From all these texts the conclusion emerges that the post of hegoumenos was not a sinecure. The person in question was appointed because of his great competence.¹⁶ He had responsibility for the overall administration of the association and wielded authority, called and presided over meetings, supplied the drinks for the monthly dinner, managed finances (PSI 1265), gave orders (2Macc 14:16, 20), and was owed obedience;¹⁷ he took coercive measures against delinquents¹⁸ and meted out penalties. It is not surprising that in 24 BC the “spoude (zeal, pains) ton hegoumenon” should be mentioned (P.Tebt. 700, 30), or that in the second century AD a certain Dios, who awaits the arrival of the hegoumenos to solve his problems, should at the same time expect “the help of the gods” (P.Alex. 25, 15). These data supply something of an analogy with the office of the leaders of the Christian community in the first century: they “take pains,” and St. Paul asks that they be “thought of with infinite (hyperekperissou) respect” (1Thess 5:13; cf. Did. 4.1).

¹ Sir 44:4; cf. R. W. Skehan, “Staves and Nails and Scribal Slips (Ben Sira XLIV, 2–5),” in BASOR, 1970, pp. 66–71.

² Acts 7:10 (cf. Sir 49:15). The Lycaonians identify St. Paul with Hermes because he was “the master of the word” (Acts 14:12). Iamblichus, Myst. 1.1 has been cited as a parallel, where Hermes is the lord of language, ὁ τω—ν λόγων ἡγεμω—ν (cf. A. J. Festugière, Hermès Trismégiste, Paris, 1944, vol. 1, p. 73; Kleinknecht, “λέγω,” in TDNT, vol. 4, p. 88). To this add Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Amm. 1 7: When Aristotle was living near Plato “he had not yet been head of a school, οὔτε σχολῆς ἡγούμενος.”

³ Deut 5:23 (associated with the elders); 1Sam 15:17; 2Chr 5:2 (associated with the archontes); cf. leader of the people (2Sam 6:21; 1Chr 11:2; 1Esdr 1:49; 1Macc 3:55; 5:6, 18; 2Macc 10:21); head over Israel (1Sam 25:30; 1Kgs 1:35; 14:7), of the Tyrians (Sir 46:18).

⁴ David (1Sam 25:30); Saul (2Sam 2:5), Solomon (2Chr 9:26), Jehu (1Kgs 16:2); Hezekiah (2Kgs 20:5); cf. 2Chr 11:22; Jdt 5:3; Ezek 43:7. Nicolaus of Damascus, frag. 66.62, uses this title for Cyrus (in C. Müller, Fragmenta Historicorum Graecorum, vol.3, p. 404); cf. Epictetus 2.13.27. Appian calls L. Cassius sometimes ὁ τῆς —Ασίας ἡγούμενος (Mith. 17), sometimes τῆς —Ασίας ἀνθύπατος (Mith. 24), sometimes ὁ περὶ τὸ Πέργαμον —Ασίας ἡγούμενος (Mith. 11); cf. I.Bulg. 876, 6; 1569, 3; Dio Chrysostom 78.15: peregrinorum princeps. Cf. a prefect, ε—πι —Ιουλίου Κασσίου τοῦ διασημοτάτου ἡγουμένου τοῦ Ἑλλησπόντου (I.Ilium, n. 97, 12). Letter of Severius Alexander τοι—ς ε—πιτρόποις καὶ τοι—ς ἡγουμένοις τω—ν ε—θνω—ν (P.Oxy. 3106, 3). In Diodorus Siculus, the meaning is mostly military: the commandant of a garrison (17.8.7), the satrap leading his horsemen (17.19.4; 17.19.6; 17.48.3), Darius commanding the left wing (17.59.2; cf. 17.60.5), the commandant of a bodyguard (17.61.3), the head of the army (17.65.4), leaders of the fleet (17.107.1).

⁵ 1Macc 9:30. Ptolemaeus of Mende: the Jews left Egypt led by Moses, Μωσέως ἡγουμένου (in T. Reinach, Textes d’auteurs grecs et romains relatifs au Judaïsme, 2d ed., Hildesheim, 1963, n. 46). A synonym of πρωτοστάτης, “commander of the front ranks,” in Asclepiodotus: ὁ δὲ ἡγούμενος ὠνόμασται καὶ πρωτοστάτης (2.3; restored by the editors, Köchly and Rüstow; cf. 2.10: ἡγούμενος = τηλάρχης).

⁶ Sir 17:17—“For each nation God prepares a leader.” This could mean a temporal king or a heavenly prince, cf. R. Meyer, “λαός,” in TDNT, vol. 4, pp. 40–41; H. Bietenhard, Die himmlische Welt im Urchristentum und Spätjudentum, Tübingen, 1951, pp. 109ff.; L. Hackspill, “L’Angéologie juive à l’époque néo-testamentaire,” in RB, 1902, p. 546.

⁷ Cf. Sir 10:2—“As is the head of the city, so will be all the inhabitants.” Cf. J. Delorme, in Le Ministère et les ministères selon le N.T., Paris, 1974, p. 321.

⁸ Cf. Luke 12:42; 1Cor 4:1; 9:17; Titus 1:7. Didymus the Blind: “Those who guide the people like sheep (οι— ἡγούμενοι τω—ν λαω—ν) by the priesthood are their shepherds (ποιμένες)” (on Zech 4:41; cf. 4:51).

⁹ The hegoumenos has authority, he rules, cf. 2Macc 14:16, 20; 1Clem. 1.3.

¹⁰ Cf. E. Bickerman, Institutions des Séleucides, pp. 64, 80; F. Cumont, L’Égypte des astrologues, pp. 39, 71. The term ἡγούμενος would seem less politically loaded and more discreet than ἡγεμών, which expresses more dignity: prince (Josephus, Ant. 12.223; 19.217), imperial governor (Ant. 15.405), procurator or prefect (Ant. 18.55 = Pontius Pilate; who is described as praefectus Iudaeae in an inscription discovered in 1961 at Caesarea, cf. JBL, 1962, p. 70). At the same time, ἡγούμενοι are pagan governors (in 1Clem. 5.7; 32.2; 37.2–3; 51.5; 55.1; P.Oxy. 896, 26) or provincial prefects (P.Oxy. 1020, 5; 1119, 17), but these are actual “leaders” (Josephus, War 2.434), and they are described as “very eminent” (P.Oxy. 1186, 1; 1722, 1; P.Panop.Beatty 1, 78, 126, 143, 385). L. Robert gives this definition: “The term ἡγούμενοι refers to the whole range of Roman ‘authorities’ in their variety” (Opera Minora Selecta, vol. 2, p. 329; cf. H. J. Mason, Greek Terms, p. 151).

¹¹ Sir 33:19—“Hear me, great ones among the people (μεγιστα—νες); presidents of the assembly (οι— ἡγούμενοι ε—κκλησίας), lend your ear”; 39:4—“He will serve in the midst of the great ones, he will appear in the presence of the chiefs”; Ep. Arist. 309–310: “The elders . . . together with the leaders of the people made this declaration.” Cf. C.Pap.Jud., p. 9; M. Guerra y Gomez, Episcopos y presbyteros, Burgos, 1962, pp. 322ff.; A. Pelletier, Josèphe adaptateur, pp. 186–188.

¹² P.Mich. 245, 5 (in AD 47; cf. C. Præaux, “A propos des associations dans l’Égypte gréco-romaine,” in RIDA, vol. 1, 1948, pp. 189–198). These statutes or nomoi would be of Greek origin, cf. A. E. R. Boak, “The Organization of Guilds in Greco-Roman Egypt,” in TAPA, 1937, pp. 212–220. In the plural, hegoumenoi are “authorities, magistrates” (I.Perg., 536, 7; I.Car., 6, 9; Dittenberger, Syl. 748, 21; SEG XVIII, 143, 5 and 52; from AD 43 at Corinth. Cf. L. Robert, Études anatoliennes, p. 51; M. G. Colin, Fouilles de Delphes IV, 3, p. 102, n. 2); but in the singular, ἡγούμενος is most often a subordinate functionary (P.Ryl. 196, 9; second century), like the police superintendent (P. Yale 62,1; SB 9630, 1 = ZPE, vol. 6, 1970, p. 11; BGU 2016, 1), the personnel chief in the office of the strategos, a provost (P. Oxy. 294, 19; in AD 22; Pap. Lugd. Bat. 26, verso 1), the chief of the phylakitai (P. Tebt. 731, 1), an overseer (P. Flor. 382, 15; P. Oxy. 43 recto; col. VI, 14), hence an episkopos.

¹³ Ἡγούμενος συνόδου κώμης Τάνεως, BGU 1648, 3 (second century); P. Tebt. 484 verso: Εὐτυχὸς ἡγούμενος κώμης Τεβτύνεως; P. Grenf. II, 67, 2: ἡγ. . . . κώμης Βακχιάδος; P. Alex. 6, 3: ἡγ. . . . κώμης Σεκνεπαίου Νέσσου; SB 10619, 3. It is to this functionary that certain farmers address their petition (P. Mich. 523, 15; AD 66; 524, 12; AD 98). Cf. P. Fouad 18, 1: “Ἡρακλείδης Ἀρμιώσιος ἡγούμενος, Heracleides son of Harmiosios, president” (14 October 53). The editor, J. Scherer, comments: “ἡγούμενος . . . The title is, in general, narrowed down by a genitive: ἡγούμενος ἰ—ερέων, κώμης, γερδίων; cf. BGU 2239, 1: Setabous, head of the elders of Soknopaiou Nesos (AD 17). In P. Tebt. 573, the word is used without a modifier; but there is no ambiguity, because the preceding context has to do with a σύνοδος; similarly BGU 1615, line 6, where the context is a weavers’ association. Here, on the other hand, the sense is not clear, and two explanations are possible. Either Heracleides is the ‘president of the town association’—but in this case we would expect ἡγούμενοθ κώμηθ συνόδου (P. Tebt. 401, line 23) or at least ἡγούμενος κώμης (P. Tebt. 484, verso. Cf. W. L. Westermann, ‘Entertainment in the villages of Greco-Roman Egypt,’ in JEA, 1932, p. 23); or Heracleides is the president of the college or πρεσβύτεροι δημοσίων γεωργω—ν: in which case it would be more understandable that ἡγούμενος is not made more specific. But the existence of a ‘president of the college of elders’ is not attested, as far as I know, by any other document, and this explanation, like the other, leaves room for doubt. In P. Fay. 110, 26, and Dittenberger, Or. 671, the absolute usage of ἡγούμενος gives rise to similar difficulties of interpretation.”

¹⁴ Cf. P. Ryf. 122, 7–8; 125, 3; 196, 9; BGU 392, col. II, 6: διὰ τω—ν ἰ—ερέων πρεσβυτέρων Τανεφρις; cf. P. Mich. 226, 3, 9; 344, 1: “Horos, son of Petermouthis, president of the elders of the public farmers of the village of Kerkesephis” (first century); ZPE, 1975, p. 144, n. 4; 1976, pp. 196ff.

¹⁵ Τω— ἡγουμένω τω—ν ἰ—ερέων τῆς Σεκνεπαίου Νέσου. In the first century, in P. Vindob. Worp 12, 1; in 66, P. Lond. 281, 2 (vol. 2, p. 184), ἡγ. ἰ—ερέων Σοκνοπαίου Νήσου; in 87, Pap. Lugd. Bat. II, 1, 31: περὶ τω—ν ἰ—εροῦ ἡγουμένων καὶ πρεσβυτέρων αἰ—τίας ε—χόντων; around the year 1, P. Tebt. 525: Παεῦς ἡγούμενος ἰ—ερέων.

¹⁶ “An excellent man, ἄνδρα ἀγαθότατον” (P. Mich. 244, 4); ἄνδρα λόγιον (P. Lond. 2710, 5; cf. C. Roberts, T. C. Skeat, A. D. Nock, “The Guild of Zeus Hypsistos,” in HTR, 1936, pp. 36–89; J. Seyfarth, in Aeg, 1955, p. 17).

¹⁷ “All shall obey the president” (P.Mich. 244, 15); cf. P.Petaus 34, 20: εἰ—ς τὸ βῆμα τοῦ ἡγεμόνος (read ἡγουμένῳ) Ἄρπάλου. Cf. Polybius 1.45.4: πειθαρχει—ν τοι—ς ἡγουμένοις; cf. 67, 4; Plutarch, Praec. ger. rei publ. 21.816 f.

¹⁸ He could “arrest (the offender) in public or at home and hand him over for justice” (P.Mich. 244, 11ff.). Cf. P.Mich. 245, 43 (statutes of an association of salt merchants; cf. M. Boak, “An Ordinance of the Salt Merchants at Tebtunis,” in AJP, 1937, pp. 210–210); 246, 1; 247, 1 (all from the first half of the first century). On P.Wisc. 38, 40, 43, 75, the editor, P. J. Sijpesteijn, comments: “With ἡγούμενος the person who collects the daily amounts is meant. He could be a πράκτωρ, cf. P.Yale I,62 introduction.”

ἡδέως, ἡδιον, ἡδιστα, ἡδύς

hedeos, gladly; hedion, more gladly, quite gladly; hedista, most gladly, very gladly; hedys, pleasant, sweet

hedeos, S 2234; EDNT 2.113; MM 277–278; L&N 25.129; BAGD 343–344 | hedion, BAGD 343–344 | hedista, S 2236; MM 278; L&N 25.129; BDF §§60(2), 246; BAGD 343–344 | hedys, BAGD 344

Hedys, which is used to describe wine (Esth 1:7; P.Cair.Zen. 59110, 29; P.Lond. 2056, 4), an offering that is acceptable to God (Josephus, Ant. 12.47), a sweet child (CII 126), a person who is pleasant to be with (C.P.Herm. 3, 5; cf. P.Brem. 55, 9; P.Ryl. 706, 14), and of “the sweet life.”¹ As a parallel for the comparative hedion, which is found only in Sir 22:11, which bids the reader “cry more sweetly (or less sadly) over a deceased person, because he is at rest” (hedion klauson epi nekro), the letter of the proconsul Paulus Fabius Maximus in 9 BC has been cited. This letter proposes to the Greeks of Asia Minor the introduction of a new anniversary for Augustus, “the same for all; it would be more satisfying for humankind (hedion d’an anthropois) if everyone joined with it the pleasure of their own inauguration.”²

As for the adverb hedeos,³ it refers to the sort of friendly indifference with which an audience may listen to this or that speaker (2Cor 11:19; Polybius 5.36.6; 5.37.12) and the real pleasure that they may derive from so doing (Mark 6:20; 12:37). Menander uses it often,⁴ as do the papyri, from which Moulton-Milligan give numerous examples.⁵ It is common for the author of a letter to ask his correspondent exactly what he wants, saying that he will do it willingly. In 250 BC: “Write if you need anything from us, for we will do it hedeos” (graphe de kai, ean tinos ton par’hemis chreian eches, hoti gar hedeos poiesomen, SB 7648, 8); in the second century AD: “But you also must make clear to me what you want; they will do it hedeos.”⁶ Pleasure is or is not derived from someone’s company (SB 4317, 10; 7572, 20; P.Oxy. 298, 33; 1218, 12). The word is also used in formulas of greeting,⁷ and takes on the nuances of willingly, gladly (Pap.Lugd.Bat. XVI, 31, 4), pleasantly, with pleasure, as in this epitaph for a black slave: “Learn, stranger, that I am Fortunatus, because I obtained from Fortune that which is pleasant for mortals” (SB 8071, 18; cf. SEG VIII, 464, 22).

The adverb hedista, which St. Paul uses in the sense of “most gladly” (2Cor 12:9, 15), takes on all the preceding meanings. “King Agrippa to Joseph his very dear friend, greetings. It was with much pleasure that I read your letter” (Josephus, Life 365); “Write me what you want, and I will be very happy to do it” (P.Oxy. 1061, 21; from 22 BC); “I greet you most gladly” (P.Oxy. 933, 5); something is received with great pleasure (P.Lond. 897, 8; vol. 3, p. 207; in AD 84); to dilute in very sweet wine (P.Oxy. 234,39).

¹ Epitaph of Serapias: “We are grateful to you, because you made life sweet, ε—πεὶ βίον ἡδὺς ἔδικας” (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 52, 5). The epitaph of a Christian jurist at Eumenia in Phrygia, in the third century: “Hasten, rejoice your soul at all times, for life is sweet” (SEG VI, 210, 36; cf. L. Robert, Hellenica, vols. 11–12, Paris 1960, pp. 414, 427); PSI 1242, 4 (first century). Cf. Euripides, Phoen.: “No land is sweeter than the one that nurtured us” (in Stobaeus, Ecl. 4.39.10 = vol. 4, p. 723). Plutarch, Phoc. 10.5: “the same person, like the same wine, can be at the same time agreeable (ἡδύς) and bitter”; cf. 10.9; Plutarch, Cat. Min. 14.8: “you will come back more amiable (ἡδίω)”;Ti. Gracch. 10.4: a law that is favorable to the people (cf. 2.3); Plutarch, C. Gracch. 19.3: Cornelia was very congenial toward her visitors.

² I.Priene 105, 19; cf. BGU 372, col. I, 15: ἵνα δὲ τοῦτο προθυμότερον καὶ ἡδιον ποιήσωσιν; republished by Chrest.Wilck., n. 19 (edict of M. Sempronius Liberalis, in AD 154); P.Stras. 275, 6; IGLS 718, 81, 92: “I will do it all the more willingly” (letter of Octavian); cf. ἡδυτέραι τῆ φωνῆ (UPZ 77, col. I, 17; second century BC); an envoy’s request for a remedy: φάρμακον δακνηρὸν καὶ ἕτερον ἡδύτερον (P.Oslo 54, 9; from the second century AD; on this comparative, cf. E. Mayser, Grammatik, vol. 1, p. 298). Ἡδυσμα is a “condiment” (Aristophanes, Vesp. 496; cf. J. Jouanna, Hippocrate: La Nature de l’homme, Berlin, 1975, p. 305).

³ In the OT, ἡδέως is used for sleep (Prov 3:24), hidden waters (Prov 9:17), the pleasures of the table (Tob 7:10, 11; cf. Ep. Arist. 198: “so that when we begin dinner, we shall enjoy it”; cf. P.Tebt. 758, 18: “it is pleasant to be drunk and protected,” second century BC), of time spent pleasantly (2Macc 11:26), of a contented heart (Esth 1:10), even in toil and death (2Macc 2:27; 6:30; cf. 4Macc 10:20).

⁴ Menander, Dysk. 9: “Throughout a life already long, the dyskolos had never uttered a friendly word”; 136: “it was plain to see that he was not accompanying me gladly” (οὐχ ἡδέως); 270: “Would you permit me to have a serious word with you? —Most willingly; speak (μάλ ἡδέως, λέγε)”; 658: “I should be happy to see him”; 726: “For all that, he saved me gladly”; Menander, Aspis 435.

⁵ Notably the letter of Emperor Claudius thanking an association of gymnastai who had sent him a crown of gold to commemorate his victory over the Bretons: τὸν πεμφθέντα μοι ὑφ ὑμῶν ἐ—πὶ τῇ κατὰ Βρετάννων νείκη χρυσοῦν στέφανον ἡδέως ἔλαβον (P.Lond. 1178, 13; vol. 3, p. 216); cf. Pap.Lugd.Bat. I, 13, 4: “Our lord Arpebekis receives with great pleasure (ἡδιστα παρά σου λαμβάνει) the perfume that you sent”; Ἐζησα ἡδέως (IGUR II, n. 786); συνβίῳ ἡδίστη (ibid. 855). P.Giss. 73, 4: —Ἐκομισάμην σου τὴν ἐ—πιστολὴν ἡδεως; P.Stras. 400, 3. Plutarch, Phoc. 3.2: “we see the early produce with pleasure.” Diodorus Siculus 17.9.4; 17.56.2; receive with pleasure.

⁶ P.Oxy. 133, 30, περὶ δὲ καὶ σὺ ὧν θέλεις δήλου μοι, ἡδέως ποιήσοντι. In two Christian letters, P.Grenf. II, 73, 20: “let me know what you want; I will do it gladly” (third century); P.Oxy. 1162, 11 (fourth century); cf. M. Naldini, Il Cristianesimo in Egitto, n. 21, 51, 87.

⁷ P.Oxy. 531, 3: ἡδέως σε ἀσπαζόμεθα πάντες οἱ— ἐ—ν οἴκῳ (second century AD); P.Brem. 10, 4: ἡδέως σε, ἀδελφε, ἀσπάζομαι (cf. the correction, in Berichtigungsliste, vol. 4, p. 10).

ἤπιος

epios, congenial, kind

epios, S 2261; EDNT 2.122; MM 281; L&N 88.61; BAGD 348

Unknown in the OT, rare in the papyri, epios is used only twice in the NT, both times by St. Paul. Writing to the Thessalonians, he reminds them that as an apostle of Christ he could have been a burden on them (en barei

) but rather was entirely congenial toward them,¹ after the fashion of a mother who nurses her children and pampers them. To Timothy, he writes: “A servant of God must not be combative, but very congenial toward all.”² In both cases, epios refers to a style of teaching and of apostolic authority, without sharpness or bitterness arising from overzealousness: St. Paul shows a motherly goodness; the bishop of Ephesus will make no use of hurtful or sarcastic speech, or a rigid attitude;³ nor will he be intolerant in his relations with others; he will be “kind toward all,” even adversaries and opponents.⁴

This means that in the NT epiotes is not so much a virtue of personal and family life⁵—much less of child-rearing—as the attitude required in the leader of the community. Toward adversaries who are determined to discuss and quarrel, the good shepherd keeps a courteous and calm attitude, an attitude well suited to pacifying the hot-tempered and aggressive, a disarming gentleness.⁶ In paganism and in Judaism, it is above all a divine attribute: “the most epios god toward humans” (theos ... anthropoisi d’ epioutatos, Euripides, Bacch. 861); the Pythagorean Sthenidas of Locri: “It is natural that the first god was considered father of the gods and father of men, especially because he is epios toward all whom he has brought into being (hoti epios pros panta ta hyp’ auto genomena esti) and because for all of them alike he is the nurse and teacher—tropheus, didaskalos—who teaches them all good things” (in Stobaeus, 7.63; vol. 4, p. 271). Philo attributes these words to Yahweh: “I am by nature epios and favorable to true suppliants” (Moses 1.72). Zeus, who is “epios toward humans (ho d’ epios anthropoisi), sends them unflinching signs” (Aratus, Phaen. 5); Leto, “endlessly mild, epios toward humans and toward the immortal gods, mild from her first day, merciful among all the Olympians.”⁷ In an invocation to Isis, from the second century, this tenderness is parallel to philostorgia, the virtue of rulers:⁸ *en Kalamisi epian, en te Karene philostorgon.*⁹ This modifier goes particularly well with divinities who save: Apollo, Asclepius, Hygieia.¹⁰

It is likewise a royal virtue, one that Ahasuerus made good on.¹¹ It is incumbent upon masters to show “congeniality and mildness” (Philo, Decalogue 167). Philodemus of Gadara agrees: “let him appear praos (mild) because of his judgment, let him be loved for his epiotes ” (Good King 7.13–14; cf. 6.24). According to Hecataeus, “after the battle of Pharsalus, Ptolemy became master of Syria, and many of the inhabitants, when they learned of his cordiality and humaneness—ten epioteta kai philanthropian—wanted to leave with him for Egypt” (Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.186). When Augustus gave way to wrath, Maecenas always calmed him: “for he set him free from wrath and restored him to a more epios frame of mind.”¹² In the fifth century, Leontios, prefect of the pretorium of Illyria, staked his claim to glory on having been mild and benevolent toward upright judges and dreadful to the unjust.¹³ In his chapter on descriptions of royalty, Julius Pollux lists: “Concerning the praises of a king, say—Peri basileos epainon, lege: pater, epios, praios, hemeros, pronoetikos, epieikes, philanthropos, megalophron” (Onom. 1.2.40). The first sequence probably comes from Homer.¹⁴ It goes without saying that epiotes can be practiced by private individuals. Moulton-Milligan cite this tomb inscription: “kind and epios to all people.”¹⁵ In fact, it is most often associated with hilaos and meilichos. Philo inserts it between hemerotes and philanthropia (Sacr. Abel and Cain 27). Finally, while nepios is the underaged child, or minor, subject to someone’s authority or in need of someone’s protection, the person who is epios plays a parental and civic role, is a person of responsible age who is gifted with beneficent power and with wisdom.¹⁶

¹ 1Thess 2:7—ἀλλὰ ἐ—γενήθημεν ἥπιοι ἐ—ν μέσῳ ὑμῶ—ν. A fair number of the papyri and the Vulgate read νήπιοι, but the context rules out this variant (cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 3, p. 107; B. Rigaux, Thessaloniens, on this text). Cf. A. J. Malherbe, “Gentle as a Nurse’: The Cynic Background to I Thess. II,” in NovT, 1970, pp. 203–217; C. Crawford, “The ‘Tiny’ Problem of I Thess. II, 7: The Case of the Curious Vocative,” in Bib, 1973, pp. 69–72. —The Latin writers translated mitis (Cyprian, Augustine, Ambrosiaster), mansuetus (Ambrose), lenis, quitus, (Jerome); but we must take into account the shades of meaning of related words: ἀγαθωσύνη is goodness pure and simple; εὐνοια, benevolence; χρηστότης, kindness; πραυ4της, mildness; ἐ—πιείκεια, sympathetic evenhandedness, or clemency; ἡρεμασιότης, tranquility and calm; λειότης, consideration (λει—ος, a smooth skull, Sophocles, Ichn. 359; the calm sea, Herodotus 2.117); ἀστειότης, urbanity, charm; ἡμερότης, the genteel ways of the polite as opposed to the crudeness of the boorish (Philo, Contemp. Life 9). Ἡπιος would be “congenial” or “easy-going”—the French word débonnaire—though in our days this term can have the pejorative sense of “mild to the point of weakness.” But its old meaning, including nuances of mildness, benevolence, goodness, would match Greek usage exactly, cf. La Fontaine, Fables, III, 4: “Il devait vous suffire que votre premier roi fut débonnaire et doux”; Bossuet, Serm. Quinq. 2: “Jésus, le débonnaire Jésus, il plaint nos misères.”

² 2Tim 2:24—οὐ δεῖ— μάχεσθαι, ἀλλὰ ἥπιον εἶναι πρὸς πάντας. The verb μάχομαι is often used in a figurative sense for “squabble, quarrel” (cf. J. M. Jacques, Ménandre: La Samienne, Paris, 1971, p. liii). Epictetus 4.5.1: “The kalokagathos doesn’t dispute with anyone, and, as much as possible, keeps other people from doing so.”

³ One thinks of the leitmotiv of I.Asok.: “the king, friend of the gods, of friendly demeanor”; cf. Artigamos, σῶφρων, νέος, ἥπιος (I.Bulg. 221, 1).

⁴ There is no question, in fact, of winning a personal victory and imposing one's will by force, but of setting forth and gaining acceptance for the gospel. The Messiah, who was all tact, eschewed violence. Isa 52:1-4; Matt 12:18-21; 1Pet 2:23; cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 1, pp. 68ff.; O. Cullmann, Christology of the New Testament, Philadelphia, 1963, pp. 52ff., 66, 69; M. A. Chevalier, L'Esprit et le Messie dans le Bas-Judaïsme et le Nouveau Testament, Paris, 1958, pp. 46–48, 72ff.

⁵ Sometimes ἥπιος is used for a father in relation to his son (Philodemus of Gadara, Hom. 6.24). For Philodemus, this would be the virtue that moderates wrath, τὰς τω—ν ἥπιωτάτων φαρμάκων ὑπομένει προσαγωγὰς (Ir. 19.19; cf. Piet. 95.11); cf. the epitaph of a physician from the imperial period: μόσοις ἥπια φάρμακα πα—σιν (L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1950, p. 218, n. 241 a). Cf. ἥπιος as a proper name, P.Fay. 67, 4 (AD 80); J. Baillet, Inscriptions grecques et latines . . . à Thèbes, Cairo, 1920, n. 145. —Ἡπιόδωρος (P.Cair.Zen. 59437; BGU 1896; P.Tebt. 858, etc.). —Ἡπιόθολμος (SB 8439).

⁶ Cf. Jas 3:18—“A harvest of justice in peace is sown for those who spread peace.” In most of its occurrences, ἥπιος is described as being shown toward a large number of people; for example, Berenice, πα—σιν δ ἥπιος (Theocritus 17.5).

⁷ Hesiod, Th. 407: μείλιχον αι—εί, ἥπιον ἀνθρώποισι, καὶ ἀθανάτοισι θεοι—σιν, μείλιχον ε—ξ ἀρχῆς, ἀγανώτατον ε—ντὸς —Ολύμπου.

⁸ Cf. C. Spicq, “ΦΙΛΟΣΤΟΡΓΟΣ (à propos de Rom. XII, 10),” in RB, 1955, pp. 497–510.

⁹ P.Oxy. 1380, 11, cf. 86, 155. The only attestation from the papyri, P.Oxy. 2161, 7 (fragment from the Δικτουλοί of Aeschylus), with the commentary of E. Siegmann, in Philologus, 1948, pp. 90–93.

¹⁰ Ἡπιε' Απολλων (SB 8511, 2); cf. K. Keyssner, Gottesvorstellung und Lebensauffassung im griechischen Hymnus, Stuttgart, 1932, pp. 93–95; E. Des Places, La Religion grecque, Paris, 1969, pp. 76, 78, 235; cf. pp. 84, 265.

¹¹ Esth 3:13; cf. C. Spicq, “Bénignité, mansuétude, douceur, clémence,” in RB, 1947, p. 332.

¹² Τῆς τε γὰρ ὀργῆς αὐτὸν ἀεὶ παρέλυε, καὶ ε—ς τὸ ἥπιώτερον μεθίστη, Dio Cassius 55.7; cf. 55.17: τοι—ς ἥπιοις φαρμάκοις. Cf. Eusebius: “At the beginning of his reign, Nero was milder, ἥπιώτερον” (Hist. Eccl. 2.22.8).

¹³ Κριντῆρσι γάρ ει—μι ἥπιος ει—θυδικοίς, τοι—ς δ ἀδίκουσι δέος (Epigramme de Gortyne, line 4, published by L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 4, pp. 14–16).

¹⁴ Homer, Od. 2.37, 2.230, 5.8, 5.12, 15.152; cf. Il. 8.40, 22.184, 24.770. According to the historians of religions, the Homeric pantheon is copied from the feudal Mycenaean royalty, so that Homer's gods borrow their personalities from contemporary people and kings, cf. W. K. C. Guthrie, The Greeks and Their Gods, Boston, 1955, pp.118ff.

¹⁵ Μειλείχιον πάντεσσι καὶ ἥπιον ἀνθρώποισι. Republished in its entirety by E. Bernand: “When he was already twenty-two years old, young Sarapion with his beard just beginning to grow was led off to Hades by the dread Parca of death, he who was kind and friendly to everyone” (Inscriptions métriques, n. 79).

¹⁶ This conclusion is that of M. Lacroix, “ΗΠΙΟΣ–ΝΗΠΙΟΣ,” in Mélanges A. M. Desrousseaux, Paris, 1937, pp. 261–272.

ἡσυχάζω, ἡσυχία, ἡσύχιος

hesychazo, to be silent; to be calm, tranquil; hesychia, silence, tranquility, rest; hesychios, tranquil, quiet, peaceful

hesychazo, S 2270; EDNT 2.125; NIDNTT 3.111–112; MM 281; L&N 23.82, 33.119, 88.103; BDF §420(2); BAGD 349 | hesychia, S 2271; EDNT 2.125; NIDNTT 3.111–112; MM 281; L&N 22.43, 33.119, 88.103; BAGD 349 | hesychios, S 2272; EDNT 2.125; NIDNTT 3.111–112; MM 281–282; L&N 88.104; BAGD 349

Before taking on moral value, these terms—etymology unknown—meant either silence or tranquility, and it is not always impossible to unravel this double connotation.

I. — When the Jews heard Paul speaking in Hebrew they “kept all the more quiet” (Acts 22:2). Doctors of the law and Pharisees were reduced to silence by the wisdom of Jesus and “held their peace.”¹ But if Peter's audience, after hearing him tell about the conversion of the centurion Cornelius, “kept silence” (Acts 11:18, hesychasan), keeping their objections quiet, we would do better to translate “fell silent,” because it is said immediately thereafter “and they glorified God,” apparently aloud. Similarly, when St. Paul would not let himself be persuaded to give up his plans to go to Jerusalem, the brothers are silent, meaning that they no longer insisted, but more accurately, “We remained quiet, saying ‘God’s will be done’” (Acts 21:14). In other words, “silence” means not the absence of noise or speech but quiet and tranquility.² So it is that a woman—like a disciple in the school of a teacher—should receive “instruction in silence (en hesychia), in all submissiveness (en pase hypotage).”³ This mandate is more psychological and religious than physical: it calls for an attitude of attentiveness and receptiveness.⁴

II. — In the LXX and the papyri, the most common meaning of hesychia-hesychazo is remain calm, tranquil;⁵ repose is contrasted with agitation, war, or danger.⁶ It is commonly said that the land, the city, or the populace was tranquil for so many years, meaning that they enjoyed peace for that length of time:⁷ peaceful people live in security and at rest (Ezek 38:11; Hebrew shaqat). The meaning is classical, since Thucydides uses hesychia-hesychazo for inaction, times of peace, as opposed to combat (3.6.1; 3.12.1; 3.66.21; 3.71.1; 3.106.3); this is the meaning in 2Macc 14:4 (“That day Alcimus did nothing more, ten hemeran ekeinen hesychian esche”) and in Luke 23:56 (“on the Sabbath, the women rested, according to the commandment”). The definition of the word is then extended to cover interior calm, as opposed to anxiety or fear.⁸ The one who listens to talebearers will never have peace (Sir 28:16; cf. BGU 1764, 11), but the good will remain in tranquility (Prov 15:15). Yahweh watches over them (Isa 66:2) and gives them hesychia (1Chr 22:9). “The children of the great God will live in tranquility (hesychios) around the temple” (Sib. Or. 3.702).

III. — There are different levels of rest. Just as hesychia does not mean absolute muteness, neither does it imply the cessation of all activity. St. Paul exhorts the Thessalonians to work meta hesychias,⁹ so that they may eat their own bread (2Thess 3:12), to “live in quietness (hesychazein), look after your own business, work with your hands” (1Thess 4:11), meaning without agitation, dispute, or vain curiosity, without poking into things that are not their concern.¹⁰ The meaning is clearly moral. The best parallel is Philo’s contrast between the respectable man and the “vulgar man, who spends his days meddling, running around in public, in theaters, tribunals, councils, and assemblies, meetings and consultations of all sorts; he prattles on without moderation, fruitlessly, to no end; he confuses and stirs up everything, mingling truth with falsehood, the spoken with the unspoken, the private with the public, the sacred with the profane, the serious with the ridiculous, not having learned to remain quiet (hesychian), which is the ideal when the situation calls for it; and he pricks up his ears in an excess of bustling busyness.”¹¹

IV. — Finally, the whole of the Christian life should unfold in a climate of peace and security that is favorable to the birth and development of virtue.¹² Believers should pray for the powers that be, “so that we may lead a peaceful and hesychios life.”¹³ Like hopos, hina introduces a result: that the Christian community, free from trials, may develop in calm and tranquility. The adjective *hesychios*¹⁴ reinforces the idea of peace (eremon) and accentuates the importance of unfettered external freedom and of serenity of heart. An untroubled political and social context is favorable for the life of the soul.¹⁵ Christian women, according to 1Pet 3:4, have the charm of quietness and peacefulness (tou praeos kai hesychiou pneumatos), the opposite of agitation, impatience, annoyance, notably of compulsive discussion.¹⁶ Discretion and tranquility go together.¹⁷ Thanks to this peaceful, religious calm, the spouse can hope to win her husband who does not believe in the word of God even without speaking a word (1Pet 3:1).

V. — Hellenistic hesychia then has a broad range of meaning: (a) repose in a bed (Jos. Asen. 10.8; 25.3), in the grave (Job 3:13—nyn an koimetheis hesychasa), days of relaxation (Esth 4:21—I do not wear the diadem “on days when I am resting”), especially during retirement, like the secretary Pamouthis, who expressed the desire to terminate his functions, to withdraw from business (ton pragmaton) because of his poor health, and to rest: kai hesychasai.¹⁸ (b) This tranquility of mind and of heart, this calm existence, sheltered from trouble and danger, is the hope of all citizens (DioChrysostom 6.34: medepote de hesychian dynamenous agein; Thucydides 1.71.3; 5.26.5; Philo, Rewards 128; T. Asher 6.6), of spouses (P.Oxy. 129, 8), of every wise person (PSI 41, 23), like Sertorius (Plutarch, Eum. 21.1). (c) If Epictetus addresses “those who seek tranquility and leisure, en hesychia diagein” (4.4; cf. 1.10.2: en hesychia kai ataraxia), he sees in this desire an occasion for mutual interdependence, which is contrary to ataraxia (cf. Plato, Resp. 6.496 d; Epicurus, according to Plutarch, Mor. 465 f). But the Latins raised otium cum dignitate to the level of an ideal.¹⁹ (d) This repose is even a religious virtue, because it is proper to God, who is the model for the wise person.²⁰ Through its detachment from created goods, it becomes in Philo a characteristic of the contemplative life, practiced by the silent Essenes (Josephus, War 2.130), and a monastic spirituality: “If you see a monk walking along alone, with a demeanor that bespeaks humility, modesty, quietude, and tranquility—tapeinon kai praon kai hesychion kai eremon—envy the happiness of that man.”²¹

¹ Luke 14:4—οι— δὲ ἡσύχασαν (Mark 3:4—ε—σιώπων); cf. Philo, Prov. 2.101: “In our inability to track down nature and the properties of each phenomenon, we remain silent”; Contemp. Life 75: at the beginning of the meal of the Therapeutai, “there was a great silence”; Abraham 29: “Six of our faculties sound the call to arms endlessly and without respite. . . . These are the five senses and spoken language . . . prattling on, a mouth without restraint, on thousands of subjects concerning which it would be preferable to remain silent”; 174: “too moved to speak”; Job 32:1 (Hebrew shabat), the three men stop discussing with Job; 1Macc 1:3—the land fell silent before Alexander; Prov 11:12 (Hebrew harash): “the intelligent person keeps silence, ἡσυχίαν ἄγει.” Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.114. “Eumenes was carried in a litter away from the army, to avoid the noise (ε—ν ἡσυχία) because of his insomnia” (Plutarch, Eum. 14.6); cf. Pomp. 23.2; 48.7; 73.1; Cat. Min. 44.5: “they heard his words quietly”; 12.3: “enter the city noiselessly”; Phoc. 34.9: keep silence; Cleom. 38.10: “silently and quietly, σιωπῆ καὶ μεθ ἡσυχίας”; Dem. 17.1; Cic. 4.3.

² Cf. Ep. Arist. 301: The Seventy meet on the island of Pharos, “a magnificent resting place engulfed in silence (πολλῆς ἡσυχίας),” “in their retreat, so pleasant because of its tranquility (διὰ τὴν ἡσυχίαν)” (307); Plutarch, Alex. 6.6: “Alexander, quietly throwing off his mantle.”

³ 1Tim 2:11 (cf. 1Cor 14:34—σιγάτωσαν); 2:12—“I do not permit a woman to speak, nor to control a man, but to remain quiet (ἀλλ εἶναι ε—ν ἡσυχία),” i.e., without intervening, or “without stirring”; cf. Plutarch, Pomp. 68.4–7: πολλὴν ἡσυχίαν is contrasted with κίνησιν καὶ θόρυβον and μετὰ βοῆς; 69.3.

⁴ The Suda (under the word Σαπφώ) calls the pupils of Sappho μαθήτριά. Then there is a papyrus from the grammarian Kallias of Mytilene (P.Col. inv. 5860) that says that she taught in all tranquility not only prominent young girls from her island but also others from Ionia: ἡ δ ε—φ ἡσυχίας παιδεύουσα τὰς ἀρίστας οὐ μόνον τω—ν ε—γχωρίων, ἀλλὰ καὶ τω—ν ε—π —Ιωνίας (M. Gronewald, “Fragmente aus einem Sapphokommentar,” in ZPE, vol. 14, 1975, p. 115 = frag. I, 7). Cf. Philo, Dreams 2.264: “Has someone said something worth hearing? Pay close attention, do not contradict them, be silent (ε—ν ἡσυχία), as Moses taught (Deut 27:9): Be silent and listen”; Heir 13: “When the intelligence decides to pay no attention to the objects that call to it from without or that are stored up inside, when it remains quiet and still (ἡρεμίαν ἀγαγὼν καὶ ἡσυχάσας), focused on the one who is speaking, remaining silent (σιωπήσας) according to the precept of Moses, then it will be able to understand with full attention”; 14: “Then for the ignorant, silence (ἡσυχία) is a useful thing.” Cf. Prov 1:33—“The one who fears me will live in tranquility, fearing no evil.” P.Lond. 44, 17 (= vol. 1, p. 34; from 161 BC; republished UPZ 8): crying out loudly, he stirred me from my repose in the temple.

⁵ Said of things: “When the earth rests,” or lies dozing under the hot wind (Job 37:17); “From the heavens you make your sentence heard, the earth is afraid and remains quiet” (Ps 76:9). After the storm, the sea quiets down (Ps 107:30). The waters calm down and are no longer troubled (Ezek 32:14). An animal rests in its lair (Job 37:8). Yahweh’s sword does not rest (Jer 29:6). A quarrel is stilled (Prov 26:20); cf. Philo, Abraham 210.

⁶ Exod 24:14—“Moses said to the elders, ‘Remain at rest here, until we return to you’”; Josh 5:8; Ruth 3:18—“the man will not be at rest unless he finishes the business today”; Job 3:26—“I have no peace, nor quiet nor rest; agitation comes over me”; Prov 7:11—the prostitute’s feet do not remain in her house. Cf. P.Fouad 86, 10: a scheming monk, capable of all sorts of slander, “if he gains a hearing with the very eminent general and consul, will not be able to keep quiet, but will stir up all sorts of dust clouds against the monasteries and against each of us.” Philo, Drunkennes 97: “The elements of which we are composed are peaceable (ἡρεμεῖ—). . . . If they are quiet (ἡσυχία) a deep peace reigns; otherwise an inexorable war.” Vercingetorix remains quiet, seated at the feet of Caesar, when he surrenders (Plutarch, Caes. 27; cf. 21), but “the Romans, having seen the enemies leave their tents, did not remain quiet” (Dionysius of Halicarnassus 38.49).

⁷ Judg 3:11, 30; 5:32; 8:28; 18:7, 27; 2Kgs 11:20; 1Chr 4:40; 2Chr 14:1; 23:21; Zech 1:11; 1Macc 7:50; 9:57–58; 11:38, 52; 12:2; 14:4; Strabo 4.6.9; Plutarch, Cleom. 11.2: “when tranquility was assured”; Diodorus Siculus 12.26.2–4; the emphasis is always on lack of movement (17.116.3), even inertia (17.62.7); foot soldiers, standing at attention, do not move (17.112.1, 17.112.4), and the mother of Darius stops moving about (17.59.7).

⁸ Isa 7:4—“Take care to be calm and not afraid”; Jer 26:27—“Jacob will be tranquil, with no one to disturb him”; Job 11:19—“You will be at rest and no one will fight you”; 14:6; 32:6; Lam 3:26—It is good to be patient and to wait quietly for Yahweh’s help; I.Lind. 2 D, 69: ποτέταξε ἡσυχίαν ἔχειν περὶ αὐτα—ς. In the papyri, ἡσυχία is almost always used in petitions, with the plaintiff declaring that his adversary has not left him in peace but has terrorized him (P.Cair.Isid. 73, 13), or that before he realized that he had been wronged he was completely tranquil, his mind was at rest (P.Rein. 7, 15; from 141 BC) or that because he was a minor he did not take action, did not bring a complaint (P.Cair.Isid. 63, 13; republished in SB 9185), or that his adversary did not appear until then, cf. P.Thead. 19, 13: an orphan denounces the actions of the sister of his paternal grandfather, “she seemed to have lived more than sixty years, always until this day living in peace” (cf. P.Oxy. 237, col. VI, 3; P.Cair.Zen. 59852, 7). Because the victim was unable to endure this harm and violence, she brought a complaint, according to a stereotyped formula: ὅθεν οὐ δυνάμενος ἡσυχάζειν ε—πιδίδωμι (P.Tebt. 330, 8; P.Oslo 22, 10; P.Stras. 241, 22; PSI 1248, 21). But some new villagers undertake to keep the peace and to conduct themselves appropriately, μετὰ ἡσυχείας καὶ τῆς πρεπούσης καταστάσεως (P.Mert. 98, 6; cf. PSI 52, 20). Cf. P.AdI. 1, col. II, 2 (R.

Taubenschlag, “Die Geschäftsmängel im Rechte der Papyri,” in Opera Minora, vol. 2, pp. 197, 207).

⁹ Cf. Sir 28:16; Dittenberger, Syl. 1109, 65: μετὰ δὲ πάσης εὐκοσμίας καὶ ἡσυχίας (republished in LSCG, n. 51); P. Oslo 22, 16: μετὰ πάσης ἡσυχίας ζῆν (cf. M. David, Berichtigungsliste, vol. 3, p. 120; 1964, vol. 4, p. 57).

¹⁰ Moulton-Milligan compare this to BGU 372, col. II, 14 (second century AD): ἄλλοις δὲ τω—ν ποτε προγραφ[έ]ντων ἡσυχάζουσι καὶ ε—ν τῇ οι—κείᾳ τῇ γεω[ργ]ίᾳ προσκατέρχουσι (read προσκατέχουσι) μὴ ε—νοχλει—ν. Cf. Vinicius: “he lived in safety—τὴν ἡσυχίαν ἄγων—quietly looking after his own business” (Dio Cassius 60.27).

¹¹ Philo, Abraham 20; cf. 27: “Vulgar people love movement, but people who esteem virtue seek a life that is quiet and tranquil, stable and peaceable”; 216: Abraham “showed his nobility in a tranquil life”; Moses 1.49: Moses “set about living a quiet, unspectacular life, living unknown to most people, not wanting to appear in public except to reconcile . . . the most prominent people.” The nuance of stability is unambiguous in Moses 1.177: “the two sides of the opening . . . remain unmoving and at rest, ἡρέμει καὶ ἡσύχαζε”; Job 34:29—If God is at rest, who will disturb him?

¹² Philo, Heir 257: “Ecstasy designates rest and quietness of the intellect, τὴν ἡσυχίαν καὶ ἡρεμίαν τοῦ νοῦ.” Cf. PSI 41, 23: σωφρονι—ν καὶ ἡσυχάζειν.

¹³ Ἴνα ἡρεμον καὶ ἡσύχιον βίον διάγωμεν, 1Tim 2:2. Josephus, War 1.201: “The peoples would live in tranquility (καθ ἡσυχίαν βιώσονται) . . . enjoying a common peace (κοινῆς ει—ρήνης)”; Plutarch, De Pyth. or.: “Great peace and calm prevail, πολλὴ ει—ρήνη καὶ ἡσυχία”; Phoc. 8.1: “Phocion’s politics were always directed toward peace and tranquility, πρὸς ει—ρήνην καὶ ἡσυχίαν”; C. Gracch. 1.1: “Caius lived in tranquility, καθ ε—αυτὸν ἡσυχίαν ἔχων διέτριβεν”; 1.7: μεθ ἡσυχίας ἡρεμένῳ ζῆν. Alex. 65.1: “those who lived with peace between themselves, καθ αὐτοὺς ε—ν ἡσυχίᾳ ζω—ντας.” In the sixth century, a father justifies a broken engagement on the grounds that he wants his daughter to lead a quiet and tranquil life, βούλεσθαί με ει—ρηνικὸν καὶ ἡσύχιον βίον διάξει τὴν ἡμι—ν θυγατέρα (P. Oxy. 129, 8). Sertorius wants to go and live peaceably (ζῆν ε—ν ἡσυχίᾳ), free from tyranny and war (Plutarch, Sert. 9.1; cf. Plutarch, Caes. 7.9); he was “made to live a quiet life” (22.12). According to T. Abr. a., the patriarch ζῆσας ε—ν ἡσυχίᾳ καὶ πραότητι καὶ δικαιοσύνη.

¹⁴ J. and G. Roux (“Un décret du politeuma des Juifs de Berenikè en Cyrénaïque,” in REG, 1949, p. 284) publishes the encomium of Marcus Titius in the first century AD: “He does not cease to show forth, through his conduct, the mildness of his character, ε—ν τε τῆ ἀναστροφῆ ἡσύχιον ἦθος ε—νδικνύμενος” (= CIG III, 5361, 13); cf. the epitaph of Cyrilla: “now you take up the peaceable abode of the immortals” (SB 4230, 2 cf. 9138, 4; cf. I.Bulg. 741, 8). Hesiod: the people of the Golden Age knew no war and lived quietly (ἡσυχιοι, Op. 119); Plato, Chrm. 160 b: ἡσύχιος, ὁ σώφρων βίος. In the Hellenistic era, Ἡσύχιος (the translation of Noah’s name) and Ἡσύχις are proper names among Jews and Greeks (B. Lifshitz, “La Vie de l’au-delà dans les conceptions juives,” in RB, 1961, p. 403; M. Schwabe, B. Lifshitz, Beth She’arim, vol. 2, p. VIII b. L. Robert, Noms indigènes, p. 622). Ἡσυχίδες is the name of a priestess of the Eumenides (Callimachus, frag. 681).

¹⁵ Cf. Plutarch: “Aemilius Paulus kept himself at peace (ἡσυχίαν εἶχε), occupied only with the worship of the gods and the education of his children” (Aem. 6.8); Num. 20.4: “Under the reign of Numa, the cities . . . all wanted to live in peace . . . quietly raising their children and venerating the gods”; Ammianus Marcellinus 16.10.2. In 377, the decree establishing the second Athenian confederation proposed that “Sparta should let the Greeks live tranquil lives in liberty and independence . . . so that general peace might come about and remain in perpetuity” (J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. 27, 10ff.).

¹⁶ Cf. Sir 28:16; 1Tim 2:11-12; the contrast between the cantankerous woman and the quiet woman, Sir 25:12–26:14.

¹⁷ Cf. the stele of Moschion, which is personified and seen as eulogizing the deceased: “He suggested that I remain discreet, συνέπεισεν ἡσυχάζειν” (SEG VIII, 464, 12; from the third-fourth century; republished by E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 108). Cf. “Aseneth quietly opened the door” (Jos. Asen. 10.9); dew that “quietly nourishes” the ground (Plutarch, Sert. 8.4).

¹⁸ P.Oxy. 128, verso 2; cf. IGLS 992, 13, in 189 BC: “We wanted to hire him as our coworker, but often he told us about the weakness of his body in the wake of endless sicknesses and begged us to let him live at rest (ε—φ ἡσυχίας γενέσθαι), so that for the rest of his days he might enjoy uninterrupted good health.” Epictetus 1.10.2: “A praefectus annonae at Rome . . . promised himself that he would spend the rest of his life in calm and tranquility.”

¹⁹ Philodemus of Gadara, Rh., frag. 27; ed. Sudhaus, vol. 2, p. 162). Cf. L. Alfonsi, “Otium e vita d’amore negli Elegiaci augustei,” in Studi in onore de A. Calderini, Milan, 1956, vol. 1, pp. 187–209 (gives the bibliography); J. M.

André, Recherches sur l'otium romain, Paris, 1962; idem, Otium dans la vie morale et intellectuelle romaine, 1966.

²⁰ Cf. Epictetus 3.13.7: “Zeus, alone with himself and quiet . . . lives in thoughts that are appropriate to his identity” (cf. A. Jagu, “Saint Paul et le Stoïcisme,” in RSR, 1958, p. 234); Iamblichus, Myst. 2.3.72: ἡρεμία is proper to the gods, ἡσυχία to the angels, ταραχή καὶ ἀταξία to the demons. Cf. R. Joly, Genres de vie, p. 141.

²¹ St. John Chrysostom, Comp. reg. et mon. 4; cf. W. E. Crum, H. G. Evelyn White, The Monastery of Epiphanius at Thebes, New York, 1926, n. 162, note 13; J. Meyendorff, G. Palamas: Défense des saints Hésychastes, Louvain, 1959; I. Hausherr, “L’Hésychasme: Etude de spiritualité,” in Orientalia Christiana Periodica, 1956, pp. 247–285; idem, Hésychasme et prière, Rome, 1966, pp. 163–237; J. Leclercq, Otia Monastica, Rome, 1963. Chio of Heraclea (Epist. 16.5) says that he wants to live in quiet for the sake of contemplation, according to the teaching of his master Plato (ἀνδρὶ ἡσυχίας ἐ—ραστῆ). To the citations from Plutarch, add: When Demetrios arrived at the Piraeus “he signaled from the top of his ship that he wanted quiet and silence, αἴτησιν ἡσυχίας καὶ σιωπῆς” (Demetr. 8.6). The philosopher Stilpon was known for the quiet life that he chose to lead, ἐ—ν ἡσυχίᾳ καταβιω—ναι (ibid. 9.9); “the army returned to order and quiet, κόσμον . . . καὶ ἡσυχίαν” (Ant. 49.1); “they quietly crossed the watercourse, καθ ἡσυχίαν” (Ant. 49.3), etc.

θάλλω

thalpo, to warm up, keep warm, care for, nurture

thalpo, S 2282; EDNT 2.128; MM 283; L&N 35.36; BAGD 350

This verb may be said to have four meanings: (a) In its literal meaning, “reheat, keep hot,” it is applied to things,¹ to an animal that is brooding, keeping its eggs warm (Deut 22:6), and to people: “Was I made just to stay in bed and keep warm under the covers?” (Marcus Aurelius 5.1.1). (b) In a metaphorical sense, to keep warm by showing affection, meaning to comfort or restore the strength of (cf. thalpore, comfort), which does not exclude the first meaning: Abishag the Shunammite warms and strengthens David (1Kgs 1:2, 4; cited by Josephus, Ant. 7.343); the deceased are kept warm by a mound that lightly covers them.² (c) Translating love, burning passion, or signifying a tender attachment,³ like Herodes Atticus erecting a statue to his cousin and disciple Polydeukion: “the one who nurtured him and loved him as a son” (ho threpsas kai philesas hos huion).⁴ That is the meaning of the two NT occurrences, where St. Paul cherishes the Thessalonians as a mother does her children (1Thess 2:7) and declares: “No one ever hated his own flesh, but rather nurtures it and cares tenderly for it. That is just what Christ does for the church” (Eph 5:29). That is the late meaning in the Byzantine papyri; in marriage contracts, the fiancé undertakes “to care for and nurture and clothe (his wife)” (thalpein kai trephein kai himatizein auten, P.Cair.Masp. 6 B, 132), “to love and care for and attend to” (agapan kai thalpein kai therapeuein).⁵ (d) Among these usages, one last meaning must be included: “tend, care for,” used of persons as well as of things. The strategos Callimachus “cared for the city” (ten polin ethalpe) as a good father for his family⁶ and like the dux of P.Lond. 1674, 100 (cf. 1727, 11; 1729, 16).

¹ Theocritus 5.31; 25.249. Of fermenting wine: τὴν δὲ πρώτην πάνυ θαλπεισοῦσαν ἐ—κελευσα αὐτήν (first-second century, P. J. Sijpesteijn, “Einige Papyri aus der Gießener Papyrussammlung,” in Aeg, 1965, p. 6, line 7; republished SB 10211); cf. θάλπος, “heat”; the adjective θαλπνός, “that reheats.”

² Epitaph of the euergetes Apollonius, in E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 6, 23 (= SEG VIII, 768); epitaph of Aphrodisia: “this sacred seat of Persephone comforts me” (ibid. 35, 4). Cf. Job 39:14.

³ Theocritus 14.38: θάλπε φίλον, “go warm up another friend.”

⁴ I.Rhamn., n. 50, 6. Cf. the “restoration” of a Roman epitaph by G. Klaffenbach (Studies Presented to D. M. Robinson, 1953, vol. 2, pp. 289–290)—Ἐνθάδε κει—ται πα—σιν ποθινός Εὐετέων, —Αμασεὺς καὶ Ψεκάδος θάλ[πε]ται μνήμη—but this latter reading “would have to have support from parallels” (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1954, p. 189, n. 284).

⁵ CPR I, 30, 20. Cf. SB 4658, 12. The nuance of gentle beneficence is preserved in μητρόφι λαμπάδι θαλπόμενον: “Memnon lives . . . and he lifts his great voice . . . when the eternal torch (the rising sun) restores his strength” (SB 8354, 3; cf. A. and E. Bernand, Memnon, n. 62, 3).

⁶ Dittenberger, Or. 194, 5 = SB 8334, 5 (42 BC) = R. Hutmacher, Ehrendekret.

θανάσιμος

thanasimos, mortal, causing death, relating to death

thanasimos, S 2286; EDNT 2.129; MM 283; L&N 23.115; BAGD 350

This biblical hapax, which can be either noun or adjective (like the English “mortal”), is as common in classical Greek as in Koine. It is noteworthy both that its meaning never varied and also that something that is by nature thanasimos can be rendered harmless by some external intervention. The resurrected Christ, appearing to the Eleven, promises them the gift of miracles on various occasions: “They will take serpents in their hands, and if they drink any deadly poison, it will do them no harm” (kan thanasimon ti piosin ou me autous blapse).¹

(a) In classical Greek, thanasimos (“causing or leading to death”) is used to describe an act of aggression (Sophocles, OT 560), a fall,² a deadly wound or illness,³ especially poisonous animals (thanasimon therion, Polybius 1.56.4) whose bite causes death (Diodorus Siculus 1.87). Hence, the meaning “poison” or “poisoning,”⁴ which predominates almost to the point of being a technical term in the Hellenistic period. This is the only meaning known by Philo⁵ and the commonest meaning in Josephus.⁶ According to Plutarch, when Domitius had asked his physician for poison (pharmakon), he gave him a narcotic to drink, not a lethal drug (ou thanasimon, Caes. 34.8); Aratus received from his son Philip “a poison which, without being lethal, drove him mad.”⁷ In a tabella defictionis of Cnidos in the second century BC: “I consign to Demeter and to Kore the one who said against me that I compound deadly poisons for my husband.”⁸

(b) Thanasimos is also “relating to death.” “Hecuba, learning the deadly fate of the child” (thanasimon moron, Euripides, Hec. 1145); “the prophet himself led me to this destiny of death” (thanasimos tychas).⁹ Antipater had prepared a deadly plan (Josephus, Ant. 17.74, thanasimon gnomen); “he himself was more deadly a menace for his father than all the others” (panton auto thanasimotaton, Ant. 17.120).

(c) “Near death, moribund, dying.” Sophocles, Phil. 819: “O earth, receive me quickly, I am going to die” (dexai thanasimon); Plato, Resp. 3.408c: “to heal for money a rich man who was dying” (thanasimon . . . iasasthai); 10.610 e: “injustice is far from being a cause of death.”¹⁰

¹ Mark 16:18 (J. Hug, La Finale de l’Evangile de Marc, Paris, 1978, pp. 119ff.). ἀνάσιμος appears as a synonym of θανατηφόρος (cf. Jas 3:8—“the tongue . . . full of deadly venom”; Num 18:22—“incur a deadly sin”; Job 33:23—angels that bring death; 4Macc 8:18, 26: disobedience and fatal stubbornness; 15:26). We may cite the case of St. Paul at Malta, where he was bitten by a viper and not harmed (Acts 28:3; cf. Luke 10:19); likewise St. John the Evangelist’s taking poison at Patmos (Acts John 9, 10); Justus

Barsabas, according to Papias (cited by Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 8.39.9). A certain Jaaqob de Kaphar-Sama healed snake bites in the name of Jesus (Str-B, vol. 4, 1, p. 459); cf. the serpent dying during the prayer of R. Chanina b. Dosa (around 70; Str-B, vol. 1, pp. 399ff.).

² Sophocles, Aj. 1033; cf. the tunic of Nessos: “the peplos of death” (Trach. 758).

³ Hippocrates, Loc. Hom. 33, 1: θανάσιμα τρώματα; 2: θανάσιμον = the case is terminal; Aph. 2.1: “A disease in which sleep causes distress is a deadly one, but if sleep is beneficial, the disease is not deadly”; Acut. 4.90.6. Mortal blows (πληγὰς θανασίμους ε—πήνεγκέν μοι, SB 9239, 12) are those which can lead to death, but do not necessarily do so, because in this case the victim is bringing a legal action in good form.

⁴ Euripides, Ion 616: “How many deadly poisonings (φαρμάκων θανασίμων) have wives plotted against their husbands?”; Diodorus Siculus 4.45.2: “Hecate, skilled in the art of preparing poisons”; Dioscorides, Mat. Med. 2.24; Josephus, War 1.583: “a woman expert in poisons (φαρμάκων ἔμπειρον) . . . had given Pheroras a deadly (θανάσιμον) poison.”

⁵ Philo, Plant. 147; Spec. Laws 3.91: “with deadly poisons the assassin will cause thousands of persons to die”; 3.98; 4.26.

⁶ Among the different commands in the law, the Jews are forbidden to possess deadly poisons (Ant. 4.279); Antigonus sent physicians to Phasaël, as if he wanted to heal him; but in reality he had him killed with deadly poisons (14.368); Antipater had prepared a deadly potion (17.69).

⁷ Plutarch, Arat. 54.1; cf. Art. 30.5: “Ariaspes procured a deadly poison” (φάρμακον τω—ν θανασίμων); 2.61 b: deadly mushrooms gathered in the fields.

⁸ Dittenberger, Syl. 1180, 2: φάρμακα ποιω— θανάσιμα. In an account turned in to Zeno, thanasimos (if the restorations are correct) is used several times without a noun and appears to be the opposite of ἀθάνατος. The topic the ἔριφοι θανάσιμοι, goats that do not have to be replaced when they die (of sickness or of lack of food?), SB 9682, 18, 23, 24, 26, 35, 38; republished Pap.Lugd.Bat. XX, 35 (with the discussion of the editor, P. W. Pestman, pp. 150–151). Ignatius of Antioch likened heretics to those who give a deadly poison (ὡσπερ θανάσιμον φάρμακον) with wine mixed with honey (Ign. Trall. 6.2).

⁹ Aeschylus, Ag. 1276; cf. 1445: “Like a swan, she sang her supreme song of death”; 1019: “once the black blood of a human being has been spilled on the ground (ἄπαξ πεσὸν θανάσιμον), no enchanter can call it back into the veins from which it came.”

¹⁰ Euripides, Hipp. 1438: “I am not permitted to stain my eye with the gasps of the dying” (thanasimoisin). In the sense of death, cf. Sophocles, Aj. 517: “a stroke of fate, O inhabitants of Hades, transformed my father, my mother into dead ones” (Ἄιδου θανασίμους οἰ—κήτορας); OT 959: “Polybus is gone.”

θαρσέω (θαρρέω), θάρσος

tharseo (tharreo), to have confidence, courage; tharsos, courage

tharseo* (tharreo), S 2293; TDNT 3.25–27; EDNT 2.134; NIDNTT 1.327–329; MM 284; L&N 25.156; BDF §§34(2), 148(2), 206(2), 407; BAGD 352 | tharsos, S 2294; EDNT 2.134; L&N 25.157; BAGD 352

The denominative verb tharseo (Ionian; the Attic form is tharreo) is always used in the imperative in the NT, in conformity with most of its occurrences in the LXX.¹ It means, in effect, “have confidence, courage, be unafraid,” with the nuance determined by the context.² It is a common stylistic element in accounts of miracles, as in that of the paralytic: “Take heart, my child, your sins are forgiven” (Matt 9:2); that of the woman with the hemorrhage (Matt 9:22); the blind man at Jericho (Mark 10:49). When the apostles, thinking that they have seen a ghost walking on the water, are terrified, Jesus reassures them: “Take heart, it is I, fear not” (tharseite, ego eimi, me phobeisthe, Matt 14:27; Mark 6:50). To this may be compared Caesar’s order to the pilot terrified by the storm: “Take heart and make for the rough water; you bear Caesar and the fortune of Caesar” (tharron ithi pros ton klydona; Kaisara phereis kai ten Kaisaros tychen, Plutarch, Caes. 38.5; cf. Ant. 48.6).

This verb thus refers to courage that can be displayed in the midst of danger or simply with respect to a trial: martyrdom, exile, scorn, whatever goes against our desires or requires effort, an undertaking that is difficult and of uncertain outcome, like pleading a case (P.Oxy. 237, col. VIII, 17; Philo, Post. Cain 38: “If an accusation of impiety is brought against you, take heart—tharreite”), exposing oneself bravely to the cold (Hippocrates, Vict. 3.68, tharseon; cf. 74, give oneself to exercises, tharrein), even “take on a pioneering role in a science” (Strabo, Prolegomena 1.1.4), and especially bravery or daring in battles,³ whether on the one hand the battles of war or of human life,⁴ or on the other hand the battles of initiation into the mysteries of salvation,⁵ where the exhortation to bravery in facing dangers in the long and perilous journey in the beyond, culminating in the supreme trial of judgment, implies a hope of immortality.⁶ In every instance, the imperative is meant to encourage someone who will be undergoing a trial. This is the nuance in John 16:33, where Jesus tells the apostles that persecutions will come and exhorts them not to give up: “In the world you will have to endure tribulation, but be bold (courage! — tharseite), I have overcome the world.” Similarly, Acts 23:11—“The Lord, appearing to Paul,⁷ said ‘Take heart, for just as you have testified concerning me at Jerusalem, you must also testify at Rome’” (a vision is said to be “encouraging,” cf. Plutarch, Pomp. 68.3). In both cases, a motivation is provided with the exhortation, as is traditional,⁸ and the danger of death is in view.⁹

Indeed, it is especially in the face of death that it is necessary to be intrepid (to tharsos, Epictetus 2.1.14; tharrei, Menander, Dysk. 692; Josephus, Ant. 7.266: “He said, ‘And you, O Samuis, take heart and fear not at all that you shall die’”: sy te, eipen, o Samoui, tharrei kai deises meden hos tethnaxomenos; cf. 1Macc 4:35). According to Codex Bezae, in response to the prayer of the good thief, Jesus said to him, “tharsei” (Luke 23:43). It is not rare to see an epitaph, even in Latin, ending with *tharsei*¹⁰ and especially with tharsei—oudeis athanatos (“no one lives forever”), even on Jewish and Christian graves;¹¹ because this is not only an exhortation to accept the common lot,¹² but an audacious confidence in the eternal future. Thanks to faith, the fear of death is overcome. It is in this eschatological sense that St. Paul, in exile, takes courage (tharrountes, tharroumen), preferring to go be at home with the Lord.¹³ The Christian draws this energy from the certitude of the Lord’s presence and help, which prevails over anguish or the feeling of being abandoned: “We can say courageously (tharrountas) ‘The Lord is my help, I will not fear.’”¹⁴

The Stoic meaning of tharreo is found in 2Cor 7:16; 10:1-2, where the apostle rejoices at “being able in all things to be bold with” the Corinthians, to speak to them undiplomatically, with evangelical liberty and authority, and thus to communicate to them painful truths. He is accused of being timid in person, but bold, unflexible, assertive from a distance;¹⁵ so he protests that he is ready to demonstrate his boldness if circumstances require. Philo had shown that in addressing God piety (eulabeia) could go along with a certain audacity (to tharrein, Heir 22) and the latter with a fear of saying what one thinks (ibid. 28). Epictetus lauded the conciliation of prudence and boldness—eulabos hama de tharrountos; they seem to be opposites, but in reality there is no contradiction between them (2.1.1).

When St. Paul, finally arriving at the Forum of Appius and at Three Taverns, meets the brothers from Rome who have come to greet them, “on seeing them he gave thanks to God and took courage, elabe tharsos.”¹⁶

¹ The midwife says to Rachel: “Fear not, you have another son” (Gen 35:17, Hebrew yare’ with negation); Moses to the people: “Fear not” (Exod 14:13; 20:20); Elijah to the widow of Zarephath (1Kgs 17:13), the wife of Raguel to Sarah (Tob 7:17); Holophernes to Judith (Jdt 11:1, 3); the king to Esther (Esth 5:7); Darius to Daniel in the lions’ den: ἕως πρῶτὸν θάρρει (Dan 6:17); the prophets to Israel (Joel 2:21, 22; Zeph 3:16; Hag 2:5; Zech 8:13, 15), notably in the “book of consolation”: Take heart, my people, children, Jerusalem (Bar 4:5, 21, 27, 30). Cf. Philo, Moses 2.252: “Be bold, do not be discouraged, stand firm, firm in heart, and wait for God’s invincible help”; Jos. Asen. 15.2, 3, 5: “Take heart, Aseneth, the Lord has given you to Joseph as his wife”; Enoch 102.4; 4Macc 13:11—“‘Courage, brother,’ said one; and the other, ‘Bear it nobly’”; 17.4. Diodorus Siculus 19.58.6: “Antigonus urged his soldier to be courageous”; 19.81.2: “the crowd cried out to him to have confidence”; 17.25.4.

² The significance of “confidence”—that of a husband in his wife (Prov 31:11; Hebrew batah; A, B = θαρσει—; S = θαρρει—)—can take on a certain boldness, that of Wisdom at the city gates, θαρροῦσα λέγει (Prov 1:21). This sense is most common in the papyri, where an author of a letter expresses his confidence in the recipient: τῇ σῇ δικαιοκρῖσει, δέσποτα ἡγεμών, θαρρω—ν (SB 7205, 4); ε—πὶ τὴν σὴν ἀνδρείαν καταφεύγω θαρρω—ν τεύξεσθαι τω—ν προσόντων μοι δικαίων (P.Oxy. 1468, 9); θαρρω—ν τῇ ἀγαθῇ σου προαιρέσει γράφω (P.Ryl. 696, 2; cf. P.Oxy. 1872, 4); θαρσω—ν δὲ γεγράφηκα (SB 7656, 6; BGU 1080, 14); θαρρω— οὔν, ἀδελφε, ὅτι οὐκ ἀμελεῖ—ς μου (O.Mich. 91, 10); πιστεύω γὰρ ἀκριβω—ς καὶ θαρρω— ὡς οὐδέν τι ἀηδὲς οὐδ’ ἄτοπον συμβήσεται τοῦ θεοῦ . . . πρὸς πα—σαν πράξιν (C.P.Herm. 6, 19; cf. 2, 17; Demosthenes, Fals. Leg. 3, θαρρω— καὶ πάνυ πιστεύω; Polybius 3.11.8: θαρρει—ν καὶ πιστεύειν); Xenophon, Cyr. 5.1.6; θαρσέων καθίζειν = sit down without fear (on a tomb, an epigram of Theocritus, in Anth. Pal. 13.3.4); P.Lond. 981, 12 (vol. 3, p. 241): θαρροῦμεν ται—ς προσευχαι—ς (fourth century). It is a question not simply of peace and security (Xenophon, Cyr. 1.3.18; Plutarch, Sert. 18.7; SB 9026, 6: οὐκ ε—θάρρησα δὲ τὸν τοσοῦτον λόγον ὑποστῆναι ἄνευ τῆς σῆς γνώμης; second century), but of courage. Tiberius Julius Alexander in 68: “I want the people to regain their courage and cultivate with zeal” (SB 8444, 56). Hermias: “I came and I regained courage, ἦκω καὶ τεθάρρηκα” (A. Bataille, Les Inscriptions grecques du temple de Hatshepsout à Deir el-Bahari, Cairo, 1951, n. 139, 2); “ὄμμα . . . ψυχῆς θάρσει, eye . . . of my soul, take courage” (interpretation of a dream, from 160 BC; P.Paris 51, 10 = G. Milligan, Selections from the Greek Papyri, Cambridge, 1927, n. 6); Octavian invites the inhabitants of Rhosos to address to him their requests without fear, bravely (θαρροῦντες, IGLS, n. 718, 93), just like the king in Ep. Arist. 272. There is even some boldness in the aggressiveness of this or that person “emboldened by their wealth”:

θαρρω—ν ὁ αὐτὸς Ἴσακίς τοι—ς χρήμασι αὐτοῦ καὶ τοῦ πλούτου, βούλεται μ[α]ι ἐ—ξελάσαι ἀπότης κόμης (P.Cair.Goodsp. 15, 19; P.Cair.Isid. 75, 10; republished SB 9184, 10; P.Oxy. 68, 19). Aion, emboldened by the state of my business and my unfavorable economic position, θαρσω—ν τοι—ς ἐ—μοι—ς πράγμασι καὶ τῇ κακοτροπία ἐ—μαυτοῦ (P.Abinn. 50, 18; republished SB 9690); Josephus, Ant. 20.175: —Ιουδαι—οι τω— πλούτῳ θαρροῦντες; War 1.189, Mithridates is “emboldened” by the extra forces that he receives from Antipater; Plutarch, Pomp. 72.6: “witless presumption”; Alex. 31.3; 32.4; 33.3; Caes. 44.10; 52.4.

³ Cf. Quintus of Smyrna, Posthomerica 11.282: “It is the daring (θάρσος) person who leads men in slaughter”; 12.254, 273; 13.121; cf. 2.39: “a hundred times better to die bravely (θαρσαλέως) than to flee abroad”; 10.209; 12.72: “only bravery gives the advantage in combat”; 12.253; cf. 3.186: “Paris harangues his men to make them brave (θαρσύνεσκε)”; 4.85; 12.253. Fear and boldness are mutually exclusive (φόβει καὶ θάρρη, Aristotle, HA 8.1.588a22), and θαρρέω is part of the military vocabulary (2Chr 16:8; Plutarch, Eum. 9.5; 17.3). The dying emperor encourages his nephew to be valiant (θαρρει—ν) and not to fear Vitellius (Plutarch, Oth. 16.2; Alex. 58.2); “Let them be brave and courageous (θαρροῦσι καὶ προθυμουμένοις) at the proper time and place; it will give them victory without danger”; (Cam. 23.4); cf. Cor. 27.7; 32.7; “Boldness is truly the beginning of victory, ἀρχὴ γὰρ ὄντως τοῦ νικᾶ—ν τὸ θαρρει—ν” (Plutarch, Them. 8.2); Plutarch, Tim. 9.1: “Embaldened by these divine portents, the flotilla carefully set out to cross the sea” (cf. Strabo 2.5.12); “Hannibal restored the courage of his men (εὐθαρσει—ς)” (Polybius 3.54.3; cf. 3.60.13); Thucydides 4.25.9; Aeneas Tacticus, Polior. 16.3, 16.5; Plutarch, Pomp. 75.3; Diodorus Siculus 19.109.4: “Gaining fresh courage (πάλιν θαρρήσαντες) those from the camp withstood the combat at the front”; Plutarch, Cat. Min. 40.1; Cleom. 38.8: Cratesicleia, as she was led off to torture, is accompanied and encouraged by her daughter-in-law, καὶ θαρρει—ν παρακαλοῦσα.

⁴ The Δαίμων urges humans who are starting their existence: Courage, θαρρει—ν, ἔφη· διὸ καὶ ὑμεῖς—θαρρει—τε (Tabula of Cebes 30.2), taken up by Temperance and Endurance (16.3). “—Ἀλλὰ σὺ ἄρσει, ἐ—πεῖ εἰ—ον γένος ἐ—στὶ βροτοι—σιν. But you must take courage, since mortals are of divine lineage” (Golden Verses, Pythagoreans, 63). Sophocles, El. 174: θάρσει μοι, θάρσει τέκνον· ἔτι μέγας οὐρανῶ— Ζεῦς; Manilius 4.16: Nascentes morimur, finisque ab origine pendet.

⁵ Firmicus Maternus, Err. prof. rel. 22.1: θαρρει—τε, μύσται, τοῦ θεοῦ σεσωσμένου· ἔσται γὰρ ἡμι—ν ἐ—κ πόνων σωτηρία. I.Marcon. 11: “It is with confidence that I advance” (cf. Y. Grandjean, Arétalogie d’Isis, pp. 42ff.). ἄρρῆω is not only a technical verb for ritual initiation, it is used in novels with a symbolic and religious value: in the imperative, used by persons representing the initiates or the divinity, addressing the tested individuals; as a participle, it indicates that the individuals had the help of the god; cf. R. Merkelbach, Roman und Mysterium in der Antike, 1962, pp. 100, 141, 173, 212, 231; M. Simon, “θάρσει οὐδεὶς ἀθάνατος,” in RHR, 1936, pp. 188–206; R. Joly, Genres de vie, “L’Exhortation au courage (APPEIN) dans les mystères,” in REG, 1955, pp. 164–170.

⁶ Cf. F. Cumont, Symbolisme funéraire, pp. 76ff. Idem, Lux Perpetua, p. 404.

⁷ —Επιστὰς αὐτοῦ ὁ Κύριος; cf. I.Did., 496 a 4: οἱ— θεοὶ ε—νφανει—ς δι ε—πιστάσεων γεγένηται (second century AD); the gods appear and “present themselves” (cf. παριστάναι, Acts 27:23). The texts are cited by A. Wikenhauser, “Die Traumgeschichte des Neuen Testaments in religionsgeschichtlicher Sicht,” in Pisciculi F. J. Dölger dargeboten, Münster, 1939, pp. 320–333, commented on by L. Robert, Hellenica 11–12, Paris, 1960, p. 544. — In John 16:33; Acts 23:11 we move closer to the legal sense of πατρίαν θαρρήν in I.Olymp. 2, 1, where this verb is almost synonymous with “guarantee the inviolability of” (cf. the commentary by G. Glotz, La Solidarité de la famille dans le droit criminel en Grèce, Paris, 1904, p. 257).

⁸ Cf. Tob 8:21 (manuscript S): “Be brave, my child; I am your father and Edna is your mother; we are near you. Be brave, my child”; Esth 5:7— “What’s wrong, Esther? I am your brother; take heart, you will not die”; Joel 2:21—“Fear not, O land, be glad and rejoice, for Yahweh has done great things”; etc.

⁹ Cf. P. Pokorný, “Romfahrt des Paulus und der antike Roman,” in ZNW, 1973, pp. 240ff.

¹⁰ SB 8370, 3; CII 1009, 1039, 1050–52, 1110, 1125; M. Schwabe, B. Lifshitz, Beth She’arim, vol. 2, n. 22, 29, 39–41, 43, 77, 84, 88–89, 193.

¹¹ Cf. IGLS 343, 2662, 4059; CII 314, 335, 380, 401, 450, 539; cf. 782, 788, 1209, etc. E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 156. J. Delling, “Speranda futura: Jüdische Grabinschriften Italiens über das Geschick nach dem Tode,” in TLZ, 1951, col. 521–526. Sometimes a Christian epitaph modifies the formula, as on a stele of Tisiyeh, south of Bosra: οὐδὶς ε—πὶ γῆς ἀθάνατος (F. M. Abel, “Inscription chrétienne du Ghor es-Safy,” in RB, 1931, p. 98); cf. M. Simon, “θάρσει οὐδεις ἀθάνατος,” in RHR, 1936, p. 194.

¹² Cf. a Christian epitaph of Phrygia—“There is only one Hades for all”—in L. Robert, Hellenica 11–12, Paris, 1960, p. 415.

¹³ 2Cor 5:5, 8 (J. Dupont, “L’Union avec le Christ suivant saint Paul,” Bruges-Louvain-Paris, 1952, pp. 158ff.); Pap.Graec.Mag. 4, 718–724.

¹⁴ Heb 13:6—“οὐ φοβηθήσομαι does . . . look more like be afraid [‘linear’] than become afraid [‘punctiliar’]” (C. F. D. Moule, Idiom Book, pp. 10, 22); cf. P.Oxy. 1492, 15; 4 Ezra 6:33; Philo, Flight 82: “one of the sages of old had the courage to affirm . . .”; Rewards 95; Plutarch, Ages. 28.2: “Epaminondas replied boldly”; Dem. 9.3. Cf. the strengthening or the energy (θάρσος, Hebrew ‘ames’) of Job 4:4; 17:9; Josephus, Ant. 9.55; Dio Chrysostom 32.21, or the hymn to Isis (first century BC), who strengthens and gives divine power in the midst of wars and crimes, but there are few who receive courage: ὀλίγοισι δὲ θάρσος ἔδωκε (SEG VIII, 55, 18 = SB 8140 = V. F. Vanderlip, Four Greek Hymns, p. 49).

¹⁵ 2Cor 10:1—ἀπὼν δὲ θαρρῶ—ει—ς ὑμα—ς; verse 2: δέομαι δὲ τὸ μὴ παρὼν θαρρήσαι; cf. SB 7656, 5: ει—καὶ ἀπὼν ει—μί, ἀλλ’ ὅμως θαρσῶ—. Aristotle observed that “movements of bravery or fear . . . are accompanied by heat or cold” (Aristotle, MA 8.701b).

¹⁶ Acts 28:15; cf. T. Kleberg, Hôtels, restaurants et cabarets dans l’antiquité romaine, Uppsala, 1957, pp. 63ff., 67.

θεοδίδακτοι, θεόπνευστος

theodidaktoi, taught by God; theopneustos, breathed or inspired by God

theodidaktoi, S 2312; TDNT 3.121; EDNT 2.139; MM 286–287; L&N 33.228; BAGD 356 | theopneustos, S 2315; TDNT 6.453–455; EDNT 2.140; NIDNTT 3.689–690; MM 287; L&N 33.261; BAGD 356; ND 3.30

The theodidaktoi Thessalonians are “taught by God” to love one another (1Thess 4:9). Theodidaktos is a NT and OT hapax. It has been pointed out by Hugo Rabe in Prolegomenon Sylloge, (Leipzig, 1931, p. 91, 14). It is also found in Barn. 21.6, important for its dependence; Athenagoras, Leg. 2.32; Theophilus, Ad Autol. 2.9; and the Greek fathers. It is formed like theo-styges (Rom 1:30) and theo-pneustos (2Tim 3:16), and its elements are found together in John 6:45, which depends on Isa 54:13; Jer 31:33. St. Paul might have been thinking of these passages. Compare also Pss. Sol. 17:35 and Matt 23:8. Above all, compare 1Cor 2:13—didaktois pneumatos.¹ G. Mussies (DioChrysostom, p. 202) cites Dio Chrysostom 4.41: “And again, when he (Homer) calls kings diotrepheis and diiphilous, he seems to mean something other than the sustenance that he calls divine teaching and instruction” (palin de hotan lege diotrepheis kai diiphilous, allo ti oiei legein auton e ten trophen tauten hen ephen theian einai didaskalian kai matheteian).

To express the sacred nature of the Scriptures, their divine origin, and their power to sanctify believers, perhaps St. Paul coined the verbal adjective theopneustos, “breathed, inspired by God.”² We know that in biblical Greek pneo refers to the breath of Yahweh (Isa 11:24; Ps 147:18; 148:8); in the form of a noun in Acts 27:40 (tei pneousei = aurai = “to the breeze”), it expresses the action of the Holy Spirit.³ The compound theopneustos should be understood in a passive sense, as it is understood by: “divinitus inspirata” in the Vulgate; “divinitus instituta” in Codex Fuldensis; the parallel text 2Pet 1:21—“born along by the Holy Spirit, men spoke from God” (hypo pneumatou hagiou pheromenoi elalesan apo theou anthropoi);⁴ Ambrosiaster’s gloss, “divinitus inspirata . . . cujus Deus auctor ostenditur” (“whose author is shown to be God”); and almost all the Greek fathers and commentators.⁵ Underlying this theological conception of a sacred text is the Hellenistic concept whereby the tragic and lyric poets are considered to have written under inspiration from the gods, that they are their spokesmen, addressing their fellow citizens in the name of the divinity.⁶

Bibliography. — Discussions of the theology of the inspiration of Scripture are innumerable and differing in merit. Among the moderns, the following are worthy of mention: G. Courtade, in DBSup, vol. 4, pp. 482ff.; G. Perella, La nozione dell’ispirazione scritturale secondo i primitivi documenti cristiani, in Ang., 1943, pp. 32–52; P. Benoit, “L’Inspiration scripturaire,” in La Prophétie (Somme Théologique), Paris, 1947, pp. 293ff.; idem, “Note complémentaire sur l’inspiration,” in RB, 1956, pp. 416ff.; idem, Exégèse et théologie, pp. 3ff.; idem, “Révélation et inspiration,” in RB, 1963, pp. 321–370; idem, “Inspiration de la tradition et inspiration de l’Ecriture,” in Mélanges M. D. Chenu, Paris, 1967, pp. 111–126; idem, Aspects of Biblical Inspiration, Chicago, 1965; A. Robert, A. Feuillet, Introduction à la Bible, Tournai, 1957, pp. 6–68; P. Grelot, La Bible Parole de Dieu, Paris-Tournai, 1965, pp. 33ff. A. Penna, “L’ispirazione biblica nei padri della chiesa,” in DivThom, 1967, pp. 393–408; J. Richard, “Le Processus psychologique de la révélation prophétique,” in LTP, 1967, pp. 42–75; A. Artola, “La inspiración y la inerrancia según la constitución ‘Dei Verbum,’” in El sacerdocio de Cristo (XXVI Semana Española de Teología), Madrid, 1969, pp. 471–495; J. T. Burtchaell, Catholic Theories of Biblical Inspiration since 1810, Cambridge, 1969; J. Beumer, L'Inspiration de la Sainte Ecriture, Paris, 1972; L. Alonso-Schoekel, La Parole inspirée, Paris, 1972; B. Vawter, Biblical Inspiration, Philadelphia, 1972; O. Loretz, Das Ende der Inspirations-Theologie: Untersuchungen zur Entwicklung der traditionellen theologischen Lehre über die Inspiration der Heiligen Schrift, Stuttgart, 1973; D. R. Jones, "The Inspiration of Scripture," in New Testament Christianity for Africa and the World (Essays in honor of H. Sawyerr), London, 1974, pp. 8–18; P. Benoit, "Saint Thomas et l'inspiration des Ecritures," in Tommaso d'Aquino nel suo VII Centenario, Congresso internazionale, Rome-Naples, 1974, pp. 115–131.

¹ B. Rigaux, Saint Paul: Les Epîtres aux Thessaloniens, Paris-Gembloux, 1956, p. 517. Cf. E. von Dobschütz, Die Thessalonicher-Briefe, 7th ed., Göttingen, 1909, pp. 176ff. Moulton-Milligan cite the Homeric αὐτοδίδακτος in Cagnat (IG Rom., vol. 4, 176: εἰ—μὶ μὲν ε—κ Παρίου Ὀρτυξ σοφὸς αὐτοδίδακτος) and θεόγνωστος in P.Oxy. 237, col. VI, 29: ἀλλὰ σὺ ὁ κύριος τῆ θεογνώστῳ σου μνήμη καὶ τῆ ἀπλανήτῳ προαιρέσει ἀνενεγκῶν τὴν γραφει—σάν σοι ὑπὸ τοῦ στρατηγοῦ ε—πιστολῆν.

² 2Tim 3:16. The verb ε—στί should probably be restored not after γραφή but before ὠφέλιμος: "Every Scripture inspired by God is useful . . ."; θεόπνευστος is attributive and not predicative, for reasons explained in C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, vol. 2, pp. 794ff. Philo was the first to use the verbs ε—πιπνει—ν, καταπνει—ν (ε—πιθειάζω) for the inspiration of the Scriptures, and Josephus the substantive ε—πίπνοια (Ag. Apion 1.37), in agreement with secular usage (J. Magn. 100 a 12: the people were led by divine inspiration—θείας ε—πιπνοίας—to build a temple in honor of Artemis). The known occurrences of θεόπνευστος are all later than the first century, Ps.-Plutarch, De plac. philos. 5.2: dreams inspired by the gods; Vettius Valens 9.1: the divinely inspired element in human beings, ἔστι δέ τι καὶ θει—ον ε—ν ἡμι—ν θεόπνευστον δημιουργήμα (cf. A. J. Festugière, Idéal religieux, p. 125); Ps.-Phocylides 129: wisdom of divine origin = λόγος τῆς θεοπνεύστου σοφίης (but this line is missing in some manuscripts); Sib. Or. 5.308, 5.406; cf. Porphyry, De antr. nymph. 10: θεόπνοος; Corp. Herm. 1.30: "So here I am, full of the divine wind of truth, θεόπνους γενόμενος τῆς ἀληθείας ἦλθον." The word θεόπνο[υς] appears in a very mutilated oracle of Claros (cf. L. Robert, "Les Inscriptions," in J. des Gagniers, Laodicée, p. 337). A proskynema of the third century in honor of the sphinx, who "has a sacred face, animated by the breath of God, ι—ερόν . . . πρόσωπον ἔχει τὸ θεόπνουν" (SB 8550, 4: republished by E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 130). In T. Abr. A 20, the term refers to the angels who appear to Abraham: μυρίσμασι θεοπνεύστοις.

³ John 3:8; L. Koenen, “Johannes III, 7–10: Aus einem Minuskel-Kodex,” in ZPE, 1967, pp. 126–130; cf. D. Lys, “Rûach”: Le Souffle dans l’Ancien Testament, Paris, 1962, pp. 359ff. On the cult of the winds in pagan antiquity, cf. F. Cumont, Symbolisme funéraire, pp. 107ff.

⁴ Cf. C. Spicq, Épîtres de saint Pierre, pp. 225ff. Philo called the inspired person θεοφόρητος (Heir 265; Change of Names 120, 203). The Jews “considered their laws as oracles spoken by God, θεόχρηστα λόγια” (To Gaius 210; cf. Decalogue 15; Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.37). The prophet is only a tool for utterance (διὰ; Matt 1:22; Luke 1:70; Acts 2:16; 3:18, 21; Heb 1:1-2) that God uses to make himself heard. Cf. J. Frey, “La Révélation d’après les conceptions juives,” in RB, 1916, p. 472; J. Bonsirven, Judaïsme palestinien, vol. 1, pp. 254f. “How do we hear the voice of the Spirit? A psalm is sung—it is the voice of the Spirit; the Gospel is read—it is the voice of the Spirit; the word of God is preached—it is the voice of the Spirit” (Augustine, Tract. 12.5 in Ev. Joh.).

⁵ Didymus, Trin. 2.10; PG, vol. 39, p. 644. The grammar nevertheless allows giving θεόπνευστος an active sense: the Scripture breathes God, the gramma exhales pneuma (cf. Bengel, and the discussion by J. H. Bennetch, “II Timothy III, 16a,” in BSac, 1949, pp. 187ff.). In any event, it contains a breath (cf. St. Athanasius, Ep. Serap. 1.8; PG, vol. 26, p. 549) and, as a sacrament, communicates by means of written signs (cf. Athenagoras, Leg. 9: “The Spirit used them [the prophets] as the flutist blows through his flute”).

⁶ Cf. E. Schweizer, “πνεῦμα,” in TDNT, vol. 6, p. 454, who cites J. Leipoldt, “Die Frühgeschichte der Lehre von der göttlichen Eingebung,” in ZNW, 1953, pp. 118–145; add A. Wartelle, “Poète grec et prophète d’Israël,” in BAGB, vol. 26, 1967, pp. 373ff.; P. Benoit, “Les Analogies de l’inspiration,” in Sacra Pagina, Paris-Gembloux, 1959, vol. 1, pp. 86–99. Every divine utterance has a dynamis (C. Préaux, “De la Grèce classique à l’époque hellénistique,” in ChrEg, 1967, pp. 378, 383) and is effective (M. Détienné, Les Maîtres de vérité dans la Grèce archaïque, Paris, 1967).

