5; SB 8002, 3; PSI 1261, 5; 1425, 6); “it is the best opportunity to pray for your health” (C.P.Herm. 2, 25; cf. 8, 13 and 27; 9, 22); “I absolutely need your prayers” (P.Fouad 88, 10; cf. 89, 5; P.Oxy. 2479, 18; 3150, 33). Hymn to Isis: “Answer my prayers . . . hearing my prayers and my hymns” (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 175, col. I, 35; II, 33). “The prayers and sacrifices that ought to obtain health, victory, power, and might for us” (UPZ 106, 13; 108, 12).

⁴⁰ Hebrew tepillâh, Job 16:18; Prov 15:8, 29; Bar 1:5; 2Macc 15:26—“making invocations and prayers.”

⁴¹ Alleg. Interp. 1.84; 3.104: “the fine prayer that Moses made”; Unchang. God 156; Husbandry 94–95; Sobr. 53; Moses 1.47, 149. Perfect prayer (Alleg. Interp. 3.192), which God loves (Post. Cain 179), vain prayer (Cherub. 94); prayer, sacrifice, and cult functions (Unchang. God 132; Drunkness 66, 79, 130; Dreams 1.215; 2.299; Moses 2.133, 147, 174; Decalogue 158; Spec. Laws 1.83, 97, 113, 193; 2.17; 3.131, 171), with thanksgiving (Moses 1.219; 2.42; Spec. Laws 1.224, 229; Rewards 56; Josephus, Ant. 3.25; 9.209). Cf. Philo, Sobr. 66–67; Conf. Tongues 159; Prelim. Stud. 7; Dreams 1.126, 163; Abraham 235, 250; Moses 2.5, 24, 26, 107, 154; Spec. Laws 2.148, 167, 196; Virtues 59, 209; Rewards 79, 84, 126, 166; Contemp. Life 67, 89; Josephus, War 2.128; Ant. 1.99, 228, 268; 3.7, 189; 10.16, 29; 14.260; 18.15; Life 295; etc. Cf. J. Rudhardt, Notions fondamentales de la pensée religieuse et actes constitutifs du culte dans la Grèce classique, Geneva, 1958, pp. 187–202.

⁴² IGLS 2035, 2037; CII 690, 9; 78, 12.

⁴³ PSI 1422, 16. P. Colomb, Recherches sur la chancellerie et la diplomatie des Lagides, Paris, 1926, pp. 119, 183.

⁴⁴ I.Priene 174, 18; cf. LSAM, n. 19, 2: a prayer will be said for nine days at Maeonia on the order of the gods; LSCG, n. 46, 21; Supplément, n. 14, 34.

⁴⁵ It seems that εὐχαι—ον means the place of prayer in P.Lond. 1177, 60 (vol. III, p. 183), but the common designation is προσευχή, meaning first of all the prayer itself (Matt 21:13; Luke 6:12; Acts 1:14; 1Tim 5:5; P.Lond. 1917, 8; 1926, 17; C.P.Herm. 9, 8), then the place outside the city walls where Diaspora Jews met to pray together (Acts 16:13; cf. S. M. Zarb, “De Iudaeorum προσευχῆ in Act. XVI, 13, 16,” in Angelicum, 1928, pp. 91–108; cf. Josephus, Ant. 14.258; Ag. Apion 2.10); προσευχή, being synonymous with τόπος προσευχῆς (1Macc 3:46; cf. 7:37; Epiphanius, Pan. 80; PG 42.757), refers quite often to the synagogue (Str-B, vol. 2, p. 472; CII 662, 684, 754; B. Lifshitz, Synagogues juives, n. 3, 86, 92–96, 99, 35: τῆ κυρία προσευχῆ; SB 6832, 7454), having benefit of the right of asylum (Dittenberger, Or. 129, 9). It was to be applied even to Christian meeting-places: the Christians of Gaza meet seven days in a row at the προσευχή to sing hymns (F. M. Abel, “Marc Diacre et la biographie de saint Porphyre,” in Conférence de saint Etienne, Paris, 1910, vol. 1, p. 248). Cf. A. Hamman, “La Prière chrétienne et la prière païenne, formes et différences,” in ANRW, vol. 23, 2; Berlin-New York, 1980, pp. 1193ff.

εὐψυχέω

eupsycheo, to take heart, be courageous, be cheered

eupsycheo, S 2174; EDNT 2.90; NIDNTT 3.687; MM 268; L&N 25.146; BAGD 329

St. Paul sends Timothy to the Philippians “in order to be encouraged in turn by the news that I will receive from you” (Phil 2:19). That is the usual translation of the biblical hapax eupsycheo, which is rare in classical and Hellenistic literature,¹ where it refers to bravery in battle, comfort in trials (Josephus, Ant. 11.241: the king comforts Esther after she faints). It occurs in great abundance in epitaphs, like that of Serapias: “You have left behind an inscription and a marker to commemorate your virtue as you ascend to the country of the blessed. Good courage, Serapias!”² Most often, it is a simple utterance connected with the name of the deceased or ending the inscription, for example Euthenia eupsychi.³ It is sometimes used in letters of condolence: “Take heart!”⁴ Even the Jews at Rome follow this usage: “To Eutychnianos, archon, his worthy spouse. Good courage! May your sleep be with the just” (CII 110); “Here lies Junia, daughter of Antipas, two years, four months, and [—] days old. Good courage, be joyful—euphychei euphronei” (ibid. 303).