θεοσέβεια, θεοσεβής

theosebeia, reverence, piety; theosebes, reverent, pious

theosebeia, S 2317; TDNT 3.123–128; EDNT 2.142; NIDNTT 2.91–92; MM 288; L&N 53.1; BAGD 358 | theosebes, S 2318; TDNT 3.123–128; EDNT 2.142; NIDNTT 2.91, 94; MM 288; L&N 53.6; BAGD 358

The noun and the adjective in the LXX translate “the fear of God” or of Adonai. They are used with men and women who worship the true God and conform to his will. The meaning is as much moral as religious,¹ connected with notions of purity, holiness, perfection, wisdom.² Theosebeia is contradictory to sin (Sir 1:25); to possess it is a title of nobility.³

This is exactly the nuance in John 9:31—“God does not hear sinners; but if someone is pious (tis theosebēs ei) and does his will, he listens to that person”—and in 1Tim 2:10, where St. Paul exhorts the Ephesians to decency, “as befits women who profess theosebeia.”⁴ Just as spiritual threskeia is identified by its helping the unfortunate (Jas 1:27), the worship of God implies ethical uprightness.

In secular Greek, theosebeia is also mentioned in eulogies to point out the excellence of a person or an action, and especially with ethical value;⁵ but it is worth noting that the literature⁶ or the inscriptions that point it out are of predominantly Jewish origin. In the imperial period, an inscription from the theater of Miletus specifies the placement of the spectators: “Place for Jews and God-fearers, topos Eioudaion ton kai theosebon.”⁷ Ton kai is not to be taken as introducing another category, distinct from Jews per se, namely proselytes; rather, these are Jews who are described as fearing God. In a synagogue of Tralles, in the third century AD, a certain Capitolina is described as he axiologotate kai theoseb[es] or theoseb[estate].⁸ From the same period in Lydia, in a synagogue of the region of Philadelphia, a basin for ablutions was offered by Eustathios the Pious.⁹ At Rome, Agrippa, son of Fuscus, is described as theosebēs (CII 500); in the Jewish catacomb of the Via Appia, a “Jewish proselyte [is also called] Theosebēs” (ibid. 202). The title thus seems to belong to the vocabulary of Jewish epigraphy; but it is not a technical term (cf. sebomenoi, phoboumenoi), and it would seem overly bold to see it as belonging exclusively to converts or proselytes added to the community of Israel.¹⁰

Actually, the epitaph of an anonymous person who died at age eighteen and was apparently from Alexandria describes his virtue with respect to gods and men by these words: dikaïos, theosebēs philanthropos.¹¹ In Mart. Pol. 3.2, “the whole multitude was astonished by the courage of the holy (theophiles) and pious (theosebēs) race of Christians” (ten gennaioteta tou theophilous kai theosebous genous ton christianon). Even in the Jewish writings, in the papyrological documents that we have, eulabeia is a reverential title used from the fourth century to honor various personages in the Christian church: bishops,¹² archbishops (SB 9527, 4), priests (IGLS 279), a church administrator (SB 10269 verso), deacons,¹³ the superiors of a religious order (P. Stras. 279, 12: “reverence the most theosebēs and long-lived common father, Abba Charisios,” proskynesete ton theosebestaton kai makrogeron koinon patera ton abba Charision), abbots of monasteries,¹⁴ an anchorite (M. Naldini, // Cristianesimo in Egitto, n. 86, 2, 24, 26), a widow or a consecrated virgin (IGLS 727), a “most pious sovereign” (ibid. 1875), and even those who make up the escort of eminent persons: Count John, for example, “with the very pious brothers James, Agathos, and Phoibammon.”¹⁵ The usage is constant in letters from the Byzantine period (cf. M. Naldini, // Cristianesimo in Egitto, n. 42, 5; 49, 5; 83, 5; 84, 21).

We may speculate that this purely conventional designation is somehow derived from 1Tim 2:10; in any event, it is likewise in a context of prayer that theosebes is used in Pap.Graec.Mag. 4, 685 (vol. 1, p. 96).

¹ Gen 20:11—“Abraham said . . . as little θεοσέβεια as there is in this place, they will kill me on account of my wife”; Exod 18:21—“You shall choose . . . men of worth who fear Elohim.” Most of the twelve occurrences of θεοσεβής in Jos. Asen. point out “that which is not appropriate” for the pious man or woman, whether sexually (8.5, 7; 20.8) or “returning evil for evil to one’s neighbor” (23.9; 28.4; 29.3).

² Job 28:28—“This is the fear of Adonai and wisdom”; 1:1—“Job was perfect and upright, fearing Elohim”; 1:8; 2:3; 4Macc 7:6—“piety and purity”; 7:22—“mastery of the passions for the sake of piety”; 15:28—“the steadfastness of pious Abraham”; 16:11—“the holy and pious mother”; T. Jos. 7.7—ε—ν σωφροσύνη θεοσεβοῦντων; T.Abr. A 4: Abraham is just, merciful, hospitable, faithful, θεοσεβής, far removed from any evil action; Jos. Asen. 4.8—“Joseph is pious, prudent, and a virgin.”

³ The new name of the eschatological Jerusalem will be “glory of θεοσέβεια” (Bar 5:4); Jdt 11:17—“Your servant is pious”; Ep. Arist. 179: “noble servants of God”; 4Macc 17:15—“It is piety that brings victory”; T. Naph. 1.10—ὁ Ῥουθαι—ος . . . θεοσεβής, ε—λεύθερος καὶ εὐγενής. “It is these derivatives of σέβειν, θεοσέβεια or especially εὐσέβεια, habitually translated as ‘piety,’ that enunciate the Greek concept closest to our concept of religion. . . . εὐσέβεια concerns the performance of certain customs (Herodotus 2.37) but it also, with respect to values (Sophocles, OC 260–262), is a notion related to those of truth and justice (Xenophon, An. 2.6.26). More rarely used than εὐσέβεια, θεοβέσεια is its very close neighbor and like it is opposed to ἀσέβεια (Plato, Cra. 394 d, ὅταν ε—ξ ἀνδρὸς ἀγαθοῦ καὶ θεοσεβοῦς ἀσεβῆς γένηται), but it has a narrower range of meaning and, in conformity with its etymology, probably expresses in relationship to the gods the virtue that both words signify (cf. Herodotus 1.86; Aristophanes, Av. 897)” (J. Rudhardt, Notions fondamentales de la pensée religieuse . . . dans la Grèce classique, Geneva, 1958, p. 12); cf. R.

C. Trench, Synonymns of the New Testament, 12th ed., London, 1894, pp. 172ff.

⁴ —Ἀλλ' ὁ πρέπει γυναιξὶν ε—παγγελομέναις θεοσέβειαν. C. Mussies, (Dio Chrysostom, p. 206) cites as parallel Dio Chrysostom 36.54 (οὕτως δὴ λέγομεν καὶ ἡμεῖς—τιμω—ντες καὶ) σεβόμενοι τὸν μέγιστον θεὸν ἔργοις τε ἀγάθοις—καὶ ῥήμασιν εὐφήμοις. Cf. Philo, Migr. Abr. 97: the Israelite women “exchanged the adorning of the body for the beauty of eusebeia”; Creation 154: “The greatest of virtues, θεοσέβεια makes the soul immortal”; it is “the perfect good” (Prelim. Stud. 130), “the most beautiful good” (Flight 150); with wisdom, justice, and the other perfections, it makes up the chorus of virtues (Spec. Laws 4.134; cf. 170; Abraham 114; Change of Names 197); “the wise person is protected by the indestructible rampart of θεοσέβεια” (Virtues 186).

⁵ Cf. G. Bertram, on this word, in TDNT, vol. 3, pp. 123–128. In the second century BC, the help of King Ptolemy Philometor is sought for a certain Apollonios, η—ς ἔχετε πρὸς πάντα τοὺς τοιούτους θεοσεβοῦ[ντα]ς (P.Lond. 23.20; vol. 1, p. 38 = UPZ 14). Aristagoras is the object of an honorific decree of Istros: τῇ τε ἡλικίᾳ προκόπτων καὶ προαγόμενος εἰ—ς τὸ θεοσεβει—ν ὡς ἔπρεπεν αὐτῷ—πρω—τον μὲν ε—τείμησεν τοὺς θεοὺς (Dittenberger, Syl. 708, 19). According to Dionysius of Halicarnassus, theosebēs Xenophon is adorned with all the virtues (Pomp. 4); Augustus ordered the senators to offer incense to the gods “to show their respect for the divinity, τὸ μὲν ἵνα θεοσεβῶ—σι” (Dio Cassius 54.30).

⁶ According to Josephus, Apion considered the priests “the wisest and most pious of the Egyptians” (Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.140); Judas Maccabeus enrolls “the just and the pious” (Ant. 12.284); Poppaea petitioned Nero on behalf of the Jews, “for she was pious” (Ant. 20.195), which is often taken to mean a proselyte, God-fearing, Judaizing.

⁷ J. B. Frey, CII, n. 748; A. Deissmann, Light, pp. 451ff.; B. Schwank, “Theaterplätze für ‘Gottesfürchtige’ in Milet,” in BZ, 1969, pp. 262–263 (settles A. Deissmann’s mistaken citing); I.Sard.Rob., pp. 39ff., which cites also two synagogue inscriptions of Sardis: Eulogios and Polyippos are both described as theosebēs. On the island of Cos, Εἰ—ρήνη θεοσεβῆς χρηστὴ χαί—ρε (ibid. p. 44).

⁸ L. Robert, Etudes anatoliennes, p. 409. At Rhodes, the epitaph of Εὐφροσύνα θεοσεβῆς χρηστὰ χαί—ρε (ibid. p. 411).

⁹ CII 754; cf. B. Lifshitz, Synagogues juives, p. 31.

¹⁰ Cf. B. Lifshitz, “Du nouveau sur les ‘Sympathisants,’” in JSJ, 1970, pp. 77–84.

¹¹ E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 71, 8. Cf. F. Cumont, L’Égypte des astrologues, pp. 134, 147, n. 3.

¹² P.Lond. 1923, 1: τω—ἀγαπητω—καὶ θεοσεβεστάτω—καὶ θεοφιλή καὶ εὐλογημένω πατρὶ Παπνουθίω —Αμμώνιος ε—ν Κυρίω θεω—χαίρειν; 1924, 2–3: μεμνημένος τω—ν ε—ντολω—ν τῆς σῆς θεοσεβείας; 1929, 3: δοίη τὴν σὴν θεοσεβείαν παραμένιν ἡμι—ν πολὺν χρόνον (these three papyri in H. I. Bell, Jews and Christians in Egypt, pp. 103–118); P.Princ. 82, 10, 95; P.Oxy. 1871, 5; P.Alex. 32, 2: διὰ τοῦ θεοσεβεστάτου καὶ ὀσιωτάτου πατρὸς Ἀββα Βίκτορος ε—πισκόπου; P.Giss. 55, 1; SB 7033, 16, 28; P. Bert. Zill., n. 14, 22: τοὺς θεοσεβεστάτους ἄββα Μαρι—νον καὶ τοὺς ἄλλους πρεσβυτέρους; IGLS, n. 1739 bis. Cf. the letter of recommendation of an archimandrite of the fifth-sixth century, Εἰ—δὼς οὖν καὶ αὐτὸς τὸ φιλόπρωτον καὶ φιλόπρωτον τῆς σῆς θεοσεβείας . . . παρακαλω—ν δὲ τὴν θεοσεβείαν σου . . . Προσαγόρευε τοὺς εὐλαβεστάτους ἀδελφοὺς πάντας (SB 10965, 4, 8, 9).

¹³ IGLS n. 2210; M. Naldini, Il Cristianesimo in Egitto, n. 51, 1.

¹⁴ C.P.Herm. 17, 1: τω—κυρίω μου θεοσεβῆ Ἄπα —Ιωάννην; 59, 2; SB 10522, 15; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XI, 28 verso, ε—πίδος τω—εὐλαβεστάτω θεοσεβεστάτω πατρὶ ἄββα—Κολλουθίω ἁγίου Παεῖτου; PSI 1342, 2, 26; P.Fouad 86, 12; P.Cair.Masp. 67138 (according to Berichtigungsliste, vol. 4, p. 14); P.Giss. 55, 1; 57, 4. Cf. SB 10798, 4: ὑπατίας τοῦ αὐτοῦ εὐσεβεστάτου ἡμω—ν δεσπότη (seventh century).

¹⁵ P.Fouad 87, 25 (cf. J. O’Callaghan, “Sobre P. Fouad 87,” in SPap, 1970, pp. 51–60); P.Ness. 46, 10–11; P.Meyer 24, 3.

θησκειά, θησκόσ

theskeia, worship, liturgy, ritual, religion; theskos, religious, reverent

theskeia, S 2356; TDNT 3.155–159; EDNT 2.154; NIDNTT 3.549, 551; MM 293; L&N 53.1; BAGD 363 | theskos, S 2357; TDNT 3.155–159; EDNT 2.155; NIDNTT 3.549, 551; L&N 53.6; BDF §118(2); BAGD 363

These two terms, which occur frequently in the imperial period, are of Ionian¹ origin and derive from theskeuo, “observe religious practices.”² The biblical hapax theskos is unknown in Greek before Jas 1:26.

I. — The ritual and liturgical meaning of threskeia is its basic and most often attested sense: acts of worship (the term is often in the plural), ritual function, liturgy, religious observance, ceremony, in honor of a divinity, an emperor, a deceased person.³ In Wis 14:18, 27 and T. Job 2.2 it refers to the worship or veneration of idols; in Col 2:18 the threskeia ton angelon.⁴ The tyrant Antiochus scoffs at Eleazar for holding to Jewish practices (4Macc 5:6, 13). Philo denounces the imposter who claims to be a prophet and leads his hearers into pagan superstitions, “toward the threskeia of the gods who are acknowledged in the various cities.”⁵ Plutarch recommends that the married person “shut out from the home superfluous ceremonies and foreign superstitions” (periergois de threskeiais kai xenais deisidaimoniais apoekleisthai ten auleion, Con. praec. 19). In 174, the Tyrians of Puteoli mention “the expenditures that we have to make for the sacrifices and for the worship of our national divinities who have temples here.”⁶ On 14 June 171, the priests of the town of Bacchias ask the strategos to countermand an order of the ekboleus, who is sending them to work far from their temple; they say that they want to be in a position “to carry out each day the ceremonies of the gods for the preservation of our lord the emperor.”⁷ In 202–204, two priests declare that they have faithfully carried out the rites.⁸ Negligent priests are liable to a fine of two hundred drachmas.⁹

II. — If threskeia is often used in a thoroughly material sense,¹⁰ for a purely ritual deed or action, it is normally an expression of an internal piety or a truly religious sentiment. This is certainly the case when Emperor Claudius prides himself on having promoted the cult of Apollo;¹¹ and it is the inspiration behind a goodly number of religious rules posted on the doors of sanctuaries.¹² Confirmation is provided by the frequent mention of eusebeia: “they worshiped the gods with eusebeia.”¹³ It is in this sense that St. Paul confessed to King Agrippa, “I have lived as a Pharisee according to the strictest sect of our religion” (kata ten akribestaten hairesin tes hemeteras threskeias, Acts 26:5; cf. Josephus, Ant. 12.271; 19.284). The emphasis is on the practice of external observances and on the faithfulness of traditional piety.

III. — But in this latter text, threskeia is properly understood as being religion pure and simple, or better, the liturgy and rites used in the adoration of God, the cult that honors God.¹⁴ Thus the expression in the sixth century, “Jewish with respect to religion” (loudaio ten threskeian, P.Ant. 42, 10 = C.Pap.Jud. 508) or “Samaritan with respect to religion” (Samaritai ten threskian, C.P.Herm. 29, 7 = SB 9278, 7). Clement of Rome referred to the Christian religion as threskeia hemon (1Clem. 62.1; cf. 45.7).

IV. — Threskeia takes on ethical connotations in Jas 1:26—“If someone thinks that he is religious—ei tis dokei threskos einai—and does not bridle his tongue . . . his religion (he threskeia) is worthless,” his observances are vain; Jas 1:27—“Religion that is pure and spotless before the God and Father—threskeia kathara kai amiantos—to take help to orphans and widows.”¹⁵ The best parallel is probably that of Corp. Herm. 12.23: “Adore this Word, my child, and worship him (proskynei kai threskeue). For there is only one way to worship God (threskeia mia): not being evil.”¹⁶ Philo emphasizes that “authentic worship” requires cleansing one’s heart of ingratitude, self-love, and presumption (Sacr. Abel and Cain 58); and Josephus notes that Isaac combined with the practice of all the virtues and with filial obedience a zeal for the threskeia of God (Ant. 1.222).

In defining true religion not by the the precise execution of rituals but by the carrying out of moral obligations and above all by brotherly love,¹⁷ St. James sided with the contemporary religious movement in the direction of the spiritualization of worship.¹⁸

¹ According to Plutarch (Alex. 2) the etymology of θρησκεύω traces back through θρησσα: “These Thracian women to whom it seems we owe the application of θρησκεύω to religious practices that are tiresomely and excessively detailed—δοκει— τὸ θρησκεύειν ὄνομα ται—ς κατακόροις γενέσθαι καὶ περιέργοις ι—ερουργίαις,” justified by H. Gregory (“Thracés et Thessaliens maîtres de religions et de magie, ou l’étymologie de θρησκεία et d’ἀτάσθαλος,” in Hommages à J. Bidez et à Fr. Cumont, Brussels, 1948, pp. 375–386). E. Boisacq (Dictionnaire étymologique, p. 340) derives these words from the root of θεράπων-θεραπεύω. P. Chantraine states: “Since θρησκος is secondary and postverbal, we must begin with θρησκεύω, where it is customary to see an arrangement θρήσκω νοω— and θράσκειν ἀναμιμνήσκειν (Hesychius); these glosses confirm the Ionian origin of θρησκεύω. At a greater distance there is ε—ν-θρει—ν φυλάσσειν (Hesychius), where can be seen an aorist with a zero vowel; moreover, the adjective ἄ-θερές: ἀνόητον, ἀνόσιον (Hesychius). This analysis, which remains uncertain, supposes that the use of θρησκεύω for ‘observe a religious practice’ arises from the general sense ‘observe, keep,’ etc.” (Dictionnaire étymologique, p. 440). Cf. K.L. Schmidt, on this word, in TDNT, vol. 3, pp. 155–159.

² The verb θρησκεύειν, “adore, venerate, give cultic honor,” unknown in the NT, is used in Wis 11:15; 14:17 for idol worship; cf. Herodotus 2.37: “the priests force themselves, as it were, to observe thousands of religious practices”; 2.64: “the Egyptians, who in general follow prescriptions of a religious nature (θρησκεύουσι) painstakingly, do so in particular on this point”; Plutarch, Alex. 2.8: give oneself to rites. In 290 on the column of a temple at Akoris: ε—πὶ Διδύμου ι—ερέως θρησκεύοντος (SB 991); a Christian papyrus of the fourth century: prayers obtain ascetical and religious revelations, τω—ν γὰρ ἀσκούντων καὶ θρησκευόντων ἀποκαλύμματα δικνέοντε (P.Lond. 1926, 10; cf. H. I. Bell, Jews and Christians in Egypt, p. 108). On a stele of the third century, οἱ—συνελθόντες θρησκευταὶ ἐ—πὶ θεοῦ Διὸς Ὑψίστου (J.M.R. Cormack, “Zeus Hypsistos at Pydna,” in Mélanges . . . G. Daux, Paris, 1974, p. 51, 6); BGU 2215, col. I, 3: θρησκευέται τὸ ἰ—ερόν; col. III, 2: ἰ—ερεῖ—ς μὴ εἶναι τὰς τω—ν θρησκείας.

³ P.Lund IV, 1, 13. Cult of Isis (P.Oxy. 1380, 245); Res Gestae Divi Saporis: κάκει—νος ἐ—πὶ τὰς χρείας καὶ θρησκείας τω—ν θεω—ν σπουδασάτω (SEG XX, 324, 69); in AD 77, Silvius Italicus, proconsul of Asia, forbids catching with the help of bait, touching, or frightening, or buying pigeons in the city of Aphrodisias “because of the cult of the goddess, τῆς τε θρησκείας τῆς περὶ τὴν ἐόν χάριν” (LSAM, n. 86, 8); the expulsion of pigs from the temple of Talmis so that religious ceremonies would not be disturbed: τὰ περὶ τούτου κελευσθέντα πρὸς τὸ δύνασθαι τὰ περὶ τὰ ἰ—ερά θρήσκια κατὰ τὰ νενομισμένα γείνεσθαι (Chrest. Wilck., 74, 9 = Dittenberger, Or. 210, 9 = SB 8534); C.P.Herm. 2, 11: “the water of the cult of the god Hermes who protects my daughter,” line 19: “the cult of the sacred month of Pharmuthi”; IGLAM, n. 90, 5: τὰ θεῖ—α θρησκεία; Stud.Pal. XXII, 184, 93: θρησκείας τω—ν θεω—ν—on the honors given Augustus, I.Priene, 105, 24 (= Dittenberger, Or. 458), to the emperor (Philo, To Gaius 232). On the religio of the dead, cf. the inscription of Nazareth on the violation of tombs: Augustus orders that “the sepulchers and tombs made for the veneration (εἰ—ς θρησκείαν) of grandparents or children or close relatives remain inviolate in perpetuity” (SEG VIII, 13, 3; XIII, 596, 16; XVI, 828). F. M. Abel, “Un rescrit impérial sur la violation de sépulture et le tombeau trouvé vide,” in RB, 1930, p. 568; J. Schmitt, “Nazareth (Inscription de),” in DBSup, vol. 6, 338ff.; Receuil L. Cerfaux, Gembloux, 1962, vol. 3, pp. 23ff.). At Thessalonica, a funerary epigram for a young woman: ἦν ἐ—πόθησεν Ἔρωσ διὰ τὴν Παφίαν —Αφροδίτην· κει—μαι δ ἐ—ν τύμβῳ διὰ θρησκευτω—ν φιλότητα (L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 2, Paris, 1946, p. 133). Cf. the numerous inscriptions cited by L. Robert, Etudes épigraphiques, pp. 226–235.

⁴ Cf. F. O. Francis, “Humility and Angelic Worship in Col. II, 18,” in ST, vol. 16, 1963, pp. 109–134. Eusebius mentions a θρησκεία τω—ν δαιμόνων (Hist. Eccl. 6.41.2).

⁵ Πρὸς τὴν τω—ν νενομισμένων κατὰ πόλεις θρησκείαν θεω—ν, Philo, Spec. Laws 1.135; cf. Flight 41; To Gaius 298: “the emperor Tiberius . . . left intact the ceremonial worship”; Josephus, War 1.148, 150; the letter of Claudius to the Alexandrians: τω—ν πρὸς θρησκείαν αὐτοί—ς νενομισμένων τοῦ θεοῦ (P.Lond. 1912, 85; cf. H. I. Bell, Jews and Christians in Egypt, p. 25; C.Pap.Jud. 153); an inscription of Lydia published by J. Keil, “Ein Markttag in Maeonien,” in G. E. Mylonas, D.

Raymond, Studies Presented to D. M. Robinson, St. Louis, 1953, vol. 2, pp. 363–370 (republished SEG XIII, 518, 5).

⁶ Dittenberger, Or. 595, 9: ἀναλίσκοντες εἰς τε θυσίας καὶ θρησκείας τῶν πατρίων ἡμῶν θεῶν.

⁷ P. Yale inv. 349, 21: τὰς τῶν θεῶν θρησκείας ποιεῖσθαι γεινομένας; ed. E. H. Gilliam, “The Archives of the Temple of Soknobraisis at Bacchias,” in YCS, vol. 10, 1947, p. 251; SB 9328; Chrest. Wilck., 72, 10; C. Pap. Jud. 520, 11.

⁸ P. Yale inv. 324, 8: εἰς ποιησάμεθα θρησκείας τῶν θεῶν; ed. E. H. Gilliam, “The Archives of the Temple of Soknobraisis at Bacchias,” in YCS, vol. 10, 1947, p. 270, and SB 9331.

⁹ Gnomon of the Idios Logos 75: ἰερεὺς καταλειπὼν τὰς θρησκείας.

¹⁰ P. Oxy. 2476, 10; P. Mil. Vogl. 43, 9: θρησκεύετε τοῦτον; Stud. Pal. XX, 33, 12; cf. the different forms of ritual (Josephus, Ant. 13.66). In 262, the Emperor Gallienus orders that places of worship be left free, ἀπὸ τῶν τόπων τῶν θρησκευσίμων (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 7.13).

¹¹ Dittenberger, Syl. 801 D 4: ἀεὶ δετήρησα τὴν θρησκείαν τοῦ Ἀπόλλωνος τοῦ Πυθίου (republished by F. Gabba, Iscrizioni greche e latine per lo studio della Bibbia, Turin, 1958, n. 22). Similarly Plotinus to the Epicureans of Athens (ibid. 834, 14) and Hadrian at Delphi: καὶ εἰς τὴν ἀρχαιότητα τῆς πόλεως καὶ εἰς τὴν τοῦ κατέχοντος αὐτὴν θεοῦ θρησκείαν ἀφορῶν (E. Bourguet, De Rebus Delphicis, Paris, 1905, p. 78); Cl. Vibius Salutaris at Ephesus (I. Ephes., II, n. 27, 20). At Thessalonica, οἱ συνθρησκευταὶ κλεινῆς θεοῦ μεγάλου Σαράπιδος (IG X, 2, 192).

¹² At Theos, in the time of Tiberius, the regulations concerning the cult of Dionysius are presented as περὶ τῶν εἰς ἄρρησκεία (LSAM, n. 28, 5), for the cult of Artemis at Ephesus (ibid. 31, 27), of Zeus Panamaros and of Hecate at Stratoniceia (ibid. 69, 7, 13); cf. J. van Herten, ῥησκεία, εὐλάβεια, ἰκέτης, Utrecht, 1934, pp. 2–27; A. Pelletier, Josèphe adaptateur, pp. 32ff.

¹³ Τοὺς μὲν θεοὺς εἰς θρησκευσεν εὐσεβῶς, Dittenberger, Syl. 783, 42, (27 BC); cf. 867, 12, 48; Or. 513, 13 (Pergamum, third century); I. Lind. 490, 10, 15; IGLAM, 519, 7: εἰς τῆς δὲ ὑμνωδίας προσόδου καὶ θρησκείας εὐσεβείαν αὐτούς; line 13: ὑπὲρ τοῦ ἰς [τὸν πάντα] αἰῶνα τὴν αὐτὴν διαμεινῆσαι τῆς ἀνθαιρέσεως τάξιν καὶ ῥησκείαν καὶ εὐσέβειαν

τω—ν' εω—ν (Stratoniceia in Caria); SEG IV, 245, 4–5: θρησκευέσθαι καὶ εὐσεβει—ν (first century BC); IV, 263, 8: a decree for a priest who showed ὅσου μὲν ποιει—ται πρὸς αὐτὸν εὐσέβειαν καὶ θρησκείαν (first century AD); G. E. Bean, T. B. Mitford, Cilicia, n. 12, 15: τὴν θρησκείαν δὲ τὴν πρὸς τὸν θεὸν εὐσεβω—ς.

¹⁴ When Mattathias issued a call to arms to sustain the covenant (διαθήκην) according to 1Macc 2:27, Josephus writes “the cult of God, τῆς τοῦ θεοῦ θρησκείας” (Ant. 12.271; cf. 253). Moses had insisted on an oath not to “transgress the laws” (Ant. 4.309); Josephus comments “violate his cult, θρησκεία” (4.312–313); cf. 9.99: ἀφιέναι τὴν θρησκείαν = quit or reject the cult; War 7.45: “They drew to their cult a large number of Greeks, who from then on, in some way, became part of their community, προσαγόμενοι ται—ς θρησκείαις πολὺ πλῆθος Ἑλλήνων”; cf. Ant. 9.273; 17.214; War 5.229. Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 4.26.7.

¹⁵ Cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 1, pp. 199ff.; D. J. Roberts, “The Definition of ‘Pure Religion’ in James I, 27,” in ExpT, vol. 83, 1972, p. 215. M. Black (“Critical and Exegetical Notes on Three New Testament Texts: Hebrews XI, 1; Jude 5; James I, 27,” in Festschrift E. Haenchen, Berlin, 1964, p. 45) draws attention to the interesting variant in P74: ὑπερασπίζειν (instead of ἄσπιλον ε—αὐτὸν τηρει—ν): to visit the orphans and protect the widows in their affliction in this world.

¹⁶ Cf. a Christian epitaph from around Laodicea in which eusebeia is defined as love for the poor, regard for friends, affection for parents, hospitality toward all people (F. Cumont, Studia Pontica, vol. 3, 20, 10ff.). If Philo distinguishes between εὐσέβεια and θρησκεία (Philo, Worse Attacks Better 21), Josephus reports that Antiochus Sidetes was called Eusebes on account of his excessive θρησκεία (Ant. 13.244; cf. 20.13). —Cf. P. Hermann, Ergebnisse, n. 25, 8: διὰ τὴν ι—ς τοὺς θεοὺς θρησκείαν καὶ τὰς ι—ς τὸν δοῦμον πολλὰς εὐεργεσίας.

¹⁷ Cf. A. Hamman, “Prière et culte dans la lettre de saint Jacques,” in ETL, 1958, pp. 35–47; O. J. F. Seitz, “James and the Law,” in F. L. Cross, SE, vol. 2, pp. 472–486.

¹⁸ Cf. Philo, Spec. Laws 1.277; Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.192: “It is God . . . that all must serve by practicing virtue (θεραπεύειν αὐτὸν ἀσκοῦντας ἀρετήν); for that is the holiest manner of serving God (τρόπος γὰρ θεοῦ θεραπείας ου—τος ὀσιώτατος);” Musonius (ed. C. E. Lutz, pp. 49ff. et passim); etc. Cf. H. Wenschkewitz, “Die Spiritualisierung der Kultusbegriffe Tempel, Priester und Opfer im Neuen Testament,” in Angelos, 1932, pp. 71–230.

ἴδιος, ἴδια, ἰ—δία

idios, particular, private, own; idia, one's own affairs, property, etc.; idia (with subscript), for oneself particularly

idios, S 2398; EDNT 2.171; NIDNTT 2.839–840; MM 298; L&N 10.12, 28.67, 57.4, 58.47, 87.56, 92.21; BDF §§12, 14, 241(6), 286; BAGD 369 | idia, NIDNTT 2.838–840; ND 6.113–119, 125–127

Whether used as adjective, noun, or adverb, this term means “peculiar to, particular, private,”¹ but its sense is weakened in the Koine, where it is usually equivalent to a possessive.² It is used with respect to things as well as persons to express who they belong to: “If you were of the world, the world would love its own” (to idion ephilei, John 15:19); “wood must be taken from his own property” (1Esdr 6:31); “Leaving there the things that belonged to us (ta idia, our goods), we followed you.”³ Ta idia means “his/her/ its property, goods”; cf. “a land that is not theirs” (ouk idia, Gen 15:13; 47:18; Deut 15:2; Prov 11:24); “no one said that anything he had was his own” (idion einai).⁴ That which is public or common (koinon) is always being contrasted with the private (idion): “Boulagoras rendered many services in a public capacity and in private.”⁵

Often enough, ta idia refers to private business, personal interests: “Hold it as a point of honor to see to your own business” (prassein ta idia, 1Thess 4:11); “each one has his own burden to bear” (Gal 6:5); “Each one must forget his individual sufferings (apalgesantas de ta idia) and devote himself to the preservation of the common interest.”⁶ “He does not draw from it a meager profit for himself” (eis idion, P.Mich. 526, 15). To this we may connect on the one hand idion in the sense in which “the property” of fire is to burn,⁷ that of horses is to whinny (Philo, Dreams 1.108), and the good peculiar to humankind is knowledge (Good Man Free 12); and on the other hand to the expressions ek ton idion and ek tou idiou, “at their/his/her own expense,” which recur constantly in the papyri and the inscriptions: “Apollonius has restored the damaged propylon at his own expense” (ek tou idiou);⁸ “he offered at his own expense” (ek ton idion anetheken);⁹ “I paid out of my own pocket” (BGU 2243, 10; ektou idiou).

Ta idia can refer to all the things that a person owns or has use of: fruits (Luke 6:41; BGU 1901, 3), an olive tree (Rom 11:24), a mount (Luke 10:34), sheep and flocks,¹⁰ members or organs of the body,¹¹ a meal (1Cor 11:21), pay (3:8; 9:7), all that is personal.¹² Its most common meaning is territorial: idios, like topos,¹³ can refer to a field (Matt 22:5; P.Mich. 423, 14), a country (Philo, Virtues 105; Josephus, Ant. 9.40), a city (Matt 9:1; 1Esdr 5:8), a village (P.Fouad 26, 27; SB 8299, 20; P.Cair.Isid.

8, 11), and especially the place where one resides and of which one is an inhabitant,¹⁴ where one is at home (cf. French chez soi),¹⁵ one's house.¹⁶ Thus Paul stayed "two years in a house that he had rented" (en idio misthomati, Acts 28:30), the episkopos governs his own house well (1Tim 3:4, 5, 12; 5:4), and the wicked angels left their own dwelling (Jude 6). In writing that the incarnate Word came to his own place (eis ta idia), St. John (1:11) means not only to locate this coming geographically in Palestine but also to set it in the particular property of the One by whom all things were made (Sir 24:6–12), as distinct from that which might belong to others; that is, among the beloved and chosen people.¹⁷ Ta idia therefore has an affective nuance, because only guests with whom one has affinity of mind and heart are received into a person's home. 2John 10 forbids receiving a heterodox person (me lambanete auton eisoikian).¹⁸

The stability, security, intimacy, and happiness of home life are not absent from the numerous literary and papyrological texts that mention the return home of prisoners, soldiers, travelers, or workers.¹⁹ In any event, amnesty decrees regularly order "that those who have fled return home with amnesty from the accusations of which they are the object."²⁰ We may compare John 16:32—"You will be dispersed, each to his own home (skorpisthete hekastos eis ta idia) and you will leave me alone."²¹ To convey the idea "aside, apart," the NT uses kat' idian,²² but the adverb idia (ἑδὲ), "for oneself particularly," is also used.²³

Idios, idia are similarly used for persons in a way synonymous with a simple possessive, notably with regard to members of a family: one's own brother and sister,²⁴ mother,²⁵ father (John 5:18; Josephus, Ant. 1.230; 9.99), spouse,²⁶ son or daughter.²⁷ If it is easy to identify idios when it is used as an attributive adjective (Matt 25:14, tous idious doulous; Josephus, Ant. 10.47), when it is used as a noun only the context can identify the referent: Peter and John, when released, go to "their own" (elthon pros tous idious).²⁸ The word can mean men, people,²⁹ companions,³⁰ or retinue (Philo, Flacc. 27: Agrippa embarked meta ton idion; Josephus, Life 246), troops (Philo, Abraham 214), compatriots (Philo, To Gaius 211, 327), partisans (Josephus, War 2.267); but usually the emphasis falls on an emotional attachment: relatives and friends.³¹ John 1:11 uses the masculine plural hoi idioi to emphasize the scandal of the rejection of the Messiah by the Israelites (cf. P.Oxy. 2778, 3–4: hoi idioi . . . ouk ethelesan). It was neither humankind in general nor the Galileans who rejected him (Matt 15:57; Mark 6:4; Luke 4:24; John 4:44), nor even his compatriots who did not accept his testimony (John 3:11; 5:43), but the Israelites, his table companions, who lived in his dwelling and were not willing to receive the Master of the house. They knew the heir and killed him (Matt 21:39; Mark 12:8; Luke 20:15). This selection evoked by hoi idioi is as marked in John 13:1, where Jesus, "having loved his own (tous idious) who were in the world, loved them to the end." This refers to his mathetai (John 8:31; 13:23, 35; 15:8; etc.), a more restricted group than “his people” (1:11); these are close friends, favorites. It is he who has chosen them, those whom the Father gave and entrusted to him;³² this means above all the apostles, to whom the Lord was to give his last instructions and to whom he dedicated his final expressions of emotion.

After the disciple at the foot of the cross has heard Jesus say, “Behold your mother,” the evangelist adds, “And from that moment, the disciple took her into his own home” (ap’ ekeines tes horas elaben ho mathetes auten eis ta idia).³³ Answering to the specification of the time (the hour), idia adds—as happens constantly in the Fourth Gospel—a specification of place: after Jesus’s death the beloved disciple took Mary into his own home and the mother of Jesus became his own mother (according to the Lord’s order). He considered her to be his own and surrounded her with filial affection and veneration, thus becoming as it were a brother of Christ.³⁴

¹ In a guarantee of immunity from AD 52, ε—μοὶ ἴδιον (“personal”) is written at the top of the papyrus (P.Mich. 354, 1). Cf. μέρος ἴδιον (P.Oslo 110, 1; P.Phil. 5, 3; first century AD), τὰ ἴδια μέρη (P.Oxy. 3026, col. II, 18); “Dioscorus, a slave, counted here as my personal property” (ὁ καὶ ε—νθάδε λογιζόμενος ἰδιός μου, P.Brux. 19, 8; declaration of inventory); “the trees of their private property”; the Nymphs and the Seasons poured “the libations which belong to them” (προκοαι—ς ται—ς ι—δίαις, SB 7541,6).

² Cf. A. Deissmann, Bible Studies, pp. 123ff.

³ Luke 18:28. Cf. τὰ ἴδια φύλασσε (Dittenberger, Syl. 1268, 20); those who were despoiled took possession of their goods (τω—ν ι—δίων, SEG I, 166, 18); “He has undertaken to advance the necessary sums personally from his own money” (ε—κ τοῦ ι—δίου, ibid., I. 35; III, 356, 15); P.Oxy. 489, 4; 490, 3; 492, 4; 2729, 10; 3015, 22; 3288, 7; P.Athen. 17, 15; BGU 1849, 10; P.Vindob.Bosw. 7, 29; P.Dura 14, 4; P.Fam.Tebt. 43, 49; P.Hamb. 68, 12; P.Cair.Isid. 64, 18; 70, 7; etc.

⁴ Acts 4:32. Cf. Philo, Creation 57, 138; Alleg. Interp. 1.104; Cherub. 73, 113, 117, 124; Unchang. God 5; Migr. Abr. 10 (τὸ ἴδιον = “your property”); Heir 103, 258; Sacr. Abel and Cain 97; Husbandry 5; Dreams 1.95; Moses 1.254; 2.243; Spec. Laws 1.157; 1.71, 85, 92, 106, 141: sell what belongs to them (τὰ ἴδια); 4.159: personal fortune (τὴν ι—δίαν οὐσίαν); Rewards 54; Virtues 90, 95, 100, 226; Flight 29; Flacc. 57, 77; Josephus, War 1.201, 483; 4.94; Ant. 6.322; 11.214.

⁵ SEG I, 366, 3 and 50; likewise Athenodorus of Rhodes (Dittenberger, Syl. 493, 8 and 13), a garrison commandant (φρούραρχος) in the second century BC at Lepisia (NCIG, n. IV, 11–12); cf. GIBM, 2d ed., vol. 1, Attica, n. 15, 11–12; 235, 10, 236, 5; 237, 6; etc. P.Mich. 607, 14; Philo, Alleg. Interp. 1.106; 3.30, 86; Worse Attacks Better 174; Post. Cain 117 (private and public life); Giants 29; Unchang. God 17; Husbandry 35, 47; Plant. 146; Drunkenness 79, 109, 129; Sobr. 40; Conf. Tongues 46; Flight 36, 210; Dreams 1.176; Abraham 20; Moses 1.137; 2.291; Decalogue 5, 51, 173; Spec. Laws 1.149; 2.12, 145, 150, 188; 4.35, 72; Virtues 3; Good Man Free 86; Contemp. Life 61; Rewards 14, 67, 87, 119, 168; To Gaius 4, 11, 190, 193; Josephus, War 4.320; 7.260; Ant. 3.219; 4.310; 5.92; 8.297; 13.166; 14.151; 16.39; Thucydides 1.141.3: “The Peloponnesians have neither individual nor collective wealth.”

⁶ Thucydides 2.61.4; 2Macc 3:3; 11:23—“see to the care of their own business” (πρὸς τὴν τω—ν ι—δίων ε—πιμέλειαν); 11:26; 14:4—their own advantage (ι—δίας); 14.42; Philo, Unchang. God 19; Migr. Abr. 211: “return to your own business” (πρὸς τὴν τω—ν ι—δίων ε—πιμέλειαν); Spec. Laws 2.236; Josephus, Ant. 6.61; 10.246; 12.402; 13.265; Ag. Apion 2.196: his own interest; BGU 2348, 4: ει—ς ι—δίαν χρεία = for his own use (hence, “revenue,” War 1.483; and “profit,” Ant. 5.26, 32, 33; 6.133); P.Tebt. 5, 254: “no one shall requisition a boat for his personal use”; PSI 1401, 9; P.Panop.Beatty 1, 253; P.Cair.Zen. 59133, 15; 59516, 17; 59697, 11; P.Ant. 102, 6; 103, 15; P.Hamb. 57, 24; P.Fam.Tebt. 45, 2; P.Apoll. 26, 10: ἕκαστος ει—ς τὸν ἴδιον κάματον, let each one return to his own occupations; SB 8384, 8.

⁷ Philo, Alleg. Interp. 1.5; cf. 2.34; 3.105, 200; Cherub. 77; Sacr. Abel and Cain 101; Worse Attacks Better 138: “joy is the property of the sage”; Dreams 1.181, 186: the property of mortal man; Heir 128, 161: the property of justice; Prelim. Stud. 69, 149: of philosophy; Moses 2.4: of the law; Post. Cain 29: “God’s property is rest and stability”; Change of Names 129: “is to do good”; Husbandry 106; Drunkenness 209.

⁸ E. Bernand, Fayoum, n. 89; cf. 92, 99: in AD 5, “Publius Petronius Eudemon rebuilt the altar and its outbuildings at his own expense (ε—κ τω—ν ι—δίων ἀναλωμάτων) in honor of Nemesis”; Dittenberger, Syl. 374, 40; SEG XIV, 64, 12; CII 548, 738 (cf. B.Lifshitz, Synagogues juives, n. 32, 66, 77 b); I.Olymp. 55, 11; 284; 428, 7; 940, 3; P.Oxy. 2874, 52; P.Mich. 530, 7; P.Phil. 15, 13: “Each year we will carry out all the appropriate work at our own expense (ε—κ τοῦ ι—δίου), in good time, without causing any damage”; P.Soterichos 3; 23, where the editor gives numerous references to this clause in rental contracts; cf. ἴδιον ἔργον (L. Robert, Etudes épigraphiques, p. 47). “At his own expense” is also expressed by τοι—ς ι—δίοις (P.Sorb. 17 a 13; b 14; Josephus, War 2.105).

⁹ GIBM, n. LVII, 4; To Gaius 157, 317: “with his own funds”; Josephus, War 1.136; 2.124; Ant. 3.242, 257; 9.273; 11.181; 14.276, 485. Cf. the devil, who “draws lies out of his own store” (ε—κ τω—ν ι—δίωv λαλει—, John 8:44; 15:19).

¹⁰ John 10:3, 4, 12; Philo, Change of Names 115: “the Shepherd looks over the flock that is his” (ποιίμνης τῆς ι—δίας); Joseph 257: guardians of his own livestock (τω—ν ι—δίωv).

¹¹ The eye (Luke 6:41), blood (Acts 20:28; Heb 9:12; 13:12), a nurse’s milk (P.Rein. 103, 8; 104, 9; SB 7619, 8; 11248, 69), especially the hands (1Cor 4:12; Eph 4:28; Josephus, War 4.47; 6.216, 346; 7.243; C.P.Herm. 30, 26; P.Oxy. 2237, 22; 2478, 10; 3204, 8; SB 6968; 6961; 9153, 14); “The man who is fully capable of doing his own will” (περὶ τοῦ ι—δίου θελήματος, 1Cor 7:37); a personal feeling of benevolence (P.Oxy. 3022, 10); “The soul from above knows that which is proper to it” (τὰ ἴδια γεινώσκει, P.Oxy. 4, 10). Cf. die a natural death (ει—δίωv θανάτω, SEG VI, 274; L. Robert, Gladiateurs, n. 55, 11, ι—δίωv ἔθανον).

¹² A conviction (Rom 14:5), an interpretation (2Pet 1:20), religion (Acts 25:19), credit (διὰ τῆς ι—δίας συστάσεως, NCIG, n. VII, 5); capabilities (κατὰ τὴν ι—δίαν δύναμιν, Matt 25:15; Acts 1:7; 3:12). Cf. “each in his rank” (ἕκαστος ε—ν τω— ι—δίωv τάγματι, 1Cor 15:23) = Josephus, War 3.93—τὴν ι—δίαν τάξιν; PSI 1441, 22; P.Panop. Beatty 1, 355: ε—ν ι—δίᾳ τάξει; SB 10281, col. III, 6; BGU 2217, 20; E. Bernard, Fayoum, 1975, n. 29, 12.

¹³ Acts 1:25—“Judas withdrew to his own place”; 1Macc 11:38; Josephus, War 2.488; Ant. 14.235; 19.305; P.Mich. 243, 7: τοῦ ι—δίου τόπου = his own town (period of Tiberius); P.Oxy. 2187, 26; a place of birth (P.Mert. 12, 5).

¹⁴ P.Fam.Tebt. 33, 2: οι—κοῦντες ε—ν τοι—ς ι—δίωις; P.Mich. 174, 21: ε—ν τῇ ι—δίᾳ διαζῆν; 529, 18; P.Oslo 22, 16; P.Mert. 91, 18; 92, 13; SB 7602, 2; 7673, 11: οι—κω— δὲ ε—ν ι—δίᾳ οι—κία τῆς αὐτῆς κώμης.

¹⁵ 2Macc 11:29—“the desire you have to return home” (πρὸς τοι—ς ι—δίωις); 1Esdr 5:46; Esth 5:10—“Haman will return home” (ει—ς τὰ ἴδια); 6:12; 3Macc 6:27, 37; 8:8. At Acts 5:18, D adds that after the apostles came out of prison καὶ ε—πορεύθη εἰς ἕκαστος ει—ς τὰ ἴδια; at Acts 14:18, C adds: ἀλλὰ πορεύεσθαι ἕκαστος ει—ς τὰ ἴδια; at Tyre, after the Christians had accompanied Paul to the ship, ε—κει—νοι δὲ ὑπέστρεψαν ει—ς τὰ ἴδια. “Aratus exhorted the Mantinaeans to stay home” (μένειν ε—πὶ τω—ν ι—δίωv, Polybius 2.57.5); “Abilyx went back home” (ει—ς τὴν ι—δίαν ἀπηλλάγη, Polybius 3.99.4). A law of Cyrene on sacred vases, μηδὲ ἔξω σκευὴ φέρειν ἢ ι—δίαι λαμβάνειν (SEG XX, 720; second-first century BC), κατήλθεν εἰ—ς τὸ ἴδιόν μου καὶ ἔλαβεν τὰ ε—μά (SB 9616, verso 18); ἡ μήτηρ σου παρακαλεῖ— σε ε—λθει—ν εἰ—ς τὰ ἴδια (SB 10240, 4; AD 41); cf. the synonymous relationship with ε—μαυτόν or ε—αυτόν, Wis 8:18. F. Neiryneck, “ἀπήλθεν πρὸς ε—αυτόν, Lc. XXIV, 12 et Jn. XX, 10,” in ETL, 1978, pp. 104–118.

¹⁶ Job 7:10—He did not return to his house (οὐ μὴ ε—πιστρέψῃ εἰ—ς τὸν ἴδιον οἶκον); 3Macc 5:21, 34; 6:27; 7:8, 18, 20; P.Brem. 40, 5: καταλιπεῖ—ν εἰ—ς τὴν ι—δίαν αὐτῆς οἰ—κίαν. For his son’s epikrisis, Horion sends a dinner invitation (καλεῖ— σε εἰ—ς τὴν ι—δίαν οἰ—κίαν, P.Oxy. 2792, 4); likewise at the supper of Sarapis (ε—ν τῇ ι—δίᾳ οἰ—κίᾳ, P.Oslo 157, 4; P.Oxy. 523; BGU 2221, 10). The papyri offer this formula rather often: “from her house to ours” (ε—ξ οἴκου αὐτῆς εἰ—ς ι—δίας ἡμῶ—ν, P.Erl. 67, 12; P.Fouad 53, 2; P.Köln 103, 8; P.Warr. 10, 11; PSI 1340, 7; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 1, 6). The Fates snatched the scribe Ammonius from his home (οἴκων ε—ξ ι—δίων, SEG XV, 853, 7). Cf. Gen 14:14—τοὺς ι—δίους οἰ—κογενεῖ—ς αὐτοῦ, the men born in his own home; Philo, Cherub. 99; Migr. Abr. 185, 195; Dreams 1.56, 149; Moses 1.150; Spec. Laws 3.138; Good Man Free 85; To Gaius 123.

¹⁷ Cf. Exod 19:5; Deut 7:6; Ps 135:4; 1Pet 2:9. Cf. J. Jervell, “‘Er kam in sein Eigentum’: Zu Joh. I, 11,” in ST, vol. 10, 1965, pp. 14–27. On ἔρχομαι, cf. E. Arnens, The HΛON-Sayings in the Synoptic Tradition, Fribourg-Göttingen, 1976.

¹⁸ P.Fay. 136, 9: ἄμινον ὑμα—ς ε—ν τοι—ς ι—δίοις οἷς ε—άν τύχοι εἶναι ἢ ε—πὶ ξένης (“It is better to be at home than abroad, whatever the circumstances may be”); P.Oxy. 1680, 5: “I pray God . . . that we may welcome you again to the house in good health” (ὕγιαίνοντί σε ἀπολαβεῖ—ν ε—ν τοι—ς ι—δίοις).

¹⁹ Josephus, War 1.666: ἀναπέμπειν ἕκαστον εἰ—ς τὰ ἴδια; 4.528; Ant. 7.362: “Solomon ordered him to return to his house” (εἰ—ς τὴν ι—δίαν οἰ—κίαν ἀπελθει—ν); 8.405: Micaiah had predicted that the men would return home in peace (ἀναστρέψειν εἰ—ς τὰ ἴδια); 8.416; Appian, Hisp. 23: ἀπέλυε τοὺς αἰ—χμαλώτους εἰ—ς τὰ ἴδια; Peripl. Erythr. 65: ἀπαίρουσιν εἰ—ς τὰ ἴδια εἰ—ς τοὺς ε—σωτέρους τόπους (ed. H. Frisk, The Periplus of the Erythraean Sea, Göteborg, 1927, p. 21, cf. p. 66). I.Cret. IV, 168, 18: “Hermias asked that we let him return home” (ἀθέμεν αὐτόν ε—ς τὴν ι—δίαν); P.Apoll. 26, 12: “Let everyone return home” (ἕκαστος εἰ—ς τὰ ἴδια); SB 6002, 9.

²⁰ P.Kroll I, 4 (= SB 9316), an ordinance of a Ptolemy in 186 or 104 BC, καταπορεύεσθαι εἰς τὰς ἰδίας, ἀπολελυμένους; C.Ord.Ptol. 41, 4 (of Ptolemy Euergetes II; 154 BC): καταπορεύεσθαι εἰς τὰς ἰδίας, those who have fled shall return home and take up their former activities, n. 43 bis 8; 53 ter 7; P.Tebt. 5, 7 (118 BC).

²¹ The apostles will seek secure shelter. M. J. Lagrange (on this text) comments: “The dispersion εἰς τὰ ἴδια (cf. 9:27) is incontestably synonymous with ‘to the house’ (Esth 5:10; 6:12; cf. 3Macc 5:21 and 6:27). But here John meant more broadly ‘each his own way,’ because the disciples did not return at once to Galilee (chapter 20), and it does not seem that they were guests at private homes in Jerusalem,” hence “to different places”; cf. 1Kgs 22:17; 1Macc 6:54. E. Fascher, “Johannes XVI, 32: Eine Studie zur Schriftauslegung und zur Traditions-geschichte des Urchristentums,” in ZNW, 1940, pp. 171–230.

²² Matt 14:13, 23; 17:1, 19; 20:17; 24:3; Mark 6:31–32; 9:2; Luke 9:10; 10:23; Acts 23:19; Gal 2:2; Josephus, War 2.25: examine in private; 2.109: “Celados took him aside”; 3.407; 4.159, 346: “in secret”; Ant. 15.87; 16.201; Life 110: “taking him aside.”

²³ 1Cor 12:11; Philo, Contemp. Life 85; Flacc. 21, 32; Josephus, Ant. 7.138; 15.82.

²⁴ John 1:42; P.Erl. 36, 9; P.Ant. 94, 3; P.Mil. 61, 2; SB 9444, 2; Josephus, Ant. 2.249; 11.300; —sister, CII 43; P.Warr. 21, 4.

²⁵ CII 124; PSI 1412, 1; SB 10772; grandmother (GIBM, n. 636, 8); country (John 4:44). Cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 738 B 5: ἀξίως τοῦ ἰδίου δάμου.

²⁶ Acts 24:24; 1Esdr 4:25, τὴν ἰδίαν γυναῖκα; CII 166: τῆ ἰδία συμβίῳ; 139; SEG XVII, 468, 3; T. Drew-Bear, Phrygie, IV, 24, 27, 37; Josephus, War 1.483; 2.237; Ant. 8.368. — CII 299: τῷ ἰδίῳ συμβίῳ; 1Cor 7:2; 14:35; Titus 2:5; 1Pet 3:1, 5; H. W. Pleket, Rijksmuseum, n. II, 2: ἰδίῳ συμβίῳ; III, 2: τῷ ἰδίῳ ἀνδρί (I, 3: ἰδία γυνή). Cf. E. Schwertheim, Die Inschriften von Kyzichos und Umgebung, Bonn, 1980, n. 166: τῷ ἰδίῳ ἀνδρί; 261: τῆ ἰδία γυναῖκί; 373: τῷ ἰδίῳ πατρί.

²⁷ One’s own son, Philo, Virtues 132; Josephus, War 1.665; Ant. 1.215; CII 112; P.Oxy. 3313, 19; SB 8359, 3. Daughter, SEG II, 294, 8; CII 185; a ward: θρεπτῷ ἰδίῳ (ibid. 3 and 144); farmer (γεωργός; BGU 1589, 2; 1780, 14).

²⁸ Acts 4:23, referring to the disciples; cf. Mark 4:34—τοις ἰδίοις μαθηταῖς; Josephus, Ant. 10.178: τῶν ἰδίων μαθητῆ; cf. P.Athen. 11, 4: τῶν ἰδίων ὑπηρετῶν.

²⁹ Philo, Moses 1.177; Flacc. 111: “Banus disembarked from the boat with his men,” 112, 117; Josephus, Ant. 8.175, 191, 210, 218, 264; War 1.192; P.Mich. 502, 13.

³⁰ Josephus, War 1.42, 149; P.Oxy. 2603, 28; cf. the proskynemata for “their own,” SB 7932, 6; 8142, 3; 8673, 6; MAMA vol., 87, 5: dedication to Apollo Lykios made ὑπὲρ εαυτῶν καὶ τῶν ἰδίων, made by οἱ κατοικοῦντες ἐν τῇ τρικωμῖα; T. Drew-Bear, Phrygie, pp. 36, 38, 41, 43; IGLS 1322–1327.

³¹ 1Tim 5:8—“If anyone does not take care of his own (ton idion) and especially those of his household”; Philo, To Gaius 272: “Recognize those who are there: they are all your own (ἴδιοι πάντες εἰσί), friends, freedmen, servants. They are the ones who hold most closely to you, and you to them”; Josephus, War 1.537: his own relatives (τῶν ἰδίων συγγενῶν); Ant. 1.297: γονεῖς); 12.392 and 16.327 = friends; P.Oxy. 3314, 15: in such circumstances, “a man’s true friends are found out” (εὐρίσκονται οἱ ἴδιοι τοῦ ἀνθρώπου).

³² John 6:37; 17:6; cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 3, pp. 143–149.

³³ John 19:27 (cf. P.Bon. 29, 13: λαβειν παρά σου τὸν ἴδιον ον—). F. M. Braun (La Mère des fidèles, Tournai-Paris, 1953, pp. 124–129) presents four possible translations: (1) “the disciple took her into his home”; (2) “received her into his home” (λαμβάνω can mean “take” or “welcome”); (3) “he received her into his property,” as an inheritance, in the spiritual sense: of faith and love; (4) “he received (or took) her as his possession” (French pour son bien); εἰς can be the equivalent of the Hebrew lamed, corresponding to the conjunction ώς (cf. Acts 7:53). F. M. Braun prefers the second, or better, the third translation. He is followed by I. de la Potterie, “La Parole de Jésus ‘Voici ta Mère’ et l’accueil du Disciple (Jn. XIX, 27 b),” in Marianum, 1974, pp. 1–39 (taken up by J. Gnllka, Neue Testament und Kirche: Festschrift R. Schnackenburg, Freiburg, 1974, pp. 191–219), and R. Schnackenburg, John, vol. 3, pp. 279, 458–459, but refuted by F. Neiryck, “ΕΙΣ ΤΑ ΙΔΙΑ: Jn XIX, 27 (et XVI, 32),” in ETL, 1979, pp. 357–365. Cf. R. E. Brown, “The ‘Mother of Jesus’ in the Fourth Gospel,” in M. De Jonge, L’Evangile de Jean, Gembloux-Louvain, 1977, pp. 307–310. In effect, idia refers generally to the legal domicile, but less as a territory (place of origin, birth) than as a community where one is enrolled (ἀναγραφόμενος), where one has rights to claim or is held to obligations

(M. Hombert, C. Préaux, Recherches sur le recensement dans l’Égypte romaine, Leiden, 1952, pp. 68ff.). The term connotes the inhabitants of a house rather than the house itself (cf. ἀναχώρησις, withdrawal from legal obligations, H. Braunert, “ΙΔΙΑ: Studien zur Bevölkerungsgeschichte des ptolemäischen und römischen Ägypten,” in JJP, vol. 9–10, 1955–56, pp. 211–328).

³⁴ Cf. Matt 12:49; Mark 3:35; Luke 8:21. The best commentary on John 19:27 is still that of M. J. Lagrange. One may fruitfully read A. Feuillet, “Les Adieux du Christ à sa mère (Jn. XIX, 25–27) et la maternité spirituelle de Marie,” in NRT, 1964, pp. 469–489; A. Feuillet, “L’Heure de la femme Jn XVI, 21) et l’heure de la Mère de Jésus (Jn XIX, 25–27),” in Bib, 1966, pp. 557–573; especially F. Neiryck, “La Traduction d’un verset johannique: Jn XIX, 27 b,” in ETL, 1981, pp. 83–106.

ι—διώτης

idiotes, private individual, lay person, non-expert idiotes, S 2399; TDNT 3.215–217; EDNT 2.172–173; NIDNTT 2.456–457; MM 299; L&N 27.26; BAGD 370

The very diverse usages of this word are all homogeneous.

I. — The commonest sense corresponds to the French particulier, meaning “private individual” (SB 8232, 18; 8299, 52; 8444, 27, 54), as opposed to “officials” (SB 3924, 9, 25), persons charged with public offices, notably the king¹ and the magistrates.² Sometimes reference is to a common citizen (Thucydides 1.124.1; NCIG, n. 7, II, 6; P.Fay. 19, 12), sometimes to a taxpayer, as opposed to a tax collector (P.Hib. 198, 168, 170; P.Ryl. 111 a 17), sometimes to a miscellaneous unnamed person (P.Tebt. 812, 10: ta ton idioton, the affairs of private individuals; P.Ryl. 572, 65, 73). By extension the sense can be pejorative: a common person, a vulgar person, of the lowest social class,³ even a slave (Stud.Pal. IV, 306, p. 68).

II. — Idiotes refers to anyone who has no training or specialty, and therefore is contrasted with experts and professionals (cf. Hyperides, Ath. 9.19: “on every other occasion, there is nothing of the beginner about him”); for example, the lay person as compared to the physician,⁴ the “common soldier” as compared to the officer,⁵ the amateur as compared to the professional (Xenophon, Eq. Mag. 8.1), the layman as compared to the philosopher⁶ or the poet (Alexis, frag. 269.1; cited by Athenaeus 2.28 c) or the orator⁷—it is in this sense that St. Paul declares himself idiotes en logo,⁸ the lay person as compared to the priest;⁹ hence, any person who is unexperienced or who does not know the technique, as compared to the expert and the specialist (Epictetus 2.12.11; Plutarch, De gen. 1), that is, the “uninitiated.” According to 1Cor 14:16, the idiotes does not understand anything that the glossalaliac says, he has no grasp of this language¹⁰ and cannot respond “yes” (amen with the article), cannot join in a prayer the sense of which escapes him. It is in the same sense of the word that the members of the Sanhedrin note that Peter and John are anthropoi agrammatoi . . . kai idiotai,¹¹ that is, common people, of a lower social class; hence uncultured, unlettered, unschooled.

III. — Finally, any person who does not belong to a given group and does not know its mindset and customs can be called idiotes, a foreigner vis-à-vis nationals.¹² If, for example, at Corinth, in the middle of a charismatic meeting, “uninitiated persons or unbelievers should enter the church, will they not say that you are mad?” (1Cor 14:23).

¹ A gloss of the LXX on Prov 6:8b—“Kings and commoners (βασιλει—ς καὶ ἰ—διω—ται) use honey for their health”; Ep. Arist. 288: “What is better for the peoples, to get a king from the ranks of simple commoners or a king who is son of a king?”; 289: “Certain common people . . . from the day they gain authority over the crowd, they end up being more malicious than impious tyrants”; Philo, Decalogue 40: “God did not want any king ever to scorn the obscure private individual”; Josephus, War 1.665: Herod, “a simple commoner, rose to the throne”; 2.178; SEG IX, 73, 10 (second-first century BC). For the morphology and semantics, cf. G. Redard, Les Noms grecs en -THΣ, -TIS, pp. 6ff., 28ff., 224ff. Very numerous literary and inscriptional references in H. Schlier, on this word in TDNT, vol. 3, pp. 215–217. Add Xenophon, Hell. 4.10–33, distinguishing private entrepreneurs (οἰ—ἰ—διω—ται) from public undertakings (τὸ δημόσιον); Polybius 5.35.5: his personal servants; m. Sanh. 10.2; BGU 123, 13; 137, 10; P.Oxy. 1101, 6; PSI 236, 31; P.Panop.Beatty 1, 194: “a lawyer found among the private individuals”; P.Fouad 59, 5; P.Oslo 16, 6; P.Tebt. 736, 30; 769, 19 (third century BC); Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 12, 6; P.Meyer 9, 10.

² Plato, Plt. 259 a, b; Hyperides, Dem. 26; Epictetus 3.24.99: ἄρχοντας ἢ ἰ—διώτην; Diodorus Siculus 19.3.3: “Agathocles, sometimes as a common soldier, sometimes as an officer (ποτὲ μὲν ἰ—διώτης ὄν, ποτὲ δὲ ε—φ ἡγεμονίας) gained a reputation for effectiveness and capability” (same sense, Polybius 5.60.3); 19.52.4: Cassander orders that the education of the son of Roxane “should no longer be that of a king but that of a common person (ἀλλ ἰ—διώτου)”; 19.9.1: Agathocles, discharged of his burden, wants to live henceforth as a common individual; Plutarch, Ti. Gracch. 11.17; 12.2; Cic. 26.8: “tomorrow you will be no more than a common person”; Diodorus Siculus 17.65.4: a common soldier, as in Polybius

5.60.3. I.Lind. 419, 120; Dittenberger, Syl. 305, 71; Or. 383, 188 (Antiochus I of Commagene); an order of the dioiketes of Egypt on 1 April 278, to “appoint overseers, chosen as usual to supervise these works from among the magistrates or the private persons” (P.Oxy. 1490, 14); J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. 13, 14. “Private persons,” witnesses in acts of manumission, are distinguished from priests and rulers, CII 709–711; I.Ilium, n. 36, 14.

³ Lucian, Vit. Auct. 11: “if you are a common person, a tanner, a fishmonger, a carpenter, a money-changer”; Philo, Dreams 2.21: “binding sheaves is a task for laborers . . . reaping for masters and competent farmers”; Philo, Husbandry 4; P.Berl.Zill., n. 1, 20 (second century BC), with the correction of Berichtigungsliste, vol. 3, p. 30. Cf. the contrasting of the ι—διώτης and the σεμνός, Plutarch, De frat. amor. 4.

⁴ Plato, Tht. 178 a; Thucydides 2.48.3: “I leave it to each one, physician or layperson (ι—ατρὸς καὶ ι—διώτης) to form an opinion concerning the disease”; Philo, Conf. Tongues 22: “Physicians are affected just like the idiotai (those who know nothing about medicine).”

⁵ Polybius 1.69.11; Dittenberger, Or. 609.12; P.Hib. 30, 21; P.Sorb. 14. a 7; P.Hamb. 26, 10; 183, 3, 15; 189, 6, 11, 30; P.Yale 27, 7. Cf. M. Launey, Armées hellénistiques, vol. 2, p. 1276 (on this word).

⁶ Plato, Tim. 20 a; Epictetus 3.19, 1; 3.7.1: “It is right that we, the secular, should interrogate you, the philosophers”; Philo, Good Man Free 3; Atticus, frag. 7.1: “It is obvious not only for philosophers, but perhaps even for all the secular folk, τοι—ς ι—διώταις ἄπασιν”; cf. frag. 2.9: “low, small-minded ideas, such as one would expect from a vulgar, uncultured person (ι—διώτης καὶ ἀπαίδευτος), an adolescent, or a woman.”

⁷ Isocrates, Paneg. 4.11: “conversations that surpass the level of the crowd (ι—διω—ται = non-specialists)”; Hyperides, Lyc. 16.20: “I, your fellow citizen, I, who here feel as if I were a layperson, unused to speaking”; Eux. 40.30: “while he is a simple layman, your pursuit places him on the level of an orator”; Epictetus 2.12.2: “Put whichever of us you please in the presence of a layman as an interlocutor”; 2.13.3.

⁸ 2Cor 11:6. His ignorance of oratorical art consists of his not conforming to the rules of contemporary rhetoric; he is a “layman” with regard to language, as opposed to the professionals; cf. Josephus, Ant. 2.271, where Moses says to the Lord: ι—διώτης ἀνήρ καὶ μηδεμια—ς ι—σχύος εὐπορω—ν ἢ πείσω λόγους τοὺς οι—κείους ἀφέντας.

⁹ Philo, Spec. Laws 3.134: “a purity that consists only of the absence of willful sinning is only accepted for simple lay persons, and perhaps if you will for ordinary priests . . . ; but the high priest . . .”; Drunkenness 126: “you would no longer be able to remain a simple lay person, and you would attain to the highest order in the hierarchy, the priesthood”; Dittenberger, Syl. 736, 15–20; 1013, 6; Or. 90, 52; P.Mert. 26, 19. But ι—διώτης in religious regulations is used as a technical term for the person who comes to offer a sacrifice: τὸν ἀναφερόμενον ὑπὸ τω—ν ι—διωτω—ν (LSAM, n. 34, 26; cf. 24 A 27; idem, LSCG, n. 119, 6: ε—ὰν δὲ ι—διώτης θύῃ δίδοσθαι τω— ι—ερεϊ—; 120, 5; 154 B 37: ι—διώται θύοντι θεοι—ς ἢ θεαι—ς; 164, 2); the vestments that he must wear are prescribed (n. 65, 17), the place that he must take in the procession (92, 38), his monetary obligations (107, 3; 117, 5), his rights (LSCG Sup, n. 38 A 28–29), the ban on cutting trees or branches (81, 3), etc. Idios places the emphasis on that which is proper to a being, a particular name, a special designation, etc., cf. Geminus, Intro. to Astronomy 3.2, 3.9, 3.14, 12.23–24.

¹⁰ Cf. the English idiot and the rabbinic transliteration fwøydḥ = the lay person, especially ignorant when compared to the expert in the law; cf. Str-B, vol. 3, pp. 454ff. Cf. ι—διωτικός, a stupid argument (Geminus, Intro. to Astronomy 17.42).

¹¹ Acts 4:13; cf. E. Jacquier, Les Actes des Apôtres, Paris, 1926, on this text; M. Wilcox, The Semitisms of Acts, Oxford, 1965, p. 101. In Latin, the idiota is an unlettered person, one who has no literary education, who has master no science or field of study. In the patristic literature, Christian idiotae, taught by divine revelation, become wiser than the philosophers and teachers in spiritual knowledge, cf. G. Oury, “Idiota,” in Dict.spir., vol. 8, col. 1242–1248.

¹² Cf. Aristophanes, Ran. 456–459; Dittenberger, Syl. 37, 3; 987, 28; Or. 483, 71.

ι—εροπρεπής

hieroprepes, reverent and dignified

hieroprepes, S 2412; TDNT 3.253–254; EDNT 2.176; MM 300; L&N 53.6; BDF §119(4); BAGD 372

Apparently unknown in the papyri, this biblical hapax is used to describe the conduct of the older Cretans in Titus 2:3—en katastemati hieroprepeis. In the inscriptions, the adjective describes religious processions and functions,¹ such that the bearing of Christians would be analogous to the dignity and restraint of priestesses officiating in a temple,² likely to inspire respect, even veneration.

But the extension of the term—from the language of religion to daily life at home—seems to be the work of Philo, who uses this word quite often. In the first instance he reserves it for God, God's mysteries, oracles, and commandments, and prayers addressed to God;³ but he applies it also to the ethical life: “the offering of fasting and perseverance rises as the most holy and most perfect of offerings” (Migr. Abr. 98). Holiness (hosiotēs) is not only consecration to the service of God, but sanctification of the spirit (Good Man Free 75). Virtue (aretē), which seems to hold a woman's rank, spreads abroad the good seed of principles that are useful in life, so that “the art of thinking receives holy and divine seed” (Abraham 101). Those who dedicate to God their thoughts, their words, their feelings “maintain them as truly sacred and holy objects for their possessor, hieroprepes kai hagion ontos phylaxantes to ktesameno” (Heir 110). “The mind (ho nous) takes Virtue as its wife, because it has understood that her beauty is authentic and free of artifice, perfectly suited to a holy person (hieroprepestaton)” (Sacr. Abel and Cain 45).

The same meaning is found again in 4Macc 9:25, where the oldest of the Maccabean brothers is described as “the noble young man, ho eugenes neanias” (verse 13), defender of the law of God (verse 15), true son of Abraham and courageous (verse 21), a fighter of the battle for eusebeia (verse 23); finally “the saintly young man gave up the ghost.” Ho hieroprepes neanias sums up all the above-mentioned qualities; cf. 11:20.

Hence Titus 2:3 sees that Christians, consecrated to Christ by baptism and officiating in some way in the home, carry out a sacred function, a liturgy that unfolds in the presence of God; their holy life is characterized by a remarkable dignity, profound respect toward all, a very religious sense of God, “ut ipse quoque earum incessus et motus, vultus, sermo, silentium, quamdam decoris sacri praeferant dignitatem” (“that even their very gait, movement, aspect, speech, silence may manifest a certain dignity of holy grace,” St. Jerome).

¹ I.Priene 109, 216: Panathenian procession (second century BC); Dittenberger, Syl. 708, 23: πομπαι—ς ι—εροπρεπέσιν (before 100 BC). In 160/59, Euboulos of Marathon, “designated by lot for the priesthood of Dionysus, accomplished in a decorous and pious fashion (καλω—ς και ι—εροπρεπω—ς) . . . all the processions and all the sacrifices for the Athenians and the Romans” (F. Durrbach, Choix, n. 79, 21); IGLAM 1143, 3: ι—εροπρεπω—ς και φιλοδόξως; I.Sard. n. 5, 4; 53, 6. Cf. Xenophon, Symp. 8.40: “During their feast, you carry out your sacred functions in a manner even more worthy than your ancestors, you prevail through your noble bearing . . .”; Dio Chrysostom 56.46: “A decree ordered that the tribunes of the people, whose persons were sacrosanct (ὡς καὶ ἱεροπρεπεῖς ὄντες), should celebrate the Augustales”; Josephus, Ant. 11.329: a religious reception by the priests and the mass of citizens; Ag. Apion 1.140: decoration of the gates in a fashion befitting their holiness; Iamblichus, Myst. 3.31: magical operations.

² Cf. Menander’s doorkeeper (Dysk. 496) who wants to appear fashionable and uses various greetings for various visitors: “I address a woman of uncertain age as ‘priestess’ (ἱέρεια).” At the Council of Laodicea, in 360 (canon 11), the πρεσβύτειδες seem to be members of a religious order, cf. H. Grégoire, Asie Mineure, n. 167.

³ “No one is pure enough to celebrate the holy and sacrosanct mysteries, ὡς ται—ς ἁγίαις καὶ ἱεροπρεπέσι χρῆσθαι τελεται—ς” (Philo, Dreams 1.82; cf. Unchang. God 102); the Ten Commandments befit God’s holiness (Decalogue 175; cf. Rewards 101; Alleg. Interp. 3.204; Moses 2.25); the image of God in the soul is the most sacred of all (Decalogue 60; Spec. Laws 3.83); “God hears prayers that are offered very piously, ἱεροπρεστάτων εὐχῶ—ν” (Rewards 84); Plant. 25: “in love with natures that are lofty, very holy, blessed”; 162: sacred meals in the sanctuaries; Creation 99: the sacred character of the number seven.

ἱ—κανός, ἱ—κανότης, ἱ—κανόω

hikanos, sufficient, capable; hikanotes, sufficiency, enabling; hikanoo, to enable, make sufficient, capable

hikanos, S 2425; TDNT 3.293–296; EDNT 2.184; NIDNTT 3.728–729; MM 302; L&N 25.96, 59.2, 59.12, 59.44, 67.91, 75.2, 78.14, 78.50; BDF §§5(3b), 131, 187(8), 379, 393(4), 405(2); BAGD 374 | hikanotes, S 2426; TDNT 3.293–296; EDNT 2.185; NIDNTT 3.728–729; L&N 75.1; BAGD 374 | hikanoo, S 2427; TDNT 3.293–296; EDNT 2.185; NIDNTT 3.728–729; MM 302; L&N 75.3; BAGD 374

These derivatives of hiko, hikneomai, “reach, arrive, attain,”¹ are not all used with the same frequency,² and they took on different meanings in classical Greek and in Koine. It is roughly correct that hikanos means “capable of” in speaking of persons and “sufficient” in speaking of things, but this sufficiency or capacity varies from “not very” to “much.” In the LXX, the most common corresponding Hebrew is hardly illuminating: day, “sufficiency, that which is enough or appropriate.” For example, looters steal what they need (Obad 5; cf. Hab 2:13), and the lion carries off what its young need.³ Sometimes the well-bred person gets by on little food (Sir 31:18); or “there are three things which are not satisfied and which never say ‘enough’ (hikanon, Hebrew hon): the sterile womb, the ground without water, and fire”;⁴ sometimes—most commonly in late texts—the sufficient is that which satisfies,⁵ or a large enough amount, whether with respect to years (Zech 7:3; 1Macc 16:3; 2Macc 1:20) or duration (2Macc 7:5; 8:25), money (2 Macc 4:45; Josephus, Life 68) and equipment,⁶ or a multitude of persons.⁷

This is the almost constant meaning⁸ of the verb hikanoomai, which ordinarily corresponds to the Hebrew rab and can be translated “it is enough, it suffices”⁹ or even “it is too much.” Elijah beseeches God: “It is too much, Yahweh; take my life” (1Kgs 19:4); “thus says the Lord Yahweh: it is too much (hikanoustho), princes of Israel! Get rid of oppression” (Ezek 45:9).

The NT attests these meanings, from “it is enough”¹⁰ to “numerous, many”: “a numerous herd of pigs (choiron hikanon) that were feeding” (Luke 8:32); Herod “asked Jesus numerous questions” (en logois hikanois, 23:9); “there were many lamps in the upstairs room.”¹¹ The members of the Sanhedrin “gave a large sum of money to the soldiers”¹² who guarded Jesus’ tomb. The adjective is used particularly with respect to meetings of people (“a numerous crowd”)¹³ and a long or rather long time, whether in days or years.¹⁴ for a number of years St. Paul had wanted to go to Rome (Rom 15:23).

It is Philo who fleshed out the sense of hikanos as “capable of” in applying it to people; he gave it the nuances of being apt,¹⁵ particular to (Spec. Laws 4.188), equal to (To Gaius 257), gifted for, in a position to do (Flight 40); seeds “are capable of producing plants like those which produced them” (Unchang. God 40; Drunkenness 212; Cherub. 65); at seven years, “a person is able to interpret nouns and verbs of familiar language.”¹⁶ It even becomes a noble term, since it is used frequently for intelligence and for the soul capable of receiving wisdom,¹⁷ or for magistrates skilled at governing and gaining honors.¹⁸ What is more, hikanos is introduced into the religious vocabulary, as with the prophet Jeremiah, a “worthy hierophant” (hierophantes hikanos),¹⁹ and especially God, who is sufficient unto himself (hikanos autos heauto ho theos).²⁰ This Philonian axiom is probably inspired by the translation errors of the LXX, which took Shaddai to mean “the sufficient one” as a designation of the “All-Powerful” God (Ruth 1:20-21; Job 21:15; 31:2; 40:2; Ezek 1:24): “The voice of Shaddai” comes out phone hikanou.

The grammar, even the theology, is the same as that which inspired John the Baptist: “The one who comes after me is stronger than I (ischyroteros, a divine attribute; Jer 32:18; Dan 9:4); I am not worthy (ouk eimi hikanos) to loose his sandals” (Matt 3:11; Mark 1:7; Luke 3:16). Also, the centurion at Capernaum: “I am not worthy (ouk eimi hikanos hina) that you should enter my house” (Matt 8:8; Luke 7:6); and St. Paul: “I am not worthy to be called an apostle.”²¹ After all, “who is sufficient” (tis hikanos) for such a ministry (2Cor 2:16)? The apostle specifies: “It is not that we ourselves are of sufficient capability (hikanoi esmen) to be able to chalk up anything to our own credit as coming from ourselves; but our qualification (hikanotes) comes from God, who has made us sufficient (hos kai hikanosen) to be ministers of a new covenant not of the letter but of the spirit” (2Cor 3:5-6). Similarly, God has made Christians equal (to hikanosanti) to sharing the lot of the holy ones (angels) in the light (Col 1:12). Finally, Paul writes to Timothy: “What you have heard from me in the presence of many witnesses you must entrust (like a deposit, parathou) to faithful men who will themselves be capable of instructing yet others” (pistoi anthropois, hoitines hikanoi esontai kai heterous didaxai, 2Tim 2:2). A “first sketch” of the apostolic succession has been seen here,²² guaranteeing a seamless continuity from Paul to Timothy (kai ha ekousas par’ emou) and to Timothy’s hearers. The integrity of the gospel message is guaranteed, because the depositaries of the tradition are men of proven faith and faithfulness and because they are gifted and competent to communicate this teaching precisely; here hikanotes is not only a human aptitude that makes a person worthy, up to the task at hand, but is also a divine enabling. It is God who qualifies his ministers (2Cor 3:5-6).

There may be a legal nuance at Mark 15:15—“Pilate, wishing to satisfy the people,²³ released Barabbas to them and handed over Jesus ...” probably by virtue of a customary Paschal amnesty of which we are made aware by two documents;²⁴ but hikanos surely has the sense of “surety, guarantee” in Acts 17:9, where it is said that the politarchs “took surety²⁵ from Jason and the others and let them go.” The use of the adjective is well attested in a legal context and even in the literal sense of “guarantee.”²⁶ We do not know whether the hikanon given by Jason was a monetary payment, cash bail, or a promise to the officials not to disturb the public order with gospel preaching, but certainly it was a commitment by way of a stipulation taken by one person with respect to another, that is, a security.²⁷ Cf. BGU 530, 38 (first century AD): a security is sought by tax collectors, ἀπαίτιται (sic) ὑπὸ τω—ν πρακτόρων ι—κανόν; P.Ryl. 77, 30: a security was given for a municipal office; P.Lips. 32, 15 (= P.Stras. 41, 51, contesting an inheritance): “the rhetor Antoninus said, ‘They wish to deposit a security’ (ι—κανὸν διδόασιν). Hermanoubis said, ‘They should pay the security’ (ι—κανὰ παρασχέτωσαν).”{NOTEEND} Thus in AD 22, Sarapion informs his brother Dorion that, by order of the prefect,²⁸ two officials have been incarcerated until the opening of the session, “unless they persuade the chief bailiff to accept bail for them until the session.”²⁹ In the course of a trial, the strategos declares to Imouthe, “These two shall both pay you a security” (hikanon soi hoi duo houtoi dotosan, P.Oslo 17, 17; second century).

² This etymology of ι—κάνός remains detectable in Lev 5:7; 12:8; 25:26: “If your hand does not reach sufficiency” = is not strong enough, does not have the means. Philo, Dreams 1.66: the possibility of reaching God and understanding him. Hymn to Isis: “may you reach (ἴκανεσ) Olympus, where the gods of heaven reside” (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 175, col. III, 23).

³ The substantive ι—κάνότης is unknown in the LXX, Philo, Josephus, and the papyri.

⁴ Nah 2:13; cf. Isa 40:16—“Lebanon will not have enough to burn, and its beasts will not be a sufficient holocaust”; Prov 25:16—“If you have found honey, eat your fill of it”; Exod 36:7; Lev 25:28. With negation (οὐχ ι—κάνόν = meat): “Is it too little for you to have taken my husband, that you should want also to take my mandrakes for your son?” (Gen 30:15); “I am not able to speak either of yesterday or of the day before yesterday” (= I never knew, Exod 4:10). “It was too little for Ahab (niphāl of the Hebrew qalal) to walk in the sins of Jeroboam” (1Kgs 16:31); “Was it too little for you to feed in a good pasture?” (Ezek 34:18).

⁵ Prov 30:15; cf. 2Chr 30:3—“the priests were not sanctified in sufficient number” (Hebrew maday); Wis 18:12; 2Macc 10:19.

⁶ Gen 33:15—“It is enough that I find grace in the eyes of my lord”; Wis 18:25.

⁷ 1Macc 15:26; Philo, Moses 1.225. Cf. Eirenias, who gave “enough wood for the works mentioned” (honorific decree of Miletus, in NCIG, n. VII, 1, 8); Dittenberger, Syl. 736, 108.

⁸ 1Macc 13:11, 49; 2Macc 5:26; Ep. Arist. 13, 15, 21, 275; Josephus, War 4.444; Ant. 1.240; 5.250; 9.45; 13.29, 155; 14.231; Life 162.

⁹ Two exceptions: Gen 32:11—“I am too small (Hebrew qaton) for all of the justice and faithfulness you have shown your servant”; Mal 3:10—“if I will not pour out blessing for you until there is an abundance” (Hebrew day).

¹⁰ Num 16:7; Deut 1:6—“You have lived long enough on this mountain”; 2:3; 1Kgs 12:28; 1Chr 21:15; Ezek 44:6. Cf. P. Tebt. 20, 8: “If an accounting is required, consider yourself to have full power (ι—κάνωῆνα) until I arrive” (113 BC).

¹¹ At Gethsemane, when the apostles have only two swords, Jesus says: ἰκανόν ἐστιν, “it is enough” (Luke 22:38). “We may with Cyril of Alexandria suspect an indulgent smile, not without melancholy” (M. J. Lagrange, on this verse); 2Cor 2:6—“that is enough punishment” imposed by the community; it is an adequate sanction. Cf. Menander, Dysk. 776; Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.126: “these arrangements are insufficient”; 3.147; Abraham 53, 199; Sacr. Abel and Cain 36; Unchang. God 157; Post. Cain 21; Plant. 144; Joseph 178: sufficient supplies for the road; Spec. Laws 2.39; To Gaius 3; Josephus, War 2.144: enough (adequate) torture for their sin; 2.208; 4.116; Ant. 5.178; 15.311; 19.168; 20.251: that is enough on this subject; Epictetus 1.2.36: τοῦτό μοι ἰκανόν ἐστιν, “I am content with it”; PSI 1337, 19; P.Oxy. 2411, 50; 3358, 20; SB 6717, 11.

¹² Acts 20:8; cf. 20:37—“abundant tears”; 22:6; cf. Menander, Dysk. 307: “I am free and at ease”; Ep. Arist. 33: a quantity of (precious) stones; Josephus, Ant. 1.227; 4.3; P.Oxy. 2860, 4: “I sent numerous other letters”; SB 6789, 4: great gratitude; Vision of Maximus: “the abundant waves of the gentle Nile” (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 168, 14).

¹³ Matt 28:12; cf. Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.13: “God gives an abundant spring”; Flacc. 130: considerable expense; P.Lille 3, 76: considerable sums (third century BC); P.Tebt. 24, 2; 29, 12; P.Cair.Isid. 77, 26; P.Mich. 28, 18: Sosos does not have enough money to give to Pyrrichos (third century BC); 174, 13: “an estate that pays considerable revenues (ἰκανοὺς φόρους) to the imperial treasury”; P.Oxy. 3089, 24: upon the death of Petronius, Niger will be forced to repay the large sums (ἰκανὰ κεφάλαια) due according to the lease; Dittenberger, Syl. 1106, 74, 77.

¹⁴ Mark 10:46; Luke 7:12; Acts 11:24, 26; 12:12—ἦσαν ἰκανοί = numerous people were gathered; 14:21—numerous disciples; 19:19, 26; 1Cor 11:30—a rather large number (weaker than πολλοί) of Corinthians had died; Polybius 1.53.8; Philo, Joseph 251; BGU 1994, 12: an important crowd is on the site = Pap.Lugd.Bat. XX, 12; P.Hib. 198, 119: a sufficient police guard is adequate for the protection of private persons (cf. C. Kunderewicz, “Ad Papyrus Hibeh 198,” in JJP, vol. 15, 1965, pp. 139–143); P.Oxy. 3250, 22: a sufficient crew; P.Tebt. 41, 13: many among us; SB 6757, 8; Dittenberger, Syl. 569, 14.

¹⁵ Luke 8:27—the Gerasene demoniac “for a long time (χρόνω ἰκανω—) had not worn clothing”; 20:9—the owner of the vineyard left the country for a long time; 23:8—for a long time (ε—ξ ἰκανω—ν χρόνων), Herod had wanted to see Jesus; Acts 8:11; 14:3; 20:11; 27:9; Dittenberger, Syl. 665, 12; UPZ 161, 29; Acts 9:23—“a number of days went by”; 9:43; 18:18;

27:7—for long days, we sailed slowly; UPZ 162, col. II, 15. Cf. Ep. Arist. 109: ε—φ ι—κavόν = prolonging their stay; Josephus, Ant. 1.326; 7.22; Ag. Apion 1.100, 237; BGU 1770, 4; 1847, 21; 2063, 15; P.Warr. 13, 16: live a long time; P.Thead. 20, 12; SB 7339, 13; 8988, 9, 33.

¹⁶ Cf. Philostratus, Gym. 16: man is capable of or suited for wrestling, fighting, racing; cf. 56: muddy dust is capable of cleansing. P.Mich. 87, 3: the route that leads to pasture is good for slaughter; Josephus, War 7.165: “the nature of the place (Machaerus) was such as to inspire confidence in its occupants and hesitation and fear in its attackers.”

¹⁷ Philo, Alleg. Interp. 1.10; cf. Worse Attacks Better 66: ability to stand guard; Post. Cain 22; Husbandry 22, 93: capable of keeping horses; Conf. Tongues 17; Flight 97: of running fast; Dreams 2.153; Joseph 114, 142; Moses 1.63; Spec. Laws 1.21; P.Oxy. 1672, 15: you will be capable of judging everything; P.Tebt. 37, 18: “I am writing you so that you may be able to understand the matter” (ἵνα ι—κavός γένῃ; 73 BC).

¹⁸ Worse Attacks Better 30. 86, 106, 115; Giants 57: “when we shall have become capable of being initiated”; Change of Names 91; Post. Cain 146: the teachings that the disciple is capable of receiving; Migr. Abr. 140: capable of teaching; Heir 125; Flight 172; cf. Alleg. Interp. 3.31: intelligence is not capable of helping itself; Worse Attacks Better 43, 61; Post. Cain 42; Drunkenness 166; Migr. Abr. 92; Spec. Laws 1.334; Good Man Free 47.

¹⁹ Conf. Tongues 112; Joseph 270; Rewards 51; cf. Josephus, War 3.352: “Nicanor was skilled at guessing the truth”; 4.230, 638; Ant. 2.80—Joseph’s extreme sagacity; 3.49; 4.14: Korah, a skilled orator; 5.51: the men most capable of acting in the people’s interest; 7.237: a very capable general; 7.391; 10.50: completely competent; 10.187, 239; Life 40: a skillful demagogue; Ag. Apion 1.183: Hecataeus of Abdera, a consummate man of affairs; P.Oxy. 1672, 15; SB 9840, 13: a capable man.

²⁰ Cherub. 49; Migr. Abr. 21: Joseph is strong enough to love God; 201: “capable of seeing God”; Heir 39; Sacr. Abel and Cain 10: “Who would be able to conceive the passage of a perfect soul to the one who is?”; Worse Attacks Better 124; Post. Cain 16; Drunkenness 32; Dreams 2.25. Created being has a very limited capacity with regard to divine realities: “no created being is able to give God a gift in exchange for his gifts” (Cherub. 123; cf. 16; Prelim. Stud. 9; Flight 163, 202, 213); Plant. 31, 42; Change of Names 15; Moses 1.304; Spec. Laws 2.17; Creation 20: “What other place than the divine powers would be found adequate to receive and lodge so pure an idea?”; Alleg. Interp. 3.164.

²¹ Alleg. Interp. 1.44; 3.171; Cherub. 46; Change of Names 27, 46; Heir 15, 23. Cf. Plato, Lysis 215 a: “The one who is sufficient unto himself has no need of anything insofar as he is sufficient” (κατὰ τὴν ἰ—κανότητα).

²² 1Cor 15:9. Cf. in a marriage contract, the intermediaries are qualified men: ἀνδρῶ—ν ἰ—κανῶ—ν μεσιτῶ—ν (P.Dura 30, 13); Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 10, 13: ἰ—κανὸν ὄντα, qualification for a leitourgia; PSI 1100, 12; P.Princ. 78, 6: ἐ—πὶ ἐ—πτὰ μαρτύρων ἰ—κανῶ—ν; P.Ross.Georg. IV, 5, 9; SB 9806, 3.

²³ A. M. Javierre (Bib, 1975, p. 433); idem, “Pistoi Anthropoi’ (II Tim. II, 2),” in AnBib, vol. 18, Rome, 1963, pp. 109–118.

²⁴ Τὸ ἰ—κανὸν ποιῆσαι (a Latinism, satisfacere alicui); cf. Philo, Dreams 2.73; Josephus, Ant. 7.451; Polybius 32.7.13; P.Giss. 40, col. I, 5; P.Oxy. 293, 10; PSI 1114, 8; BGU 1141, 13; SB 8393, 19.

²⁵ P.Flor. 61, 61 (from AD 85): χαρίζομαι δέ σε τοι—ς ὄχλοις καὶ φιλανθρωποτερός (cf. indulgentia) σοι ἔσομαι (cf. Chrest.Mitt., n. 80; A. Deissmann, Light, pp. 269–270; on the ἐ—πιβόησις of the Hellenes and the ἀναβόησις of Mark 15:8, cf. Acts 3:14; cf. J. Colin, Les Villes libres de l’orient gréco-romain et l’envoi au supplice par acclamations populaires, Brussels, 1965, pp. 13ff.); b. Pesah 8.6a (cf. 91a) includes among the persons who have the right to sacrifice the paschal lamb “the one who has been promised release from prison”; cf. C. B. Chavel, “The Releasing of a Prisoner on the Eve of Passover in Ancient Jerusalem,” in JBL 1941, pp. 275–278; J. Blinzler, Trial of Jesus, pp. 218–221.

²⁶ Τὸ ἰ—κανὸν λαμβάνειν; Philo, Giants 35; Josephus, War 2.340; Dittenberger, Or. 484, 50; 629, 101.

²⁷ Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.208: “It suffices (hikanon) to the creature to take the divine word as guarantee and witness”; Drunkenness 188; To Gaius 37: “I have given enough pledges of my friendship to Caesar”; P.Cair.Isid. 66, 20 (to the prefect of Egypt): “I ask you to command that they supply guarantees (ἰ—κανά) so long as they are here”; P.Eleph. 8, 20: οὐ—τος δὲ δυνατός ἐ—στιν εἰ—σενέγκαι καὶ ἔγγυον ἰ—κανόν (first century); P.Tebt. 746, 16: “having left enough grain (τὸν ἰ—κανὸν σι—τον) for the money payable on past debts” (third century BC).