This nuance of joy, or as we would say, good spirits, is attested at the time of Claudius or of Nero in a letter from a woman to her husband: “For I am not troubled, but I remain eupsychousa” (ego gar ouch oligoro, alla eupsychousa parameno, BGU 1097, 15); or in this assurance, carved on a stone of a newly constructed edifice: “I am placed for the joy (pros eupsychian) of those who dwell here” (IGLS, 1653, 3). This nuance is not excluded in Phil 2:19, which can be compared to the letter of Heraklammon to his son Kallistos in the second century: “Write to me soon so that I may rejoice” (tacheos oun moi grapson hina eupsycho, P.Oxy. 2860, 17); the father’s heart will be comforted, refreshed, and joyful to hear from his child, from whom he has hitherto had no response to his letters.

L. Robert, commenting on IGRom. IV, 860, 12, which praises a police superintendent for his “magnanimous generosity in the ‘good news’ festivals” (epididonta en euangeliois eupsychos) illustrates the psychological and moral connotations of this adverb:

_EXTRACT = From Liddell-Scott-Jones, one would think that this word was a hapax from Xenophon, Eq. Mag. 8.21; from the Thesaurus it is evident that the adverb is well attested in Polybius and Diodorus; there it has the connotation “courageously,” which it also has in the decree of Lete on the military successes of a quaestor (Dittenberger, Syl. 700), like eupsychia in a decree of Elea for a pankratist (Syl. 1073, 30–31), like eupsychotatos for a young Spartan winner in the endurance contest beneath the whip at the altar of Artemis Orthia, like (again at Sparta) eupsychia kai peitharchia en tois patriois Lykourgeiois ethesin, “enduring courage and obedience” (IG V,

1, 549). The adverb in the inscription under discussion may have the sense of “magnanimity and generosity.” I compare it to a decree of Acraiphia under Claudius, which I published in BCH, 1935, pp. 338–340; the preamble of this second decree begins with this rhetoric: tes ophilomenes hapasi times tois eis ten patrida eupsychos diatethisin . . . axious ontas metalambanein (lines 37–40), “being worthy to receive their share of the honor that is due to those who administrated in a manner honorable to their country”; the decree has to do with three citizens who when the land was in very difficult circumstances (en te tes choras apoleia) agreed to assume the military command, the superintendance of the marketplace, and the supplying of oil, and who made numerous generous gifts of grain, money, and oil to grocers, cooks, butchers, and others. The meaning is the same in 3Macc 7:18—“the king having gladly (eupsychos) supplied them everything needed for each of them to arrive at his own house.”⁵

¹ The LXX uses only εὐψυχία: for the courage of Judas and his companions in battles waged for the country (2Macc 14:18; cf. 4Macc 6:11—the courage of Eleazer won the admiration of his torturers; Dittenberger, Syl. 1073, 30: ε—πὶ τοσοῦτον δὲ καὶ ἀρετῆς καὶ εὐψυχίας ἦλθεν, AD 117; Xenophon, Cyn. 10.21: “show his bravery”; Polybius 1.57.2); εὐψυχος: around Judas are grouped οἱ—εὐψυχοὶ τῆ καρδίᾳ (1Macc 9:14; cf. Philostratus, Gym. 9: pankratists and boxers must not leave themselves open to the charge of cowardice, ὡς μὴ εὐψυχον; Thucydides 2.11.5: “brave to attack”; P.Oxy. 2656, 400); εὐψύχως: the mother of the seven sons bravely bears the death of her children all on the same day (2Macc 7:20). SB 9017, n. 18, 6–7: endure with courage (an illness?), λοιπὸν εὐψύχως δεῖ—φέρειν.

² E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 52, 3; cf. n. 76, col. III, 3: “Heraïis, you are of good courage, having come to the end of the gentle light.”

³ SB 6092; cf. 2134, 4230, 4229, 5631, 6093, 6238, 6239, 6585, 6697, etc. IGLS 90, 701–703, 756–757, 885–887, 972–975. Sometimes ἄλυπε εὐψύχει (ibid. 838, 934, 1029; SB 6829, 7797).

⁴ Letter from a son to his mother from the first-second century (P.IFAO II, n. XI, 3); P.Oxy. 115, 2: Εἰ—ρήνη Ταοννώφρει καὶ Φίλωνι εὐψυχει—ν; cf. O.Bodl. 2056. In the sense of being confident in one’s ability to do something, SB 9017, n. 12, 2: εὐψυχω—ἀποδω—ναι (AD 160).