²⁸ Probably Galerius, cf. J. Lesquier, L’Armée romaine d’Egypte, Cairo, 1918, p. 510, n. 5.

²⁹ P. Oxy. 294, 23, ε—άν μή τι πίσωσι τὸ ἀρχιστράτορα δοῦναι εἰ—κανὸν ἕως ε—πὶ διαλογισμὸν; cf. P. Lips. 36, 8: τοὺς παραδοθέντας μοι ὑπὸ ἀπὸ—ν ε—γύους ι—κανούς.

ἴσος, ι—σότης, ι—σότιμος

isos, equal; isotes, equality; isotimos, equal in dignity, worth, honor

isos, S 2470; TDNT 3.343–355; EDNT 2.201; NIDNTT 2.497–500, 502, 505, 508; MM 307; L&N 58.33; BDF §§194(1), 453(4); BAGD 381 | isotes, S 2471; TDNT 3.343–355; EDNT 2.202; NIDNTT 2.497–499; MM 307; L&N 58.32; BAGD 381 | isotimos, S 2472; TDNT 3.343–355; EDNT 2.202; NIDNTT 2.497–499; MM 307; L&N 58.34; BDF §118(1); BAGD 381

The adjective isos, “equal,” is used first of all for equality either for numbers¹ and surfaces² and hence arithmetic or geometric identity, or for equivalence: “What is squaring? Making an equilateral rectangle equivalent (to ison) to a given rectangle.”³ Another sort of equality (isotetos) is proportional (dia analogias) equality, where “the small quantities are equal to the large.”⁴ It is in this sense that interlocutors are equal (Philo, Good Man Free 126), like rewards (Moses 1.327) and favors (To Gaius 289), or that the athlete has a well-proportioned stature (Philostratus, Gym. 28).

Plato is the first to give a geometrical meaning⁵ to the hendiadys isos kai homoios, the first term of which refers to equality of size, the second sameness of form; but in practice no distinction was made between the two terms of this emphatic locution, which dates back to Homer,⁶ and it was seen as a sort of superlative⁷ to underline especially equality of rights between allies or adversaries. Both accept rights and responsibilities: “The Athenians are ready to make allies of us on equal footing, without guile or deceit.”⁸

The five occurrences in the Letter of Aristeas have only one meaning: “make oneself the equal of all” (Ep. Arist. 191, 228, 257, 263, 282). It may be said that the term is unknown in OT Hebrew;⁹ usually, isos in the LXX translates the Hebrew preposition k, which is used for comparison and analogy (as in the prayer that the leprous Miriam “may not be like one born dead”).¹⁰ Philo gives isos a technical exegetical meaning, equivalent to id est (“that is,” “in other words,” “as much as to say”).¹¹ The equality referred to is obviously approximate;¹² but Philo highly exalts isotes as a “good such that none greater can be found” (Spec. Laws 4.165), a virtue that must be praised (epainos isotetos autou; Joseph 249; Rewards 59; Decalogue 162), honored (Spec. Laws 2.204; 3.74, 169; 4.235; cf. Euripides, Phoen. 536: isoteta timan), and cultivated (Philo, Spec. Laws 1.295; 2.21), because God is the creator of equality and of all that is excellent (1.265; 4.187). Isotes, constantly associated with justice,¹³ is particularly assured under democracy (Conf. Tongues 108), which accords each that which is proper (Xenophon, Cyr. 2.2.18).

If all men are equal by nature (Aristotle, Pol. 2.2.6: dia to ten physin isous einai pantas; Philo, Spec. Laws 2.68), maintaining a certain equality among them in life in society is a different task (Thucydides 2.65.10), because “equality preserves concord, and concord preserves the all-engendering world” (Ps.-Aristotle, Mund. 5.397a3). Now, in principle it is in a democracy that the maximum liberty and equality are found;¹⁴ but Xenophon already observed, “There is nothing in the world less conformable to equality than a system that puts the good and the wicked on the same footing” (Cyr. 2.12.8). Plutarch considers equality in politics actually to be a danger, since every constitution has its defects;¹⁵ and according to Aelius Aristides, what is best is to establish a well-ordered (euschemon) isotes, a mixed constitution (Orat. Rom. 90).

In the papyri, to ison means a “copy,” as when the scribe adds to the text the simple notation to ison (P.Erl. 38, 10). A phrase that frequently occurs is “I have received a copy of this for verification” (eschon toutou to ison achri exetaseos).¹⁶ The document in question may be a circular or a rescript (P.Stras. 32, 14; P.Bon. 17, 11; P.Apoll. 9, 5; P.Lond. 1225, 5; vol. 3, p. 126), but often more precisely a “double,” as with a petition to the dekaprotoi that ends with the words “I have received a copy of this for judgment” (eschon toutou to ison eis diakrisin).¹⁷

Equality may have to do with time, space,¹⁸ or number,¹⁹ especially sums of money²⁰ and notably in the formula “an equal sum to the public treasury” (eis to demosion tas isas), as, for example, in these provisions from first-century wills: “Whoever shall contest or put forward a claim “on one of these goods shall pay to the persons named above these damages and a fine of five hundred silver drachmas, and an equal sum to the treasury.”²¹ Or the equivalence referred to may have to do with thought and their expression. In AD 58, a physician writes, “I think that if I cannot give you the same, I can at least show you a little reciprocity for your affection for me.”²² Samos honors Diodorus, public physician, who “was the same for everyone (en toutois ison) and was not sparing in his care.”²³

In accounting, ison can mean that the sum of the entries on this line balance exactly with the entries on the preceding line (P.Princ. 42, 19, 21, 39; from the first century; cf. P.Oxy. 1867, 9 and 11). At Murabba’ât (P.Mur. 90, 2), in an account for cereals and legumes, the proper name is followed by the commodity and figures, for example, “same as thirteen of wheat” (ison pyrou τρις?); the editor, P. Benoit, notes that ison, “equivalent,” means the exchange value; thus “fifteen seahs of lentils equals thirteen of wheat (wheat playing the role of a standard). We frequently encounter ex isou (merous) to refer to equal shares between two parties or a property held in common in equal shares by several heirs,”²⁴ also koinos ex isou (P.Mich.

175, 6; 554, 18; P.Köln 100, 11, 16, 23; P.Corn. 8, 9 and 16; SB 9642, col. III, 7 and 13; 10500, 11; 10756, 11). Under Tiberius, a brotherhood held a banquet every month, thanks to the monthly contribution of twelve silver drachmas assigned equally to each of its members (tas ex isou kat'onoma kekrimenas, P.Mich. 243, 3).

In the NT, isos has the same meaning as in the papyri. In the parable of the Workers in the Vineyard, those who were hired at the beginning of the day complain about being “put on the same footing” as those who had only worked an hour (isous autous hemon epioesas, Matt 20:12—In giving them the same pay, you have made them equal to us!). Something similar happens with spiritual gifts: at Caesarea, Peter recognizes that God has given the Gentiles the same gift as Israel (ten isen dorean);²⁵ this “same gift” is salvation. When sinners make loans, they count on recovering the equivalent, a restitution equal to the sum loaned (hina apolabosin ta isa, Luke 6:34), while Christians are to be ready to lend and receive nothing back. At the trial of Jesus before the high priest, the witnesses against him were not in agreement (isai ouk esan, Mark 14:56, 59). God has “arranged everything by measure, number, and weight” (Wis 11:20); Rev 21:16 describes the heavenly Jerusalem: “the length and width and height are equal” (isa estin). This shape of a city, in which the three dimensions are equal, is not representable; it is “thought” rather than “seen.”²⁶ It is a geometric symbol that evokes the Egyptian pyramids, “eternal dwellings.”

There are two texts of major theological importance. According to Phil 2:6, the person of the historical Christ—preexistent, immutable in his abasement, then exalted, inseparable from his Trinitarian relations—did not during his sojourn on earth take advantage of his equality of rank and rights with God (ouk harpagmon hegesato to einai isa theo).²⁷ The formula einai isa theo (accusative neuter plural functioning as predicate, cf. Job 11:12) = “to be on an equal footing with God,” is not synonymous with isos theo = “to be equal to God” (identity of nature); it places the emphasis on the “equality of treatment, dignity made manifest and recognized”²⁸ of the one who was and remained of “divine condition,” but who—as a man, with his divine attributes limited, eclipsed—could say, “The Father is greater than I” (John 14:28), on account of his heavenly situation. We may compare the designation isotheos as applied to kings and eminent persons²⁹ as a title of honor: “Darius, equal to the gods (isotheos), reigned on this earth” (Aeschylus, Pers. 856); of the various benefactors of humanity “some received divine honors” (Diodorus Siculus 1.2). It is decided that the name of Caesar “would be written in the hymns alongside the gods (auton ex isou tois theois esgraphesthai). . . . Those who have reigned are the object of other honors which make them equal to the gods (allai te isotheoi timai didontai)” (Dio Cassius 51.20); “Virtue makes many people equal to the gods (arete men gar isotheous pollous poiei), but votes never had the power to make a god (oudeis popote theos egeneto).”³⁰

On the other hand, when the Pharisees declared that “He said that God was his own father, making himself equal to God” (ison heauton poion to theo, John 5:18), they indeed understood that Jesus placed himself on the same level as God; his equality of being or of nature is an identity.³¹

The two NT occurrences of isotes belong to St. Paul.³² The first comes in connection with the collection for Jerusalem, a charitable work: “It is not a matter of afflicting yourselves in order to comfort others; what is necessary is equality (all’ ex isotetos —this is the motivation). In the present circumstances, your surplus provides for their lack, so that their surplus may provide for your own lack, so that the result is equality” (hopos genetai isotes —this is the goal; 2Cor 8:13-14). On this matter the apostle cites Exod 16:18—the manna answered to each one’s need.³³ This social conception of isotes is not that of Greek democracy but depends on that equality of conditions which was the Israelite ideal and which did much to provide for the sabbatical year and the jubilee year. According to Exodus, the equitable sharing of the manna seems to be ensured only by the brotherhood uniting the members of the chosen people: those who had gathered more than they needed gave from their abundance to those who were not sufficiently provided for. It seems that for St. Paul, however, the Corinthians, by their material contribution, are paying off their spiritual debt to their brothers in Jerusalem, and that in this act of beneficence there is established an equilibrium, a harmony, between the gentile and Jewish Christian churches.

As for the precept, “Masters, give your slaves what is just and equitable” (to dikaion kai ten isoteta tois doulois parechesthe, Col 4:1), the first time can be understood as a reference to food and clothing, especially as just compensation for work done, as well as to promises to be kept, since the law did not establish anything. The “equitable” should have in view “that which comes under the master’s personal initiatives,”³⁴ a good attitude on his part which sees his doulos on a certain plane of equality. His attitude is that of one person toward another, remembering that this person gives him service. It is less a strictly legal obligation than a subjective appreciation, both natural and Christian, that recognizes an equal in every neighbor (cf. Josephus, Ant. 16.32: hous ison echein autois), entirely different from that of an owner who treats his slaves as the living tools which by legal definition they are.

Isotimos. — This compound, unknown in the LXX, can have the sense of simple equality, of a sharing (Philo, Heir 177) of rights and obligations (Good Man Free 148), of the same rank,³⁵ but its proper meaning, which also occurs much more commonly, is that of equality of dignity, honor, consideration: “God grants to the wise as much honor as to the world” (isotimon kosmo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 8; Sobr. 54); “No one finds himself placed on the same level as God” (isotimos theo, Conf. Tongues 170), equal to him;³⁶ greetings accord an honor equal to that of the soul (isotimon psyches).³⁷ Josephus uses this adjective almost exclusively for equality with superiors, kings, persons of rank: Aristobulus “conferred upon his next younger brother, Antigonus, honors equal to his own” (War 1.71); Ananos “loved to treat the humblest as his equals”;³⁸ Seleucus Nicator granted to the Jews of Antioch privileges equal to those of the Macedonians and the Greeks (Ant. 12.119).

The term seems to have been part of the vocabulary of the royal court. “Lysander’s ambition offended only the first citizens and the equals” (tois protois kai isotimois, Plutarch, Lys. 19.1; at Sparta, the “equals” were citizens with full rights); Metellus had a good understanding (homonoia) with Sulla, because he was his “colleague and his kinsman by marriage” (isotimon andra kai kedesten, Plutarch, Sull. 6.9). This equality of rank is attested in an honorific description of Cyprus in 120 BC: “of those equal to the first friends” (ton isotimon tois protois philois, SEG 18, 581); Apollodoro ton isotimon tois protois philois (P.Ryl. 253, 1); in the third century, the syndic Menelaos will have documents distributed “to the two tribes for the equality of honor” (diarethesontai eis tas dyo phylas hyper tou to isotimon einai, P.Oxy. 2407, 34).

So then, when Pseudo-Peter addresses his letter tois isotimon hemin lachousin pistin (2Pet 1:1), we must translate, “To those to whom has been allotted the same precious faith as to us” (cf. “the same faith,” Titus 1:4) and understand this to mean not that the faith of the recipients of the letter is of the same sort or kind as that of the writer, but that this faith places them in a position of equal status and honor as the apostles, “with the same privileges as ourselves.”³⁹

¹ Plato, Meno 82 c: “in a square, the four lines are equal”; 83 b; Resp. 4.441 c: “in the soul there are the same parts and in the same number” (καὶ ἴσα τὸν ἀριθμὸν); Tim. 53 d: “one part of the right angle divided by equal sides”; 55 e: “the base of triangles formed by equal sides”; Aristotle, Cael. 2.4.287a19: “a figure in which all of the radii from the center are not equal” (μὴ ἴσας ἔχον); Pol. 5.1.12: “By equality in number I mean sameness or equality in number or in size”; Philo, Alleg. Interp. 1.3: “the number six is equal to the sum of its parts”; Plant. 122: “the sides of a square are necessarily equal”; Heir 144: “a first form of equality in number (two equals two) . . . the other in size”; 144–155; 195: the example of numerical equality (κατ’ ἀριθμὸν ἰσότητος); 220, 224; Joseph 101; Moses 1.221; Giants 56: “the same number of years”; Spec. Laws 2.34: equal sums were prescribed for men of each age; 2.37; Cherub. 22: “space of equal times”; Spec. Laws 4.233: “equal length of the day and the night.” A foundation in favor of the temple of Soknopaios, in 95 BC, “those who will succeed them in office shall pay the sanctuary each year the same number of artabai as their predecessors” (SB 8888, 18; cf. 9875, 15); Josephus, War 2.500; 3.476; Ant. 4.159.

² Two figures or two geometrical elements (line segments, angles, polygon, circles, etc.) are identical at two different places in space and are therefore superimposable (C. Mugler, Terminologie géométrique, pp. 227–231). They are situated in the same manner: ε—ξ ἴσου κει—σθαι. “The number seven brings . . . a correspondence with . . . the solid body by means of the cube” (Philo, Creation 106); geometry sows the seed of equality and proportion (Prelim. Stud. 16).

³ Aristotle, De An. 2.2.413a17; Plato, Grg. 508 a: “geometric equality is all-powerful among the gods as among humans”; Meno 84 d: “an equivalent space”; Resp. 10.617b: at equal intervals (δι ἴσου); Philo, Moses 2.89: columns separated by the same interval; 2.91; Spec. Laws 1.178; 4.22: an equivalent income.

⁴ Philo, Heir 145ff.; Cherub. 105; Worse Attacks Better 96: “intention is equivalent to act”; Plant. 142; Conf. Tongues 160; Change of Names 103: that which is proportional to life; Plant. 172: black is equally (ε—ξ ἴσου) appropriate for the virtuous and the wicked.

⁵ Plato, Tim. 55 a: “divide the total surface of the sphere into parts identical to each other” (εἰ—ς ἴσα μέρη καὶ ὅμοια συνίσταται); cf. C. Mugler, Terminologie géométrique.

⁶ Homer, Il. 1.187: Agamemnon: “Let everyone else hesitate to speak to me as to an equal (ἴσον) and equate himself to me (ὁμοιωθήμεναι) in my presence.”

⁷ Aristotle, Pol. 3.16.13: “friendship implies equality and likeness”; Eth. Nic. 8.10.1159b2: “equality, that is, resemblance, is friendship, notably among those who resemble each other in virtue” (cf. Deut 13:7—φίλος ἴσος τῆς ψυχῆς, your friend who is another like yourself); Philo, Heir 160: “All things were shared out equally and alike”; 164; Change of Names 235; Decalogue 41; Spec. Laws 4.143; Etern. World 43: “God remains equal and like to himself.” Cf. καθ ἴσον τω—ν ὁμοίων (P.Oxy. 2907, col. I, 4; II, 9; 2909, 19; 2910, col. I, 6; 2915, 9; SB 10215, 15; 11263, 15).

⁸ Herodotus 9.7: ε—π ἴση τε καὶ ὁμοίη; Demosthenes 21.112: All the citizens are ἴσοι καὶ ὅμοιοι; Thucydides 1.27, 99, 145; Xenophon, Hell. 7.1.1: an alliance “on a footing of absolute equality”; 45; Dittenberger, Syl. 312, 27; 333, 25; 421, 13; 742, 45; P.Oxy. 2476, 39: ἀνταμίβεσθαι δὲ ται—ς ἴσαις καὶ ὁμοίαις τιμαί—ς (privileges of athletes and artists, in the third century). At Samos, an honorific decree for judges from Myndus (third century BC): “Let them be given rights of citizenship with complete equality of rights” (ε—φ ἴση καὶ ὁμοίᾳ, J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. XXI, 27).

⁹ The two occurrences of ι—σότης (Job 36:30; Zech 4:7) have no corresponding Hebrew. Ἴσος translates the Hebrew words tô’am, “twin” (Exod 26:24); bad, “equal part” (Exod 30:34); ke’ahîw, “to each alike” (Lev 7:10).

¹⁰ Num 12:12; Jdt 1:11; Job 5:14; 10:10; 13:28; 40:15; Isa 51:23. In the Greek Bible, the meanings are as in classical Greek: “I am a mortal man, like everyone else” (Wis 7:1, 3, 6); “make them like the Athenians” (2Macc 9:15 = a similar death). Cf. 4Macc 13:20—“each brother lived for the same period of time”; Josephus, Ant. 19.242; War 1.414; Ag. Apion 1.177.

¹¹ Philo, Creation 27; Alleg. Interp. 1.36, 65; 2.21, 86; 3.51–52, 78; Cherub. 7, 119; Sacr. Abel and Cain 12, 112; Worse Attacks Better 38, 70; Giants 45; Plant. 89; etc.

¹² Cf. the equality of the virtues (Migr. Abr. 167), of honors (Sacr. Abel and Cain 138; Moses 2.232, 242; Decalogue 38; Spec. Laws 2.165; Dreams 2.80; cf. Josephus, War 6.231; Ag. Apion 2.36); a dividing or sharing in equal parts (ει—ς ἴσα; Heir 133, 141, 168, 174, 175, 180, 182, 207); thinking of allies and friends as one’s equals (Worse Attacks Better 33; Virtues 114; Sobr. 8); discussing on an equal footing (ε—ξ ἴσου; Good Man Free 149); the fate of mortals is not equal, but their kinship is equal and alike (Decalogue 41; Spec. Laws 1.140); “as much” (Creation 119; Alleg. Interp. 1.12; 3.10; Spec. Laws 1.121). Cf. Philostratus, Gym. 14: the two arts of the γυμναστικῆς and the παιδοτριβῆς are like (ἴσαι αι— τέχναι).

¹³ Creation 51; Sacr. Abel and Cain 27; Dreams 2.40; Moses 1.328; 2.9; Spec. Laws 4.231: “equality is the mother of justice” = To Gaius 85; Conf. Tongues 48; Change of Names 153; Contemp. Life 17. Associated with benevolence, in the sense of equity (Spec. Laws 4.184; Good Man Free 42; To Gaius 67). — For Plato, the just judge (ἴσος δικαστής) metes out impartial justice (Leg. 12.957 c). For Aristotle, “the just man is the one who safeguards equality” (Eth. Nic. 5.2.1129a33); “the idea of the just corresponds to the ideas of the legal and the equal” (1129a34); I.Priene 61, 9ff. Dittenberger, Or. 339, 51; Syl. 426, 14; P.Lond. 1345, 2: φυλάσσειν τὸ δίκαιον καὶ τὴν ι—σότητα. Cf. G. Stählin, “ἴσοθ, ι—σότης,” in TDNT, vol. 3, pp. 343–355.

¹⁴ Aristotle, Pol. 4.4.23; 3.6.9; 2.2.4: “equality by way of reciprocity is the safeguard of states”; Eth. Nic. 5.8.1132b33: “there is equality by way of reciprocity when one renders to others an equivalent quantity to what one has been given by them.”

¹⁵ Plutarch, De trib. r. p. gen. 826 f–827 a: “if monarchy is threatened by violent movements through the irresponsibility of its subjects, and oligarchy is threatened by exactions and abuse through the arrogance of the nobility, democracy is threatened by claims of equality” (C. Panagopoulos, Vocabulaire, pp. 224ff.); “Plutarch and his contemporaries accepted social inequality as obvious and as a fact of nature that it would be dangerous to eliminate. It is therefore ‘just’ to maintain this sort of inequality” (ibid., p. 265).

¹⁶ P.Tebt. 301, 21; P.Mich. 368, 14: “I, Phaesis, town secretary, have received a copy for verification”; 370, 25; 544, 6; 610, 49; 617, 10; P.Aberd. 45, 22; P.Phil. 9, 14: “I, Nemesas, have received a copy”; P.Oslo 25, 20; 89, 31; 90, 21; P.Oxy. 1834, 6: “I gave a copy of the letter to Proximus”; 2566, col. I, 10; 2567, 36; 3365, 4; P.Mich. 526, 19: “I ask that a copy of this petition be sent along”; BGU 2231, 12; 2233, 16; 2235, 13; P.Warr. 13, 9; P.Fam.Tebt. 43, 9 (= SB 5343; 10568, 9; 10923, 18; 11220, 23).

¹⁷ P.Got. 4, 30; cf. P.Mert. 18, 1; 91, 4; P.Oxy. 1934, 1; 2849, 3. Τὰ ἴσα are duplicata (P.Harr. 75, 24; P.Cair.Isid. 62, 26; 76, 4; P.Mich. 378, 2; P.Col. VII, 70, 4). Cf. P.Panop.Beatty 1, 84: “In conformity (τὸ εἶσον) with the instructions written by Your Diligence.”

¹⁸ According to the amphictyonic law of 380, “The duration of the sacred month of Pythia is one year; it is equal for all” (Corpus des inscriptions de Delphes, I, n. 10, 44 and p. 118; cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 145); P.Cair.Isid. 104, 16: γεωργει—ν ε—πὶ τὸν αὐτὸν ἴσονχρόνον; BGU 646, 6. In an apprenticeship contract from AD 48, if the apprentice takes more than three days off, “in compensation I will retain him with me for an equal number of days” (P.Fouad 37, 6–7; cf. P.Mert. 105, 33; P.Mil. 60, 10 and 22).

¹⁹ P.Corn. 9, 18: a work contract with castanet dancers: “we will supply two asses when you come to us and the same number (τοὺς ἴσους) when you return to the city”; P.Oxy. 2182, 28.

²⁰ P.Alex. 9, 6 (a first century contract); P.Ant. 101 b 4; BGU 2041, 17; 2051, 21; 2346, col. II, 7: τὰς ἴσας ἀργυρίου δραχμὰς; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 4, 7 (work contract): “If you send me back before the end of this period without just cause, you shall pay the same indemnity”; P.Dura 15 a 2; P.Got. 10, 8: “Do not restore to me (the twenty artabai of grain) that you owe me, since the same sum was delivered to me by him (Hierax)”; P.Mil. 2, 9: sale of part of a palm grove for two bronze talents; P.Sorb. 35, 10: a like payment to the bank (or banker); P.Oxy. 2875, 32; 3085, 9; SB 9860 f 4; cf. price equivalent to (P.Mich. 627, 12; P.Köln 104, 23).

²¹ P.Fouad 33, 14; P.Panop.Beatty 2, 15; P.Fam.Tebt. 8, 25; 23, 18; P.Dura 31, 20: τω— φίσκω τὰς εἴσας; P.Mert. 109, 20; P.Mich. 186, 28 (AD 72); 187, 28 (AD 75); 194, 29 (AD 61); 245, 26 and 29 (AD 47); 262, 31 (AD 35–36); 276, 12 (AD 47); 287, 14; 323, 25 (AD 47); 326, 58 (AD 48); 331, 4 (AD 41); 340, 106 (AD 45–46); 350, 21 (AD 37); 351, 19 (AD 44); 554, 42; 555, 21; 583, 25 (AD 25); 584, 32 (AD 84); P.Oslo 31, 25; 125, 2; P.Oxy. 2349, 16; 2971, 37; 3092, 12; PSI 1118, 25; 1120, 9; 1263, 11; P.Rein. 103, 29 (AD 26). P.Ryl. 65, 7: εἰ—ς τὸ βασιλικὸν τὰ ἴσα (first century BC); 582, 17 (42 BC); BGU 1732, 16; P.Dura 19, 17; 21, 21; SB 9827 a 19 (AD 29); 9906, 26; 10236, 39 (AD 36); 10882, 22 (AD 45).

²² P.Mert. 12, 11; P.Princ. 74, 9: αὐτὸς τὴν αὐτὴν ἴσην εὐνοίαν καὶ τειμὴν πρὸς ε—μὲ ε—νδείξασθαι; P.Oxy. 2154, 24: a request to offer a present to a third person “so that I may be equal to all the others and not dishonored before all”; 3313, 20: “we rejoice as much as you.”

²³ J. Pouilloux, Choix, XIV, 26 (third-second century). Likewise Demetrias among the Magnesians: “secretary of the federal council . . . to those who presented themselves to him, he never failed to show himself the same to all” (ἴσον παρεχόμενος πα—σιν διατετέλεκεν, SEG XXIII, 447, 10). Cf. the epitaph of a Christian jurist: “There is only one Hades for all, and the end is the same” (καὶ τέλος ε—στὶν ἴσον, ibid. VI, 210, 29). Josephus, Ant. 9.3: ἅπανσι τὸ ἴσον; 16.61; 18.207: ἴσος πα—σιν εἶναι.

²⁴ P.Fam.Tebt. 44, 16; P.Mich. 354, 23 (AD 52); 370, 14; 609, 29; P.Mil.Vogl. 84, 19; 193 b 9; P.Mil. 53, 4; P.Mert. 109, 25; PSI 1239, 7; 1325, 10; P.Oxy. 2133, 10; 2348, 35; 2474, 4 and 28; 2583, 4 and 7; 3117, 19; SB 10441, 4. A veteran’s will: “My property is to be shared between my heirs in equal parts, with no fraud” (Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIV, 5–6). Cf. ε—ξ ἴσου ἀποδοθεῖ—σαι (P.Erl. 46, 31; 71, 5; P.Cair.Isid. 105, 11); Josephus, Ant. 6.366: πα—σιν ε—ξ ἴσου; 3.284: balance of expenses and revenues.

²⁵ Acts 11:17; cf. Polybius 2.38.8: “He grants total equality to new adherents”; Thucydides 3.14: ε—ν ου— τω— ι—ερω— ἴσα καὶ ι—κέται ε—σμέν, “The sanctuary (of Olympian Zeus) receives us on the same footing as suppliants”; Josephus, War 5.199: “The place was equally open for worship (ε—ν ἴσω πρὸς θρησκευίαν) to women of the region and their coreligionists from elsewhere”; 7.44: “They authorized them to enjoy the rights of citizenship on the same footing (ε—ξ ἴσου) as the Greeks”; Ant. 18.241; 19.281: ἴσης πολιτείας . . . τετευχότας.

²⁶ E. B. Allo, Saint Jean: L'Apocalypse, 3d ed., Paris, 1033, on this text and p. 349. The author notes that this shape is less that of a cube than of a “five-sided pyramid whose height is equal to the side of the square base,” around 2400 kilometers. Cf. the Phasaël tower (Josephus, War 5.166; cf. 570; 5.215; Ant. 8.64). L. Saint-Michel, “Situation des dodécaèdres celto-romains dans la tradition pythagoricienne,” in BAGB, vol. 10, 1951, pp. 101–111.

²⁷ ἄρπαγμός is a precious possession to be consecrated or acquired, cf. W. Jaeger, “Eine stilgeschichtliche Studie zum Philipperbrief,” in Hermes, 1915, pp. 537–553; W. Förster, “Οὐχ ἄρπαγμὸν ἠγήσατο bei den griechischen Kierchenvätern,” in ZNW, 1930, pp. 115–128; R. P. Martin, Carmen Christi; O. Hofius, Der Christushymnus Philipper II, 6–11, Tübingen, 1976; J. Murphy-O'Connor, “Christological Anthropology in Philip. II, 6–11,” in RB, 1976, pp. 25–50; “Equality with God is the possession whose exploitation Christ renounced” (P. Henry, “Kénose,” in DBSup, vol. 5, col. 27, who quotes in this sense [col. 56] the letter of the communities of Lyon and Vienne; cf. Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 5.2.2–6).

²⁸ P. Benoit, trans., Bible de Jérusalem. Cf. A. Feuillet, “L'Homme-Dieu considéré dans sa condition terrestre de serviteur et de rédempteur (Phil. II, 5 sv. et textes parallèles),” in RB, 1942, pp. 58–79; J. Dupont, “Jésus-Christ dans son abaissement et son exaltation,” in RSR, pp. 500–514; G. Bornkamm, Studien zu Antike und Urchristentum, Munich, 1959, vol. 2, pp. 177–187; P. Grelot, “Deux expressions difficiles de Philippiens II, 6–7,” in Bib, 1972, pp. 496–502 (cites Homer, Od. 1.432: “Laertes had honored her equally with his faithful wife”; 11.304: Castor and Pollux “are honored equally with the gods”; 15.520: Eurymachos, “whom our people already honor [equally] as a god”; Nicolaus of Damascus 90, frag. 130, 97: Caesar “revered equally as a god,” τὸν ἴσα καὶ θεὸν τιμώμενον); G. Strecker, “Freiheit und Agapè: Exegese und Predigt über Phil. II, 5–11,” in Neues Testament und christliche Existenz: Festschrift H. Braun, Tübingen, 1973, pp. 523–538.

²⁹ Cf. Aristotle, Pol. 3.13.13: “It is natural that such an individual (of eminent virtue) should be like a god among men” (ὥσπερ γὰρ θεὸν εἰς ἀνθρώποις εἰκότως εἶναι τὸν τοιοῦτον); I.Olymp. 53, 12: ἰσοθέων τιμάς. It seems that the Samian Philaenis had heard of a woman ὡς ἰσόθεον (P.Oxy. 2891, frag. 3, col. II, 4); cf. K. Tsantsanoglou, “The Memoirs of a Lady from Samos,” in ZPE, vol. 12, 1973, pp. 189ff. W. Luppe, “Nochmals zu Philainis,” ZPE, vol. 13, 1974, p. 281.

³⁰ Dio Cassius 52.35.5. If Augustus is only referred to as θεὸς Καίσαρ (P.Oxy. 257, 21, 37) or θεὸς Σεβαστός (2476, 3), as also Claudius (θεὸς Και—σαρ, 1021, 3), θεὸς Σεβαστός (P.Mich. 244, 15), the latter is also θεὸς Κλαύδιος (PSI 1235, 8), like θεὸς Τίτος (P.Oxy. 1028, 23), θεὸς Οὐεσπασιονός (257, 12), etc. Cf. P. Bureth, Les Titulatures impériales dans les Papyrus, Brussels, 1964. E. Peterson (EISΨΕΟΣ, Göttingen, 1926, p. 172) cites an Alexandrine acclamation (τὰς δὲ ε—πιφθόνους ε—μοὶ καὶ ι—σοθέους ε—κφωήσεις ὑμῶ—ν ε—ξ ἅπαντος παραιτοῦμαι) and a Freiburg papyrus (τί θεός, τὸ κρατοῦν; τί βασιλεύς, ι—σόεος). On ι—σόθεαε τιμαί, honors rendered as to the gods, but not for true gods, cf. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Rh. 7.7: πολλοὶ καὶ ι—σόθει ε—νομίσθησαν, οἱ— δὲ καὶ ὡς θεοὶ τιμῶ—νται. L. Cerfaux, J. Tondriau, Culte des souverains, pp. 109ff.

³¹ Cf. John 10:30, 33; 19:7. Philo wrote that Abraham became ἴσος ἀγγέλοις = like the angels (Sacr. Abel and Cain 5), that “the egotistical and atheistic mind thinks that it is equal to God” (ἴσος εἶναι θεῶ—, Alleg. Interp. 1.49) and that “to add something to God would have to be something superior to him, or inferior to him, or equal to him” (ἢ ἴσον αὐτῶ—, Alleg. Interp. 2.3; Sacr. Abel and Cain 92).

³² This substantive, unknown in Josephus, seems to be attested only once in the papyri, P.Mil.Vogl. 23, 7, in the sharing of a succession πρὸς ι—σότητα.

³³ Text cited by Philo, Heir 191: the manna is shared among all those who will use it with particular attention to equality; Ps.-Phocylides 137: “Render to all their due, and impartiality is best in each case,” with the commentary of P. W. van der Horst, The Sentences of Pseudo-Phocylides, Leiden, 1978, p. 205.

³⁴ N. Hugedé, Colossiens, p. 199.

³⁵ Philo, Good Man Free 148, cf. isotimia in I.Gonn. : (δοῦναι) ι—σοπολιτείαν καὶ ι—σοτιμίαν (30, 5; 31, 8). The first term refers to equality of rights (property, marriage, etc.), the second to equality in access to offices. Philo, Joseph 232; Virtues 223; of the same value (Spec. Laws 3.202; Virtues 185; To Gaius 341); cf. Spec. Laws 1.238: “Involuntary sin with regard to the holy things is of a gravity equal to that of voluntary sin applied to human relations.”

³⁶ Sacr. Abel and Cain 91, 131. Zeus granted to Semele’s child “the rank of the heavenly gods” (Good Man Free 130). Cf. Dittenberger, Or. 234, 25: —Απόλλωνος —Ισοτίμου: this god is not less honored than Zeus Chrysaoreus.

³⁷ Post. Cain 18; cf. Decalogue 37: Each observer of the law is “as precious as a very populous nation . . . even as the whole universe”; Rewards 112; Spec. Laws 1.70: “the seventh day is equal in honor to eternity”; 2.155; Unchang. God 13; Moses 1.324: “You are all equal in dignity (πάντες ἐ—στὲ ἰ—σότιμοι), one and the same race, the same fathers. . . .” Cf. Dittenberger, Or. 554, 33: ζῶ—ντα τε δικαίως καὶ ἰ—σοτείμως. At Pergamum, a νεωκόρος (temple warden) behaved πρὸς πάντας ἰ—σοτείμως (C.Habicht, Die Inschriften des Asklepieions, Berlin, 1969, n. 55, 4).

³⁸ Josephus, War 4.319, 389, 393; Ant. 8.215: to be treated almost as the equal of kings.

³⁹ This meaning was already specified by F. Field, Notes on the Translation, pp. 240ff. —Ἰσότιμος is one of 57 NT hapaxes in this epistle.

καθηγητής

kathegetes, guide, teacher, master

kathegetes, S 2519; EDNT 2.222; MM 312; L&N 33.245; BAGD 388–389

In the midst of the invective that he unleashes against the scribes and the Pharisees—the titled teachers of the Jewish people, masters, fathers, or headmasters in the academic sense of these terms—Christ, addressing only his disciples, pronounces a threefold injunction that has no parallel in the other Gospels: “But you must not be called ‘Rabbi,’ for you have only one teacher (ho didaskalos), and you are all brothers. Neither shall you call anyone on earth ‘Father,’ for you have only one heavenly Father. Neither shall you be called kathegetai, for you have only one kathegetes, the Christ.”¹

The three terms used are equivalent and mean “master-teacher,”² even kathegetes, which can have the sense “guide, conductor”³ and thus would mean “educator, spiritual director.” In the literature, the papyri, and the inscriptions, however, it is most often attested with the meaning of “private tutor, master, salaried instructor”: “philosophy . . . from Aristotle the kathegetes”;⁴ “Mnesarchus had ideas contrary to those of his master Philon” (Philoni tou kathegete, Numenius, frag. 28; ed. des Places, p.80). In the first century, at Alexandria, young Theon mentions the poverty of teachers (P.Oxy. 2190, 7, 15, 24); in the second-third century, a mother, desolated at learning that the tutor of her child Ptolemy has left to find another position, urges her child to join forces with his paidagogos to find another teacher.⁵ Such a teacher receives compensation in kind and in cash.⁶ At Thebes in Egypt, during Hadrian's time, Julia Pasicleia is the wife of the teacher Acharistos (Dittenberger, Or. 408). Herodes Atticus erects a statue to his teacher Secundus (SEG XXIII, n. 115; cf. 117, 6). Indeed, disciples often set up funerary steles or compose inscriptions in honor of their kathegetai; thus, in Lycaonia or in Galatia: "Siderion and Diadoumenos set (this) up for their kathegetes Phosphoros" (Siderion kai Diadoumenos Phosphoro to heauton kathegete anestesan, MAMA VII, 358); or at Rome, "Rebuilt for a iatros Kaisaros (emperor's physician) who is a patronus kai kathegetes agathos kai axios (good and worthy patron and teacher)."⁷

Several Hebrew or Aramaic equivalents of kathegetes are possible in Matt 23:10. The best would seem to be môreh,⁸ which refers to "one who is learned" (Prov 5:13; Hab 2:18) and has messianic significance in Isa 30:20; Joel 2:23. We may recall the môreh hassedeq, the teacher of righteousness of the sect of the new covenant, tutor and leader of the community,⁹ called Teacher by antonomasia,¹⁰ raised up by God "to lead (the children of Israel) in the way of his heart" (CD 1.11; 4QpPs 37) and made him "a father for the sons of grace" (1QH 7.20), bring glad news to the humble (1QH 18.14).

Over against this doctrinal and religious authority, Jesus sets up his triple heis estin ("there is one . . ."): there is only one Teacher who should be trusted, only one Guide for the spiritual life.¹¹ Faith is built on God alone.

¹ Matt 23:8-10. Cf. E. Haenchen, "Matthäus XXIII," in ZTK, 1951, pp. 38–63. Most commentators write off verse 10 as a doublet of verse 8, overlooking both the pedagogical value of a triad or three-part sentence in the first Gospel and also the parallels of Gen 45:8 (Joseph says to his brothers, "Elohim has set me up as a father to Pharaoh, and as a lord to all his household, and as governor in all the land of Egypt") and b. Mak. 24a: "When King Jehoshaphat saw a disciple of the scribes, he arose from his throne, embraced him, kissed him, and said to him, 'My father, my father, my teacher, my teacher, my lord, my lord ('abbî, 'abbî; rabbi, rabbi; mâri, mâri)'" (cited by Str-B, vol. 1, p. 919, and K. Kohler, "Abba, Father, Title of Spiritual Leader and Saint," in JQR, vol. 13, 1901, pp. 567–580). Only P. Bonnard (L'Évangile selon saint Matthieu, Neuchâtel, 1963, pp. 336ff.) and W. Trilling ("Amt und Amtsverständnis bei Matthäus," in Mélanges Rigaux, pp. 30ff.) let the text stand in its entirety.

² Rabbi, the title given to all the "authorities," suggests grandeur or excellence: the prince in a kingdom, the chief of an army, the oldest child in a family, the steward in a household, the executive in an administration. Here, the master in a school or the professor of theology (cf. Lohse, “ῥαββί,” in TDNT, vol. 6, pp. 961–965; H. Kosmala, “In My Name,” in ASTI, vol. 5, 1967, pp. 87–109). —Abba, apart from its use for a literal father and for a lord and chief (vizier), refers to the master-teacher. It is an honorific term for outstanding scribes and teachers: “just as disciples are called son, so the master is called father” (Sipre Deut. 6.7; cf. b.Sanh. 19b ; Pirqe ‘Abot; 4Macc 7:9; Schrenk, “πατήρ,” in TDNT, vol. 5, pp. 945–1022). The Georgian version uses again in verse 10 the same “magister” as in verse 8 (PO, vol. 24, p. 127).

³ Cf. the translation of the Peshitta: medhaberonê; Josephus, War 3.497: Titus καθηγει—ται πρὸς τὴν λίμνην. According to A. Schlatter (Der Evangelist Matthäus, Stuttgart, 1948, p. 670) the Aramaic equivalent of the Jewish historian’s καθηγέομαι would be gyhnm 2.15; Tanh. 1.151; 6.12), used also for shepherds leading their sheep (Gen. Rab. 91.5). According to Plutarch, “the god of Delphi ordered Theseus through an oracle to take Aphrodite as his guide (καθηγεμόνα) and pray her to accompany him in his voyage” (Thes. 1.8). When Corinth and Phocaea send delegations to consult the oracle in the sanctuary of Claros, in the second-third century, the choir of nine young singers is accompanied by dignitaries, among whom are mentioned a καθηγητής or καθηγούμενος or καθηγησάμενος τὸν ὕμνον, who directs the children and their singing (I.Car., vol. 2, p. 215, n. 6 and 10; p. 216, n. 1, revised by L. and J. Robert in J. des Gagniers, Laodicée, 1969, p. 301, cf. REG, 1976, p. 543, n. 627). Cf. καθηγη[τής] or καθηγήσ[ατο] = drogomanno, official interpreter (in J. Baillet, Inscriptions grecques et latines . . . à Thèbes, Cairo, 1920, n. 745 bis); τῆς καθηγετίδος θεα—ς (MAMA, vol. 8, 419).

⁴ Φιλοσοφία . . . παῖ —Αριστοτέλους τοῦ καθηγητοῦ, Plutarch, De Alex. fort. 327; De adul. et am. 70 e: ὁ ἡμέτερος καθηγητής —Αμμόνιος; Alex. 5.7: Leonidas, Alexander’s τροφεύς and καθηγητής; cf. Dionysius of Halicarnassus: “Isaeus was the teacher of Demosthenes” (Is. 1.1); Aristotle directed Alexander’s education (Amm. 1 5); “Aristotle did not think that everything was perfected by his master Plato, τῷ καθηγητῇ Πλάτωνι” (Th. 3); Strabo 14.674. In Philodemus of Gadara, καθηγητής means the head of the school, the instructor, the teacher, Ir. 19.14; Lib. 52.6; 80.2. Rhetorius mentions the καθηγητὰς βασιλέων (in CCAG, vol. 8, 4, p. 157, 27), explained by Firmicus Maternus: “qui cum imperatoribus constituti docendi habeant aliquam potestatem” (Math. 1.160.7; cf. 1.225.22: magistros regum; 1.263.13–14; cf. F. Cumont, L’Egypte des astrologues, p. 31, n. 1). Cf. the enigmatic καθηγητήρες εὐσεβῶ—ν ἔργων of Monument d’Agrios IV, 10 (in E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, p. 444; cf. W. Peek, “Griechische Vers-Inschriften aus Ägypten,” in ZPE, 1973, pp. 242ff.).

⁵ Ὡστε οὖν, τέκνον, μελησάτο σοί τε καὶ τω- παιδαγωγω- σου καθήκοντι καθηγητῆ σε παραβάλλειν (P.Oxy. 930, 20; cf. 6 = Chrest. Wilck., n. 138).

⁶ P.Giss. 80, 5ff.; P.Oslo 156, 5–6; cf. P.Tebt. 591.

⁷ Cited by L. and J. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1958, p. 358, n. 552 (ed. IGUR, vol. 2, n. 675, 707); other mentions, ibid., 1938, p. 443, n. 225; 1950, p. 150, n. 77; 1962, p. 213, n. 352; 1967, p. 475, n. 187; IG XIV, 1751. Cf. L. Robert, “Un citoyen de Téos à Bouthrôtos,” in Bulletin de l’Académie des Inscriptions et Belles Lettres, Paris, 1974, pp. 526ff.

⁸ The word chosen by F. Delitzsch in his Hebrew translation of the NT. Cf. A. H. M’Neile, The Gospel According to St. Matthew, London, 1952; L. Saggin, “Magister vester unus est Christus (Mt. XXIII, 10),” in VD, 1952, pp. 211–213; P. Geoltrain, “Une nouvelle attestation du titre ‘Maître de Justice,’” in Sem, vol. 16, 1966, pp. 69–72; D. Hill, Greek Words and Hebrew Meanings, Cambridge, 1967, pp. 110ff. In our day, judges in rabbinic tribunals often enough have on their seals the phrase “judge and professor of law, Nyd qdx hrmw”; cf. J. Schreiden, Les Enigmes des manuscrits de la Mer Morte, Wetteren, 1961, pp. 8, 336.

⁹ CD 20.32–33; 4QpPs37; cf. F. F. Bruce, The Teacher of Righteousness in the Qumran Texts, London, 1957; J. Carmignac, Le Docteur de Justice et Jésus-Christ, Paris, 1957; I. Rabinowitz, “The Guides of Righteousness,” in VT, 1958, pp. 391–404; A. S. Van der Woude, “Le Maître de Justice et les deux Messies de la Communauté de Qumrân,” in Recherches bibliques IV: La Secte de Qumrân, Louvain, 1959, pp. 121–134; J. Weingreen, “The Title More Sedek,” in JSS, vol. 6, 1961, pp. 169ff.; M. Delcor, “Le Docteur de Justice, nouveau Moïse dans les hymnes de Qumrân,” in R. de Langhe, Le Psautier, Louvain, 1962, pp. 407–423.

¹⁰ CD 20.1, 14, 28; 1QH 2.13, 17–18; 4.27; 7.26; 1QpHab 2.2, 8–9; 7.4–5; 1QpMic 1.6–8.

¹¹ Cf. John 14:5; 1John 2:27. C. Spicq, “Une allusion au Docteur de Justice dans Matthieu, XXIII, 10?” in RB, 1959, pp. 387–396.

κακοήθεια

kakoetheia, malice, malignity

kakoetheia, S 2550; TDNT 3.485; EDNT 2.237; MM 316; L&N 88.113; BAGD 397

This perverse disposition of the heart is mentioned in three sin lists. Philo says, "You see all that the strong liquor of folly produces: bitterness, malignity, a hot temper, extreme rage, savagery, harsh sarcasm, the desire to hurt" (Dreams 2.192). Apollonius of Tyana specifies the reason for estrangement from a friend: phthonou, kokoetheias, misous, diaboles, echthras.¹ And St. Paul (Rom 1:29) inserts kakoetheia between deceit (dolos) and gossipers (psithyristas). M. J. Lagrange comments correctly: "like envy or jealousy, kakoetheia takes everything amiss: esti gar kakoetheia to epi to cheiron hypolambanein panta ('kakoetheia means taking everything for the worse,' Aristotle, Rh. 2.13.1389b20ff.). Aristotle thus treated it as a specific vice, but the popular understanding of the word was broader: 'kakoetheia men esti kakia kekrymmene, kakotropia de poikile kai pantodape panourgia, kakoetheia is hidden evil, varied mischief, miscellaneous villainy' (Ammonius, p. 80 in the Thesaurus), hence a general inclination toward evildoing" (on this verse). Thus Xenophon says, "Some are capable of scorn and malignity and greed, others not" (Cyn. 13.16).

So kakoetheia can be translated, depending on the context, as "malignity," "malice," even "bad morals";² but the connotation of lying, intrigue, deceit is by far the most pronounced. Just as St. Paul links dolos and kakoetheia, P.Grenf. I, 10, 13 has "apart from any deceit or fear or force or cheating or compulsion or any malice or kakoetheia whatsoever or any detraction" (aneu pantos dolou kai phobou kai bias kai apates kai anankes kai hoias depote kakonoias kai kakoetheias kai pantos elattomatos); cf. Esth 8:12 f (LXX): "These friends, having through the specious reasoning of their kakoetheia beguiled the sincere goodwill of their sovereigns." According to Josephus, the lying serpent maliciously persuaded the woman to taste of the tree of wisdom (Ant. 1.42) and is deprived of its voice because of its malignity toward Adam (1.50). The malice of Salome and of Pheroras was directed against the young people (16.68; cf. the psithyristai of Rom 1:29). The enemies of the Jews slander them "through envy and malice, dia phthonon kai kakoetheian" (Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.222; cf. Plutarch, Praec. ger. rei publ. 12.807 a; 32.825 e; Cic. 5.6). By giving small gifts to those who possess great riches, "one gains a reputation for malice and meanness, kakoetheias kai aneleutherias proslambanei doxan" (De E ap. Delph. 1). A letter of 16 May AD 243, reproaches its recipient for having behaved shabbily (P.Cair.Zen. 88, 16; cf. Menander, Epit. 334).

So the word refers to perverse intentions, innate malice (te symphyto kakoetheia, 3Macc 3:22; cf. 7:3), an inclination to evil (he kakoethes diathesis, 4Macc 1:25) that cannot be rooted out, but the effects of which can be neutralized by a temperate mind (4Macc 2:16; 3:4).

¹ Apollonius of Tyana, Ep. 43; cf. G. Petzke, Die Traditionen über Apollonius von Tyana und das Neue Testament, Leiden, 1970, p. 226.

² Cf. P.Giss. 40, col. II, 11: ἵνα μὴ παρ' αὐτοῖ—ς ἡ δειλίας αἰ—τία ἢ παρὰ τοῖ—ς κακοήθεσιν ε—πηρείας ἀφορμὴ ὑπολειφθῆ (AD 215). Hesychius offers this definition: ε—γκιλικίζεται· κακοηθεύεται, κακοποιεῖ—.

κακοπαθέω, κακοπάθεια

kakopatheo, to suffer, undergo hardship; kakopatheia, hardship, distress, suffering

kakopatheo, S 2553; TDNT 5.936–938; EDNT 2.238; NIDNTT 3.719, 722, 725; MM 316; L&N 24.89; BAGD 397 | kakopatheia, S 2552; TDNT 5.936–938; EDNT 2.238; NIDNTT 3.724; MM 316; L&N 24.89; BDF §23; BAGD 397

Occurring frequently in the Hellenistic period, these terms express the idea of hardship and distress, with rather variable connotations: “And you say, ‘Ah, what fatigue (Hebrew tela’âh)!’” (Mal 1:13); the redacting of a work of history is arduous toil (2Macc 2:26–27); the strength of family ties is seen “in that we suffer the hardships of our kin along with them” (Ep. Arist. 241); “You are troubling yourself for no reason” (Menander, Dysk. 348); “Why are you so bent on mistreating yourself?” (ibid., 371); “You have been reduced to such a state!” (Philo, Dreams 2.181, ti kakopatheis); “the soul suffers from being housed by nature in the body” (Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.203); “many were in distress” (Ant. 12.336). In the second century AD, a Jewish woman attacked by another woman suffered greatly because of the blows she received and because of her fall (hypo ton plegon kai tou ptomatos deinos kakopathein) and she is at risk for a miscarriage (paidion ektroma ginesthai).¹ It is in this sense of enduring painful trials (Jas 5:13) and torments (2Tim 2:9; 4:5) that kakopatheo is used in the NT.

The meaning of the NT hapax in Jas 5:10 poses a problem: Christians are exhorted to take the hypodeigma tes kakopatheias kai tes makrothymias of the prophets who spoke in the Lord’s name. Is kakopatheia subjective or objective? Should we translate “Take as your model the suffering and the patience of the prophets,” or “the endurance in suffering of the prophets”?² The truth of the matter is that both meanings are attested in the literature, the inscriptions, and the papyri. “The human race increases and is created over many years in great suffering” (kakopatheiais megistais); “Most people endure much suffering, karterousi pollen kakopatheian” (Aristotle, Pol. 3.6, 3.15.1278b); “They took up a strong position . . . to rest from their recent toils, ek tes progegenemenes kakopatheias” (Polybius 3.42.9; cf. 3.72.5); but Aratus was “quick to rise after being struck, thanks to his boldness and his endurance, dia tes autou kakopatheias” (4.8.3); Numa “further perfected himself, thanks to exercise and the practice of endurance and of philosophy” (Plutarch, Num. 3.7). In his list of Moses’ virtues Philo includes “endurance of suffering” between “toilsome exertion” and “scorn of pleasure” (Moses 1.154; cf. Spec. Laws 2.60; Cherub. 88). “Through enduring these torments and through our patience—dia tesde tes kakopatheias kai hypomones—we gain the fruit of virtuous battle.”³

The term is used first and foremost for the danger and toil of war: “You must blame yourselves either for your disasters or for your sufferings” (Thucydides 7.77.1); “The Romans endured severe hardships” (Josephus, War 1.148); “the patience of the Jews and their steadfastness in the midst of adversity” (6.37; cf. Ag. Apion 1.135; Ant. 1.185; 6.172); “taking on all the danger and all the toil”;⁴ soldiers are worn out by the trials they endure (Diodorus Siculus 17.12.2; cf. 17.10.5; 17.37.2). Similarly the toil of farmers: “You plant a vineyard at the cost of endless labors, of the sort that workers of the soil must endure”⁵; and of porters, who toil physically “after the fashion of beasts of burden” (Philo, Virtues 88), “those who earn their living through any trade do not cease to suffer at any time or any place” (Sacr. Abel and Cain 38; cf. I. Magn. 65 a 26: kakopathian ergontes; b 14); which explains why the word is so often linked with dapane (expense).⁶ Naturally, it occurs in the language of sports.⁷ Finally it comes to be used of a costly effort; hence the corresponding adjective is used in the sense of “hard-working, persevering,” as in this epitaph: *Leon Androstheneus kakopathe chreste chaire.*⁸

Since kakopatheia takes in the danger, trouble, and toil suffered by functionaries in the course of duty, by workers in their trades, by people in the course of their lives, 2Tim 2:9 and 4:5 can be understood as referring to the hard apostolic labor that is not deterred by any difficulty or suffering.

¹ P. Tebt. 800, 27 (= C. Pap. Jud. 133); cf. P. Cair. Zen. 59093, 17 = SB 6720: γίνωσκε δὲ καὶ ἡμαρσ πολλὰ κακοπαθήσαντας καὶ μόγις καταχωρισθέντας; a horoscope of the first-second century, κακοπαθήσεται καὶ ξενιτεύει (P. Lond. 98 recto 73; vol. 1, p. 130); in the fourth century, ε—άν ἄλληται (μηρὸς εὐώνυμος), σκυλμοὺς καὶ πόνους δηλοῖ—καταπαθήσαντα δὲ εὐφρανθῆναι (P. Ryl. 28, 84).

² Cf. A. Deissmann, Bible Studies, p. 263. G. Björck (“Quelques cas de ε—ν διὰ δυοῖν—ν dans le N.T. et ailleurs,” in ConNT, vol. 4, 1940, p. 3) takes μακροθυμίας as a hendiadys in the genitive and adopt Osterwald’s translation: “Take your example of patience in sufferings of the prophets.”

³ 4Macc 9:8. Cf. I.Perg. 252, 17: τω—ν τε ε—κκομιδω—ν ε—πιμελεία καὶ κακοπαθία διειπῶν τὰ δέοντα πα—σαν ε—πιστροφήν ε—ποίησατο (second century BC); Dittenberger, Or. 244, 12: τὴν περὶ τὸ σω—μα γεγενημένην ἀσθένειαν διὰ τὰς συνεχει—ς κακοπαθίας; 339, 23; physicians endure fatigue and toil in serving the sick: διὰ τὰς κακοπαθίας τὰς γενομένας περὶ αὐτοῦς (Dittenberger, Syl., 943, 9); BGU 1209, 7: οὐδὲν σπουδῆς οὐδὲ κακοπαθίας περέλιπον (23 BC; 1822, 15; 1836, 11; 50 BC, very mutilated). —On the other hand, the meaning of suffering is that of ε—ν ἀνάγκαις καὶ κακοπαθίαις γένηται (Dittenberger, Syl. 521, 24); πα—σαν ἀναδεχόμενοι κακοπαθίαν (685, 30; from AD 139); ψυχικὴν ἅμα καὶ σωματικὴν ὑπέμειναν κακοπαθίαν (656, 20; decree of Abdera from 166 BC, republished by L. Robert, Opera Minora Selecta, vol. 1, pp. 321ff.; P. Herrmann, “Zum Beschluß von Abdera aus Teos,” in ZPE, vol. 7, 1971, pp. 72–77). Cf. Michaelis, on this word, in TDNT, vol. 5, pp. 936–939.

⁴ J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. 4, 11 and 23: πάντα κίνδυνον καὶ πα—σαν κακοπαθίαν ὑπομίνας (the linking of these two terms is constant, cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 547, 9; 613, 32; 700, 28); Diodorus Siculus 19.80.2: “on account of the excessive hardship (διὰ τὴν ὑπερβολὴν τῆς κακοπαθείας), none of the valets or stableboys could keep up with the army”; 109, 5: “affected by the heat and the hardship of their flight”; Plutarch, C. Gracch. 2.3: “the soldiers continued to suffer (κακοπαθούτων)”; cf. L. Robert, Noms indigènes, pp. 458, 488; idem, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1950, p. 196, n. 183.

⁵ Philo, Rewards 128; Jonah 4:10—“You took pity on the castor oil plant for which you had not toiled (Hebrew ‘amal)”; most occurrences of κακοπάθεια in the papyri have to do with farmers, P.Cair.Zen. 59474, 13; P.Tebt. 787, 16: πα—σαν κακοπαθίαν ἀνεχόμενοι (138 BC); 955; I.Magn. 105, 3: πα—σαν ἀναδεχόμενοι κακοπαθίαν (republished Dittenberger, Syl. 685, 30).

⁶ Tabula of Cebes 8: κακοπαθω—ν καὶ δαπανω—ν (contrasted with ἡδυπάθεια); C. Michel, Recueil, n. 546, 11: ὑποστησάμενος δαπάνας καὶ κακοπαθίας (first century BC); P.Oslo 26, 13: μετὰ πλαιστής δαπάνης καὶ κακοπαθίας (5 or 4 BC). In 159 or 158 BC, a Jew worked his land at the cost of great toil and expense, μετὰ πολλῆς κακοπαθίας καὶ δαπάνης

(P.Ryl. 578, 7; republished C.Pap.Jud. 43; H. C. Youtie, Scriptiunculae, pp. 100ff.); BGU 1209, 7; P.Stras. 601, 16.

⁷ “Contender with misfortune, that is what I am! Fate has saddled me with many difficulties” (Philo, Joseph 36); “Our father, . . . like an athlete, passed his life suffering toil and the most unbearable evils” (ibid., 233); cf. Musonius: πόσα δ αὖ κακοπαθοῦσιν ἔνιοι θηρώμενοι δόξαν (in Stobaeus 3, Ecl. 29.75.17; ed. C. E. Lutz, p. 56, line 19).

⁸ J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1955, p. 232, n. 134. Philo defines rest: “an activity without fatigue, ἄνευ κακοπαθείας” (Cherub. 87).

κακούργος

kakourgos, malefactor, good-for-nothing, criminal kakourgos, S 2557; TDNT 5.484; EDNT 2.239; NIDNTT 1.561, 564; MM 317; L&N 88.114; BDF §§31(1), 119(1), 124; BAGD 398

This word presents no difficulty. It occurs only twice in the NT, where it refers to the two malefactors led with Jesus to Calvary “to be executed”¹ and to St. Paul in prison, enduring sufferings and humiliation “even chains, like a malefactor” (2Tim 2:9; cf. Gos. Pet. 26). But it is interesting to ask what sort of delinquent or criminal is meant.

Esth 8:12 q uses the word in its most general and pejorative sense: the Jews handed over to destruction by Amon “are not malefactors (= culprits), but govern themselves according to very just laws.” Sir 11:33 makes an easy play on words: “Be on guard against the evildoer (apo kakourgou), for he stirs up evil,” but this is the conclusion of a warning against the ploys of the intriguer, the heart of the proud, and slanderer, and sinner (verses 29–32). In Prov 21:15, the kakourgos is the “doer of iniquity” (Hebrew po‘el ‘awen) and is contrasted with the just person, who practices equity.

The word can refer to a simple good-for-nothing (Menander, Dysk. 258) or a villain (Philo, Heir 109)—whose impiety and anomia are mentioned in BGU 1854, 19 and SB 9691, 12 = P.Abinn. 54, 12—a criminal (P.Oxy. 1468,4), most often a thief or brigand (lestes, Matt 27:38 = Mark 15:27; Herodian, Hist. 1.10.2), operating in groups (kollegion kakourgon, P.Gron.Amst. 1, 4) that give themselves over to pillage (P.Ant. 97, 9; P.Hib. 62, 3; from 245 BC) without shrinking from violence (Philo, Spec. Laws 1.75). Thus it is that in AD 171 two pork merchants of Arsinoè were attacked on the road by brigands who beat them up, took their tunics, and stole a pig from one of them.² These nameless bandits cannot be identified by their victim: “epelthan tines kakourgoi, housper agnoo, several bandits whom I do not know attacked” (P.Lund IV, 13, 10; republished SB 9349; P.Flor. 9, 12; C.P.Herm. 52,7), they work at night (P.Mil. 45, 6; republished SB 9515; P.Lond. 245, 9 = vol. 2, p. 272), break into a town (P.Bon. 22 a 9), a house (P.Mich. 425, 16; P.Gen. 47, 6, 13), or a farm estate (Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 8, 7), steal or kill sheep (P.Lond. 403, 8; vol. 2, p. 276 = P.Abinn. 49; P.Lond. 242, 6; vol. 2, p. 275), and do not hesitate to set fires; they burn harvested grains and hay (P.Cair.Isid. 65, 4; 66, 8; 67, 11; cf. Gos. Pet. 26). For Palladas, the kakourgos is a murderer (androphonos) headed for crucifixion.³

The civil authority can take security measures against these malefactors, brigands, deserters, and other delinquents,⁴ like the ordinance of Ptolem Euergetes calling for the arrest of leistai kai hoi loipoi kakourgoi (P.Hib. 198, 93, 98; BGU 1764, 20). The two Gospel texts concerning these bandits emphasize their punishment. Sir 33:27 sets forth torture and trial by ordeal for the oiketes kakourgos (wicked servant); Cyrus had the feet and hands of kakourgoi and adikoi cut off and their eyes gouged out (Xenophon, An. 1.9.13). Thucydides 1.134.4 mentions “the Kaiadas (a pit or cavern) where kakourgoi were interred”; Philo, “the whips usually reserved for the degrading of the worst malefactors, kakourgon ponerotatous” (Philo, Flacc. 75); Plutarch, the mines where the work is done by kakourgoi and foreign slaves (Crass. 34.1). Incarceration is the commonest punishment, at least as a provisional measure. Pentepres condemns Joseph as a good-for-nothing and sends him to the malefactors’ prison, eis ten kakourgon heirkten enebalen (Josephus, Ant. 2.59). Since the recovery of debts was in principle supposed to be carried out against the property of debtors and not their persons, Tiberias Julius Alexander orders “that in no event shall free men be imprisoned at all unless they are malefactors” (SB 8444, 17 = Dittenberger, Or. 669). A plaintiff of the third century, who claims to be innocent, was first led to the town prison, then “transferred to the prison of Crocodilopolis (the metropolis), (the police officer) claiming that I was a malefactor, phaskon einai me kakourgon” (P.Lille 7, 20; cf. 28, 3). In 6 BC, the chief of police of Persea is ordered to transfer two malefactors who have been arrested, hous synepsekas kakourgous duo.⁵

¹ Luke 23:32: ἤγοντο δὲ καὶ ἕτεροι κακοῦργοι δύο (cf. Gos. Pet. 10, 13). This usage of ἕτεροι is a syllepsis, like τοι—ς ἄλλοις ι—διώταις (“that all the other private individuals be permitted to celebrate the feast”) in the Inscription of Rosetta (Dittenberger, Or. 90, 52); the adjective ἄλλοις does not indicate that those previously mentioned are also ι—διω—ται; furthermore, ἕτερος, a stronger word than ἄλλος, can have the sense of “contrary, opposed, hostile” (Deut 4:28; 5:7; Rom 7:23) and here points out dissimilarity (Luke 9:29; Heb 7:11). More precisely, the frequent occurrence of the formula shows that it must be translated “in addition, besides,” as J. Vergote has shown (“L’expression καὶ οἱ— ἄλλοι = et aussi,” in Scrinium Lovaniense: Mélanges historiques Et. van Cauwenberg, Louvain, 1961, pp. 61–68).

² P.Fay. 108, 11; SB 9238, 8 (second-third century); P.Gen. 47, 6–7 (= P.Abinn. 47); P.Oxy. 1408, 19 (third century), BGU 1847, 15. Although the verb κακουργέω has the sense “mistreat, harm” (Ep. Arist. 271; Josephus, Ant. 2.101; P.Mich. 657, 14) and “act faithlessly” (Josephus, War 2.277), the noun κακουργία emphasizes especially faithlessness and fraud, 2Macc 3:32; 14:22; P.Oxy. 71, col. I, 10; 1469, 18; P.Lond. 948, 8 (vol. 3, p. 220); Josephus, Ant. 18.96; it refers also to the deterioration that merchandise can suffer when transported by sea, ἀπὸ πάσης ναυτικῆς κακουργίας (C. Balconi, “Ricevuta de un Naukleros,” in Aeg, 1974, p. 32).

³ Anth. Pal. 9.378. Numerous texts associate the malefactor-criminal and crucifixion: the Gauls “keep malefactors in prison for five years and then, in honor of the god, fasten them to crosses raised on a vast pyre, where they are offered in sacrifice” (Diodorus Siculus 5.32.6). “When the physical tortures are carried out, each malefactor carries his own cross” (Plutarch, De sera 9); “If the dreamer is a malefactor, this means carrying the cross” (Artemidorus Daldianus, Onir. 2.56); “it is bad for the malefactors; because this brings punishment for the criminals, often even by the cross” (ibid. 2.68).

⁴ P.Lips. 37, 8. At Athens, a law prescribed imprisonment for clothing thieves and kidnappers. Cf. Antiphon: “First of all, I was arrested as a malefactor after an investigation, and I must now answer to a murder charge. . . . And indeed, I should not be classed as a malefactor and am not subject to the law on malefactors (οὐδένοχος τῶ— τῶ—ν κακούργων νόμῳ), as my accusers themselves bear witness; for that law was directed against thieves and highwaymen” (see Antiphon, Murd. Her. 9). If thieves are the most commonly mentioned malefactors in Egypt (BGU 325, 3; 372, col. II, 11, 22; 935, 4; P.Lond. 408, 5; vol. 2, p. 280; P.Abinn. 55, 5: ὑπὸ τῶ—ν κακουργῶ—ν ἀναιλούμεθα), many others were later added to the category of kakourgoi.

⁵ G. Geraci, “Ordine de trasferimento di duo arrestati,” in Aeg, 1974, pp. 5–8.

καλύπτω, ἀνακαλύπτω, ἀποκαλύπτω, ἀποκάλυψις

kalypto, to cover, envelop, hide; anakalypto, to unveil, uncover; apokalypto, to reveal; apokalypsis, revelation

kalypto, S 2572; TDNT 3.556–558; EDNT 2.246; NIDNTT 2.211–212; MM 319; L&N 28.79, 79.114; BAGD 401 | anakalypto, S 343; TDNT 3.560–561; EDNT 1.82; NIDNTT 2.212f.; MM 34; L&N 79.117; BAGD 55 | apokalypto, S 601; TDNT 3.563–592; EDNT 1.130–132; NIDNTT 3.309–312, 314; MM 63; L&N 28.38; BAGD 92 | apokalypsis, S 602; TDNT 3.563–592; EDNT 1.130–132; MM 63; L&N 28.38; BAGD 92

“Kalypto. Verbal expression indicating that an object that intercepts the light or visual rays keeps another object from being seen, or, in the case of a living being, from seeing. The active forms of kalyptein have as subject, in Homer, the earth, water, clouds, the night, etc., but also deities who used nature to hide what they wanted hidden. The poets, moreover, provide an external cause for the extinction of vision in the dead and wounded, placing outside of their persons the night in which they feel themselves enveloped.”¹

In classical Greek, this verb has three meanings: (a) “cover”; Homer, Il. 6.464: “May the earth poured over me cover me”; 10.29: Menelaus “covered his large pack with the hide of a spotted leopard”;² (b) “envelop”; Il. 5.23: Hephaestus saved the life of Idaios “by enveloping him in darkness”; 5.507: Ares “enveloped the battle in a sudden night” and thus brought help to the Trojans; 5.553: death, “which ends all, enveloped them there”;³ (c) “hide”; Il. 3.381: Aphrodite “hid Paris behind a thick fog”;⁴ 21.318, 321: “his splendid arms will rest beneath the water, hidden beneath the silt (kekalyptmena). . . . I will heap rubble on him to hide him (kalyptso).”

In the inscriptions, kalypto is found in liturgical⁵ and funerary⁶ regulations. On the pedestal of a statue of a magistrate at Mariamnia: “the earth, which nurtured him like a mother, now covers him.”⁷ The verb is rare in the papyri,⁸ but much used in the LXX (for the Hebrew piel of kasâh), from the simple meaning in such expressions as covering a cistern (Exod 21:33), fat covering the intestines (Lev 3:14), and “leprosy covering all the skin of the body” (Lev 13:12-13), to the meaning “fill, inundate, overrun”:⁹ God’s majesty covered the heavens (Hab 3:3); fear enveloped me (Ps 55:5; cf. Prov 10:6, 11; Sir 37:3; Hab 2:17). It is especially clouds that cover and envelop,¹⁰ but also hangings, drapes,¹¹ and vestments that “hide” nudity.¹² To cover one’s face is to hide from others’ looks.¹³ To keep words hidden is to keep them secret (kalyptson ta prostagmata, Dan 12:4).

It could be said that this verb is unknown in Philo, since he uses it only in quoting Deut 23:13 (Alleg. Interp. 2.27; 3.158) and in commenting on Exod 26:1-14 (Moses 2.87). Josephus also knows the meaning “cover,”¹⁴ but he more often uses the word to mean “hide,”¹⁵ and with the pejorative nuance of “conceal”: the satrap conceals his machinations under signs of friendship (War 1.256); Antipater cleverly conceals his hatred (1.468); soldiers camouflaged in civilian clothes (2.176).

The Gospels know only the meaning “hide”: a boat is hidden by the waves (Matt 8:24); one who lights a lamp does not hide it with a vase or place it under a bed (Luke 8:16); “they say to the hills, ‘hide us’” (Luke 23:30; cf. Hos 10:18). If there is nothing hidden that will not be uncovered (ouden kekalymmenon, ho ouk apokalyphthesetai, Matt 10:26), we must understand this to mean that what Jesus said in secret to his apostles will be promulgated by them to the whole world, and that the truth of the gospel, which is at first contradicted or unrecognized, will be recognized and accepted by the very pagans. In the same sense: “If, moreover, our gospel is veiled (perfect passive participle, kekalymmenon), it is so for those who are perishing” (2Cor 4:30). The gospel, which is light and illumination, must be manifest to all, but its brilliance is not perceived by the blind or those who have an opaque spot on their eye (E. B. Allo), a veil (kalymma, 2Cor 3:15), due to Satan’s action, so that they are incapable of understanding its message: the revelation of the Messiah. That is to say, the interior illumination of faith is necessary for perceiving the shining brilliance of the Son of Man (Luke 11:33–36).

Very important, theologically speaking, are 1Pet 4:8—“Show intense love among yourselves, since (causal hoti) love covers a multitude of sins” (agape kalyptei plethos hamartion)—and Jas 5:20—“One who brings back a sinner from the error of his way will save his soul from death and cover a multitude of sins” (kalypsei plethos hamartion). The exact parallelism of the two assertions indicates that we have here a Greek aphorism.¹⁶ The Syriac Didascalia (2.3.3) attributes it to Jesus himself,¹⁷ but it is certainly a quotation of Prov 10:12 according to the Hebrew text: “Love covers all faults.” To cover, veil, or hide sins is to efface them, pardon them.¹⁸ The OT affirms that works of mercy obtain pardon for sin from God,¹⁹ and the Lord pronounces the merciful blessed (Matt 5:7; 6:14-15; cf. 1Pet 2:20; 3:8-9). We may affirm that in the NT, agape has the value of an expiatory sacrifice and is a major element of spiritual worship (1John 3:19-20).

Anakalypto. — Apparently this verb is commonplace, meaning “unveil, remove a veil, uncover.” It was agreed that once seated, “the conspirators (disguised as women) would strike immediately, throwing off their veils”;²⁰ “unveil the sacred robe” (anakalypton ton hieron pepilon, Pap.Graec.Mag. 57, 17). In the LXX, that which was hidden in darkness is disclosed and made to appear, made known,²¹ like the sins of the wicked (Job 20:27; cf. Philo, Dreams 1.87; Moses 1.243), and more frequently this or that body part: “The Lord will uncover the form of the daughters of Zion” (Isa 3:17; piel of the Hebrew ‘arâh); the deported Egyptians will go “barefoot and with their shame uncovered” (Isa 20:4; Hebrew hasap); notably for uncovering the pudenda.²²

Anakalypto is sometimes associated with vision: with animals that have eyelids, “If they do not open them (me anakalyphthenton) they cannot see.”²³ But in the OT, the verb is in a way sacralized, when God is the subject. Not only does he “reveal himself” (Isa 22:14), but “he makes a revelation to humans.”²⁴ “He reveals that which is deep and hidden” (Dan 2:22), mysteries (2:28-29). Philo takes up this meaning: “the will of God is to reveal the secrets of things to those who wish to know the truth.”²⁵ Virtue, like Tamar, sits at the crossroads with veiled face; but “in unveiling her (anakalypsantes), the curious behold (katatheasontai) her beauty undefiled” (Prelim. Stud. 124).

It is in light of these data that we must understand the two NT occurrences of this religious verb. Comparing Judaism and Christianity, the synagogue and the church, St. Paul says, “Until this day (cf. Deut 29:3; Isa 29:10; Rom 11:8) the same veil (kalymma) remains (on the heads of Jews, as the veil was upon Moses’ head) at the reading of the old covenant, for it is not unveiled (me anakalyptomēnon) that in Christ it (the covenant) is abolished” (2Cor 3:14). The veil hinders seeing, and here, the understanding that the transitory old covenant is now outdated. The condition of Christians is quite different: “We all with unveiled faces (dative of manner, not instrumental, anakekalymmeno prosopo) reflect like a mirror the glory of the Lord.”²⁶ The new covenant, after all, is written not on stone tablets but on tablets of flesh, in the hearts of believers (2Cor 3:3). All the same, since it is a question of knowledge, the apostle speaks no longer of uncovered hearts but of faces with no interposed veil, of uncovered persons who refract the divine light when they are turned toward Christ, who, illuminating them with the divine light, metamorphoses and divinizes them. The image is that of a permanent and transforming spiritual reflection.²⁷ Everyone can perceive it, whereas the Israelites could not look upon Moses reflecting the divine light, so that he was obliged to veil it (Exod 34).

Apokalypsis. — This noun, unknown in Philo, Josephus, and the papyri, means literally “the act of uncovering”²⁸ and corresponds exactly to the English “revelation.”²⁹ Ben Sirach uses it for the divulging of a secret (Sir 22:22; 41:26—logon kryphion) and for the manifestation of that which was previously unknowable: “At a person’s end (comes) the revelation of his works” (apokalypsis ergon autou, 11:27).

Simeon, drawing upon Isa 42:6 and 49:6 (eis phos ethnon) sees in the infant Jesus the Messiah, “a light for the revealing of the nations” (phos eis apokalypsin ethnon, Luke 2:32); ordinarily this apokalypsis is understood to mean the teaching of the Gentiles or the suppression of spiritual darkness, the drawing back of a veil; but that is not a translation; we must translate, “a light that will reveal itself to the nations” (E. Osty). The meaning of “manifestation” is evident when the word refers to the glorious Second Coming of Christ, coming from heaven,³⁰ so that

“apocalypse” has in view the eschatological future, the object of Christian faith, and awaited even by the very creation (Rom 8:19). Its technical meaning is given in the doxology in Rom 16:25, where “the revelation of a mystery (kata apokalypsin mysteriou) kept in silence from eternity”³¹ is a divulging analogous to the gospel and the kerygma; its object is Jesus Christ, who is henceforth announced. In fact, the apostle learned the mystery and the gospel not from human teachers, but “by revelation” from God and Christ,³² so that he could put the dispensation into effect. Heavenly manifestations and apocalyptic visions were multiplied in his life precisely because he was the herald charged with proclaiming to the world the truth of the saving divine truth, with being a bearer of the light.³³ He teaches what he has received by divine revelation, and his words are a revelation for Christians, to whom he brings new knowledge: “Of what use will I be to you if I do not speak to you in revelation (en apokalypsei), or in gnosis, or in prophecy, or in instruction?” (1Cor 14:6). It is remarkable that in church meetings each one was concerned to bring to his brothers and sisters some additional light to allow them to know God better, to “disclose” him more and more: “May the God of our Lord Jesus Christ . . . grant you a spirit of wisdom and of revelation that will make you truly know him.”³⁴

It is not surprising that the name Apocalypse should have been given to books recording the revelations of prophets.³⁵ Also, the first word of the text of the Apocalypse of the apostle and prophet John (Apokalypsis Iesou Christou, Rev 1:1) serves as the title of the work: in it Christ reveals himself, makes himself known, manifests himself as Lord and Redeemer, reigning in heaven and triumphing over Satan’s last assaults on earth. The veil that hides the future is lifted to make known God’s secrets concerning the future, the events of the church’s future as discernible by Christians.

¹ C. Mugler, Terminologie optique, p. 214.

² Cf. Josephus, War 3.192; Homer, Od. 5.352: a black wave covers the white goddess (Leukothea) and hides her from Ulysses’ sight; 11.15: the Cimmerians live covered by fog and dust, which hide them from view; Pindar, Nem. 8.64: “I would like to deliver my body to the earth to cover it”; Sophocles, Ant. 28: it is forbidden for inhabitants of the city to cover the body of Polynices with a tomb; Euripides, Supp. 531: “Grant then that the earth now cover these dead”; Hipp. 712: “Let your silence cover what you have heard here”; Aristotle, HA 2.13.505: the gills of the anglerfish are not covered by a spiny operculum.

³ Homer, Il. 465: the desire of Idomeneus is “to envelop several Trojans with the darkness of night”; 17.243: “the cloud of war enveloped everything around us.”

⁴ Cf. Homer, Il. 14.438: a night hides the eyes of wounded Hector from us; 14.519; 17.136: the lion, facing the hunters, “lowers his eyelids, hiding his eyes”; 20.444; 22.466; Od. 5.293; 9.68; 12.314; Jos. Asen. 14.17: “She hid her head under a fine, lovely veil.”

⁵ At Lycosura, a rule relating to the cult of Demeter (third century BC): μηδὲ κεκαλυμμένος = hair not covered for people entering the sanctuary (Dittenberger, Syl. 999, 10 = LSCG, n. 68).

⁶ At Cos, a rule against excessive displays of mourning (fifth century BC): μὴ καλύπτειν (sc. τὸ θανόντα); Dittenberger, Syl. 1218, 7 = LSCG, n. 97, 7; cf. n. 77, C14: τὸν νεκρὸν κεκαλυμμένον φερέτω; n. 159, B 34. At Alexandria, a very damaged tombstone (third-second century); ε—κάλυψεν (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 31, 7 = SB 5004).

⁷ IGLS 2114, 6 (καλύπτει); I.Bulg. 1788, 1; cf. Josephus, War 1.671: Herod’s body was laid out covered with purple.

⁸ The opposite of the case with the compound κατακαλύπτω (cf. T. Nägeli, Wortschatz, p. 27). Moulton-Milligan gives no other reference than Ep. Arist. 87: for decency’s sake, the priests “cover themselves with tunics . . . that reach to their ankles.” We may add CPR I, 239, 5: a land covered with water; SB 10218, 15 (second century AD, badly mutilated): ε—κάλυψαν καὶ πληγαί—ς πλείσταις; P.Apoll. 69, 8 (eighth century): ἴσως ἄρα ε—κάλυψεν αὐτῶ— τοῦς τεχνίτας καμει—ν ει—ς τὸ τροχομυλόνιν.

⁹ Gen 7:19—at the deluge “all the high mountains were covered”; Exod 14:28—the waters covered the chariots and riders of Pharaoh’s whole army (15:5, 10; Josh 24:7; Ps 78:53; 104:9; 106:11; Job 22:11); Exod 16:13—the quails covered the camp (cf. 8:2, frogs); Num 22:11—the people covered the face of the country (Jdt 2:7, 19; 5:10 [famine_]; 7:18; 16:4; Josephus, War 5.352).

¹⁰ Exod 24:15-16 (Josephus, Ant. 8.346; 13.208); 40:34; Num 9:15-16; 17:7; Lev 16:13; Ezek 30:18; 32:7.

¹¹ Exod 26:13; Num 4:8-12; cf. Exod 27:2—the horns of the altar are covered with bronze; 1Kgs 7:41.

¹² Exod 28:42; Hos 2:11; Isa 20:4; Ezek 16:8; Sir 29:21; Josephus, War 5.231; Ant. 7.287: καλύπτει ι—ματίῳ. Cf. Num 16:33—“the earth covered those who were in Sheol and they disappeared from the midst of the assembly”; Ezek 24:7-8; 26:10; Ps 106:17; Job 21:26.

¹³ Isa 40:2; Job 15:27; 23:17; Ps 44:15; 69:7; Sir 16:30; Obad 10; Ezek 7:18; “the walls hide me” (Sir 23:18); “they will say to the mountains, ‘Hide us’” (Hos 10:8; Mal2:16).

¹⁴ Towers covered with fire (War 3.284; cf. 5.201, 222; Ant. 8.77, 136); the cherubim cover the ark (Ant. 7.378); they were submerged by the wave of carnage (War 3.330, 425); “he would cover this abominable crime beneath the ruins of their country” (6.217).

¹⁵ War 2.169: Pilate had the images of Caesar veiled; 3.160: “Jotapata, hidden by a circle of high mountains, was absolutely invisible”; 5.196: a concealed structure.

¹⁶ Cf. J. Chaine, L’Epître de saint Jacques, Paris, 1927; C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 2, pp. 332–338; C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, pp. 496ff. A. Perego, “I peccati sono rimessi e non coperti anche secondo il salmo 31,” in DivThom, 1960, pp. 205–215.

¹⁷ Cf. the numerous quotation of this logion in the apostolic literature, notably 1Clem. 50.5: “We are happy if we practice the commandments of God in harmony and charity, so that on account of charity our sins may be pardoned”; Did. 4.6; Clement of Alexandria, Paed. 3.12.91; Didymus, Zech. 3.219. A. Resch, Agrapha, Leipzig, 1889, pp. 129–130, 248, 249.

¹⁸ Ps 32:1, 5; 85:3; Neh 3:5. One might ask if this means the sins of the converted one or the one doing the converting. Apparently the latter, at least in 1Peter, which is addressed to “the one who loves” his neighbor. According to 1Tim 4:16, one saves oneself by saving others.

¹⁹ Dan 4:24; Tob 4:10; 12:9; Sir 3:30—“Water extinguishes a blazing fire, and almsgiving expiates sin”; 17:22.

²⁰ Xenophon, Hell. 5.4.6. Cf. Euripides, Or. 294: “Uncover yourself, brotherly head, leave your weeping there”; Polybius 4.85.6: Aratus asked, “Do not neglect any means of arriving at the truth before disclosing anything to the Achaeans”; Diodorus Siculus 17.62: “unveil his aspirations to tyranny”; T. Jud. 14.5: ἀνακάλυψα κάλλυμα ἀκαθαρσίας υἱ—ω—ν μου. Used for the opening of a parcel or package (P.Oxy. 1297, 9; letter from the fourth century) and open jars (3081, 8; third century); cf. 2195, 134: τοι—ς ἀνακαλύψασιν τὸν λάκκον τῆς μηχανῆς τοῦ κτήματος Εὐαγγελίου (sixth century).

²¹ Isa 49:9 (Hebrew galâh); Ps 18:15—“when the foundations of the earth are uncovered” (cf. P.Cair.Zen. 59497: ἡ γῆ ἀποκαλύπτεται; O.Mich. 891, 8; P.Oxy. 1833, 7); Job 12:22; 28:11—the result of an exploration is to bring to light what was hidden (cf. Philo, Dreams 1.99: the light of day brings out everything). Tobias sleeps with face uncovered (Tob 2:9); Saul’s messengers discover David’s bed (Josephus, Ant. 6.218); “It is a very distant history, buried in forgetfulness, that I want to reveal to you; I will disclose it to you in private” (Philo, Joseph 238). In a pejorative sense: in the shakings of the earth, God disfigures the face of the earth (Isa 24:1; cf. 22:8; 26:2).

²² Deut 23:1; Isa 47:2-3; Jer 13:22; 49:10; Job 41:5. Cf. Josephus, Ant. 20.108.

²³ Aristotle, Sens. 5.444b25; cf. at Epidaurus, the healing of a woman by a vision: ε—δόκει αὐται— τὰν νηδὺν ὁ θεὸς ἀγκαλύψαι (Dittenberger, Syl. 1169, 62; fourth century BC).

²⁴ Job 33:16. Cf. Tob 12:7, 11: “It is good to reveal brilliantly the works of God.”

²⁵ Joseph 90; cf. Drunkennes 139: virtue, eliminating equivocal reasonings, unveils the truth; cf. Josephus, Ant. 7.151: Nathan reveals to David the wrath of God at his crime.

²⁶ 2Cor 3:18. Cf. J. Dupont, “Le Chrétien miroir de la gloire divine, d’après II Cor. III, 18,” in RB, 1949, pp. 392–411; N. Hagedé, La Métaphore du miroir dans les Epîtres de saint Paul aux Corinthiens, Neuchâtel-Paris, 1957; J. F. Collange, Enigmes de la deuxième Epître de Paul aux Corinthiens, Cambridge, 1972, pp. 106–125; W. C. van Unnik, “‘With Unveiled Face,’ an Exegesis of II Corinthians III, 12–18,” in Sparsa Collecta, Leiden, 1973, vol. 1, pp. 194–210 (= NovT, 1964, pp. 153–169).

²⁷ If we understand κατοπτρίζομαι: “behold in a mirror” (cf. Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.101), the mirror would be Christ, filled with God’s glory; cf. A. Feuillet, Le Christ, Sagesse de Dieu, d’après les épîtres pauliniennes, Paris, 1966, pp. 115–135; B. Rey, Créés dans le Christ Jésus, Paris, 1966, pp. 194ff.

²⁸ Cf. Plutarch, Cat. Mai. 20.8: “Among the Romans, fathers-in-law would have been embarrassed to undress and appear nude before them (their sons-in-law)”; 1Sam 20:30—the shame of the unveiling (Hebrew ‘erewâh) of nudity.

²⁹ Revelacium, derived from the Latin, appeared in twelfth-century French and was used for realities divulged to people who did not know about them. To reveal is to remove the veil (obstacle) that hinders physical vision or intellectual knowledge.

³⁰ Rom 2:15; 1Cor 1:7 (Peter von der Osten-Sacken, “Gottes Treue bis zur Parusie: Formgeschichtliche Beobachtungen zu I Kor. I, 7 b–9,” in ZNW, 1977, pp. 176–199); 2Thess 1:7; 1Pet 1:7, 13; 4:13.

³¹ L.-M. Dewailly, “Mystère et silence dans Rom. XVI, 25,” in NTS, vol. 14, 1967, pp. 111–118: the mystery is God’s secret, because he had a plan in mind and said nothing about it (cf. Eph 3:9; Col 1:26; 1Cor 2:7); hence his “silence,” the opposite of announcement, communication, revelation. G. R. Beasley-Murray, Jesus and the Future, London, 1954; idem, Jesus and the Last Days, Peabody, 1993.

³² Gal 1:12; Eph 3:3. K. Kertelge, “Apokalypsis Jesou Christou (Gal. I, 12),” in J. Gnllka, Neues Testament und Kirche, pp. 266–281.

³³ 2Cor 12:1—If boasting is necessary “I shall come to visions and revelations from the Lord”; 12:7; Gal 2:2. “I went up to Jerusalem according to a revelation.” Cf. J. W. Bowker, “‘Merkabah’: Visions and the Visions of Paul,” in JSS, 1971, pp. 157–173; H. Saak, “Paulus als Ekstatiker: Pneumatologische Beobachtungen zu II Kor. XII, 1–10,” in Bib, 1972, pp. 404–410 (= NovT, 1973, pp. 153–160); J. Cambier, “Une lecture de II Cor. XII, 6–7 a: Essai d’interprétation nouvelle,” in AnBib 17, Rome, 1963, pp. 475–485.

³⁴ Eph 1:17. Cf. 1Cor 14:26—“When you meet, each one has a psalm, a teaching, a revelation, a speech in tongues.” P. Benoit, “L’Evolution du langage apocalyptique dans le corpus paulinien,” in Apocalypses et théologie de l’espérance, Paris, 1977, pp. 219–235.

³⁵ Apocalypses of Abraham, of Moses, of Baruch, etc. Apocalyptic succeeded prophetism, cf. M. J. Lagrange, Le Judaïsme avant Jésus-Christ, Paris, 1931, pp. 70–90; E. B. Allo, Saint Jean: L’Apocalypse, 3d ed., Paris, 1933, pp. xivff., xxixff.; J. B. Frey, “Apocalyptique,” in DBSup, vol. 1, col. 326–354.

κᾰμνω

kamno, to work, take pains, become weary, lose heart, be ill

kamno, S 2577; EDNT 2.248; MM 320; L&N 23.142, 25.291; BAGD 402

This intransitive verb is frequently used by Homer in the sense of “work, make an effort, take pains” a meaning attested up until the eighth century in the papyri.¹ From this meaning, it comes to signify “grow weary, tire oneself out, take great pains.” Thus Heb 12:3 cautions “lest you grow weary, becoming faint of heart, hina me kamnete tais psychais hymon eklyomenoi, ”² to which we may compare 4Macc 7:13 (Eleazar, whose “bodily strength was spent, whose muscles were flabby, whose sinews were weakened—kekmekoton —became a young man again”) or 3:8 (“when evening came, David, covered with sweat and quite exhausted, sphodra kekmekos ”). Job’s soul was tired (literally “disgusted,” Hebrew qût) of life (kamnon te psyche mou, Job 10:1). A person is tired out by effort or a sustained attempt (P.Stras. 198, 10; second century); one suffers on account of bad news (P.Michael. 29, 6; cf. BGU 884, col. I, 11); besieged people whose spirits have flagged badly take fresh courage (Diodorus Siculus 20.96). Quite often the verb is used with negation. God says: “I am the one who marked out the way that leads to heaven and blazed the trail, like a highway for all suppliant souls, so that they might not tire out as they go, hos me kamnoien badizousai ” (Philo, Post. Cain 31). “If you do not get what you are looking for on the first try, persevere tirelessly, epimene me kamnon ” (Philo, Migr. Abr. 220). Those who do not seek the truth zealously should take as their model those who are suffering physically (ton ta somata kamnonton) and who seek the care of a physician (Philo, Good Man Free 12). Moses did not let himself be worn down by Pharaoh’s threats (Josephus, Ant. 2.290, oute ekammen); from the time of Hadrian: “very light for his height, so that the one carrying him did not suffer, hos me kamnein ton phorounta auton ” (P.Giss. 47, 8). In the third-fourth century, “Your enemy does not tire of making petitions, ou kamnei de sou ho antidikos entynchanon ” (P.Oxy. 2597, 6).

Kamno finally means to suffer in the sense of being affected by an illness; hoi kamnontes = patients (Hippocrates, Acut. 1.1, 3.2, etc.), as in Jas 5:15, where the elders are called to pray over the sick person, “and the prayer of faith will save the sufferer, he euche tes pisteos sosei ton kamnonta. ” This meaning is the one found in the classical authors.³ It is current in the first century: “God offers the remedy for the salvation of the sick—pros ten ton kamnonton soterian —by applying this balm to the wounds of the soul” (Philo, Migr. Abr. 124); “physical illnesses for which one goes to a physician” (Good Man Free 12); “When his son Obime was sick (kamnontos)” Jereboam sent his wife to consult the prophet Achias;⁴ “treatment for the sick” (therapeian ton kamnonton, Musonius Rufus, p. 20, 8); “You know that my brother Marcus has many dealings with the sick and with the clinic” (tous kamnontas kai to iatrion, P.Ross.Georg. III,2, 9; cf. P.Gron.Amst. I, 11).

¹ Josephus, Life 209: “Μὴ κάμνε δὴ—do not put yourself to the trouble.” in the second century AD: “Tothes will without difficulty find the way to find me, Τοθῆς μὴ κάμνη εὕρας τὴν ὁδὸν ε—μὲ” (UPZ 78, 10); “I took a good deal of trouble for a long time for Heraïskos, πολλὰ ἔκαμνον προσκαρτερω—ν” (second aorist, P.Ross.Georg. II,31, 11). In the third century, a petition to the emperor: σωτήρων δὲ ε—μοῦ ἀνδρὸς μετρίου πολλὰ καμόντος (PSI 1422, 10); ε—γὼ γὰρ πολλὰ καμών (SB 9468, 9); κέκμηκα μετὰυτοῦ (P.Berl.Zill. 11, 11); make great efforts (P.Oxy. 2274, 6; 2596, 17); the labors of a liturgy (P.Flor. 382, 29). The senators ask the prytanes: “Labor on for us, work in a manner worthy of the past, κάμε ἄξια τοῦ ε—πάνω χρόνου” (P.Oxy. 1414, 27). In the fourth century, a letter to the abbot John: “Greet for me all of the brothers who work with you” (C.P.Herm. 8, 21; republished by M. Naldini, Il Cristianesimo in Egitto, p. 328). In the sixth century, at the entrance to the synagogue of Beth Alpha: “Let them remember the artisans who executed this work, Μνιστοῦσιν ὕ τεχνι—τε ὕ κάμνοντες τὸ ἔργον τοῦτω” (CII 1166; cf. an epigram of Ephesus in L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 4, Paris, 1948, p. 73; republished by B. Lifshitz, Synagogues juives, p. 67); a widow wants her son to be adopted by new parents, because she is alone and must labor and toil, κάμνουσα καὶ δυστηχοῦσα (P.Oxy. 1895, 6); in the seventh century, a horse is absolutely unable to work, οὐ δύνατε ὅλως κάμνι—ν (P.Oxy. 1862, 19). Between 703 and 715: “given that the caulkers who work at the shipyards of Babylon have taken flight, οἱ—καλαφάται οἱ—κάμνοντες εἰ—ς τοὺς καράβους” (P.Apoll. 9, 6; again PSI 1266, 5); “You must work on the cleaning out (of the canal) or the digging that remains to be done on this new work” (ibid. 27, 7; cf. 12, 6; 69, 9); an accounting for expenses: a subsidy for the workers (in the mines?) of Maximianopolis, τοἰ—ς καμοῦσι ε—ν Μαξιμιανοπόλει (ibid. 88, 3); P.Lond. 1414, 24, 26, 28, 76, 78, 81, 118, 149, 151, 198, 218, 304; 1436, 50. Cf. Galen: “It is a shame, when one works for years to become a good physician, orator, grammarian, mathematician, that people are never willing to work long enough at becoming a good person” (Anim. Pass. 16).

² On the supplementary participle with a verb indicating cessation of action, cf. B. G. Mandilaras, Verb, n. 891. Cf. fatigue in combatants, Diodorus Siculus 17.12.1.

³ Sophocles, Phil. 282, “when I was bitten by a snake and was suffering, no one stood by me, οὐδ’ ὅστις νόσου κάμνοντι συλλάβοιτο”; Plato, Grg. 478 a: “To whom do we take those who suffer from bodily illness? —to the physicians”; Hp. Mi. 304 a: “If each of us is sick (κεκμηκῶς), or wounded, or smitten”; Leg. 11.916 a: “If anyone has purchased a slave suffering from consumption (ε—άν τις ἀνδράποδον ἀποδω—ται κάμνον) or who has a stone or strangury or the so-called holy distemper or any other physical or mental illness”; Aristotle, HA 8.21.603a: horses that graze freely are protected from illnesses; Aristophanes, Nub. 708: “What are you suffering from? What illness? τί πάσχεις, τί κάμνεις.” —Hence the meaning “to die”: “the dead righteous person (δίκαιος κάμνων) condemns the living wicked” (Wis 4:16); “He cares nothing about having to die someday”; idols are “images of dead gods” (Sib. Or. 3.588).

⁴ Josephus, Ant. 8.266. Cf. a decree of Cos on honoraria for physicians, διὰ τὴν ε—πιμέλειαν . . . τω—ν καμνόντων (Dittenberger, Syl. 943, 10). Wettstein gives several references to the medical writers.

καπηλεύω

kapeleuo, to peddle, to traffic in something for gain

kapeleuo, S 2585; TDNT 3.603–605; EDNT 2.249; MM 321; L&N 57.202; BAGD 403

“We are not among the many who hawk the word of God about, hos hoi polloi kapeleuontes (Vulgate adulterantes) ton logon tou theou. ”¹ The verb occurs only here in the Bible. It derives from kapelos, which by contrast with emporos (a considerable merchant) normally refers to a small shopkeeper, a retailer, a reseller, a peddler, a second-hand dealer,² and by extension any trafficker or merchant;³ tradition most often makes the kapelos a wine merchant,⁴ even though this specialization is poorly attested before the first century, when it is denounced for misdeeds already noted by Isa 1:22—“hoi kapeloi sou misgousi ton oinon hydati, your kapeloi mix the wine with water.”⁵

If kapeloi have a reputation for falsifying what they sell or cheating on the price, what are we to do with the verb kapeleuo? It has the two connotations of “falsify” and “reap illicit profits,” which the commentators are wrong to separate.⁶ Moulton-Milligan, to support the sense “deal in for purposes of gain,” cite BGU 1024, col. VII, 23, referring to a prostitute: “hoti ton men bion asemnos diegen, to de telos . . . ekapeleuen, because she led an indecent life, she ended by selling . . .”; but this text is from the fourth century and contains the only occurrence of kapeleuo in the papyri.⁷

Aeschylus (Sept. 545) uses kapeleuein ten machen, meaning “do a half-way job at fighting, wage pseudo-combat”; Philo: “She who ought to share a man’s bed, not for pay like a courtesan who peddles the flower of her beauty, hos hetairan to tes horas anthos kapeleuousan” (Virtues 112); “A certain Apelles, a tragedian, who they say had in the flower of his youth peddled his beauty, ekapeleuse ten horan ” (To Gaius 203); “One hears of irregularities: businessmen and traders (emporoi and kapeloi) will for filthy lucre (glischron heneka kerdon) cross seas and traverse the whole earth” (Migr. Abr. 217). Philostratus: “This is what I have against trainers who make merchants of themselves (kapeleuonton), for they peddle the good qualities of the athletes (kapeleuosi gar pou tas ton athleton aretas) to achieve their own interests” (Gym. 45). Palladas: “Fortuna, who traffics in all of human life (Tyche kapeleuouosa) . . . who mixes and then draws off again (synkykosa kai metantlous au palin), see how she in her turn is a tavern keeper (kaute kapelos esti), not a goddess; having received from fate a profession to match her character” (Anth. Pal. 9.180). This last text emphasizes the scorn directed at the profession of kapelos; cf. Lucian: “The Phoenicians . . . you must regard them as gods, although for the most part they are mere kapeloi and fishmongers” (Tox. 4). This pejorative flavor, which St. Paul preserves, is present in all of the references just given; the love of lucre cannot be disentangled from shady dealings and guilty deeds; it is in fact their motive.⁸

It is more illuminating to follow J. J. Wettstein in tracing behind the Pauline usage the philosophical use of the term, in which the sophist is disqualified for selling his teaching. The tradition goes back to Plato: “Is a sophist not a merchant or shopkeeper (emporos tis e kapelos), selling the commodities that nourish the soul. . . . Those who peddle their knowledge from city to city, selling it wholesale and retail (polountes kai kapeleuontes) praising to their buyers all that they offer for sale” (Prt. 313 c-d). Philostratus: “he went off to buy and sell and to hackney wisdom, apege tou chrematizesthai te kai ten sophian kapeleuein ”;⁹ Lucian: “the philosophers sell their teaching like tavern keepers (hos kapeloi), and most of them (hoi polloi) mix their wine with water and misrepresent it (dolosantes).”¹⁰

We must conclude that the apostle has in mind those preachers who do not proclaim the word of God in all its purity; they alter it, falsify it by introducing elements foreign to the revelation—1Tim 1:3; 6:3 calls this heterodidaskalein —after the fashion of shopkeepers who sell adulterated goods;¹¹ by so doing, this preaching loses its power to convert and give spiritual life. This hucksterism is aimed not only at making a profit (cf. 1Cor 9:5-14) but for building a reputation, inspiring admiration, gaining personal advantages, prestige, credit, authority.

The papyri add nothing to this semantic, apart from the names of several tavern keepers or merchants.¹² In the patristic literature, theokapelos, christokapelos, kapeleuein ta theia refer to people who abuse Christianity by either falsifying or selling the truth.¹³ back-translating οἱ— πολλοί = Hebrew ha-rabbîm = the numerous, sees in the word a Qumran expression, “Une mention paulinienne des Esséniens de Qumrân,” in RevQ, vol. 20, 1966, pp. 553–567.

¹ 2Cor 2:17. The reading οι— πολλοί is perfectly attested by the best manuscripts, over against οι— λοιποί in D, E, F, L, P46, Syr.; C. Daniel,

² J. Rougé (Recherches sur l'organisation du commerce maritime en Méditerranée sous l'Empire romain, Paris, 1966, p. 266ff.) has shown that κάπηλοι also includes those who traffic in luxury items and maritime merchants; cf. Philo, Good Man Free 78. In the rescript of Pergamum (Dittenberger, Or. 484), κάπηλοι are mentioned with fishmongers (ὄψαριοπω—λαιο) and retail dealers (ε—ργασταί). Among the small merchants who fill the streets and plazas of Constantinople, Gregory of Nyssa mentions οἱ— τω—ν ι—ματίων κάπηλοι (De Deitate, PG, vol. 46, 557 b).

³ Sir 26:29—“οὐ δικαιωθήσεται κάπηλος ἀπὸ ἀμαρτίας, the shopkeeper will not be free of faults,” i.e., will not refrain from sins of injustice. The business world is full of snares; it is difficult to get rich without committing fraud and giving in to greed; cf. Jas 4:13ff.; Rev 18:1ff. B. 'Erub. 55b : “Knowledge is found neither among businessmen nor with merchants”; Pirqa 'Abot 2.6: “A person who gives himself over to business cannot remain wise.” The Vulgate translates κάπηλος by caupo, which means innkeeper, hotelier; whereas a tavern keeper is a tabernarius (cf. T. Kleberg, Hôtels, restaurants et cabarets dans l'antiquité romaine, Uppsala, 1957, pp. 1ff.). A καπηλει—ον is a tavern: ὑπὸ τὴν ἀπηλιωτικὴν στοᾶν πρὸς ἄνοιξιν καπηλείου (P.Oxy. 2109, 11, 32; cf. P.Tebt. 43, 16; SB 10465, 1; P.Lond. 2049, 4).

⁴ Κάπηλος (cf. the feminine καπηλίς, P.Fay. 12, 23) is often written without further qualification (cf. Prosop.Ptol., vol. 5, n. 13504ff.) to designate someone's profession: θήκη Σωπάτρου καπήλου (MAMA III, 184; cf. 192; σωματοθήκη—Αναστασίου καπήλου, 234; cf. 296, 474, 603. C. Naour, “Inscriptions et reliefs de Kibyratide et de Cabalide,” in ZPE, vol. 22, 1976, p. 134; cf. J and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1976, p. 513, n. 532). Often mention is made of the grain merchant, σιτοκάπηλος (P.Tebt. 120, 125; 890, 97, 179, 210); UPZ I, 8, 33); the oil merchant, ε—λαιοκάπηλος (P.Petr. III, 86, 2–4; PSI 372, 5–6; SB 7202, 18), or the wine merchant, οἱ—νοκάπηλος (cf. Prosop.Ptol., vol. 5, n. 12535–12551); but these latter retailers are also called κάπηλοι without further designation (P.Enteux. 34, 1–2; P.Oxy. 3007, 5, 16). Through their fault, soldiers go without wine: μηκέτι χορηγεῖ—σθαι αὐτοί—ς οἶνον διὰ τω—ν καπήλων (P.Tebt. 724, 6; second century BC; cf. 612: καπήλων Τεβτύνεως διὰ τω—ν οἱ—νοπρατω—ν ε—κάστου δραχμαὶ η?, first-second century). Each month, the κάπηλοι have to pay a tax (BGU 1237; from the third-second century).

⁵ Cato, Agr. 111; Martial 1.56; 3.57; Pompeian inscription: “Talia te fallant utinam mendacia, copo; tu vendas acuam et bibes ipse merum” (CIL IV, 3948); two goblets, one from Reims and the other from Amiens, bear the inscription: misce, copo (CIL XIII, 10018, 120 a-b). Hesychius defines καπηλεύει: μεταπωλει— οι—νοπωλει—, καὶ τὰ πρὸς τὰς τροφὰς καὶ πόσεις, and the Suda explains καπηλικω—ς: ἀντὶ τοῦ πανουργικω—ς: ε—πεὶ οι— κάπηλοι ὀνθυλεύουσι τὸν οἶνον, συμμιγνύντες αὐτω—σαπρόν.

⁶ Cf. the clarification of H. Windisch, “καπηλεύω,” in TDNT, vol. 3, pp. 603–605; E. B. Allo, Seconde Epître aux Corinthiens, on this verse; C. K. Barrett, A Commentary on the Second Epistle to the Corinthians, London, 1973, p. 103. H. Lietzmann (An die Korinther, 2 vols., 2d ed., Tübingen, 1923, p. 109) thought that καπηλεύω referred primarily to “gain” when the verb was used figuratively (here for spiritual realities), and that falsification was a secondary meaning.

⁷ Καπηλεύω = sell, in the record of receipts and payments of the hieropoioi at Delos in 279 BC, τω—ν οι—κημάτων ε—ν οἷς Ἐφεσος καπηλεύει.

⁸ We may use the Aristotelian definition: Retail trade is a mode of exchange “aimed at maximizing profits” (Pol. 1.9.9.1257b); “the abundance of cash is the goal of retail trade” (Pol. 1.9.10). Philo asks what profit Balaam might have derived from this sophistic art of divination whereby “he had altered the features of the prophecy inspired by God” (Change of Names 203). Cf. καπηλεία in Josephus: “the inhabitants of the Phoenician coast give themselves enthusiastically to small business and big business (περὶ τὰς καπηλείας καὶ περὶ τὰς ε—μπορίας) through their love of profits (διὰ τὸ φιλοχρηματει—ν)” (Ag. Apion 1.61). The adjective κάπηλος means “false, deceiving” and καπηλικός “mercantile” (Marcus Aurelius 4.28; SB 7612, 7, 19).

⁹ Philostratus, VA 1.13 (cited by G. Petzke, Die Traditionen über Apollonius von Tyana, p. 146); cf. Philo, Giants 39.

¹⁰ Lucian, Hermot. 59 (cf. 2Cor 4:2—μηδὲ δολοῦντες τὸν λόγον τοῦ θεοῦ); cf. Maximus of Tyre 33.8; Iamblichus, VP 34; Philo: “philosophy—not that practised by the wordmongers and sophists who sell their principles and reasonings like any other goods at the market” (Moses 2.212); cf. Spec. Laws 4.51; Change of Names 136: Judah “considers it impious to sully the divine with the profane.”

¹¹ For ways in which the flavor of wine was altered, how it was denatured, cut with seawater, perfumes, etc., cf. J. André, L'Alimentation et la cuisine à Rome, Paris, 1961, pp. 164–175; Kleberg, Hôtels, pp. 111ff.

¹² Cf. Ὠρος (P.Cair.Zen. 59297, 9; 59567, 15; 59736, 31), Σεω—τος (59450, 3), Ἡρωνος (P.Fouad 68, 5), Ἡραΐσκος (SB 9157, 15), Φμοίς (P.Tebt. 890, 29, 95, 122, 137); Μαρρέως (P.Tebt. 701, 156, cf. 833, 44; 890, 138, 224); Διόδωρος (P.Oxy. 1158, 26). On George of Korykos, both fisher and merchant (MAMA III, 279), cf. L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 11, Paris, 1960, p. 45. In the sixth-seventh century, P.Oxy. 1966, 6, 25; P.Ness. 49, 3–4; cf. εογένης (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1958, p. 186, n. 39; cf. p. 299, n. 391), Πυρουλα—ς (I.Bulg. 2078 b 3). These κάπηλοι join together to offer a dedication to the god of the city of Kendrisos, θεω— Κενδρείσω τέχνη καπήλων εὐχαριστι— (I.Bulg. 917, 4).

¹³ Cf. S. Tromp, “Χριστέμποροι καὶ θεοκάπηλοι,” in Gregorianum, 1935, pp. 452–455; G. J. M. Bartelink, “εοκάπηλος et ses synonymes chez Isidore de Péluse,” in VC, 1958, pp. 227–231.

κατάγω

katago, to lead, take, conduct, bring back, restore, return

katago, S 2609; EDNT 2.257; MM 325; L&N 15.175, 54.16; BAGD 410

This compound of ago, which has no theological meaning in the NT, rather often keeps the same meaning as the simple verb (“lead, take, conduct”),¹ notably in geometry, where it refers to “the consistent operation of tracing a line from a point toward a limit,”² and where it is often synonymous with epizeugnymi. Literally, however, it means “bring from above to below, bring down,” for example: “transport wood from the mountains to the city” (Plato, Critias 118 d), bend the branch of a young tree to the ground (Euripides, Bacch. 1065), “bend the head toward the ground” (Lam 2:10); “Michal let David down through the window”;³ and very often, go or take someone to another place: “The Philistines took Samson down to Gaza”;⁴ “Gabinus went down to Egypt” (Josephus, War 1.175); go down to Caesarea (Ant. 16.62; cf. P.Tebt. 338, 14). It is exactly in this sense that the Jerusalem brothers “took Paul to Caesarea and sent him to Tarsus” (Acts 9:30).

Katago quite often means “bring back,” for example bringing back the banished to their homes⁵ or bringing someone back to power, that is, “restore,”⁶ then “return” (Xenophon, An. 3.4.36; Philo, Cherub. 3) and “bring” or “bring back.”⁷ But the maritime meaning is the commonest from Homer on: “Ulysses sailed for Troy” (Od. 19.186); “We arrived at Geraestus” (3.178; 10.140); “they put straight in”;⁸ “ships of Alexandria ready to set out” (Philo, Flacc. 27); “the Jews who disembarked” (Philo, To Gaius 129); “He disembarked at the port of Augustus at Caesarea” (Josephus, War 1.613); “He reached Dicaearchia” (2.104; Ant. 14.378). These are just like Acts 27:3—“The following day we landed at Sidon”; 28:12—“Having landed at Syracuse, we remained there three days.”⁹

In the papyri, the meaning is almost exclusively “transport” from one place to another, generally by water (katagein apo . . . eis),¹⁰ whether the cargo is wood (SB 8242, 3), wine (6798, 28; P.Mich. 30 e, 2; PSI 1123, 6, 21), legumes,¹¹ etc., but also a man or a woman required to appear before a magistrate, as when a certain Egyptian is to appear before the chief of police (Takolkeileos ton Peunis Horou tou Angatos metros Taonnophrios katagin eis ton archephodon, P.Ryl. 681; second century); this is what we call a warrant to come before a judge, where katago then means “appear,”¹² that is, present oneself by order before a judge or court. So Acts 22:30; 23:15, 20, 28, where the usual translation is “make Paul go down before the Sanhedrin,” could strictly in the first text mean that the tribune brought Paul to the Tower of Antonia to conduct him to the place where the Sanhedrin met; but in the three other cases, the verb signifies a judicial appearance “before you as if you wanted to get more accurate information concerning his case” (23:15).

There remains the difficult text at Rom 10:6—“Do not say in your heart, ‘Who will ascend to heaven?’ that is, to bring Christ down (tout’ estin Christon katagagein), or ‘Who will go down to Sheol?’ that is, to bring Christ up from the dead.” The first words, “Do not say in your heart,” are from Deut 8:17; 9:4; “Who will ascend to heaven?” and “Who will go down to Sheol (the abode of the dead)?” are suggestive of Deut 30:12-13. But this double journey was known to the Greeks and the Romans¹³ as well as to the Hebrews,¹⁴ for whom it became a proverbial expression for something impossible,¹⁵ although God can communicate that which is inaccessible to humans. It is precisely the unbeliever who would think of climbing up to heaven to search for a Savior or going down to the abode of the dead to bring Christ back to life. In reality, for the believer whose confidence is in God, redemption is already accomplished; Christ has already come down from heaven; he has already been resurrected. Salvation is quite close at hand, and there is no need for a long journey. One has only to accept it, welcome it with an open heart.

How was St. Paul able to enunciate this truth, which is so simple, by means of so subtle an exegesis (?) of Deut 30:12-13? He was led to it by the gloss on this text in the Targum according to the recension in Codex Neofiti (Tg. Neof. fol. 432 b): “The law is not in heaven, so that you must say, ‘Can we have someone like the prophet Moses to ascend to heaven and bring it to us.’ . . . Neither is the law beyond the great sea, so that you must say, ‘Can we have someone like the prophet Jonah to go down into the depths of the sea to bring it back up to us and help us understand its precepts so that we may carry them out.’¹⁶ For St. Paul, faith puts righteousness within reach. He applies to Jesus what this targum says about Moses and Jonah, a type of Christ (Matt 12:40; Acts 7:35-39).

¹ Plutarch, Marc. 22.1 (cf. Josephus, War 3.105); Polybius 5.95.4; Gen 39:1—“Joseph was taken off to Egypt” (hophal of the Hebrew yarad); 42:20—“Take me to your brother” (hiphil of bō’); 44:21; 1Sam 30:15-16: “lead to”; 1Kgs 3:1; Josephus, War 2.175: “the water was brought a distance of four hundred stadia”; Ant. 7.80: “escort the ark to Jerusalem”; Ag. Apion 1.307: “bring into the desert.” Epitaph of a black slave: “The god brought me to Pallas the decurion as a servant from the land of Egypt” (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 26, 3); P.Hamb. 88, 7: πάντοτε κατάγεις σεαυτὸν καὶ νῦν ὡς ἄνθρωπος τέλειος γενόμενος. Cf. P. Ducrey, Le Traitement des prisonniers de guerre dans la Grèce antique, Paris, 1968, pp. 39ff.

² C. Mugler, Terminologie géométrique, p. 241. Gives numerous examples from Archimedes, Pappus, Apollonius. Cf. “Drawing from K the line segment KM equal to Θ ” (Archimedes, Sph. Cyl. 1.3); “One must draw a segment A Ξ so that joined to segment ΞP it forms an angle equal to angle KH Θ ” (Pappus, Coll. 3.71; cf. 4.76; 7.25). In particular, τεταγμένως κατάγειν means “draw the chords conjugate to a diameter of a conic”; “Since ZB is the diameter of the segment of a parabola . . . the lines AZ and ΔH are drawn to it ordinate-wise” (Archimedes, Aequil. 2.10); “Since B $\Lambda\Gamma$ is a parabola of diameter A Δ ανδ της λινεσ $\Xi\Sigma$ and B Δ are drawn ordinate-wise, the square on B Ξ is to the square on $\Xi\Sigma$ as ΔA is to A Σ ” (Archimedes, *Meth. of Mech. Theorems*4).

³ 1Sam 19:12; Judg 7:4; 1Kgs 18:40: “went down to the torrent of Kishon”; Joel 4:2, to the valley of Jehoshaphat; 1Kgs 17:23—“carried down from the upper room”; 2Kgs 11:19; Hos 7:12—“I pull them down like birds from the sky”; Ps 78:16—“He makes the waters come down like rivers” (Philo, Rewards 133: “dusty earth will fall from the sky as rain”); Sir 48:3, fire from heaven; Lam 1:13. Hence “flow,” as tears (Jer 9:17; 13:17; 14:17 Lam 1:16; 2:18; 3:48; Sir 22:19; 35:15; 38:16) or blood (Isa 63:3, 6; Hebrew shahâh, naga’), and “fall” in ruins (Sir 48:6; Amos 3:11), desolation (Jer 19:8), slavery (Josephus, Ant. 8.161; 18.357).

⁴ Judg 16:21; 1Kgs 1:33; 5:23. One descends from a horse or a carriage to take up lodging with a host: “The most distinguished people of the Lacedaemonians always go down to you” (Xenophon, Symp. 8.39); “Stephanion, to whose house they had gone down” (Philo, Flacc. 112); the angels agree to go down to Abraham’s house (Abraham 115); Josephus, Ant. 1.196, 200, 250, 278; 5.11, 139–140; 14.374; 18.109; Life 136: “the house where I stayed,” 264. Cf. Plutarch, Num. 1.1: “The genealogical tables descend from the beginning down to him.”

⁵ Plato, Menex. 242 b; Xenophon, An. 1.2.2; Gen 45:13; Philo, To Gaius 49; Josephus, War 1.111, 239, 448, 632; Ant. 13.409; 14.332; “bring peace back to our country” (Polybius 5.105.2).

⁶ Herodotus 5.92; Josephus, War 1.124, 126, 131, 169, 248; 7.300; Ant. 14; 15.105,180.

⁷ Plato, Meno 80 e: “You bring us a fine topic for sophistic disputation”; Plutarch, Lyc. 30.1: bring back gold and silver from the war; P.Yale 32, 10 (third century BC); P.Brem. 14, 17; P.Tebt. 701, 240; 783, 82; P.Mich. 601, 16; P.Warr. 21, 18; SB 6714, 14; 6722, 4; 6732, 2; P.Lond. 1945, 2: “I asked the bearer of this letter to bring us back several garments and tunics”; 1946, 4.

⁸ Od. 3.10; 11.164: “I had to sail for Hades”; Il. 5.26: “to lead the horses back to the hollow ships”; 6.53; Herodotus 4.43: “they landed with their ship”; 6.107: “They had unloaded the slaves brought from Eretria”; Sophocles, Phil. 356: “a favorable wind brought me to the sad land of Sigeum”; Xenophon, An. 5.1.11: bring commercial vessels to port”; Plutarch, Sol. 4.3: throw a net into the sea.

⁹ Cf. Luke 5:11—“Having brought the boats back to land (καταγαγόντες τὰ πλοῖα ἐπὶ τὴν γῆν), they left everything and followed him.” The verb κατάγω is used with regard to acts of violence perpetrated on ships at sea (IG, XI, 4, 1049, 6–7); an embargo is placed on the vessel (κατήγαγον τὰ πλοῖα; Ps.-Aristotle, Oec. 2.2.1346b) to force it to land or prevent its leaving; the cargo is seized as security (M. Holleaux, Etudes d'épigraphie, vol. 1, p. 371; Dittenberger, Syl. 304, 36–41; 409, 10–13; Demosthenes, Peace 5.25; Treaty Alex. 17.20; C. Poly. 50.6, 17; Chers. 8.9, 28; Lycurgus, Leoc. 18; Isocrates, C. Callim. 18.60; Aeschines, Fals. Leg. 2.71; Xenophon, An. 5.1.11–12, 15–16; Hell. 6.2.36; Polybius 3.24.6; Diodorus Siculus 14.79.7; 20.82.2). Texts noted by G.E.M. de Sainte Croix, The Origins of the Peloponnesian War, London, 1972, pp. 47, 314, and significance recognized by Julie Vélissaropoulos, Les Naoclères grecs, Geneva-Paris, 1980, pp. 151–153.

¹⁰ BGU 2270, 8; cf. 1741, 14; P.Lond. 295, 7–8 (vol. 2, p. 100); 1940, 31, 44, 78 (third century BC); 1941, 11; P.Aberd. 30, 14; P.Mich. 78, 2; 103, 6; P.Yale 38, 7; P.Wisc. 78, 31–32; P.Princ. 26, 19; 73, 7; 106, 4; P.Tebt. 753, 6; 957, 15; 1033, 13; 1102, 9; P.Oxy. 2125, 26; 2347, 8; 2926, 6; P.Oxy.Hels. 20, col. I, 10; SB 7515, 32, 71, 117, etc.; 9557, 30; 9682, 6; 10299, 106; cf. Gen 37:25.

¹¹ A prostagma of Cleopatra VII and Ptolemy XIII, from 50 BC: “No merchant who buys grain or legumes in the nomes located beyond Memphis shall bring them to Lower Egypt or transport them any more into the Thebaid under any pretext” (BGU 1730 = C.Ord.Ptol. 73, 3); “The functionaries of the royal administration . . . shall not let anything be transported without the certificates delivered by Epikydes” (P.Hib. 198 = C.Ord.Ptol. 11, 4). Cf. Josephus, War 1.299: transport grain, wine, oil, and cattle to Jericho; 4.615; 5.36; Ant. 11.78; 14.408.

¹² Cf. Josephus, War 1.652: the prefect arrests forty young people and leads them before King Herod (= makes them appear), who interrogates them; Ant. 2.120: Joseph’s brothers are conducted into his presence and expect to be accused of theft; cf. Plutarch, Aem. 38.5: take someone before the censors. Cf. in 250 BC, presents καταγόμενα τῶν βασιλειῶν εἰς τὴν θυσίαν τῶν Ἀρσινοείων (P.Lond. 2000, 3–5).

¹³ Pindar, Ol. 9.52: Hades “brings down the bodies of humans by the route that leads to the pit of the dead”; Plutarch, Num. 15.8: incantations force Jupiter to go down from heaven; Anth. Plan. 81: “Either the god descends from heaven to earth to show you his image . . . or you yourself go to see the god.” Cf. Philo, Dreams 1.57: “Bring this searcher back down from heaven; snatch him away from his studies up there”; epitaph of Sarapion, who “saw himself led to Hades by the somber Fate of death” (E. Bernard, Inscriptions métriques, n. 79, 3); CIRB 138, 4. P. Liver, “Usque ad sidera, usque ad inferos,” in Mélanges P. Meylan, Lausanne, 1963, pp. 169–182.

¹⁴ Amos 9:2—“If they ascend to heaven, I will bring them down”; Obad 3–4; Isa 26:5. In the OT, to die is to descend to Sheol: Gen 42:38; 44:29; 1Kgs 2:6, 9; Tob 3:10; 13:2; Yahweh sends down to Sheol (1Sam 2:6) or in the pit of the grave (Ps 55:23); Ps 31:17; Prov 5:5—“his feet go down to death”; 7:27; the deceased is laid in the dust of death (Ps 22:15).

¹⁵ We may cite the Babylonian Talmud: “If anyone said to a woman, ‘You shall be my fiancée if you ascend to heaven or descend to Sheol,’ that is a null condition” (b. B. Mes. 94 a); b. Git. 84a . Cf. Str-B, vol. 3, pp. 278–281; vol. 4, 2, pp. 857ff. J. Bonsirven, Exégèse rabbinique et exégèse paulinienne, Paris, 1939, pp. 306–307.

¹⁶ R. Le Déaut, Liturgie juive et Nouveau Testament, pp. 44ff. Cf. S. Lyonnet, “Saint Paul et l’exégèse juive de son temps: A propos de Rom. X, 6–8,” in Mélanges bibliques . . . A. Robert, Paris, 1957, pp. 494–506; M. McNamara, The New Testament and the Palestinian Targum to the Pentateuch, Rome, 1966, pp. 70–78

καταλλαγή, καταλλάσσω

katallage, reconciliation; katallasso, to reconcile

katallage, S 2643; TDNT 1.258; EDNT 2.261–263; NIDNTT 3.166–168; MM 329; L&N 40.1; BAGD 414 | katallasso, S 2644; TDNT 1.254–258; EDNT 2.261–263; NIDNTT 3.166–169, 171–172; MM 329; L&N 40.1; BDF §193(4); BAGD 414

For pagans and Christians alike, reconciliation is the action of reestablishing friendship between two persons who are on bad terms, to replace hostility with peaceful relations; but in the nature of the case, secular parallels can hardly shed light on the theological elaboration of so specifically Christian a reality as the reconciliation of God with humans, the immediate effect of redemption.¹ The parallels usually apply to the reestablishment of good relations in the political,² social,³ familial,⁴ or moral sphere⁵ and have to do with a change of feelings or circumstances; in banking jargon, katallage means changing one currency into another,⁶ an exchange (P.Oxy. 1937, 8; P.Corn. 3, 11; PSI 859, 4; P.Hib. 100, 4; T. Job 25, 3) or a replacement (P.Apoll. 79, 7).

Nonetheless, the contexts of these “changings” or reversals (cf. Jer 48:39) can be instructive, especially for 1Cor 7:11, where St. Paul recalls that the Lord prescribed that a woman should not separate from her husband, but in case there was a separation, the wife should not remarry but remain agamos or be reconciled with her husband, e to andri katallageto.⁷ We might compare Judg 19:2–3, where a Levite’s concubine is angry at him (orgisthe auto) and leaves him. He “went after her to speak kindly to her and reconcile her to him (tou diallaxai auten heauto) and take her back home”; 1Esdr 4:31: “if the husband feels that the wife is bitter against him, he caresses her to reconcile her to him (hopos diallage auto).” In a will from AD 96, the legator in bequeathing her house to her son asks that forty drachmas be given to his sister Tnepheros, who has a room set aside in her building, in case she is ever separated from her husband, until she is reconciled, ean apallage tou andros mechri hou . . . katallage.⁸ The best parallel is a contract from AD 124 for remarriage between two Jews; El[e_aios having formerly repudiated his wife Salome takes her back again with a dowry of 200 denarii, which he acknowledges having received: “now the same Elaios son of Simon agrees to reconcile anew and to take back the same Salome . . . as wedded wife” (nynei homologei ho autos Elaios Simonos ex ananeoseos katallaxei kai proslabesthai ten auten Salomen . . . eis gynaika gameten).⁹

In the OT, katallage in the religious sense is peculiar to 2 Macc, where the almighty, merciful God, angry at sin (2Macc 1:5; 5:20; 7:33) but hearing the prayers of his servants (1:5; 8:29), renounces his momentary wrath and is reconciled anew (palin, 7:33) and wholly (eis telos, 8:29). On the basis of this katallage, the temple is rebuilt (5:20), victory over enemies is assured (8:29), peace is guaranteed.¹⁰ The Pauline theology of reconciliation also involves the cessation of a state of hostility, which is replaced by peaceful relations and mutual agreement, but there is a profound difference: “If, while we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, how much more, now that we are reconciled, shall we be saved by his life; and not only [have we been reconciled], but we glorify God through our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom we have now obtained reconciliation.”¹¹ “God has reconciled us to himself through Christ’s mediation and has given us the ministry of reconciliation—to us who know that in Christ, God was reconciling the world to himself, taking no account of their sins, and putting in our (mouth) the word of reconciliation.”¹² “For Christ, then, we are ambassadors, seeing that it is God who exhorts through us. We implore on Christ’s behalf: be reconciled with God.”¹³ It appears from these texts that Pauline katallage is a transformation or a renewing of relations between God and humans, in accord with the framework mentioned in pagan texts:

(a) First there is a state of hostility between God and humans; the latter are designated echthroi, asebeis, astheneis (Rom 5:6), hamartoloi (verse 8), under the domination of the devil, enrolled in his army. Hence God’s anger, stirred by the offense against him (verse 10), so that the fruit of the katallage is to be saved from this avenging wrath (verse 9; Eph 2:3).

(b) God always takes the initiative in reconciliation, “not charging their trespasses to their account” (2Cor 5:19). Not only does he change his feelings, but he grants pardon to his adversaries (cf. Col 2:13-15), establishes fresh relations with humans; reconciliation is characterized by a reestablishment of peace;¹⁴ it is a “pacification.”

(c) Christ is the instrument of this reconciliation (2Cor 5:18-19), because he offered himself as a sacrifice for the expiation of the sins of the world (Rom 5:10, dia tou thanatou, through his death), which were obstacles to unity and peace (cf. Heb 9:22); and God, who willed this offering, accepted it.

(d) The apostles are the agents of the katallage, like ambassadors (presbeuomen) charged with working out a peace settlement; they actualize it and make it possible for everyone and ask each one’s consent.¹⁵ Their ministry is to promulgate and transmit the katallage —ton

logon tes katallages (2Cor 5:19-20)—which presupposes that humans must sign on for the reconciliation to be efficacious.

(e) It is for each one to accept it for himself or herself, to sign on to it: “let yourselves be reconciled with God” (2Cor 5:20), do what is necessary to that end: have faith and repent.

(f) A new state of affairs results, like a new ktisis (creation, 2Cor 5:19), a resurrection (Rom 11:15), salvation, justification,¹⁶ peace (5:1), life (5:10), and kauchema: a confident, proud, joyful assurance of beatitude (verse 11).

¹ Cf. E. G. van Leeuwen, “De καταλλαγή,” in Theologische Studien, 1910, pp. 159–171; F. Prat, La Théologie de saint Paul, 6th ed., Paris, 1923, vol. 2, pp. 257ff.; A. Nygren, Die Versöhnung als Gottestat, Gütersloh, 1932; J. Dupont, La Réconciliation dans la théologie de saint Paul, Bruges-Paris, 1953 (gives the bibliography, p. 5); L. Sabourin, Rédemption sacrificielle, Paris, 1961, p. 486 (on this word); T. W. Manson, On Paul and John, London, 1963, pp. 50ff.; F. Büchsel, in TDNT, vol. 1, pp. 254–258.

² Herodotus 5.29: “The Parians had effected a reconciliation with the Milesians in the following manner”; 5.95; 6.108: the Corinthians, chosen as arbiters, brought the Thebans and the Plateans to terms; 7.145: “the first thing to do was to put an end to the hostilities and wars”; Demosthenes, 1 Olynth. 4: the “arrangements” that Philip would like to set up with the Olynthians; Plato, Resp. 8.566 e: “When he has finished with his exiled enemies, coming to terms with some (καταλλαγή), having others destroyed, and so has quiet on that front (ἡσυχία).” Josephus, War 1.320: “Herod set out to attack Machaeras as an enemy, but he mastered his anger . . . when [Machaeras] had reflected on his faults, he succeeded in reconciling with him (ε—αυτω— διαλλάττει)”; cf. Matt 5:24; Epictetus 1.15.6: “if my brother is not willing to be reconciled (μη διαλλασσομένου).”

³ Herodotus 1.61: “He reconciled himself with the men of his party”; Aristotle, Oec. 2.15a1348b: “Aristoteles of Rhodes, having received (money) from both sides, managed to reconcile the two rival factions.” A law of Ilion against tyrants and oligarchy: “Murder cannot be compensated for either by marriage or by money” (Dittenberger, Or. 218, 105; third century BC, cf. RIJG, vol. 2, p. 30, whose editors observe that no case of a settlement through marriage is known but cite Aristotle, Ath. Pol. 14.4: “Megacles, being hard-pressed . . . came to terms with Pisistratus, on the condition that the latter should marry his daughter”). Cf. Moses’ intervening with the two Israelites who were fighting, συνήλλασεν αὐτοὺς εἰ—ς εἰ—ρήνην (Acts 7:26).

⁴ Josephus, Ant. 7.184: an old woman bids David be reconciled with Absalom and give up his anger against him; cf. 7.196; 6.353; 11.278 (Malichus and Antipater). In Acts 12:22, with respect to Herod, D adds καταλλαγέντος δὲ αὐτοῦ τοι—ς Τυρίου ὁ δὲ δῆμος ε—πεφώνει; Philo, Drunkness 208 (Pharaoh and his cupbearer); Joseph 99, 156; 237, 262 (Joseph and his brothers); Flacc. 76. Some reconciliations are sham (Flacc. 19), others in good faith (Joseph 265); the latter belong to grateful souls (Virtues 118) who seek restoration to grace (Virtues 124) and want to make peace (151).

⁵ Plato, Phd. 69 a: “not the correct method of exchange: exchanging pleasure for pleasure, pain for pain . . .”; Philo, Rewards 166: those who scorn the holy laws of justice and piety (162), should they be slaves of enemies who have carried them off to captivity (164), “shall make use of three advocates for their reconciliation with the Father”; Alleg. Interp. 3.134: “They reconciled themselves and made a truce with the passions, setting conciliatory reason at the fore.”

⁶ This is the most common meaning in the papyri, P.Lond. 1457, 9, 58, 87, 125; P.Corn. 3, 11, 14; P.Hib. 51, 6; P.Cair.Zen. 59320, 21. εἰ— δ ἄν καταλλάσσει in a regulation from Tegea in the fourth century BC, concerning pasture land (cf. LSCG, n. 67, 2) seems to mean “if he substitutes” scrawny beasts for others in the sacred pasture, rather than “if he surpasses” the number; cf. J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1948, p. 155, n. 74; 1953, p. 139, n. 80.

⁷ Cf. D. W. Shaner, A Christian View of Divorce, Leiden, 1969, pp. 57ff. M. Humbert, Le Remariage à Rome, Milan, 1972. The separation could be legal separation or merely casual; χωρισθῆναι can be synonymous with “divorce,” and the wife can take the initiative, cf. C. Vatin, Recherches sur le mariage et la condition de la femme mariée à l’époque hellénistique, Paris, 1970, pp. 165ff. J. Gaudemet, L’Eglise dans l’Empire romain, Paris, 1958, pp. 540ff. H. Crouzel, “Les pères de l’église ont-ils permis le remariage après séparation?” in Bulletin de littérature chrétienne, 1969, pp. 3–43.

⁸ P.Oxy. 104, 27 (the papyrus is mutilated; cf. H. C. Youtie, Scriptiunculae, vol. 1, pp. 380–382); cf. 1477, 6 (third-fourth century), in which a slave asks an oracle, εἰ— καταλλάσσομαι εἰ—ς τὸν γόνον; will his master reunite him with his children? P.Lond. 1735, 11 (sixth century).

⁹ P.Mur. 115, 5 = SB 10305. The editors note that instances of remarriage were rare (BGU 1101; from 13 BC; P.Oxy. 1473; from the third century AD), but that it was permitted if the repudiated and restored wife had not in the meanwhile belonged to another man (Deut 24:1ff.; 2Sam 3:14ff.; Hos 3:1ff.). It seems that the verb καταλλάσσειν, “put an end to enmity, restore peace,” was used especially for reconciliation between husband and wife: “Cnemon is reconciled with his wife (κατηλλάγη)” whom he had left (ἀπελείφθη) on account of her character (Menander, Dysk., Prologue 9; cf. line 2); Josephus, Ant. 5.137 (the Levite from Ephraim is reconciled with his wife who had been angry with him and sought shelter with her family); 11.195: Artaxerxes still ardently loved Vashti, whom he had had to send away, but the law forbade him to reconcile with her; Philo, Spec. Laws 3.31: If a divorced woman is remarried and goes back to her first husband, and he is willing to make peace with such a woman, “For such subsequent reconciliations are proofs of both [adultery and pandering]. The proper punishment for him is death and for the woman also” (LCL).

¹⁰ 2Macc 1:1, 5. Secular texts are not devoid of an awareness of religious reconciliation. Ajax, weighed down by the anger of the gods, strives to be reconciled with them through expiatory rites (Sophocles, Aj. 744; cf. Aeschylus, Sept. 767). Samuel prays God to be reconciled with Saul (Josephus, Ant. 6.143; cf. 7.153; P.Oxy. 1477, 6), the Jews appeal to the Lord to be reconciled with his servants (2Macc 8:29); cf. Josephus, War 1.320.

¹¹ Rom 5:10-11; cf. 11:15—“If their rejection (the ἀποβολή of Israel) meant the reconciliation of the world, what will their reintegration (ἡ πρόσλημψις) mean, if not a resurrection of the dead?”; which can be taken as referring to the consummation of the universe, the coming of a new world (M. J. Lagrange, on this text), or of the large-scale conversion of the Jews, coming back to life by faith (F. J. Leenhardt, Romans, pp. 284–285); cf. Col 1:21, ἀποκαταλλάξαι (B. N. Wambacq, “Per eum reconciliare ... quae in coilis sunt,” in RB, 1948, pp. 35–42; J. M. Robinson, “A Formal Analysis of Colossians I, 15–20,” in JBL, 1957, pp. 270–287).

¹² 2Cor 5:18-19. For the construction, cf. E. B. Allo, Seconde Epître aux Corinthiens, pp. 169ff.

¹³ 2Cor 5:20; the aorist passive imperative must be retained—καταλλάγητε τω θεω—against D, E, G, Goth, καταλλαγήναι; cf. V. Taylor, Forgiveness and Reconciliation, London, 1946, pp. 72–82; B. Cohen, “Arbitration in Jewish and Roman Law,” in RIDA, 1958, pp. 165–223.

¹⁴ Col 1:20; Eph 2:15-16 (ἀποκαταλλάσσω); cf. M. Barth, Ephesians, vol. 1, pp. 265ff.

¹⁵ Cf. J. Murphy O'Connor, Paul on Preaching, pp. 85ff.

¹⁶ On the relationship between καταλλαγή and δικαιοσύνη, cf. R. Bultmann, Theologie des Neuen Testaments, Tübingen, 1948, p. 281 = ET Theology of the New Testament, trans. Kendrick Grobel, New York, 1951, vol. 1, pp. 285ff.; L. Cerfaux, Le Christ dans la théologie de saint Paul, Paris, 1951, pp. 110ff.; T. W. Manson, On Paul and John, pp. 54ff.

καταναρκάω

katanarkao, to burden, to benumb

katanarkao, S 2655; EDNT 2.265; MM 330; L&N 57.224; BDF §181; BAGD 414–415

The simple verb narkao, “become numb, paralyzed,” is used of sinews (Gen 32:26, 33), arms (Dan 11:6), the mass of “crippled” bone (Job 33:19, Theodotion) that precludes movement and confines to bed.¹ Hippocrates observes that the patient is susceptible to paralysis and coma, together with a lack of feeling (Hippocrates, Liqu. 1.3), and that “a large quantity of cold water dulls the pain” (6.2–3).

The compound katanarkao also belongs to the medical vocabulary,² but St. Paul, in three occurrences of the word, gives it an active sense, unusual in Greek literature—and also figurative: ou katenarkesa outhenos (2Cor 11:9), ou katenarkesa hymon (12:13), ou katanarkeso (12:14). Most modern versions translate: “I avoided being a burden to you . . . I was not a burden to you . . . I will not burden you.” They are following the Vulgate (nullus onerosus fui) and the Peshitta, Chrysostom, and Theodoret, who see the word as a synonym of baryno. This is also in line with St. Jerome’s identification of the usage as a Cilicium.³ It is indeed possible that from the meaning “be numb and dull” there was a transition to “be inactive, burdensome.” The apostle would mean that his presence at Corinth was not taxing for the community.

But LSJ translates “to be slothful” (cf. Hesychius, narke-okneria). E. B. Allo better follows the medical meaning “anaesthetize,” proposing, for lack of a better translation, enjōler.⁴ The verb is unknown in the papyri.

¹ A slackening of the vital forces exhausts the inordinate strength of the passions (Philo, Rewards 48). The substantive νάρκα, νάρκη, “numbness, lethargy” (cf. the “torpedo” fish, Hippocrates, Vict. 48.2; cf. in modern Greek ναρκοτικός, “soporific”) used similarly for arms that can no longer hold a sword (Aristophanes, Vesp. 713), for body parts that have no tendons and are not subject to numbness (Aristotle, HA 3.5.515b); cf. Marcus Aurelius 10.9: “the low comedy (of life), war, fear, lethargy (νάρκκα), slavery will negate in you all these sacred principles.” A. Lobeck (Phrynichi Eclogae nominum et verborum atticorum, 2d ed., Hildesheim, 1965, p. 331) cites: Τόλμη καὶ τόλμα, πρύμνη καὶ πρύμνα, νάρκη δὲ διὰ τοῦ η, and Menander (cf. D. B. Durham, Vocabulary of Menander, p. 80).

² Hippocrates, Epid. 6.7.3: “It is necessary through change to stir up timid, benumbed (κατανεναρκωμένους) individuals to the things that they are neglecting”; cf. J. J. Wettstein.

³ St. Jerome, Epist. 121.10, to Algasia: “There are numerous expressions that the apostle uses familiarly, following usages peculiar to his city or his province. As examples, I would cite . . . ‘I speak according to human language, ἀνθρώπινον λέγω,’ and οὐ κατενάρκησα ὑμα—ς, i.e., ‘I was not a burden to you.’ . . . These expressions and many others are used, even in our day, by the Cilicians. We should not be surprised if the apostle uses idioms from the language in which he was born and raised.”

⁴ [The French enjôler, etymologically “imprison,” means “beguile, wheedle, cajole, bamboozle, coax.”—Tr.] “We may think of those thieves of our day who chloroform their victims in order to be able to work without trouble or discussion; the equivalent that I have come up with, enjôler, is rather weak” (E. B. Allo, Seconde Epître aux Corinthiens, p. 283).

καταντάω

katantao, to arrive at, reach

katantao, S 2658; TDNT 3.623–625; EDNT 2.265; NIDNTT 1.324–325; MM 330; L&N 13.16, 13.121, 15.84; BAGD 415

Unknown in classical Greek and in the Gospels, quite rare in the inscriptions, but common in Polybius, Diodorus Siculus, and the papyri, this verb, which means “arrive at, reach, come to, end up at,” is sometimes used literally, sometimes metaphorically. In the first case, someone goes to a certain place or city, or to see a certain person: “which brought him to Jerusalem” (2Macc 4:21), “the king came to Tyre” (verse 44); Paul arrived at Derbe and Lystra (Acts 16:1; cf. 18:19, 24; 20:15; 21:7; 25:13; 27:12; 28:13); katantan eis to gymnasion = come to the gymnasium;¹ one sojourns at a place that is the terminus of a march or a voyage.

In the figurative sense, the idea of movement or change is often preserved,² with the suggestion that the event happens at the desired moment, at a named point, as if following a trajectory; or that the person obtains what he or she was counting on (“he had himself named high priest,” 2Macc 4:24), achieves his or her goal.³ If the subject is a thing, it comes to a certain person—“Is it to you alone that the word of God has come?”⁴—and the verb katantao, used in legal texts, especially in wills, often means “fall one’s lot” or, as we would say, “devolve.”⁵ 1Cor 10:11 has often been understood in this sense: “We, upon whom the consummation of the ages has come,” like the receiving of an inheritance; but the idea is more that of an encounter⁶ or a confrontation. Circumstances evolve. We read concerning a small group of artisans that they would consider it a simple wish to be able to “arrive at” fulfilling the orders they have received (P.Phil. 10, 6), or that “the quite large number of inhabitants that used to live in these towns have today reached the point of being only a few, nynei katentesan eis oligous.”⁷ Or one may hope to benefit from help received,⁸ BGU 1821, 22: δυνηθεῖς κατήντηκα ἐπὶ τὴν ἐκ σοῦ βοήθειαν; cf. 1843, 15; 1857, 5. {NOTEEND} which would vindicate the step of approaching someone to ask for relief. It is in this sense that the body of Christ is built and that all believers should arrive at (katantesomen hoi pantes, Eph 4:13) true unity. The goal is set, the people of God aim toward it, are moving toward this end, which has not yet been attained. The goal is the encounter with the bridegroom, Christ, but also an inheritance; and also entrance into a place—Paradise.

² I.Priene 112, 987; cf. P.Tebt. 59, 3 (first century BC); P.Oxy. 486, 30; BGU 1768, 8; 1873, 7: καταντήσας οὖν πρὸς τὸν γεωργὸν Παποντω—ν; P.Fouad 23, 5: “having declared under oath to the strategos of the Arsinoite that I myself would be present there (καταντήσαι ἐ—νθάδε) the twenty-fourth of this month”; 24, 9: “I undertook to go to Alexandria”; P.Brem. 37, 6; 48, 3; P.Mich. 506, 3: “We should go there, since he is a close friend”; SB 4084, 4: “Having reached the goddess Isis, I performed this act of adoration”; P.Petaus 84, 17: εἰ—ς τὴν ἡμετέραν κώμην καταντήσει (AD 185); Enoch 17.6: “I saw all the great rivers and reached to the great darkness”; Diodorus Siculus 4.52: “The Argonauts went to the palace.”

³ Cf. 2Sam 3:29—“May the blood of Abner fall on (Hebrew hûl) the head of Joab.”

⁴ 2Macc 6:14—“The sovereign Master is letting the nations reach the full measure of their iniquity before punishing them”; Acts 26:7—the twelve tribes hoped to obtain God’s promise; Phil 3:11—“to attain, if possible, to the resurrection of the dead”; cf. Josephus, Ant. 3.246: each day cattle are sacrificed until the number seven is reached.

⁵ 1Cor 14:36; cf. PSI 101, 13: a tax levy “falls on” three taxpayers: εἰς—μόνους κατηντηκέναι ἄνδρας γ?; 102, 10; 105, 8; P.Oxy. 75, 5: ἀπογράφομαι ε—πὶ τοῦ παρόντος ἀπὸ τῶν κατηντηκότων εἰς με; 248, 11; 274, 19 (first century AD); BGU 1169, 21 (first century BC); SB 9531, 4: εὐθέως λαβὼν τὸ ε—πιστόλιον κατάντησον πρὸς με ἀναγκαίως; 9317 a 4: προσαπογράφομαι τὸ κατηντηκὸς εἰς με ε—ξ ὀνόματος τῆς μητρός μου; b 16.

⁶ P.Mich. 175, 11; PSI 942, 16; 1255, 20; C.P.Herm. 25, 7; Pap.Lugd.Bat. I, 1, 23; XIII, 14, 25; P.Lund IV, 7, 14; cf. BGU 326, 12: καταντήσαι θέλω; P.Stras. 277, 23.

⁷ Cf. Polybius 4.26.5: the Aetolian leaders appointed a day to meet Philip at Rhion.

⁸ SB 7462, 8 (petition from the time of Nero from six poll-tax collectors in the towns); cf. 8070, 8; 9344, 14; P.Mich. 577, 11. Cf. Polybius 4.34.2: “an excess of boldness does no good”; in rhetoric: “we have arrived at the fall of Cleomenes, king of Lacedaemonia” (Polybius 4.1.8).

καταρτίζω

katartizo, to make, prepare, restore, establish see also ε—ξαρτίζω, καταρτίζω

katartizo, S 2675; TDNT 1.475–476; EDNT 2.268; NIDNTT 3.349–350; MM 332; L&N 13.130, 42.36, 75.5; BDF §§74(1), 126(1a); BAGD 417–418

Derived from artios (“complete, perfect, suitable, exactly fitted”), the compound *katartizo*¹ is a technical term of primitive parenesis. Its range of meanings, both extended and homogeneous, is well indicated by the variety of Hebrew words that it translates in the LXX: pa’al, “do, make, prepare” (Exod 15:17; Ps 68:29); pelal, “finish, complete, restore” (2Esdr 4:12–13, 16; 5:3, 9, 11; 6:14); yasad, “found, establish, or ordain, decree” (Ps 8:3; cf. shat, Ps 11:4); tamaḵ, “hold, uphold, keep” (Ps 17:5); shawâh (in the piel), “equalize, make level, place” (Ps 18:34); hûl (in the piel), “be in labor, writhe with anguish” (Ps 29:9); kûn (in the niphal), “establish, strengthen, found, or prepare, dispose” (Ps 68:10; 74:16; 89:38); kanan, “designate” (Ps 80:16). From the etymology and usage of the word, its basic sense is to put in or restore to a condition, to make an object fit for its purpose, prepare it and adapt it to its usage, hence to adjust and perfect.

This arranging or adapting to an end applies to things, to persons, or to members of a society.² The verb is used:

(1) of a founding or creating, notably by God, who “founded” the sun (or the light, B, S) and the moon (Ps 74:16); “By faith, we understand that the worlds were organized (set in order, arranged, ornamented) by a word from God”;³ “the god of gods, who founded the world” (ho theos ton theon, ho ton kosmon katartisamenos, Pap.Graec.Mag. 4, 1147; vol. 1, p. 112), who puts his might to work (Ps 68:29), establishes his laws (Ps 11:4), arranges or prepares his dwelling place in the midst of his people (Exod 15:17), mends or protects the vine that he has planted (Ps 80:16), causes or prepares the deer to give birth (Ps 29:9). It is also used for the great king in Israel who built the temple and finished it for them (okodomesen auton kai katertisato auton autois, 2Esdr 5:11; cf. 6:14). Finally, God “fashions” praise from the mouths of infants.⁴

(2) for a strengthening or sustaining, as of a worn down people (Ps 68:10), of the conduct of the faithful (Ps 17:5) whose energy and agility are restored (Ps 18:34), of a dynasty that will endure forever (Ps 89:38).

(3) in architecture, of restored walls of a city or of a sanctuary (2Esdr 4:12–13, 16; 5:3, 9); BGU 1854, 3: “to restore to the temple of the city of Herakles” (katartisasthai eis to en Herakleous polei hieron, AD 8).

(4) of the master of a house who offers a room to a guest and prepares it, makes it comfortable and suits it perfectly for the well-being of the guest.⁵

(5) when a woman has assembled the pieces of fabric for making a garment; the finished work is “ready to wear.”⁶

(6) when the mistress of a house has prepared a meal for the family; she says that “it is ready” to eat (Dioscorides).

(7) when a pharmacist has, thanks to a successful mixture of ingredients, made a potion to heal a sick person; he describes the result as katartismos: its composition is perfect, the remedy is ready to take (“prepare disks weighing precisely one drachma in the scale,” katartizoio de kyklous drachmaious platingi diakridon arthos eryxas, Nicander, Ther. 954; second century BC).

(8) in medicine, for the surgeon or bonesetter who puts a dislocated member back in place, thus restoring to the patient the use of the arm or leg.⁷

(9) of the potter who has formed a vase that is ready to be delivered and suited for a certain use.⁸

(10) of the sailor who outfits his boat, the admiral who arms a fleet that is ready to set sail, the general who equips an army that is ready to set out on a campaign.⁹

(11) of the fisherman who, returning from fishing, repairs his nets, putting them in order for reuse (Matt 4:21; Mark 1:19).

(12) of the treasurer who is in a position to make a payment.¹⁰

(13) of the educator who, having given a complete paideia to the child, can leave him to lead an adult life.¹¹ In this sense, “if someone should be taken in a fault, you, the spiritual ones, set him right (reclaim, restore: katartizete ton tououton) with a spirit of gentleness” (Gal 6:1); “we ask with great urgency that we may see you again and mend the deficiencies (fill in the gaps) of your faith (katartisai ta hystere mata tes pisteos hymon, ” 1Thess 3:10); Christian discipleship implies mending one’s ways (cf. Ep. Arist. 144: tropon exartismon).

(14) in political language: to calm, appease the factions, restore unity.¹² While there were divisions (schismata) in the Corinthian community, Paul exhorts the believers to be reconciled in one and the same Spirit, to maintain harmony between one another (1Cor 1:10). The passive imperative katartizesthe in 2Cor 13:11 can be translated with the same nuance: “come to an agreement among yourselves” with no element of discord, or “work at restoring yourselves”; that is, let yourselves be brought to a place of completeness, of perfection.¹³

In all these usages and on all levels, the idea of setting in order and arranging is overshadowed by that of adapting to an end,¹⁴ as is apparent in Heb 13:21—“may the God of peace make you ready for all good work to do his will”—and 1Pet 5:10—“The God of all grace . . . will himself equip you (autos katartisei), will strengthen you (sterixei), will fortify you, establish you.”¹⁵ We may conclude that katartizein is a major element in the paideia of the primitive church and—especially in St. Paul—in “edification,” that the Christian life involves steady progress in preparation for glory, or the restoration and reordering of whatever is deficient either in one’s personal life or in one’s relations with one’s neighbor.

¹ Verbs in -ιζω are quite common in the NT. A list of them and their various modes of formation from nouns, adjectives, adverbs, prepositions, verbs, etc., is given by J. H. Moulton, W. F. Howard, Grammar, vol. 2, pp. 406–410, who observe that the meaning of these verbs often depends on context.

² The best study of that of H. T. Kuist, “Now the God of peace . . . make you perfect,” in Biblical Review, 1932, pp. 249–253, revised in Exegetical Footnotes to the Epistle to the Hebrews, New York, n.d., pp. 16–19; cf. W. Barclay, NT Wordbook, pp. 67–68.

³ Heb 11:3. Cf. A. G. Widdess, “A Note on Hebrews XI, 3,” in JTS, 1953, pp. 326–329; L. H. Taylor, The New Creation, New York, 1958, p. 80; K. Haecker, “Creatio ex auditu: Zum Verständnis von Hebr. XI, 3,” in ZNW, 1969, pp. 279–281.

⁴ Ps 8:3; messianic interpretation in Matt 21:16; cf. S. Légasse, Jésus et l'enfant, pp. 260ff.

⁵ Cf. the letter of 112 BC to prepare the reception of the senator Lucius Memmius on his visit as a tourist to the Fayum; the local authorities must see to the outfitting of his guest room, τὰ εἰς τὸν τῆς ἀύλλης καταρτισμόν (P.Tebt. 33, 12; republished, G. Milligan, Selections from the Greek Papyri, Cambridge, 1927, n. 11). At Antalya, in Pisidia, a dedication to Men lists the furnishings consecrated to the god: “two beds with bedding, κλείνας δύο σὺν τῷ καταρτισμῷ,” i.e., mattresses, pillows, and the frame to hold them, cf. J. and L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 9, Paris, 1950, p. 41.

⁶ A letter from Apollonius in the first century AD: ἃ ε—δωρήσατό σοι Παισανίας ὁ ἀδελφός σου πρὸ πολλοῦ ε—κ φιλοτιμίας αὐτοῦ καταρτισμένα (P.Oxy. 1153, 16); the preparation of warp and woof for a cloak for 18 silver drachmas: ἰ—ματίου καταρτισμόν κρόκης καὶ στήμονος ἄξιον ἀργυρίου δραχμῶ—ν ἡ? (P.Ryl. 127, 28; from AD 29); ἔδωκα εἰς καπάνην τοῦ καταρτισμοῦ δρ. δ? = I gave four drachmas for the cost of the preparation of the wool (P.Oxy. 2593, 17; from the second century).

⁷ In the first century BC, Apollonius of Citium, ed. J. Collesch, F. Kudlien, Kommentar zu Hippokrates, Berlin, 1965 (index, under this word); Galen 19, p. 461 (ed. Kühn). Cf. Heb 10:5—“You have prepared a body for me” (= Ps 40:7—ὠτία; cf. C. Spicq, Hébreux, vol. 2, p. 305).

⁸ Rom 9:22-23 —“God bore with great and long patience the vessels of wrath, prepared for perdition (κατηρτισμένα εἰς ἀπώλειαν), and in order to make known the wealth of his glory through the vessels (objects of mercy) that he prepared for glory (ἃ προητοίμασεν εἰς δόξαν).” The “hard” interpretation takes the vessels as having been “arranged by God,” fashioned by him for perdition, as were the just for glory, and thus makes κατηρτισμένα strictly parallel with προητοίμασεν. A more subtle explanation takes κατηρτισμένα as a middle participle: the vessels have prepared themselves (Chrysostom). It is better to follow an intermediate course: God did not prepare the vessels so that they might be destroyed; there is no predestination to perdition; but sinners are in the condition of being destroyed, they are “on the verge,” ripe for perdition; cf. M. J. Lagrange, Romains, p. 240; F. Leenhardt, Romans, p. 258.

⁹ Herodotus 9.66: Artabazus places himself at the head of these men who are “in formation” (for combat); Polybius 1.21.4: “when they had put the troop in a state of readiness”; 1.21.1: “the Romans having outfitted the captured ships”; 3.95.2: “Hasdrubal, after equipping the thirty vessels left by his brother”; cf. P.Panop.Beatty 1, 167: put a ship back in shape (ε—ξαρτισθῆναι), 173, 181; 2, 17: prepare the boat with its full rigging, καὶ πάσῃ ε—ξαρτεία παρασκευασθέντα.

¹⁰ P.Tebt. 6, 7; 24, 48; Dittenberger, Or. 177, 10 (95 BC = SB 8886); 179, 9 (= SB 8888).

¹¹ Plutarch, Alex. 7; Them. 2.7. Cf. Luke 6:40—“Every disciple who is well trained (and well instructed) will be like his master”; cf. H. Schürmann, Lukasevangelium, p. 368): ausgebildet. Cf. 2Tim 3:17—the man of God, instructed in Holy Scripture, is “accomplished” or “well equipped, well put together” (ἄρτιος), perfectly outfitted (ε—ξηρτισμένος) for every good work.

¹² Cf. Herodotus 5.28: Miletus had suffered from strife for two generations “until the Parians had restored order there, κατήρτισαν.”

¹³ Cf. Dittenberger, Or. 177, 10 = SB 8886 (cf. 8888, 8–9), where the verb is construed with an infinitive (κατηρτίσατο δίδοσθαι), translated by E. Bernand: “est convenu de donner” (“was agreed to give”); this has to do with a compromise between the financial administration of the meris and the priests of the temple of Soknopaiou Nesos (Fayoum, p. 134).

¹⁴ Cf. Eph 4:12—The whole organization of the church is ordained “for the preparing (literally the getting just right) of the saints for the work of ministry, πρὸς τὸν καταρτισμὸν τῶ—ν ἁγίων,” making them fit for service, in a position to work in their positions and according to their abilities (or gifts) for the building up of the body of Christ (cf. N. Hugedé, Ephésiens, p. 162); cf. προκαταρτίζειν, 2Cor 9:5.

¹⁵ The last verb is omitted by A, B, Old Latin, Vulgate, etc. Cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, p. 123.

καταφεύγω

katapheugo, to flee, take refuge

katapheugo, S 2703; EDNT 2.270; MM 334; L&N 15.62, 21.15; BAGD 420

It is hardly possible to specify whether, in its two NT occurrences, this verb means “flee” or “take refuge.” According to Acts 14:6, in the face of the pagan and Jewish uprising against them at Iconium, Paul and Barnabas kataphygon eis tas poleis, fled to or took refuge in the cities of Lyconia—Lystra, Derbe—and the surrounding area. Moderns take this to mean that they “went to seek refuge in” these cities, but in that case en rather than eis would be expected; in addition, it is surprising that of the several “cities of refuge” mentioned, one, namely Lystra, should be the place where Paul was stoned and left for dead.¹ So it seems preferable to say that the apostles fled, ran away from Iconium,² even though this meaning is less attested.³

In the papyri and the inscriptions, katapheugo is a kind of technical term used by those who present an appeal to the emperor,⁴ to the king, the prefect, the strategos, a magistrate. The appeal may be made by a widow who is shabbily treated (kataphronon), “thus, after appealing to you, O king, I shall receive justice” (P.Magd. 2, 8; from the third century BC; cf. P.Hib. 238, 10); or by weavers seeking exemption from public service: “anankaios epi se katephygamen, by necessity we have appealed to you” (P.Phil. 10, 13; from AD 139; cf. SB 10195, 12); or by plaintiffs who place themselves under the protection of a magistrate (P.Oxy. 2131, 7; C.P.Herm. 19, 9, 12; BGU 2061, 8; SB 9897, recto 9). All of them emphasize their need for help (P.Oslo 22, 12: “epi se katapheugo asthenes kai aboethetos, I flee to you weak and helpless”; from the second century AD; P.Tebt. 327, 28; P.Cair.Zen. 59447, 10; 59852, 10), which is why⁵ they appeal with fervor (spoudazo, SB 9886, 5; espeusa, P.Fouad 26, 34) and humility (P.Mich. 529, 13: “katephygon epi tas podas sou, deomenos, I have fled to your feet, pleading”) to a superior whom they describe as “benefactor of all people” (P.Oxy. 2342, 37; cf. PSI 1323, 4; SB 10196, 43), “savior” (P.Mich. 422, 32), “savior of all people” (P.Tebt. 769, 87; P.Fouad 26, 50; P.Mich. 174, 18; P.Oxy. 2563, 46; P.Cair.Zen. 59421, 9; 59618, 7); they appeal to his nobility (epi ten sen andreian katapheugo tharron, P.Oxy. 1468, 9; PSI 1337, 17) and to his power (P.Tebt. 326, 4; P.Cair.Isid. 66,16).

The persecuted, the oppressed, and fugitives seek refuge, security, and justice either with an authority (Josephus, War 1.131; Life 113), or in a place,⁶ notably in a temple that has the privilege of inviolability.⁷ This custom perhaps allows us to specify the sense of the aorist participle “hoi kataphygontes, we refugees,” in Heb 6:18, which could be seen as a term for Christians.⁸ Analogous to οἱ—πιστεύσαντες (Heb 4:3), οἱ—σωζόμενοι (Acts 2:47), οἱ—φρουρούμενοι (1Pet 1:5), κλήσεως ε—πουρανίου μέτοχοι (Heb 3:1). The Habiru are refugees (cf. L’Etranger {Recueils de la société Jean Bodin, vol. 9, 1} Brussels, 1958, p.112).

They are, after all, exiles and pilgrims on this earth,⁹ whose hope of heaven has all the appeal of a city of refuge or place of asylum.¹⁰ This figurative meaning can be compared to the Philonian framework, with which this epistle—addressed, it would seem, to a group of persecuted exiles—has so many other points of contact: “The law permitted a murderer to take refuge (katapheugein) not in the temple, since he was not yet purified . . . but in a holy city, an intermediate place between the temple and profane soil, a sort of secondary temple. . . . The law aims to take advantage of the prerogatives of the city of reception to assure the refugee (to kataphygonti) of the most secure safety (bebaiotaten asphaleian).”¹¹ “Those who do not have a solid faith in God their Savior first of all seek refuge in the help of creatures (katapheugousin epi tas en genesei boetheias) . . . ; then if someone says to them, ‘Fools! Seek refuge with the only physician for the diseases of the soul (katapheugete . . . epi ton monon iatron psyches)’ . . . in spite of them, the wretches turn late and not without trouble to seek refuge with the only Savior, God (katapheugousin . . . epi ton monon soteran theon).”¹²

² Acts 14:19. Cf. E. Jacquier, Actes, on this text, who cites the translation of the Peshitta, “discesserunt et fugierunt,” and of the Harclean Syriac, “et fugientes pervenerunt in Lycaoniam.”

³ Cf. Gen 19:20—“This city here is close by for fleeing to . . . let me run away to it.” Καταφεύγω translates the Hebrew nûs, “flee, run away”; in the piel and in the hiphil: “put to flight.” It is also translated (other than by φεύγω and its derivatives—διαφεύγω, ε—κφεύγω) by ἀναχωρέω, “pull back, withdraw, go away from” (Judg 4:17; 1Sam 19:10; 2Sam 4:4; Ps 114:5).

⁴ Cf. Josephus, War 1.32; 6.201: “Maria, daughter of Eleazar, fled to Jerusalem and went through the siege there.” Aelius Aristides praises the philanthropy of the Athenians, ὑποδεχομένη τοὺς καταφεύγοντες (ed. Bursian, p. 99, 8ff.). Thirteen inhabitants of Delphi who denounced abuses before the amphictiones of Delphi were victims of intrigue and were sent into exile, καταφυγόντες (Fouilles de Delphes III, 4, n. 43, 8). Κατέφυγε πρὸς ἡμᾶς Στοτοῆτις ἰ—βιοτάφος (SB 9628, 2; second century BC). In a figurative sense: “Their life was dissipated on these preoccupations” (Ep. Arist. 140).

⁵ “The city of Euhippe, having appealed to the great Fortune of our master Emperor Antoninus” (L. Robert, Opera Minora Selecta, vol. 1, p. 348); cf. a supplication to the king: ε—πί σε τὸν σωτήρα καταφεύγων (SB 9798, 3, 15; from the third century BC; P. Yale 46, col. I, 9); Dittenberger, Or. 519, 14; 569, 15; SEG I, 366, 8: “the citizens who have been deprived of their lands appealed to our people, καταφυγόντων ε—πὶ τὸν δῆμον”; P. Tebt. 43, 27: “We were compelled to seek refuge with you” (118 BC); UPZ 106, 16; Berichtigungsliste, vol. 4, p. 98, n. 774.

⁶ Τούτου χάριν (P.Oxy. 2479, 26); τούτου ἔνεκεν (SB 8246, 34), διὰ τοῦτο (P.Tebt. 724, 8), ὅθεν (P.Mich. 174, 6; 422, 32). One appeals to someone to find help, Isa 10:3.

⁷ The capitol (Strabo 5.3.2; cf. 6.3.5), a city (Josephus, Ant. 18.373), an island (Thucydides 8.42.4), the tombs (Menander, in Stobaeus, Flor. 86.6; vol. 4, p. 704), a grotto (Plutarch, Luc. 15.3); cf. Diodorus Siculus 12.9.3; 12.24.5.

⁸ At Euhemeria, no one has the right “to expel in any manner whatsoever . . . those who come seeking refuge (τοὺς καταφεύγοντες)” in the temple of Amon (SB 6155, 20; cf. 8266, 10 b); P.Tebt. 787, 34: καταφυγει—ν ει—ς τὸ ε—ν—Iβιω—νι τοῦ Διὸς ι—ερόν; 724, 8. A sanctuary that has just been built lays claim to this privilege for fugitives, καταφεύγοντας καθ ὀνδηποτοῦν τρόπον (P.Fay., p. 49, 9; from 69–68 BC). But in AD 121, P.Dura 20, 11 prescribes: “if he takes refuge in a temple, he shall be cast out of it.” Diodorus Siculus 17.41.8: a pursued suspect “took refuge in the temple of Heracles” at Tyre.

⁹ Cf. C. Spicq, Vie chrétienne, pp. 59ff. On the theme of καταφυγή, cf. P. Collomp, Recherches sur la chancellerie et la diplomatie des Lagides, Paris, 1926, p. 127.

¹⁰ In the OT, to flee to a city of refuge is to be saved, cf. Num 35:25-26; Deut 4:42; 19:5; cf. Nicolas of Damascus: “It was there that those who were able to escape the flood took refuge (συμφυγόντες) and were saved” (in Josephus, Ant. 1.95); Philo, Good Man Free 151: “those who take refuge in inviolable places.” Cf. Xenophon of Ephesus, Ephes. 1.4.5: σω—σον τὸν ε—πὶ σὲ καταπεφευγότα τὸν πάντων δεσπότην. I might note that καταφεύγω translates the Hebrew ‘asap (in the niphal), “disappear, withdraw, assemble, reunite” (Gen 49:1; 1Sam 13:5; 17:2; 2Sam 17:2; Ps 35:15; Isa 57:1), and lawâh (in the niphal), “join, accompany” (Num 18:2, 4), which means that the “fugitives” of Heb can be understood as a community (cf. 13:14).

¹¹ Philo, Spec. Laws 3.130 (cf. Heb 6:19: ἀσφαλῆ τε καὶ βεβαίαν); cf. 123; Flight 87ff.; Spec. Laws 1.129, 1.309: καρπὸν εὐράμενοι τῆς ε—πὶ τὸν θεὸν καταφυγῆς τὴν ἀπ αὐτοῦ βοήθειαν; 2.217. The new name of Aseneth: “city of refuge” (Jos. Asen. 15.6), cf. M. Philonenko, Joseph et Aséneth, Leiden, 1968, pp. 55ff., 170; C. Burchard, Untersuchungen zu Joseph und Aseneth, Tübingen, 1965, pp. 93, 118; L. Delekat, Asylie und Schutzorakel am Zionheiligtum, Leiden, 1967.

¹² Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 70–71; cf. 119; Change of Names 8; Abraham 95; Conf. Tongues 39; compare Pap. Graec. Vindob. 19799–19800 (ed. H. Hunger, “Die Logistie—ein liturgisches Amt,” in ChrEg, 1957, pp. 272–283). Esth 4:17 k: “Queen Esther took refuge with the Lord”; Jos. Asen. 12.7: “It is with you [Lord] that I have taken refuge”; 13.1; T. Sim. 3.5. A dedication of Sibidounda ἑω— Ὑψίστω Καταφυγῆ should not be understood as the translation of Sancta Tutela but the corresponding Yahweh-God-Refuge. IGLS 1483, 1: Τὸν Ὑψίστον ἔθου καταφυγὴν σου. Cf. the Virgin Mary, refugium peccatorum, invoked as Καταφυγῆ in the Byzantine era, cf. J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1965, p. 169, n. 412.

καταφθείρω

kataphtheiro, to corrupt, ruin

kataphtheiro, S 2704; TDNT 9.93–106; EDNT 2.270; MM 334; L&N 88.266; BAGD 420

False teachers oppose the truth and have a corrupt mind: houtoi anthistantai te aletheia, anthropoi katephtharmenoi ton noun (2Tim 3:8; same link between these two verbs, 1Macc 8:11). The only more or less close parallel is Uzziah, “who was puffed up and corrupted; he became unfaithful to Yahweh his God” (2Chr 26:16; cf. 27:2—“ho laos katephtheireto, the people were corrupted”; Lev 26:39—“those among you who remain will waste away [Hebrew maqaq] because of their sin”). In most of its LXX occurrences, kataphtheiro translates the Hebrew shahat, “destroy, cut down; corrupt, pervert.” These two meanings are used together: “God saw that . . . all flesh had corrupted their ways on the earth. So behold I shall destroy them” (Gen 6:12–13; commented on by Philo, Unchang. God 141–142), but this second meaning is by far the best attested, especially with respect to the destruction of a city,¹ of the whole earth (Gen 9:11; cf. Isa 24:1—baqaq), of a kingdom (1Macc 8:11), of a ravaged land,² of its products (Judg 6:4), its fruits, its harvests (Wis 16:19, 22), and its trees (Dan 4:14; cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 1157, 74). So the idea is that of devastation, always with the connotation of violence (1Macc 15:31). When the verb is used with humans as the object, it means their extermination (2Chr 12:7; 24:23; 25:16; 35:21); they succumb (Exod 18:18, Hebrew nabal); these victims (2Macc 5:14) lose their life like “water that is spilled to the ground” and cannot be regathered (2Sam 14:14).

In the papyri, kataphtheiro is used of a business deal that will come to nothing if no decision is made: “you must give me an answer so that I maynot be ruined” (ei dei se apophasin moi dounai hina me entautha kataphtheiromai, PSI 377, 11); caviar which, if it cannot be sold, must be eaten, “so that it will not go bad like the rest” (hina me kataphthare hosper kai ta loipa, P.Cair.Zen. 59121, 3); of a harvest that is in danger of being ruined (P.Cair.Zen. 59132, 5; cf. SB 6794, 5; P.Tebt. 769, 25, 85); a horse that has died or become useless, “but your horse has been ruined” (ho de para sou hippos katephthartai, P.Cair.Zen. 59093, 5 = SB 6720, 5); of an invasion of grasshoppers that has destroyed everything (P.Tebt. 772, 2; from the third century BC; cf. SB 6769, 18); of unused cargo ships (P.Haun. 12 a 6; republished in SB 9425 a) that founder where they are berthed (P.Magd. 11, 9; third century BC); above all, of prisoners who languish (P.Cair.Zen. 59831: “to waste away in prison,” en to desmoterio kataphtharenai) and are in danger of atrophying or dying: “so that he may not waste away in prison” (hopos me symbe auton kataphtharenai en te phylake, P.Mich. 85, 5); “not to leave me to rot in jail for five months” (me hyperidein me katephtharmenon en te phylake menas η?, P.Tebt. 777, 11; cf. P.Petaus II, 19; BGU 1847, 21).

These usages show that the false teachers of 2Tim 3:8, their minds wasted or ravaged—today we speak of losing one’s mind—are radically incapable (cf. the perfect passive participle) of carrying out any magisterial function. When one’s ability to think and reason is corrupted, one is straightaway disqualified for teaching (cf. adokimoi; cf. Titus 1:16).

¹ 2Macc 8:3—razed to the ground; SB 8334, 5 (42 BC); cf. R. Hutmacher, Ehrendekret.

² Isa 13:5 (Hebrew habal in the piel); 36:10 (shahat in the piel); 49:19 (shamem); 1Macc 3:39; 15:4; Ep. Arist. 23, 120; Polybius 2.64.3.

καταφρονέω, καταφρονητής

kataphroneo, to scorn, disdain; kataphronetes, scoffer

see also περιφρονέω

kataphroneo, S 2706; TDNT 3.631–632; EDNT 2.270; NIDNTT 1.461–462; MM 334–335; L&N 88.192; BAGD 420 | kataphronetes, S 2707; TDNT 3.632; EDNT 2.270; NIDNTT 1.461–462; MM 335; L&N 88.193; BAGD 420

The verb, meaning “scorn, disdain,” connotes a lack of respect or consideration when its object is a person: “Who then would take the risk if he had to see himself surrounded with scorn rather than honor?” (anti tou timasthai kataphronethesomenos, Isocrates, Archid. 6.95); “to avoid being scorned and merit public esteem” (me kataphronesesthai, all’ eudokimesein en tois pollois).¹ This disdain or irreverence become impiety when directed toward the deity;² the kataphronountes (Hebrew bagad) are the ungodly and traitors (Prov 13:15; Hos 6:7). It is in this sense that the Jew takes no account of the treasures of divine goodness which ought to move him to repent: “Have you nothing but scorn for the riches of God’s kindness, patience, longsuffering?” (Rom 2:4); likewise: “No one can serve two masters; for either he will hate the one and love the other, or he will cleave to (anthexetai) the one and pay no attention to the other (tou heterou kataphronesei). You cannot serve God and Mammon.”³ To give all one’s attention and zeal to one kyrios implies absolute lack of interest toward another master.

In the category of the unjust, the most guilty are sensualists, the insolent, and blasphemers, “those who follow the flesh, by covetousness of that which defiles, and scorn lordship” (kyriotetos kataphronountas, 2Pet 2:11). For the slaves of carnal passions, it is no longer wealth that is sovereign but the sarx (flesh); this being so, they have no use for and thus reject or annul (Jude 8), deny (2Pet 2:1; Titus 1:16) the yoke of Christ the Lord, his supreme authority, his teachings, his will, and his control. One scorns “the king’s decrees” (4Macc 4:26, ta dogmata; Dittenberger, Syl. 705, 36; Josephus, Ant. 2.207, a prostagma; 6.331; 10.257; 12.207). Disdain here is refusal and disobedience (Ant. 6.142, 147; 11.130); a common meaning of kataphroneo: “Some are capable of disdain, others are not” (Xenophon, Cyn. 13.16); commonly in Philo.⁴ In 2Pet 2:10, not only do those referred to snap their fingers at a prohibition,⁵ but they treat lightly the kyriotes (lordship) of Christ; this is an insult,⁶ a well attested meaning of the verb: “He insults me, Thebes” (kataphronei me, Euripides, Bacch. 503).

Heb 12:2 exhorts Christians to behold Jesus, who endured the ignominy of the cross,⁷ “despising the shame” (aischynes kataphronesas). The emphasis is not on suffering, but on the humiliation of this punishment, which was reserved for slaves and criminals (cf. oneidismos, 10:33; 11:26; 13:13). It is also an allusion to the mockery, the ridicule, and the insults to which the saint par excellence was subjected by “sinners.” Nothing could be more abject! Precisely: to “scorn”⁸ is to “laugh at,”⁹ “mock” (Josephus, Life 337,347).

The meaning “humiliate, shame” is found in 1Cor 11:22, with regard to participation in the Lord’s Supper, when some have plenty to eat and others have nothing: “Do you scorn the church of God (tes ekklesias tou theou kataphroneite) and do you wish to shame (kataischynete) those who have nothing?”¹⁰ One cannot take part lightly in a sacred ceremony (Philo, Moses 1.102; Decalogue 85), because that would be to profane it, commit an impiety, and incur mortal punishment.¹¹

“Take care not to scorn one of the least of these little ones (me kataphronesete henos ton mikron touton), because their angels in heaven constantly behold the face of my heavenly Father” (Matt 18:10). Scorn is the clear opposite of respect, here powerfully motivated. Not only in judgment but also in conduct it is necessary to take account of these little ones who are so honored by God. These mikroi are not young children (nepioi) but insignificant, negligible Christians¹² who are not ordinarily taken into account. In this category we may include the poor,¹³ the members of an inferior social class in the community, and also the weak, the fragile, those easily offended,¹⁴ even the handicapped (cf. Eph 4:22). They must be taken care of because of their great dignity in God’s eyes.

Unconditional submission of the young to their elders was common to oriental, Greek, and Roman antiquity.¹⁵ So also St. Paul confirms Timothy’s authority at Ephesus with the words, “Let no one despise your youth” (medeis sou tes neotetos kataphroneito, 1Tim 4:12). The verb has the sense “treat with disdain, pay no attention to.” The scorn for a person is constantly mentioned in the Hellenistic era¹⁶ and is justified in many ways, notably by the youthfulness of the one disdained: “Darius had only scorn for Alexander’s youthfulness” (kataphronesas tes Alexandrou neotetos).¹⁷ A certain Antinous, a daredevil, “scorns my passivity” (apragmosynes, P.Ant. 36, 12; P.Oxy. 2410, 3; cf. Josephus, War 6.337: rhathymia = softness), “my mediocrity” (P.Panop.Beatty 1, 173; P.Ryl. 659, 7; P.Oxy. 3126, col. II, 10), because I am a foreigner” (P.Magd. 8, 11), “because my husband is dead” (kataphronon hoti ho aner mou tetelyteken, P.Magd. 2, 6; cf. P.Gen. 31,10: kataphronon mou tes chereias); “as a helpless woman” (hos gynaikos aboethetou, BGU 291, 9), “because I am an orphan,”¹⁸ “scorning me because of my weak vision.”¹⁹ Hence to “scorn” is to refuse to give justice, to give back a stolen object, a borrowed ass, to pay a servant’s wages; no interest is shown in the complainant because of his or her lack of social, financial, or political status. Here again scorn is a lack of respect and consideration.

“Let slaves who have believers as masters not scorn them because they are brothers” (1Tim 6:2); me kataphroneitosan explicates 6:1—masters are worthy of respect (pases times axious). They must be esteemed. If it is true that spiritually, Christian masters are the equals of Christian slaves, of “brothers,” one must respect the social hierarchy. What is more, agape, the enemy of arrogance, inspires even more respect and devotion (cf. Phlm 16: adelphos agapetos), so that the servant’s “service” becomes a gracious “benefit” (euergesia) that rules out all negligence.²⁰

As for St. Paul’s apostrophe at Pisidian Antioch, “Behold, scoffers (hoi kataphronetai), wonder and perish” (Acts 13:41), it is a quotation of Hab 1:5, where the prophet threatens Israel with terrible punishment. In the Greek OT this substantive always translates the Hebrew bagad (Hab 2:5), bogdîm (1:5), bogdôt (Zeph 3:4) and thus would mean “arrant traitors.” It is used only once in Philo: “They do not profess scorn for divine things”;²¹ and it is used in a favorable sense in Josephus and Plutarch.²²

¹ Plato, Hp. Ma. 281 c; καταφρονέω is contrasted with τιμάω, “honor” (Josephus, Ant. 6.80), with θαυμάζω, “admire” (Ag. Apion 2.47), with φοβέομαι (Prov 13:13). The verb sometimes has a favorable or neutral meaning: “dream of, think of, aspire to” (to the throne, Herodotus 1.59), “come to one’s senses” upon waking (Hippocrates, Morb. Sac. 15), after a fit of hysteria (Nat. Mul. 3).

² Euripides, Bacch. 199: οὐ καταφρονῶ— τῶ—ν θεῶ—ν (parallel to οὐκ αἰ—σχύνομαι, 204); a meaning especially frequent in Josephus: one does not snap one’s fingers at God, at his foreknowledge (Ant. 2.329), words (3.16, 85), power (4.215, 217; 9.173; 12.357), commandments (1.43; 6.150; 8.19), worship (1.311; 4.181; 8.251), obligations due him (9.160). PSI 1337, 17: τῶ—ν θεῶν διατάξεων καταφρονεῖ—.

³ Matt 6:24 = Luke 16:13 (the Lucan context is better). A radical decision is forced between two lordships which make a total demand on their slaves and leave no room for other jobs (C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 1, pp. 28–31). Cf. Eubulus: “The slave of two masters is at each moment the slave of no one” (οὐδαμόθεν οὐδεῖς, J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 2, p. 120). In fact slaves were often the property of a number of masters (Acts 16:16—τοῖς κυρίοις), notably because of inheritance (P.Oxy. 1030, 5–6; 1638; BGU 1654; P.Grenf. 21; P.Mert. 123; P.Mich. 317, 326; P.Mil.Vogl. 23; etc.). A half or two-thirds of a slave could be sold (PSI 1228; P.Freib. 8). At Delos, in the first century BC, a slave was owned in common by three brothers (F. Durrbach, Choix, p. 213). Cf. I. Biezunska-Malowist, “Les Esclaves en copropriété dans l’Egypte romaine,” in Aeg, 1968, pp. 116–129.

⁴ One scorns the flesh (Philo, Giants 32), money and pleasure (Flight 33), glory (Flight 35; Rewards 24), human affairs (Dreams 1.218), physical exercises that are opposed to the equilibrium of the soul (Abraham 48), wealth (Moses 1.153, 213), foods and luxury (Moses 2.69; Rewards 17), material goods (Virtues 15), the fruits of pride (17), myths (Contemp. Life 63), honor and power (Drunkness 57).

⁵ Inscription from Iasus: the passive ἄν δ’ εἰς καταφρονηθῆ corrected to the active καταφρονήσῃ by L. Robert, Opera Minora Selecta, vol. 3, p. 1516. Cf. Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.264: “scorn the constitution and laws of the country”; P.Mich. 582, col. II, 9–10 (AD 49–50): not fulfilling the obligations of his office (P.Panop.Beatty 1, 172); Josephus, War 1.318) or the stipulations of a contract (SB 9778, 14; P.Oxy. 2730, 15), scorning ancestral customs (Philo, Spec. Laws 4.150).

⁶ One must not despise anyone (Philo, Dreams 2.141), except enemies, according to Ep. Arist. 225: πω—ς ἄν καταφρονοίη τω—ν ε—χθρω—ν; among nations (Xenophon, Hell. 7.4.30; Josephus, War 6.422; Ant. 5.255, 304; 6.71), for example the Jews' scorn for the Romans (20.126) or the Syrians (20.175); Jdt 10:19. Cf. Thucydides 6.34.9: "Scorn for the aggressor is shown through acts of resistance"; 2Macc 7:24—"Antiochus thought that he had been vilified (καταφρονει—σθαι) and suspected that these words contained an insult (ὀνειδίζουσεν)"; Prov 18:3—"When the wicked comes, scorn comes also."

⁷ Cf. scorn of death = counting it as nothing, Epictetus 4.1.70; Diodorus Siculus 5.29.2: certain Gauls despise death; Philo, Good Man Free 30; To Gaius 236, 249; Josephus, War 2.60: Athrongaeus "had a soul scornful of death"; 2.377; 3.356, 475; 5.458; 6.42; Ag. Apion 2.294. Cf. 4Macc 13:9—the three young men scorned a furnace. Cf. the scorn of dangers and perils, Josephus, War 5.87; Ant. 9.55, 82; 12.425; 14.380.

⁸ Musonius, frag. 10, l. 22ff. (ed. C. E. Lutz): "If the philosopher—who ought obviously to despise death itself—cannot scorn blows or insults, what good is he?"

⁹ Diodorus Siculus 3.50; Plato, Euthd. 273 d: "These words brought me their scorn (κατεφρονήθην); they began to laugh"; Philo, Drunkenness 131: to show a lack of respect for the dignity of one's superiors is to expose oneself to a mocking laugh; Gen 27:12—Jacob, "In my father's eyes I will be seen as a mocker" (ὡς καταφρονω—ν, pilpel of the Hebrew ta'a').