⁵ Τοῦ βασιλέως χορηγήσαντος αὐτοί—ς εὐψύχως τὰ πρὸς τὴν ἄφιξιν πάντα ε—κάστῳ ἕως εἰ—ς τὴν ἰ—δίαν οἰ—κίαν. L. Robert, “Les Inscriptions,” in J. des Gagniers, Laodicée, pp. 272–273.

ζημία, ζημιόω, κέρδος, κερδαίνω zemia, fine, penalty, contribution, harm, loss, disadvantage; zemioo, to lose, suffer loss, be punished; kerdos, gain, profit; kerdaino, to gain, profit

zemia, S 2209; TDNT 2.888–892; EDNT 2.101–102; NIDNTT 3.136–137; MM 273; L&N 57.69; BAGD 338 | zemioo, S 2210; TDNT 2.888–892; EDNT 2.102; MM 273; L&N 38.7, 57.69; BDF §159(2); BAGD 338 | kerdos, S 2771; TDNT 3.672–673; EDNT 2.284; NIDNTT 3.136–137; MM 341; L&N 57.192; BAGD 429 | kerdaino, S 2770; TDNT 3.672–673; EDNT 2.283–284; NIDNTT 3.136–137; MM 341; L&N 13.137, 57.189; BDF §§28, 101; BAGD 429

In the OT, zemia (Hebrew ‘onesh) and zemioo (‘anash) always have the sense “fine, contribution,”¹ “impose a fine, punish”;² a meaning that is frequent in the papyri,³ but unknown in the NT apart from Luke 9:25—“What good will it do a person to gain the whole world, if he himself is lost or condemned, heauton de apolesas e zemiotheis ?”⁴ Apoleia is the technical term for eternal damnation (cf. John 12:25); if Luke, unlike the parallels (Matt 16:26; Mark 8:36), adds zemiotheis, the point is that this is not a question of a simple loss, but of a penalty, or positive punishment.

In the literary and popular Koine, zemia and zemioo refer to a very wide range of “harm.”⁵ P.Tebt. 420, 4: “You know that I am above reproach (apo zemias)”; the prostitute is a bane (Philo, Spec. Laws 3.51); pederasty wrongs the lovers (Contemp. Life 61, ezemieose; P.Tebt. 947, 2; second century BC); associating with the wicked becomes “the worst calamity” (Migr. Abr. 61, megiste zemia); “those who rebel against divine law come into grave danger for the body and the soul” (Virtues 182); “the person who kills a domestic . . . slashes his own fortune by the price of this man” (Spec. Laws 3.143; cf. Josephus, Ant. 11.214); “they consider an expensive coat to be a great waste” (Philo, Dreams 1.124); sometimes it is a matter of wrong (Giants 43; Post. Cain 184), of detriment (Virtues 169), of a deficit (P.Oxy. 2023, 4, 9); sometimes ruin (Moses 2.53; Migr. Abr. 172), of dire consequences (Unchang. God 113). “When he was about to be sentenced to death (thanatoi zemiousthai), Hyrcanus had saved him from danger and punishment” (Josephus, Ant. 15.16). It is in this sense that St. Paul connects hybris and zemia to suggest the anger and the loss of the cargo and the ship in the course of the storm (Acts 27:10, 21)—which he considers as totally null and worthless in comparison with having Christ (Phil 3:8)—did not wrong the Corinthians, whose sorrow bore such auspicious fruit (2Cor 7:9). But the bad preacher whose work will be consumed by fire will suffer a loss or harm (1Cor 3:15), namely, the fruitlessness of his work, which will not be rewarded; he will lose his pay.⁶

In the language of business and diatribe, zemia -zemioo are normally opposed to gain and profit, kerdo-kerdaino.⁷ So the Lord used this ruinous accounting to teach that gaining the universe would be empty if one lost oneself;⁸ St. Paul, alluding to the Damascus road, applied it to himself: the advantages that he had in Judaism (kerde) he considered disadvantageous (zemian) for the sake of Christ;⁹ “I consider it all a liability next to the outstanding profit of knowing Jesus Christ. For him, I have accepted the loss of everything . . . in order to gain Christ, hina Christon kerdeso” (Phil 3:8).

The goal of the merchant is to make money, to generate profits: “We shall trade and make profits.”¹⁰ But kerdos is used for all sorts of advantages and acquisitions.¹¹ If there are base profits or sordid gains,¹² there is also the gaining of souls, and kerdaino became a religious term, or rather an apostolic and missionary term, from the brotherly correction whereby one “gains one’s brother” (Matt 18:15) and from Paul’s adapting himself to every type of person “in order to gain the largest number” (1Cor 9:20-22) to the husbands whose minds are closed to the word of God but who will be won without a word by the behavior of their Christian wives (1Pet 3:1). Such texts obviously have no pagan parallels.