¹⁰ Τοὺς μὴ ἔχοντας, cf. F. Field, Notes on the Translation , p. 175.

¹¹ Cf. Prov 19:16—"The one who scorns (Hebrew bazâh) his ways shall die"; Wis 14:30—καταφρονήσαντες ὀσιότητος; 2Macc 4:14—"The priests who scorn the temple and neglect the sacrifices"; 4Macc 4:9—"the Holy Place, which was treated contemptuously," means the violated temple.

¹² Cf. S. Légasse, Jésus et l'enfant, pp. 51ff., 62ff.

¹³ Menander, Dysk. 286: "Do not treat us who are poor with disdain"; Plato, Resp. 7.556 d: "In the midst of danger it was not the poor who scorned the rich"; Plutarch, Per. 1.4: "Often we take pleasure in the work while scorning the worker." Masters scorn their slaves (Philo, Spec. Laws 3.129; Decalogue 40; Flacc. 178).

¹⁴ Cf. 1Thess 5:14—“Encourage the timid, the fearful (τοὺς ὀλιγοψύχους) comfort the feeble (ἀσθενῶ—ν).” Cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, p. 792, n. 2.

¹⁵ Sir 32:9; Plato, Resp. 3.412; Leg. 690 b; 917 a; Xenophon, Mem. 2.3.16 (cf. M. P. Roussel, Etude sur le principe de l'ancienneté dans le monde hellénique, Paris, 1942). Old age alone is respectable (τιμῆς ἄξιος, Philo, Sobr. 16; Decalogue 167), deserving to take precedence (Sacr. Abel and Cain 42). It is in any event to be wished that the presumed wisdom of age will corroborate the prestige of the function. St. Thomas quotes Aristotle: “Nemo juvenes elegit duces.” Timothy, young and timid, lacking in self-confidence (1Cor 16:10-11) would be paralyzed by the defiance or scorn of his circle (C.Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, vol. 1, p. 511).

¹⁶ 4Macc 5:10—κάμοῦ καταφρονήσεις; 6:21; P.Col. VII, 169, 13: καταφρονοῦντές μου; P.Yale 46, col. I, 13: καταφρονήσας μου ὅτι Αι—γύπτιός ει—μι (third century BC); P.Mich. 79, 24: “because my father was absent, they treated us with scorn” (memorandum of Artemidorus to Zeno); P.Cair.Isid. 76, 17; P.Mich. 23, 4: a woman who borrowed twenty-four drachmas “does not return them to us . . . she scorns us” (221 BC); PSI 1344, 2; P.Oxy.Hels. 23, 17.

¹⁷ Diodorus Siculus 17.7.1; Josephus, Ant. 12.242; 8.274: διὰ τὴν ἡλικίαν; P.Gen. 6, 13. Similarly, the feebleness of the aged is scorned: “Do not scorn your mother when she is old” (Prov 18:3; Josephus, War 1.633; Ant. 5.143; cf. 16.288).

¹⁸ P.Oxy. 1470, 15. In judicial petitions, the formula occurs almost constantly: “I am wronged because . . .”; cf. P. Enteux, Cairo, 1931, n. 9, 6; 25, 8; 26, 9; 41, 5; 48, 7; 68, 11; etc.

¹⁹ P.Mich. 422, 29; cf. 425, 11: this person scorns me because of my weakness, because I have only one eye and do not see with it, although it appears that I am sighted. . . .

²⁰ Μὴ καταφρονήσης = do not be negligent; P.Oxy. 2154, 12; P.Yale 83, 10; P.Genova 85, 5; cf. Thucydides 2.11.4; 3.83.4; Xenophon, Hell. 4.5.12; Josephus, Ant. 1.313; 7.313; 12.292; Life 143, 291.

²¹ To Gaius 322; cf. Epictetus 4.7.33: “It is such principles that cause scorn for the laws.”

²² Josephus, War 2.122: the Essenes despise riches (καταφρονηταὶ πλούτου) and danger (2.151; Ant. 6.347); Plutarch, Brut. 12.1: the conspirators were chosen from among men who scorned death.

κατέχω

katecho, to hold, keep, take ill, contain, constrain, occupy, hold to katecho, S 2722; TDNT 2.829–830; EDNT 2.271–272; MM 336–337; L&N 13.150, 31.48, 37.17, 54.22, 57.1, 85.9; BDF §400(4); BAGD 422–423

The meanings of this verb are multiple,¹ though rather homogeneous, and can be defined thus: seize, hold strongly, keep, detain, contain, take possession, occupy. They are all attested in the NT.

1. “Hold strongly.” — “Those who hear the word with a noble and good heart hold to it (ton logon katechousin) and bear fruit by persevering.”² Thus it is that “a ram is held in the thicket by its horns”³ and Saul wished to seize Samuel (Josephus, Ant. 6.152; 6.169; 9.69). Metaphorical usages are common: “Dizziness seized me” (2Sam 1:9; Job 15:24), or rage,⁴ a passion (Philo, To Gaius 338), but also ardor and love for the best (Rewards 15, 26), zeal and love for the good and for virtue (Change of Names 108, 153, 199; Unchang. God 138; Flight 58, 195). Finally, one can be “seized” and inspired by God.⁵

2. “Be taken ill, suffer from an illness.” — “The first one to go down (into the pool at Bethesda) after the stirring of the water was healed of whatever illness gripped him (whatever illness he had).”⁶ The expression is common: Philo, Prelim. Stud. 138; Spec. Laws 1.118; 2.136; Cherub. 42; To Gaius 16, 267, 357: “a shaking seized me”; Josephus, War 1.236: “Herod was detained by illness”; Life 48: “taken with a sudden onset of fever”; PSI 299, 3 and 5: “because I was taken quite ill, so that I could not even move” (hoti keteschethen noso epi poly hos me dynasthai mede saleuesthai); “but when my illness was lessened” (hos d’ekouphisthe moi he nosos).

3. “Keep.” — “I would like to keep Onesimus with me, because he serves me on your behalf in these chains I am in for the gospel.”⁷ Cf. Gen 24:56—“Abraham’s servant said, ‘Do not keep me . . . Let me go’”; Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.197: Abraham sent the horses back to the king of Sodom but “kept the goods that God had given him”; Joseph 163: Jacob sent his sons to buy grain in Egypt, but he kept his youngest son home (cf. 185, 201, 233); Dreams 1.95: “Lenders keep the goods taken as security until they recover their own property” (cf. Josephus, Ant. 4.269). Josephus, War 1.267: “Herod dispersed across Idumea men who were more burdensome than useful, keeping with him the most stalwart and the most beloved.”⁸ Kopres writes to his father, Heron: “Do not think that I am keeping back the workers; it is the epimeletes alone who is keeping them.”⁹

Often, one is kept in spite of oneself: “The crowds came to Jesus and kept him (kateichon auton) so that he would not leave them” (Luke 4:42). Manoah said to the Angel of the Lord: “Permit us to keep you” (Judg 13:15-16; 19:4). To be “held by force” (Philo, Joseph 209; Moses 1.319) is to no longer be at one’s own disposal,¹⁰ and often to be arrested and imprisoned: Joseph’s master took him and put him in the stronghold, the place where the king’s prisoners were kept (topon en ho hoi desmotaí . . . katechontai, Gen 39:20; cf. 42:19); Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.21: “You would have kept the soul in prison” (katesches en desmoterio); Prelim. Stud. 41: “forgetfulness holds captive”;¹¹ P.Flor. 61, 60: “You deserve to be whipped, having taken it upon yourself to hold an honorable man and woman” (axios men es mastigothenai, dia seautou kataschon anthropon euschemona kai gynaikan); P.Lond. 1914, 35: “He came, arrested him, and put him in prison”; 422, 3 (vol. 2, p. 318; cf. Diodorus Siculus 12.65); P.Petr. 45, col. II, 4: the money was seized; P.Mich. 616, 11: “He impounded my property until I should pay my debts to the treasury.”¹² It is in this sense that, according to Rom 1:18, human godlessness and unrighteousness “hold the truth” captive in the chains of unrighteousness (anthropon ton ten aletheian en adikia katechonton). By not adhering to the truth from the heart and not submitting their conduct to it, they somehow shackle the divine truth and hold it in check.¹³ Thus the satanic power is held back to burst forth at the great day. In explaining the delay of the Parousia, St. Paul writes, “You know what holds it back (to katechon oidate) so that it will not be revealed before its time. For the mystery of ungodliness is already set in motion. Only when the one who is now holding it back (monon ho katechon) is out of the way, then the ungodly one will be revealed.”¹⁴

In NT kerygma and catechesis, katecho (“hold, keep”) in a favorable sense has become a technical term: “You hold the traditions just as I transmitted them to you” (kathos paredoka hymin tas paradoseis, 1Cor 11:2); “You are saved, if you hold to the terms in which I evangelized you” (sozesthe, tini logo euangelisamen hymin ei katechete, 1Cor 15:2). It is not enough to receive the divine message by faith; one must hold to it, keep it intact, retain it unshakably.¹⁵ “Prove everything, keep the good (to kalon katechete), reject the bad.”¹⁶

4. “Contain.” — The idea of keeping passes easily into that of “contain, master, dominate.” Philo, Post. Cain 5: “The circle of heaven contains the universe within itself”; Alleg. Interp. 3.13: “They contain themselves with patience”; Josephus, War 2.40: “Varus went up to Jerusalem to contain the rebels” (cf. 2.213, 214); 4.587: “The soldiers with great difficulty contained their desire to pillage”; 6.257, 260; “Catullus, unable to contain himself . . .”¹⁷

5. “Constrain.” — “We have been freed from the law, being dead (by baptism) to that which held us in constraint” (apothanontes en ho kateichometha, Rom 7:6). Philo, Spec. Laws 2.124: “subjected to this inexorable law, which refuses immortality to every human creature”; P.Cair.Isid. 77, 18: “even though they were compelled by the laws (katechomenoi apo ton nomon) to keep the children”; P.Amh. 97, 17: “I will not be bound by my promise” (ou kataschethesomai te hyposchesei).¹⁸

6. “Occupy, take possession of.” — A guest who takes the first place runs the risk that the host will say, “Give place”; “then, in embarrassment, you will have to take the last place” (ton eschaton topon katechein).¹⁹ Jdt 5:19—“Returned from the dispersion, they reoccupied Jerusalem”; Philo, To Gaius 155: “This quarter of Rome, beyond the Tiber, was occupied and inhabited by Jews” (cf. 216); Change of Names 113: “those who held the place.” Constantly in Josephus: Antiochus Epiphanes, after taking Jerusalem, occupied the city for three years and six months.”²⁰ P.Oslo 40, 50: “The creditor shall be able to take possession of the house when he wishes”; P.Mich. 424, 5; a complaint to the strategos: “Sotas wanted to take possession of my property by force” (ta hyparchonta mou kataschein bia).²¹

7. “Have, possess.” — “The time is short. Henceforth . . . let those who buy be as if they did not possess” (hoi agorazontes hos me katechontes, 1Cor 7:30); “thought of as having nothing, but possessing all things” (hosmeden echontes kai panta katechontes, 2Cor 6:10). Thus Yahweh, the master of everything (Isa 40:22), gives his people ownership of Canaan;²² money is possessed (Job 27:17), or a sickle (Jer 50:16), or a sword,²³ or a goat (Philo, Flight 151). P.Berl.Zill. 4, 19: “He claims as his own property the paternal field and the vineyard”; P.Oxy. 237, col. VIII, 22: How can it be that the Egyptian widows claim their husbands’ properties (katechein tahyparchonta) by virtue of local Egyptian law, according to their marriage contracts?²⁴ In religious language, katecho means “have in possession,”²⁵ and in everyday language, “victimize” (Josephus, Ant. 1.34), “envelop” (War 1.148), “oppress” (P.Oxy. 532, 23); so that human thought can be “possessed by the love and thirst for wisdom” (Philo, Creation 5; cf. Alleg. Interp. 1.43; 2.102) and “seized like Korybants (priests of Cybele) by divine inspiration.”²⁶

8. “Sail along, make for.” — “Having put the foresail to the wind, they made for the beach” (kateichon eis ton aigialon, Acts 27:40). Or at least that is how this verb (in the imperfect) is translated, as a technical navigational term. But hardly any exact parallels are known.²⁷ It was necessary to begin with “hold” (the course), then add various nuances. The idea is to sail in a certain direction, steer for, aim it, travel toward.

¹ Cf. the dozen Hebrew verbs that correspond to this verb in the LXX: 'ahaz, hazaq, taqap, 'asar, 'asar, 'ahar, yarash, yashab, 'asap, nahal, halaq, hasan.

² Luke 8:15; cf. Recueil L. Cerfaux, vol. 3, pp. 111–122.

³ Gen 22:13. Adonijah gripped the horns of the altar (1Kgs 1:50; 2:29); 2Sam 2:21; 4:10; Ps 139:10—“Your right hand holds me.”

⁴ Ps 119:53; anguish (Jer 6:24); pain (13:21; Philo, Moses 1.136; 2.225); wrath (Philo, Abraham 152; Decalogue 63; Josephus, War 1.479; 2.293; 4.591; 7.48; Ant. 6.237; Life 233), drunkenness (Philo, Creation 71; Moses 2.164; Drunkenness 166), stupidity (Drunkenness 5; Dreams 2.196), madness (Philo, Decalogue 52; Josephus, Life 323), fear (Josephus, War 3.147), panic (Ant. 20.78), thirst (Ant. 5.302), sorrow (Ant. 4.330; Life 205), sleepiness (Philo, Joseph 147).

⁵ Philo, Dreams 1.2; 2.232; Heir 260, 264; Moses 2.188, 270; Spec. Laws 1.65, 315; Virtues 217; Good Man Free 43.

⁶ John 5:4—ὧ δὴποτε κατείχετο νοσήματι (omitted by P66, S, B, etc.). Cf. S. Bartina, “Papiros y hermeuética para el pasaje de la piscina Probatica,” in Proceedings XI, pp. 499–507.

⁷ Phlm 13: ὃν ε—γὼ ε—βουλόμην πρὸς ε—μαυτὸν κατέχειν; Prov 18:22—“The one who keeps (ὁ δὲ κατέχων contrasted with ε—κβάλλει) an adulterous woman is a fool”; cf. 2Sam 6:6—Uzzah held back the ark; Josephus, Ant. 5.204: the Israelites were restrained by Deborah; Life 43: at Gischala, John, “seeing several citizens very excited by the insurrection against Rome, endeavored to hold them.”

⁸ Cf. Josephus, War 2.584; 5.326: “Josephus kept back those of the prince’s friends who wanted to step forward”; 5.454; 6.132; Ant. 2.1, 54, 75, 95: Jacob kept Benjamin with him; 7.234; 11.131: Ezra kept the letter but sent a copy; 13.190–191; Life 53: “Varus kept the messages in his possession, arranging that the text should not be seen by the king”; 92: “I sent back my bodyguards, except one, and kept with him ten soldiers”; War 2.606: “I had decided to keep this money hidden.”

⁹ P.NYU 25, 7 and 8: μὴ νόμιζε οὖν ὅτι ε—γὼ κατέχω τοὺς ε—ργάτας, ἀλλ’ ὁ ε—πιμελητής ε—στιν ὁ αὐτοὺς κατέχων; P.Oxf. 1, 12 (second century BC): the tax collector asked for two supporting documents (τὰ σύμβολα) from the wife of the plaintiff to establish the balance of her accounts. He took them home and is keeping them (κατέχων αὐτά); P.Oxy. 1842, 10: “I sent you the animals . . . keeping only one here”; 2267, 13; P.Petaus 26, 18: “keep them with you until he returns.” At Samos, in the second century BC, a grain distribution law prescribes: “If one of the commissioners does not lend the money that he has been given with the mission of lending it, but dishonestly keeps it in his own possession (ἀλλ’ αὐτὸς κατάσχη ε—π ἄδικία), he shall pay ten thousand drachmas to the city” (Dittenberger, Syl. 976, 73). Polybius 1.2.3: “The Lacedaemonians, who had for a long time contested the hegemony of Greece, once they became conquerors, kept it (κατει—χον αὐτήν) uncontested for almost twelve years”; Josephus, War 4.415: “They despaired of being able to save the town themselves.” Cf. Sir 46:9—“The descendants of Caleb kept the inheritance.”

¹⁰ Josephus, War 1.84: “How long, O impudent body, will you keep my soul?”; 1.109; 2.234; Ant. 13.317. When Herod tried to kill himself, “His cousin Ahab ran fast enough to hold his arm and stop the blow” (War 1.662); “The elders of the Jewish community were not able to hold back their own partisans” (2.267; 3.350; 6.345). Age “keeps” one = hinders from going (Ant. 12.196); Joseph was held (stopped) by a rain that God sent in the night (14.391). In the third century BC, a man complains of having been held in a village (PSI 525, 9). In the same period, Hierakion writes to the strategos Apollonius: μὴ κατέχου = do not let yourself be held (P.Brem. 16, 13; cf. O.Bodl. 1996, 8: μὴ αὐτὸν κάτεχε = do not keep him); P.Cair.Zen. 59110, 6; 59253, 8; 59596, 21; C.Pap.Jud. 141, 5: ε—ρωτω— σε ὅπως οὐ κατακεθήσεται = that he not be able to be held (first century BC). Hence “maintain”; Josephus, Ant. 1.198: “The messengers of God cannot maintain their deception any longer”; 1.231: “Prayers and sacrifices maintain the soul close to God”; 10.108: “maintain an alliance.”

¹¹ Josephus, Ant. 1.319: Jacob detained at Laban’s; 2.158, as a slave; 1.299: Pharaoh holds the Hebrews (in slavery); 3.17; 15.11: the high priest Hyrcanus is prisoner of the Parthians; War 2.11: “order to the tribune to seize by force the promoters of the sedition”; P.Cair.Zen. 59044, 27; 59819, 9; BGU 372, col. I, 16; P.Amh. 144, 4; P.Mich. 421, 18 (reign of Claudius): the local police officers arrested (κατείχουσαν) and imprisoned a man who was after some thieves and released him three days later only after the intervention of the town secretary and elders; 515, 2; P.Oxy. 2155, 12; P.Rein. 56, 29: “I did not want to go back up the river for fear of meeting a policeman and being held”; P.Ross.Georg. V, 8, 6; a prostagma of Ptolemy II Philadelphus in 260 BC, “Those who, in Syria and Phoenicia, have purchased a free indigenous person, seized and held him, or acquired him in some other fashion . . . shall declare him to the oikonomos” (C.Ord.Ptol. 22, 3).

¹² P.Fam.Tebt. 24, 107–108; 37, 13; P.Oxy. 1892, 27; cf. Wis 17:4—“the inner chamber where they were imprisoned”; a tomb encloses a dead person (SB 7289, 2); γαι—α κατέχει (IGUR, n. 436); cf. T. Drew-Bear, Phrygie, p. 37.

¹³ Κατέχω often has the sense of placing an obstacle, holding in check (cf. Thucydides 6.29.3; 1Macc 6:27), meeting with a refusal (Tob 10:2), obliging to stop (Josephus, War 1.187), hindering (2.590: “Lack of money hindered John of Gischala from realizing his ambitions”; Ant. 14.102: Gabinius could not hinder Alexander).

¹⁴ 2Thess 2:6-8. The Ungodly One is the instrument of Satan (cf. 1Thess 2:18). Exegetes have tried in vain to identify this neuter (something, τὸ κατέχον) and this masculine (someone, ὁ κατέχων), which lack an object. All that we can say is that the Restrainer is a present and beneficent force that slows the advent of the Antichrist. Finally, cf. B. Rigaux, Thessaloniciens, pp. 259–279; P. Andriessen, “Celui qui retient la venue du Seigneur,” in Bijdragen, 1960, pp. 20–30; J. Coppens, “Le ‘Mystère’ dans la théologie paulinienne et ses parallèles qumrâniens,” in Recherches bibliques, vol. 5, Desclée De Brouwer, 1960, pp. 163–165; O. Betz, “Der Katechon,” in NTS, vol. 9, 1963, pp. 276–291; D. W. B. Robinson, “II Thess. II, 6: ‘That which retains’ or ‘that which holds away’?” in F. L. Cross, SE, vol. 3, 1964, pp. 635–638.

¹⁵ On this meaning of the verb, cf. Theophrastus, Char. 26.2: The oligarch “of all Homer’s work retained only this verse” (τοῦτο ε—ν μόνον κατέχειν); Xenophon, Symp. 8.26: “Keep his friend’s affection”; Philo, Flight 200: teachers pour out doctrines and theories of knowledge in their students’ ears “so that they may grasp with their intelligence and hold in their memory that which has been transmitted to them.” (On this intellectual meaning of κατέχω, cf. UPZ 145, 23: κατέχεις = understand that; P.Cair.Zen. 59060, 10: “You are amazed that I do not grasp the fact that there is a tax on all these things” = SB 6717). We may compare the magical papyri: Horus, κατέχων δράκοντα (Pap.Graec.Mag. 4, 995), Michael κατέχων, ὃν καλέουσι δράκοντα μέγαν (Pap.Graec.Mag. 4, 2770; cf. vol. 2, p. 209); P.Lund IV, 12, 7ff.; SB 7452, 20.

¹⁶ 1Thess 5:21; cf. Heb 3:6—“We are his household, if we hold firmly the assurance and the hope which is our boast”; 3:14; 10:23 (τὴν ὁμολογίαν).

¹⁷ Josephus, War 7.452; Ant. 6.63; 7.130: David, unable to contain his lust for Bathsheba; 8.170: the queen of Sheba could not contain her admiration; 2.345: the Hebrews could not contain their joy; Life 60: “Philip sought to restrain their impetuosity”; 301: “His men could no longer master themselves”; Menander, Dysk. 687: “I could not contain myself any longer . . . so strong was my desire for her”; Chariton, Chaer. 3.7.4: “Unable to contain his sorrow.”

¹⁸ Cf. P.Oxy. 2109, 52; PSI 1070, 2; P.Princ. 148, 20; P.Wisc. 6, 25 (= SB 11234); P.Ryl. 117, 13: not be held responsible for their debts (μη κατέχεσθαι τοις ε—κείνων ὀφειλήμασιν); P.Giss. 11, 9: requisition for public service; P.Lond. 342, 7 (vol. 2, p. 174).

¹⁹ Luke 14:9 (cf. P. Glaue, “Einige Stellen, die die Bedeutung des Codex D charakterisieren,” in NovT, 1958, pp. 313–314); cf. Ps 69:36.

²⁰ Josephus, War 1.19; cf. 1.74, 190: “The Jews who occupied the territory”; 1.238, 248, 364; 2.486; 3.290: “the place around the tabernacle was occupied by the priests” (Ant. 8.104); War 5.104: “occupying the inner part of the temple, the conspirators took heart”; 5.252, 253, 357, 527; 7.165, 275, 306; Ant. 1.130, 136; 4.115; 5.224; 8.203; 9.280; 10.181; 13.213, 353; 14.200; Ag. Apion 1.228, 262, 272; 2.35: “if the Jews had occupied (their part of Alexandria) by force.” Letter of Ptolemy IV in the third century BC: the city and even a large share of the houses were occupied by soldiers camping in disorder (ed. C. B. Welles, Royal Correspondence, n. 30, 6 and 9). Amnesty decree of Ptolemy Euergetes II, Cleopatra II, and Cleopatra III, in 118 BC, in favor of chlerouchoi: “We and our descendants remain in possession of holdings occupied up to the year 52” (P.Tebt. V, 47 = C.Ord.Ptol. 54, 3; cf. 71, 12–13: 60 BC). One also “occupies” power or an office: “Caesar, who had held power for three years and seven months” (Josephus, War 1.218; cf. Ant. 1.86; 5.197, 254, 316, 359; 8.3, 298, 316; 10.143; 11.31; 12.234; 14.11, 123, 270, 290; 15.179, 180; 18.100); P.Oxy. 2339, 27: τὴν ἀρχὴν κατείχομεν ε—ν τῇ ἄκρᾳ = those who held power in the citadel; P.Princ. 137, 2 (the officials); P.Mich. 603, 18.

²¹ Cf. P.Cair.Isid. 104, 8: land “that I occupied and cultivated for thirteen years”; P.Tebt. 743, 7; P.Princ. 119, 37 (= SB 10989, 12 a); P.Amh. 30, 26; P.Oxy. 118, verso 11; 3311, 12; Apokrimata 16: the prefect of the province orders that you recover the possession of the housing lots by force (cf. F. Pringsheim, “Some Suggestions on P.Col. 123,” in Eos, vol. 48: Symbolae R. Taubenschlag Dedicatae, Warsaw, 1956, pp. 241ff.); Herodotus 5.72.

²² Exod 32:13; Josh 1:11; Ezek 33:24; Dan 7:18, 22. Cf. Josephus, Ant. 1.191; 2.170; 3.87; 7.342; 8.153, 204; 12.133, 243; 14.314; Ag. Apion 2.48.

²³ Cant 3:8; cf. SB 9641 recto, col. I, 12: οὐ μὴ κατάσχω τὴν μάκαιραν εἰς τῆς ἡμέρας τοῦ θανάτου μου (priestly regulation from the second century AD). The nuance is then “be in possession of,” cf. Philo, Change of Names 136; P.Tebt. 767, 11; P.Sorb. 62, 4: a steward asks his mistress to deduct the price of his purchases from the six solidi that she received from Peter the ζυγοστάτης (public weigher) “since she is now in possession of this sum to my credit.”

²⁴ Cf. P.Oxy. 713, 15 (AD 97); P.Yale 46, col. I, 8 (third century AD); SB 9241, 5; the will of Taharpaesis, SB 10765, 25 (= ZPE, vol. 4, 1969, p. 60 = P.Köln 100); I.Magn. 105, 51: ἵνα ἔχωσιν κατέχωσίν τε καρπίζωνταί τε.

²⁵ LSAM, p. 104; cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 662, 9; TAM III, 1, 34, 32; I.Priene 125, 9: τοῖς κατεχομένοις ὑπὸ τοῦ θεοῦ = those who are possessed by the god (ruling regarding the cult of Sarapis, around 200 BC).

²⁶ Philo, Creation 71; cf. Heir 69; Dreams 1.254; Moses 2.175, 288; Spec. Laws 3.44.

²⁷ Cf. Herodotus 7.188: “When the fleet having set out sailed and held (κατέσχε) to the Magnesian coast between Casthanea and Cape Sepia”; Polybius 1.25.7: “The Romans took to the sea with three hundred and thirty vessels and made for Messina (καὶ κατέσχον εἰς Μεσσήνην), where they went back out to sea”; Josephus, Ant. 1.204: Lot flees Sodom, taking refuge (κατασχών) in a tiny corner that formed an oasis in the midst of the flames.

κατηγέω

katecheo, to cause to ring in the ears, inform, instruct, catechize

katecheo, S 2727; TDNT 3.638–640; EDNT 2.273; NIDNTT 3.771–772; MM 337; L&N 22.190, 33.225; BDF §159(1); BAGD 423–424

Unknown in the LXX, rather poorly attested in classical Greek, and appearing late on the scene,¹ this verb derives from echeo, “resound,” and means “cause to ring in the ears, instruct by word of mouth,”² hence “inform.” Thus it was that the brothers at Jerusalem heard that Paul was teaching apostasy against Moses to all the Jews (Acts 21:21, katechethesan peri sou); but when they saw him perform a vow at the temple, they recognized that “there is nothing in what they have heard about you” (verse 24, hon katechentai peri sou). This meaning is current in writing from that period: “As he had heard it said (katechetai) that the temple at Jerusalem was the most beautiful sanctuary in the world . . .” (Philo, To Gaius 198). King Agrippa writes to Josephus: “It is plain to see that you do not need to be taught concerning our learning from the beginning. When you meet me, however, I myself will tell you by word of mouth about many things that are generally unknown” (se polla katecheso ton agnooumenon, Josephus, Life 366). In the second century, the prefect of Egypt says that he has been informed about the dealings of the telonai who extort money from tourists.³

Nevertheless, information communicated to someone teaches, and katecheo tends to mean “instruct, give instructions,”⁴ as in P.Lips. 32, 1 (= P.Stras. 41, 37) in 250, where a lawyer declares, “He taught me nothing at all (emeoudepote katechesen),” and is answered, “Today you taught someone (semeron tina edidaxas).” In the fourth century, the Christian Copres writes, “We have given the lawyer instructions for the twelve.”⁵ This is the meaning of five of the seven NT occurrences of the verb, all with a religious meaning; although without the later technical flavor of “catechesis,” they refer to instruction in the gospel given to believers: “Apollos was taught in the ways of the Lord, houtos en katechemenos ten hodon tou Kyriou” (Acts 18:25); this is not knowledge through hearsay but doctrinal instruction properly speaking. St. Paul would rather speak five words with understanding,⁶ that is, in an intelligible language, “in order to instruct the others as well, hina kai allous katecheso,” as befits the role of prophecy (cf. 1Cor 14:3), than ten thousand words “in tongues” that those who hear would not understand at all.⁷

For discerning between good and evil, for evaluating his deeds, the Jew has no need to consult the obscure voice of conscience, because he is constantly informed, taught, by the law.⁸ In his dedication to Theophilus, St. Luke specifies that his purpose is “hina epignos peri hon katechetes logon ten asphaleian, so that you may know precisely the solidity of the teaching that you have received” (or “in which you were instructed,” or “concerning the things that you have learned about”—Luke 1:4). Widely varying interpretations have been given for this verse: some say that Theophilus was an eminent person or a pagan official who had been prejudiced against Christianity by tendentious information and that St. Luke wanted to clarify his judgment. Others speculate that Theophilus was an outsider who was interested in the new religion and that the evangelist wanted to give him reliable information. More likely, he was a good Christian, who, having been taught the logoi of the faith,⁹ would see his belief confirmed by exposition of the teachings and life of the Savior. The logoi he was taught do not constitute a systematic exposition, much less a mystagogic catechesis. It is not possible to specify whether it was a pre- or postbaptismal liturgy; but certainly the formula already has something specifically Christian-catechetical about it, and it would be too weak to translate katechetes “you have heard tell,”¹⁰ as if this referred to the mere receiving of news. We might take it to mean that Theophilus, like Apollos (Acts 18:25), had received an initial, incomplete knowledge, but asphaleia, which is the key word,¹¹ and the aorist “seem to indicate that the instruction had ended.”¹² A written document, objectively informed, composed in an orderly fashion, like this Gospel, would confirm these logoi and demonstrate their trustworthiness.

Gal 6:6 recommends: “Let the person who is being taught the word (ho katechoumenos ton logon) give part of all his goods to the catechist (to katechounti),” i.e., to his instructor in the faith (cf. Phil 4:15). This is perhaps not exactly “the one who prepares the candidate for baptism,” but it is certainly the one who teaches the gospel; this person’s relation to the “catechumen” on the doctrinal level is that of teacher to initiate, a debtor-and-creditor relationship, according to Phil 4:15. These catechumens are attested in the third-fourth century in three letters of recommendation: “give a proper reception to our brothers Ero and Horion and Philadelphos and Pechusis and Naarous, who are catechumens ton synagomenon, and Leo, a catechumen en arche”;¹³ “welcome the catechumen Serenos” (katechoumenon Serenon . . . prosdexai, M. Naldini, Il Cristianesimo in Egitto, n. 20, 4; republished in SB 10255); “receive them then with love as friends, for they are not catechumens” (prosdexai oun en agape hos philous, ou gar katechoumenoi eisin, P.Oxy. 2603, 26; cf. M. Naldini, n. 47).

¹ Cf. E. D. Burton, The Epistle to the Galatians, 2d ed., Edinburgh, 1948, pp. 336ff.

² Cf. κατήγησις ι—διωτέων, instruction given by the physician to the patient (Hippocrates, Praec. 13).

³ Κατηχοῦμαι τοὺς τελῶνας δι[ν]ω—ς σοφίσασθαι τοι—ς διερχομένοις (P.Princ. 20, 3; republished in SB 8072). Tiberius Julius Alexander orders that names of suspects be noted or passed along (Dittenberger, Or. 669, 23–24).

⁴ The poets teach their hearers, μέτροις κατάδουσι καὶ μύθοις κατηχοῦσιν (Lucian, JTr. 39; cf. Lucian, Philopatr. 17; Lucian, Asin. 48). “The intelligent living being is perverted . . . through the instruction given by the entourage, διὰ τὴν κατήγησιν τω—ν συνόντων” (Chryssipus, cited by Diogenes Laertius 7.1.89). Cf. Beyer, on this word, in TDNT, vol. 3, pp. 638–640.

⁵ P.Oxy. 2601, 15: ε—κατηγήσαμεν δὲ ῥήτορα τῆ ι? (the editors compare ε—διδασκῆμην, in P.Oxy. 2343, 8; republished by M. Naldini, // Cristianesimo in Egitto, n. 35).

⁶ Five is a round number (Str-B, vol. 3, pp. 461ff.), cf. P. J. Sijpesteijn, Penthemeros Certificates in Graeco-Roman Egypt, Leiden, 1964.

⁷ 1Cor 14:19; for the textual criticism, cf. G. Zuntz, “Réflexions sur l’histoire du texte paulinien,” in RB, 1952, pp. 11ff.; idem, The Text of the Epistles, London, 1953, p. 230.

⁸ Rom 2:18, κατηχούμενος ε—κ τοῦ νόμου, note the present participle (Cf. W. Schrage, Die konkreten Einzelgebote in der paulinischen Paränese, Gütersloh, 1962, pp. 167ff.). A Christian letter of the fourth century, ἄνθρωπον κατηχούμενον ε—ν τῆ Γενέσει (P.Oxy. 2785, 7).

⁹ Cf. πιστὸς ὁ λόγος (1Tim 1:15; 3:1; 4:9; Titus 3:8; 2Tim 2:11); ε—ντρεφόμενος τοι—ς λόγοις τῆς πίστεως καὶ τῆς καλῆς διδασκαλίας ἡ—παρηκολούθηκας (1Tim 4:6); ὑποτύπωσιν ἔχε ὑγιαινόντων λόγων ὧν παρῆ ε—μοῦ ἤκουσας ε—ν πίστει (2Tim 1:13). J. M. Robinson, “ΛΟΓΟΙ ΣΟΦΩΝ,” in E. Dinkler, Zeit und Geschichte: Dankesgabe an R. Bultmann, Tübingen, 1964, pp. 77–96; H. Schürmann, Lukasevangelium, p. 15.

¹⁰ Rightly emphasized by E. Trocmé, Le ‘Livre des Actes’ et l’histoire, Paris, 1957, p. 49.

¹¹ P.Amh. 131, 3: ἕως ἄν ε—πιγνώ— τὸ ἀσφαλὲς τοῦ πράγματος (second century); 132, 5; P.Giss. 28, 8: ἵνα τὸ ἀσφαλὲς ε—πιγνώ—; cf. W. den Boer, “Some Remarks on the Beginnings of Christian Historiography,” in SP IV, Berlin, 1961, pp. 349ff.

¹² M. J. Lagrange, Luc, p. 7.

¹³ Τοὺς ἀδελφοὺς ἡμῶ—ν Ἡρώνα καὶ Ὠρίωνα καὶ Φιλάδελφον καὶ Πεχῦσιν καὶ Νααρωσοῦν κατηχουμένους τῶ—ν συναγομένων καὶ Λέωνα κατηχούμενον ε—ν ἀρχῇ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου πρόσδεξαι ὡς καθήκει, PSI 1041, 8–10, republished by M. Naldini, // Cristianesimo in Egitto, n. 29, 8–10, who translates: “catecumeni ‘participanti’ e Leone catecumeno ‘iniziato,’” citing 2Clem. 17.1; Tertullian, Praescrip. 41; Coron. 2; Marc. 5.7; cf. Did. 14.1 (J. P. Audet, La Didaché, Paris, 1958, pp. 415ff., 461).

καυχάομαι, καύχημα, καύχησις

kauchaomai, to boast; kauchema, grounds of boasting; kauchesis, boastfulness

kauchaomai, S 2744; TDNT 3.645–653; EDNT 2.276–279; NIDNTT 1.227–228, 2.874; MM 339; L&N 33.368; BDF §§148(2), 187(4), 196, 231(1); BAGD 425 | kauchema, S 2745; TDNT 3.645–653; EDNT 2.276–279; NIDNTT 1.227–229; L&N 25.203, 33.368, 33.371, 33.372; BAGD 426 | kauchesis, S 2746; TDNT 3.645–653; EDNT 2.276–279; NIDNTT 1.227–228; L&N 25.204, 33.368, 33.371; BAGD 426

The etymology of kauchaomai is disputed,¹ but the meaning of this verb, which is usually intransitive, is clear: “boast, glory in, put one’s human confidence in.”² Kauchema is “what one is proud of, claim to glory, event on which excessive confidence is based.” Kauchesis is “vainglory, boastfulness, the act of boasting, of showing oneself off.”³ The verb appears for the first time, with a pejorative meaning,⁴ in Sappho: “May Doricha not have occasion to boast that for the second time he has left for a delightful love” (P.Oxy. 1231, frag. 1 col. I, 10); then Theocritus 5.77: “I tell the truth in everything without boasting”; Herodotus 7.39: “You cannot boast that you have outdone the king in generosity”; Aristotle, Pol. 5.10.1311b4: “The king boasted at (eis ten) having enjoyed his youth.”⁵ Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse, was more vain about his poems than about his military success (Diodorus Siculus 15.6.2); Agathocles was proud of his former occupation of potter.⁶ There is a certain lack of moderation in this self-exaltation,⁷ which in the end offends the gods: “Untimely insolence (to kauchasthai para kairon) accompanies the song of folly” (Pindar, Ol. 9.38). Kauchesis is related to pride (hyperephaneo) in Philodemus of Gadara, Vit. 10, col. XV, 14–22; cf. T. Reub. 3.5. We may therefore conclude that for the most part kauchaomai and its related nouns are pejorative and add, with R. Bultmann, that if there are occasions for expressing legitimate pride, the Greek sensibility feels that it is a violation of aidos and a sign of aneleutheria to blow one’s own horn.

This sense is obviously present in the LXX, notably in the Wisdom writers: at death, “the pride of the godless perishes” (Prov 11:7); “those who place their confidence in their fortune and glory in their great wealth” (Ps 49:6); “Who can boast of having a pure heart?” (Prov 20:9); no one can boast of being Elijah’s equal (Sir 48:4). It is precisely “vainglory” to boast of presents that one does not give (Prov 25:14), to congratulate oneself about the morrow when one does not know “what it may bring to birth”;⁸ but it seems that the basic meaning of kauchaomai is (a) “exalt”: “Do not exalt yourselves (me kauchasthe; hiphil of the Hebrew rabâh, make great, augment), do not speak haughty words”;⁹ (b) hence, a completely original nuance of “joy”: “Let all those exult in you (Hebrew ’alas) who love your name” (Ps 5:12); “Cry out with joy (Hebrew ranan), all you who have an upright heart” (32:11); “Let the saints rejoice in glory” (en doxe);¹⁰ (c) the substantive kauchesis, which always translates the Hebrew tiperet (ornament, adornment, beauty), has an aesthetic connotation: “Our God, we thank you and praise your glorious name” (or “your brilliant renown,” tonomates kaucheseos sou, 1Chr 29:13); “White hairs are a splendid crown” (Prov 16:31; cf. Sir 31:10); “I place a magnificent diadem on your head” (Ezek 16:12; 23:42); an adornment of jubilation (Ezek 24:25); “objects that made up your splendor” (tas skeues tes kaucheseos sou, Ezek 16:17; 23:26). (d) The LXX gives to the verb the sense “be proud”¹¹ and to kauchema that of “honor,” “pride,” “object of praise,” Deut 10:21—“God is the object of your praise” (Hebrew tehillâh); 26:19—“Yahweh has declared today . . . that he will make you superior to (hyperano) all the nations that he has made in renown, in honor, and in glory” (onomaston kai kauchema kai doxaston).¹² (e) The peculiar contribution of the OT to the semantics of kauchaomai is to give this verb a religious meaning and to pose the radical contrast between human vainglory and divine honor. “Yahweh said to Gideon, ‘The people that is with you is too numerous for me to deliver Midian into their hands, lest Israel boast (Hebrew pa’ar in the hithpael, derive glory, vaunt oneself) against me, saying, “It is my own hand that saved me”’” (Judg 7:2); “Let the wise glory not in his wisdom, let the brave glory not in his bravery, let the rich glory not in his wealth; but let the one who glories glory in this, that he understands and knows me.”¹³ The honor and pride of a religious soul is to belong to God and to be consecrated to God’s worship: “Save me, O God of our salvation . . . deliver us so that we may give thanks to your holy Name, so that we may glory in your praise” (kauchasthai en tais ainesesi sou).¹⁴

In the NT, our three terms are unknown in the Gospels and the Johannine writings and appear almost exclusively in St. Paul, who uses them extremely often¹⁵ and consequently in their various meanings. The religious meaning is predominant. It originates with the OT theology¹⁶ and expresses a fundamental conviction of the new faith: all exaltation of the creature by virtue of its qualities, advantages, or spiritual or temporal successes, partakes of the character of a lie. Everything has been given by God, so to God alone belong the praise and the glory. The emphasis is on this exclusivity of kauchaomai: “Let the one who glories glory in the Lord” (2Cor 10:17; 1Cor 1:29, 31), not “in the flesh,”¹⁷ not in works (Eph 2:9), not in humans and their applause.¹⁸ The brilliance, celebrity, and honor in which people take pride are contradictory to the Pauline kauchaomai: “May I glory in nothing but in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ” (Gal 6:14), a degrading punishment, shame and scandal for human wisdom, but for believers the source of joy, because all the benefits of salvation derive from it.¹⁹ Thus one is elevated, magnified, and honored with such a spiritual glory that human “glory” becomes as nothing. So one “glories” not only at being destined for a blessed eternity but also in all that leads to it and allows it to be obtained: tribulation (Rom 5:3), weakness, infirmities.²⁰ As for personal qualities and merits that each one may have, there is no matter for boasting in them and even less for exalting oneself to the detriment of one's neighbor (physiousthe kata, you are puffed up against), because a creature is insignificant, possesses nothing in its own right; everything comes from God: "What do you have that you did not receive? And if you indeed received, why do you boast?" (1Cor 4:7; Eph 2:9).

St. Paul innovates not only in giving the verb kauchaomai the positive meaning "be proud,"²¹ but also "be proud of others" (Gal 6:13). 2Cor 7:14—"If in front of Titus I was somewhat proud of you, I have not been embarrassed by it; but just as we have spoken truthfully in everything, so also our pride (he kauchesis hemon) in Titus's presence is found to be the truth";²² "I knew well your eagerness (for the collection), concerning which I express pride in you (hen hyper hymon kauchomai) before the Macedonians" (2Cor 9:2). Reciprocally, the Corinthians are proud of their apostle (2Cor 5:12). But the word also has the pejorative sense "boast,"²³ and most commonly "exalt oneself unduly." It is a psychological trait of Paul's adversaries to get themselves noticed by exaggerating or twisting the truth (2Cor 11:12); the apostle replies that he himself boasts but without going beyond the "measure," the "limit," that is, in conformity with the divine "rule" that in the case at hand established his ministry to the Gentiles along with all the work that he (Paul) has done in the apostolic field of action.²⁴

The kauchema is normally what one is proud of. St. Paul almost always uses this word in a positive sense,²⁵ notably with respect to deeds, work accomplished, virtues that entitle a person to honor.²⁶ It is the apostle who provided the basis for or legitimated Christian pride, for example, when he insisted on working with his own hands so as to be able to preach the gospel for free: "No one will take away my grounds for pride (to kauchema mou oudeis kenosei), because if I evangelize it is not grounds for pride for me (ouk estin moi kauchema); it is a necessity that is incumbent upon me."²⁷ All the other occurrences apply to the pride that Paul takes in the fervor of Christians or that they feel at being disciples of such an apostle: "You have indeed recognized that we are a grounds of pride for you (kauchema hymon esmen) just as you (will be) for us at the Day of our Lord Jesus."²⁸

Despite what is often said, kauchema and kauchesis are often synonymous in St. Paul (cf. Rom 3:27; 4:2; 1Cor 15:31; 2Cor 1:12; 5:12; 11:10); but normally kauchesis is pride per se, which is neither vanity nor arrogance, nor on the other hand mere contentment or satisfaction, but rather honor, a feeling of dignity and nobility. The apostle gives the precise nuance: "So I have this pride in Christ Jesus for the service of God" (Rom 15:17). This exaltation and this joy are legitimate only "in Christ" and even "in God's service," by the preaching of the gospel; they belong to a conscientious and faithful servant, but one who has lofty sentiments. "Our pride (he kauchesis hemon) is in this: the testimony of our conscience . . . we have comported ourselves in the world and in particular towards you in the grace of God” (2Cor 1:12); “[By] the truth of Christ [that is] in me (an oath formula), this basis for pride (he kauchesis haute) will not be taken away from me.”²⁹ Just as the farmer is proud of the harvest or the artisan of the object that is the fruit of his labor, St. Paul expresses the joy and honor that he feels at the fruitfulness of his ministry: “Who then is our hope, our joy (chara), the crown of our pride (epexegetic genitive), if it is not also you, in the presence of our Lord Jesus, at his appearing?” (1Thess 2:19). Not only is kauchesis Christianized, but its joy is fulfilled and fixed in the eschatological age.

¹ Cf. Moulton-Milligan, on this word. J. S. Bosch, “Gloriarse” según san Pablo: Sentido y teología de καυχάομαι, Rome-Barcelona, 1970, pp. 2ff., 27ff., 89ff., 281ff.

² Construed with ε—ν and ε—πί and the dative, περί and ὑπέρ with the genitive. Transitive with the accusative: καυχάομαι εἰς τι in classical Greek, τι in the Koine (2Cor 9:2; 11:30).

³ M. Carrez, F. Morel, Dictionnaire grec-français du Nouveau Testament, Neuchâtel-Paris, 1971. Cf. R. Astings, “Kauchesis,” in Norsk Teologisk Tidsskrift, 1925, pp. 129–204; B. A. Dowdy, The Meaning of kauchasthai in the New Testament, Nashville, 1955; R. Bultmann, “καυχάομαι,” in TDNT, vol. 3, pp. 645–654.

⁴ Favorable or neutral meanings are rare, in the sense “draw glory from”: a general from the capture of a city (Dionysius of Halicarnassus 8.30); Archilochus gloried in being able to intervene in public debates (ε—καυχήσατο τω— δυνάσθαι μετέχειν τω—ν πολιτικω—ν ἀγονω—ν, Athenaeus, Deip. 14.627 c); “Heaven cannot boast of having more stars” than Egypt has available women (Herondas, Mimes 1.33). Cf. P.Oxy. 1160, 8 and 10: the pride of bearing the name of Diodorus = gift of Zeus.

⁵ In the comic authors: “Neither Sicily nor Elis would boast of feeding this butcher with fish” (καυχήσεται τρέφειν τοιοῦτον ἄρταμον κατ᾽ ἰ—χθύων, Epicrates, frag. 6; in J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 2, p. 353); Cratinus, frag. 95: φθονερὸν ἀνθρώποις τόδε κταμένοις ε—πί αι—ζηοι—σι καυχᾶ—σθαι μέγα (Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 1, p.53).

⁶ Diodorus Siculus 20.63.4; cf. Plutarch, Aem. 27.6: “Aemilius Paulus dismissed the young people after abating their conceit and insolence (τὸ καύχημα καὶ τὴν ὕβριν) with a speech that bridled them like a bit”; Pindar, Isthm. 5.51: “silence with its tide covers over boasting” (καύχημα); cf. P.Oxy. 2637, frag. I a 17.

⁷ PSI 26, 16: καυχα—σθαι ει—ς ε—λπίδας ματείας, to exalt oneself with vain hopes (our three terms are rare in the inscriptions and exceptional in the papyri). Epitaph of Victor at Philippopolis: “It was the god who killed me, not the faithless Pinnas; let him boast of it no more” (L. Robert, Gladiateurs, n. 34); of Achilles at Xanthos: “Euprepes insulted me by boasting of having killed me” (ibid. 107). Cf. the Delphic precept: ε—πὶ ῥώμῃ μὴ καυχῶ— (Dittenberger, Syl. 1268, 23; Stobaeus, Ecl. 4.1.173 = vol. 3, p. 127, 9).

⁸ Prov 27:1; cf. Philo, Prelim. Stud. 107: God becomes favorable when the suppliant “is not puffed up with boasting (καύχησις) and self-sufficiency.” To Ben-Hadad, who was trying to terrify Ahab by insisting on the crushing superiority of his forces, the king of Israel replied that the moment to boast was not when taking up arms but after obtaining victory in battle (Josephus, Ant. 8.372); cf. 1Kgs 20:11.

⁹ 1Sam 2:3 (in connection with arrogance); cf. Judg 7:2 (Hebrew pa’ar); Dan 5:5 (chapter prologue in LXX)—King Baltasar (Belshazzar), in the midst of a great feast, “exalted with wine and καυχώμενος”; excited and jubilant, he praised all the gods of the nations; Sir 24:1—“In the midst of his people, wisdom is glorified,” gives testimony concerning its own excellence; 24:2—“in the presence of God she glories,” shines on the earth as in heaven.

¹⁰ Ps 149:5 (Hebrew ’alaz); cf. 94:3—“How long will sinners exult?”; 3Macc 2:17–18; Sir 17:8—“He granted to them to celebrate his marvels” (καυχα—σθαι ε—ν τοι—ς θαυμασίοις αὐτοῦ, gloss in Sinaiticus). Among the seven Hebrew verbs translated καυχάομαι by the LXX (notably halal), we may mention ’alaz, “rejoice”; ’alas, “rejoice, triumph”; ranan, “sing praises, cry out with joy.” —Likewise καύχημα, 1Chr 16:27—“Glory and praise are before him, power and joy in his sanctuary” (ι—σχὺς καὶ καύχημα [Hebrew hedwâh] ε—ν τόπῳ αὐτοῦ).

¹¹ Sir 11:4; 30:2—“He who raises his son well . . . will be proud of him in the midst of his acquaintances,” who will congratulate him; 38:25—“The one who handles the plow is proud to have the goad as a lance”; 39:8—the scribe “will put his pride in the law of the covenant of the Most High” whose interpreter he is; 50:20—the high priest Simon, in giving the Lord’s benediction, “had the honor of pronouncing his Name”; literally, “he glorified himself in his Name.”

¹² Cf. Deut 33:29—the sword is Israel’s pride; Judith is “the great honor of our race” (Jdt 15:9); Sheshach “the pride of the whole world” (Jer 51:41); fathers are their children’s pride (Prov 17:6; contrasted to αἰ—σχύνη in T. Jud. 14.7), and Israelites’ pride is their ancestors (Sir 44:7); a man’s pride is to pass over an offense (Prov 19:11); the splendor of liturgical ornaments gives Aaron “the perfection of pride” (συντέλειαν καυχήματος, Sir 45:8); a crown of gold is a badge of honor (45:12). The just put their pride in God (Sir 1:11; 9:16; Ps 89:18), the object of their praise (Jer 17:14; cf. 1Chr 29:11). In return, God gives honor, renown, and glory to his people (Jer 13:11; Zeph 3:19-20; cf. Zech 12:7); Philo, Spec. Laws 4.164: “My scepter is the book of the sequel to the law, this object of pride and glory.”

¹³ Jer 9:22-23. These verses were inserted as a gloss in 1Sam 2:10 (the Song of Hannah) and are more or less repeated by T. Jud. 13.2; Philo, Spec. Laws 1.311; Ps.-Phocylides 53. Cf. J. Schreiner, “Jer. IX, 22–23 als Hintergrund des paulinischen ‘Sich-Rühmens,’” in Neues Testament und Kirche (Festschrift R. Schnackenburg), Freiburg-Basel-Vienna, 1974, pp. 530–542.

¹⁴ 1Chr 16:35 (hithpael of the Hebrew shabah, put one’s glory in); cf. Pss. Sol. 17.1—“In you, O God, does my soul glory.”

¹⁵ Around fifty times. The correct reading of 1Cor 13:3 is disputed: ε—ἀν παραδω— τὸ σω—μά μου ἵνα καυθήσομαι (D, F, G, L) or καυχήσομαι (P46, a, A, B, 33, 1739, Sahidic, Bohairic, Origen). Diplomatically, this latter reading is much better supported and it is preferred by a number of exegetes (cf. P. Benoit, “Le Codex paulinien Chester Beatty,” in RB, 1937, p. 74), but it is rejected by almost all the ancient versions, the Fathers of the church, and most moderns. Not only does it go unexplained that copyists should have substituted καυθήσομαι for the thoroughly Pauline καυχάομαι; it is also hard to see what it would mean to “hand over the body” for boasting, or how this contrasts with agape; cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 2, pp. 56–58; E. Preuschen, “‘Und ließe meinen Leib brennen’ (I Kor. XIII, 3),” in ZNW, 1915, pp. 127–138; G. Zuntz, The Text of the Epistles, London, 1953, pp. 35–37; J. C. Hurd, The Origin of I Corinthians, London, 1965, p. 77, n. 4; J. K. Elliott, “In Favour of καυθήσομαι at I Corinthians XIII, 3,” in ZNW, 1972, pp. 297–298 (cf. idem, RB, 1977, pp. 11–12); R. Kieffer, “‘Afin que je sois brûlé’ ou ‘Afin que j’en tire orgueil’? (I Cor. XIII, 3),” in NTS, vol. 22, 1975, pp. 95–97.

¹⁶ Jer 9:22-23, etc; Rom 2:17—“You who bear the name of Jew . . . and glory in God”; 2:23—“You who glory in the law,” you dishonor (ἀτιμάζεις) God when you break the law (cf. Isa 52:5). The Israelite is proud of knowing the only true God and of realizing his will by keeping the commandments. Cf. J. Bonsirven, Judaïsme palestinien, vol. 2, pp. 38–43.

¹⁷ Phil 3:3, “We glory in Christ Jesus (καυχώμενοι ἐν Χριστῷ — Ἰησοῦ) rather than place our confidence in the flesh,” i.e., the carnal observances of the old law, circumcision, human works; which was Israel’s pride (Gal 6:13).

¹⁸ 1Cor 3:21—μηδεὶς καυχάσθω ἐν ἀνθρώποις. The Corinthians were proud of their preachers and teachers (Paul, Apollos, etc.) and proclaimed themselves disciples of one or another of these masters. Cf. M. Carrez, “La Confiance en l’homme et la confiance en soi selon l’apôtre Paul,” in RHPR, 1964, pp. 191–199.

¹⁹ Rom 5:11—“Glorying in God, through our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom we have now obtained reconciliation,” that is, pardon for sins, intimacy with God, access to eternal blessedness; 5:2—depositaries of better promises than those made to Israel, “we owe it to Christ to glory (καυχώμεθα ἐπί) in the hope of the God’s glory”; we exult in this future participation in the divine glory, the object in which we glory.

²⁰ 2Cor 11:3—“If boasting is in order, then I shall boast of my weakness”; 12:5, 9 (cf. A. Fridrichsen, “Zum Stil des paulinischen Peristasenkatalogs,” in Symbolae Osloenses, vol. 7, 1928, pp. 25–29; idem, “Peristasenkatalog und res gestae,” Symbolae Osloenses, vol. 8, 1929, pp. 78–82; T. Fahy, “St. Paul’s ‘Boastings’ and ‘Weakness,’” in ITQ, 1964, pp. 214–227); Jas 1:9—“Let the brother of humble circumstances glory (or rejoice; present imperative καυχάσθω) in his exaltation (spiritual and moral), and the rich person in his humiliation, because he will pass away like a flower of grass.” In human eyes, wealth is “considerable,” money makes for happiness. Under the New Covenant, the small and the weak are exalted (Matt 5:3; Luke 1:52; cf. 1Sam 2:7–8; Ps 72:4; Sir 11:1), and that is what they are to take pride in: “Humble yourselves before the Lord and he will lift you up” (Jas 4:10). The “good” rich person ought to rejoice just as much, knowing that his possessions are ephemeral and that at his death nothing will be left him but his supernatural goods.

²¹ 2Cor 10:8—“If I should be a little too proud of the power (apostolic authority) that the Lord has given me for your edification (the growth of the spiritual edifice which is the community) . . . I should have nothing to be ashamed of (οὐκ αἰ—σχυνθήσομαι)” (S. H. Travis, “Paul’s Boasting in II Corinthians X–XII,” in E. A. Livingstone, SE, vol. 6, Berlin, 1973, pp. 527–532); 2Cor 12:5–6: “With regard to that person (the ecstatic who was raised to the third heaven) I will be proud. . . . If I wanted to boast (of the excellence of these revelations), I would not be foolish (ἄφρων), because I speak the truth; but I refrain”; J. Cambier, “Le Critère paulinien de l’Apostolat en II Cor. XII, 6ff.,” in Bib, 1962, pp. 481–516; Cambier, “Une lecture de II Cor. XII, 6–7 a: Essai d’interprétation nouvelle,” in AnBib 17, Rome, 1963, pp. 475–485.

²² The apostle had praised the Corinthian community, whom Titus knew only by reputation; but he was somewhat apprehensive about the result of the mission that he was entrusting to his collaborator. Had he perhaps exaggerated the qualities of his converts? No. There was a basis for his confidence, and it is understandable that Paul was proud. Just as he had always been sincere in his teaching to the faithful, the praise that he had given did not turn out to be wrong (cf. E. B. Allo, on this text).

²³ 2Cor 11:18—“Because there are many who boast according to the flesh, I also am going to boast”; 12:1—“I must boast, even though it does no good (οὐ συμφέρον); I shall come to visions and revelations of the Lord.” Jas 4:16—“Now you exalt yourselves in your boastings” (καυχᾶσθε ἐν ταῖς ἀλαζονίαις); the latter term describes the pride of riches in 1John 2:16; the adjective ἀλάζων is set parallel to ὑπερήφανος in Rom 1:30; 2Tim 3:2; cf. T. Jos. 17.8. St. James goes on: “all vainglory of this sort is bad” (πᾶσα καύχησις τοιαύτη πονηρά ἐστιν). This is a condemnation of merchants who glory at their facility and their success in business. This vanity and boasting are worse than errors in reasoning; they amount to a profane way of judging, an assessment that leaves God out; cf. J. Marty, L’Épître de Jacques, Paris, 1935, on this text.

²⁴ 2Cor 10:13—“As for ourselves, we boast not beyond our measure (οὐκ εἰς τὰ ἄμετρα καυχησόμεθα), but conformably to the measure (κατὰ τὸ μέτρον) of the limit (τοῦ κανόνος) that God has allotted us, to get as far as to you.” The kanon is the limit or rule (cf. a survey or cadastral sketch of an area done in order to assign parcels of land to various people; the canon frumentarius, etc.; H. Oppel, KANON, Leipzig, 1937; L. Wengée, Canon in den römischen Rechtsquellen und in den Papyri, Vienna, 1941), and also a benefit paid (L. Bove, “Canone: Diritto Romano,” in Novissimo digesto italiano, 1958, pp. 845–846). Here, to put it plainly, Paul is not boasting unduly of work done by others. His measuring rule is the field of action that God has assigned to him; his portion or share has been to establish the Christian community at Corinth; cf. 2Cor 10:15-16: “We do not boast beyond our measure of work done by others,” in the sector attributed to other preachers. The apostle does not encroach upon others’ boundaries (ἐν ἀλλοτρίῳ κανόνι).

²⁵ Cf. the Pythagorean Archytas of Tarentum (Stobaeus, Ecl. 4.1.106; vol. 3, p. 57, 1). The only Pauline exception is 1Cor 5:6, regarding the incestuous person at Corinth, who is a scandal in the community: there is nothing to be proud of (οὐ καλὸν τὸ καύχημα). Cf. P. Genth, “Der Begriff καύχημα bei Paulus,” in NKZ, 1928, pp. 25–29; 1929, pp. 78–82; C. H. Dodd, New Testament Studies, Manchester, 1953, pp. 73ff.

²⁶ Rom 4:2; Gal 6:4—“Let each one examine his own work (ἔργον ε—αυτοῦ) and then if there is occasion for being proud it will be with respect to himself and not others”; evaluation based on the facts has real justification.

²⁷ 1Cor 11:15; cf. Heb 3:6—“If we keep the assurance and the joyful pride of the hope” (τὴν παρρησίαν καὶ τὸ καύχημα τῆς ε—λπίδος); same connection in 2Cor 7:14; the hope is joyful (Rom 12:12; 5:2); joy befits “sharers in a heavenly calling” (Heb 3:1).

²⁸ 2Cor 1:14; the Corinthians’ pride in such a father and teacher is full of joy, as is that stirred in Paul by the devotion and faithfulness of his children: “You are my pride, brethren, in Christ Jesus” (τὴν ὑμετέραν καύχησιν ε—ν Χριστῷ— —Ἰησοῦ, 1Cor 15:31); “Great is the pride that I have in you” (2Cor 7:4, associated with χαρά); 8:24; “You are preparing a basis for pride for me for the Day of Christ” (Phil 2:16); “It is not that we were recommending ourselves to you (ε—αυτοὺς συνιστάνομεν) all over again, but to give you an occasion for pride on our account” (διδόντες ὑμ—ν καυχήματος ὑπὲρ ἡμῶ—ν, 2Cor 5:12); “I sent the brothers so that the pride that we have taken in you (Paul’s praise for the Corinthians regarding the collection) might not be falsified on that point” (2Cor 9:13); “That my return and my presence among you may be for us a new occasion for pride (and joy) in Christ Jesus” (Phil 1:26).

²⁹ 2Cor 11:10 (his disinterestedness in the ministry, cf. W. Pratscher, “Der Verzicht des Paulus auf finanziellen Unterhalt durch seine Gemeinde: Ein Aspekt seiner Missionsweise,” in NTS, vol. 25, 1979, pp. 284–298). Apart from Jas 4:16, two occurrences of kauchesis are pejorative: “In this self-confident boasting, it is not according to the Lord that I speak, but as a fool (ε—ν ἀφροσύνῃ)” (2Cor 11:17). “Where then is boasting (ποῦ οὖν ἡ καύχησις)? It has been ruled out. By what law? By that of works? No, but by the law of faith” (Rom 3:27). The boasting mentioned here is that of the Jews’ claiming their rights vis-à-vis God, their recompense for good works; this pretension is a manifestation of pride; kauchesis is “fundamentally pride at being what one is” (F. J. Leenhardt, Romans, p. 109). Cf. G. Friedrich, Auf das Wort kommt es an, Göttingen, 1978, pp. 107–122.

ΚΕΝΌΣ, ΚΕΝΌΩ

kenos, empty, vain; kenoo, to empty, evacuate, purge

kenos, S 2756; TDNT 3.659–660; EDNT 2.281–282; NIDNTT 1.546–547; MM 340; L&N 32.60, 57.42, 72.10, 89.53, 89.64; BDF §§182(1), 207(3), 211; BAGD 427–428 | kenoo, S 2758; TDNT 3.661–662; EDNT 2.282; NIDNTT 1.546–547; MM 340; L&N 76.27, 87.70; BAGD 428

The dictionaries are ordinarily content to give the adjective the two meanings “empty (without content)” and “vain (without reality),” but the nuances are extremely varied, and the principal ones are found in the NT. In its literal sense, kenos is used to describe objects: an empty house (Menander, Dysk. 223; P.Flor. 294, 52), buildings (Josephus, War 2.636; SB 9898, 11; 10728, 10, 3), vats (O.Bodl. 344, 1), a cistern (Gen 37:24), jugs (Judg 6:16), vases (2Kgs 4:3; Jer 14:3), containers (P.Oxy. 2982, 9; SB 6767, 19; Josephus, Ant. 5.223; 9.48, 49; P.Ross.Georg. V, 5, 10), baskets (P.Ross.Georg. II, 29, 6), jars (“ten drachmas for empty jars,” P.Mich. 601, 11–12; P.Cair.Zen. 59741; PSI 859; P.Tebt. 815; frag. II, verso 27), “empty rack for four bottles” (tetralagynon kenon, P.Wisc. 30, col. I, 10); a small box emptied of its jewels (P.Ryl. 125, 26; from AD 28–29), plates are emptied by pigs (Philo, Contemp. Life 55), a boat (Josephus, War 2.645; Life 167), a ship (“my boat, even when empty [kenon to ploion] could not go down to Alexandria,” P.Magd. 11, 15; from 221 BC); “I brought the boat to land and left it there six months unused” (apo kenon menas, P.Haun. 12, A 5 = SB 9425; cf. Job 7:3, menas kenous). Kenos is also used for beasts that are not laden (P.Mert. 80, 4): two unburdened camels (kamelous kenous dyo, SB 10914, 3); an inscription at Palmyra distinguishes between camels that are not laden (kenai) and those that are (engomoi, Dittenberger, Or. 629, 166). Also, a city is said to be empty of people or of defenders.¹

With regard to persons, kenos is used from Homer on for empty hands.² The LXX often uses this meaning, either to forbid appearing before God without a sacrifice (Exod 23:15; 34:20; Deut 16:16; Sir 35:4), or to express the absence of gifts that one should have brought to someone else or that one should have received.³ It is in this sense that in contrast to the hungry, who are filled, the Virgin Mary declares that God “has sent the rich away empty-handed.”⁴ This is not a reference to the upsetting of social conditions but to messianic benefits: forgiveness and salvation. God does not take away the wealth of the wealthy, but he does not give them his goods; they are not despoiled, but neither do they receive anything. In the same fashion, in the parable of the Wicked Husbandmen, the servant who comes to collect the fruit of the vineyard is sent away brutally, empty-handed (aposteilan kenon, Mark 12:3; Luke 20:10-11).

Hence the nuance “useless, without effect or result, vain.”⁵ Thus Saul’s sword did not return without success (2Sam 1:22), projectiles do not remain without effect (Josephus, War 5.61), or brotherly affection proves vain (1.275), or violence useless (Ant. 19.27); likewise certain expenditures (P.Mich. 203, 12), and especially vain or fruitless words from which no profit may be drawn (Job 6:6; 15:3; Wis 1:11). The words of this law “are not for you a vain word, but are your life” (Deut 32:47). A vain desire (kene orexis) is one that is not satisfied;⁶ the cares of mortal life are vain because they serve no purpose (Philo, Drunkenness 152: kenai spoudai). Kenon poiein means to leave empty, that is, fruitless (Isa 32:6; 45:18; cf. 49:4). It is in this sense that St. Paul’s visit to Thessalonica was not without success (ten eisodon ... ou kene gegonen).⁷ The litotes is effective in 1Cor 15:10—“His grace to me did not become useless” (ou kene egenethe), meaning that it was prodigiously effective. If the Corinthians surpass themselves in the Lord’s work and know that their toil is not useless (ho kopos hymon ouk estin kenos en Kyrio, 15:58), this means that despite obstacles and disappointments their efforts will come to fruition; they will triumph.

In 1Cor 15:14—“If Christ is not raised, then our preaching is in vain, and your faith is also in vain”⁸—the meaning is more forceful. Ordinarily kenos means “without content, without object,” but here it has to be “nothingness, absolute void.” This “nothing” meaning occurs already in Aristotle: “For certain ancients (Parmenides and Zeno), the empty is nothingness” (to kenon ouk on, Gen. Cor. 1.8.325a); Jer 18:15—“They burn incense to nothingness” (eis kenon ethymiasan, cf. 51:58; Isa 59:4; 65:23; Ps 25:3). This meaning is especially Philonian: “The Creator made the idea of air and of the void . . . the void is very deep and immense”,⁹ “a nothing (ouden estin), without consistency, mortal realities that go into the void (kata kenou bainonta) like dreams.”¹⁰ So when Job 7:16 considers life to be like a breath (Hebrew hebel), it envisages it as being flimsy, next to nothing; and according to the LXX of the messianic Ps 2:1, quoted in Acts 4:25, the peoples plot vain things (emeletesan kena) that cannot succeed: they plan nothingness (cf. 1Macc 9:68; 4Macc 8:18).

This meaning of inanity, often expressed by eis kenon (“in vain”),¹¹ is the commonest in St. Paul: “Provided that our toil was not in vain” (eis kenon genetai ho kopos hemon, 1Thess 3:5). “We urge you not to receive the grace of God in vain” (me eis kenon ten charin tou theou dexasthai hymas, 2Cor 6:1), that is, not to let it be inefficacious, fruitless; here kenos has a religious and moral meaning. The connotations are athletic in the formula “run in vain” (Gal 2:2; Phil 2:16), which evokes the efforts of the athlete who does not obtain success but pours himself out for nothing.¹²

The LXX also uses dia kenes, “without reason, without purpose,” to express the groundlessness of an action.¹³

In this figurative sense kenos quite often has a pejorative nuance, synonymous with “false, lying”; kene doxa is a false or erroneous idea.¹⁴ Abraham judges that the customs of the Egyptians are “empty and contain no truth.”¹⁵ A person may be empty of knowledge (Philo, Heir 194), of wisdom (Change of Names 270), prudence (Flight 45), or sense (To Gaius 119), like the croaking of frogs (Sacr. Abel and Cain 69). Hopes especially are described as vain (because deceptive; kenai elpides kai pseudeis),¹⁶ and more and more conceit (Prelim. Stud. 61), vanity (Drunkenness 39, 40), bragging and pride.¹⁷ Kenos then means “deceptive, lying”;¹⁸ it amounts to wind (Hebrew hebel) or smoke (Philo, Cherub. 91), hence is futile.¹⁹ This is the word’s meaning in Eph 5:6—“Let no one mislead you with vain reasonings (medeis hymas apatato kenois logois), for because of such things God’s wrath falls on those who are disobedient.” One falls into error when one does not take into account the supreme rule of truth, which is divine revelation. Specious arguments are only pretexts for doing evil (1Pet 2:16; Jas 1:14; 3:14). Likewise Col 2:8—“Take care that no one kidnaps you by means of philosophy, vain deception, according to the tradition of men.” The prestige of eminent teachers and prestigious masters makes their hearers fall prey to illusion; this is the victory of imposture (cf. P. Tebt. 741, 23).

Finally, kenos means “foolish, senseless,” and is used to describe presumption (Philo, Rewards 94: kenon auchema) or conceptions: “What a stupid and vain idea (anoeton kai kenon) . . . to think that you could be Alcmena’s son” (Aristophanes, Ran. 530); “vain and stupid foolishness” (kene kai mataia anoia, P. Oxy. 2713, 15; same adjectives linked, Ep. Arist. 137, 205; cf. 194; Plutarch, Art. 15.6). It is also applied to persons:²⁰ “I do not aspire to follow beyond: I would be a fool” (keinos eien, Pindar, Ol. 3.45); “The fullness of time that makes you old makes you also foolish” (tou nou kenon, Sophocles, OC 931). When Haemon says, “It is no threat to reply to your vain arguments” (kenas gnomas), Creon replies, “It will cost you dearly to dare to reason with me when you yourself are so empty of reason” (on phrenon autos kenos, Ant. 753–754; cf. 709). Those who worship idols and forget the true God are empty brains (hoi kenoï phrenon).²¹ This is like the apostrophe in Jas 2:20—“O foolish man (o anthrope kene), do you wish to know that faith without works is sterile?” It is equivalent to aphron (1Cor 15:36); a head without a brain is incapable of reflecting and understanding.

The verb kenoo, which is much less common, means “to empty, evacuate,”²² and hence “purge” in Philo: the physician decides to purge (kenoo), cut, and burn for the good of the patient (Cherub. 15); “I will purge the sick one” (kenoso ton kamnonta, Alleg. Interp. 3.226). In a metaphorical sense, “A perfect thought purifies and purges the soul of its sins” (Dreams

1.198; Decalogue 13). The verb is only used twice in the LXX to translate the pual of the Hebrew 'amal, “waste away, languish” (Jer 14:2). In the papyri, nothing can be added²³ to the three references given by Moulton-Milligan: “I finished unloading (exekenosa) on the 18th of the same month” (BGU 27, 7; cf. P.Ryl. 125, 24); “It is easy for a god . . . to empty of his swinish wealth the dirty usurer and hoarder.”²⁴ The strong meaning “annihilate, destroy,” corresponding to certain usages of kenos, is well attested in Vettius Valens (kenosin bion, 2.22; p. 90, 7) and is perceptible in Philo, To Gaius 117: “That which seemed to still hold solid slips away and falls in ruins.”

This is certainly the nuance in the five uses by St. Paul, who does not have the mission of “evangelizing with learned speech, lest the cross of Christ be nullified” (aorist passive subjunctive, hina me kenothē).²⁵ St. Paul’s claim to glory is his apostolic disinterest, whereby he preaches the gospel freely; “no one will nullify” (oudeis kenosei, future active) this claim (1Cor 9:15); the apostle’s pride before the Macedonians in the generosity of the Corinthians will not be annulled, reduced to nothing.²⁶ “If those who rely upon the law were the heirs, then faith would be reduced to nothing (kekenotai he pistis, perfect passive) and the promise annihilated (katergetai he epangelia).”²⁷

There remains Phil 2:7, heauton ekenosen, well translated by the Vulgate’s exinanivit, “He annihilated himself.” The causative denominative verb kenoo, used here in the aorist indicative and without complement, but followed by a reflexive pronoun, has no parallel in Greek and looks like a hapax;²⁸ it does not mean a voluntary renunciation, nor even a stripping, but an inaction. Its meaning is metaphorical; so it is not a “theological” technical term, but a term of a religious soul contemplating the mystery of Christ and gaining the sense of divine transcendence and creaturely nothingness. That is to say, the translation “annihilate” must not be given up; it says what it means, especially in a hymn; and this kenosis is relative. Christ did not cease to be God and did not become something else; his mode of existing and his morphe changed when the Word assumed an earthly condition through the incarnation;²⁹ but his personal identity is immutable.³⁰ The subject of ekenosen is not the incarnate Christ, but the preexistent Lord who by his assumption of human nature is “reduced to nothing.” This was a legitimate expression at a time when it had not yet been defined that “He” had one person with two natures. The best parallel is 2Cor 8:9—“He made himself poor, although he was rich” (eptocheusen plousios on).

¹ Josephus, War 1.62; 2.515; 3.298; 5.373; Ant. 6.235: “David’s place was empty”; 9.84; cf. empty stomach (War 5.549), empty throat (Ps 102:9); Menander, Sam. 682: “I would do so well that not a barber shop, not a

portico would remain empty”; Sik. col. VI, c, 6; “Let the wrestler not be supported by lean loins, but let this region be to a certain degree well nourished” (Philostratus, Gym. 35); “The virtuous man must not leave anything unoccupied or empty for the free access of sin” (Philo, Rewards 112; cf. 65). Cf. Euripides, Hec. 230: “the great battle, full of moans, not empty of tears” (πλήρης στεναγμῶν—ν οὐδὲ δακρύων κενός).

² Homer, Il. 2.298: “It is shameful, after so long a sojourn, to return empty-handed” (κενεόν τε νέεσθαι); Od. 10.42; P.Rein. 55, 9: “If the ass-driver Dioscoros comes to you . . . above all do not send him away empty” (μὴ ἀναπέμψης αὐτὸν κενόν).

³ Gen 31:42, Jacob to Laban: “If God had not been for me, you would have dismissed me empty-handed (Hebrew rēqam)”; Exod 3:21—“You shall not go away empty-handed”; Deut 15:13; Ruth 3:17—“You must not return empty-handed to your mother-in-law”; Jdt 1:11—“They sent back Nebuchadnezzar’s messengers empty-handed”; Job 22:9—“You sent away widows empty-handed”; Sir 29:9—“Do not send the poor away with nothing” (αὐτὸν κενόν); cf. Jer 50:9—the arrows of an accomplished warrior, who does not return empty-handed. Josephus, War 6.405: having come to pillage, the soldiers went back out of the houses empty-handed; SB 6769, 30: κενὸν ἀπῆλθεν; 7247, 24; 7248, 11.

⁴ Luke 1:53—ε—ξαπέστειλεν κενούς. “The image is that of a court. According to oriental custom, the rich come with gifts and receive even greater gifts from the monarch, who does not want to be outdone in generosity; the poor are set aside.... It is not like that with God. . . . The rich think that everything is owed them; he sends them away empty” (M. J. Lagrange, on this text); cf. Pss. Sol. 4.19—let the flatterer “return home empty-handed”; T. Job 10.4.

⁵ Sophocles, OC 359: “You have not come in vain” (ἦκεις γὰρ οὐ κενή γε); Heliodorus, Aeth. 10.30.4: after a fall, vain movements of the limbs to stand up; Philodemus of Gadara, Inf. 8.27, 31: κίνησις ἔστι κενόν; 9.2; 12.9–10; T. Job 24.2—Job’s wife toiled with hardships in vain; IGLS 1125, 6: “For us the Underworld is the end of vain troubles”; Jewish epitaph at Rachelis: “Do not mourn in vain for me, uselessly” (μὴ με μάτην πενθι—τε κενάς, CII 1513, 5; SEG I, 573; SB 6650); “To a mother who nourished me in vain with the milk of her breasts I was not able to show the gratitude that a child grants his parents in their old age” (SEG I, 567, 9 = SB 6706); epigram of Catilius: “without noting in vain who my author is” (οὐ κενὰ μενύων, E. Bernand, Philae, vol. 2, n. 143, 4).

⁶ Philo, Decalogue 119; cf. κενὰ ἐπιθυμίαι = unsatisfied desires, Worse Attacks Better 113; Husbandry 36; Drunkenness 206; Spec. Laws 4.82.

⁷ 1Thess 2:1; κενή is the opposite of the abundant fulfillment (πληροφορία) in 1:5. Cf. J. Gribomont, “Facti sumus parvuli: La Charge apostolique (I Thess. II, 1–12),” in L. de Lorenzi, Paul de Tarse apôtre de notre temps, Rome, 1979, pp. 313–338.

⁸ Cf. T. G. Bucher, “Die logische Argumentation in I Korinther XV, 12–20,” in Bib, 1974, pp. 465–486; M. Bachmann, “Zur Gedankenführung in I Kor. XV, 12ff.,” in TZ, 1978, pp. 265–276; T. G. Bucher, “Nochmals zur Beweisführung in I Korinther XV, 12–20,” TZ, 1980, pp. 129–152.

⁹ Philo, Creation 29, 32; Alleg. Interp. 1.44; 3.4; Post. Cain 6; Plant. 7; Heir 67, 228; Dreams 2.245; Etern. World 21, 78, 102–103; cf. Hippocrates, Aph. 7.24: “After a bone section, delirium; if it penetrates into the void” (= the cavity, ἤν κενεὸν λάβη [ἡ διακοπή]). Aristotle analyzes “the vulgar definition of the void (τὸ κενόν): where there is no body, but there could be one” (Ph. 4.208b26; Cael. 1.279a13).

¹⁰ Unchang. God 172; Migr. Abr. 80—“speech is stepping on empty air” (kata kenou bainei); Spec. Laws 3.148; Rewards 19; Flacc. 164: “phantoms going into the void.” Cf. Migr. Abr. 35: “Certain days I came as a void: I was suddenly filled with these ideas”; Spec. Laws 1.327: “an empty name, lacking true reality.”

¹¹ Lev 26:20: “Your strength will be consumed in vain (εἰς κενόν); your land will not give any crops”; Jer 29:8—his soul has hoped uselessly; Jer 6:29—the refining is done in vain; 46:11—“in vain do you multiply remedies; there is no healing for you”; Job 39:16—the ostrich cares nothing about the inanity (εἰς κενόν) or her toil; Josephus, Ant. 19.96: time uselessly lost, a missed opportunity. Cf. water flowing out and being wasted: ἵνα μὴ τοῦ ὕδατος ἀφεθέντος διὰ τοῦ σωλήνος εἰς κενὸν φέρηται (P.Petr. II, 37, 1 b recto; third century BC).

¹² Cf. V. C. Pfitzner, Paul and the Agon Motif, Leiden, 1967, pp. 3, 49, 76ff., 99ff., 127, 183; cites Menander, Mon. 51: ἀνήρ ἄβουλος εἰς κενὸν μοχθεῖ—τρέχων. Cf. εἰ—κῆ (Gal 3:4).

¹³ “You will sow your seed in vain (Hebrew rîq); you enemies will eat from it” (Lev 26:16); “You have stirred me up against Job for no reason” (Job 2:3); “The one who multiplies our wounds for no reason” (Hebrew hiphil of haser, Job 9:17; Prov 23:29); “For no reason (Hebrew hinnam) you took security from your brothers” (Job 22:6; Ps 7:4). Lysias confesses, “I sent to have the inhabitants of Judah exterminated without cause” (1Macc 6:12). Cf. P.Hib. 66, 5: There is no reason to thank us (228 BC). A vain fear is one that is not objectively justified (Xenophon, An. 2.2.21); Eros empties us of the belief that we are strangers to one another (Plato, Symp. 197 d). A judicial petition κατὰ κενὸν is lacking any legal proof (UPZ 161, 36, 67; 162, col. IV,36).

¹⁴ Plutarch, Cons. ux. 6; Philo, Alleg. Interp. 2.57; Joseph 126 (κενής διανοΐας); Husbandry 56; Drunkness 36, 38 (contrasted to “truth”), 57, 76, 144; Sobr. 57; Migr. Abr. 21; Prelim. Stud. 6, 15; Flight 47, 128; Change of Names 93–96; Dreams 1.82, 126; 2.16, 42, 46–48, 50, 53ff.; Decalogue 4; Spec. Laws 1.27; Virtues 7, 100; Good Man Free 66, 158; Contemp. Life 17. Cf. empty and deceptive conceptions (κεναὶ καὶ ψευδεῖς, Sacr. Abel and Cain 84).

¹⁵ Josephus, Ant. 1.166; some people think that Plato’s works are empty discourses (λόγους κενούς, Ag. Apion 2.225; Plato, Lach. 196 b). Garrulous folk make “long, empty speeches” (Philo, Worse Attacks Better 130); “the error is to believe in vain calculations” (Alleg. Interp. 3.229; Cherub. 69). “I do not want to send you back on a vain pretext” (Menander, Dysk. 322; Demosthenes, Corona 18.150).

¹⁶ Sir 34:1; Wis 3:11; Job 7:6 (‘epes); Isa 9:28; Philo, Moses 1.195; Aeschylus, Pers. 804; Anth. Pal. 9.411. Cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, p. 298, n. 4.

¹⁷ Homer, Od. 22.249; Philo, Drunkness 128; Epictetus 2.19.8: “If I am conceited (ἄν ὦ κενός), I can bowl over my dinner companions by listing those who have written on the subject”; 4.4.35. Cf. Oepke, “κενός,” in TDNT, vol. 3, pp. 659–662.

¹⁸ Hebrew kazab, Hos 12:11; Mic 1:14; Hab 2:3; cf. lying words (Exod 5:9, Hebrew sheqer), false oath (Sir 23:11).

¹⁹ Plutarch, De laude 3: “Praise is futile (κενὸς ἔπαινος) when one appears to praise oneself in order to get oneself praised. It is then the object of the greatest scorn”; Cons. ux. 6: “unwarranted and ungrateful grief” (εἰς κενὸν καὶ ἀχάριστον πένθος); De Pyth. or. 8.

²⁰ In Judg 9:4; 11:3, the kenoi are good-for-nothings, adventurers; cf. Neh 5:13; Plutarch, De laude 5: “We consider people who strut about with heads held high foolish and conceited” (ἀνοήτους καὶ κενούς).

²¹ Philo, Migr. Abr. 138; Dreams 1.49; Moses 1.325; Spec. Laws 1.311; 4.129, 200; Virtues 179.

²² Hippocrates, Morb. Sac. 9: “Epilepsy sets on . . . because the veins are empty (passive, κενω—νται) and blood is in short supply”; Herodotus 4.123: “the town had been completely emptied” (κεκενωμένου); Euripides, Med. 959: empty the hands; Ion 447, the temples; Bacch. 730: “I left the thicket (cf. “vacate the premises”) where I was hidden in ambush”; Aeschylus, Suppl. 660: “May the plague never empty their city of people”; Philo, Abraham 91, 136: “The cities would be as if emptied by a pestilential disease”; Spec. Laws 2.170; Virtues 43: “The reserves came to fill the empty places left in the enemy ranks”; Rewards 142: “The granaries that are full of food and wealth will be empty”; Etern. World 128: “The elephants, bitten by the serpents, were emptied of their vital force”; To Gaius 90: “You have emptied the cities of all who contribute to its welfare and happiness”; Josephus, War 1.355: “The Romans emptied the city of its wealth and its inhabitants” (= Ant. 14.484); 2.457: “Caesarea was completely emptied of Jews”; cf. 3.186: a cistern; 3.259: quivers; Ant. 9.264: a chest; 10.3; 12.250: the temple emptied of its treasures. Cf. Sophocles, Aj. 986: “One of our enemies must not take him away from us, like the whelp of a widowed lioness.”

²³ Nothing can be drawn from BGU 1683, 3—κενώσων (fragment of a letter from the third-fourth century)—because the papyrus is very mutilated.

²⁴ Cercidas, Mel. (second century BC), in P.Oxy. 1082, frag. 1, col. II, 5ff.

²⁵ 1Cor 1:7—Salvation does not rest on the brilliance and facility of human wisdom; that would be to supplant the cross, the scandalous mystery of divine wisdom, which demands participation by faith. The cross would not just be robbed of its saving virtue; it would be reduced to nothingness; cf. C. Masson, Vers les sources d’eau vive, Lausanne, 1961, pp. 189–207.

²⁶ 2Cor 9:3—ἵνα μὴ κενωθῆ (aorist passive subjunctive). Paul sends Titus and two other brothers to stir up givers for the collection: let them be ready on time!

²⁷ Rom 4:14; the two verbs are synonymous, and the first cannot be rendered “would become vain” or even “would be emptied of its content” or “useless.” Those who are faithful to the former law, according to which the importance of works is paramount, put it into practice; consequently, they are sure to benefit from the messianic promises. But the old dispensation is abolished, no longer exists; consequently, to rely on it is to annihilate the meaning and the role of faith in the new covenant, which is substituted for the old; it has disappeared; it exists no longer (cf. Gal 3:17-18).

²⁸ Literary affinities of the hymn with a pre-Pauline model have been found (O. Cullmann, Christology of the New Testament, Philadelphia, 1963, pp. 158ff.), notably with the book of Wisdom (J. Murphy-O'Connor, "Christological Anthropology in Phil. II, 6–11," in RB, 1976, pp. 25–50; A. Feuillet, "L'Hymne christologique de l'Épître aux Philippiens," in RB, 1965, pp. 352–380; critiqued by J. Coppens, "Les Affinités littéraires de l'Hymne christologique Phil. II, 6–11," in ETL, 1966, pp. 238–241), the Epistle to the Hebrews (O. Hofius, Der Christushymnus Philipper II, 6–11, Tübingen, 1976), the first Adam (L. Ligier, Péché d'Adam et péché du monde, Paris, 1961, vol. 2, pp. 346–361), and the Suffering Servant of Isaiah (L. Cerfaux, "L'Hymne au Christ-Serviteur de Dieu," in Recueil Cerfaux, vol. 2, Gembloux, 1954, pp. 425–437). The reference to Isa 53:12 given by W. Warren ("Ἐαυτὸν ἐ—κένωσεν, Phil. II, 7," in JTS, 1911, pp. 461–463) is probably useful for the theology of the passion: "He handed himself over for death." The Hebrew verb 'arâh would mean "empty, despoil, denude," but the LXX did not translate it by κενόω! And hardly anyone has studied the semantics of this verb or of κενός! The two major studies on our verb are those of R. P. Martin, Carmen Christi, pp. 165ff., and P. Henry, "Kénose," in DBSup, vol. 5, col. 7–16.

²⁹ J. Dupont ("Jésus-Christ dans son abaissement et son exaltation d'après Phil. II, 6–11," in RSR, 1950, pp. 500–514); A. Feuillet (Le Christ sagesse de Dieu, Paris, 1966, pp. 341ff., 354); J. Jeremias ("Zu Phil. II, 7: Ἐαυτὸν ἐ—κένωσεν," in NovT, 1963, pp. 182–188, reprinted in Abba, Göttingen, 1966, pp. 308–313); and P. Lamarche ("L'Hymne de l'Épître aux Philippiens et la kénose du Christ," in L'Homme devant Dieu: Mélanges H. de Lubac, Paris, 1963, vol. 1, pp. 147–152; cf. J. G. Gibbs, "The Relation between Creation and Redemption according to Phil. II, 5–11," in NovT, 1970, pp. 270–283), relying on Isa 53:12, see here the sacrifice that Christ made of his own life and not a renunciation of the divine glory in the Incarnation; which is contested by M. D. Hooker (Jesus and the Servant, London, 1959, p. 12) and J. Coppens ("Phil. II, 7 et Is. LIII, 12: Le Problème de la 'Kénose,'" in ETL, 1965, pp. 147–150; cf. A. Feuillet, "L'Homme Dieu considéré dans sa condition terrestre de Serviteur et de Rédempteur," in RB, 1942, pp. 58–79; D. Georgi, "Der vorpaulinische Hymnus Phil. II, 6–11," in E. Dinkler, Zeit und Geschichte, pp. 263–293).

³⁰ It is perhaps wrong to comment on this hymn as a rigorous theological account and to define kenosis too precisely in terms of what precedes and follows. If one were to do so, it is more the Incarnation of God that would be like an annihilation; because, once human, it would be normal for Christ to die, even if this death is singularly aggravated by the crucifixion.

κεράτιον

keration, carob pod; karat (monetary unit)

keration, S 2769; EDNT 2.283; MM 341; L&N 3.46; BAGD 429

The prodigal son of Luke 15:15-16, given the job of feeding pigs,¹ “desired (epethymeî, imperfect tense for habitual action) to fill his stomach with the carob pods (keratia) that the pigs were eating.”² The carob tree (Ceratonia siliqua) can grow to a height of forty feet and a circumference of six feet. Its leaves are leathery and evergreen, its flowers reddish, and locusts do not attack it. Its abundant fruit, the keration (diminutive of keras, so literally “small horn”)—which only appears, according to the rabbis, seventy years after the tree is planted and three years after it flowers (cf. Str-B, vol. 2, p. 214)—is a long pod, thick and flat (about five or six inches long and one inch wide) that contains a sweet-tasting pulp that is used as livestock feed. “This fruit is quite sour when green, but dried carob pods are sweeter, and people snack on them as Orientals do with chick-peas, peanuts, etc.”³ They are also used in a pharmaceutical extract and in syrup form (akanthes keratia, P.Leid. X, col. XII, 35; from the third-fourth century; cf. Dioscorides, Mat. Med. 1.114); they are helpful for gastroenteritis.⁴

Carob is hardly mentioned in the papyri except in the accounts of a farmer from AD 78 (P.Lond. 131, 7; vol. 1, p. 189). But from the third-fourth century, in Egypt the word refers to a monetary unit, the karat (cf. the Latin siliqua). Phoibammon asks his brother to buy for him while he is at Alexandria “a robe of Antioch, embroidered, not much worn, for about ten keratia, a small chair for the workshop, some ink, a pen from Antioch, a copy priced at one and a half keratia” (P.Fouad 74, 7–9). “The master knows that a phelonis (cloak) costs more than . . . keratia.”⁵ In a private account from the third-fourth century, we read: “21 nomismatia (the name of a coin), 6 keratia on the installment account . . . for the baker 19 keratia on the children’s linens . . . 3 keratia on the wine.”⁶ In the fifth century, one artabe of wheat is worth three keratia, and one artabe of barley almost two keratia (P.Sorb. 61, 8, 13). In a receipt handed over to an epimeletes: “I declare that I have received from your majesty four nomismata (solidi) . . . less five keratia that were given me as my annual salary for both jobs, that of dyer and that of tapestry-maker, which I have carried out. . . .”⁷ For 33 knidia of wine I received 24 keratia” (P.Berl.Zill. XIII, 3). “I will pay annually a rent of ten keratia in common currency”;⁸ etc.