¹ 2Kgs 23:33; Prov 27:12; 2Macc 4:48—those who had undertaken the defense of the city “suffered this unjust punishment.” CII 709: “They will not have to fear any lawsuit or any fine or any punishment whatsoever” (second century BC). In a contract for the leasing of the precincts of Zeus Temenites at Amorgos, in the fourth century BC, the lessee pays all fines at the same time as the lease (IG XII, 7, 62, line 7).

² Exod 21:22; Deut 22:19; 1Esdr 1:34; Prov 17:26; 19:19; 21:11; 22:3. For the Aramaic etymology (zyny, zyyn) of zemia, cf. O. Szemerényi, “Etyma Graeca III (16–21),” in Mélanges de linguistique et de philologie grecques offerts à Pierre Chantraine, Paris, 1972, p. 247.

³ Ζημία, P.Tebt. 894, frag. III, 13 (account of an association, from the second century BC): Naaron paid a fine in addition to his subscription; P.Ryl. 674, 8 (a private account from the second-first century BC); C.Ord.Ptol. 71, 9 (an amnesty ruling of Ptolemy Auletes, around 60 BC): “They shall be absolved of the fines incurred”; UPZ 180 a, col. XV, 4; P.Mil. 212 r, col. VI, 18: fine of John Sergios (P.Ross.Georg. V, 46, 4), of Paulos and Jacob (P.Apoll. 84, 5–6; the record of a series of payments by the tax collectors); in the sense of penalty, cf. P.Mich. 231, 14 (a petition to the strategos, in 47–48); P.Panop.Beatty 2, 235: the collectors will not be content with financial penalties; P.Ross.Georg. IV, 15; col. I, 1; Apokrimata 6: “we revoke the fines imposed on the Alexandrians or Egyptians”

(republished in SB 9526). The verb ζημιόω also refers to the imposing of a fine (UPZ 70, 18; SB 8030, 25, 28, from AD 47; 8267, 51; from 5 BC). The accounts of an agonothetes at Lebadaiia (second century BC): “I imposed on Plato, son of Aristokrates, of Thebes, my predecessor as agonothetes, for not turning in the accounts of his term, the fine prescribed by law (ε—ζημίωσα), 10,000 drachmas” (NCIG, n. 22 C, 29; cf. ibid. line 44: an extension for turning in accounts; line 58: the fine will be lifted and declared null, but if they do not turn in the accounts, the fine will stand). Ζημιόω is also used, however, for inflicting a punishment (P.Fam.Tebt. 24, 90), usually severe: Tiberius Julius Alexander prescribes: “The case cannot be brought again to judgment but that the person who did this will be punished without remission, ἀπαραιτήτως ζημιωθήσεται” (SB 8444, 40). It is used notably for capital punishment, P.Tebt. 5, 92; P.Hib. 198, 159; P.Tebt. 699, 21; C.Ord.Ptol. 13, 19; 41, 14; 43, 21; 53, 92: “those to whom these measures apply shall be punished by death”; 55, 22; IG, II2, 43, 129: ζημιούντων δὲ αὐτὸν θανάτῳ (fourth century BC).

⁴ Cf. Epictetus 2.10.15: “If you lost your knowledge of grammar or of music, you would regard this loss as a harm, ζημίαν ἢ γοῦ τῆς ἀπώλειαν αὐτῆς.” F. Field, (Notes on the Translation, p. 61) understands ἀπολέσας as a total loss and ζημιωθείς as a partial loss. He translated, “and lose himself, or be cast away.” On this verse, cf. H. Schürmann, Lukasevangelium, pp. 546ff.

⁵ Ζημία is often a synonym for βλάβη, cf. Philo, Migr. Abr. 172; Josephus, War 2.605; BGU 316, 32; Stud.Pal. XX, 122, 12: μήτε ε—νάξειν περὶ ζημίας ἢ περὶ βλάβης; 128, 13; IGLS 262, 25–26.

⁶ Perhaps the nuance of punishment is not to be ruled out. L. Robert has published a Christian epitaph from Catana: —Ιάσων πρεσβύτερος, μηδὲν ζημιώσας τὴν ε—ντολήν, ἠγόρασεν ε—αυτῷ— καὶ τοι—ς τέκνοις ε—αυτοῦ τὴν κοῦπαν ταύτην (“Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1960, p. 212, n. 459).

⁷ A. Stumpff (“ζημία, ζημιόω,” in TDNT, vol. 2, p. 888) cites the definition of these two terms by Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 5.7.1132b2ff., cf. Xenophon, Cyr. 2.2.12: “without seeking personal gain (κέρδει), without cost to those who hear (μήτ’ ε—πὶ ζημίᾳ)”; Epictetus 3.26.25: “When a vase that is not broken and is still useful is discarded, whoever finds it carries it off and considers it a gain (κέρδος ἠγήσεται); but with you, everyone will consider it pure loss (πα—ς ζημίαν)”; cf. Josephus, Ant. 4.274: “They consider it immoral to profit from the loss (of lost money) of another”; War 2.605: “Far be it from me to consider as gain that which is harmful to the common interest.” The contrast appears in rabbinic writings, cf. Str-B, vol. 1, p. 749.