¹ Βόσκειν χοίρους; this word for swine (χοι—ρος; cf. Luke 8:32-33) is pejorative; the French here would be cochon, as opposed to porc for υ—ς in 2Pet 2:22. Cf. the complaint against two πορνοβοσκοί (brothel-keepers), PSI 1055. In Egypt, herds of swine could be as large as four hundred head (P.Cair.Zen. 59310), and each swineherd could keep as many as seventy animals (ibid. 59652). The archives of Zeno mention about forty of these hired workers, whose material circumstances must have been difficult, judging from their numerous grievances; a good number of them ran away because they were unable to meet their obligations (ibid. 59310), their wages were paid late, and the owner went so far as to imprison them (ibid. 59495). Cf. A. Swiderek, “La Société indigène en Egypte au IIIe siècle avant notre ère d’après les archives de Zénon,” in JJP, 1954, pp. 237ff., 265ff., 273. A rabbinic proverb went, “Cursed be the man who raises pigs, and cursed be the man who teaches his son Greek wisdom” (b.B. Qam. 82 b).

² Luke 15:16. The best manuscripts read γεμίσαι τὴν κοιλίαν; but the reading χορτασθῆναι has the support of P75 and yields no difference in meaning; cf. J. Dupont, Béatitudes, vol. 3, pp. 47 and 48 n. 4. On the verb ε—πιθυμέω, cf. ibid., p. 48, n. 3.

³ M. J. Lagrange, Luc, 3d ed., Paris, 1927, on this text; cf. Pliny, HN 13.16; Columella, Rust. 5.10; 7.9; Horace, Epist. 2.123; Persius, Sat. 3.55; Juvenal, Sat. 11.59; M. Gandoget, E. Levesque, “Carob,” in Dictionnaire de la Bible, vol. 2, col. 308–311; W. Corswant, Dictionnaire d’archéologie biblique, Neuchâtel-Paris, 1956, p. 59; F. M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, Paris, 1933, vol. 1, p. 206. The carob tree is popularly called “St. John’s tree”; cf. R. K. Harrison, Healing Herbs of the Bible, Leiden, 1966, p. 32. According to Lev. Rab. 35, when the Israelites eat carobs they are doing penance.

⁴ Old Egyptian medicine recommended dried carob pods for dental ulcers and to strengthen the gums (P.Ebers, n. 746), to cure a nurse of a disease called bââ (ibid.), to get rid of a cough (n. 314), for stomach pains (n. 205), to refresh the heart and invigorate the blood vessels (n. 139), for diseases of the womb (P.Kahoum 3–9), etc. Cf. G. Lefebvre, Essai sur la médecine égyptienne de l’époque pharaonique, Paris, 1956, pp. 65, 94, 110, 114, 118, etc.

⁵ P.Michael. 38, 3. On the paenula, the winter cloak (2Tim 4:13), cf. C. Spicq, “Pèlerine et vêtements,” in Mélanges Tisserant, vol. 1, p. 389. Add to the references there cited P.Mil.Vogl. 256, 20; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 18, 21; P.Oxy. 3201, 7.

⁶ Νομισμάτια κα? κεράτιας? ὑπὲρ τῆς καταβολῆς . . . τω— ἀρτοκόπω κεράτια ιθ? ὑπὲρ ὀθονίων τω—ν τέκνων . . . κεράτια γ? ὑπὲρ τοῦ οἴνου, P.Alex. 39, 3, 10, 13.

⁷ P.Got. 9, 11; cf. a list of employees, “Victor: eight solidi less eighteen keratia” (P.Harr. 101, 4).

⁸ Pap.Lugd.Bat. XVI, 8, 26–27; cf. P.Ant. 91, 8: “I have promised to pay an indemnity of nine gold keratia”; P.Oxy. 2237: a price of six gold solidi less six keratia; P.Mert. 95, 4: an order to pay eight gold keratia to the guards, to the Arab archers; P.Stras. 247, 15; P.Ryl. 707, 2–3; C.P.Herm. 26, 10; 30, 19; 41, 5–6: “two solidi and two gold keratia”; P.Mich. 607, 16–17; 612, 15. In the eighth century, the value of a solidus is twenty-two and two-thirds keratia, cf. P.Apoll. 81, 11, 13; 86, 4, etc. L. C. West, A. C. Johnson, Currency in Roman and Byzantine Egypt, 2d ed., Amsterdam, 1967, pp. 129, 135.

κερματιστής, κολλυβιστής, τραπεζίτης

kermatistes, money changer; kollybistes, changer; trapezites, changer, banker

kermatistes, S 2773; EDNT 2.284; MM 342; L&N 57.205; BAGD 429 |
kollybistes, S 2855; EDNT 2.306; MM 353; L&N 57.205; BAGD 442 |
trapezites, S 5133; EDNT 3.367; MM 640; L&N 57.216; BAGD 824

All along the court of the Gentiles in the temple at Jerusalem—as under a portico at Ephesus and at Delos in the first century (trapezeitike stoa)—there were shops set up where the salt, wine, and oil needed for the sacrifices were sold.¹ There also were the tables of the money changers,² who supplied to the Jews the Tyrian shekels (tetradrachma) and half-shekels (didrachma)³ used for buying their offerings and paying the temple tax (two drachmas). Hence John 2:14—“Jesus found seated in the temple the sellers of cattle, of sheep, and of doves, and the money changers seated, tous kermatistas kathemenous,” before their low tables full of coins. The designation kermatistes, unknown from other sources,⁴ is derived from kermatizo, “reduce to small bits, change money,” and kerma, “coin”; but as opposed to the literary texts, the papyri show that this term refers not so much to small change as to the amount of hard cash one has available for purchases and other daily needs.⁵

John 2:15 continues: “He ran them all out . . . and he poured out the money of the changers, kai ton kollybiston execheen to kerma.”⁶ Kollybistes,

“changer,” a word that is late and rare in popular Greek⁷ and is disapproved by the Atticists,⁸ derives from kollybos, which means “‘coin,’ ‘exchange premium or rate,’ and—in the plural—‘delicacies.’ Kollybistes relates to the first two meanings.”⁹ In changing a certain coinage for another, from copper to silver, for example (P.Ryl. 192, 10), the kollybistai took a fee, the kollybos (Hebrew qalebôs); the same word also referred to the rate of exchange.¹⁰ In 160 BC, Delphi, having received a donation of “eighteen thousand silver drachmas of Alexander” from King Attalus II, converted into local currency, asks that “to cover expenses and costs for the journey (of the ambassadors) it be permitted to charge an exchange premium (ek tou kollybou) and that those who carry out the transaction should give an accounting to the city” (Dittenberger, Syl. 672, 32). If the island league praises Timon, banker at Delos, for changing money without charging a kollybos (IG XII5, 817, 4, 8–10), the changers of the banks of Oxyrhynchus¹¹ are accused of shutting down and not accepting the bad imperial currency; the strategos forces them to reopen and accept all legal tender.¹² Thus the kollybistai are true bankers.¹³

In fact, it was the exchange tables that gave birth to banking and constituted its first function,¹⁴ to which were later added deposits, lending, receiving payments, and other financial operations. The word *trapezites*¹⁵ appears for the first time in a very mutilated inscription discovered at the Athenian agora that has to do with exchanging gold currency, in the fifth century (SEG X, 87, 19), where it means “changer.” Later it means the head of the bank,¹⁶ the one who trafficks in gold and silver, tests the coins (Epictetus 1.20.8–9), gives credit, etc. These are the trapezitai alluded to in the parables of the minas and the talents, which censure the lazy servant for not carrying his money to the bankers (Matt 25:27) or the bank (Luke 19:23), which would have allowed his master to recover his money “with interest” (syn toko).¹⁷

The two evangelists are referring to an investment deposit, which usually yielded interest at a rate of twenty percent,¹⁸ For example, the Egibi bank at Babylon (R. Bogaert, Les Origines antiques de la banque de dépôt, Leiden, 1966, pp. 113, 122, 141; cf. Bogaert, Banques et banquiers, pp. 345–351). Under Nebuchadnezzar, the interest rate was 13.5 percent and even 10 percent, but under Cyrus and Cambyses it was 20 percent; but the house of Murashu at Nippur lent at 40 percent and even 50 percent (G. Cardacia, Les Archives de Murashû, Paris, 1951, pp. 5, 39, 59, 177). E. Cuq, Les Nouveaux Fragments du Code de Hammourabi sur le prêt à intérêt et les sociétés (Mémoires de l’Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres, vol. 41), Paris, 1918; idem, Etudes sur le droit babylonien, Paris, 1929, pp.221ff.{NOTEEND}

hence investments were made “to bear fruit.”¹⁹ The depositor is considered as an associate whose money, far from remaining unproductive, is sure to bring a profit; and bankers would have attracted customers by offering good investments;²⁰ but unreliable payers and bankruptcies were not rare, at least in Greece and at Rome;²¹ in Egypt, we have several hundred banking papyri,²² and where monetary transactions were carried out through banks, the administration of the latter seems to have been more seriously controlled;²³ money brought profits there, since the interest rate for private loans in the third century was twenty-four percent.²⁴ In Israel, of course, lending for interest was forbidden,²⁵ but interest was allowed on commercial loans, since the shulh^anîm (a Hebrew term derived from shulhan, table) achieved returns on the funds that were invested with them.²⁶

So we must conclude that the Lord does not condemn lending at interest in the parable of the minas and of the talents, but that he only condemns its practice in the sanctuary. There is a distinction between the usurer who exploits the misery of the poor (cf. Tabula of Cebes 31, 3: “mede gignesthai homoious tois kakois trapezitais, not to become like the wicked trapezitai”) and the trapezites who aids business people and well-off members of the public (P. Tebt. 890; Dittenberger, Or. 484, 9; cf. R. Bogaert, “Changeurs et Banquiers,” p. 270). This would be confirmed by this logion agraphon, if it is authentic: “gignesthe dokimoi trapezitai, be good bankers.” This is by far the best attested extracanonical sentence, since seventy witnesses to it have been found.²⁷ Nevertheless, this is an exhortation not to be honest bankers, but to be like expert money changers who can tell the difference between true and counterfeit money and reject that which is worthless.

² A good number of them belonged to the family of the high priest, cf. J. Jeremias, Jerusalem, p. 49.

³ M. sheqal. 1.3; t. sheqal. 1.6; cf. E. Lambert, “Les Changeurs et la monnaie en Palestine du I^{er} au III^e siècle de l’ère vulgaire d’après les textes talmudiques,” in REJ, 1906, vol. 51, pp. 217–244; vol. 52, pp. 24–42; S. Krauss, Talmudische Archäologie, 2d ed., vol. 2, Hildesheim, 1966, pp. 411–414.

⁴ Cf. A. Ben David, Jerusalem and Tyros, Basel-Tübingen, 1969, pp. 5–13, 25, 27.

⁵ The only occurrence is the reading κερματιστής for χρηματιστής, in Maximus of Tyre 31.2 b and d. Cf. R. Bogaert, Banques et banquiers, pp. 46–47. For κερμάτιον, cf. D. B. Durham, Vocabulary of Menander, p. 70.

⁶ Cf. Aristophanes, Plut. 379: “stuffing the mouths of the orators with small coins”; Eubulus, frag. 84: ἢ τὰς φιλωδοῦς κερμάτων παλευτρίας οὐκ οἶσθα (ed. J.M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 2, p. 118); Josephus, War 2.295: the enemies of Florus, mocking his avarice, passed around a container and asked people to contribute (alms of) small change for him, ε—πήτουν αὐτῶ— κέρματα”; Epictetus 2.10.14: “Must you lose a kerma to be injured?” Julius Pollux, Onom. 9.87, note: In Attic the plural form κέρματα was used for money, not the singular χρήμα or κέρμα . . . ; but the latter form is used in Dorian for small change; later, even in Attic, the singular was used, as with Antiphanes in the Cyclops: κέρμα γάρ τι τυγχάνω. Cf. in the second-third century, P.Oxy. 114, 13–14: “If the money (τὸ κέρμα) is insufficient because of the neglect of Theagenes, sell the bracelet to get yourself money”; 1220, 7; “Send me a little money to prepare the harvest . . .”; P.Rein. 117, 6: “See that if you need money you ask Aculeinos for it”; Pap.Lugd.Bat. I, 14, 19: “Thus we have transferred the money to Harthonios your brother’s wife through a bank”; P.Hib. 206, 13; C.P.Herm. 13, 4: καθὼς παρατέθικά σοι τὸ μαρσίπιν τοῦ κέρματος . . . ; P.Fouad 81, 9: “Send me some money, since you want to buy a book.” P.Tebt. 418, 12: “give to my wife the money that she needs until you arrive” (very similar to P.Meyer 23, 5); P.Gen. 77, 5; PSI 512, 13: ε—μοὶ δὲ οὐπω παράκεται κέρμα ἀπὸ τοῦ οἴνου; UPZ 81, col. IV, 20 (the dream of Nektonabos): ὁ δὲ Πετήσιος κέρματα λαβὼν πολλὰ ε—πήλθεν εἰ—ς Σεβεννῦτον.

⁷ The same term is used for the changers in Matt 21:12; Mark 11:15 which specify that Jesus turned over their tables. M. J. Lagrange comments: “The κολλυβισταὶ who replace the κερματιστάς could well be a reminiscence of the Synoptics, but this word would provide pleasing variety before κέρμα” (commenting on John 2:15).

⁸ In the Ptolemaic period, P.Petr. III, 59 a, col. I, 7 mentions κολλυβισταῖς?; P.Tebt. 1079, 49; Πτολεμαίῳ κολλυβιστῆ; an inscription from the Sarapieion of Delos, from the first century: κολλυβιστής A (P. Roussel, Les Cultes égyptiens à Délos, Paris-Nancy, 1915–1916, n. 177 b 3). P.Giss.Univ. 30, 11: ἤδη οὖν μαρτύριν γέγονε περὶ τοῦ κερματιστοῦ (ed. H. Büttner).

⁹ Phrynicus: Κολλυβιστής ε—πὶ τοῦ ἀργυραμοιβοῦ citing Menander (ed. C. A. Lobeck, p. 440); Julius Pollux, Onom. 7.33.170 cites Lysias: κολλυβιστής ὡς Λυσίας ε—ν τῶ— περὶ τοῦ χρυσοῦ τρίποδος, καὶ ὁ νῦν κόλλυβος, ἀλλαγή. Cf. D. B. Durham, Vocabulary of Menander, p. 71.

¹⁰ R. Bogaert, “Changeurs et banquiers chez les Pères de l’Eglise,” in Ancient Society, vol. 4, 1973, p. 241; cf. M. N. Tod, “Epigraphical Notes on Greek Coinage,” in Numismatic Chronicle and Journal of the Numismatic Society, 1945, pp. 108–116. A text that is cited is Aristophanes, Pax 1200: “Before today, no one had bought a single scythe, not even for a dime (οὐδὲ κολλύβου = a third or fourth of a denarius); today I am selling them at five drachmas.”

¹¹ At Mylasa, (Dittenberger, Or. 515, 23, 50), at Pergamum (484, 20); at Ephesus, cf. R Bogaert, Banques et Banquiers, p. 49; S. Leroy Wallace, Taxation in Egypt from Augustus to Diocletian, Princeton, 1938, p. 488, n. 274, and p. 503 (on this word). Cf. the inscription of Pergamum mentioning the phrase πρὸς κέρμα . . . ε—κ τοῦ κολλύβου (Dittenberger, Or. 484, 19–20).

¹² P.Oxy. 1411, 4: τοὺς τω—ν κολλυβιστικω—ν τραπεζω—ν τραπεζεΐτας; cf. P.Alex. 144 (p. 42).

¹³ Cf. Gnomon of the Idios Logos 106: “It is not permitted to exchange (κερματίζειν) a large coin for a number of smaller coins greater than its legal value.”

¹⁴ Cf. κολλυβιστική τράπεζα, P.Oxy. 2471, 10, 13, 19; 2584, 8; PSI 204, 21; 1235, 7; 1318; col. I, 11; P.Stras. 34, 7; P.Hamb. 1, 2: —Αντίγραφον διαγραφῆς διὰ τῆς —Απολλωφανοῦς τοῦ Πτολεμαίου κολλυβιστικῆς τραπέζης (21 September 57).

¹⁵ The τράπεζα of Ps.-Aristotle, Oec. 2.1346b24–26 is a simple currency exchange.

¹⁶ Cf. G. Redard, Les Noms grecques en -ΤΗΣ, -ΤΙΣ, Paris, 1949, pp. 39ff. Derived from τράπεζα, which means first the table or counter at which the changer is seated (P.Eleph. 10, 2; cf. καθίζοντες ε—πὶ τὰν τραπεζα—ν, LSCG, n. 161, A 19) and then the institution (the bank—P.Lond. 3, 38 = vol. 1, p. 47; P.Oxy. 98, 8); hence the play on words of Andocides, Myst. 130–131, where the rappings of a spirit upset the tables and furniture and cause the bank to collapse. With the adjective ι—ερά or a god’s name in the genitive (τράπεζα κυρίου, 1Cor 10:21; cf. ἡ τοῦ θεοῦ τράπεζα, SEG 1, 344; Dittenberger, Syl. 1106, 99; 1022, 2; 1038, 11; cf. the κλίνη of Sarapis, P.Oxy. 2592; P.Yale 85; etc.), τράπεζα refers to the table for offerings or the sacred table of the god (cf. A. J. Festugière, Monde gréco-romain, pp. 172ff.), but the cultic table is also mentioned without further specification, cf. I.Sinur., n. 76; cf. at Iconium, L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1950, p. 201, n. 200.

¹⁷ Ep. Arist. 26: “The king ordered that the total be divided between the military treasurers and the royal bankers” (repeated by Josephus, Ant. 12.32); Dittenberger, Syl. 577, 17; Plutarch, Arat. 18; cf. R. Bogaert, Banques et banquiers, pp. 33–41. Τραπεζιτεία refers to the function of the τραπεζίτης (P.Oxy. 1415, 26), but in SEG IV, 668, 14 it is used both for the college of τραπεζίται and their term of office (cf. Bogaert, Banques et banquiers, p. 236).

¹⁸ Cf. J. Dupont, “La Parabole des talents (Mt. XXV, 14–30) ou des mines (Lc. XIX, 12–27),” in RTP, 1969, pp. 376–391. On the allegorical interpretation of this parable, where several of the Fathers suppress “with interest,” cf. P. Quiévreux, Les Paraboles, Paris, 1946, pp. 221–227; R. Bogaert (“Changeurs et banquiers chez les Pères de l’Eglise,” in Ancient Society, vol. 4, 1973). Cf. the decree from Abdera in 166 BC that authorizes placing in the bank a sum intended to cover the costs of two ambassadors: κομιζόντων ἀπὸ τῆς τραπέζης, θεμένων αὐτοί—ς τὸ διπλάσιον τω—ν νομοφυλάκων ἀπὸ τω—ν εἰ—ς τὰς πρεσβείας (Dittenberger, Syl. 656, 47ff.; cf. L. Robert, Opera Minora Selecta, vol. 1, pp. 320ff.).

¹⁹ Code of Hammurabi 99: “If a businessman has given money to a steward for selling and buying, and he invests it in a voyage, the commercial traveler shall see that it bears fruit”; cf. J. Dauvillier, “La Parabole des mines ou des talents et le 99 du Code de Hammurabi,” in Mélanges J. Magnol, Paris, 1948, pp. 153–165. On commercial societies and contracts for business associations in the papyri, cf. R. Taubenschlag, Opera Minora, vol. 2, pp. 516–526.

²⁰ An epigram attributed to Theocritus takes the form of a banker’s sign: “To inhabitants of the city and to foreigners this bank gives the same terms: what you have deposited you may withdraw, after the accounting is done. Let others resort to trickery; Caïcos pays back deposits to whoever asks, even at night” (Anth. Pal. 9.435).

²¹ Notably that of the Christian Carpophorus at Rome, the victim of the machinations of his slave Callixtus (Hippolytus, Haer. 9.12.1–12; cf. R. Bogaert, “Changeurs et banquiers,” p. 253). The expression ἀνατρέπειν τὴν τράπεζαν appears in the fifth century (Andocides, Myst. 130).

²² E.g., the accounts of a private bank from the second century BC, P.Tebt. 890; P.Oxy. 1639 (first century BC); P.Mich. 564, 17; 625, 2; P.Princ. 133, 5; P.Mert. 70, 35, etc. Cf. F. Preisigke, Girwesen im griechischen Aegypten, Strasbourg, 1910; E. Ziebarth, “Hellenistische Banken,” in Zeitschrift für Numismatik, 1924, pp. 36–50. Prosop.Ptol. (vol. 1, n. 178–

179, 1122–1294) cites 175 τραπεζίται; e.g., Didymus (P.Mich. 572, 4), Kephalos in 18 BC (P.Rein. 128, 5), Zoilos and Dionysios in 6–5 (P.Yale 60, 5), Ammonios in AD 64 (63, 3, 8), etc.

²³ Cf. P.Tebt. 703, 117–134; N. Hohlwein, Termes techniques, pp. 405ff. P.Rev. 73–78 (a decree on bank closings); H. Desvernois, “Banques et banquiers dans l’Egypte romaine,” in Bulletin de la Société royale arch. d’Alexandrie, 1928, pp. 303–348.

²⁴ C. Préaux, Economie royale, p. 282; J. Herrmann, “Zinssätze und Zinsgeschäfte im Recht der gräko-ägyptischen Papyri,” in JJP, 1962, pp. 23–31. In Greece, it was ordinarily ten percent; cf. at Ilion (LSAM, n. 9); Pergamum (Dittenberger, Or. 484, 8–15), at Delos, Miletus, Amorgos, etc., cf. R. Bogaert, Banques et banquiers, pp. 138, 258, 290, 360.

²⁵ Exod 22:25; Ps 14:5; 34:34; Ezek 18:17; cf. C. Spicq, Péchés d’injustice, pp. 339, 440ff.; S. Stein, “The Laws on Interest in the Old Testament,” in JTS, 1953, pp. 161–170; E. Neufeld, “The Rate of Interest and the Text of Nehemiah V, 11,” in JQR, 1954, pp. 194–204; E. Szlechter, “Le Prêt dans l’Ancien Testament et dans les codes mésopotamiens avant Hammourapi,” in RHPR, 1955, pp. 16–25; H. A. Rupprecht, Untersuchungen zum Darlehen im Recht der graeco-ägyptischen Papyri, Munich, 1967; R. Maloney, “Usury and Restrictions on Interest-Taking in the Ancient Near East,” in CBQ, 1974, pp. 1–20.

²⁶ International loans (Josephus, Ant. 12.180ff.), maritime loans (SB 7169: a loan contract for herb and spice trade, cf. L. Robert, Etudes épigraphiques, pp. 206ff.). Cf. Str-B, vol. 1, pp. 970ff. S. Eijges, Das Geld im Talmud (Diss. Gießen), Vilna, 1930, p. 74; G. R. Driver, J. Miles, The Babylonian Laws, 2d ed., Oxford, 1956, p. 175. At the synagogue of Beth Shearim, an inscription names a donor: the banker Leontios Polmurenos (M.Schwabe, B. Lifshitz, Beth She‘arim, vol. 2, n. 92).

²⁷ A. Resch, Agrapha, 2d ed., Leipzig, 1906, pp. 112–128; L. Vaganay, “Agrapha,” in DBSup, vol. 1, col. 187; H. Rahner, “Werdet kundige Geldwechsler,” in Gregorianum, 1956, pp. 475–480; J. Jeremias, Unknown Sayings of Jesus, trans. R. H. Fuller, London, 1957, pp. 89–93.

κολακεία

kolakeia, flattery

kolakeia, S 2850; TDNT 3.817–818; EDNT 2.306; MM 352; L&N 33.367; BAGD 440

The etymology of this biblical hapax (1Thess 2:5) is unknown. Its very rare occurrences in the papyri—hardly four or five instances can be found—and its denominative verb kolakeuo evidence two meanings. One is neutral, “something pleasant”; the other is pejorative, “flattery,” associated with the idea of deceit or lying. Under the first heading, in T. Abr. A 16, the Most High tells Death, who is being sent to Abraham and will appear in a very attractive form, “Do not frighten him; instead, take an attractive form—me ekphobeses auton alla meta kolakias touton paralabe.” In addition, Death explains to Abraham, “It is with great calm and in a pleasing form that I come to the just, en hesychia polle kai kolakia proserchomai tois dikaios” (17). But in the third century AD: “I ask you, the prefect asks you, do not try to fool me”;¹ “like a wine with no odor at all, kept in a jar, you show no emotion in the wake of flattery.”²

This last meaning is that of kolakeuo in the LXX, contrasting with pikraino (1Esdr 4:31). Wis 14:17 denounces the sculpted images venerated on the orders of the tyrants: “They made a visible image of the king which they honored . . . to flatter zealously one absent as though he were present.”³ In several literary texts, the kolakeia is friendly: “The young girl fusses over (or adulates) my companions the nymphs and honors them earnestly” (Menander, Dysk. 37). “The trainer must exercise the athletes, or rather flatter them . . . when he is working as well as when they are exercising” (Philostratus, Gym. 29). But most often the nuance is pejorative: “But you have spoiled this radiant glory, thanks to an unexpected noise, some joke by the shepherds” (Sophocles, Ichn. 154). The slave of Demos “flatters, cajoles, fawns upon him, tricks him” (Aristophanes, Eq. 48); “a hundred heads of accursed flatterers, in a circle, licked their lips” (Pax 756); “Is it not a great bondage to see those people invested with public office, them and their paid flatterers” (Vesp. 683). “With good reason that person obtains more from both gods and humans who instead of flattering them when they are in an awkward position remembers them especially when his circumstances are most prosperous.”⁴

The comedians⁵ and the moralists list the characteristics of the kolax, who is bent on profit, and distinguish him from the compliant person (areskos) who acts disinterestedly but out of “an innate desire to please” (Theophrastus, Char. 5). Having defined flattery as “a shameful business, but profitable for the flatterer” (Char. 2.1), Theophrastus concludes, “In review, you will see the flatterer say and do all the things that he hopes will ingratiate him” (Char. 2.13). In this Theophrastus is the heir of Aristotle, who makes kolakeia a vice opposed to kindness: “There are two kinds of people who are always trying to please. The first, who wants only to make people happy, is the compliant person. The second, whose goal is to make people happy in order to profit in money or in goods that can be bought with money, is the flatterer” (Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 4.12.1127a7–10); “All flatters are servile” (Eth. Nic. 4.9.1224b32); “flattery and the flatterer are gratifying, because the flatterer pretends to be an admirer or a friend” (Aristotle, Rh. 1.11.1371a22). Moreover, the Stagirite places friendship between animosity and flattery (Eth. Eud. 3.7.1233b29–38) and emphasizes the contrast between the friend and the flatterer.⁶

From then on kolakeia is an item in catalogs of vices,⁷ starting with Philo, who inserts it along with perfidy (apistia) and cheating (phenakismos) and deceitfulness (apate, Sacr. Abel and Cain 22). Sometimes flattery is presented as a vice opposite to philia: “In friendship, people fear the deceits of flattery as being very harmful”;⁸ sometimes as betraying the truth: false piety, which “flatters the One who is not vulnerable to flattery, who loves true worship . . . that of a soul who brings truth as a pure and sole offering”;⁹ sometimes as spawning vanity: “All the people . . . flattered Gaius by treating him with undue seriousness and conspiring to inflate his vanity.”¹⁰

So this is a vice that has diverse sources: natural inclination, as with Eurikles, “glib at dispensing flattery, without seeming to do so” (Josephus, Ant. 16.301); the desire to please one’s neighbor;¹¹ to glorify a prince (thus becoming a characteristic vice of a courtier);¹² to excite the admiration of the crowd (thus becoming a vice of the orator);¹³ “Behold the flatters assassinating their victims and attacking their ears day and night; not only do they approve every word uttered, but they endlessly string together declarations and tirades. With their lips they express a thousand good wishes, but in their hearts they are always cursing” (Philo, Migr. Abr. 111).

These usages of kolakeia can help determine in what sense St. Paul, who had never used a word of flattery toward the Thessalonians, thus provided a guarantee of the authenticity of his apostolic utterances (1Thess 2:5); (a) whereas the flatterer is a deceiver and fawner, the emissary of Jesus Christ had always spoken only the truth; (b) he refused to gain the sympathy of his hearers by cajoling or flattering them; (c) he had not sought personal gain (money, hospitality, prestige) through more or less devious dealings; (d) his agape, which does not hesitate to reprimand and correct, proves to everyone the authenticity of his affection—the opposite of blameworthy leniency.¹⁴ On this integrity of St. Paul’s conduct, cf. 1Cor 1:17ff.; 2:1, 4ff.

¹ P.Oxy. 2407, 52: μή με κολακεύης. The same link between deception and kolakeia in the sixth century, in P.Lond. 1727, 24, which associates δόλος, φόβος, βία, ἀπάτη, ἀνάγκη, κολακία.

² Acta Maximi 2.42; ed. H. A. Musurillo, Acta Alexandrinorum, Leipzig, 1961, p. 30; idem, Pagan Martyrs, p. 39. The only other papyrus is mutilated, διδόναι κολακεύοντες (PSI 4 = P.Cair.Zen. 59838).

³ In Job 19:17, the LXX is based on the reading with the Hebrew verb hanan, which it understands to mean “I speak with flattery or kindness to the sons of my concubine.”

⁴ Xenophon, Cyr. 1.6.3; cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 889, 29ff., you cannot exceed the limits set by destiny, neither by flattery nor by supplication, οὔτε κολακεία οὔτε ι—κετεία; Josephus, War 2.213: “the most ardent courtiers of fortune.”

⁵ In 421, Eupolis wrote a comedy called The Flatterers (ed. J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 1, pp. 368ff.). Philodemus the Epicurean wrote a treatise περὶ κολακείας (W. Crönert, “Neues über Epikur und einige Herkulanenische Rollen,” in RhMus, 1901, p. 623). Cf. O. Ribbeck, “Kolax: Eine ethologische Studie,” in Abhandl. der philol.-hist. Kl. d. königlich Sächsischen Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften, vol. 9, 1884, pp. 1–115.

⁶ Eth. Nic. 10.2.1173b32. Cf. Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.182: “It would not be said that the flatterer is a good friend. Flattery is pathological friendship.”

⁷ Cf. A. Vögtle, Tugend- und Lasterkataloge, p. 201.

⁸ Philo, Abraham 126; Plant. 105–106: “Flatterers often harbor an unspeakable hatred for those who are the object of their attentions. . . . Fawners exercise their zeal only for the sake of their own gain”; these deceits and artifices are not compatible with true friendship.

⁹ Worse Attacks Better 21; cf. Spec. Laws 1.60: Moses teaches the truth and expels from his city πάντας τοὺς κολακεύοντας αὐτήν (divination). Cf. Josephus, Life 367: “Agrippa, not attempting to flatter me, nor speaking ironically . . . witnesses to the truth” of my works.

¹⁰ To Gaius 116. Cf. Sobr. 57: “the wise person accepts praise that is not tainted with flattery but guaranteed by sincerity”; Josephus, War 4.231: the Idumeans are a nation in love with change, “when they are the least bit flattered by those who appeal to them, they take up arms and go off to battle as if to a festival.”

¹¹ Philostratus, Gym. 44: “It was medicine that first treated [athletes] with indulgence (ε—κολάκευσε),” teaching laziness, introducing the habit of remaining seated before exercises, favoring an overly refined diet.

¹² The flatters of the tyrant Dionysius of Sicily were called Διονυσοκόλακες (Athenaeus 6.56; 10.433 e).

¹³ Cf. the fifteen references given by G. Mussies, Dio Chrysostom, pp. 200–201. Cf. Lucian, Dial. Mort. 10.8.

¹⁴ We may cite Luke 6:26—“Woe to you, when everyone speaks well of you,” referring to flattering words, laudatory remarks; cf. J. Dupont, Béatitudes, vol. 3, Paris, 1973, pp. 86ff.

κοπιάω, κόπος

κοπιαο, to work hard, grow weary; kopos, trouble, suffering, fatigue

see also μόχθος

κοπιαο, S 2872; TDNT 3.827–830; EDNT 2.307; NIDNTT 1.262–263; MM 354; L&N 23.78, 25.289, 42.47; BAGD 443 | kopos, S 2873; TDNT 3.827–830; EDNT 2.307–308; NIDNTT 1.262–263; MM 355; L&N 22.7, 42.47; BAGD 443

Derived from kopto, “smite, strike a hard blow, cut, cut off, chop,” hence figuratively “tire out,” the action noun kopos means “a blow,”¹ and usually “trouble, suffering, fatigue.”² It is often associated with its synonym *mochthos*³ and especially with ponos, which figures in the Stoic vocabulary.⁴ It is difficult to translate it precisely,⁵ because it is used for every kind of physical and moral suffering, affliction, torment, difficulty, effort, and weariness, but in secular Greek especially for fatigue: “to know what effect a bath at the wrong time or needless fatigue will produce” (Hippocrates, VM 21); “spontaneous weariness (kopoi automatoi) is a sign of illness” (Hippocrates, Aph. 2.5; cf. Philostratus, Gym. 53); “fatigue and sleepiness are enemies of study” (Plato, Resp. 7.537 b); “I am exhausted with fatigue.”⁶

Nevertheless, the substantive and the verb κοπιαο are not much used in classical Greek, although they are common in the LXX, where their meaning becomes more precise and more intense (especially the verb), because being tired⁷ becomes “be exhausted, tired out.” Amalek “cut off the retreat of those who were lagging behind when you were exhausted and tired out” (Deut 25:18); “They struck down the Philistines from Micmash . . . and the people were exhausted” (Hebrew ’ûp, 1Sam 14:31); Ahithophel: “I would fall upon David when he is exhausted and weak”;⁸ one is worn out with moaning and weeping (Ps 6:6; 69:3). If κοπιαο means

“make a toilsome effort” (1Sam 17:39), it is used rather frequently in the sense of “work hard,” either physically or intellectually. Judg 5:26—the workers’ hammers (kopionton, B); Eccl 2:18—“I have hated all my work on which I have worked under the sun”; Wis 9:10—“wisdom has worked beside me”; Sir 11:11—“Such a person works, tires himself out, and presses on (esti kopion kai ponon kai speudon) and for all that is only in greater want”; 24:34—“I have toiled not for myself alone but for all those who seek wisdom” (cf. 33:18; 51:27). We may note the formula “work in vain” or “for nothing,”⁹ which St. Paul takes up.

Rarely kopos has the meaning “fatigue” (Gen 31:42) or “burden” (Deut 1:12; Hebrew torah) or the softened meaning “boredom” (Sir 22:13), “care” (29:4), “depression” (Job 4:2), but usually retains the sense of “trouble, suffering, misfortune, misery.”¹⁰ Twice there is the intellectual nuance, “painful thinking” (Ps 73:5; Sir 13:26).

These words are almost unknown in Philo.¹¹ In Josephus, kopiao always means “grow weary,”¹² but kopos retains the connotation of “excessive fatigue, exhaustion,” as a result of battle (War 5.307; Ant. 7.299), a night march (War 5.68), wandering in the wilderness (Ant. 2.257), crossing the sea (3.25), work (7.48), illness (5.315), the sacrificing of victims (8.244). It brings on sleep (Life 136; cf. T. Issach. 3.5), makes rest necessary (Ant. 5.315), affects beasts of burden (1.336: kopon ton hypozygion).

All the preceding meanings are attested in the papyri and the inscriptions, first of all in the most weakened sense: “boredom, discouragement.” In the third century, Ptolemaeus writes to his father that he himself will come with friends to take delivery of five loads of wood, so that his father might not have the burden of transporting it (hina me sy kopias, P.Mich. 511, 15); “We are not in the habit of inconveniencing the strategos” (hina me kopous parechomen stratego, P.Giss.Univ. 27, 13); the trip taken by the mother of Dioscoros cannot inconvenience anyone (medeis soi kopon pareche, P.Princ. 70, 10). Then “fatigue, weariness”: a letter from Nicanor in the second-third century begins thus: “I have grown weary of writing you, and you have not answered me” (ego kekopiaka graphon soi, kai sy moi ouk antegrapsas, P.Oslo 160, 1). Usually exhaustion is the point. In February 107, Apollinarius, who is assigned to the Roman legion at Bostra, which is opening a route through the limes of Arabia, writes, “I give thanks to Sarapis and to good fortune. While everyone is being worn out all day long (panton kopionton) cutting stones, I, as principalis, walk around doing nothing (diakino meden poion).”¹³ But the job is not without danger. At the same period, Terentianus writes from Alexandria to his father, “You know that we are working hard now to clean up the tumult and sedition in the city” (oides gar hoti kopiomen arti diotei kathairoumen ton thorybon kai akatastasian tes poleos, P.Mich. 477, 28–29). Kopiao means “work,”¹⁴ kopiatai are gravediggers,¹⁵ and kopos is “expense, costs,”¹⁶ and especially difficulties: “We never had so much difficulty in winnowing it (barley)” (P.Oxy. 1482, 6); “With great difficulty (meta pollon kopon) we made him accept the obligation to see to it (the silage of Poīs) at the former rent” (P.Sarap. 92, 11); “With great difficulty I obtained from Penemgeus, with no written document, the eighty drachmas that I have sent you” (P.Sarap. 97, 5). These kopoi are also “torments” which sometimes are expressed in groans and cries of pain: “Brother, the torments and headaches of this city” (adelphe, tous kopous kai tas kephalargias tes poleos tantes, P.Apoll. 45, 1; eighth century); “It is for my torment (eis tous kopous mou) and not for my rest (ouk eis anesin) that they laid hands on him” (P.Apoll. 45, 13); for the reconciliation of a mother and her son who are involved in a lawsuit: “I send you the letter addressed to me on the subject of this painful trial” (charin tou kopou).

With regard to the NT formula kopon (kopous) parecho tini (“give care, make trouble for someone”),¹⁷ Moulton-Milligan compare BGU 844, 12: “For he troubles me in my weakness” (kopous gar moi parechei asthenountei, AD 83); P.Tebt. 21, 10: “If he gives you trouble, go up with him” (ean de soi kopous pareche synanabaine auto, 115 BC). We may add P.Princ. 70, 10; P.Giss.Univ. 27, 13; Pap.Graec.Mag. 14 b (vol. 2, p. 132); SB 8247, 8; 9017, 28; 9271, 4 (first-second century), and an ostrakon in which Paulina complains to her brother Titus concerning her husband’s poor behavior and asks him to intervene: “Because my husband Aponius gives me trouble since he knows that I have no one” (hoti kopous moi parechei Aponios ho emos aner dia to eidenai auton hoti oudenan echo).¹⁸

The six occurrences of kopiao in the Gospels—where kopos does not appear—conform to secular Greek usage: the lilies of the field neither toil nor spin (Matt 6:28 = Luke 12:27); “Come to me, all you who are weary and overburdened, and I will give you rest.”¹⁹ After the miraculous catch of fish, Simon Peter declares to Jesus: “We wore ourselves out all night without catching anything” (Luke 5:5). When Jesus arrived at Jacob’s well at noon, in the heat of the day, after climbing the high plateau of Samaria, Jesus was more than usually tired (kekopiakos, “exhausted,” John 4:6); the day’s journey was unusually difficult. This explains not only the fact that he did not go with his disciples to buy provisions at Sychar but also that he sat down just as he was (houtos), i.e., on the ground, without choosing some other place. The important text (because it seems to be at the root of the Pauline identification of kopos with the apostolic ministry)²⁰ is John 4:38—“I sent you to harvest that which has cost you no trouble; others have taken the trouble (have labored, sown, etc.) and you have entered into their labor” (ho ouk hymeis kekopiakate; alloi kekopiakasin, kai hymeis eis ton kopon auton eiselelythate). The contrast between sowers and reapers is made in terms of the labor provided by the former and the relatively easy work done by the latter.²¹ Jesus is the one who defined the apostolic ministry as kopos, painful toil.

Beginning with his earliest epistles, St. Paul uses kopiao and kopos to refer to his own labor, and in the first instance his manual work. After all, he was a tentmaker (Acts 18:3, skenopoios); this was rough work, since the Ephesians made off with overalls or aprons (simikinthia) and handkerchiefs that were soaked with the apostle's sweat (Acts 19:12). This was not a temporary occupation for him, but a trade at which he worked²² in order not to have to live off of the communities that he evangelized: "You remember, brothers, our labor and fatigue (ton kopon hemon kai ton mochthon). Night and day we worked (ergazomenoi) in order not to be a burden on any of you" (1Thess 2:9; repeated at 2Thess 3:8). "We wear ourselves out working with our own hands" (kopiomen ergazomenoi tais idiais chersin, 1Cor 4:12). To the Ephesian elders, he notes that the money so earned allowed him to help with the needs of the poor; this work—in Christian terms—is thus inspired by brotherly love: "I showed you that it is by working thus (houtos kopiontas) that we must sustain the weak and remember the words of the Lord Jesus, 'It is more blessed to give than to receive'" (Acts 20:35).

But this labor comes to encompass more and more all of the efforts, cares, constraints, austerities, and labors of the apostolic ministry. If a church is submitted to trial and danger, Paul fears that his "trouble" in building it up might have been in vain, his sacrifices pointless (1Thess 3:5; Gal 4:11; Phil 2:16). He did not spare himself: "I worked more abundantly than all (the other preachers)" (1Cor 15:10; ekopiassa); "Are they ministers of Christ? I more. In more abundant labors (en kopois perissoteros),"²³ in prisons, blows, danger of death, hunger and thirst (2Cor 11:27). The proclamation of the gospel in the midst of the worst adversities is a dramatic battle: "For this cause I wear myself out in the fight (eis ho kai kopio agonizomenos) with the energy of Christ, who works mightily in me" (Col 1:29); "it is for this that we toil and fight" (kopiomen kai agonizometha).²⁴

Another series of texts uses kopos and kopiao to refer to the achievements of the Christian life, the efficiency of faith, endurance in hope, love's labors and devotion;²⁵ "Beloved brethren . . . surpass yourselves in the Lord's work (en to ergo tou Kyriou), knowing well that your labor is not in vain in the Lord" (ho kopos hymon ouk estin kenos en Kyrio, 1Cor 15:58). In the edification of the church and the service of God, the "labors" are diverse, notably among the founders of communities, apostles, and preachers. The labor of the "converter" is one thing; the lesser toil of those who follow another (2Cor 10:15); a part of the fruits belongs first of all to the farmer who has worked hard (2Tim 2:6, ton kopionta georgon), although "the one who plants and the one who waters are one; but each one shall receive his own pay, according to his own toil"

(ton idion misthon lempsetai kata ton idion kopon, 1Cor 3:8). In the first place are those responsible for the churches: “We ask you, brethren, to recognize those who toil among you (tous kopiontas en hymin), those who are your superiors in the Lord” (1Thess 5:12), the elders, “especially those who toil at the word and at teaching,”²⁶ but also Christian families, like the household of Stephanas and those who have the same zeal and collaborate with each other, spending themselves without sparing any trouble (1Cor 16:16), and also women of signal devotion, like Mary (Rom 16:6), Tryphena, Tryphosa, and Persis (16:12) who toiled so (polla ekopiasen), probably in service to the poor, in hospitality, helping the preachers, etc.

We may sum up in a few words. In the NT, kopos/kopiao, “work hard,” means (1) constant, exhausting manual labor; (2) the fatigue of long, incessant missionary wanderings; (3) blows, wounds, and suffering endured in the course of stonings and riots; (4) slanders and insults by enemies, the humiliations of imprisonment; (5) the difficulties of governing and exercising apostolic authority; (6) the preparation of sermons, speeches given in the open air, the editing of epistles; (7) care for all the churches and for each soul (2Cor 11:28-29; Heb 13:17), who will not be saved on the steep path except through costly endurance and violence (Matt 11:12). There is no Christian life, no apostolic ministry, without rough, persevering labor.

¹ Euripides, Tro. 794: “the blows with which I strike my chest”; Aeschylus, Cho. 32: a blow.

² P. Chantraine (Dictionnaire étymologique, on this word) mentions ἄκοπος, “without fatigue,” ὑπόκοπος, “a little tired.”

³ Job 2:9; 1Thess 2:9; 2Thess 3:8; 2Cor 11:27.

⁴ Ps 10:7, 14; 90:10; Hab 1:3; Jer 20:18; 45:3; Sir 11:11; T. Jud. 18.4. Cf. Homer, Il. 6.77: the difficulty of combat; 12.348; 16.568: the drudgery of grim war (μάχης πόνος); 17.718: remove the body from the battlefield (φέρειτ ε—κ πόνου); Ps.-Plato, Ax. 368 a–b: “workers and laborers who toil (πονουμένων) from one night to another and obtain the necessities with difficulty. . . . They fill their watches with groans and lamentations.” Epictetus 2.1.10, 13 links πόνος with death and exile and contrasts it with pleasure (ἡδονή), 1.2.15.

⁵ Cf. A. von Harnack, “Κόπος (κοπια—ν, οι—κοπιω—ντες) im frühchristlichen Sprachgebrauch,” in ZNW, 1928, pp. 1–10; Hauck, “κόπος, κοπίαω,” in TDNT, vol. 3, pp. 827–830.

⁶ Euripides, Phoen. 852; Bacch. 634: “glutted with fatigue . . . he faints”; Aeschylus, Suppl. 209: “O Zeus, take pity on our toil before we succumb”; Sophocles, Phil. 880: “when fatigue leaves me . . . we will go to the ship”; Aristophanes, Lys. 542: “heavy fatigue would not be able to numb my knees”; Ran. 1265; Plut. 321; Xenophon, Eq. 4.2: “the horse, after too much work (κόπος), requires rest”; Philostratus, Gym. 48: things that are useless for the athlete, “agitation of soul, fatigue”; 49: “good proofs of excessive fatigue are supplied by the exterior contours of the body”; 53: “sudden relaxation after the use of dust is a poor remedy for fatigue.” Likewise the verb κοπιάω: “tired of amusing ourselves” (Aristophanes, Thesm. 795); “You will get tied of good things, so rich you will be” (Av. 735); Alexis, frag. 147: κοπιω— τὰ σκέλη; Menander, Phas. 36: εἰ—σῆλθεσ εὐθύς ἄν κοπιάσης τὰ σκέλη.

⁷ Κοπιάω translates especially the Hebrew yegî'a and 'amal. Cf. Josh 24:13—“I will give you a land where you have not toiled, and cities that you have not built . . . vines and olive trees that you have not planted”; Isa 43:22—“You are tired of me, Israel”; 47:13—“You are wearied (Hebrew lahâh) by much advice”; 47:15—“you are tired of your conspirators”; Wis 6:14—“The one who goes toward wisdom in the morning will not be wearied, for he will find her seated at the gate” (cf. Jer 2:24, Hebrew yâ'ep); Sir 6:19—“In the cultivation of wisdom you will toil a little” (ὀλίγον κοπιάσεις); 16:27—“God’s works experience neither hunger nor fatigue” (cf. Isa 40:28); 31:3-4: “The rich person toils to amass goods . . . the poor person toils because he lacks means”; 43:30—“Do not tire of exalting the Lord”; Hos 8:10—“They will suffer a little (of time, Hebrew halal) bearing tribute to the king”; Isa 33:24—“No inhabitant will say, ‘I am sick’” (LXX κοπιω—, Hebrew halâh).

⁸ 2Sam 17:2; cf. 23:10—Eleazar “smote the Philistines until his hand was tired out” (cf. 4Macc 9:12); Isa 5:27—“None is weary (Hebrew kashal) and none stumbles; none dozes or sleeps”; 16:12; 40:30-31; 46:1—idols carried in processions are “a burden for the tired-out beast” (cf. 1Macc 10:81); 57:10; Lam 5:5—“We are pursued, we are worn out, there is no more rest for us.” The LXX sometimes translates the Hebrew verb kashal, “stumble,” with κοπιάω: “If you run, you will not stumble” (Prov 4:12; cf. Isa 31:3; 43:13).

⁹ Ps 127:1—“Those who build it work in vain” (εἰ—ς μάτην ε—κοπίασαν); Isa 30:5; 49:4; κοπία—ν εἰ—ς κενόν (Job 2:9; 20:18; 39:16; Isa 65:23; Jer 51:58); Wis 3:11—Those who lack wisdom: “Their hope is vain, their fatigue pointless, their toil profitless” (οἰ— κόποι ἀνόνητοι).

¹⁰ Judg 10:16—“Israel’s trouble, suffering”; Hab 1:3; 3:7 (Hebrew ’āwen); Jer 20:18—“Why did I come out from the womb to see trouble and sorrow?”; 45:3—“Yahweh has added affliction to my pain” (κόπον ἐ—πὶ πόνον); Mal 2:13—“weeping and sighs in troubles” (ἐ—κ κόπων); Job 5:6-7: misfortune does not grow up out of the ground; man engenders it; 11:16; Ps 10:14—“You see the trouble and sorrow”; 25:18; 88:15—“I have been poor and in trouble from childhood”; 110:10—“the number of our years is toil and trouble”; 107:12; 140:9; Wis 10:10—“wisdom multiplies the fruit of labors”; 10:17; Sir 14:15—“Will you leave the fruit of your toil to be shared out by fate?”; 34:23; 1Macc 10:15—the sufferings that Jonathan and his brothers endured in battle. There is the sense of “misdeed” (Ps 10:7; 55:11), “iniquity” (Nah 2:1) and—a legal meaning—“penalty” inflicted by a court (Ps 94:20).

¹¹ The three occurrences of the verb are to explain Leah’s name: she who shows fatigue, or she who is weary (Cherub. 41; Migr. Abr. 145; Change of Names 254). A single attestation of the substantive: ἡ ἄνευ ψιλῆ διήγησις, a simple, unpretentious account (Spec. Laws 2.39).

¹² War 3.19: “The Romans did not grow weary but wanted to push their victory to its conclusion”; 3.473: “The Jews do not grow weary although they are getting the worst of it”; 4.367: they “reconciled out of weariness”; 6.142: “on both sides, the combatants showed no weariness”; 6.204: “the woman grew weary of seeking food” (during the siege of Jerusalem).

¹³ P. Mich. 465, 15; cf. C. Préaux, “Une source nouvelle sur l’annexion de l’Arabie sous Trajan: Les Papyrus de Michigan 465 et 466,” in Mélanges J. Hombert, Phoibus, vol. 5, Brussels, 1950–51; pp. 123–139.

¹⁴ On a sarcophagus: κοπιάσαντι ἰ—ς τοῦτα χωρία (IGUR, n. 750); cf. SEG XX, 101: ὑπὲρ τῆς πατρίδος κοπιάσαντα; IGLS 481; Dittenberger, Syl. 761, B 6: πάντα κόπον καλω—ν ἀναδεξάμενος (48/7 BC). Kopos is very close to the Latin labor, and not only Virgil’s labor improbus (the adjective giving a pejorative flavor) but also to express the effort required to triumph over a difficult task, even work as punishment, finally human trouble, cf. P. Boyancé, “La Religion des ‘Géorgiques’ à la lumière des travaux récents,” in ANRW, vol. 31, 1980, pp. 550ff.

¹⁵ A Christian epitaph of Cilicia: Μνήμα —Ιοάννου κοπιατοῦ; cf. L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 1, Limoges-Paris, 1940, pp. 30ff.

¹⁶ IGLS 741: κομιδῆ ἐ—κ κοινω—ν κόπων; honorific decree: εὐχρηστον καὶ σύμφορον τῇ τε πόλει μήτε κόπου φεισάμενος μήτε δαπάνης. We may compare bread that is not worked, or unfinished = to be cooked, ἄρτων

ει—ς κόπον ἄλλων (BGU 1858, 8) and the recipe for making silver: “Add in dried pitch until it arrives at a state of saturation” (καὶ ἔμβαλε τὴν πίσσαν τὴν ξηράν, ἕως κοπιάση, P.Leid. X, 5, 27, quoted by Moulton-Milligan).

¹⁷ When the apostles rose up against the generous act of Mary of Bethany, who poured out a very costly perfume on Jesus’ head, he went to her defense: “Let her be! Why do you give her trouble?” (τί αὐτῇ κόπους παρέχετε, Mark 14:6 = Matt 26:10). The man bothered by his importunate friend in the middle of the night responds μή μοι κόποις πάρεχε, “Don’t bother me = You are putting me out = You are oppressing me” (Luke 11:7); likewise the unjust judge with regard to the obstinate widow: “Since this woman is exasperating me” (διὰ γε τὸ παρέχειν μοι κόπον τὴν χήραν ταύτην, Luke 18:5; cf. C. Spicq, “La Parabole de la Veuve obstinée et du juge inerte aux décisions impromptues,” in RB, 1961, pp. 68–90). With regard to Gal 6:17, “Let no one cause me trouble (κόπους μοι μηδεὶς παρεχέτω), for I bear in my body the marks of Jesus” (traces of whippings and mistreatment suffered in Christ’s service), M. J. Lagrange, following A. Deissmann, cites a Greek-Demotic Leiden papyrus: “Do not pursue me ... I bear the bier of Osiris . . . if such a person gives me trouble (ε—άν μοι ὁ δει—να κόπους παράσχη), I will throw it at him” (Pap.Graec.Mag. XIV, 15 = vol. 2, p. 132).

¹⁸ Published by P. I. Price, “Some Roman Ostraca from Egypt,” in JJP, vol. 9–10, 1955–56, p. 161.

¹⁹ Matt 11:28 (quoted, IGLS 2541): πάντες οἱ—κοπιω—ντες καὶ πεφορτισμένοι. The two verbs are almost synonymous. M. J. Lagrange comments that “κοπιω—ντες beside πεφορτισμένοι means not just those who work, but those who are tired of working, which is moreover the normal sense of the word.” Here the reference would be to the weight of the Pharisaic observances which like a yoke overwhelms those who try to bear it (11:29-30; cf. Acts 15:10; Gal 5:1). They are laden like beasts of burden. Cf. A. Schlatter, Der Evangelist Matthäus, p. 385.

²⁰ We know that the oral Johannine tradition is well anterior to the redaction of the Fourth Gospel, certain parts of which, moreover, were published quite early (cf. C. Spicq, Hébreux, vol. 1, p. 132, n. 2; R. Gyllenberg, “Die Anfänge der johanneischen Tradition,” in Neutestamentliche Studien für R. Bultmann, Berlin, 1954, pp. 144–147; B.P. W. Stather Hunt, Some Johannine Problems, London, 1958, pp. 105–123; F. M. Braun, Jean le Théologien, Paris, 1959, p. 21; C. H. Dodd, Historical Tradition in the Fourth Gospel, London, 1963, p. 150; W. Gericke, “Zur Entstehung des Johannesevangeliums,” in TLZ, 1965, col. 807–820), to the extent that it could influence Matt and Luke in the pericope of the empty tomb (P. Benoit, “Marie Madeleine et les disciples au tombeau selon Jo. XX, 1–18,” in Judentum, Urchristentum, Kirche: Festschrift J. Jeremias, Berlin, 1960, pp. 141–152).

²¹ The ἄλλοι are often identified with Moses and the prophets. For O. Cullmann, they are the Hellenistic founders of the Christian mission (Acts 8), the reapers being Peter and John (cf. “La Samarie et les origines de la mission chrétienne,” in Annuaire de l’Ecole pratique des Hautes Etudes, Paris, 1953, pp. 3ff. O. Cullmann, Christology of the New Testament, p. 184). People have also thought of Jesus and the Samaritan woman herself, but we must not forget John the Baptist and his own disciples, cf. J.A.T. Robinson, “The ‘Others’ of John IV, 38,” in K. Aland, SE, vol. 1, Berlin, 1959, pp. 510–515.

²² The rabbis worked to earn their living and extolled the merits of manual labor, cf. Str-B, vol. 2, pp. 745–746; B. Rigaux, Thessaloniens, pp. 707ff. J. Jeremias, Jerusalem, pp. 3ff.; cf. G. Agrell, Work, Toil and Sustenance: An Examination of the View of Work in the New Testament, Lund, 1976; cf. F. Gryglewicz, “La Valeur morale du travail manuel dans la terminologie grecque de la Bible,” in Bib, 1956, pp. 314–337; C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, pp. 377ff.

²³ 2Cor 11:23; cf. J. N. Collins, “‘Georgi’s Envoys’ in II Cor. XI, 23,” in JBL, 1974, pp. 88–96.

²⁴ 1Tim 4:10; cf. L. de Lorenzi, “Paul ‘Diakonos’ du Christ et des chrétiens,” in Paul de Tarse apôtre de notre temps, pp. 446ff.

²⁵ 1Thess 1:3 (cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 2, pp. 10–15; R. Schippers, “The Pre-Synoptic Tradition in I Thess. II, 13–16,” in Placita Pleiadia, Festschrift G. Sevenster, Leiden, 1966, pp. 226ff.). The Lord declares to the church at Ephesus, “I know your works and your labor and your endurance (τὰ ἔργα σου καὶ τὸν κόπον καὶ τὴν ὑπομονήν σου). You have endurance, you have suffered for my Name and not grown weary (οὐ κεκοπίακας)” (Rev 2:2-3); “The Spirit says, let them (the dead who die in the Lord) rest from their labors” (ἀναπαύσονται ἐκ τῶν κόπων αὐτῶν, 14:13).

²⁶ 1Tim 5:17—μάλιστα οἱ—κοπιῶντες ἐν λόγῳ καὶ διδασκαλίᾳ. In the primitive church, “working priests” were preachers of the gospel, cf. C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, vol. 1, pp. 541–543.

κοσμέω, κόσμιος

kosmeo, to put in order, adorn, prepare; kosmios, respectable, well ordered

kosmeo, S 2885; TDNT 3.867; EDNT 2.309; NIDNTT 1.521, 524, 526; MM 355–356; L&N 79.12; BAGD 445 | kosmios, S 2887; TDNT 3.895–896; EDNT 2.309–313; NIDNTT 1.521, 524; MM 356; L&N 66.10, 88.48; BDF §59(2); BAGD 445

The denominative verb kosmeo —formed from kosmos, meaning “order, good order,” then “adornment” (Strabo 3.4.17), “ornament” (SB 8381, 1; 8550, 3), and “glory, honor” (SB 8140, 26)—always retains the fundamental meaning “to put in order,” and so “to prepare” the table (Dittenberger, Syl. 1038 A 11), a meal (Sir 29:26; Ezek 23:41), or a lamp that someone “puts in order” by filling it with oil (Matt 25:7); to organize or finish a work (Sir 38:28). Thus the Creator not only brought beings into existence but ordered them well (Ps 104:24), made an orderly work (Sir 16:27; 42:21). What we call the cosmos (P.Lond. 981; vol. 3, p. 241), the universe, is the “order of the world.”¹ These wise arrangements ornament things and persons (Sir 25:1; Eccl 12:9), especially buildings; Solomon decorated the temple with precious stones;² the royal house was decorated with hangings (Esth 1:6); the unclean spirit, returning to the dwelling from which it was driven out, “finds it empty (available), swept (cleaned), decorated,” ready for the spirit to move back in;³ the scribes and Pharisees build the tombs of the prophets and adorn the monuments to the righteous, multiplying the sculptures on the facade or in the underground chambers,⁴ like Phasaël providing for the decorating of the tomb of his father Antipater, taphon ekosmei to patri (Josephus, Ant. 14.284). By “ordering the [sacred] seasons perfectly,” David set the liturgical calendar and adorned its feast-times (Sir 47:10; cf. 50:14; 2Macc 9:16). Finally, kosmeo is used in particular for sacred (Sir 45:12; 50:9) or royal⁵ vestments, and for women’s dress or accoutrements,⁶ as for the heavenly Jerusalem—at the same time a city and a woman—prepared like a fiancée (Rev 19:7) and adorned for her husband.⁷

Cultic regulations often specified the dress of worshipers (Dittenberger, Syl. 999, 2–13). Similarly, St. Paul, in prescribing the appearance of the Ephesians in their assemblies for worship, tells them “to be attired decently (en katastole kosmio), to adorn themselves with modesty and sobriety (meta aidous kai sophrosynes kosmein heautas),”⁸ just as 1Pet 3:5 set forth a model for the dress of Christian women, namely that worn by the holy women of old (“ekosmoun heautas, they adorned themselves”). The verb chosen—“put oneself in order”—here refers to the correctness of a well-fitted garment, in no way outlandish or provocative: Christian women should dress themselves in good taste, “appropriately.”⁹

The connection between kosmios, sophron (sophrosyne), and aidos is so constant in the Hellenistic period that it must be considered a literary topos from Xenophon on; its point is always to emphasize conformity to the rules of decency and modesty,¹⁰ the control of attitude and bearing: beauty is joined in its possessor “with modesty and reserve, met’ aidous kai sophrosynes” (Xenophon, Symp. 1.8; cf. Cyr. 8.1.31); “the goal of human learning is to inspire restraint and moderation (aido kai sophrosynen) in the soul, virtues whose most visible manifestation is that one blushes if the occasion arises” (Philo, Heir 128); virtue “causes to arise and contemplate beauty that is noteworthy for its modesty and moderation (aidous kai sophrosynes), beauty that is unmarred, unspotted, truly pure”;¹¹ a young man dresses with modesty and restraint, aidoi kai sophrosyne kosmeitai neos”;¹² the prostitute can put on a decent exterior, schema kosmion kai sophron (Spec. Laws 1.102; cf. Plutarch, Praec. ger. rei publ. 4.800 f: aner sophron kai kosmios), but Moses expels her from the city, because she is a stranger to “decency, modesty, chastity, and the other virtues (kosmiotetos kai aidous kai sophrosynes).”¹³

The honorific decrees sum up the life of an honest person in two words, zesanta kosmios (having lived kosmios),¹⁴ often explicated zesasan kosmios kai sophronos (MAMA VIII, 472; cf. I. Magn., 162, 6; from the first century); a physician: “for his medical art and the kosmiotes of his way of life” (epi te te techne tes iatrikes kai te kosmioteti ton ethon, I. Magn. 113, 11 = Dittenberger, Syl. 807). “Having lived a life that was modest and kosmios and praiseworthy . . . for his kosmios conduct” (zesas bion aidemona kai kosmion kai axion epainou . . . epi te kosmio anastrophe, MAMA VIII, 414, 9, 14); “having lived kosmios and modestly and as a paragon of virtue.”¹⁵ Similar praise is accorded women whose virtue is adorned with “restraint, moderation, decency” (Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 27), like Flavia Ammion in the first century, “on account of her virtue and the kosmiotes and purity of her life”;¹⁶ Ammia in the second century, “pure and moderate and adorned with all virtue in manner of life and wifely affection”;¹⁷ Appia: “moderate and kosmios daughter” (thygatera sophrona kai kosmian, MAMA VIII, 469, 4; cf. 407, 14). These virtues are like apparel that gives an air of style and distinction, dia ten kosmiotaten autes (Dittenberger, Or. 474, 9, at Pergamum). The Greeks have such a sense of beauty that they see the virtues, or perfect deportment, as a sort of ornament that enchants the eyes and stirs admiration.¹⁸ The Christians of Asia Minor would consequently have appreciated this union of the ethical and the esthetic in the exhortations of St. Paul that use the language of their contemporaries.

A slightly different connotation is present in the quality required of candidates for the episkope: sophron, kosmios, philoxenon (1Tim 3:2), which would be understood in the sense of “well-mannered, honorable, distinguished.” These men must have not only a decent life, like the women, but dignity, combining seriousness and courtesy.¹⁹ Much more so the kosmios man, who has a “sense of responsibility, a feeling of duty and decency ... who is able to give each his due and does nothing but what is honest, just, and appropriate.”²⁰

A new connotation appears in Titus 2:10, where Christian slaves honor the teaching of our Savior God through their virtue, hina ten didaskalian ... kosmosin en pasin; that is, the doctrine that came from Christ and is preached in the church (didaskalia) receives from the behavior of the slaves not just new luster, the adornment that works add to the truth, but a tribute.²¹ In the first century, moreover, kosmeo commonly means “honor, do homage, make famous.” By raising a monument to one’s mother, one does homage to her, just as “Tabeis has adorned his very sweet mother Koudan” (MAMA VIII, 108). Lolla “has adorned the virtues of her ancestors by the example of her way of life”;²² one “adorns” a gymnasion by attracting ephebes to it;²³ a city is honored (Mic 6:9, tis kosmesei polin; Dittenberger, Syl. 326, 15; Thucydides 2.42.2) by edifices;²⁴ a province (SEG XXIII, 433, 2, kosmesein Thessalian), all Greece (SEG I, 329, 47), or one’s country²⁵ is adorned by sentiments worthy of one’s ancestors, city, country. Thus renown is consolidated or augmented by an irreproachable manner of life. So slaves, these somata or res at the bottom of the human hierarchy, are able, through the splendor of their conduct, to honor God and increase the attractiveness of the gospel in the hearts of pagans.²⁶

¹ The ordered world (cf. Sasse, TDNT, vol. 3, pp. 867–870). In the fifth century BC, κόσμιος “already refers to the ‘world,’ but the idea of order is still very much in evidence; it is not the world as a mere collection of beings, but as a totality structured in accord with a law (ἀνάγκη . . .) whereby each being is in solidarity with the whole and the whole with each being. The same idea of the solidarity of the elements is implied by κόσμος in Anaxagoras (Vors. 59 B 8) and in Plato, Grg. 507 e –508 a” (J.Jouanna, Hippocrate, La Nature de l’homme, Berlin, 1975, p. 274); cf. G. S. Kirk, Heraclitus: The Cosmic Fragments, 2d ed., Cambridge, 1965, pp. 311–314.

² 2Chr 3:6; cf. Rev 21:19; U. Jart, “The Precious Stones in the Revelation of St. John XXI, 18–21,” in ST, 1970, pp. 150–181.

³ Matt 12:44; Luke 11:25; cf. Josephus, War 3.79: “a wall adorned with towers”; the broom is called κόσμητρος. In the sense of furnish (cf. Diodorus Siculus 17.93.2; 17.100.4; 17.108.1) and put in order (17.87.4).

⁴ Matt 23:29; Philo, To Gaius 157: “Augustus adorned our sanctuary with a very expensive votive plaque.” Cf. the epitaph of the architect Harpalos “who decorated the very long walls of the temples, who set up high columns in the porticos” (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 23, 5; with the editor’s comments, pp. 130–131). “Seven times Hermeias extended the hundred cubits' length to decorate [the temple of] Hibis with this stone pavement" (SB 8688, 2 = SEG VIII, 795); Philo, Unchang. God 150: "that which decorates the dwelling or tomb of the soul"; Dittenberger, Syl. 1050, 6; SEG IX, 5, 20. J. Jeremias, Heiliger Gräber in Jesu Umwelt, Göttingen, 1958; J. Duncan M. Derrett, "You Build the Tombs of the Prophets," in F. L. Cross, SE, vol. 4, pp. 187–193.

⁵ Cf. Menahem arrayed in royal robes, ε—σθῆτί τε βασιλικῆ κεκοσμημένος (Josephus, War 2.444).

⁶ Jdt 10:3; 12:15; Jer 4:30; Ep Jer 11; Ezek 16:11, 13; 23:40. Epitaph of Politta, at Memphis: "Where are the robes, where are the gold jewels with which my father adorned me?" (E. Bernard, Inscriptions métriques, n. 96, 8); a proskynema in honor of Harmachis: "Clothes, not arms, are our adornment" (SB 8447, 9); ε—ν κοσμοίσις γυνηκείσις (P.Ness. 33, 21); P.Oxy. 1901, 65; SB 9763, 6, 16. —The noun κόσμος refers to the ordering, hence the beauty, that is in evidence on a person. "Daughters of Israel, weep for Saul, who adorned you beautifully (μετὰ κόσμον) with scarlet, who enhanced your finery with golden adornments (κόσμος)" 2Sam 1:24; in the third century AD, a woman had the privilege of being honored for being a mother, τω— κόσμῳ τῆς εὐπαιδείας εὐτυχήσασα (P.Oxy. 1467, 11). Cf. H. Diller, "Der vorphilosophische Gebrauch von κόσμος und κοσμεί—ν," in Festschrift Bruno Snell, Munich, 1956, pp. 47–60.

⁷ Rev 21:2 (cf. J. Comblin, "La Liturgie de la nouvelle Jérusalem," in ETL, 1953, pp. 5–40); Achilles Tatius, Leuc. et Clit. 3.7.5: ὡσπερ —Αἰδωνει— νύμφη κεκοσμημένη; T. Jud. 12.1: κοσμηθει—σα κόσμῳ νυμφικῶ—; Jos. Asen. 4.2: "His parents saw Aseneth adorned like a divine bride."

⁸ 1Tim 2:9. Καταστολή (NT hapax; cf. Isa 61:3) is used for customs and way of life (Ep. Arist. 284), for dress and appearance (Josephus, War 2.126). A Syracusan law prescribed: τὰς γυναι—κας μὴ κοσμεί—σθαι χρυσῶ— μηδ ἄνθινά φορεί—ν μηδ ε—σθῆτας ἔχειν πορφυρά—ς ε—χούσας παρυφάς (Athenaeus 12.521 b).

⁹ Before the formation of the world, the elements behaved without reason or moderation, but then the All was arranged (Plato, Tim. 53 a). "A woman's conversation would be too free if she had only the reserve of a decent man" (Aristotle, Pol. 3.4.17.1277b). In the material sense of the word: "All the young girls should dress richly and walk in solemn procession" (Xenophon of Ephesus, Ephes. 1.2.2); T. Jud. 13.5: ε—κόσμησεν αὐτήν ε—ν χρυσίῳ καὶ μαργαρίταις; T. Jos. 9, 5. Cf. children prepared with care, κοσμίως εἰ—στήκεσαν (Plutarch, Cat. Min. 13.1).

¹⁰ Cf. Athenaeus 1.38 = 21 b: “A constant concern of the ancients was to dress themselves in accord with the rules (κοσμίως).”

¹¹ Philo, Prelim. Stud. 124. Cf. MAMA VII, 258, 5: εἰ—κόνα σωφροσύνης καὶ αἰ—δοῦς; GVI, n. 1575, 1: σωφροσύνας αἰ—δοῦς τε ε—τύμου χάριν, ὦ μάκαρ Ἑρμα— (first-second century).

¹² Philo, Change of Names 217; Moschion, evoking his past: ἦν κόσμιος = I was a proper boy (Menander, Sam. 18); Dittenberger, Syl. 796 B 26: νεανίαν κόσμιον καὶ σώφρονα καὶ πάση ἀρετῇ ε—ν τῇ πρώτῃ ἡλικίᾳ τοῦ βίου (Athens, around AD 40); L. Robert, Documents, pp. 81ff. Cf. Geminus, Intro. to Astronomy 1.20: “Even with a well-born man, with well-ordered mores (περὶ ἄνθρωπον κόσμιον καὶ τεταγμένον), one would not allow for such irregularity of movement.” A maxim of Delphic wisdom from the third century BC, found in Afghanistan: “Παι—ς ὦν κόσμιος γίνου—while you are a child, be well-mannered; as a young man, master of yourself; in mid-life, just; when old, of good counsel; at your death, without grief” (NCIG, n. 37 B).

¹³ Philo, Spec. Laws 3.51; cf. C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, vol. 1, pp. 414ff.

¹⁴ MAMA VIII, 473 and 480; R. Noll, Griechische und lateinische Inschriften, Vienna, 1962, n. 84; IGLAM, n. 1121: Πόπλιος Βετούριος Προσδόκιμος ζήσας κοσμίως ἔτη.... G. E. Bean, T. B. Mitford, Cilicia, n. 12, 12: σώφρονά τε καὶ κόσμιον βίον; n. 13, 13.

¹⁵ Ζήσαντα κοσμίως καὶ αἰ—δημόνως καὶ πρὸς ὑπόδειγμα ἀρετῆς, MAMA VIII, 490, 9; cf. 412, c 5; other examples in L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 13, p. 223; “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1966, p. 435, n. 465.

¹⁶ —Ἀρετῆς ἔνεκεν καὶ τῆς περὶ τὸν βίον κοσμιότητος τε καὶ ἀγνεΐας, H. W. Pleket, Epigraphica, vol. 2, n. 11, 7; PSI 97, 1.

¹⁷ Ἀγνήν καὶ σώφρονα καὶ κεκοσμημένην πάση ἀρετῇ ἤθεσι καὶ φιλανδρίᾳ, H. W. Pleket, Epigraphica, vol. 2, n. 24, 5–10. Cf. the epigram of Artemisia in the second century, “She whose decency (κοσμία) distinguished her among the Muses and among women” (I.Thas. 333). — The word εὐκοσμία is unknown in the NT; the gynaikonomos was in charge of overseeing the appropriate dress of women and their public behavior (cf. J. Aubonnet, Aristote: Politique, II, 2, Paris, 1973, p. 309, n. 2, on Pol. 6.8.22.1322b). Concerning this censor of feminine eukosmia, cf. P.Hib. 196 (with the commentary of J. Bingen, “Le Papyrus du gynéconome,” in ChrEg, 1957, pp. 337–339); I.Thas., n. 141, 154, 155 (C. Wehrli, “Les Gynéconomes,” in MusHelv, 1962, pp. 33–38).

¹⁸ Apollo is the god bedecked by all the virtues, τὸν πάσαις ται—ς ἀρεται—ς κεκοσμημένον θεὸν —Απόλλωνα (Ps.-Plutarch, De mus. 14). Xenophon, ἀπάσαις τε συλλήβδην κεκοσμημένον ἀρεται—ς (Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Pomp. 4); Eleazar, πάση τῇ κατὰ τὸν βίον ἀρετῇ κεκοσμημένος (3Macc 7:1); Tata, at Aphrodisias, ἀρετῇ σωφροσύνη κεκοσμημένην (MAMA VIII, 492, c 24; cf. 407, 14; 499, c 8; I, 228, 4; PSI 151, 1). The formulation adopted by Jews and Christians: “I praise the man adorned with all virtue, Aurelios Bellichos” (L. Jalabert, R. Mouterde, IGLS, 306, 1; cf. 1118, 2). “Here lies the most gracious and mourned deaconess, ἡ κοσμοιότατη καὶ πενθουμένη διακόνεσσα” (I.Cor. VIII, 3, n. 629).

¹⁹ Cf. Epictetus 4.9.17: “Rather than being disorderly, you shall be orderly”; Iamblichus, Myst. 3.31 = 176.11: “their ways become excellent and orderly, χρηστοὶ καὶ κόσμιοι”; Lucian, Bis Acc. 17: κόσμιον ἄνθρωπον καὶ σώφρονα. At Magnesium, Moschion: ἄνδρα φιλότειμον καὶ ε—νάρετον καὶ ἀπὸ προγόνων εὐσχήμονα καὶ ἦθει καὶ ἀγωγῇ κόσμιον (I.Magn., 164, 3; republished Dittenberger, Or. 485); at Paros (IG XII, 5, 314).

²⁰ J. M. Jacques, Ménandre: La Samienne, Paris, 1971, p. xxx, who for the definition of kosmios refers to H. J. Mette, “Moschion ὁ κόσμιος,” in Hermès, 1969, pp. 432–439. We may recall that in Crete kosmos is the title of an official charged with keeping order (I.Cret., vol. 2, p. 56; Dittenberger, Syl. 524, 1–2), called kosmeter at Itanos. At Pergamum, he oversees the good conduct of young women, οἱ—ε—πὶ τῆς εὐκοσμίας τῶ—ν παρθένων (I.Perg. 463 B); this official is often mentioned in I.Did. (cf. p. 356, on this word). The Egyptian kosmetes is a liturgical official in the metropolises, the organizer of festivities (BGU 362, 7, 21; 14, 7; 19, 5; SB 1569, 5; 9839, 3; cf. the bibliography in E. Bernand, Fayoum, vol. 1, p. 34). At Athens, the person with this title was the head of the ephobic college, in charge of its material and moral direction, keeping good order and harmony among the young people, seeing to their education, knowing how to exhort them (A. Dumont, Essai sur l'éphébie attique, Paris, 1876, pp. 166ff.; C. Pelekidis, Ephébie attique, pp. 104ff.).

²¹ Cf. Plutarch, De gen. 13: “confirming a noble doctrine through noble deeds, ἔργοις καλοῖ—ς καλὰ δόγματα βεβαιω—ν”; and the rabbinic idea whereby people embellish God by keeping the commandments (Mek. on Exod 15:2; cf. b. Pe'a 15b). Epictetus 3.1.26: “the reasonable element, that is the superior element within you that you must adorn and embellish.” Philo, Creation 139: “The Logos of God is worth more than beauty itself, which is beauty in nature, because it is not adorned by beauty (οὐ κοσμούμενος κάλλει), being in itself, so to speak, the adornment of this beauty and the most beautiful thing.”

²² Κεκοσμηκυ—αν καὶ τὰς τω—ν προγόνων ἀρετὰς τοι—ς ἰ—δίοις τω—ν τρόπων ὑποδείγμασι. An honorific decree, cited by L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 13, p. 226; cf. Musonius, frag. 9: the virtues honor their possessor, αἰ—παροῦσαι τε κοσμεῖ—ν καὶ ὠφελει—ν πεφύκασι τὸν ἄνθρωπον καὶ ε—παινετὸν ἀποφαίνειν καὶ εὐκλεῆ; P.Thead. 14, 18; Sib. Or. 3.426: “He will greatly exalt the combatants.” The monk John, writing to Abbé George in the fourth century: “I salute our highly honored mother community, τὴν κοσμιωτάτην κοινὴν μητέρα” (P.Fouad 88, 12); cf. Μαρία ἡ κοσμιωτάτη (P.Ness. 188, 6); PSI 839, 1.

²³ Κοσμήσαντα τὰ γυμνάσια ε—φήβοις, I.Car. 172, 15 (with the commentary of L. Robert on this text); τὸ γυμνάσιον ε—κόσμησε (I.Priene, 112, 114; from AD 84); P.Oslo 85, 14; P.Oxy. 2477, 7; 3088, 10–11: in AD 128, the prefect Flavius Titianus congratulates a benefactor for adorning and honoring the city (τὴν πατρίδα κοσμεῖ—ν) by building baths for it (κατασκευάζειν τὸ βαλανει—ον). Cf. Philo, Worse Attacks Better 20: “the sanctuary is adorned with rich offerings.” I.Lind. II A 3 (= Dittenberger, Syl. 725; cf. 1100, 21).

²⁴ At Nisa, in Lycia, someone willed half of his fortune to his city, ὡς ἀπὸ προσόδου ἔργοις κοσμηθῆναι (cited by J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1973, p. 173, n. 453). Plutarch, Praec. ger. rei publ. 5.802 b; Cic. 24.7.

²⁵ Κοσμεῖ—ν τὴν πατρίδα recurs frequently in honorific decrees, cf. I.Did. 343, 18; cf. I.Priene 105, 36; texts cited by L. Robert, Etudes anatoliennes, p. 349.

²⁶ Cf. C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, pp. 682ff.

κρύπτη

krypte, hidden or secret place

krypte, S 2926; TDNT 3.957–1000; EDNT 2.322; MM 361; L&N 28.78; BAGD 454

This substantive is a biblical hapax whose meaning cannot be precisely determined. It appears for the first time in the third century BC in two analogous “architectural” texts. Callixenus, Alex. 1: “Walls and windows surrounded the 'crypto-portico' on every side";¹ PSI 547, 18 gives a list of parts of a house (doors, windows, etc.), adding "the crypt (i.e., cellar) similarly plastered."² In the first century, Strabo mentions that "before the entrance there are crypts, numerous and long" (prokeintai de ton eisodon kryptai tines makrai kai pollai, 17.1.37); and Josephus says that "Castor and his companions set the tower afire and jumped through the flames into the vault beneath it."³ From these data the conclusion is drawn that krypte means an underground chamber or vault, a cellar, a covered passageway, a hidden corner or corridor; but none of these meanings seems to fit the Gospel text.

According to Luke 11:33, "No one lights a lamp to put it in the cellar (?) or under the bushel (eis krypten tithesin oude hypo ton modion)⁴ but on the lampstand (all' epi ten lychnian) so that those who come in see the brightness." The Jewish lamp (lychnos, Hebrew ner), made of terra-cotta, is a small oil receptacle with a wick. It is placed on a wooden or bronze lampstand (lychnia, Hebrew menôrâh) so that from a goodly height the flame can illuminate the whole room.⁵ This useful arrangement is contrasted with putting the lamp under a bushel,⁶ where the light would be useless. The modios is not a vessel for grain but a small piece of furniture, a sort of tub in the form of a truncated cone whose base is supported by three or four feet and which contains the wheat supply needed for the household. It can be used as a table or a plate.⁷ The purpose of the light being to illuminate, hiding it by placing it under a piece of furniture would be useless.

In fact, Luke 11:33 is a doublet of Luke 8:16, which is more explicit: "No one, after lighting a lamp, hides it under a vase (kalyptei auton skeuei) or places it under a bed."⁸ Most likely the verb kalypto was used first and gave rise to krypte, whose meaning it specifies; that meaning is preserved in Gos. Thom. 33: "For no one lights a lamp (and) puts it under a bushel, nor does he put it in a hidden place, but he puts it upon the lampstand, so that all who go in and come out may see its light."⁹ At least if we are not to envision a Greco-Roman dwelling, this krypte cannot be a cellar; an ordinary Palestinian home did not have one. We might well identify it with "the niche opened up in a wall where objects were packed in,"¹⁰ or as we would say today, "in the cupboard." Finally, the most correct translation seems to be "in a nook."

Be that as it may, the light of Luke 11:33 is Christ himself and his teaching, which appear with the best possible visibility. In Matt 5:15, the light is that of the disciples; they radiate the light of revelation, taking care not to hide it.¹¹

¹ Τοῦ δ ὑπερωροῦ κρύπτη φραγμοί—ς καὶ θυρίσι περιεχομένη πάντοθεν, ed. Müller, Fragmenta Historicorum Graecorum, 1849, p. 56.

² Καὶ τὴν κρύπτην ὁμοίαν τῷ— κονιάματι. The third century BC papyrus was noted by Moulton-Milligan; today it apparently remains the only papyrological attestation.

³ War 5.330. The form in Athenaeus 205 a is the feminine of κρυπτός.

⁴ Οὐδὲ ὑπὸ τὸν μόδιον is omitted by P45, P75, Sinaitic Syriac, Sahidic, Armenian, some miniscules, etc.

⁵ Cf. J. Toutain, “Lucerna (λύχνος),” in DAGR, vol. 3, 2, pp. 1320–1339; E. Saglio, “Candelabrum (λύχνιον, λυχνία),” ibid., vol. 1, 2, pp. 869–875. J. Jeremias (“Die Lampe unter dem Scheffel,” in ZNW, 1940, pp. 237–240, reprinted in Abba, pp. 99–102), cites several rabbinic texts that mention that on the Sabbath day it is permitted to move a new lamp but not an old one (m. shabb. 3.5), to turn over a pot on the lamp so that it cannot ignite the beams (m. shabb. 16.7), to straighten up a lampstand on a feast day (m. Besa 2.6), to turn over a kind of jar on the coals gathered from the altar (m. Tamid 5.5).

⁶ Μόδιος, cf. Josephus, Ant. 9.85: “The saton is equal to one and a half Italian modii”; b. B. Qam. 6d .

⁷ A. Dupont-Sommer, “Note archéologique sur le proverbe évangélique: Mettre la lampe sous le boisseau,” in Mélanges syriens offerts à monsieur René Dussaud, Paris, 1939, pp. 789–794.

⁸ M. J. Lagrange notes on Mark 4:21 that κλίνη here is a table rather than a bed. Bushel and bed are both associated in the little parable of the lamp in Mark 4:21, while Matt 5:15, which mentions only the bushel, seems to depend on a written source common to Matt and Luke 11:33. On the question of literary or oral dependence, cf. L. Vaganay, “L’Etude d’un doublet dans la parabole de la lampe (Mc. IV, 21; Lc. VIII, 16; Lc. XI, 33; Mt. V, 15)” in Le Problème synoptique, Tournai, 1954, pp. 426–442; G. Schneider, “Das Bildwort von der Lampe: Zur Traditionsgeschichte eines Jesus-Wortes,” in ZNW, 1970, pp. 183–209; F. Hahn, “Die Worte vom Licht Lk. XI, 33–36,” in P. Hoffmann, Orientierung an Jesus, Freiburg, 1973, pp. 107–138.

⁹ Trans. B. M. Metzger in Kurt Aland, ed., Synopsis Quattuor Evangeliorum, Stuttgart, 1976, p. 522.

¹⁰ P. Joüon, L’Evangile de Notre-Seigneur Jésus-Christ, Paris, 1930.

¹¹ J. D. M. Derrett, “The Lamp Which Must Not Be Hidden (Mk. IV, 21),” in Law in the NT, pp. 189–207.

κυριακός

kyriakos, belonging to the emperor; belonging to the Lord kyriakos, S 2960; TDNT 3.1095–1096; EDNT 2.328–331; NIDNTT 2.510, 518; MM 364; L&N 12.10; BDF §113(2); BAGD 458

A. Deissmann noted that the adjective kyriakos is not a biblical word,¹ but it is frequently attested in secular Greek. St. Paul and St. John borrowed it from the commonly used, official language: “concerning the emperor” or better “belonging to the emperor”; it derives from kyrios in the sense of “possessor.”²

Its first known occurrence is in the edict of Tiberius Julius Alexander, 6 June 68: “knowing that it also suits the emperor’s accounts (tais kyriakais psephois) that those who are able should carry out these activities of their own volition, zealously”;³ “that in no case shall free men be kept in any prison at all, at least if they are not malefactors, nor in the praktoreion, with the exception of debtors to the imperial accounts, opheilontes eis ton kyriakon logon” (ibid., line 18); these debtors to the state or to the imperial finances are payable to the proprietor.

The kyriakos logos is constantly mentioned in the papyri,⁴ as is kyriakos phiskos in the inscriptions.⁵ But this adjective is used with many other terms,⁶ notably to lands on which the fiscus is payable (kyriake ge; P.Giss. 48, 8; P.Petaus 25, 20), over against ousiake ge.⁷ To the examples supplied by Moulton-Milligan, we might add ta kyriaka ktemata (property, P.Oxf. 3, 4), te pros ta kyriaka pragmata epimeleia (business, P.Brem. 37, 10), tas kyriakas misthoseis (rents, P.Mich. 174, 9), proteron ousa hypo kyriakon chorton (pasture, P.Mich. 620, 76), kyriakos oinos (wine, P.Oxy. 1578, 7), apophora en te tautes kratesei kai kyreiake apophora ton periteinomenon (payment, SB 6951, 28; cf. 9050, col. V, 12; from the first-second century); “whatever the sum we are assessed for the fiscus, we pay it” (P.Oxy. 2562, 10).

It is clearly in a much loftier sense of the word that 1Cor 11:20 notes that to participate in the Eucharist without practicing brotherly love “is not to eat the Lord’s Supper, ouk estin kyriakon deipnon phagein.” Rather, it is a private meal, one that no longer has the spirit of the liturgical act that was instituted by the Lord and remains consecrated to him. This formula was the inspiration for an inscription on a eucharistic table: Hygiainon phage kyriakon (deipnon)” (SB 7265). Pagan texts mention the hagia kyriake,⁸ and in ecclesiastical language to kyriakos (oikion) seems to mean “the house of the Lord,” the church.⁹

Sunday is mentioned in this way in Rev 1:10—“I was in the Spirit on the kyriake hemera” (egenomen en pneumati en te kyriake hemera).¹⁰ To this compare this tomb inscription from the seventh century: “God’s servant fell asleep at the tenth hour, at the dawning of the Lord’s Day, the day of the resurrection of Christ” (hora dekate diaphaousais kyriakes tais anastaseos tou Christou, SB 7564, 15); and in pagan texts, Sebaste refers to the day of the emperor, when his birthday was celebrated. This was a way of specifying a precise date, for example: “In the twentieth year of Tiberius Caesar Augustus, in the month of August, on the day of Sebaste.”¹¹ But in the Christian religion, the Lord’s Day is the one that is set aside for him.

¹ The reading Ἀδαρ λέγεται τῆ κυριακῆ φωνῆ (2Macc 15:36) in Alexandrinus is to be rejected; all the other manuscripts have τῆ Συριακῆ φωνῆ, “the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, called Adar in Syriac (Aramaic),” cf. R. Hanjart, Maccabaeorum liber II, Göttingen, 1959, pp. 17, 115. On Mordecai’s day, cf. H. Bardtke, “Der Mardochäustag,” in Tradition und Glaube: Festgabe K. G. Kuhn, Göttingen, 1971, pp. 97–116.

² Cf. P.Oxy. 1461, 10: ε—ν κτήσει κυριακῆ (third century); IGLS 650, 6: “ε—ποίησεν ε—αυτω— ε—κ τω—ν κυριακω—ν, built this tomb for himself at his masters’ expense.” Cf. A. Deissmann, Bible Studies, pp. 217ff.; Light, pp. 76, 358ff.; H. J. Mason, Greek Terms, p. 64.

³ Dittenberger, Or. 669, 13 = BGU 1563, 35; translated G. Chalon, T. Julius Alexander, p. 101, n. 2, who says that “κυριακαὶ ψῆφοι means rationes fisci,” the imperial finances.

⁴ BGU 1564, 9; 1576, 10; P.Panop.Beatty 1, 88; 2, 15, 31; P.Dura 26, 26; P.Mich. 174, 13; 423, 27; 623, 17; SB 9541, 9; Stud.Pal. XXII, 177, 18. O.Wilck. I, p. 645.

⁵ —Ἐπὶ ὁ ε—νθάψας δώσι τω— κυριακω— φίσκω (I.Car., n. 114, 4; cf. 102, 5; 106, 5; 107, 6; 108, 12; 116, 3; republished, with the exception of the last three, from MAMA VI, 135; 131; 128) or ε—πεὶ ἀποτείσει εἰ—ς τὸν κυριακὸν φίσκον (I.Car. 105, 5; 110, 4; 113, 4; 117, 2; 164, 11 = MAMA VI, 129, 130, 141, 142, 141 a).

⁶ N. Hohlwein, Termes techniques, p. 301.

⁷ Cf. C. Préaux, Economie royale, p. 621, under “Terre royale.”

⁸ P.Ant. 91, 5: “every day, except for τῆς ἁγίας κυριακῆς καὶ τῶ—ν μεγάλων ε—ορτῶ—ν”; PSI 932, 11: ἁγίας κυριακῆς ε—ν δημοσίῳ τόπῳ (sixth century). On the invitations to the banquet (the kline) of “Lord Sarapis,” P.Oxy. 110, 2; 523, 2; 1484, 3; 1755, 3; 2592 (cf. ZPE, vol. 1, 1967, p. 121); 2678; P.Oslo 157; P.Yale 85 (F. Dunand, Le Culte d’Isis dans le bassin oriental de la Méditerranée, Leiden, 1973, vol. 3, pp. 209ff.; H.C. Youtie, Scriptiunculae, vol. 1, pp. 487–509; cf. A. J. Festugière, Monde gréco-romain, vol. 2, pp. 172ff.).

⁹ P.Oxy. 903, 19: “when I had gone out to the church at Sambatho” (καὶ ἀπελθοῦσα εἰ—ς τὸ κυριακὸν ε—ν Σαμβαθῶ); 21: “Why did you go to the church?” (διὰ τί ἀπῆλθας εἰ—ς τὸ κυριακόν); PSI 843, 15: ἵνα μὴ ἀτέλεστον ὑπολύσωμεν (?) τὸ κυριακόν (sixth century). A rescript of Maximinus in 313 regarding Christians: “Let them be allowed to build their own churches, τὰ κυριακὰ δὲ τὰ οἰ—κει—α” (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 9.10.10). F. J. Dölger, “Kirche’ als Name für den christlichen Kultbau,” in Antike und Christentum, vol. 4, 1941, pp. 161–195.