⁸ Matt 16:26; Mark 8:36 (cf. A. Béa, “Lucrari Mundum—Perdere Animam,” in Bib, 1933, pp. 435–447). The thought had been well exploited by Philo, Drunkness 20–33; cf. besides Moses 2.53: “considering as very advantageous that which brought about their complete ruin”; Change of Names 173: “Pharaoh, portraying harms as advantages . . .”; To Gaius 242: “the care of such multitudes is not a question of profit but of piety”; cf. Schlier, “κέρδος, κερδαίνω,” in TDNT, vol. 3, pp. 672–673.

⁹ Phil 3:7; “these profits were not just wiped out; they became losses; their mathematical sign changed from plus to minus” (P. Bonnard, L’Épître de saint Paul aux Philippiens, Neuchâtel-Paris, 1950, p. 63); cf. J. Gnilka, Der Philipperbrief, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna, 1968, p. 191). Phil 1:21—τὸ ἀποθανεῖν—ν κέρδος.

¹⁰ Jas 4:13—ε—μπορευσόμεθα καὶ κερδήσομεν; Josephus, War 2.590: “a matter in which he realized large profits”; P.Oxy. 1477, 10: εἰ— κερδαίνω ἀπὸ τοῦ πράγματος; P.Mich. 507, 13: if we gain, you will profit; P.Flor. 142, 8; Menander, Dysk. 720: “the calculations that he made for getting rich.”

¹¹ Ep. Arist. 270: “Do not trust . . . those who see only their own profit in everything”; Epictetus 1.28.13; 3.22.37: deliverance from a burdensome or unfaithful wife; Josephus, Ant. 2.31: the advantage of not having blood on one’s hands; War 5.74: “the Romans will profit from our quarrels by taking the city without shedding any blood”; cf. Ant. 5.135: ἡδονὴ τοῦ κερδαίνειν. P.Panop.Beatty 2, 149, 151: that the wine may bring no profit to the evildoers; PSI 1128, 30; Stud.Pal. XX, 283, 3.

¹² Titus 1:11—αι—συχρὸν κέρδος; Polybius 6.46.2–5: μηδὲν αι—συχρὸν νομίζεσθαι κέρδος; 6.47.5; Dio Chrysostom 4.6; 31.32; 31.138; Philo, Spec. Laws 4.121: “an unjust profit.”

ζωγρέω

zogreo, to capture alive, spare the life of zogreo, S 2221; EDNT 2.109; MM 274; L&N 37.1; BAGD 340

Formed from zoon-agreo, this verb is defined by the Suda: zogrei—zontas lambanei.¹ It means “capture alive, spare the life of” and belongs to the vocabulary of hunting and war.² Its eight occurrences in the OT all have military meanings,³ while the two NT occurrences are metaphorical, suggesting a fish or a small animal caught in a net.⁴

After the miraculous catch of fish, “Jesus said to Simon, ‘Fear not; from now on you will catch men.’”⁵ This is not so much an order as a prophecy announcing the apostolic task to which the disciple will be exclusively dedicated (cf. Luke 18:28-29). He will no longer catch dead fish, in order to eat them; rather, he will catch living people, not to reduce them to servitude, after the fashion of prisoners, but to give them liberty and true life.⁶

In Greek literature, zogreo is most often opposed to verbs meaning kill, massacre, annihilate: “The Persians massacred a large number of the Massagetae and made the others prisoners” (Herodotus 1.211); “The Syracusans had either captured a large number of men or killed them” (Thucydides 7.41.4); “Such was the anger of the Crotoniates that they took no prisoners but killed all who fled.”⁷ The fate of these captives is often dire: weighed down with fetters (Herodotus 1.66; Polybius 5.77), it was not rare for them to be executed in the end: “Seven hundred men of the popular party, taken alive (zogresantes), were put to death; only one escaped, and he was mutilated” (ibid. 6.91); “Of all the enemies that the Scythians capture alive, they sacrifice one out of a hundred.”⁸ But to be “taken alive” means not simply escaping immediate massacre and “being spared,”⁹ but also retaining hope of liberation (Herodotus 5.77). That is why vanquished people plead with their conquerors to spare their lives.¹⁰ That is in fact the nuance in Luke 5:10—keep a captive alive, be gracious and merciful to him, even restore him to life.¹¹

The secular texts cited display especially the cruelty of victors toward their prisoners, whom they torture and reduce to slavery, when they do not simply execute them. Thus it is that the devil casts his net over sinners,¹² takes them prisoner (ezogremenoï), subjects them to his will (1Tim 2:26).

¹ Cf. P. Chantraine, Etudes sur le vocabulaire grec, Paris, 1956, p. 51.

² Unknown in the inscriptions and the papyri. But the substantive ζωγρία is attested in 117 BC, καὶ πολλοὺς μὲν αὐτῶ—ν ε—ν χειρῶ—ν νομαί—ς ἀπέκτεινεν, οὓς δὲ ζωγρίαὶ συνέλαβειν (Dittenberger, Syl. 700, 30), and Num 21:35—“They attacked Og, king of Bashan . . . until no survivor was left”; Deut 2:34; 2Macc 12:35: Dositheus “laid hold of Gorgias and . . . forcibly dragged him, intending to capture this accursed man alive, βουλόμενος τὸν κατάρατον λαβεῖ—ν ζωγρίαν.”

³ When the Israelites have killed all the male Midianites, taking prisoner the women and children, Moses asks “Have you then left alive (or ‘spared’—ε—ζωγήσατε) all the females?” (Num 31:15, 38); “the towns . . . that Yahweh gives you to possess, you shall not leave any creature alive, for you must devote them to destruction” (Deut 20:16); Rahab asked the Israelite spies: “Swear to me that you will leave alive (or ‘spare’) my father’s household, my mother, my brothers and sisters” (Jos 2:13; 6:25; cf. 9:20; 2Sam 8:2; ζωγρέω always translates the piel or the hiphil of the Hebrew hayâh); “the sons of Judah captured alive (hayîm shabû) ten thousand survivors, whom they led to the top of a cliff and threw down from the summit; they were all dashed to pieces” (2Chr 25:12).

⁴ Cf. ζωγρει—ον: a cage or tank for fish. The image of fishing for men (Aristaenetos, Ep. 2.1), previously used in Hab 1:14-15; Jer 16:16 (cf. Prov 6:26), is found again at Qumran (cf. 1QH 2.29; 3.26; 5.8; CD 4.15ff.), notably in the form of a net (cf. M. Hengel, Nachfolge und Charisma, Berlin, 1968, p. 86, n. 150–151 = ET The Charismatic Leader and his Followers, trans. James C. G. Greig, ed. John Riches, Edinburgh, 1981, p. 77, nn. 150–151); but it is the devil who is portrayed as hunting men.

⁵ Luke 5:10—ἀνθρώπους ἔσῃ ζωγρω—ν; substituted for ποιήσω ὑμα—ς γενέσθαι ἄλσει—ς ἀνθρώπων in Mark 1:17; Matt 4:19. Cf. J. Mánek, “Fishers of Men,” in NovT, 1958, pp. 138–141; C. W. F. Smith, “Fishers of Men,” in HTR, 1959, pp. 187–203; R. Pesch, “La Rédaction lucanienne du logion des pêcheurs d’hommes,” in L’Evangile de Luc: Méorial Lucien Cerfaux, Gembloux, 1973, pp. 225–244.

⁶ The fishing has a different object, but the metaphor is coherent because of the permanency of the profession (cf. Vulgate eris capiens). We know how fond the first Christians were of representations of the fisherman and of little fish born in the baptismal waters, cf. F. J. Dölger, ΙΧΥΣ: Das Fisch-Symbol in frühchristlicher Zeit, Münster, 1928–1932.

⁷ Diodorus Siculus 12.10.1; cf. 11.22; Polybius 1.34.8; 3.102.2: Marcus, attacking the Carthaginians, commands that no prisoners be taken. Cf. Strabo 11.11.6: Alexander pursued Bessos and Spitamenes; he captured the former alive (ζωγρία δ ἀναχθέντος), but the latter had the barbarians kill him (διαφθαρέντος).

⁸ Herodotus 4.62; cf. 5.86; Diodorus Siculus 18.16.2: “Perdiccas took more than five thousand prisoners . . . among whom was Ariarathes, whom he ordered crucified with all his relatives after torturing them cruelly”; 18.40.3. Cf. P. Ducrey, Le Traitement des prisonniers de guerre dans la Grèce antique, Paris, 1968, pp. 29–33.

⁹ Thucydides 3.66.2: “Those who stretched out their hands to you and whom you took prisoner, you promised to spare, and you butchered them”; 4.57.3; Xenophon, Hell. 1.5.14.

¹⁰ Homer, Il. 6.46: Adrastus, clutching the knees of Menelaus, begs “Take me alive, son of Atreus, accept an honest ransom”; Dolon likewise beseeches Ulysses (10.378). Polybius 3.84.10: “When the cavalry came upon them and their loss was certain, they raised their arms and begged to be spared, δεόμενοι ζώγρει—v.”

¹¹ Cf. Homer, Il. 5.698: “The blast of the north wind brought life back (ζώγρει)” to Pelagon, who had passed out (κεκαφηότα); Anth. Pal. 9.597.6: “skillful Philip restored my life by healing me of this cruel disease.”

¹² Cf. Isa 24:17 (Luke 21:35). Qumran denounces the empire or domination of Belial (1QS 1.18.24). When Cleopatra was about to be captured by Proculeius, Caesar’s envoy, one of the women shut up with her cried out, “Unhappy Cleopatra, you are captured, ζώγρει—” (Plutarch, Ant. 75.3).