¹⁰ Cf. Did. 14.1: καθ ἡμέραν δὲ κυρίου (cf. J. B. Audet, La Didaché, Paris, 1958, pp. 460ff.). Without the substantive in Gos. Pet. 35: “in the night in which the Lord’s Day shone forth” (τῇ δὲ νυκτὶ ἠ—ε—πέφωσκεν ἡ κυριακή), 50: “early on the Lord’s Day,” (ὄρθου δὲ τῆς κυριακῆς). Cf. S. V. McCasland, “The Origin of the Lord’s Day,” in JBL, 1930, pp. 65–82; W. Rordorf, Der Sonntag, Zurich, 1962, pp. 203ff. Idem, Sabbat et Dimanche dans l’église ancienne, Neuchâtel, 1972, p. 44, 63; 77, 1; 84, 5; 88, 1; 113, 7; 129, 1; 135, 79–82.

¹¹ Μηνὸς Σεβαστοῦ Σεβαστῆ (P.Meyer 36, 6). I.Perg., n. 374 B 4: μηνὸς Καίσαρος Σεβαστῆ; 8: μηνὸς Πανήμου Σεβαστῆ; D 10: μενὸς Λῶου Σεβαστῆ; SB 9589, 15: τοῦ Παρμουῦθι μηνὸς καθ ε—κάστην κυριακῆν. Cf. O.Wilck. I, pp. 812ff. H. H. Hobbs, Preaching Values from the Papyri, Grand Rapids, 1964, pp. 76–78.

κύριος, κυριεύω

kyrios, master, lord, Lord, sir; kyrieuo, to be master, take possession of, possess

kyrios, S 2962; TDNT 3.1039–1095; EDNT 2.328–331; NIDNTT 2.508–520; MM 365–366; L&N 12.9, 37.51, 53.62, 57.12, 87.53, 87.56; BDF §§5(3a), 188(2), 254(1), 268(2), 147(3); BAGD 458–460 | kyrieuo, S

2961; TDNT 3.1097; EDNT 2.328; NIDNTT 2.510, 518; MM 364–365; L&N 37.50; BDF §177; BAGD 458; ND 5.74

The substantive kyrios, “master, legal representative, sir,” was formed in the fourth century BC from the substantivized adjective to kyrion, “master of, having authority, sovereign,” from which it is barely distinguishable.¹ The first meaning of this adjective is “having power”; “taste for the beautiful and irresistible might” (dynamin kyrioteron, Pindar, Ol. 1.168), whether it is a matter of self-control,² of being master of a city (Plutarch, Quaest. conv. 6.8.2) and governing it,³ of successful politics (Demosthenes, Chers. 8.69), and especially being head of an estate: “My mother no longer had power (kyria) over her property to give me what she would have liked.”⁴ The second meaning is “decisive, regular, important, principal,”⁵ “highest of all” (Ep. Arist. 2), such as an “appointed day” (Euripides, Or. 48) or a day “marked by a new birth” (Aeschylus, Ag. 766), official (P.Princ. 165, 10) or a “decisive opinion, because we rely on numerous authorities” (Plato, Leg. 1.638 d). Hence it is used for authorized witnesses (Phlb. 67 b; Symp. 218 d), and the meaning “valid” occurs constantly in the papyri,⁶ notably with the present imperative esto, whether regarding a stipulation (P.Fouad 38, 10), a security deposit (20, 11; P.Mert. 98, 18; P.Oxy. 3204, 26), a proxy (P.Phil. 16, 8, epitropike), an agreement (P.Fouad 33, 34; P.Stras. 399, 13), a receipt,⁷ a sale,⁸ a contract,⁹ a will (P.Wisc. 13, 9, diatheke; P.Köln 100,18; P.Col. VII, n. 188, 25; SB 10756, 18), an act of cession (parachoresis, BGU 1738, 29; P.Wisc. 9, 30), a deposition (cheirographia),¹⁰ a lease (misthosis),¹¹ or any written act: to gramma,¹² he graphe kyria (SB 11248, 63, 102).

The substantive kyrios refers to the one who commands, a boss, a master,¹³ notably the owner of a slave,¹⁴ but also the master of a household (Menander, Dysk. 73, 98), the head of a family (P.Oxy. 288, 36), the head and master of inhabitants (Plutarch, Arat. 50.9; Josephus, Ant. 11.54), an officeholder (prophet, priest, scribe, C.Ord.Ptol. 43, 2; P.Köln 85, 1), the owner of a ship (BGU 1932, 11) or of real estate.¹⁵ This is the sense of “the master of the house” (ho kyrios tes oikias) in Mark 13:35 (cf. P.Tebt. 5, 147: tous kyrious ton oikion).

In Greek and Egyptian law, a wife or daughter is assisted by a legal guardian, a tutor (ho kyrios),¹⁶ which would indicate a different legal capacity for women than for men; but the documents vary a great deal. Sometimes it is specified that the woman contracts “with a guardian” (meta kyriou, P.Aberd. 30, 4; 65, 1; P.Alex. 7, 8), sometimes “without guardian” (*choris kyriou*¹⁷ or aneu kyriou [BGU 2070, 6], me echousa kyrion [P.Stras. 241, 5]). This legal meaning does not occur in the Bible.

As a common title of courtesy, kyrios is used for a speaker (as the French still say maître, cf. English mister; Epictetus 3.23.11, 3.23.19; cf. 4.1.57; BGU 2190, 1: to megaloprepestato kyrio Phoibammoni magisteri), a physician (2.15.15; 3.10.15), a soothsayer (2.7.9), a philosopher (3.22.38). It becomes the equivalent of the English “sir” (P.Wisc. 21, 5, 12; P.Brem. 12, 20 and 27; P.Phil. 33, 17; P.Oslo 49, 10; P.Laur. 39, 10; 41, 1; 107, 5; P.Genova 70, 1, 4; 84, 1) or “madam” (P.Oxy. 3313, 28: “we wish you good health, madam,” errosthai se euchometha, kyria) as when the cithara player Nero addresses his audience, “Sirs (kyrioi mou), hear me favorably” (Dio Cassius 61.20.1). Much more respect is implied, however, when the word is used for superiors, a strategos or the prefect¹⁸—as we use “Excellency”—and when used for members of the same family it takes on connotations of affection, even veneration. It is used by a son to his father (to patri kai kyrio pleista chairein),¹⁹ by a son or daughter to a venerated mother (te kyria mou metri),²⁰ to a husband,²¹ a brother,²² a sister,²³ even a son (P.Oxy. 123, 1 and 24; P.Mich. 510, 1).

With its meanings “lord” and “master,” kyrios inevitably took on a religious meaning.²⁴ Pindar already terms Zeus “kyrios of all.”²⁵ In the Hellenistic period, kyrios is the constant epithet with sovereign divinities, notably Isis (“I have come to find our divine Lady Isis”)²⁶ and Sarapis,²⁷ but also for all the other gods—Hermes (P.Giss. 85, 6; SB 10278,5), Artemis (BGU 535, 9), Soknopaios,²⁸ etc.—to the point that Brutus can say, “I am neither king nor god” by saying oute basileus oute kyrios (Plutarch, Brut. 30.3).

In effect, we can say that in the Orient “Lord” always expresses royal dignity,²⁹ connoting the dependency of subjects or vassals in submission to the sovereign.³⁰ In the fourteenth century BC, the Amarna letters call Pharaoh “lord” (bêlu) and his vassal “servant” (ardu); he is master of people and lands.³¹ In Egypt, the Ptolemies, as successors of the Pharaohs, inherit their divine character: Ptolemy XII is “the Lord King God” (Dittenberger, Or. 186, 8), and Ptolemy XIV and Cleopatra are hoi kyrioi theoi megisthoi.³² At Rome, the emperor was divinized.³³ Augustus was called theos kai kyrios kaisar Autokrator in 12 BC;³⁴ his successors almost always retained the title kyrios, especially Nero: “Nero, lord of the whole world” (ho tou pantos kosmou kyrios Neron).³⁵ The word not only expresses sovereignty and majesty but also, in connection with the idea of divinity, suggests to the whole world that Caesar the beneficent god (SB 9735) and Roman savior, and he alone, dominates the whole world. Oaths were sworn per genium Caesaris.

In the LXX, the commonplace meanings of kyrios are again found: “master of a household” (Judg 19:22-23), “owner” of a bull (Exod 21:28-29; 22:10-15), of a cistern (21:34), or of a slave (21:4-6, 8; Judg 19:11-12; cf. Gen 39:1-4, 8, 16); and especially the courtesy title, with nuances ranging from simple “sir” for a person not known by name (Gen 24:18; 31:35) to “Your Excellency.”³⁶ It is the formal term for the sovereign (“My lord the king”)³⁷ who is God’s anointed (1Sam 26:23; 2Sam 1:14, 16).

The great innovation of the LXX is on the religious level. On the one hand, it uses kyrios to translate not only the Hebrew 'adôn, 'a<^>donay, Aramaic mare', but especially the divine tetragrammaton (YHWH), so that the term for the God of Israel is "Lord."³⁸ He himself affirms, "I am the Lord" (ego eimi Kyrios).³⁹ On the other hand, "theology" is elaborated in terms of this sovereignty of a powerful, transcendent God who must be feared and loved. His throne is in the heavens (Ps 103:19; Sir 1:8). He is the Most High (Kyrios hypsistos, Ps 97:9; Sir 26:16; 50:19; Dan 2:19), whose glory abides forever (Exod 16:7, 10; Num 14:10; Hab 2:14; Ezek 8:4; Ps 104:31; 138:5), the Lord God Almighty.⁴⁰ He has servants⁴¹ to whom he gives his orders (prostagmata)⁴² and who call upon him as despota kyrie (Jdt 11:10; Isa 10:33; Jonah 4:3; Dan 9:15; Sir 23:1; 2Macc 15:4; cf. Philo, To Gaius 286; Josephus, Ant. 20.90) or as "Lord King"⁴³ who reigns forever (Exod 15:18; Ps 146:10), the equivalent of "Lord and God" (Jer 31:18; Bar 2:27; 3:6). It is insisted that he is "the Lord God of the gods" (Ps 50:1; 95:3; 96:4), "the Lord is great, our Lord is greater than all the gods."⁴⁴ This is not only a confession of his transcendence but a proclamation that he is unique—in a world (first of all Alexandrian) which bowed down before so many other kyrioi both flesh and blood and wood or metal.

In the NT, the secular meanings of kyrios are again found,⁴⁵ notably as an expression of respect and a formal address,⁴⁶ but especially the designation of God as Lord of heaven and earth (Matt 11:25; Luke 10:21; cf. Acts 17:24), the God of Israel,⁴⁷ the master of times (Mark 13:20; Acts 1:24; 2:47) and of people (Luke 1:28, 38; 2Thess 3:16). He must be served (Rom 12:11; 2Tim 2:24) and pleased (1Cor 7:32, 34; Eph 5:10); his work must be done (1Cor 16:10). He is unique ("one Lord," Eph 4:5), and when his power and sovereignty are exalted, he is obviously thereby contrasted with falsely divinized sovereigns.⁴⁸

The chief innovation of the NT—because it founds the new religion—is the application of this title to Jesus, and that straightforwardly as a royal and messianic title.⁴⁹ It is not easy to know what meaning the word had on the lips of those who were asking him for a miracle,⁵⁰ although the Canaanite woman adds "Son of David" (Matt 15:22; 20:30). In any event, strangers, disciples,⁵¹ and apostles⁵² always address Jesus as Lord, and the Master acknowledged the fitness of this title: "You call me Master and Lord, and you are right; that is what I am."⁵³ In the eschatological parables, given at the end of his career, Jesus presents himself as king: "You do not know when your Lord will come" (Matt 24:42). After Easter morning, Mary Magdalene calls him "Rabboni,"⁵⁴ and the apostle Thomas worships him: "My Lord and my God" (John 20:25). Resurrected, Jesus is the heavenly king: "God has made him Lord and Christ" (Acts 2:36), the "Lord of glory" (1Cor 2:8; 2Cor 4:4), the God of the Christians.

St. Paul elaborates this theology in contrast to the ideology of divinized humans: "If there are indeed claimed gods in heaven and earth, many gods and many lords, for us there is only one God the Father . . . and one Lord Jesus Christ";⁵⁵ "We preach . . . Christ as Lord" (2Cor 4:5; Col 2:6; 3:24); "Let every tongue proclaim that Jesus Christ is Lord,"⁵⁶ that is, God. Such is the object of faith profession and worship: "Believe in the Lord Jesus and you will be saved."⁵⁷ Henceforth Christians are "those who call upon the name of our Lord Jesus Christ,"⁵⁸ that is, who worship his divine majesty and implore his sovereign protection.

Kyrieuo. — This denominative verb, signifying "be master, take possession of, possess," is normally construed with a genitive object,⁵⁹ but beginning from AD 6 (P.Köln 155, 6), it appears more and more frequently construed with the accusative (P.Grenf. I, 21, 13; P.Lond. 121, 188; vol. 1, p. 111: tou kyrieuontos ten holen oikoumenen). Its subject can be any holder of authority, even a child who holds royal power (Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.148) or officials (proedroi) who could assess fines (Aeschines, In Tim. 1.35), but especially military leaders and princes who take possession of or seize land, property, or persons,⁶⁰ and eminently the sovereign God, master of everything: ho kyrieuon (Ep. Arist. 45, 269; Pap.Graec.Mag. 1.214: "the ruler of all the angels" [ho kyrieuon panton angelon]; XII, 115: "ruler of the whole universe" [ho kyrieuon tou pantos kosmou]). In Epictetus 2.19.1, ho kyrieuon logos is the ruling or dominating argument.

In the papyri, the verb most often designates the owner of a slave (P.Oslo 40, 19) or of a house and property,⁶¹ but especially one who has the rights to the produce of some land, the harvest from a certain territory.⁶² So it is constantly associated with the verb *krateo*⁶³ or epikrateo (SB 11215, 9), katakrateo (Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.220), but also *despozo*⁶⁴ and archo (ibid. 3.187).

Much used in the LXX, which uses it to translate the Hebrew verb mashal, "reign, dominate," kyrieuo has God as its subject only once, when Jehoshaphat says, "Yahweh, God of our fathers, are you not God of the heavens, and do you not govern all the kingdoms of the nations?" (2Chr 20:6; cf. Dan 2:38). In fact, from its first occurrence it seems to have a pejorative nuance, since it expresses a punishment, if not a curse—that of the woman after the fall: "Your husband will have dominion over you" (Gen 3:16). It is also used for the extermination of enemies (Exod 15:9, Hebrew yarash) and in Yahweh's punishment of his people in the time of the judges: "Those who hated them had dominion over them."⁶⁵ The other occurrences are neutral and refer only to the exercise of power, command,⁶⁶ especially by generals and kings who seize territory or make themselves masters of their inhabitants.⁶⁷

It is in this sense that Jesus states, "The kings of the nations exercise authority over them (kyrieuousin auton), and their princes are called benefactors" (Luke 22:25), but a pejorative nuance is not excluded (cf. Mark 10:43, katakyrieuo; Acts 19:16; 1Pet 5:3), since this mode of governing is in contrast to that of the Christian community, whose apostles are diakonoi (Luke 22:26). There is even a certain irony: despite this tyranny, the title “benefactor” is conferred upon them. This nuance of despotism, constraint, or tyranny is found again in 2Cor 1:24—“It is not that we hold dictatorial power over your faith, but we cooperate for your joy.” There is only one Kyrios, whose transcendence is hailed by 1Tim 6:15—“the King of those who reign and the Lord of those who wield sovereignty.”⁶⁸ What is new in the NT is the metaphorical meaning of kyrieuo: death no longer holds sway (Rom 6:9), nor does sin, since it has been dethroned by grace (6:14); but the law retains its authority,⁶⁹ and “Christ has died and lived in order to hold sway over the dead and the living” (Rom 14:9). He has conquered every sovereignty, and the legitimacy of his dominion can never be contested.

¹ P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique; L. Cerfaux, “Kyrios,” in DBSup, vol. 5, 200–228; W. Foerster, G. Quell, “κύριος,” in TDNT, vol. 3, pp. 1039–1098; D. L. Jones, “Christianity and the Roman Imperial Cult,” in ANRW, II, 23, 2, Berlin–New York, 1980, pp. 1023–1054.

² Plato, Ep. 7.324 b; Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 3.6.1113b32: “he was able not to get drunk.”

³ Antiphon, 2 Tetr. 3.1.1; Plato, Resp. 4.429 b: “It does not depend on the citizens (they are not masters, ὄντας κύριοι) whether the State is craven or courageous”; Ps.-Plato, Ep. 8.354 c; Andocides, C. Alcib. 4.9: “The judges have the power of death” (κυρίους εἶναι); Josephus, Ant. 4.216; War 1.362, 458.

⁴ Demosthenes, C. Poly. 50.60; cf. C. Aphob. 27.55: “He made them masters (κυρίους ε—ποίησεν) of the greatest part of his patrimony”; Isocrates, Aeginet. 19.34: “He left to his mother and his sister the right to dispose of (κυρίας) of their property”; Plato, Leg. 11.929 d: “He remains master of his property”; Menander, Dysk. 800: “If you are sure that the money will always be at your disposition, keep it . . . ; but if you are not its master (μὴ σὺ κύριος εἶ) . . . do not refuse to be generous with it”; 806; P. Eleph. II, 3–4. Master of his affairs (Josephus, War 1.69; 4.366; Ant. 8.221; 13.300).

⁵ Plato, Tim. 84 c: “the most serious diseases which are the principal causes of death”; 87 c; Soph. 230 d: “That which is most important and most efficacious by way of purification”; Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 6.13.1143b34: the ruling wisdom of philosophy; Philostratus, Gym. 50: the principal parts of the body; Josephus, War 4.406; Ag. Apion 1.19; Philo, Rewards 111; Flacc. 59, 159; To Gaius 6; Epictetus 1.20.18: “What is more important?”;

1.9.4: “The principal, the most important, the most universal of all things is the system composed of God and men”; 1.12.15; 2.10.1; 3.1.37; 3.2.3; SEG 14.64.6: ε—κκλησία κυρία = the principal or regular assembly (Aristophanes, Ach. 19); C. Michel, Recueil 687, 11; P.Genova 10, 6: ε—ντολήν κυρίαν; P.Oxy. 1423, 11.

⁶ P.Eleph. I, 14 (fourth century BC): “This contract will be valid in all circumstances”; P.Tebt. 104, 41: “I have received the contract, which is valid”; P.Oxy. 275, 33: “The apprenticeship contract is valid”; P.Mur. 115, 18 (marriage contract); P.Princ. 36, 6 (association contract, ἡ κοινωνία κυρία ἔστω); NCIG, n. xi, 9; xxii, c 60; LSCG, n. xiii, 27; xlvii, A 9; lxxxi, 9; etc.; LSCG: Supplément, n. xv, 28; xxxviii, B 11. Cf. Josephus, War 1.588; 2.35; Ant. 12.418; 16.48.

⁷ —Αποχή, BGU 1782, 16 (57–56 BC); P.Cair.Isid. 54, 14; 58, 17; 123, 10; P.Oslo 94, 11; P.Princ. 81, 16; 181, 16; P.Yale 65, 36.

⁸ Πρα—σις, P.Cair.Isid. 83, 13; 86, 9; P.Oxy. 2270, 14; P.Mich. 583, 25 (AD 78).

⁹ P.Oxy. 2109, 50; 2585, 19; 3255, 24 (ε—πιδοχή); cf. τὸ δοχθὲν κύριον ἔστω = the decision made shall be definitive (J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. XIII, 21; cf. XXVII, 12).

¹⁰ P.Yale 60, 15 (6–5 BC); 63, 16 (AD 64); BGU 1649, 22; 1731, 15, 18; 2118, 16; P.Mert. 25, 19; 36, 17; P.Mich. 266, 19; 276, 14; 338, 15; P.Oslo 37, 16.

¹¹ BGU 2139, 6; 2147, 16; 2149, 23; P.Erl. 72, 7; P.Cair.Isid. 100, 19; 103, 18; P.Mert. 17, 39; 76, 35; P.Oslo 35, 20; 138, 16.

¹² BGU 2140, 16; 2152, 14; 2155, 13; P.Mich. 280, 8; P.Rein. 105, 10; P.Stras. 246, 2; P.Wisc. 10, 16; 11, 28; P.Oxy. 3146, 19; 3251, 21; cf. ἡ συγγραφή, BGU 1943, 19; 1946, 13; 1956, 3; 2116, 11; P.Mert. 6, 17 (77 BC); P.Mich. 323, 26; P.Oslo 140, 5; P.Fouad 35, 14 (AD 48); 48, 22; P.Oxy. 2349, 16 (AD 70); P.Sorb. 15, 12: “This contract will be authoritative where they present it”; ὁ νόμος, P.Mich. 243, 12.

¹³ Aeschylus, Cho. 658: “those who command here”; Sophocles, Aj. 734: “I must make a complete report to the master”; Sophocles, OC 1643; Euripides, Andr. 558: “me and your master”; Epictetus 4.1.59: “We have circumstances for masters”; 4.1.145; P.Rein. 113, 1; P.Köln 108, 4.

¹⁴ Demosthenes, P. Phorm. 36.28: “freed by his master”; 36.43; C. Pant. 37, 51; C. Euerg. 47.14; 47.60; Antiphon 2.4.7; Xenophon, Oec. 9.16: “owner’s authorization”; Aristophanes, Plut. 6; Epictetus 4.1.166; Dittenberger, Syl. 633, 95: τοι—ς κυρίοις τω—ν ἀνδραπόδων. The slave calls his mistress ἡ ἐ—μὴ κυρία (Josephus, Ant. 17.137, 139; Philo, Prelim. Stud. 154). The term is then synonymous with δεσπότης (cf. Ant. 19.131; Good Man Free 37, 104).

¹⁵ Plutarch, Arat. 9.5; or of furniture (Philo, To Gaius 122, 129; Josephus, Ant. 2.190, 193; cf. 4.274; 14.321); even lions (Philo, Good Man Free 40); P.Mich. 264, 16, 18, 26 (AD 37); 305, 19; 350, 21; C.Ord.Ptol. 53, 134; SB 9454, n. 5, 4.

¹⁶ Demosthenes, C. Steph. 46.15; Isaeus 6.32; cf. P.Mich. 563, 22: ὑπογραφεὺς ὁ κύριος = the signatory, the tutor.

¹⁷ P.Aberd. 180, 2; BGU 1650, 5; 1662, 3; P.Cair.Isid. 93, 11; 112, 4; P.Stras. 264, 6; P.Oxy. 2236, 7; P.Mich. 627, 3. These variations in private and public law are noted by R. Taubenschlag, “La Compétence du Κύριος dans le droit gréco-égyptien” in Opera Minora, vol. 2, pp. 353–377. Ordinarily, the husband functions as kyrios (P.Mert. 6, 13, from 77 BC; 103, 2–3, AD 26; BGU 1641, 11; 2035, 2; 2036, 11; 2049, 6; 2111, 4; P.Mich. 241, 19; 257, 1; 290, 1; P.Princ. 147, 2) or the father or paternal uncle (BGU 164, 21; 1657, 2; 2020, 11; 2113, 5; P.Bru. 20, 3; P.Mich. 264, 3; 296, 1; P.Oslo 130, 2; P.Wisc. 36, 7; cf. P.Princ. 141, 1; P.Stras. 370, 5); but also a brother (SB 10294, 7; 10500, 3; 10756, 3), a nephew (P.Mert. 68, 4), a relative (μετὰ κυρίου τοῦ συγγενοῦς ἕωνος, BGU 1579, 5 and 24; P.Phil. 6, 4; 7, 5; 8, 5; P.Oslo 97, 8; P.Stras. 237, 9; P.Erl. 22, 4; P.Mich. 232, 4; 262, 3; 266, 3) or the son of such (BGU 2092, 5; P.Mert. 72, 6; P.Mich. 253, 1, AD 30; P.Stras. 257, 5; P.Oxy. 2961, 3–4; 2962, 2; P.Oxy.Hels. 29, 2; SB 10236,2).

¹⁸ P.Fam.Tebt. 106, 15; 129, 1; P.Lond. 417, 5; vol. 2, p. 299; BGU 1819, 2; 1838, 1(51/50 BC); 2212; P.Brem. 73, 1; P.Giss. 41, col. I, 4, 9, 13; 71, 17; P.Cair.Isid. 66, 19; 67, 4; P.Mert. 91, 2; P.Mich. 422, 8; 423, 2; 425, 10; 613, 3; 624, 8; 629, 7; P.Oslo 128, 13; P.Oxy. 2131, 13; 2132, 4; 2242, 1; 2562, 6 (ἐ—πάρκος); 2666, col. I, 6; P.Princ. 72, 2 (ὁ κύριός μου ἐ—πίτροπος); P.Stras. 255, 8; P.Wisc. 33, 3; cf. F. J. Dölger, Antike und Christentum, vol. 5, Münster, 1936, pp. 211–217; J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1938, n. 385; 1952, n. 154; 1962, n. 315; 1963, n. 126.

¹⁹ BGU 423, 2; 665, col. II, 18; τω— κυρίω μου πατρί, P.Mert. 41, 11; P.NYU 25, 1; P.Oslo 152, 2; P.Princ. 98, 1; P.Oxy. 2190, 1; P.Mich. 476, 1; 477, 2; 479, 2; 480, 5; 519, 1; SB 10277, 2.

²⁰ P.Lips. 110, 1; P.Fouad 80, 1; 82, 4; P.Mich. 465, 1 and 23; 491, 1; P.Oxy. 2151, 1; P.Oslo 161, 11; P.Rein. 116, 5; 118, 1; SB 10211, 1.

²¹ P.Mich. 518, 1: κυρίω μου συνβίω; IGUR, n. 633: τῆ κυρία γυναικί; cf. 88: τῆ κυρία πατρίδι; 91; 551; 666; 720; 811.

²² P.Mich. 499, 2; 515, 1; 516, 1; 520, 1; etc.; P.Oslo 61, 1; P.Rein. 116, 7; P.Stras. 197,1; P.Brem. 8, 8; 9, 22; P.Princ. 69, 6; 101, 1; P.Phil. 34, 13; P.Erl. 81, 1; 114, 1; etc.; P.Mert. 95, 1; BGU 949, 1; P.Oxy. 2154, 1; 2155, 1; 2156, 22. “Brother” can also mean “colleague” (P.Cair.Isid. 126, 1; P.Mich. 515, 5; 516; 520; 521; P.Rein. 110, 4–5). The Christian formula combines affection and respect for a brother, κύριέ μου ἀγαπετέ (P.Heid. 6, 6).

²³ P.Mert. 82, 2 and 7; P.Mich. 466, 43; 502, 18; P.Oslo 161, 7; P.Stras. 253, 10.

²⁴ As an adjective; cf. Plutarch, De def. or. 29: “Why must there be a number of Zeuses in the hypotheses of a plurality of worlds rather than one god who is the common leader and supreme guide . . . like the one whom we call the sovereign and father of all?” (κύριος ἀπαντω—ν καὶ πατήρ); Arist. 6.4: the gods are feared “because of their sovereign power” (κατὰ τὰ κύριον καὶ δυνατόν).

²⁵ Ὁ πάντων κύριος, Pindar, Isthm. 5.53; cf. Plato, Leg. 12.966 c; Ps.-Plato, Ep. 6.323d: head of all things; Xenophon, Oec. 6.1: all-powerful gods. Cf. W. W. Baudissin, Kyrios als Gottesname im Judentum und seine Stelle in der Religionsgeschichte, Giessen, 1929.

²⁶ A. Bernand, Philae, n. 15, 10 (second century BC); cf. 21, 3; 22, 4; 26, 2; 51, 5; 59, 7: “I performed an act of adoration before the very great goddess, our saving Lady Isis”; 129, 2; 136, 5; 171, 6: “to Lady Isis of Philae and of Abaton, and to all the gods worshiped in the same temple”; 183, 3 (associated with Osiris); 249, 6–7 (associated with Sarapis); P.Fouad 76, 3: invitation to dinner “in honor of our Lady Isis” (εἰ—ς ἰ—έρωμα τῆς κυρίας Ἰσιδος); P.Oxy. 142; 210; 265; 1380, 61; SB 11226, 1: Κυρία Εἴσι; Dittenberger, Or. 186, 8.

²⁷ P.Fay. 127, 5: τὸ προσκύνημά σου ποιῶ— παρὰ τω— Σαράπιδι. On a stele at Abydos, Tphous, who is eighteen years old, implores Lord Sarapis

(ed. E. Bernand, in ZPE, vol. 40, 1980, pp. 213–214); P.Oxy. 110, 2; 523, 2; 2592, 2; BGU 423, 6; 1680, 2; P.Oslo 151, 19; 157, 3; P.Stras. 304, 5; SB 8828, 5. F. M. Fraser, “The Cult of Sarapis in the Hellenistic World,” in Opuscula Atheniensi, vol. 3, Lund, 1960, p. 17; L. Vidman, Sylloge inscriptionum religionis Isaicae et Sarapiacae, Berlin, 1969, n. 26, 172, 306.

²⁸ P.Tebt. 284, 5: ὁ κύριος θεός; Dittenberger, Or. 655, 3; cf. Pythian Apollo (SEG XXIV, 1244, 5); Dionysus (Plutarch, De Is. et Os. 35; Quaest. conv. 5.3.1); Asclepius (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1967, p. 509, n. 374; 1969, p. 521, n. 372); Hera (ibid. 1967, p. 509, n. 379); Kronos (Dittenberger, Or. 606, 9). Acts of adoration of “Lord Pan” (SB 8579, 8591, 8594 = A. Bernand, Koptos, n. 39; 115, 18), described elsewhere as “very great god” (SB 8588).

²⁹ The bibliography is immense. It has been collected by L. Cerfaux, J. Tondrieau, Culte des souverains. C. Spicq, Agapè, p. 33, n. 3. We note above all L. R. Taylor, The Divinity of the Roman Emperor, Middletown, 1931; W. Schubart, “Das hellenistische Königsideal nach Inschriften und Papyri,” in APF, 1936, pp. 1–26; idem, “Das Königsbild des Hellenismus,” in Antike, 1937, pp. 272–288; we add R. Etienne, Le Culte impérial dans la Péninsule Ibérique d’Auguste à Domitien, Paris, 1958, W. den Boer, Le Culte des Souverains dans l’Empire romain (Fondation Hardt, 19), Vandœuvres-Geneva, 1973; Sr. Dominique Cuss, Imperial Cult and Honorary Terms in the New Testament, Fribourg, 1974; P. Prigent, “Au temps de l’Apocalypse: Le Culte impérial au I^{er} siècle en Asie Mineur,” in RHPR, 1975, pp. 215–235; D. L. Jones, “Christianity and the Roman Imperial Cult,” in ANRW, II, 23, 2, Berlin-New York, 1980, pp. 1023–1054.

³⁰ Cf. Philo, Change of Names 15: “The appellation ‘Lord’ has to do with commanding and kingship”; Joseph 7: “You will be our king and our lord”; Flacc. 39: “From the crowd standing all around there rang out a strange cry, the name Marin (Aramaic for lord)—this is apparently the title given to the sovereign in Syria” (cf. Josephus, Ant. 5.121; Ag. Apion 2.41: “the Romans, masters of the universe”; Flacc. 49). Cf. the hymn sung by the Athenians in honor of Demetrius, preserved by Duris of Samos: “Grant us peace, most beloved, for you are the Lord” (κύριος γὰρ εἶ σύ, Hist. 22 = Athenaeus, Deip. 6.253 f).

³¹ Ed. J. A. Knudtzon and O. Weber, Die El-Amarna-Tafeln, 1915, n. 45–339; 73, 35; 145, 17; 169, 10; etc. Cf. L. Cerfaux, “Le Titre Kyrios et la dignité royale de Jésus,” in Recueil L. Cerfaux, vol. 1, p. 7. Identical protocol in the Aramaic texts from Sindjirli for “the lord the king of Assyria,” “lord of the four corners of the earth” in the eighth century (G. A. Cooke, A Text-Book of North-Semitic Inscriptions, Oxford, 1903, n. 62–63). In the period of the Achaemenids, the Jews of Elephantine write in 407 BC “to our lord (maran) Bagohi, governor of Judea, your servants Jedoniah and his fellows” (Document I, line 1 in M. J. Lagrange, “Les Nouveaux Papyrus d’Eléphantine,” in RB, 1908, p. 326 f.). Likewise, Phoenician inscriptions from the time of the Ptolemies describe the sovereign as “my lord” (marana, CIS I, 95: “To the lord of the Ptolemaic kings.” At Petra, CIS II, 199, 201, 205, 209; but elaha for the divinity). In 13 BC, Augustus writes to the Candace of Ethiopia πρὸς κυρίαν βασίλισσαν (Chrest. Wilck. I, 2 n. IV, 3). In Syria in the first century BC, ὑπὲρ τῆς τω—ν κυρίων Σεβαστω—ν σωτηρίας (Dittenberger, Or. 606, 1), Queen Laodice is divinized (L. Robert, Hellenica, VII, Paris, 1949, pp. 5ff. Cf. E. Bickerman, Institutions des Séleucides, pp. 236–257; J. Tondriau, “Souverains et souveraines en divinités,” in Le Muséon, 1948, pp. 141–182); B. Lifshitz, “Sur le culte dynastique des Séleucides,” in RB, 1963, pp. 75–81. Cf. Herod the Great: βασιλει—Ἡρώδει κυρίῳ (Dittenberger, Or. 415, 1); Herod Agrippa: ὑπὲρ σωτηρίας κυρίου βασιλέως —Αγρίππα (Or. 418, 1), Agrippa II (Or. 423, 425, 426).

³² BerlSitzb., 1902, p. 1096; A. Bernand, Koptos 52, 9: “I performed this act of adoration for our lord, king, god, new Dionysus, Philopator, Philadelphus on 14 May 62”; cf. W. Otto, “Der Kult des Ptolemaios Soter in Ptolemais,” in Hermes, 1910, pp. 632–636; J. Scherer, “Le Papyrus Fouad Ier . . . Le Culte de Sôter à Ptolemais et à Coptos,” in BIFAO, 1942, pp. 71–73; F. Sokolowski, “Caractères du culte des monarques hellénistiques,” in Eos, 1947, pp. 169–174; J. Tondriau, “Les Souveraines lagides en déesses, au IIIe s. av. J.-C.,” in EPap, 1948, pp. 1–15. Idem, “Rois lagides comparés ou identifiés à des divinités,” in ChrEg, 1948, pp. 127–146.

³³ At least in the sense in which a divus is a novum numen. Already Caesar, son of Venus Genetrix, was deified in 38 BC (CIL 7156–7157; IG XII, 2, 537). M. P. Nilsson, Geschichte der griechischen Religion, 2d ed., Munich, 1955, vol. 1, pp. 154–185; 384–395; ET A History of Greek Religion 2d ed., trans. F. J. Fielden, Oxford, 1956. The documents are collected by V. Ehrenberg, A. J. M. Jones, Documents Illustrating the Reigns of Augustus and Tiberius, 2d ed., Oxford, 1955, pp. 81–97; E. M. Smallwood, Documents Illustrating the Principates of Gaius, Claudius and Nero, Cambridge, 1967, pp. 48–65; P. Petit, Le Premier Siècle de notre ère, Paris, 1968; A. Wlosok, Römischer Kaiserkult, Darmstadt, 1978, H. Kloft, Ideologie und Herrschaft in der Antike, Darmstadt, 1979. Caligula wished to be considered as “of a nature superior to that of humans, sharing in a better and divine destiny” (Philo, To Gaius 76; cf. 356); Tiberius was reticent and affirmed that he was mortal (Tacitus, Ann. 2.87; 4.37–38; cf. A.

J. Festugière, “Notules d’exégèse,” in RSPT, 1934, p. 362) and Claudius refused all worship (his letter to the Alexandrians; P.Lond. 1912, 50ff.).

³⁴ BGU 1197, col. I, 15; 1200, 10; P.Oxy. 1143, 4; cf. W. Déonna, “La Légende d’Octave-Auguste, dieu, sauveur et maître du monde,” in RHR, 1921, pp. 32–56, 163–195; 1922, pp. 77–107; A. d’Ors Perez-Peix, “Sol re, los origines del culto al emparador en la España romana,” in Emerita, 1942, pp. 197–227, 354–359.

³⁵ Dittenberger, Syl. 814, 31. Cf. P. Bureth, Les Titulatures impériales dans les papyrus, les ostraca et les inscriptions d’Egypte, Brussels, 1964, pp. 33ff.

³⁶ The sons of Heth are deferential in their address to Abraham (“Here us, my lord,” Gen 23:6, 11, 15), as is Lot to the angels (19:2, 18). Hannah shows great respect in calling the priest Eli her lord (1Sam 1:15, 26), but there is more affectation in Abigail’s words to David (25:25-31; 1Kgs 3:17-26). The term presupposes that the person using it recognizes the person described by it as a superior (Gen 27:29, 27; 32:5, 39; 33:8, 13-15; 40:1, 7; 42:10), the master of a country (42:30, 33; 43:20; 44:9; 45:8-9; 47:18, 25; 1Macc 2:53; 9:25) or a holder of high office (2Sam 11:11).

³⁷ 1Sam 26:17-19; 2Sam 3:21; 4:8; 9:9-11; 10:3; 14:17-19; 15:21; 1Kgs 1:2, 11, 20, 24, 37; 2Kgs 6:26. Nebuchadnezzar is “the great king, the lord of the whole earth” (Jdt 2:5; cf. Zedekiah, Jer 37:20), Belshazzar (Dan 4:16, 21; cf. 2:4—“may my lord the king reign forever”; 3:9).

³⁸ “Lord is his name” (Κύριος ὄνομα αὐτῶν, Ps 68:4; 148:13), he is God (100:3); cf. Gen 10:9; 11:5-6; 12:1; 12:1; Exod 7:16—“the Lord God of the Hebrews”; 9:13; 10:3; 1Sam 14:41—“Lord God of Israel”; 20:12; 1Kgs 11:31; Isa 24:16; Bar 2:11–12; Ps 72:18. In the psalmists’ invocations, God is called simply “Lord” (Ps 3:1; 6:1; 9:13; 10:1; 12:7; 15:1; etc.); sometimes the address is doubled, “Lord, Lord” (140:7; 2Macc 1:24; Matt 25:11; 3Macc 2:2).

³⁹ Exod 14:4, 18; 15:26; Lev 11:44; 19:3-4; Num 10:10; 15:41; 35:34; Deut 5:6-9; Hos 12:10; 13:4; Isa 43:3; 51:15; Ps 81:10. L. Cerfaux, “Le nom divin ‘Kyrios’ dans la Bible grecque,” in Recueil L. Cerfaux, vol. 1, pp. 113–136; “‘Adonai’ et ‘Kyrios,’” ibid., pp. 137–172.

⁴⁰ Jdt 13:4; Ps 59:5; 69:6; 80:4, 7, 19; 84:8, 12; 89:8; Sir 3:20. Pantokrator (2Sam 7:27; 1Kgs 19:14; Jdt 8:13; 16:17; Amos 5:14-16; 9:6; Nah 2:14; 3:5; Hag 2:5, 7; Zech 1:3-4; Mal 1:4; Jer 15:16; 23:17; 50:34; Bar 3:4; cf. 2Macc 3:22, 30). He “made the heavens and the earth and the sea” (Exod 20:11; 31:17; 2Kgs 19:15; Ps 96:7); master of life and death (Ep. Arist. 253).

⁴¹ Like Moses (Josh 9:2; 11:12; 12:6; 13:8:18:7), Joshua (Josh 24:29; Judg 2:8), his faithful ones (ὁ κύριε, ε—γὼ δοῦλος σός, Ps 116:16; 135:1; Jonah 1:9—δοῦλος κυρίου εἰ—μὴ ε—γὼ) who serve him (Judg 10:16; 1Sam 2:11, 18; 3:1; 7:4; 2Kgs 10:23; 2Chr 30:8; 34:33; Ps 2:11; 100:2; 102:22).

⁴² Prov 14:27; Sir 6:37; Dan 9:23; 2Macc 2:2; cf. the commandments of the Lord, Lev 4:13, 22; Deut 4:2; 6:17; 8:6; 10:13; 2Kgs 17:16.

⁴³ Sir 51:1; Isa 6:5; 24:23; Mic 4:7; Obad 21; Zeph 3:15; Dan 4:34; Ps 145:1; 97:1; 99:1. He reigns over the kings of the earth (Ps 110:5; 138:4; Sir 10:14; Dan 2:37, 47). Kingship is a gift from God (Ep. Arist. 224; Josephus, Ant. 7.151); cf. E. R. Goodenough, “The Political Philosophy of Hellenistic Kingship,” in YCS, vol. 1, 1928, pp. 55–102; L. Delatte, Les Traités de la royauté d’Égypte, Diotogène et Sthénidas, Liège-Paris, 1942; C. Lacombrade, Le Discours sur la royauté de Synésios de Cyrène, Paris, 1951; J. de Fraine, L’Aspect religieux de la royauté Israélite, Rome, 1954; J. Coppens, “Le Caractère sacré de la souveraineté en Israël, en particulier d’après le Psaume CX,” in Atti dell’ VII Congresso intern. di Storia delle Religioni, Florence, 1956, pp. 267ff. Idem, “La Portée messianique du Psaume CX,” in ETL, 1956, pp. 5–23.

⁴⁴ Ps 135:5; 145:3—“The Lord is great; his greatness is unfathomable”; 147:5; Isa 33:21; Dan 9:4; Sir 43:5.

⁴⁵ Notably the owner of a slave (Matt 6:24; 10:24; 24:46, 50; Luke 16:13; John 13:16; 15:20; Eph 6:5, 9; Col 3:22; 4:1), of a vineyard (Matt 20:8; 21:40; Mark 12:9), of the harvest (Matt 9:38; 13:27; Luke 10:2), of the household (Mark 13:35), of the Sabbath (Matt 12:8; Mark 2:28; Luke 6:5). Cf. S. Herner, Die Anwendung des Wortes Κύριος im Neuen Testament, Lund, 1903.

⁴⁶ The members of the Sanhedrin to Pilate (Matt 27:63), and Festus to the emperor (Acts 25:26), or St. John to one of the Elders (Rev 7:4), the Greeks to Philip (John 12:21), and St. Paul to Jesus on the road to Damascus (Acts 9:5; cf. 22:19), Mary Magdalene to the one she mistook for the gardener (John 20:15), the jailer to Paul and Silas (Acts 16:30). Sarah called Abraham her lord (1Pet 3:6).

⁴⁷ Luke 1:68, 76; 20:37; cf. “the Lord your God” (4:7, 10; 23:37; Luke 1:16, 18; Acts 2:39).

⁴⁸ 1Tim 6:15—“the blessed and only sovereign, the King of those who reign and the Lord of those who wield authority”; Rev 11:17—“We give you thanks, Lord God, the Almighty, the One who is”; 15:3; 16:7; 19:6; 21:22. Cf. A. Deissmann, Light, pp. 349–357; K. Prümm, “Herrscherkult und Neues Testament,” in Bib, 1928, pp. 3–25, 129–142, 289–301; L. Cerfaux, “‘Kyrios’ dans les citations pauliniennes de l’Ancien Testament,” in Receuil L. Cerfaux, vol. 1, pp. 173–188.

⁴⁹ Luke 2:11; B. M. Nolan, The Royal Son of God, Fribourg-Göttingen, 1979; cf. W. Foerster, Herr ist Jesus, Gütersloh, 1924; E. von Dobschütz, “ΚΥΡΙΟΣ ΙΗΣΟΥΣ,” in ZNW, 1931, pp. 97–123; S. Lösch, Deitas Jesu und antike Apotheose, Rottenburg am Meer, 1933; L. Cerfaux, “Le Titre Kyrios et la dignité royale de Jésus,” in Recueil L. Cerfaux, vol. 1, pp. 35–63; L. Sabourin, Les Noms et titres de Jésus, Bruges-Paris, 1963, pp. 245–264; E. Langevin, Jésus Seigneur et l’eschatologie, Bruges-Paris, 1967, pp. 173–178; I. de la Potterie, “Le Titre Κύριος appliqué à Jésus dans l’Evangile de Luc,” in Mélanges Rigaux, Gembloux, 1970, pp. 117–146; J. Coppens, “La Relève du messianisme royal,” in ETL, 1971, pp. 117–143; idem, La Relève apocalyptique du messianisme royal, Louvain, 1979; A. H. R. E. Paap, “Nomina Sacra in the Greek Papyri of the First Five Centuries A.D.,” in Pap.Lugd.Bat. VIII, pp. 6ff., 101ff.

⁵⁰ Matt 8:2, 6; 9:28; Luke 5:12; 7:6; cf. an unnamed person: “Someone said, ‘Lord, will few be saved?’” (Luke 13:23); J. D. Kingsbury, “The Title ‘Kyrios’ in Matthew’s Gospel,” in JBL, 1975, pp. 246–255.

⁵¹ Matt 7:21—“Lord, save us”; 8:21; 14:28, 30; Luke 9:61; 10:17; 11:2; John 11:12; 20:25.

⁵² Matt 26:22; Luke 22:38; John 13:25; Acts 1:6. Notably Peter (Matt 16:22; 17:4; 18:21; Luke 5:8; 22:33; John 6:68; 13:6, 9, 36; 21:16–17, 20–21), John (Luke 9:54; John 13:25; 21:7), Zacchaeus (Luke 19:8), the Samaritan woman (John 4:11, 15), the man born blind (John 9:36, 38), the sisters of Lazarus (John 11:3, 32), Philip (14:8), Jude (John 14:22), Mary Magdalene (10:13).

⁵³ John 13:13–14; cf. Matt 22:43–45: “How is it that David calls his son ‘Lord’? If he calls him ‘Lord’ how is he his son?”; cf. Mark 12:35–37; Luke 20:42–44; Acts 2:34; Str-B, vol. 4, pp. 452–465; M. Bouttier, “Les Parables du maître dans la tradition synoptique,” in ETR, 1973, pp. 175–195.

⁵⁴ John 20:16. Cf. R. Le Déaut, Nuit Pascale, p. 22.

⁵⁵ 1Cor 8:5-6 (which could be glossed by 1John 5:21—"keep yourselves from idols"). E. Rohde, "Gottesglaube und Kyriosglaube bei Paulus," in ZNW, 1923, pp. 43ff. Cf. A. Feuillet, "La Profession de foi monothéiste de I Cor. VIII, 4-6," in Studii Biblici Franciscani, vol. 13, Jerusalem, 1963, pp. 7-32 (reprinted in Le Christ Sagesses de Dieu, pp. 59ff.); W. Thüsing, Per Christum in Deum, Münster, 1965; H. Langkammer, "Literarische und theologische Einzelstücke in I Kor. VIII, 6," in NTS, 1971, pp. 193-198; J. G. Gibbs, Creation and Redemption, Leiden, 1971, pp. 59ff. J. Murphy-O'Connor, "I Cor. VIII, 6: Cosmology or Soteriology?" in RB, 1978, pp. 253-267.

⁵⁶ Phil 1:11; V. Taylor, The Names of Jesus, London, 1953, pp. 38-51; R. P. Martin, Carmen Christi; J. Dupont, "Nom de Jésus," in DBSup, vol. 6, col. 518ff.

⁵⁷ Acts 16:31; cf. 5:14; 9:42; 20:21, 24; 28:31; cf. O. Cullmann, "'Kyrios' as Designation for the Oral Tradition Concerning Jesus," in SJT, 1950, pp. 180-197; J. C. O'Neill, "The Use of Kyrios in the Book of Acts," SJT, 1955, pp. 155-174; G. Schneider, "Gott und Christus als ΚΥΡΙΟΣ nach der Apostelgeschichte," in Begegnung mit dem Wort: Festschrift H. Zimmermann, Bonn, 1980, pp. 161-174; "No one can say 'Jesus is Lord' except in the Holy Spirit" (1Cor 12:3; cf. G. De Broglie, "Le Texte fondamental de saint Paul contre la foi naturelle, I Cor. XII, 3," in RSR, 1951, pp. 253-266); "faith in the glorious Lord Jesus Christ" (Jas 2:11), who reigns (cf. John 18:37; Rev 11:15), "Lord of lords and King of kings" (Rev 17:14; 19:16); "whoever calls upon the name of the Lord will be saved" (Rom 10:9; cf. Acts 13:2).

⁵⁸ 1Cor 1:2. The formula varies: "Lord Jesus" (1Thess 2:15; 4:2; 2Thess 1:7; 1Cor 11:23; 2Cor 4:14; 11:31; Phlm 5; Rev 22:20—"Come, Lord Jesus"); "Lord Jesus Christ" (Rom 13:14; 1Cor 5:4; 8:6; Phil 1:2; 3:20; Eph 6:23; Jas 1:1; 2Pet 2:20); "Christ Jesus my Lord" (Phil 3:8); "our Lord Jesus" (1Thess 2:19; 3:11, 13; 2Thess 1:8; Heb 13:20); "Jesus Christ our Lord" (Rom 1:4; 5:1, 11, 21; 7:25; 15:6, 30; 16:18; 2Cor 1:3; Gal 6:14; 1Thess 1:3; 5:23; 2Thess 2:1, 14, 16; Eph 1:3, 17; 6:24; Col 1:3; 1Tim 1:12; 6:14; 2Pet 1:8, 14, 16; 3:18; Jude 17, 21, 25). 2Pet 1:11 specifies: "the eternal kingship of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ"; Jude 4: μόνον δεσπότην καὶ κύριον ἡμῶ—ν —Ιησοῦν Χριστόν. In every case in which it is used, the possessive plural our emphasizes not only the common object of the faith of all believers, but also their voluntary and unanimous submission to their one and only heavenly and divine Kyrios.

⁵⁹ Dittenberger, Or. 229, 56 (third century BC); Polybius 4.18.2: "the role of the polemarchs is to keep the keys"; C. Michel, Recueil 976, 11: ὧν τε

αὐτὸς ε—κυρίευσεν; T. Issach. 7.7. Cf. B. G. Mandilaras, Verb, n. 384, 396, 859 (1), 890.

⁶⁰ Polybius 2.12.14: “they seized (ε—κυρίευσαν) twenty feluccas”; Josephus, War 1.39, Antiochus “having become master of the sanctuary”; 1.121: Hyrcanus “seized precious hostages of safety”; Ant. 10.223: Nebuchadnezzar “became master of his father’s kingdom”; 13.428; Ag. Apion 1.138.

⁶¹ P. Stras. 151, 20; P. Princ. 144, 15; P. Haun. 11, col. IV, 2; P. Oxy. 2722, 43, 61; P. Tebt. 104, 15, 21. Cf. having oneself at one’s own disposal, in a Delphic act of emancipation in the second century BC, “Stratiation will be free, mistress of herself (ε—λευθέρᾳ ἔστω Στράτιον κυριεύουσα αὐτοσωτα—ς) doing whatever she wants” (J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. 42, 9).

⁶² P. Fouad 43, 34; P. Mert. 17, 30; P. Wisc. 7, 20; P. Oxy. 2137, 29; 2189, 20; 2351, 40; 2585, 14; 2795, 15; 2874, 22; 2974, 21; 3354, 35; P. Oxy. Hels. 41, 31; P. Princ. 147, 18; P. Amst. 42, 5; P. Köln 149, 20; P. Yale 70, 5; P. Mich. 610, 30; P. Tebt. 815, frag. III, r 15; VI, 25; SB 9918, 15; 9919, 2; 10532, 18; 10780, 24; NCIG, n. 6, 33.

⁶³ P. Fouad 44, 25: “Didymus shall have possession and ownership of the above-designated part of the house” (18 August 44); P. Phil. 11, 17; P. Corn. 12, 27; P. Erl. 60, 4; P. Mich. 584, 25; P. Mert. 106, 18; P. Stras. 314, 22; P. Oxy. 2136, 10; 2236, 22; 2723, 19; 2972, 33; P. Oxy. Hels. 44, 20; P. Col. VII, 181, 14; SB 6291, 15–16; 6612, 16; 10728, 15; 11233, 42.

⁶⁴ A division of property in AD 72, P. Mich. 186, 23; 187, 21 (in 75); 583, 17 (in 78); SB 7031, 23.

⁶⁵ Ps 106, 41; cf. Isa 3:4, 12; Lam 5:8—“slaves will have dominion over us”; but finally the Israelites will have dominion over their oppressors (Isa 14:2, Hebrew radâh) and will possess the land (Jer 30:3; Bar 2:34). Other pejorative meanings: Gen 37:8, Joseph’s brothers, “Do you want to rule over us? They hated him even more”; Isa 19:4—“violent kings will rule over the Egyptians”; Dan 6:25 (Theodotion): “The lions became masters (of Daniel’s accusers) and broke their bones.”

⁶⁶ Num 21:18 (Hebrew mish’enet); Judg 9:2; Sir 37:18—“Good and evil, life and death, their perpetual sovereign is the tongue”; 44:3; Bar 3:16—“those who rule the beasts of the earth.”

⁶⁷ Josh 12:2; 15:16; Jdt 1:14; 10:13; 15:7; Dan 2:39; 11:3, 43; 1Macc 6:63; 7:8; 8:16; 10:76; 11:8; 14:7.

⁶⁸ Κύριος τῶ—ν κυριευόντων; on this superlative genitive, cf. Philo, Dreams 2.95, 100; C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, p. 573; G. Mussies, The Morphology of Koine Greek, Leiden, 1971, p. 97.

⁶⁹ Rom 7:1; cf. Josephus, Ant. 19.305; J. D. M. Derrett, Law in the NT, pp. 461–471.

κῶ—μος

komos, festive procession, feast, drunken feast

komos, S 2970; EDNT 2.333; MM 367; L&N 88.287; BAGD 461

The first meaning of this term is “festive procession,” something that formed a part of certain religious festivals, like the Anthesteria;¹ this was a parody of official processions and is linked to the birth of theater, since in it are found disguises, masks, mimic dance, and even exchanges of invective.² Secondly, komos refers to the Apollonian paeon or the Dionysiac dithyramb, associated with the arts of music and dance; thus in the catalogs of winners at the City Dionysia, komoï are the choruses sung and danced in honor of Dionysus.³

In the Hellenistic era, komos is used for a dinner and the diversion that go along with it, notably joyous singing. In the vision of the decurion Maximus: “like a spring flower, I stirred up my festal song. . . . Calliope sang a festal song.”⁴ The epitaph of a young woman who died at the age of twenty: “At the moment when the noise of the feast . . . was going to resound in my father’s home.”⁵ But these feasts, accompanied by music and dance, degenerated, ending up in drunkenness and license.⁶ Philo denounces them: “In all your feasts and gatherings, see what exploits there are that stir up admiration and imitation . . . drunkenness, drunken behavior, parties” (methe, paroinia, komoi, Philo, Cherub. 92; cf. Dio Chrysostom 4.110).

The Bible uses the word only in this pejorative sense, making komos mean a drunken dinner party: “no more intemperate parties or drunkenness” (me komois kai methais, Rom 13:13); “the works of the flesh . . . drunkenness, orgies” (methai, komoi);⁷ “You fulfilled the will of the pagans in debaucheries, lust, free-flowing wine, orgies, drinking (oinophlygiais, komois, potois)—immoral, idolatrous practices” (1Pet 4:3).

¹ In Egypt, the κωμασία is the sacred procession of the images of the gods, cf. UPZ 162, col. VIII, 21: καὶ ε—ν ται—ς κατ̄ ε—νιαυτὸν γινομέναις

τοῦ Ἀμμωνος διαβάσεσιν εἰ—ς τὰ Μεμνόνεια προάγοντας τῆς κωμασίας τὰς καθηκούσας αὐτοί—ς λειτουργίας ε—πιτελει—ν (116 BC); C.P.Herm. 2, 21: the cult of the sacred month of Pharmuthi, ε—ν ᾧ πολλά καὶ συνεχει—ς κατὰ λόγον κωμασίαι γίνονται (fourth century); P.Mert. 73, 4: τω—ν ι—ερέων κωμασίας ὑπὲρ τῆς ψυχῆς κυρίων (second century); SB 9199, 6: ι—ερεῦσι Σοκνοπαίου θεοῦ μεγάλου ται—ς κωμασίαις τω—ν προκειμένων θεω—ν; 8334, 25: μετήλλαξε διηνεκω—ς ποηθῆναι τὰς τω—ν κυρίων θεω—ν κωμασίας καὶ πανηγύρεις (= Dittenberger, Or. 194; cf. R. Hutmacher, Ehrendekret, pp. 62–63).

² According to Mme Ghiron, “Kômos et kômoi: Recherches sur les origines des genres scéniques,” in REG, 1972, pp. XX–XXII. P. Chantraine, (Dictionnaire étymologique, p. 606) defines κω—μος thus: “a group of young people having fun and singing,” especially in the Dionysiac festivals; hence: joyful festival, feast. He defines κωμάζω: “participate in a komos; go in a group to a party.” Cf. Aristotle, Poet. 3.1448a: “The Athenians say that comedians (κωμῳδοί = singers in a κω—μος) get their name not from κωμάζειν, but from the fact that having been scorned in the city they wandered about in κω—μαι.”

³ Cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 1078, 1: ἀπὸ τοῦ ἄρχοντος, ε—ῶ ου— πρω—τον κω—μοι ἦσαν τω— Διονύσω τραγωιδοὶ δ?.

⁴ Κω—μον ἀείδειν; E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 168, 9; cf. A. J. Festugière, Hermès Trismégiste, p. 48.

⁵ E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 84, 5; another reading in SEG VIII, 484; CII 1508.

⁶ Cf. Wis 14:23—“mad orgies with outlandish rites” (ε—μμανει—ς κώμους); 2Macc 6:4—“The temple was full of debauchery and orgies”; Diodorus Siculus 17.72; Josephus, Ant. 17.65: κω—μοι καὶ κρυπταὶ σύνοδοι.

⁷ Gal 5:21. Cf. Dio Cassius 65.3: “The time of the reign of Vitellius was nothing but drunkenness and orgies” (οὐδὲν ἄλλο ἢ μέθαι τε καὶ κω—μοι); De lib. ed. 16: κύβοι καὶ κω—μοι καὶ πότοι. On the linking of these two latter terms in the sin lists, cf. A. Vögtle, Tugend- und Lasterkataloge, p. 37.

λαγχάνω

lanchano, to cast lots, be chosen by lot, receive as one’s lot, receive

lanchano, S 2975; TDNT 4.1–2; EDNT 2.335; NIDNTT 1.478; MM 368; L&N 30.104, 30.106, 57.127; BDF §§171(2), 229(2), 400(3); BAGD 462

This verb, much used in classical Greek¹ but unknown in Matt and Mark, has three meanings in the NT. First of all: “cast lots.” At the foot of the cross, “the soldiers said to one another, let us not tear it (Jesus’ tunic), but let us cast lots to see whose it shall be.”² Next: “to be chosen by lot.” It was the custom of the members of the priestly class to cast lots for the division of tasks in the temple service, and Zechariah, of the class of Abdia, “was chosen by lot to burn the incense,”³ in the same manner in which Saul was chosen to become king of Israel (1Sam 14:47). In the inscriptions, lanchano is constantly used for a person chosen by lot to carry out some mission or function,⁴ notably the priesthood.⁵ But at Jerusalem the preparing and offering of the daily sacrifice were determined by casting lots four times: “The attendant said to the priests, ‘Go and cast lots to decide who shall immolate, who shall shed (the blood), who shall get the coals from the inside altar and from the lamp, and who shall carry the parts up the ramp—the head and the legs and the feet. . . .’ The attendant said to them: ‘Those who have not yet burned incense, come draw lots’; they drew lots, each having his part.”⁶ Thus the priest Zechariah was chosen to offer the sacrifice of incense. This was a memorable occasion, because a priest did not have this task more than once in a lifetime.⁷

The third meaning of lanchano is “receive as one’s lot, gain a share, be paid one’s part,” like Solomon, whose lot it was to receive a good soul (Wis 8:19), or Judas, “who received this ministry as his portion.”⁸ If sometimes, as in these two texts, lanchano kleron is used (P.Oxy. 2407, 21; SEG IX, 1, 16 and 37; Dittenberger, Syl. 1109, 127; second century AD; Philo, Moses 1.157), or ek klerou (P.Tebt. 382, 5; from 30 BC to AD 1; P.Mich. 557, 10; from AD 116), this complement is usually suppressed (P.Tebt. 383, 14; in AD 46), and the verb means “to be awarded a right,” for example, a share of the sacrifices,⁹ the right to take part in something,¹⁰ privileges (I.Priene, 364, 8; Philo, Sobr. 54). In the papyri it is seen especially with regard to the parts of an inheritance or in contracts for the division of property. In the first century: “If I die, I leave my dwelling, which I obtained by the dividing of an inheritance” (ten mou oikesin he elachon ek diakleroseos, P.Dura 16 b 7); “one of the houses was allotted to Polemocrates. . . . They were awarded it in the following manner . . .” (P.Dura 19, 3, 6). “Horion for his part obtained. . . .”¹¹

Obviously, the verb has commonplace uses, such as “If you are not present, this matter will not receive a solution” (lysin ou lanchani touto, P.Mert. 80, 14); but also in funerary inscriptions: “The season that fell my lot was short” (meikron men ego t’elachon kyklon, CII, 1510, 7 = SB 6647); “Here lies Dalmatia. . . . She lives; she has found a path that is the end of death” (thanatoio telos lachousa keleuthon, I.Thas., 370, 20, a Christian epitaph from the fourth century).

It is with this connotation of value that we must understand 2Pet 1:1—“Simon Peter . . . to those who have obtained a faith as precious as ours” (lachousin pistin; cf. Jude 3, pistis paradotheisa, “the faith handed down”). The emphasis is on God’s free grace at the source of the distributing and the giving. We might compare Homer: “The subtle plan whereby Achilles would accept Priam’s gifts” (hos ken Achilleus doron ek Priamoio lache);¹² Sib. Or. 3.580: “It is with justice that, having received their portion in the law of the Most High (nomou Hypsistou lachontes), [the holy race of] the pious shall dwell in their cities and in their luxuriant countryside in happiness and prosperity.”

¹ Cf. P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique, pp. 611ff.; a large number of references are given in LSJ under this word; G. Fatouros, Index Verborum zur frühgriechischen Lyrik, Heidelberg, 1966, p. 220.

² John 19:24—ἀλλὰ λάχωμεν περὶ αὐτοῦ τίνοσ ἔσται (cf. Gos. Pet. 12: λαχμὸν ἔβαλον ε—πὶ αὐτοί—ς); cf. Ps 22:19—“They divided up my garments, they cast lots for my clothing” (Hebrew yapilû gôral). The LXX translates ε—πὶ τὸν ἰ—ματισμὸν μου ἔβαλον κληῆρον, but Symmachus says ε—λάγχανον; cf. Josephus, War 3.390: “Having persuaded his companions, he drew lots with them”; Diodorus Siculus 4.63: “They decided to cast lots for the daughter of Leda. . . . The lots were cast, and Theseus was chosen.”

³ Luke 1:9—ἔλαχε τοῦ θυμια—σαι. The infinitive does not usually have the article (cf. SB 9760, 2: ἔλαχεν ὑμῖ—ν δοῦλαι. E. Mayser, Grammatik, vol. 1, 3, p. 149, 11; vol. 2, 2, p. 204, 25; F. M. Abel, Grammaire, §44 m, 70 b).

⁴ Athenian decree for the poet Philippides, in 287 BC: “May it please the council that the presidents who will be chosen by lot to preside over the popular assembly” (Dittenberger, Syl. 374, 54; cf. 280, 13; 375, 9, 14, 21); in honor of the taxiarchoi, in 280 (NCIG, n. 2, 12; cf. 11, 20); in 270 (SEG XIV, 64, 22); in the first century BC (ibid., II, 710, 10; cf. XVII, 2, 113); C. Michel, Recueil, n. 685, 15. “Sosigenes . . . having been chosen during the thirteenth year to go to Philae” (A. Bernand, Philae, vol. 1, n. 66); I.Gonn., n. 109, 20.

⁵ Ἴερεὺς λαχῶν, Dittenberger, Syl. 486, 9; 723, 16; 762, 12; C. Michel, Recueil, 978, 29; in 160 BC, Euboulos of Marathon, “priest of the great gods and then of Asclepius, then once again elected by the people and chosen by lot for the priesthood of Dionysus” (F. Durrbach, Choix, n. 79, 19). I.Priene 205, 1: ἔλαχε τὴν ι—εροσύνην; LSCG, n. 31, 4 (a decree relating to the cult of Poseidon and of Erechtheus, fourth century BC), τὸν ι—ερέαν ἀεὶ λαχόντα; 44, 9 (52–51 BC); 48 A 3; idem, Lois sacrées: Supplément, n. 19, 14. Cf. Josephus, War 4.155: “They undertook to choose the chief priests by lot.”

⁶ M. Tamid 3.1; 5.2; cf. m. Yoma 2.1; 2.4. Cf. Philo, Spec. Laws 1.171. J. Jeremias, Jerusalem, p. 202.

⁷ R. Hanina declared that in his time “no priest had ever been chosen twice to offer the incense” (y. Yoma 40a). “A strange story is told about the high priest Hyrcanus and how it came about that the deity spoke to him. The day when his sons fought with Cyzicenus, he was alone in the temple burning incense as high priest, when he heard a voice saying that his sons had just defeated Antiochus. When he went out of the sanctuary, he told the whole crowd what had happened, and thus it actually happened” (Josephus, Ant. 13.282–283, cited by H. Pernot, Les deux premiers chapitres de Matthieu et de Luc, Paris, 1948, p. 135).

⁸ Acts 1:17—ἔλαχεν τὸν κλῆρον τῆς διακονίας ταύτης. Cf. P. Katz, “Septuagintal Studies in the Mid-Century,” in W. D. Davies, D. Daube, eds., The Background of the New Testament and Its Eschatology (C. H. Dodd Festschrift), Cambridge, 1956, p. 195.

⁹ LSCG, 113, 5 (Thasos, fifth century BC; a rule concerning the cult of Athena Patroia): καὶ γυναι—κες λαγχάνωισιν. LSCGSup, n. 52 B 6.

¹⁰ LSCGSup, 10 C 8; 13, 22; 65, 29, 33 (= Dittenberger, Syl. 736); SB 6178, 4).

¹¹ P.Mich. 186, 13 and 14 (from AD 72); 187, 9 and 11 (from AD 75), republished in SB 7031, 12; 7032, 9. “We were children at the time; we received our inheritance in conformity to the law” (κατὰ δὲ τοὺς νόμους ε—λάχομεν, P.Meyer 8, 5; from AD 151). “The portion allotted to the very loyal Zunayn consists of . . .” (P.Ness. 16, 6, 11, 14; cf. 21, 30, 33, 40; 22, 18, 24; 31, 9, 13, 19; 59, 12). “Our Master, the illustrious emir, gave out ankle rings, and the portion that fell to the pagarchia (καὶ ἔλαχεν τῆ παγαρχία) . . . was a hundred and twenty rings” (P.Apoll. 20, 1; eighth century). Cf. Philo, Decalogue 64. In receipts, ἔλαχον—λάχωνον = received so much . . . (O.Bodl. 1849; 1962; BGU 2110, 4; 2123, 12; P.NYU 18, 2; SB 9262, 2).

¹² Homer, Il. 24.76; cf. 4.46: τὸ γὰρ λάχομεν γέρας ἡμεῖς, “it is our own prerogative.” In epigrams, cf. I.Lind. 621; A. and E. Bernand, Memnon, n. 29, 17: κήνων ε—κ γενέας κᾶγω λόχον αἶμα τὸ κα—λον, “it is from their race that I derive my noble blood”; 3Macc 6:1.

λάθρα (λάθρα)

lathra, secretly

lathra, S 2977; EDNT 2.335; MM 368; L&N 28.71; BDF §§26, 435; BAGD 462

“Call someone secretly” is a common expression. “Herod, having had the magi summoned secretly, learned from them the precise time of the appearing of the star” (Matt 2:7, lathra kalesas); “Saul gave this order to his servants: Speak secretly to David to tell him . . .”¹ Speaking or acting in secret can be a sign of discretion; thus a person might speak in a low voice, as when Martha invites her sister to join her and Jesus.² Most often, however, this sort of secrecy goes along with evil intentions and evil deeds;³ sometimes it simply expresses surprise.⁴ In any event, acting secretly is the opposite of acting out in the open: “when the Jews everywhere began to agitate and to meet, when, both in secret and openly (ta men lathra, ta dekai phaneros) they had brought great trouble on the Romans” (Dio Cassius 69.13). Thus St. Paul protests against the lictors at Philippi, “Having beaten us publicly . . . now they throw us out secretly” (kai nyn lathra hemas ekballousin).⁵

So lathra expresses what no one knows or sees—as when David arose secretly and went to the place where Saul was encamped,⁶ or when Moses’ mother nursed her child in her house for three months, away from most of the people (lanthanonta tous pollous, Philo, Moses 1.9; cf. Acts 26:26)—so that even interested parties are not alerted.⁷

This nuance of nondisclosure should be retained in John 11:28, where Mary, who is busy receiving the condolences of her Jerusalemite relations, is warned in a low voice by her sister that the Master is waiting for her. It is also the connotation in Matt 1:19—“Joseph, her husband, being a just man and not wanting to expose her in public, decided to repudiate her secretly.”⁸ M. J. Lagrange explains his situation in this way: “Three options were available to Joseph: denouncing Mary (Deut 24:1; Lev 5:1); repudiating her secretly; or taking her with him, which would make the marriage definite.”⁹ The whole emphasis of the expression is on his decision for clemency and even more on the discretion of the planned separation, which would leave the mother’s honor intact. Denouncing his fiancée publicly,¹⁰ bringing a judicial action, could have led to her receiving the death penalty. Even with a private arrangement, avoiding a scandal could be difficult. Now Joseph, while he had scruples about accepting as his wife a fiancée who was expecting a child that was not his, and even though he had decided to send her away,¹¹ wanted above all to avoid making a spectacle, avoid defaming Mary or tainting her reputation. The secrecy (lathra), then, has to do with the motive for the separation.

Since this much is clear, we might wonder why St. Matthew credits this twofold decision to Joseph's justice.¹² If we understand dikaiosyne in the biblical sense of giving God and neighbor their due, it is not clear how it requires a secret break in the relationship. The truth, however, is that in the Koine, in sacred as well as secular texts, "justice" is synonymous with perfection and encompasses all the virtues, including first of all prudence,¹³ and in this sense: Joseph, a reflective man, does not unthinkingly follow an impulse; he deliberates (dikaios, thelon, eboulethe, enthymethentos), and that is why his decision is so thoroughly discreet. Moreover, the just person, often synonymous with epieikes (Josephus, Ant. 6.263; 10.155; 3Macc 7:6–7; cf. above, pp. 34ff.), keeps from hurting anyone (Ep. Arist. 148; Diogenes Laertius 10.150). "Justice casts out hatred; humility destroys jealousy; the person who is just and humble is afraid to commit an injustice" (T. Gad 5.3). Such a person is therefore not only magnanimous (Antoninus Liberalis, Met. 5.1) but also benevolent and beneficent: "the just person must be benevolent" (dei ton dikaion einai philanthropon, Wis 12:19; SB 9974, 7; 10113, 8), possessing even philostorgia.¹⁴ And since seʿaqâh is linked with hesed,¹⁵ the just person is merciful. Such is the testimony of 1Sam 24:18 ("You are more just than I, because you paid me back with good, whereas I paid you back evil") and the blessing of Tobias by Raguel ("Excellent man, son of an excellent man, just and almsgiving, may the Lord give heaven's blessing to you and your wife . . ."—Tob 9:6, Sinaiticus). This is more than adequate to clarify St. Matthew's vocabulary and vindicate St. Joseph's goodness and generosity.

¹ 1Sam 18:22—λαλήσατε ὑμεῖς λάθρα τῷ Δαυιδ (Hebrew balat); Deut 13:7—λαθρα λέγων (Hebrew basseter); Josephus, Life 388: "I had Crispus called and secretly told him to get the soldier drunk who was charged with guarding the prisoner" (καλέσας τὸν Κρίσπον λάθρα προσέταξα μεθύσαι). Cf. 1Macc 9:20—"Bacchides ... secretly sent letters to all his allies."

² John 11:28—ε—φώνησεν Μαριάμ τὴν ἀδελφὴν αὐτῆς λάρρα; cf. Menander, Dysk. 532: "Momentarily I held my lower back, discretely at first, but as it continued I began to bend over." Λαθραίως = noiselessly (Aeneas Tacticus, Polior. 2.4; 18.16).

³ Job 31:27—“My heart was deceived in secret” (ἡπατήθη λάθρα ἡ καρδία μου, Hebrew basseter —λάθρα is then synonymous with κρυφῆ; cf. Job 13:10; Isa 45:19; Eph 5:12); Hab 3:14—“devour the wretched in hiding” (Hebrew bammistar); Menander, Dysk. 310: “If I have come here with evil intentions or to do you a bad turn in secret”; 578: “I secretly attached the hoe to a rotten cord.” Cf. Philo, Joseph 47: “A thousand witnesses see what we do in secret.”

⁴ Josephus, War 2.408: “They occupied Masada by surprise” (καταλαβόντες αὐτὸ λάθρα).

⁵ Acts 16:37. Compare the sacrifices offered ε—ν κρυφῆ (Wis 18:9), almsgiving (ε—ν τω— κρυπτω—, Matt 6:4), the fast that no one could notice and prayer in the closet with the door closed (Matt 6:6, 18), but seen by the heavenly Father, τὸ κρυφαι—ον. Cf. ε—ν γωνία (“in a corner,” Acts 26:26), i.e., unobserved (Plato, Grg. 485 d; Plutarch, Mor. 516 c, 777 b; Epictetus 1.29.36; 1.29.55; 2.12.17).

⁶ 1Sam 26:5—καὶ ἀνέστη Δαυιδ λάθρα (the Hebrew says only “David arose”; cf. coming secretly, ε—ν κρυφῆ, Judg 4:21; 9:31; Ruth 3:7); Heliodorus, Aeth. 8.1.8: “He escaped without saying anything” (λάθρα); Philemon, frag. 40 a 7: ε—πεὶ μόλις γε φεύγων ε—ξέπεσον ἄλλη λάθρα (J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 3 A, p. 22); Plutarch, Publ. 4.4: “Vindicius left secretly, but confused”; Tim. 17.1: “Hicetas blamed himself ... for not using his army except in small detachments and in secret, while bringing his allies in stealthily”; Aem. 8.6: “Philip prepared for war secretly and skillfully”; 9.4: “Hostilius secretly infiltrated Thessaly”; Plutarch, Agis 7.8: “Leonidas offered no overt opposition (φανερως), but he secretly (λάθρα) sought to thwart and ruin the undertaking.”

⁷ Ps 101:5—“Who speaks ill of his neighbor in secret” (τὸν καταλαλοῦντα λάθρα τοῦ πλησίον αὐτοῦ, Hebrew basseter); BGU 1141, 48: ἡρώτων κατ̄ ι—δίαν λάθρα τοῦ Ξύστου θέλων ε—πιγνω—ναι (14 BC); SB 6222, 17: ε—κέλευσεν ἀθλητὰς εἰ—σεπενεχθῆναι εἰ—ς κάμπον, καὶ κατὰ χάριν συνεστάλην ε—γὼ καὶ οἰ— ἄλλοι πέντε λάθρα τω—ν ἄλλων ἀθλητω—ν (private letter from the third century). One carries off secretly, λάθρα κομισάμενος (P.Paris 22, 28 = UPZ 19; P.Lond. 1975, 9); cf. a theft in AD 16: διὰ νυκτὸς λαθραίως, in BASP, vol. 10, 1973, p. 619.

⁸ —Εβουλήθη λάθρα ἀπολύσαι αὐτήν. Taken up by Prot. Jas. 14.1—“How then shall I act toward her? I shall repudiate her secretly (λάθρα αὐτήν ἀπολύσω ἅπ ε—μοῦ). And the night surprised him (in his thoughts).”

⁹ M. J. Lagrange, Matthieu, p. 11; J. Massingberd Ford, “Mary’s Virginitas Post Partum and Jewish Law,” in Bib, 1973, pp. 269–272.

¹⁰ Δειγματίζω, “uncover, expose in public” (Col 2:25) implies “a disclosure, and so something like pointing the finger at” (H. Pernot, Les deux premier chapitres de Matthieu et de Luc, p. 73). The manuscripts are divided between δειγματίσαι (Tischendorf) and παραδειγματίσαι (von Soden).

¹¹ Cf. A. Descamps, Les Justes et la justice dans les Evangiles, Louvain-Gembloux, 1950, pp. 34ff. Cf. M. Krämer, “Zwei Probleme aus Mt. I, 18–25,” in Salesianum, 1964, pp. 303–333; D. Hill, “A Note on Matthew I, 19,” in ExpT, vol. 76, 1965, pp. 133–134; idem, “Δίκαιοι as a Quasi-Technical Term,” in NTS, vol. 11, 1965, pp. 296–302; J. Scharbert, “Zu ‘Recht und Gerechtigkeit’ im Alten Testament,” in BZ, 1967, pp. 119–121; R. Pesch, “Eine alttestamentliche Ausführungsformel im Matthäus-Evangelium,” BZ, 1967, pp. 90ff. J. M. Germano, “Nova et Vetera in Pericopam de Sancto Joseph (Mt. I, 18–35),” in VD, 1968, pp. 351–360.

¹² Δίκαιος ὢν justifies the decision and the conduct (cf. the analogous syntax in B. Latyshev, Inscriptiones Antiquae, vol. 1, n. 27, 4; 34, 11; 35, 6; 51, 6; SEG XXV, 539, 3); to the parallels given by C. Spicq (“Joseph, son mari étant juste . . .,” in RB, 1964, p. 207, n. 5), add Menander, in M. Black, A. M. Denis, Fragmenta Pseudepigraphorum, Leiden, 1970, p. 170, 28. An epigram on a Roman Hermes from the second-third century, in G. Pfohl, Griechische Inschriften, Munich, 1965, n. 31, 3; Plutarch, Rom. 23.3. On ἄνῆρ δίκαιος in the inscriptions, cf. J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1966, p. 412, n. 317.

¹³ Philo, Change of Names 50; Good Man Free 72; Plutarch, Sol. 14.5; Antoninus Liberalis, Met. 4.2; I.Did. 416, 9.

¹⁴ Letter of Antiochus III for the cult of Laodicea (193 BC), in L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 7, p. 7, lines 18–19. According to St. Ambrose, justice consists in placing in other people the motive for all our actions; it presides over all our social relations; it encompasses beneficence and means thinking of others more than of oneself (Ambrose, Off. 1.136).

¹⁵ Ps 37:21; 112:4; cf. Sir 3:30; Tob 12:9; 14:11; 3Enoch 31.1. R. Mach, Der Zaddik im Talmud und Midrasch, 1957.

λακτίζω

laktizo, to kick

laktizo, S 2979; TDNT 4.3; EDNT 2.335; MM 368; L&N 39.19; BAGD 463

One of the first things the Lord said to Saul on the road to Damascus was “It is difficult for you to kick (laktizo) against the goads” (skleron soi pros kentra laktizein, Acts 26:14). The metaphor is taken from agricultural life: the farmer prods the ox with his goad, and the ox resists. Laktizo means “strike with the heel or the foot”; hence “kick” or “stamp” when the subject is an animal;¹ “kick” when the subject is human, whether kicking a door² or striking another person.³ Euripides also uses the word, however, for the “tide that drove the ship to the shore” (Euripides, IT 1396).

But the expression “kick against the goad” is proverbial in Greek and Latin literature (cf. J. J. Wettstein). Aegisthus says “Are your eyes not open to see what you see? Do not kick against the goad; if you stumble on it, you will be hurt” (Aeschylus, Ag. 1624); in other words, kicking against the goad is a threat against the recalcitrant person, who is treated more roughly than if he had been compliant. The same nuance is present in Ocean’s words to Prometheus: “You still are not humble. You do not yield to suffering, and to your present evils you intend to add others. If you will learn from me, you will stop kicking against the goad. Take thought that he is a hard monarch who is not accountable to anyone” (Aeschylus, PV 323). “Placing the yoke on one’s neck and wearing it lightly, that is the right approach. To kick against the goad is to take a slippery path” (Pindar, Pyth. 2.94). Resisting is even portrayed as impossible or impious: “Rather than kick against his goad—a mortal against a god—I will sacrifice to him . . .” (Euripides, Bacch. 794–795). “Wanting to be faithful to the old one, I have ruined my shoulder blades. . . . The fact is that it is folly to kick against the goad” (Terence, Phorm. 76–77). “Strike the goad with your fists, and it is your hands that will suffer” (Plautus, Truc. 768).

It is hardly credible that Christ would have quoted Euripides or any other classical author,⁴ especially since it is difficult to come up with a corresponding Aramaic form of the citation.⁵ So what we have is St. Luke using a traditional metaphor to express how the Lord’s order nipped in the bud any vague desire that Saul the Pharisee may have had to resist,⁶ which would have been both painful and futile. More than that, to be a theomachos (one who fights against God) would amount to criminal impiety.⁷

¹ Herodas, Shoemaker 7.118. For the etymology, cf. Hanse, on this word, in TDNT, vol. 4, p. 3, who points out the compound ἀπολακτίζειν (Hebrew ba’at) in Deut 32:15.

² Aristophanes, Nub. 136: “Quite a lout you are, by Zeus, for thoughtlessly kicking the door so hard and causing a new-found idea to be lost”; BGU 1007, 7: τὴν θύραν μου ε—λάκτιζον τοι—ς ποσίν (third century BC).

³ Josephus, Ant. 4.278: ὁ γυναι—κα λακτίσας ἔγκυον; P.Tebt. 798, 15, a complaint against employees of a public bath who attacked a client: λακτίσαντες εἰ—ς τὴν κοιλίαν (second century BC); P.Lips. 40, col. III, 3: ὁ ἄλλος λίθω δέδωκεν τω—υι—ω— μου, ἄλλος ε—λάκτισεν Ὅλον τὸ σω—μα αὐτοῦ πεπληγμένον ε—στίν.

⁴ An abundant bibliography on the origin of this citation (notably H. Windisch, “Die Christusepiphanie vor Damaskus (Act 9, 22 und 26) und ihre religions geschichtlichen Parallelen,” in ZNW, vol. 31, 1932, pp. 9ff.) is given by M. Dibelius, Studies in the Acts of the Apostles, London, 1956, pp. 188ff. (who cites Euripides, frag. 604: πρὸς κέντρα μὴ λάκτιζε τοι—ς κρατοῦσί σου) and E. Haenchen, Acts, p. 685, n. 3, who cites the Scholia Vetera in Pindari Carmina 2.60ff., οὐ συμφέρει τῇ τύχῃ ἄνθρωπον ὄντα διαμάχεσθαι. Cf. A. H. Smith, “Notes on a Tour in Asia Minor,” in JHS, vol. 8, 1887, p. 261, n. 50 B 9: λακτίζεις πρὸς κέντρα, πρὸς ἀντία κύματα μοχθεῖ—ς.

⁵ Cf. Str-B (vol. 1, pp. 769ff.), citing Eccl 12:11—“The words of the wise are like goads,” in the favorable sense of stimulating reflection; cf. t. Sota 7.11.

⁶ J. Dupont, Le Discour de Milet, p. 329: “This is a literary embellishment that expresses quite well the sort of violence that Paul was subjected to at this critical point in his life, which he himself discusses in 1Cor (1Cor 9:16-17; cf. Phil 3:12)”; cf. E. Trocmé, Le ‘Livre des Actes’ et l’Histoire, Paris, 1957, p. 194.

⁷ Cf. 2Macc 7:18; Acts 5:39: μήποτε καὶ θεομάχοι εὔρεθῆτε; at Acts 23:9, εἰ— δὲ πνεῦμα ε—λάλησεν αὐτῷ— ἢ ἄγγελος, H, L, P, 614 add μὴ θεομαχω—μεν.

λαμπρός, λαμπρότης, λαμπρω—ς lampros, shining, brilliant, splendid; lamprotes, brilliance, splendor, magnificence; lampros, brightly, brilliantly

lampros, S 2986; TDNT 4.16–28; EDNT 2.339; NIDNTT 2.484, 486; MM 370; L&N 14.50, 79.20, 79.25; BAGD 465 | lamprotes, S 2987; EDNT 2.339; NIDNTT 2.484–486; MM 370; L&N 14.49; BAGD 466 | lampros, S 2988; EDNT 2.339; NIDNTT 2.484, 486; MM 370; L&N 88.255; BAGD 466

These terms, derived from lampo, “shine, beam” (2Cor 4:6), all express something like luminosity and brilliance.¹ The Bible uses them especially for heavenly bodies: “The sun, the moon, and the stars that shine” (onta lampra, Ep Jer 60); “the wise shall shine like the brightness of the firmament” (hos he lamprotes tou stereomatos, Hebrew zohar, Dan 12:3). “Around midday, O king, I saw on the road, shining around me and those who were with me, a heavenly light more brilliant than the light of the sun” (hyper ten lamproteta tou heliou, Acts 26:13). The morning star is radiant (ho aster ho lampros ho proinos, Rev 22:16). The bright sun (lampron helion, Philo, Dreams 2.282; Anth. Pal. 9.450); “Noble souls have in them something royal, a certain brilliance (to lampron) that envious fate cannot dull” (Philo, Good Man Free 126); Judah became bright like the moon (loudas egeneto lampros hos he selene, T. Naph. 5.4). The epitaph of the silversmith Canopus: “My eyes have closed to the sun’s brilliant light.”² “The bright parts of the moon separate and demarcate the dark parts” (Plutarch, De fac. 4 c; cf. 2).

The NT uses lampros above all with clothing. Herod dressed Jesus in a brilliant or splendid robe (peribalon estheta lampran Luke 23:11). The Peshitta translates “scarlet garments” (zehôrîta) and the Vulgate indutum vesta alba;³ but the text does not indicate the color, white or purple. It is a luxurious festal garment, befitting a king⁴ or a celestial being, like the angel who appeared to Cornelius “in shining raiment” (en estheti lampra, Acts 10:30). The accent is on beauty, richness, and magnificence, as is the case in Jas 2:2-3—“If a man wearing a gold ring on his finger and dressed in fine clothes (en estheti lampra) comes into your assembly and also a poor man in ragged clothes (en rhypara estheti, dirty and worn, in tatters), if you look with favor on the one wearing the fine clothes (ton phorounta ten estheta ten lampran) . . .” The fine clothes indicate the high social rank of the one wearing them: wealthy, a person of consequence. Theophrastus also characterizes the vain “dressed in a splendid cloak (pareskeuasmenos lampron himation) and wearing a crown on his head, he appears in public.”⁵

The substantive ta lampra refers to opulence and splendor,⁶ the adverb lampros to magnificence: “He was a rich man and he dressed in purple and in fine linen, feasting extravagantly every day”;⁷ lampros refers not only to the quantity and quality of the dishes, but also the setup and atmosphere of the feast, the dishes, the service, the music, etc.

Finally, lamprotes refers to a glorious condition, a spiritual state,⁸ a shining quality. Thus reference is made to “the great glory and splendor of the Lord” (Bar 4:24), of the Lord’s magnificence (Ps 90:17, Hebrew noam); “Glorious and unchanging is his wisdom” (Wis 6:12). There is also a “splendor of the saints” (Ps 90:3, Hebrew hadar; Bar 5:3); and, very prosaically, a lampra kardia kai agathe (Sir 30:25), referring to a person who has a good appetite.

The papyri show hardly any other meaning of lampros than “glorious repute” or “illustrious memory” (tes lampras mnemes, P.Michael. 41.13; Pap.Lugd.Bat. I, 3, 2; P.Mich. 611, 3; REG 1940, p. 232, n. 189; 1955, p.274, n. 243). From the second century on, this adjective is used with cities, generally in the superlative: Hermopolis (C.P.Herm. 22, 4; 52,3; 53, 4; P.Alex. 37, 4; 565, 2), Tubis (C.P.Herm. 79, 2), Alexandria (P.Alex. 12, 2: stratego tes lamprotates poleos ton Alexandreon; P.Oxy. 3191, 2; 3245, 4; P.Mich. 606, 5; SB 10621, 2; P.Oxy. 2347, 8; P.Princ. 37, 2, 14; IGLS 821, 2), Lycopolis (P.Princ. 82, 2), Antinoite (P.Oxy. 2347, 4), Antinoopolis (P.Ant. 31, 3; 35, col. II, 2; 36, 5; 38, 2; 102, 4; BGU 1663, 6; P.Köln 52 and 53; P.Cair.Isid. 94, 2; P.Mich. 607, 5; SB 10568, 1), he lampra Lydon Hermokapeleiton polis (a fourth-century millary, J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1960, p. 196, n. 358; cf. p. 179, n. 274: tes lamprotates Histrianon poleos), Side (ibid., 1951, p. 194, n. 219), Mesembria (IGRom. I, 769), Hermopolis (BGU 2133, 1; 2135, 3; P.Tebt. 335, 18), Termesson (TAM III, 80, 82, 942, 943), Sagalassi (ibid. 113), especially the very famous Oxyrhynchus (P.Oxy. 1678, 14; 3183, 2, 5; 3184, 5; 3187, 2; 3192, 6; 3195, 5; 3203, 5; 3246, 9; 3249, 19; 3254, 5; etc. Cf. P.Coll. Youtie II, pp. 486, 536, 541, 545, 550; SB 10289, 3; P.Fuad I Univ. 13, 2:40, 4; P.Mich. 612, 6), with the insistent en te lampra kai lamprotate Oxyrynchiton.⁹ Often such designations go further: etelesthe en te lampra kai logimotate kai semnotate Panopoleiton polei (P.Oxy. 2476, 17); megales archias kai semnotates kai lamprotates (Pap.Lugd.Bat. II, 2, 4; 6, 8; P.Princ. 38, 1).

Clarissimus (= Greek lamprotatos) is the title given VIPs, especially very high-ranking officials. For example, a petition is presented before “clarissimus Mamertinus” in AD 147 (Pap.Lugd.Bat. XVI, 33, 17). It is used for consuls,¹⁰ various comites,¹¹ magistrates (IGLS 530, 4), prefects,¹² the scholastic tax assessor (ibid. 734, 2; P.Ant. 104, 1), a logothetes (P.Stras. 347, 1), the “imperial clerk (singularis) of the ducal office” (SB 7439,9), the pretorian prefect (Aeg, 1972, p. 138, 1), benefactors who build sanctuaries (IGLS 297, 3; 1570, 2), an Alexandrian “corrector” (Dittenberger, Or. 711), synagogue rulers;¹³ but also for ancestors (TAM II, 838 f 5), and women: Isidora, he lamprotate (P.Oxy. 3169, 184), or Gellia Babbia ten lamprotaten (SEG XXII, 481); Theodosia (P.Laur. 26, 6; cf. 14, 19).

Lamprotates is an everyday term of respect (he se lamprotates)¹⁴ that is used even in private correspondence, like the steward of Lady Martyria: “Would your Splendor please send me a congius of Spanish oil . . . if your Splendor agrees” (P.Sorb. 62, 1, 3). It is often reinforced with an adjective indicating authenticity (ten gnesian hymon lamproteta, P.Ness. 75, 1), or affection (he hymetera adelphike lamprotates, SB 7036, 1; P.Alex. 40, 1; aspazomai ten sen lampran adelphoteta, C.P.Herm. 45, 1). Even though all of these texts are later than the first century AD, they show that NT lamprotes should be interpreted in the sense of lavishness and magnificence,¹⁵ the emphasis being on radiant splendor.

¹ Wis 17:19—“The whole world was lit up by a brilliant light”; Isa 60:3—“The nations will walk to your light.” Shields are lustrous (C. Michel, Recueil, 248, 14); silver vases are more brilliant than mirrors (Josephus, Ant. 12.81; Plutarch, De def. or. 41, 43); “Gird your loins with your shining belt” (Jos. Asen. 14.13; cf. 14.15–16), “made of precious stones” (18.4); the river of living water that flows from the throne of God and of the Lamb is “shiny like crystal” (Rev 22:1). On shimmering water, cf. Aristotle, Mete. 370a13); gifts (Anth. Pal. 9.478). C. Mugler defines λαμπρός as an “adjective for an object that emits or reflects a bright light” (Terminologie optique, p. 238); cf. Plutarch, Cic. 20.1: the brilliance of flame; Dem. 22.6: bright colors.