ζωογονέω

zoogoneo, to leave alive, produce a living thing, make alive

zoogoneo, S 2225; TDNT 2.873–874; EDNT 2.109; NIDNTT 2.476; MM 275; L&N 23.89, 23.92; BAGD 341

This verb has two meanings, which are not always separable. The first, attested by the LXX, is “leave alive,” as opposed to “kill”: Pharaoh “mistreated our fathers, even forcing them to expose their infants so that they would not live, eis to me zoogoneisthai” (Acts 7:19) is a reference to Exod 1:17, 18, 22. “David left alive (ezoogonei) neither man nor woman” (1Sam 27:9, 11; cf. Judg 8:19; 1Kgs 21:31; 2Kgs 7:4; always translating the Hebrew hayah in the piel or the hiphil).

With this meaning, zoogoneo is a technical term in botany (Theophrastus, Caus. Pl. 3.22.3; 4.15.4; Hist. Pl. 8.11.2), attested in the papyri, beginning with AD 13,¹ and in the third-fourth centuries it is almost always associated with euthaleo, meaning good growth, fine vegetation. On 29 March 323, Origenes and his companions swear to the logistes Dioscurides that they have regularly watered the tree pros to zoogonein kai euthalein dia pantos,² which seems to be a stereotyped formula.

But literally, zoogoneo means “produce or beget a living thing, make alive,”³ and with this meaning, God is almost always the subject, as in 1Tim 6:13—“I adjure you before God, who gives life to all things, tou theou tou zoogonountos.”⁴ This divine attribute is referred to in 1Sam 2:6 (“the Lord causes to die and makes alive, Kyrios thanatoi kai zoogonei”) and in the secular literature: god is the engenderer, ho zoogonon.⁵

These usages may help clarify the paradox in Luke 17:33—ean apolesei zoogonesei auten (psychen); whoever consents to the loss or destruction of his life will save it, preserve it. That is how modern exegetes take it; but for the sentence to mean anything, it seems that we should not exclude the nuance “will bring it back to life,” referring to the saving or originating of a new life. For the living—ta zoogonounta—can have several ways of existing or disappearing (Lev 11:47).

¹ P.Oxy. 1188, 21, 23: two dead branches, from a living persea tree, ἀπὸ ζωγονούσης περσέας κλάδους. The spellings ζωγονέω and ζωογονέω are equally represented in the papyri (cf. βοαύλων-βαύλων). Cf. O. Mentevecchi, “Continuità ed Evoluzione della Lingua greca nella Settanta e nei Papiri,” in Proceedings X, p. 43. On the persea, an Egyptian tree (Strabo 16.4.4; P.Oxy. 1976; P.Panop.Beatty 2, 211, note; P.Mich. inv. 4001, 10, ed. R. W. Daniel, in ZPE 24, 1977, p. 83), cf. L. Keimer, Die Gartenpflanzen im alten Ägypten, Berlin, 1924, pp. 35ff. P. Derchain, “Le Lotus, la mandragore et le perséa,” in ChrEg, 1975, pp. 83ff.

² P.Oxy. 2767, 17; the editors offer the English translation “for it to propagate and to grow always” (it could also be “for it to live and prosper”); 2969, 14; 2994, 10; PSI 1338, 18 (labor contract for a vineyard, in 299): ε—πιμελεία . . . εὐθαλοῦσα καὶ ζωογονοῦσα τω—ν παρεχον (read παρεχομένων) μοι μοσχευμάτων.

³ Much used by the medical writers, cf. the references in W. K. Hobart, Medical Language, p. 155.

⁴ a, K, L, G, and numerous miniscules read ζωοποιοῦντος (the confusion is not surprising; cf. 2Kgs 5:7; Deut 32:39—ε—γὼ ἀποκτενω— καὶ ζῆν ποιήσω). It seems that the Christian faith is here contrasted with devotions in the emperor cult: each person would consider the prince “as the source of his life and his existence” (I.Priene 105, 10, 32).

⁵ Moulton-Milligan cite P.Lond. 121, 529 (vol. 1, p. 101; magical papyrus of the third century), an invocation to the sun: Κύριε θεὲ μέγιστε ὁ τὰ ὅλα συνέχων καὶ ζωογονω—ν καὶ συνκρατω—ν τὸν κόσμον (republished by K. Preisendanz, PGM, vol. 2, p. 24); cf. PGM IV, 1162 (vol. 1, p. 112); 1754 (p. 128): “the one who breathes life-giving reason into all souls, εἰ—ς τὰς ψυχὰς πάσας ζωογόνον ε—μπνέοντα λόγισμον”; 1614 (p.124): “at the command of Helios he engenders living creatures, ε—ξωογόνησε τὰζω—α σου ε—πιτρέψαντος”; Corp. Herm. 9.6: “There is nothing that the (divine) cosmos does not generate into life (ζωογονει—); by its very movement it gives life to all things (πάντα ζωοποιει—).” On the comparison of the divinity to a sower or planter(φυτουργός), cf. A. J. Festugière, Dieu inconnu, pp. 220–224. R. Bultmann, (“ζωογονέω,” in TDNT, vol. 2, p. 873–874) cites Lucian, Am. 19: Aphrodite “brought to life all that breathes, ι—ερά τω—ν ὄλων φύσις”; Lucian, Dial. D. 8, of asexual begetting by Zeus, παρθένον ζωογονω—ν.

ἡγούμενος

hegoumenos, leader

hegoumenos, S 2233; TDNT 2.907–908; EDNT 2.113; MM 277; L&N 31.1, 36.1, 37.58; BDF §§264(6), 341, 413(1); BAGD 343

Derived from hegeomai, this present participle would normally mean “leader, guide, commander,” but the variety in its usage gives it a broader meaning. In Matt 2:6, it refers to the Messiah, “the leader who will shepherd my sheep” (= Mic 5:2—archontos; cf. Gen 49:10); in Acts 15:22, Judas Barsabbas and Silas are “leading men among the brethren” (andras hegoumenous en tois adelphois), an expression that could be compared to the three high officials in Dan 6:2 (cf. 2Chr 7:18), the chosen and outstanding men of 1Chr 7:40; especially that category of glorious men in Israel, “leaders of the people by their counsel”;¹ their prudence qualifies them as messengers in delicate matters (2Chr 17:7; 1Macc 9:35; 13:8).

Ho hegoumenos is the top man, like Joseph in Egypt,² one who is in some way superior (Luke 22:26; Phil 2:3). In the OT, it refers to men who are wise, intelligent, learned (Deut 1:13; Sir 9:17), powerful (Sir 41:17), from whom the chiefs of the tribes are chosen,³ and initially the king⁴ and the general (Judg 11:6, where B reads archegos; 1Kgs 16:16; 1Macc 13:53), or strategos (1Macc 13:42; 14:35, 41). But hegoumenos can refer to quite diverse levels: prince (Josh 13:21; 2Sam 3:38; 2Chr 19:11; Ezek 44:3), governor and magistrate (Ezek 23:6, 12; Dan 2:48; 3:3; Mic 3:9; Mal 1:8), prefect (2Chr 17:2), “official in charge of the house of God” (1Chr 9:11, 20), superintendent (1Chr 26:24; 27:4, 16; 2Chr 31:13), chief officer (Jer 20:1). In the army, distinctions are made between commander in chief (Jdt 5:5, 7:8; 2Chr 20:27), commander of a thousand (1Chr 12:21), commander of fifty (1Kgs 1:9, 13), commander of couriers (1Kgs 14:27; cf. the quarrymen under the orders of a hegoumenos, I.Did. II, 39, 51). The term always designates one who has authority and takes the initiative, the leader who has responsibility for a common undertaking,⁵ notably the head of the city (Sir 10:2) and of the nation, whom God himself prepares for this post.⁶

These usages help clarify the function of the hegoumenoi in Hebrews, who are in charge of the community.⁷ They are obviously analogous to the proistamenoí (1Thess 5:12; 1Tim 3:4-5), who have gifts for administration (kyberneseis, 1Cor 12:28; Rom 12:8), and who care for the believers as shepherds care for their sheep (epimeleomai, 1Tim 3:5), or as oikonomoi of the house of God.⁸ The author of Hebrews greets them, because they are worthy of respect (Heb 13:17, 24; cf. 1Clem. 21.6—“let us honor those who preside over us,” tous proegoumenous hemon aidesthomen; Josephus, War 1.271: “He died as a hero by an end that matched the conduct of his whole life”). He asks that they be remembered (verse 7) and obeyed.⁹ The Vulgate translates praepositi. We must recall that in the Hellenistic era, in the Lagid and Seleucid kingdoms, hegoumenos is a technical term for the person in charge of a city, is responsible for its defense or protection;¹⁰ or again, the president of an assembly, esteemed by all.¹¹

Since there is no other NT parallel than Luke 22:26 (parallel to ho meizon), the best thing would be to transliterate hegoumenos, which became the traditional title of superiors of monasteries (P.Rein. 107, 1; P.Ness. 45, 1; 46, 3; etc.). If we translate, it is difficult to choose between “leader,” which preserves the etymological sense, and “president,” which reflects the use of the term in the papyri to designate the head or person in charge of various associations, an office also referred to as epimeletes.¹² For example, there is the hegoumenos of the weavers of a village (hegoumenos gerdion tes komes, P.Grenf. II, 43, 9, in the first century; P.Bon. 20, 21, from 69–70); the hegoumenos of a town assembly, Onnopheros¹³—these presidents were linked and sometimes identified with the presbyteroi;¹⁴ and the hegoumenoi of religious bodies: “Athenodorus, to the hegoumenos of the priests of Soknopaiou Nesos.”¹⁵