² E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 19, 5; cf. n. 166, 3: “I saw the brilliant signs of his power”; 167, 11: “He had shining cheeks and walked to the right of Isis.” In Philo, Spec. Laws 1.140: “illustrious” as opposed to “obscure.”

³ “Clothed in white raiment.” The Vulgate here takes λαμπρός as a synonym of λευκός (cf. the vestments of the high priest, λευκαί—ς ε—σθησιν; Josephus, Ant. 11.327; War 2.1); which is the exegesis of P. Joüon, “Luc XXIII, 11, ε—σθητα λαμπράν,” in RSR, 1936, pp. 80–85: “having wrapped him in a shining white garment”; he concludes that for Pontius Pilate this color represented the non-responsibility of the accused. That white is symbolic of innocence, and that angels are thus clothed in a λίνον κάαρὸν λαμπρόν (Rev 15:6), and that the elect are wrapped in a βύσσινον λαμπρόν καθαρὸν (Rev 19:8; cf. E. B. Allo, Saint John: L’Apocalypse, pp. 59–61; E. Haulotte, Symbolique du vêtement selon la Bible, Paris, 1966, pp. 324ff.), does not justify translating λαμπρός as “white,” because its basic meaning is “shining.” Cf. Theophrastus, Sens. 29: “shining colors . . . make an unfavorable impression” (τά τε γὰρ λαμπρὰ χρώματα . . . λύπην ε—μποιεῖ—ν).

⁴ Cf. Luke 7:25: οἱ—ε—ν ι—ματισμῷ—ε—νδόξῳ (cf. πολυτελής, 1Tim 2:9). Similarly, Herod Agrippa “on a solemn feast day left for Caesarea, clothed in a royal garment” (λαμπρῷ—καὶ βασιλικῇ+ κοσμησάμενον ε—σθητι, Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 2.10.1). Of course, this cloak could have been white: after mourning his father, Archelaus puts on a white garment and goes to the temple (Josephus, Ant. 19.347), but for a private individual, the color is more important than the cut or propriety of the garment (Josephus, Life 334). Dittenberger, Syl. 1157, 39: καθήσθωσαν δὲ οἱ— προγεγραμμένοι ε—ν τω— ι—ερω— κοσμίως ε—ν ε—σθήσιν λαμπραι—ς. T. Abr. A 16: “Death put on a splendid robe (στολήν λαμπροτάτην) and a radiant countenance.” Cf. the hangings of the temple, made of βύσσου λαμπροτάτης καὶ μαλακωτάτης (Ant. 8.72). Plutarch, Dem. 22.3.

⁵ Theophrastus, Char. 21.5. Cf. Philo, Joseph 105: “The prisoner is given splendid clothing (λαμπρὰν ε—σθήτα), in place of the dirty clothes that he had (ἀντὶ ῥυπώσης); he is given a whole makeover and brought before the king. The king can tell from looking at him that he has before him a free man of noble origin.” Artemidorus Daldianus, Onir. 2.3, end: “It is always more favorable in a dream to see oneself in clean, fine clothing than wearing shabby, dirty clothes (ἀεὶ δὲ ἄμεινον καθαρὰ καὶ λαμπρὰ ι—μάτια ἔχειν καὶ πεπλυμένα καλω—ς ἢ ῥυπαρὰ καὶ ἄπλυτα), except, of course, for people whose jobs are unclean and those whose work calls for them to handle filth”; cf. Apoc. Pet. 30: “ἄνδρες ῥάκη ῥυπαρὰ ε—νδεδύμενοι—people dressed in filthy rags were rolling in torment (among stones sharper than swords, and all afire). These were the rich who trusted in their riches and did not take pity on widows and orphans, but neglected God’s commandment”; Dio Chrysostom 55.20; P. Giss. 76, 3: τρίβωνας ῥυπαρὰς β? καὶ στολήν λευκὴν. Moulton-Milligan cite Menander, frag. 669: ἔξωθεν εἰ—σιν οἱ— δοκοῦντες εὐτυχεῖ—ν λαμπροί, τὰ δ ἔνδον πα—σιν ἄνθρωποις ἴσοι (Stobaeus, Flor. 104, 4; vol. 4, p. 922, n. 14; cf. J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 3 B, p. 818). In the first century AD, the sindinophoros carries σινδόνας λαμπρὰς τρεῖ—ς in procession (I. Perg. 336, 5). These “splendid” linens should be banners.

⁶ Rev 18:14—“All that is luxurious and splendid has vanished from you.” Cf. Philo, Flacc. 165: “all this splendid decor in which I have lived for a moment has vanished in a brief instant”; To Gaius 327: “I renounce all that splendor”; Josephus, Ant. 12.220: “The king, after giving him splendid presents. . . .”

⁷ Luke 16:19; Sir 29:22—“Better the life of a poor man in a wooden shelter than luxurious dishes (ε—δέσματα λαμπρά) with strangers”; 31:23. Cf. Diodorus Siculus 14.108: “The Rhegians began by supplying abundant provisions for the army of Dionysius for several days”; 17.91: “The children who show promise of elegance and strength are fed”; 17.93: “the inhabitants gave a lavish welcome to the Macedonians”; 17.16.4; 17.72.1; 17.115.6: splendid feasts; 17.64.4; 17.91.8; 17.93.1: splendid lodging (and also the spendor of arms, 17.57.2; 17.100.5; splendid courage, 17.59.3; fighting splendidly, 17.60.6; 17.63.4; Alexander carries out a splendid sacrifice in honor of Athena, 17.18.1). Cf. PSI 406, 30: ὠφελούντο λαμπρῶ—ν; SB 10288 a 10: ὄθεν λαμπρῶ—ς διασωθῆ μου ὁ υι—ός; b 13.

The adverb is used for sacrifices: θύσαντες λαμπρῶς τῶν θεῶν (Josephus, Ant. 6.15); Dittenberger, Syl. 545, 12: τὰ τε κατὰ τὰς θυσίας καλῶς καὶ λαμπρῶς συνετέλεσεν. The base of a statue of a priest of Rome, agonothetes, and gymnasiarchos in Pamphylia: λαμπρῶς καὶ φιλοδόξως (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1948, p. 199, n. 229; cf. λαμπρῶς καὶ εὐνόξως, ibid., 1934, p. 251). Λαμπρῶς ζήσαντα (“having lived splendidly,” IGLS 994, 8). At Gortyn, an honorific monument relates the triumphs of a gladiator (νεικῶν), but twice the victory was particularly glorious: νεικῶν λαμπρῶς (L. Robert, Gladiateurs, p. 119. Other references, L. Robert, in J. des Gagniers, Laodicée, p. 267, n. 9). Plutarch, Cic. 1.1: reign with spendor; 47.5: brilliant fortune.

⁸ Cf. Ep. Arist. 16: “You, whose soul in its spendor soars above all people.” IGLS, n. 275, 5: διὰ τῶν εὐνόξων καὶ λαμπροτάτων ἀρχαγγέλων.

⁹ P.Oxy. 2267, 2; 2243, 5; 2347, 1; 2475, 1; 2477, 1; P.Princ. 77, 2; P.Ross.Georg. V,27, 2; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XVI, 2, 3; P.Fouad 52, 5, 7; P.Michael. 30, 3; P.Oslo 35, 5; 41, 4; P.Got. 39, 5; P.Mich. 610, 4–5; P.Yale 71, 3–4; SB 10216, 3; 10728, 2; P.Vars. (JJP 1948, p. 116 = H. C. Youtie, Scriptiunculae, vol. 2, p. 269); ZPE, vol. 13, 1974, p. 129, line 3.

¹⁰ P.Got. 9, 2: “After the consulate of the most illustrious Flavius Basilius”; P.Lond. 1913, 1: “the most illustrious Anicius Paulinus”; P.Mert. 91, 5; P.Oxf. 6, 25; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XVI, 8, 2; 10, 2; 12, 1; P.Mich. 573, 25; 513, 1; P.Yale 71, 2; P.Stras. 471, 1; 471 bis, 1; 483, 2; BGU 2138, 2; 2139, 1; SB 10287, 1; CPR V, 2, n. 12, 9; 16, 2; P.Coll.Youtie, pp. 545, 571 (on the illustrious Capitoline Games, ibid., p. 480); IGLS 4016 bis, 6; I. Side, 183, 7; I.Bulg. 907, 2. At Ephesus (I.Cor. X, 1; ZPE XIV, 1974, p. 163; J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1965, p. 154, n. 341; 1973, p. 164, n. 426); at Hermopolis, cf. P.Vindob.Worp 8, 16. ZPE, vol. 13, 1974, p. 132, line 2.

¹¹ P.Fouad 86, 13; IGLS 1809, 4; CII 991. Athens celebrates the illustrious hand (λαμπρά χερ ἡγεμονῆος) of the governor who built its walls (IG, II2, 5201).

¹² P.Phil. 9, 4: “Conformably to the orders given by the most illustrious prefect Semproniu Liberalis” (λαμπροτάτου ἡγεμόνος, second century); P.Mich. 366, 4; 367, 7; 424, 3; 425, 3; P.Oslo 62, 6; P.Athen. 42, 4; P.Mich. 526, 17; 529, 6; 613, 3; 617, 13; P.Yale 61, 3; P.Stras. 392, 5; 393, 7; P.Oxy. 3048, 6; 3243, 1; BGU 2232, 4–5; 2234, 6; CPR V, 2, n. 3, 8 and 15; P.Petaus 25, 5; 46, 4; 47, 4; P.Ant. 31, 15; P.Lond. 1159, 4 (vol. 3, p. 112); SB 10275, 8; 10437, 5; 10537, 3; 10568, 4; SEG XXIV, 1194, 8; ZPE,

vol. 15, 1; 1974, pp. 72, 76; Stud.Pal. XXII, 5, 2. According to P.Mil.Vogl. 237, 11, in the third century, someone appears “before the most sacred tribunal of the most illustrious prefect Claudius Julianus” (τω—ι—ερωτάτω βήματι τοῦ λαμπροτάτου ἡμω—ν ἡγεμόνος Κλ. —Ι.); P.Brux. 1–18 (on all the census declarations); cf. Pap.Lugd.Bat. II, 8, 25; 9, 2; τὸ λαμπρότατον συνέδριον (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1942, p. 343, n. 96; cf. 1973, p. 183, n. 480; ZPE, vol. 15, 1; 1974, p. 35). Cf. Cato, the offspring of an illustrious family (Plutarch, Phoc. 4.1).

¹³ The one at Beth-Shearim in Berytus (B. Lifshitz, “Fonctions et titre honorifiques dans les communautés juives,” in RB, 1960, pp. 58–59), at Sidon (CII 991); republished by B. Lifshitz, Synagogues juives, n. 74.

¹⁴ SB 9396, 4; 9461, 10, 16; P.Mich. 529, 4; P.Stras. 255, 7; P.Fouad 20, 8; 83, 10; C.P.Herm. 19, 13; P.Ross.Georg. III, 49, 5; Stud.Pal. XX, 261, 6; P.Michael. 38, 1; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 2, 5 (cf. H. C. Youtie, in Essays in Honor of C. B. Welles, p. 29); P.Bon. 46, 8: πρὸς τὴν ε—ξουσίαν τοῦ κυρίου μου λαμπροτάτου.

¹⁵ Plutarch inserts λαμπρότης between εὐπορία and τιμή (Plutarch, De Pyth. or. 29). In a hymn to Isis, the sovereign of Hermouthis is praised because, thanks to her, “all those who live in prosperity, people of goodwill, scepter-bearing kings, and all who are leaders . . . leave much splendid and magnificent (λαμπρὸν καὶ λιπαρόν) wealth to their grandchildren and their descendants” (SEG VIII, 550, 10; V. F. Vanderlip, Four Greek Hymns, p. 49).

λαός

laos, people, population, community, multitude

laos, S 2992; TDNT 4.29–57; EDNT 2.339–344; NIDNTT 2.795–801, 805; MM 370–371; L&N 11.1, 11.12, 11.55, 87.64; BDF §§44(1), 134(1), 262(3), 147(3); BAGD 466–467

There is hardly anything to add to Strathmann’s excellent article (TDNT, vol. 4, pp. 29–57), nor to the known connotations of this word, which is rare in the Koine outside the Bible: the “population” of a city (Gen 19:4), members of a tribe (Gen 49:16), like those of Hamor and Shechem, who intermarry “so that they may be one people” (hoste einai laon hena, Gen 34:22), inhabitants of a country (2Kgs 16:15; Ezra 4:4; 10:2, 11; Neh 10:31) or an indigenous population,¹ and above all the honorary and religious designation of Israel as the “people of God,” the community (Hebrew ‘edâh) or assembly (qahal), who belong to Yahweh, keep his law, and worship him.² The Christian community (synagoge, ekklesia) inherits this title, which from that point means the assembly of those who believe in Christ,³ made up of people from every race and every tongue (Luke 1:17; Acts 15:14; 18:10), both Jewish and pagan (Rom 9:25; Eph 2:14). No text explicitly cancels this title for Israel;⁴ it is as if the church constitutes a new, faithful generation (succeeding a wicked and adulterous generation, Matt 12:39; Mark 8:38; Luke 11:29) in the laos tou theou, which is essentially characterized by God's call on the one hand and on the other by the consecration of its members and its assembly to the Lord.

We must insist on the quite commonplace meaning of laos, "crowd, multitude"⁵—almost synonymous with ochloi or anthropoi, "people," taking in individuals or referring to a collective whole (Philo, Rewards 125; P.Petr. 45, 3, 3)—and the legal and political sense in which "the people" expresses the idea of an organism, tied together by legal structures directed toward the common good.⁶ From that point, laos designates a group of people subject to a hierarchy, a distinct and inferior class,⁷ even the serfs attached to the land in Polybius 4.52.7. This usage is so widespread that in the papyri laoi is customarily translated "common folk, peasants." But C. Vandersleyen, who cites twenty-six papyri, of which twenty-two are from before Christ,⁸ believes that the laoi constituted the superior stratum of the Egyptian population, the class that governed the country villages; they were only one part of the population, farmers, for example, as distinct from the mass of farm laborers.⁹ They undertake initiatives (P.Lille 16, 2 and 8) and enjoy not only a relative autonomy but also the confidence of the officials: "let the laoi and the other farmers estimate their produce" (P.Rev. 42, 11). Apollonios apologizes to this limited group for not being able to give them a personal audience; he will send a chrematistes to meet them at Philadelphia (P.Cair.Zen. 59203, 3, 7, 17–17; cf. 59204, 5; 59292, 566, 650). They announce the time for beginning the harvest, they evaluate the harvest, they busy themselves with collecting taxes and they discuss them; they carry out public works (PSI 577, 23; P.Petr. II, p. 52; 15, 1 b; 13, 45, 3), excavations (SB 7179, 4), drainage projects (P.Petr. II, p. 14; 14, 11, 4). They are officials,¹⁰ hence an élite, hierarchically above the common folk,¹¹ associated with the "village leaders." C. Vandersleyen is right to translate laoi "noteworthies."¹²

This noble meaning is present in the phrases Senatus Populusque Romanus and Majestas Populi Romani.¹³ It is also the meaning of the title written on the banners in 1QM 4.13: "On the large ensign at the head of all the people shall be written 'People of God,' the name of Israel and of Aaron, and the names of the twelve tribes of Israel."

¹ Which became a pejorative term, cf. F. Würthwein, Der 'amm ha' arez im A.T., Stuttgart, 1937; R. Meyer, "Der Am Hâ'âres," in Judaica, 1947, pp. 169–199; R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel, p. 70ff., 109.

² Judg 5:11; 1Sam 2:24; 2Sam 14:13; Deut 7:6-8; 14:2; 26:18; Isa 51:4; Zeph 2:9; etc. The singular is used in contrast to the plural (which is synonymous with ἔθνη): the peoples are Israel's enemies (Gen 49:10; Ps 7:8; 33:10; 47:4; 67:5). In the secular literature, cf. Isyllus, in the third century AD: θεὸν ἀείσατε λαοί (in J. U. Powell, Collectanea Alexandrina, Oxford, 1925, p. 133, 37).

³ The "people of God" is an "elect" people, i.e., loved by God, belonging to him, reserved by him to form his church in this or that city or in all the nations (Acts 15:14; 18:10; Rom 9:25-26; 1Pet 2:10). The expression is transposed from Israel to the Christian community (2Cor 6:16; Heb 8:10), whose members are all "one" in Christ Jesus (cf. Rom 12:4; Gal 3:28; Col 3:11) and enlivened by the Holy Spirit (cf. Rom 8:5). Thus it is a "new people" that inherits the privileges of the old people (cf. L. Cerfaux, La Théologie de l'Eglise suivant saint Paul, 2d ed., Paris, 1965, pp. 56–67; cf. 18, 299–300), redeemed or liberated by the Savior. For this reason, the emphasis is on the sanctification or purification of this people (Titus 2:14; Heb 13:12; Rev 18:4), and deserters are punished (Heb 10:30). Finally, this messianic and spiritual people is promised a "Sabbath rest" (Heb 4:19) in the heavenly Jerusalem. God will dwell with them (Rev 21:3). Cf. H. Wildberger, Jahwes Eigentumsvolk, Zurich, 1960; M. L. Newman, The People of the Covenant, Nashville, 1963; J. H. Elliott, The Elect and the Holy, Leiden, 1966, pp. 138ff.; and above all P. S. Minear, "Jesus' Audiences According to Luke," in NovT, 1974, pp. 81ff.

⁴ Cf. Rom 11:1-2, 29. Nonetheless, laos without a complement, when applied to Israel, refers more to the "nation" (Matt 1:21; Luke 1:68, 77; 2:32; 7:16; Acts 4:10; 13:24; Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.159: Moses obtains the best laws for the people; Ant. 10.12: asks God to have pity on his people), without excluding a formal religious meaning. The secular meaning of the Hebrew 'am is found also at Qumran: "they behave with shrewdness and faithlessness toward all the peoples" (1QpHab 3.6, 13); "the carnal assembly" (1QS 11.7, 9); "the assembly of vanity" (1QH 6.4); but the religious sense appears in 1QM 18.7: "You have worked great wonders toward your people"; 1QH 13.8: "the assembly of your saints."

⁵ Num 2:6—"many people died"; Josh 17:14; 2Chr 7:10; Jer 23:41; 41:10; 44:2; Luke 1:10; 3:21; 6:17; 18:43; 21:38; Acts 6:12; 13:15; 21:36; 1QM 7.17; 15.3–5; Philo, Migr. Abr. 62; Josephus, War 1.122: "This agreement was made in the temple, in the presence of the people"; 1.457: "Herod assembled the people”; 1.550: “Herod stirred up the people against them”; 2.1: “Archelaus offered the people a sumptuous funeral banquet”; 3.329; Ant. 13.201, parallel to τὸ πλῆθος. Cf. the Jewish tomb inscriptions: τω—λαω—χαίρειν, “farewell to all” (CII 699–702, 704–706; Dittenberger, Syl. 1247); “people’s place of prayer” (n. 662); with reference to the “local community,” cf. n. 720, 776; at Hierapolis: “Marcus Aurelius Alexander . . . surnamed Asaph (?) of the Jewish community,” (λαοῦ —Ιουδαίων); at Caesarea, the financial participation of the community: “Gift of the community under Marathas” (προσφορὰ τοῦ λαοῦ ε—πὴ Μαρουθα—, B. Lifshitz, Synagogues juives, n. 64; other inscriptions in L. Robert, Hellenica, vols. 11–12, pp. 260–262); φιλόλαος = loving his people (n. 203, 509; cf. 476, 720). Plutarch, Rom. 26.4: “The Greeks still refer to service to the state using the word λήϊτον and to the people using the word λαός”; Suav. viv. 13: the multitude of spectators; Diodorus Siculus 1.57.2: Emperor Seoösis built canals, which facilitated relations between the inhabitants, ται—ς πρὸς ἀλλήλους τω—ν λαω—ν ε—πιμιξίαις; 3.45.6: “through lack of experience (διὰ τὴν τω—ν λαω—ν ἀπειρίαν), the people do not work the land as is necessary.” In the epigram for a winner in the Nemean games, from 200 BC, ὄσπασε λαός (the people of Phoronis) is a traditional restoration that must be done away with and replaced with ἦρσο νίκης (R. Merkelbach, in ZPE, vol. 7, 1971, p. 274) or ἵκετο νίκας (J. Ebert, Griechische Epigramme, n. 64, 3). On ὄχλος and πλῆθος, cf. P. Zingg, Das Wachsen der Kirche, Göttingen, 1974, pp. 61–67; P. S. Minear, NovT, 1974, pp. 84ff.

⁶ Cicero, Rep. 1.25: “Populus autem non omnis hominum coetus quoque modo congregatus, sed coitus multitudinis juris consensu societatis” (“The people,’ moreover, is not just any gathering of men assembled in any way, but the gathering of the multitude in accord with the laws of society”). Cf. J. Gaudemet, “Le Peuple et gouvernement de la République romaine,” in Gouvernés et gouvernants (Recueils Jean Bodin, 23), Brussels, 1968, pp. 190ff.

⁷ In the Ptolemaic papyri: “Volgus Aegyptiorum, praecipue opifices et agricolae” (Dittenberger, Or. 90, 12; n. 47; cf. UPZ 110, 100–103; P. Stras. 93, 4: requisitioned draft animals that belong to the laoi); likewise in Asia Minor (P. Briant, “Remarques sur ‘laoi’ et esclaves ruraux en Asie Mineure hellénistique,” in Actes du Colloque 1971 sur l’esclavage, Paris, 1972, pp. 93–133). The Egyptians are Pharaoh’s λαός (Gen 41:40; Exod 1:22), the λαὸς τῆς γῆς αὐτοῦ (Neh 9:10); Ezek 7:27; Luke 22:2; 23:13: “Pilate called together the chief priests, the leaders, and the people.” At Qumran, the order or precedence is first the priests, then the Levites, and “the whole people shall pass in the third place, in order, one after another” (1QS 2.20); Philo, Rewards 123: “Chosen people, not of particular governors, but of the only true governor, the holy people of a holy Governor”; Josephus, Ant. 8.101: ὁ βασιλεὺς καὶ ὁ λαὸς ἅπας; 6.199; 7.63. This pejorative connotation is heightened in Poimandrès 1.27: Ὁ λαοί, ἄνδρες γηγενεῖς, “O peoples, men born of the earth, you who have given yourselves over to drunkenness, to sleep, and to ignorance of God.”

⁸ C. Vandersleyen, “Le Mot λαός dans la langue des papyrus grecs,” in ChrEg, 1973, pp. 339, 349. Most of these papyri are administrative documents. SB 8355, 3 is a citation of Homer, Od. 24.530: “The one over there must be one of the gods, a master of the field of heaven, who cried out and held back the whole people” (κατὰ δ’ ἔσχεθε λαὸν ἅπαντα, cf. A. and E. Bernard, Memnon, n. 37, 3).

⁹ P.Rev. (J. Bingen), col. 42, 11: οἱ— δὲ [λαοὶ] καὶ οἱ— λοιποὶ γεωργοί. They are several times referred to as inhabitants of komai: τῶ—ν ε—ν ται—ς κώμαις κατοικούντων λαῶ—ν (UPZ 110, 101; second century BC); τοὺς κατὰ κώμην κωμάρχας καὶ τινὰς τῶ—ν λαῶ—ν (SB 7179, 4); P.Tebt. 701, 74, 80: τοι—ς λαοι—ς τοι—ς ε—ν Σύρων κώμη.

¹⁰ “Spare the hard-pressed noteworthies (τῶ—ν μὲν ταλαιπώρων λαῶ—ν) and the machinoi and the others who are not vested with authority (τῶ—ν ἄλλων τῶ—ν ἀδυνατούντων)” (UPZ 110, 132). Given this position and these functions, the laoi abuse their power, P.Cair.Zen. 59368, 26: “at that time, it was discovered that twelve measures of fodder were missing on account of the laoi; concerning which an investigation has been opened”; PSI 380, 5; 402, 4: a peasant complains about the competition “from the class of noteworthies who are in the city and who grow pumpkins” (third century).

¹¹ BGU 1768, 6; P.Ross.Georg. V, 24, 10; Chrest.Wilck., n. 11 A 6. Even SB 8299, 12 (the Rosetta Stone) would indicate a superior class of the population: ὁ τε λαὸς καὶ οἱ— ἄλλοι πάντες (C. Vandersleyen, ChrEg, 1973, p. 347). W. Peremans, “Classes sociales et conscience nationale en Egypte ptolémaïque,” in Miscellanea in Honorem J. Vergote, (Orientalia Lovaniensia Periodica VI–VII), Louvain, 1975, pp. 443–453. T. Alfieri, “La Position de M. Rostovzev (sic) à propos des ‘Laoi’ de l’Asie Mineure hellénistique,” in Actes du Colloque 1973 sur l’Esclavage, Paris, 1976, pp. 283–289.

¹² [French notables.] C. Vandersleyen proposes that the λαοκρίται should be seen not as “judges of the λαοί, meaning of the common folk,” but as “judges chosen from the class of the λαοί” (ibid., p. 348).

¹³ Kübler, “Majestas” (in PW XIV, 1, 542–544), which, with the empire, would be transferred to the prince; cf. the crimen minutae majestatis (Rhet. Her. 2.12, 17), repression of any breach of the majesty of the Roman people.

λείπω

leipo, to fall short, be incomplete, lack leipo, S 3007; EDNT 2.347; NIDNTT 3.247–248, 251, 253; MM 372; L&N 57.43, 57.44, 71.33; BDF §§75, 101, 180(4), 189(3), 393(4); BAGD 470

The Suda offers the definition leipesthai: hettesthai; in the papyri, this verb is often used in accounting for a deficit, a negative balance;¹ in the NT, it always has the sense “to be wanting, insufficient, incomplete.”²

When active and intransitive, it is synonymous with hystereo and indicates a lack. To the wealthy and virtuous young man, Jesus said, eti hen soi leipei,³ exactly like Epictetus: “You came to me not long ago as a man in need of nothing (hos medenos deomenos). And what could you even imagine needing (hos endeontos)? . . . Caesar knows you, you have many friends at Rome, you fulfill your obligations, you know how to oblige in turn one who obliges you. . . . What are you lacking (ti soi leipei)?” (2.14.19).

The passive is used in the NT only by St. James, either with the genitive of the thing lacking or with en and the dative: “. . . so that you may be perfect and complete, lacking nothing (en medeni leipomenoi). If anyone among you lacks wisdom (ei de tis hymon leipetai sophias), let him ask God.”⁴ The combination of teleios (the adult, one who has achieved maturity, as opposed to a nepios, 1Cor 2:6; Col 1:28) and holokleros (complete in all parts, whole, intact, cf. Acts 3:16) has the force of a superlative, to which the negative adjunct—in Hebrew gnomic style—adds nothing:⁵ the absence of any deficiency is already included in the idea of its perfection (the perfect being that from which nothing is lacking). This deficiency or shortcoming can be minimal or serious,⁶ like that of Christians who “are naked and lack daily food” (gymnoi hyparchosin kai leipomenoi tes ephemerou trophes);⁷ the latter detail serves to indicate the urgent need for help, which Christians must provide for their brothers and sisters in the faith (Gal 6:10). The choice of the passive leipomai conveys the idea that these poor folk have been left behind, as it were, by their brothers; the expression is from the vocabulary of the racetrack, where an athlete is “passed by” by his fellow runners,⁸ but it is also used for other competitions, for example, a musicians’ contest at Messina (liphtheis ton biotou stephanon)⁹ or for the “defeat” before a tribunal of a litigant who has no means of defense or who is overwhelmed by the testimony.¹⁰ In a way this is the situation of Menelaus, who “seeing that he was already defeated (ede de leleimmenos) promised large sums to Ptolemy, the son of Dorymenes, to win the king over.”¹¹

St. Paul left Titus in Crete “to finish organizing what remains (to be set in order).”¹² The present participle of leipo clearly has here the sense of incompleteness, something that constitutes a lack or is insufficient. Similarly, Combalos asked “to go finish what remained to be built, for he had left the temple incomplete” (Lucian, Syr. D. 26). Since the churches provide for the needs of itinerant preachers, giving them food, funds, means of transportation, information on routes,¹³ etc., the apostle concludes: “Take good care of Zenas the lawyer and Apollos, so that they may lack nothing” (hina meden autois leipe, Titus 3:13).

¹ BGU 1782, 12: περὶ τοῦ μηδένα λόγον λείπεσθαι; P.Mich. 182, 37: ε—άν μὲν λείπηταιί τι πρὸς τὰ μὴ (τάλαντα) τοῦ χαλκοῦ; P.Apoll. 82, 13: λείπεται νομίσμ. χνβ? κεράτι. ι?; P.Oxy. 2195, 155; P.Ross.Georg. II, 24, 10; SB 10530, 8, 23; S. Witkowski, Epistulae Privatae Graecae 41, 12: λείπεται δραγμαὶ ρνε?. Cf. the clause μὴ ε—λαττουμένου (H. A. Rupprecht, Studien zur Quittung im Recht der graeco-ägyptischen Papyri, Munich, 1971; G. Hage, “Die MH ΕΛΑΤΤΟΥΜΕΝΟΥ-Klausel in den griechischen Papyri Aegyptens,” in Proceedings XII, pp. 195–205).

² Cf. Wis 19:4—“They fill up the punishment for what is lacking in their torments” (τὴν λείπουσαν τοι—ς βασάνοις); Pap.Graec.Mag. 4, 2547 (vol. 1, p. 146): ε—ξ ὧν ὁ κόσμος αὔξεται καὶ λείπεται; P.Mert. XXIV, 10: to the extent that you fulfill your obligations, you will not be lacking my part (οὐ λείψει σε); P.Ryl. 583, 18–19; P.Hib. 198, 9: the brigand and the one who deserts the boat (ὁ ληστής καὶ ὁ τὴν ναῦν λελοιπώς); Sib. Or. 3.416: “an Erinys . . . will abandon the vast sea of Europe and Asia”; CII 61, 4; said concerning death: βίον λει—πε (SB 7289, 4; 8960, 12), of the loss of a child (I.Thas. 370, 5; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 14, 25; P.Dura XII, 5). A metrical epitaph for a bestarius at Philippi: ἔλιπον φάος τὸ γλυκὸν κόσμον, I have left the sweet light of the world (L. Robert, Gladiateurs, n. 25, 6; cf. 296, 11); one loses one’s strength or courage (ibid., 124, 5). On the aorist ἔλιπον-ἔλειψα in the Koine, and the formation of the perfect λέλοιπα by adding α to the primitive root, cf. F. M. Abel, Grammaire, §18 j, p; B. G. Mandilaras, Verb, n. 306, 13.

³ Luke 18:22 (cf. Mark 10:21: ἐν σε ὑστερεῖ—; 1Cor 1:7—μὴ ὑστερεῖ—σθαι ε—ν μηδενὶ χαρίσματι). T. Abr. A 14: Abraham says to the archangel, “Michael, what does this soul still lack for being saved?” (τί ἔτι λείπεται τῆ ψυχῆ εἰ—ς τὸ σῶζεσθαι?).

⁴ Jas 1:4-5; cf. J. A. Kirk, “The Meaning of Wisdom in James,” in NTS, vol. 16, 1969, pp. 24–38.

⁵ “The emphasis rests essentially on the first two terms; the negative parallel that follows adds nothing to the idea but amplifies the sentence and rounds it out with a concluding cadence” (J. Marty, L’Épître de Jacques, p. 12), who cites the Stoic proposition: πάντα δὲ τὸν καλὸν καὶ ἀγαθὸν ἄνδρα τέλειον εἶναι λέγουσι διὰ τὸ μηδεμια—ς ἀπολειπεσθαι ἀρετῆς (Stobaeus, Ecl. 2.7.11; vol. 2, p. 98, 15). Cf. the ordinance of Ptolemy Alexander I, granting, in 97–96 BC, the right of asylum to the temple of Horus at Athribis, “a first-class, remarkable temple, one of the oldest and most celebrated, has obtained other honors, but it is lacking in that it is not a place of asylum” (λείπεσθαι δὲ ἐ—ν τω— μὴ εἶναι ἄσυλον, SB 620, 6 = C.Ord.Ptol. 64).

⁶ Cf. Aristotle, Gen. An. 4.1.766a26: emasculated animals do not fall far short of females in appearance (μικρὸν ἐ—λλείπουσιν τοῦ θήλεος τὴν ἰ—δέαν); P.Fouad 85, 3: “Nothing remains for you (οὐθὲν λείπει) but to come and find your bed all made.”

⁷ Jas 2:15. On τῆς ἐ—φημέρου τροφῆς, cf. the parallels cited by F. Field, Notes on the Translation, p. 236.

⁸ Cf. the epitaph of Alabanda, where Polyneikes was not surpassed in the technique of combat, ἄλειπτος . . . οὐχὶ τέχνη λειφθείς (L. Robert, Gladiateurs, n. 169). Ἀλειπτος means “undefeated” (I.Magn. 181, 17; L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 11, pp. 338ff.). A decree of Gonnoi, in the third century BC: “The people should not lag behind (μηθενὸς λείπεσθαι) with respect to honors and recognition for those who choose to be benefactors of the people” (NCIG, n. 11, 15 = I. Gonn., vol. 2, n. 109).

⁹ Cited with numerous examples by L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 11, p. 330, who comments: “A common meaning of λείπεσθαι, in the passive and not in the middle, is ‘be surpassed, be left behind, be defeated.’ The phrase is used first of all for runners; it is used for all manner of inferiority and defeat in a wide variety of authors, in both prose and poetry.”

¹⁰ Cf. Artemidorus Daldianus, Onir. 2.29; 4.72.80; P.Turner 1, col. VIII, 35: λελει—φθαι τῇ κρίσει; P.Oxf. 14, 12 (with the editor’s note); Josephus, War 3.482—“You and I are on trial. . . . How could I dare present myself, if you abandoned me?”

¹¹ 2 Macc 4:45; cf. the master of the undefeated (ἀλείπτεος) athlete who gives in to corruption (Artemidorus Daldianus, Onir. 4.82).

¹² Titus 1:5: ἵνα τὰ λείποντα ε—πιδιορθώσῃ (this latter verb is not attested outside of CIG 2555, 9). To represent the word-play ἀπέλιπον . . . τὰ λείποντα, we could translate “I left you to complete what was left.” Τὰ λείποντα = the backlog (P.Mert. 73, 14; P.Princ. 117, 29); τοι—ς λιποῦσιν τὴν τάξιν could be stragglers (I.Car. 149, 15). Cf. Philo, Flacc. 124: “You give a flicker of good hope for the reestablishment of all the rest” (περὶ τῆς τω—ν λειπομένων ε—πανορθώσεως).

¹³ 3 John 6; Dittenberger, Syl. 618, 5; 800, 29; cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol.2, pp. 809ff.; P. Gauthier, Symbola, pp. 19 et passim. E. Wipszycka, Les Ressources et les activités économiques des églises en Egypte du IVe au VIIIe siècle, Brussels, 1972, pp.115ff., etc.

λειτουργέω, λειτουργία, λειτουργικός, λειτουργός

leitourgeo, to perform official service for a civic or religious community; leitourgia, civic or religious (priestly) service; leitourgikos, serving, ministering; leitourgos, official, minister

leitourgeo, S 3008; TDNT 4.215–229; EDNT 2.347–349; NIDNTT 1.551–553; MM 372–373; L&N 35.22, 53.13; BAGD 470–471 | leitourgia, S 3009; TDNT 4.215–229; EDNT 2.347–349; NIDNTT 3.551–553; MM 373; L&N 35.22, 35.25, 53.13; BAGD 471 | leitourgikos, S 3010; TDNT 4.231; EDNT 2.347–349; NIDNTT 3.551–552; MM 373; L&N 35.24; BAGD 471 | leitourgos, S 3011; TDNT 4.229–231; EDNT 2.347–349; NIDNTT 3.551–553; MM 373; L&N 35.23; BDF §27; BAGD 471

Whatever their semantic evolution, these terms retain their etymological significance: leitourgos = leitōs (Ionian, “public, relating to the people”) + ergon (“work”).¹ Sometimes the emphasis is on the work and its toilsome nature, sometimes on its official and somewhat statist character; the denominative verb leitourgeo means “carry out a service” and the leitourgia in the inscriptions and the papyri are duties or functions.²

(1) Originally the verb leitourgeo was used for the execution of a voluntary service for the state; people would of their own volition undertake a patriotic or public project.

(2) Later, it was used for services that the state imposed on citizens who were specially qualified by virtue of their intelligence or wealth.³ “The use of compulsory service, based on leitourgia, was built into an institution in Egypt under Roman rule.”⁴ The burden was so heavy that a number of those who were liable for service took flight (BGU 372; P.Oslo 79) or submitted multiple petitions to trade assignments or be exempted.⁵ No matter how much the strategos promised to apportion public duties fairly,⁶ certain persons were nevertheless shielded from any obligation while others had several leitourgiai imposed on them.⁷

(3) Leitourgeo came to mean any kind of service, whether that of a worker for his master (Aristotle, Pol. 3.5.1278a12); of tailors (P.Cair.Zen. 59477, 13: hoson an chronon leitourgomen soi, “for whatever length of time we work for you”); for an actor’s role (Epictetus 1.2.12); for a peasant who works in another’s place (P.Oxy. 1067, 19); for musicians (P.Oxy. 731, 4; AD 8–9; 1275, 12; P.Corn. 9, 5; Pap.Lugd.Bat. VI, 54, 10); for dancers (P.Grenf. II, 67, 6; P.Oxy. 475, 18); and even for prostitutes. In the LXX, the Hebrew ’ebed is taken to mean “slave” and ’abôdâh “service” or “work,” as opposed to inaction: corvée.⁸ The Hebrew verb ’abad is translated by leitourgeo as well as by ergazomai and douleuo.

(4) At least since Aristotle,⁹ and frequently in the papyri, these terms have a religious meaning: “Thaues and Taous, the twins, who serve in the great temple of Sarapis at Memphis.”¹⁰ This in the most common significance of these words in the LXX, which gives them sacerdotal connotations having to do with the priests and Levites who officiate at or carry out the worship services in the sanctuary: pas ho leitourgon en te skene tou martyriou.¹¹ In Isa 66:6, the leitourgoi are in parallel with the hiereis: “You shall be called priests of Yahweh, officiants of God” (leitourgoi theou; cf. Joel 1:9, 13; 2:17).

These various meanings are found also in the NT:

(1) Service rendered by one person to another: to help one’s neighbor is a leitourgia. Thus Epaphroditus was delegated by the Philippians to see to Paul’s needs (hymon de apostolon kai leitourgon tes chreias mou);¹² he carries out a friendly or brotherly “office.” The collection for the saints of Jerusalem is an obligation, a debt of gratitude that the pagan converts cannot shirk, even while its performance is voluntary: “If the Gentiles have shared in their spiritual goods, they should in turn help with their temporal goods” (Rom 15:27). The reference to monetary contributions places this text in agreement with secular usage (cf. P.Oxy. 2924 and 2941, the leitourgos responsible for distributing wheat or bread). But this same collection has religious connotations in 2Cor 9:12: “the ministration of this holy service”¹³ will bring thanksgiving to God.

(2) In calling imperial officials (archontes, Rom 13:3) leitourgoi theou, in a sense ministers who are appointed by God and who apply themselves to carrying out their responsibilities well (verse 6) in order to promote good order and assure the well-being of the people, St. Paul uses the word leitourgos in the sense found in the papyri: municipal officials, functionaries responsible for a particular area.¹⁴ It is an obligation that is imposed,¹⁵ and financial responsibilities go along with it (verse 7).

(3) In the religious sense, the angels are ministers of God in the service of the elect,¹⁶ that is, they are spiritual beings who carry out public functions under the authority of a sovereign. They do not act on their own initiative.

The are under the orders of the Lord, who constantly sends them out to serve. Just as Athens and the other cities send their leitourgoi to represent the city on diplomatic missions,¹⁷ God sends Paul as a minister of Christ Jesus to the Gentiles (Rom 15:16). His job is to be a leitourgos, which in itself implies no cultic functions; but he goes on to say “for the hierourgia of the gospel,” so his is in fact a sacred ministry and, more than that, a priestly function.¹⁸ Paul’s whole apostolate is conceived as a leitourgia, since he accepts the shedding of his blood as a libation “for the sacrifice and oblation of the faith” of the Christians (epi te thysia kai leitourgia tes pisteos hymon, Phil 2:17). It is generally agreed that “of your faith” is a genitive of explication and that leitourgia describes the sacrifice,¹⁹ emphasizing its public character and the ritual value of the offering, analogous to that of the temple. The sacrifice offered is faith itself, extending to take in all the moral activity that it enjoins (1Thess 1:3; 2Thess 1:11), which constitutes a new and spiritual worship, a pleasing fragrance to God (Phil 4:8; 2Cor 2:14-17; Rom 12:1). Thus the Christian life is a sacrificial offering or a liturgical sacrifice.

(4) All the other NT texts have a priestly meaning. “When the days of his ministry (hai hemerai tes leitourgias autou) were accomplished, Zechariah returned to his house” (Luke 1:23). At Antioch, the prophets and teachers hold a worship service (literally, “doing service to the Lord,” leitourgounton de auton to Kyrio) and appoint Paul and Barnabas as missionaries.²⁰ Ministers stood (Deut 10:8; 17:12; 18:7), and Heb 10:11 says, “Every priest stands each day and performs his religious functions (leitourgon), often repeating the same sacrifices.”

Heb 8:2, having described the resurrected Christ as the heavenly high priest, calls him “leitourgos of the sanctuary and of the true tabernacle prepared by the Lord, not by a human.” Ton hagion leitourgos is the priest in charge of the sanctuary, the one who presides at worship there.²¹ A double nuance must be retained. On the one hand, this minister is active, since the leitourgos is a worker;²² thus his intercession to God is constant. On the other hand, since it is emphasized that this tabernacle is pitched not by any human but by God, the accent falls on the absolute nature of Christ’s accomplishment: in carrying out his priestly duty, he obeys the will of God. This faithfulness is indispensable for a mediator (Heb 8:6), since it assures him of a hearing with God. These two latter texts offer the assurance that he carries out a priestly function in heaven, a much more efficacious ministry than that of the old covenant. Obviously, Hebrews borrows the word leitourgos from the vocabulary of the LXX and retains its religious and specifically sacerdotal meaning, but for Greek ears this word evokes an official function carried out by a person who has been put in charge on behalf of a group. Thus it would be plain that the exercise of the heavenly liturgy is something other than a sinecure. The title of heavenly high priest is not some sort of honorific title for the heavenly Christ; it is the appropriate description for the archegos who is always interceding for the salvation of humans (Heb 2:10).

¹ Plutarch, Rom. 26.4: “It seems likely that the c in the title of the lictors is an insertion and that originally it was litores, from the Greek λειτουργοί; for still today the Greeks use the word λήϊτον for service to the state and the word λαός for the people.” P.Ryl. 91, 1–2: ε—κ βιβλιοθήκης δημοσίων [λόγων], ε—κ γραφῆς λιτουργω—ν; P.Oxy. 82, 3: ὥστε καὶ τὰς ἀναδόσεις τω—ν λιτουργω—ν ποιήσασθαι ὕγιω—ς καὶ πιστω—ς (oath of office for a strategos).

² Cf. the Latin munera (O. Casel, “λειτουργία—munus,” in Oriens Christianus, 1932, vol. 3, 7, pp. 289–302). N. Hohlwein, Termes techniques, pp. 312ff.; W. Barclay, NT Wordbook, pp. 74–75; F. Oertel, Die Liturgie, Leipzig, 1917; A. Romeo, “Il termine λειτουργία nella greco biblica,” in Miscellanea Mohlberg, Rome, 1948, pp. 467–519; N. Lewis, Leitourgia Papyri, Philadelphia, 1963 (= P. Leit.); Strathmann, “λειτουργέω,” in TDNT, vol. 4, pp. 215–222; the bibliography should be filled out with that given by F. De Visscher, Les Edits d’Auguste découverts à Cyrène, Louvain, 1949, p. 88; N. Lewis, Inventory of Compulsory Services in Ptolemaic and Roman Egypt (American Studies in Papyrology, vol. 3), New Haven-Toronto, 1968–1975.

³ P.Bru. 21. “People capable of carrying out the task entrusted to them” (P.Panop.Beatty 1, 223); P.Cair.Zen. 59323, 16; I.Priene 102, 7; 113, 16. It refers to “certain public services rendered by individuals from private means” (J. Barr, Semantics, p. 149; cf. C. Kunderewicz, “Evolution historique de la responsabilité des fonctionnaires dans l’Egypte ptolémaïque,” in RIDA, 1957, pp. 168ff.). Daremberg and Saglio define λειτουργία: “every service [French toute prestation, tout service] carried out for the state or imposed by law” (DAGR; H. I. Marrou, Histoire de l’éducation, pp. 173–174, nn. 543–544 = ET, pp. 163, 507), the archithetria to defray the expenses of ambassadors sent by the state to official or sacred events, the trierarchia to pay for outfitting the fleet in wartime, the sitologia (BGU 188; 462; P.Amh. II, 139; P.Lond. 1159; vol. 3, p. 112, cf. N. Lewis, “Leitourgia Studies,” in Proceedings IX, pp. 233–245); cf. the list of leitourgiai in Demosthenes, 1 C. Boeot. 39.7–8; by Lysias, Def. Anon. 21. Cf. CIG 3936 = IGRom. IV, 861: “The council and the people (of Laodicea) have honored Tatia, daughter of Nicostratos son of Pericles, who died young, on account of the public offices, leitourgiai, and superintendancies of public projects carried out by her father.” In Egypt, municipal duties were called λειτουργίαι, and names from a list of appointees maintained by the town clerk (κωμογραμματεύς) (BGU 6; cf. P.Fay. 23 a; P.Lond. 199, vol. 2, p. 158; P.Oslo 86) were drawn by lot by the viceroy (ε—πιστρατηγός) (BGU 194). For the εὔποροι (cf. R. Taubenschlag, Opera Minora, vol. 1, p. 408), their personal revenue (πόρος) varied from 200 to 4,000 drachmas (BGU 6; 18; 91; 194; P.Flor. 2). “Corvées” (cf. P.Sorb. 42, 12) have to do mostly with the upkeep of dikes and canals (BGU 176), maintaining locks (P.Mich. 233), irrigation projects (P.Leit. 2); “I completed a leitourgia of guarding the city in the Heroum quarter” (P.Oxy. 3114, 17). The γραφή λειτουργῶ—ν τῆς κώμης is the list of “town leitourgoi” (3184, a 10; b, 9); cf. R. Koerner, “Zu Recht und Verwaltung der griechischen Wasserversorgung nach den Inschriften,” in APF, 1974, pp. 155–202; D. Bonneau, “Liturges et fonctionnaires de l’eau à l’époque romaine: Souplesse administrative,” in Proceedings XIII, pp. 35–42. In the Byzantine era, ἀπολειτουργει—ν τὸν βίον was a metaphor for death, P.Lond. 1708, 29; P.Cair.Masp. I, 67023 = Jur.Pap., 12, 14.

⁴ G. Chalon, T. Julius Alexander, pp. 104, 165.

⁵ P.Mich. 426; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XVI, 2 and 3; P.Brem. 38; P.Cair.Isid. 82; P.Yale 64, 14; P.Oxy. 2130; P.Leit. 4, 5, 6. Various petitioners cited age, 70 years, γέρας ἀλειτουρησίας (P.Flor. 57, 62; 312, 4–5; P.Oxy. 889, 18; PSI 1103), an eye disease (P.Flor. 382, 27) or some other illness (P.Mich. 426; BGU 560, 22; Stud.Pal. IV, 72, 208; Apokrimata 37 = SB 9526, 91 P.Fam.Tebt. 41), dangers (Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 10, 14), or the losses suffered by a peasant required to leave his field at harvest time (P.Flor. 6; P.Cair.Zen. 59451, 14); cf. SB 7696; 8900, 8ff.; P.Würzb. 9. P. Phil., pp. 11–23. N. Lewis, “Exemption from Liturgy in Roman Egypt,” in Proceedings X, pp. 69–79; idem, “Exemption from Liturgy in Roman Egypt,” in Proceedings XI, pp. 508–541). In AD 111, among various administrative measures, the prefect contemplates the case of dispensation from leitourgiai and the assuming of pseudonyms, which were one of the means used to obtain such exemptions (P.Oxy. 2754, 1–7; cf. N. Lewis, “Notationes legentis,” in BASP, vol. 13, 1976, p. 7).

⁶ P.Oxy. 82, 3; P.Mich. 529, 5. C.Ord.Ptol. 54, 18; J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. 20, 13: “so that each one, carrying out equal functions, may contribute to the maintenance of the post for the people.” Antiochus of Commagene: κόσμον τε καὶ λιτουργίαν πα—σαν ἀξίως τύχης ε—μῆς καὶ δαιμόνων ὑπεροχῆς ἀνέθηκα (Dittenberger, Or. 382, 74 = IGLS 1); P.Oxy. 2407, 13, 24, 25, 31, 36; 2664.

⁷ PSI 1406; cf. P.Oxy. 2110, 8, 10. There were partial (κουφοτελεία; Dittenberger, Or. 669, 26) or total immunities (ἀτελεία; P.Oxy. 2476, 5). “It accords with the favors granted by the Augusti that the citizens of Alexandria, even if they live in the countryside out of zeal for their work, should not be compelled to undertake any rural leitourgia (χωρικὴν λειτουργίαν). You have often asked for this privilege, and I uphold it: no citizen of Alexandria will be required to undertake rural leitourgia ” (edict of Tiberias Julius Alexander, Dittenberger, Or. 669, 32–34 = SB 8444); P.Oslo 126. Exempt were the scholars of the Museum of Alexandria (ἄτελει—ς, BGU 73; 231, 729; P.Flor. 68), public physicians (P.Oxy. 40, 6; P.Fay. 106, 24), certain victorious athletes (P.Lips. 44), veterans during the five years that followed their honesta missio (BGU 180; 628), members of the musical association (ibid. 1074; P.Lond. 1178; vol. 3, p. 214), certain priests (I.Perg. 40, 15), weavers (P.Phil. 1, 39–40 = BGU 1570); but this exemption was not always honored (cf. P.Lond. III, 846; P.Stras. 371; cf. vol. 3, 1973, p. 125). —Αλειτουρησῖα is immunitas (Strabo 13.1.27; H. J. Mason, Greek Terms, p. 103).

⁸ Cf. Ezek 29:20—ἀντὶ τῆς λειτουργίας αὐτοῦ, “for his toil, because they did it for me.” The “liturgy” of the Levites is a work of furniture moving: putting up and taking down the tabernacle, unpacking and repacking the objects pertaining to worship at each stage of the journey (Num 4:33, 37; 7:5, 7; cf. Par. Jer. 3.9, 11: τὰ σκεύη τῆς λειτουργίας). S. Daniel, Recherches sur le vocabulaire du culte dans les Septante, Paris, 1966, pp. 55–118.

⁹ Aristotle, Pol. 1330a13: αἱ— πρὸς τοὺς θεοὺς λειτουργίαι. Cf. I.Rhamn. 24, 9: ε—μφανίζει λειτουργηκέναι ε—ν τω— ι—ερω— τω— ε—ν Ῥαμνοῦντι τῆς —Αγδίστεως (first century BC). Dittenberger, Syl. 717, 29: ε—λειτούρησαν ε—ν τω— ι—ερω— εὐτάκτως; 736, 73: τοὺς λειτουργήσοντας ἔν τε ται—ς θυσίαις. In UPZ 175 a 43, λειτουργία = the performance of funeral rites. Other references in Strathmann, “λειτουργέω,” in TDNT, vol. 4, p. 211.

¹⁰ P.Paris 26, col. I, 2: οἱ— λειτουργοῦσαι ε—ν τω— πρὸς Μέμφει μεγάλῳ Σαραπιείῳ; P.Lond. 22, 17 (vol. 1, p. 7); P.Tebt. 302, 30: ε—κτελοῦντες τὰς τω—ν θεω—ν λειτουργίας (AD 71–72); BGU 1201, 7: πρὸς τὰς λειτουργίας καὶ θυσίας τω—ν θεω—ν (AD 2); C.Ord. Ptol. 47, 11: “the religious services purchased for the temple”; 53, 66: “those who fill the sacerdotal positions in the temples, the posts of prophets and scribes and other functions” (καὶ ἄλλας λειτουργίας); 62, 21: “so that I may fulfill the service of the gods” (ε—πιτελω— τὰς τω—ν θεω—ν λειτουργίας); I.Magn. 98, 17; I.Cos 40 A 6; Michel, Recueil, 1559, 4; Diodorus Siculus 1.21: τὸ τρίτον μέρος τῆς χώρας αὐτοί—ς δοῦναι πρὸς τὰς τω—ν θεω—ν θεραπείας τε καὶ λειτουργίας; Plutarch, An seni 17; Plutarch, De def. or. 13: λειτουργοί—ς θεω—ν. Other references in A. Deissmann, Bible Studies, pp. 140ff.

¹¹ Num 4:41; cf. 16:9. Neh 10:37—“the priests who serve in the abode of our God”; Sir 7:30—“With all your strength love the one who made you (your Creator) and do not neglect his ministers”; 45:15—Aaron’s mission is to perform the worship of God and also to be priest, λειτουργει—ν αὐτω—ᾶμα καὶ ι—ερατεύειν; 50:14, 19; Wis 18:21—prayer was the weapon Aaron used in his ministry; 1Macc 10:42—“That belongs to the priests who perform the liturgical service”; 2Macc 3:3; 4:14—“the priests showed no more zeal for the service of the altar”; Ep. Arist. 95: λειτουργοί = the officiants; 53, 92, 94, 98: λειτουργία = the cultic ceremonies, the rites; 87: “the vestment of the priests carrying out the liturgical service” (τὸ κλίμα τω—ν λειτουργούντων ι—ερέων); 96; cf. A. Pelletier, Josèphe adaptateur, p. 177. Josephus, Ant. 20.218: λειτουργει—ν κατὰ τὸ ι—ερόν; War 1.39; 6.299; Philo, Spec. Laws 1.82: λειτουργει—ν τὰς ι—εράς λειτουργίας.

¹² Phil 2:25, cf. verse 30: Epaphroditus risked his life “in carrying out the service that you yourselves were not able to render” (τῆς πρὸς με λειτουργίας). We might compare Sir 8:8—the instruction of the wise teaches how to serve the great (λειτουργῆσαι μεγιστα—σιν); 10:2—“as is the judge of the people, so will his ministers be” (οι— λειτουργοὶ αὐτοῦ); 2Sam 13:18—Ammon’s servant, his confidential aide, is called his λειτουργός (Hebrew mesharet).

¹³ Ἡ διακονία τῆς λειτουργίας ταύτης (appositive genitive). Cf. A. Ambrosiano, “La ‘Colletta Paolina’ in una recente Interpretazione,” in AnBib 18, Rome, 1963, vol. 2, pp. 591–600.

¹⁴ P.Princ. 104, 7: τοι—ς λιτουργοι—ς τῆς κώμης; SB 9258, 8–9; P.Oxy. 792.

¹⁵ Cf. N. Hohlwein, Stratège du nome, p. 136.

¹⁶ Heb 1:7 (Ps 104:4; cf. C. Spicq, Hébreux, vol. 2, pp. 18–19). In T. Abr. A 15, God calls Michael ὁ ε—μὸς λειτουργός. For Iamblichus, the daemons are λιουργοί (Myst. 9.2, with the note of E. des Place, on this text; cf. Plutarch, De def. or. 13); Heb 2:14—λειτουργικὰ πνεύματα, literally liturgical or officiating spirits (cf. Philo, Virtues 74: ἄγγελοι λειτουργοί; T. Levi 3.5: ἀρχάγγελοι οι— λειτουργοῦντες καὶ ε—ξιλασκόμενοι πρὸς Κύριον; Jub. 2.2). According to Philo, the angels are consecrated and assigned to the worship of the Father, who uses them as servants and ministers in charge of mortals (Giants 12). —The adjective λειτουργικός, unknown in secular literary texts, refers in the papyri to a sum due for a work, the tax to support statute labor (C.Ord.Ptol. 53, 49 = P.Tebt. 5; cf. 102; P.Cair.Zen. 59604, 5), but also “service days” during which the priests officiate, as at Kerkeosiris in 115–114 BC (P.Tebt. 88, 3; 853, 25); they are under obligation during this period of time. Its six occurrences in the LXX are all religious: Aaron's sacred vestments (Exod 31:10; 39:1); the objects used in worship services (Num 4:12, 26), the ceremonies in the tabernacle (7:5); so its could be defined as "pertaining to the worship services." Cf. Heb 9:21—"the tabernacle and all the liturgical vessels" (πάντα τὰ σκεύη τῆς λειτουργίας)."

¹⁷ Honorific decree for Orthagoras of Araxa, who "carried out other missions well, without asking for traveling expenses" (ἄνευ μεθοδίων λελειτούργηκεν, J.Pouilloux, Choix, n. 4, 69).

¹⁸ M. J. Lagrange translates ι—ερούργέω administrer en prêtre ("administer as a priest"). F. J. Leenhardt comments: "The apostle is liturgical minister [leitourgos] because he exercises a priestly function (ι—ερούργοῦντα) through the preaching of the gospel, thus offering to God a sacrifice that is well pleasing; namely, the converted Gentiles who are sanctified by the Holy Spirit. . . . It brings the sinner to the obedience flowing from faith in Christ, the sacrificial victim who replaces every other" (Romans, pp. 367–368). Cf. A.-M. Denis, "La Fonction apostolique et la liturgie nouvelle en Esprit," in RSPT, 1958, pp. 403ff.; J. Murphy O'Connor, Paul on Preaching, pp. 282ff.

¹⁹ Cf. A.-M. Denis, RSPT, 1958, pp. 617, 650; J. Murphy O'Connor, Paul on Preaching, pp. 281ff. Cf. Philo, Worse Attacks Better 66; Heir 84; Post. Cain 185.

²⁰ Acts 13:2. This liturgy includes preaching, prayer, songs (hymns and canticles), charismatic manifestations, celebration of the Eucharist; cf. Did. 15.1: λειτουργία τω—ν προφητω—ν καὶ τω—ν διδασκάλων. This service is conducted by qualified ministers, cf. 1Clem. 44.3.

²¹ Cf. A. Cody, Heavenly Sanctuary and Liturgy in the Epistle to the Hebrews, St. Meinrad, 1960, pp. 168ff.; L. Sabourin, "Liturgie du sanctuaire et de la Tente véritable," in NTS, vol. 18, 1973, pp. 87–90.

²² To the texts cited above (for paragraph 3 in the first part of this article), we may add P.Yale 37, 8–9 (= SB 9258), P.Petr. 46, col. III, 5: οι—κοδόμοις καὶ λειτουργοι—ς (the construction of a building); P.Oxy. 1412, 20: τὰς τω—ν λιτουργω—ν χειροτονίας (grain transport, 284 BC); 1415, 10; P.Hib. 96, 15 and 32: a military worker = a sapper; cf. Polybius 3.93.7: "he had the servants leave the camp"; 5.2.5; 10.29.4 (pioneers); 1Kgs 10:5; 2Kgs 4:43; 6:15; Ep. Arist. 186: λειτουργία, service at a dinner. In Philo, λειτουργβός is often synonymous with θεραπευτής (cf. Spec. Laws 1.242; H. G. Schönfeld, "Zum Begriff 'Therapeutai' bei Philo von Alexandrien,” in RevQ, vol. 10, 1961, pp. 224, 233). In the fourth century, a deacon improperly appointed to the leitourgia of the collection of the annona asks to be released so that he may consecrate himself to divine service (ὅπως εὖρη σχολὴν τῇ λειτουργείᾳ αὐτοῦ, P.Stras. 154,7–8).

λεπίς

lepis, peel, shell, strip, sheet, scale, scab

lepis, S 3013; TDNT 4.232–233; EDNT 2.349; MM 374; L&N 8.57; BAGD 471

As we would expect from the meaning of the verb lepo —“to peel, strip, or bark”—lepis refers to “any covering that one peels off or breaks,”¹ whether skin, hull, or shell; but it can also be a metal strip, a plaque used as a facing, like that with which the altar was covered.² This is the meaning that constantly recurs in the papyri: “metal plates and nails for the wagons” (lepidas kai helous tais hamaxais, P.Cair.Zen. 59782 a 68); iron plates (lepidas sideras kistas, BGU 544, 8); a silver plate (eis lepida argyran auto to onoma grammaton ρ?).³ In the sixth century, a double measure of wine is given to Makarios, a maker of nails, for putting a veneer on a boat.⁴

But in Aristotle: “what feathers are to a bird, scales are to a fish” (HA 1.1.486b21). Similarly, five of the six occurrences of lepis in the LXX refer to fish scales: “All that has fins and scales and lives in the water, whether in the sea or in the river, you may eat. But that which has neither fin nor scale (Hebrew qasqeset) will be for you an abomination” (Lev 11:9-10; Deut 14:9-10).

None of these meanings fits in the account of instantaneous healing of Saul’s temporary blindness when Ananias laid hands on him: “Something like scales (hos lepidas) fell from his eyes and he regained his sight” (Acts 9:18). This sense of lepis —scale or scab on an injury—is peculiar to the medical writers.⁵ It is not surprising to find this word coming from the pen of Doctor Luke, who perhaps had in mind the father of Tobias: “When his eyes began to hurt, he rubbed them, and the white films scaled off from the corners of his eyes” (kai elepisthe apo ton kanthon ton ophthalmou autou ta leukomata, Tob 11:12).

¹ A. Bailly, Dictionnaire grec-français, 2d ed., Paris, 1950, on this word; cf. λέπισμα: peeled bark (Gen 30:27).

² Num 17:3 (16:38 in English Bibles): ποιήσον αὐτὰ λεπίδας ἐ—λατάς; Josephus, Ant. 3.149: “each side of the altar was decorated with bronze plaques” (χαλκεΐαις λεπίσιν); cf. Diodorus Siculus 20.91: “the three sides of the machine (ε—λέπολις) were covered with strips of sheet metal nailed one on the other.”

³ A phylactery, Pap.Graec.Mag. 4, 258 (vol. 1, p. 80). Cf. in an inventory of the treasuries of the temples of Delos: θυμιατήριον ὑπόχαλκον, λεπίδα ἀργυρα—ν ἔχον (C. Michel, Recueil, 833, 11; third century BC).

⁴ P.Oxy. 2480, 2; cf. in the same period the diminutive λεπίδιον, 2195, 141: ὑπὲρ τιμῆς ἡλῶν καὶ λεπίδιον καὶ ὑγροπίσσης, where the editors mention definition given by LSJ on the basis of Hero, Spir. 1.3: “small plate, capsule, used to close a tube.” In a list of pharmaceutical products from the Byzantine era, λεπίδες could mean a plant (Lepidium latifolium) used against scurvy (P.Michael. 36 B 2), but Berichtigungsliste, vol. 4 (p. 52), suggests it should be understood to mean λεπίδες χαλκοῦ.

⁵ Numerous examples, notably in conjunction with ἀποπίπτω, from Hippocrates, Galen, and Dioscorides, are cited by W. K. Hobart, Medical Language, pp. 39ff. Cf. Rufus of Ephesus: the sutures of the bones of the skull come together in the form of scales (Onom. 34.133).

λήρος

leros, delirium, babbling

leros, S 3026; EDNT 2.351; MM 374–375; L&N 33.380; BAGD 473

This noun, practically unknown in the papyri,¹ is a technical term in the medical vocabulary for the delirium caused by a fever, especially in the clinical observations of Hippocrates: Python, “first day; acute fever, delirious” (pyretos oxys, leros, Hippocrates, 3 Epid. 1.1; first patient); Chaerion, “fifth day, generally worse, delirious” (panta paroxynthe, leros, ibid. 1.2; fifth patient); Herophon, “sixth day, raving,”² etc. This meaning seems too strong as a description of the remarks of the holy women to the effect that they had found the tomb empty on Easter morning. According to Luke 24:11, their words appeared to the apostles to be hosei leros, “drivel, and they did not believe them.”³ Here the word is understood in its sense from familiar, sarcastic conversation. A good example is supplied by Aristophanes, who, having compared tragedy to a woman (Ran. 95, 939ff.), declares “what before you was tragic trumpery” (1005), playing on the two senses of the word leros: prattle, and baubles or trinkets, women’s cheap jewelry.⁴ Similarly Menander: “Sostratus, see how embarrassed I am before these women—You are babbling” (Dysk. 872). Antiochus to Eleazar, when the latter refuses to eat pork: “Will you not wake up from the foolishness (apo tou phlyarou) that your philosophy produces? Will you not abandon your ravings (ton leron)?” (4Macc 5:11). Philo describes the mythological tales of paganism as empty babbling (mythikon leron, Post. Cain 165; Prelim. Stud. 62); and Josephus: “If these words are nothing more than the vain babbling (leros) of someone who is trying to turn aside the storm that he has stirred up” (War 3.405).

¹ Only one occurrence has been cited (PSI 534, 16; from the third century BC): οὔτε λήρων, or perhaps the participle ληρω—ν. The verb ληρέω is better attested. In a petition to the strategos in 47–48: Petesis and Tephereus have lodged a complaint “not without reason” (ὑπὲρ ὧν οὐ ληρήσαντες, P.Mich. 231, 17). Do not listen to nonsense (concerning prices) (μὴ οὖν πρόσεχε τοι—ς ληροῦσιν, P.Cair.Zen. 59823, 3); P.Athen. 62, 22 (a letter from the first-second century); P.Fay. 114, 21: μὴ οὖν ληρήσης τὸν ε—κτιναγμὸν σου, in which the latter term should be taken in the sense of ruin, liquidation (cf. Berichtigungsliste, vol. 4, p. 29). Cf. ληρώδης, 2Macc 12:44—“If he had not hoped that the fallen soldiers would be resurrected, it would have been superfluous and foolish (περισσὸν καὶ ληρω—δες) to pray for the dead”; Philo, To Gaius 168: “silly and worn-out jokes”; BGU 1011, col. II, 15: πολλὰ ληρωίδη καὶ ψευδῆ, much stupidity and lying (second century BC).

² 1 Epid. 3.13; cf. 7 Epid. 8.25: fourth day, “in the night, the fever became more acute and there was some delirium. . . . The fifth day, a bad night, delirium”; 8.26: “groaning and much delirium.” Other texts in W. K. Hobart, Medical Language, p. 178.

³ The translation of M. J. Lagrange, “un radotage et ils ne les crurent pas.” Cf. Xenophon, An. 7.7.41: “I know well that for Heracleides the most important thing is getting money, and that the rest is only drivel” (λήρος πάντα δοκεῖ— εἶναι).

⁴ J. Taillardat, Images d’Aristophane, n. 780, who cites the comedy of Pherecrates titled Λῆροι (which was about these baubles). Julius Pollux, Onom. 5.101: καὶ ἄλλους δέ τινας κόσμους ὀνομάζουσιν οἱ—κωμωδοδιδάσκαλοι λῆρον ὀχθοίβους, etc. Hesychius, λῆροι: τὰ περὶ τοι—ς γυναικείois χιτω—σι κεχρυσωμένα.

ληστής

lestes, brigand, bandit

lestes, S 3027; TDNT 4.257–262; EDNT 2.351–352; NIDNTT 3.377–379; MM 375; L&N 39.37, 57.240; BDF §27; BAGD 473

Derived from leis (“plunder”; cf. leizomai, “carry off as plunder”), lestes should not be considered to be synonymous with kleptes, as is shown by the fact that many texts use both terms together as designating distinct categories of malefactors.¹ A kleptes is simply a thief who contrives to appropriate another’s property, like Judas (John 12:6), working by night when possible (Matt 24:43; Josephus, War 4.402). A lestes is a brigand² who uses violence (cf. harpax), carries out armed theft and pillage (cf. Plutarch, De superst. 3: “the one who guards his house does not fear lestai, ” ou phobeitai lestas ho oikouron), like Barabbas, a lestes according to John 18:40, who according to Luke 23:19 “had been thrown in prison for an uprising in the city and for murder” (kai phonon); cf. Mark 15:17. That lestai are also murderers is attested by Ezek 22:9, where these brigands “shed blood.”³ So what is the biblical conception of the lestes ?

Thieves and brigands are often described as bold (tis ton leston, ho tolmerotatos, Heliodorus, Aeth. 5.25.1), courageous (ton leston tous andreiotatous, Josephus, Life 77), strong (hoi ischyontes), taking what they want (Ep Jer 57), despite doors, locks, and bolts (verse 17). Their shrewdness (Jer 18:22—they dig a pit, they set traps) and their rapacity, which keeps up with their greed, are such that they carry off more than they need (Obad 5), they ransack everything (Hebrew shadad), and the havoc they wreak is like that due to war (Ep Jer 13; cf. Philo, Good Man Free 37: e kata lesteias ... e kata polemon; Dio Cassius 55.28.3: “The Isaurians then by their brigandage started a war that became quite serious”; Josephus, War 2.65: “These men filled all Judea with a veritable brigands’ war,” lestrikou polemou). But while the simple kleptes sneaks into a house, the lestes or highwayman⁴ waits en te hodo.⁵

Lestai came primarily from among runaway slaves, bankrupt peasants, and military deserters⁶ and made up an armed band (Hebrew geçûd), which is precisely a characteristic of brigandage,⁷ and that is why lestai are so often mentioned in the plural), notably in the parable of the Good Samaritan, where the man who was going down from Jerusalem to Jericho “fell into the hands of brigands who robbed and beat him, then went on their way, leaving him half dead.”⁸ They attack people but also raid flocks⁹ (for numerous examples see m. B. Qam. 6.1 et passim) often enough that they are particularly feared by shepherds (m. Pe’a 2.7; Josephus, Ant. 16.272) and are compared to ferocious beasts (theriodous, in an edict of Agrippa I [or Ii_ ; Dittenberger, Or. 424, 2). It is known that these lestai hid in caves or grottos (spelaiion), which are plentiful in the hills of Judea and which served as repositories for booty and as refuges.¹⁰ The Lord alluded to this when he combined Isa 56:7 and Jer 7:11 (Hebrew paris): “It is written, ‘My house shall be called a house of prayer,’ and you have made it a brigands’ cave” (Matt 21:13; cf. Mark 11:17; Luke 19:46).

It would appear that brigandage reached epidemic proportions in Syria-Palestine;¹¹ but it wreaked havoc throughout the ancient world, whether in Egypt,¹² where certain police officers (lestopiastai) were given the specific duty of putting down banditry and everyone was expected to cooperate in the effort.¹³ In Asia Minor, brigandage was never eliminated; not only were the mountainous regions particularly conducive to it,¹⁴ but its coastline provided choice sites for piracy, “brigandage at sea”;¹⁵ so much so that Seneca could write: “If anyone has not fallen into the hands of pirates, it is because they have been spared by shipwreck” (Seneca, Ben. 6.9.2). Italy’s lot was no better,¹⁶ nor was Spain’s.¹⁷ In these circumstances, we can understand that not only does romanesque literature constantly have brigands interrupting its heroes’ wanderings,¹⁸ but all the writers point out the dangers that these highwaymen pose for travelers.¹⁹ In the first century AD, any major trip was a dangerous adventure. So it is neither a mere figure of speech nor an exaggeration when the apostle, referring to his missionary activity, mentions “long trips, often on foot, in danger from floods, in danger from brigands” (kindynois leston, 2Cor 11:26); these dangers must be understood in terms of the references given above.

Of course, such a plague, “the scourge of piracy,”²⁰ had to be combatted not only by the people who were attacked—it was permitted to kill a thief who was caught in the act²¹—but especially by the duly constituted authorities, either by the arrest and trial of bandits²² or by punitive expeditions. In Judea, the emperor, the procurators, and notably Herod took the initiative in this repression.²³ We can understand what an insult it was to the Lord when they came to arrest him like a common criminal: “You have set out to capture me as if I were a brigand (hos epi lesten), with swords and clubs.”²⁴

At Rome, brigands fell within the scope of the lex Cornelia de sicariis et veneficiis (Paulus, Sent. 23.1) and later were condemned to be killed by beasts or crucified.²⁵ In Palestine in the first century, “a day did not pass that Festus did not put many lestai to death” (Josephus, Ant. 20.161; cf. 20.168); the leaders of bands, like Tholomaïos and Menahem, were executed (20.5; Life 21). This is why two lestai were crucified at Calvary.²⁶ The evangelists’ phrase “with Jesus” (syn auto) emphasizes the infamy of the treatment inflicted on the Lord and suggests that Pilate also wanted to impress the people with his disdain for a Jewish messiah, a revolutionary: since he claims to be the Christ, he is a king of bandits.²⁷

¹ Hos 7:1; Obad 5; Ep Jer 57; John 10:1, 8. Cf. the royal decree ordering the arrest of οἱ τε λησται καὶ οἱ—λοιποὶ κακοῦργοι (P.Hib. 198, 93; cf. line 98; frag. 16 r; 62, 3–4; BGU 1764, 20). Cf. P.Ross.Georg. III, 16, 32–33: κλεπτοδημόσιοι and λησταιί; P.Ant. 97, 10.

² Josephus, War 1.204, 304, 347, 349, 398, 399. In practice, the vocabulary is very fluid (cf. Pfaff, “Latrocinium,” in PW, vol. 12, pp. 978–980); R. MacMullen, “The Roman Concept Robber-Pretender,” in RIDA, 1963, pp. 221–225). Normally, theft consists of fraudulently removing another’s property, and the thief is one who surreptitiously diverts something. The brigand steals and pillages violently; brigandage by sea is piracy. The bandit (from the Italian bandito, “exile”) is a malefactor who lives as an outlaw, thieving and murdering. The Talmud distinguishes between theft and brigandage (b. Sanh. 8.3). Aristotle (Eth. Nic. 5.11.13.1131a6) distinguished between clandestine theft and theft committed in broad daylight by violence, like assault and battery and murder, which increase the gravity of the crime. This distinction between furtum manifestum and non manifestum was retained in Roman law (cf. M. Lemosse, “Les Actions pénales de vol dans l’ancien droit civil romain,” in Droits de l’antiquité et sociologie juridique, Paris, 1959, pp. 179ff.; cf. p. 394, n. 2), but originally violence was considered only as a circumstance aggravating the theft, since it adds to the removal of the property an offense against the person: “Whoever carries off things that do not belong to him commits a theft. For does not carrying something off that does not belong to you constitute the ultimate offense against the will of the owner of that thing? Such a person is rightly called a dishonest thief. But under the heading of this crime the praetor added a special action, called ‘lawsuit for property carried off by violence,’ which involves fourfold damages if carried out within a year, and simple damages once this term has expired” (Gaius, Inst. 3.209; cf. G. Humbert, “Furtum,” in DAGR, p. 1423). This distinction was retained in theology, cf. C. Spicq, Péchés d’injustice, pp. 99ff., 175ff. It is emphasized by R. C. Trench, Synonyms, p. 157.

³ Cf. the tomb inscriptions: “. . . eques filius annorum XX a latronibus occisus” (CIL II, 2968); “. . . caeditur infesto concursu latronum” (3479). —Αλλά νιν ἸΑδης σὺν ληστῆσιν— μάρψας αὐτὸς ἔχει σφάγιον (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1942, p. 357, n. 159); cf. a merchant no doubt killed by pirates: ἔμπορον ε—ν ληστῶ—ν (ibid. 1939, p. 462, n. 92; cf. idem, Hellenica, vols. 11–12, pp. 132, 139, 175–176). Metrodorus, the head of a police troop, was “killed in combat with brigands” (inscription from the Musée de Brousse, in L. Robert, Etudes anatoliennes, p. 97). “One is already a brigand even before staining one’s hands with blood, because one is armed with a view to killing and intends to rob and kill” (Seneca, Ben. 5.14.2). According to Josephus, War 2.264: γόητες and ληστικοί threaten with death those who submit to Roman domination and declare that they will suppress by force (πρὸς βίαν) those who willingly accept servitude; 2.441: “The high priest Ananias was taken in the moat of the royal palace, where he was hiding, and killed by brigands together with his brother”; Ant. 18.7: “raids are carried out by large hordes of brigands, and men of the highest rank are assassinated”; brigands are assimilated to sicarii (20.186, 210). On this use of violence by λησταιί and on lêstîm in the rabbinic literature, cf. M. Hengel, Zealots, pp. 24–46; Rengstorf, in TDNT, vol. 4, pp. 257–260; these often identify them as Zealots; which was already the opinion of R. C. Trench, Synonyms, p. 159, and is commonly thought in our day (cf. I. J. Twomey, “Barabbas Was a Robber,” in Scripture, 8, 1956, pp. 115–119; W. R. Farmer, Maccabees, Zealots and Josephus, New York, 1956, p. 197; O. Cullmann, Dieu et César, Neuchâtel-Paris, 1956, p. 46 = ET The State in the New Testament, New York, 1956, p. 43); but this is not necessarily the case.

⁴ Plutarch, Ti. Gracch. 10.9: “He carried one of those brigand’s (ληστρικόν) weapons that are called δόλωνες.” Cf. BGU 2339, 6, denouncing people who stealthily break into houses at night (νυκτὶ . . . τινὲς ληστρικῶ—τρόπῳ—, AD 17).

⁵ Hos 8:1. His mobility is revealed by Sir 36:26, which, in praising domestic stability, compares the bachelor to a εὐζώνῳ ληστῆ bounding from city to city: “such is the man who has no home and lodges wherever he is when night falls.” He seeks the hospitality of those he meets by chance and does not gain their confidence. He has neither the social standing nor the moral authority that accrue to the married man. People are suspicious of him because he is like the marauder who does not stay put, moving about so rapidly that he seems to be everywhere at once.

⁶ Cf. P.Hib. 198, 96: ὁ ληστής καὶ ὁ τὴν ναῦν λελοιπῶς; Philo, Flacc. 5: soldiers who do not receive their pay are incited to “banditry and rapine”; Dio Cassius 74.2.5: “a large segment of Italian youth turned to brigandage and gladiatorial fighting.”

⁷ Josephus, War 2.265: “divided up by bands.” Brigand derives from the Italian brigante, “going about in a troop.” The band of brigands (and sometimes their hideout) is called ληστήριον, P.Tebt. 920, 23; P.Hamb. 10, 7; P.Stras. 233, 2; P.Mil.Vogl. 229, 6. Josephus, Ant. 20.160: “Judea was infested by a band of brigands”; 20.161: “the son of Dinaios had organized a band of brigands.” C. K. Barrett translates ληστής as “guerrilla, a nationalist rebel” (“The House of Prayer and the Den of Thieves,” in Jesus und Paulus: Festschrift W. G. Kümmel, Göttingen 1975, p. 16).

⁸ Brigands and pirates attack people as well as property, and it is a courageous deed to free their prisoners (cf. L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 11, Paris, 1960, pp. 133ff., 272ff.). “The many references to robbers in Talmudic literature (M. Ber. i.3; M. Shab. ii.5; M.B.K. vi.1, etc.) give the impression that bandit raids were by no means rare. We are often told of raids which were feared, or actually took place, particularly in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, and of the necessity of controlling this outlawry” (J. Jeremias, Jerusalem, p. 32, who also cites Levy, Neuhebräisches und chaldäisches Wörterbuch über die Talmudim und Midraschim, Leipzig, 1889, reprinted Darmstadt, 1963, vol. 2, pp. 503ff. and S. Krauss, Talmudische Archäologie, Leipzig, 1910–1912, reprinted Hildesheim, 1966, vol. 2, pp. 315ff. See also the index in Jeremias under “Brigandage.”).

⁹ John 10:1, 8 (for the textual criticism and the bibliography, cf. R. Schnackenburg, John, vol. 2, pp. 281–282, 504, 291, 507). These brigands who break into the fold, without passing through the door, are messianic pretenders with revolutionary tendencies (Acts 5:37; 21:38); cf. R. Bultmann, Das Evangelium des Johannes, Göttingen, 1941, p. 283 (=ET The Gospel of John: A Commentary, trans. G. R. Beasley-Murray, R.W.N. Hare, and J. K. Riches, Philadelphia, 1971, pp. 376–377).

¹⁰ At Arbela, Herod had his troops root out the brigands ε—ν σπηλαίοις κατοικούντων (Josephus, Ant. 14.415); cf. ε—πὶ τοὺς ε—ν τοι—ς σπηλαίοις ληστᾶς (ibid. 14.421; 15.346).

¹¹ Josephus, Ant. 20.166–167: “The deeds of the λησταιί infested the city”; 20.124, 160, 185: “Judea was laid waste by brigands”; 20.256: the Jews were unable to endure the scourge of the brigands, who forced them to give up their land and flee; 15.346: “It was not easy to put an end to the brigandage, since the people had made it a habit and a way of life”; 16.271: before Herod, the inhabitants of Trachonitis had been free to practice brigandage; 20.164ff.; War 2.235: the brigands and the rebels had as their leaders Eleazar . . . and Alexander . . . who massacred the inhabitants . . . and burned the villages”; 2.238: “Many, encouraged by the lack of punishment, turned to the occupation of brigandage”; 2.278: “Gessius did everything but proclaim throughout the country that everyone could practice brigandage.” “Brigands who hid daggers in their bosom were called sicarii ” (2.425). In his role as apologist Josephus wrote: “Our ancestors did not turn to brigandage (πρὸς ληστίας) like the others, nor to war . . . although the country had tens of thousands of men who were not lacking in boldness” (Ag. Apion 1.62). In any event, his contemporaries armed a fleet of pirate ships and raided the whole coast of Syria, Phoenicia, and Egypt (War 3.416); “In the other areas of Judea, brigands who had until then been inactive went to work” (4.406); cf. Strabo, 16.2.37; Dio Cassius 75.2.4: “A brigand named Claudius devastated Judea and Syria.”

¹² P.Cair.Zen. 59044, 25 (= SB 6787), 59313, 8; P.Paris 46, 7: ε—ν τοι—ς ἀναγκαιοτάτοις καιροι—ς ληστω—ν ε—πικειμένων (= UPZ 71; S. Witkowski, Epistulae Privatae Graecae 47); BGU 1764, 6; 1780, 7 (50 BC); P.Stras. 233. Xenophon of Ephesus, Ephes. 5.4.1: brigands infested Egypt; Heliodorus, Aeth. 1.5.3: “There live all the Egyptian brigands, organized into a city.” Hence the complaints to the police against this brigandage (ληστρικός), P.Ryl. 127, 11 (in 29); 129, 7 (in 30); 130, 6 (in 31); 134, 18 (in 34); 135, 7 (in 34); 136, 8 (in 34); 137, 12 (in 34); 140, 13 (in 36); 146, 11 (in 39); 148, 16 (in 39); P.Athen. 32, 12 (in 39); P.Mich. 230, 6 (in 48); 421, 5 (reign of Claudius); P.Stras. 216, 6; 296 recto 12; verso 8); SB 9622, 3; P.Berl.Zill. 8, 8; BGU 1832, 10; 1858, 1; P.Oxy. 1408, 23. The nightmare about a raid that a frightened child tells his father about is quite understandable (P.Oxy. 1873, 3); cf. the real tribulations of an entire Cretan family (I.Cret. II, 5; Axos, 19; vol. 2, p. 65 = Dittenberger, Syl. 622).

¹³ BGU 325, 2; P.Cair.Isid. 79, 16; P.Mil. 47, 3; P.Oslo 20, 1; P.Ostr.Mich 102, 10, 12; Stud.Pal. XX, 76, 4; SB 9406, 305; 10439, 3; 10556, 20, 25; 10929, col. III, 3, establishing the scope of the prefect’s powers: ὁ ἡγεμὼν διαγνώσεται . . . περὶ ληστειω—ν; cf. J. Jouguet, Vie municipale, pp. 264ff.

¹⁴ Xenophon, An. 1.2.25–27; Strabo 12.7.2; Plutarch, Cic. 36.6; Dio Cassius 55.28.3; Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 3.23.9, 11; SEG 8.497.

¹⁵ Philo, Good Man Free 121, Plutarch, Caes. 2.597; 30.6; Dio Cassius 20–21, 35; cf. Diodorus Siculus 15.95.1; 20.82.4–5; 20.83.1; 20.97.5; Polybius 2.4.8–9; Cicero, Flac. 13.30–31 (cf. M. Holleaux, Etudes d’épigraphie, vol. 4, pp. 28ff., 79ff. G. Biraghi, “La Pirateria greca in Tucidide,” in Acmè, vol. 5, 1952, pp. 471–477; L. Casson, The Ancient Mariners, New York, 1959, pp. 201–205). The senate and the emperors organized many punitive expeditions, notably a veritable war directed by Pompey in 67 BC (cf. M. P. Charlesworth, Trade-Routes and Commerce of the Roman Empire, 2d ed., New York, 1970, pp. 77ff.; C. Spicq, Epîtres aux Corinthiens, 385). On the law ordering the repression of piracy engraved on the monument of Aemilius Paulus at Delphi (Fouilles de Delphes III, 4, 1; pp. 41ff.), cf. E. Cuq, “Un fragment de loi romaine d’après une inscription de Delphes,” in RHDFE, 1925, pp. 541–565. The distinction between πειρατής (Dittenberger, Syl. 521, 4, 15) and ληστής dates from modern times, cf. P. Ducrey, Le Traitement des prisonniers de guerre dans la Grèce antique, Paris, 1968, pp. 172ff.

¹⁶ Horace, Epist. 1.2.32: “To cut a man’s throat, brigands arise in the night”; Seneca, Ira 16.1; Ben. 1.10.5; 2.18.6; Suetonius, Tib. 37.1; Tacitus, Ann. 2.85; Dio Cassius 55.28.1: “Brigands made such frequent raids that for three years Sardinia, instead of being governed by a senator, was handed over to soldiers and generals taken from the equestrian order”; Varro, Rust. 1.16.2.

¹⁷ Augustus put a price (250,000 drachmas) on the head of Corocottas, ληστήν ε—ν —Ιβηρία ἀκμάσαντα (Dio Cassius 56.43.3). According to Appian, the Romans battled “bands of brigands” in Spain (Hisp. 6.68; cf. 6.77).

¹⁸ Cf. Xenophon of Ephesus, Ephes. 2.13.4; 4.1–5; 5.2.1–7; Heliodorus, Aeth. 1.1.1ff.; 1.3.1–6; 1.4.1; 2.22.4; 5.2.7; 5.20.7; 5.22.8ff.; 5.31.3; 6.13.2; 7.1.2; Achilles Tatius, Leuc. et Clit. 3.5.5. For a later period, cf. D. Gorce, Les Voyages, l’hospitalité et le port des lettres dans le monde chrétien des IVe et Ve siècles, Paris, 1925, pp. 85ff.

¹⁹ P.Cair.Zen. 59659, 4: going to Philadelphia with two companions, the writer of the letter was robbed, λησταὶ παροινήσαντες ἡμα—ς; Josephus, War 2.228: “Near Bethoron, on the public highway, brigands attacked a certain Stephanos, a slave of Caesar, and robbed him of his baggage”; Epictetus 3.13.3: “When traveling, it is especially upon falling into the hands of brigands that we say we are isolated”; 4.1.91–98: “It is said that the route is infested with brigands. . . . Where to hide? How to get through without being robbed? . . . If my traveling companion himself turns against me and becomes my robber?” The Essenes traveled armed so as to be able to defend against any surprise: διὰ δὲ τοὺς ληστὰς ἔνοπλοι (Josephus, War 2.125), while in principle the poor could take comfort: “The traveler with empty pockets can thumb his nose at the brigand” (Juvenal, Sat. 10.22).

²⁰ Strabo 3.2.5; cf. 11.1.6; 11.2.12; 11.7.1; 11.12.4; 11.13.3, 6; cf. ληστηρία, I.Ilium, n. 102, 6. P.Yale inv. 1606, 13, published by N. Lewis, in Hommages à Cl. Préaux, Brussels, 1975, p. 760.

²¹ Law of Draco on murder, 8 and 10; cf. RIJG, vol. 2, p. 4.

²² P.Hib. 198, 86, 110; C.P.Herm. 48, 7; P.Oxy. 1981, 22. Accomplices were likewise punished: “Receptores adgressorum itemque latronum eadem poena adficiuntur qua ipsi latrones” (“Those who harbor attackers and brigands are visited with the same punishments as the brigands themselves,” Paulus, Sent. 5.3.4); Ulpian, Dig. 1.18.13 prol.: “[Praeses] sacrilegos latrones plagiarios fures conquirere debet et prout quisque dereliquerit in eum animadvertere, receptoresque eorum coercere, sine quibus latro diutius latere non potest” (“Governors must must search for temple-robbers, brigands, kidnappers, and thieves, and whoever has neglected to do so should see to it that he confines those who harbor them; for without accomplices a brigand cannot long hide”); 48.13.7; 50.16.118: “Hostes hi sunt, qui nobis aut quibus nos publice bellum decrevimus; ceteri latrones aut praedones sunt” (“Enemies are those who have publicly declared war on us, or we on them; the rest are brigands or robbers”); cited by M. Hengel, Zealots, pp. 30–31); cf. P.Ant. 87, 13; “The bandit’s wife is like the bandit himself” (y. Ketub. 26d 38; cf. y. Sanh. 19b 18).

²³ Josephus, War 1.398: “the emperor ordered that this nest of bandits should be exterminated” (cf. Ant. 15.343–348); Cumanus (Ant. 20.121); Felix (War 2.253: “the brigands that he crucified and the common folk convicted of complicity whom he punished were numberless”); Herod (2.56; Ant. 14.159; 16.281–285; 17.23–28; 17.271). According to Dio Cassius 54.12.1, certain generals celebrated triumphs for merely capturing brigands, ληστὰς συλλαμβάνοντες. Cf. ληστολογήσας in I.Bulg. 1126, 8, with the editor’s note.

²⁴ Matt 26:55; cf. Mark 14:48; Luke 22:52; P. Winter, On the Trial of Jesus, Berlin, 1961, pp. 44–50, 171–174.

²⁵ Paulus, Sent. 5.23.1: “humiliores vero in crucem tollantur aut bestiis obiciuntur” (“the more base are crucified or thrown to the animals”); thus the brigand Felix Bulla, condemned to be thrown to the beasts (Dio Cassius 66.10.7), or the famosi latrones, condemned to be crucified (Dig. 48.19.28, 15); Petronius 111.5: “Imperator provinciae latrones iussit crucibus adfigi” (“the provincial commander ordered the brigands to be put on crosses”); Seneca, Ep. 7.5: “sed latrocinium fecit aliquis: quid ergo meruit ut suspendatur” (“but one committed brigandage, which earned him the right to be hanged”); cited by M. Hengel, Zealots. Cf. Diodorus Siculus 16.82.3; Arrian, Anab. 3.2.5; Dittenberger, Syl. 454, 18. L. Flam-Zuckermann, “A propos d’une inscription de Suisse (C.I.L. XIII, 5010): Etude du phénomène du brigandage dans l’Empire romain,” in Lataomus, 1970, pp. 451–473.

²⁶ Matt 27:38, 44; Mark 15:27. In the rabbinic writings, crucifixion is always mentioned together with ληστεία (cf. E. Bammel, “Crucifixion as a Punishment in Palestine,” in The Trial of Jesus, London, pp. 162–165); in Palestine crucifixion goes back to the second century BC, cf. E. Stauffer, Jerusalem und Rom im Zeitalter Jesu Christi, Berne, 1957, pp. 123–127.

²⁷ Cf. A. Schlatter, Der Evangelist Matthäus, p. 781.

λίθοι ζω—ντες

lithoi zontes, living stones

lithoi zontes, S 3037, 2198; TDNT 4.270–271; EDNT 2.352–353; NIDNTT 3.393; L&N 2.23; BAGD 472(2)

Nothing is more normal than for stones to be called large (Matt 27:60), beautiful (Luke 21:5), or precious (1Cor 3:12; Rev 17:4; 18:12, 16; 21:11, 19), but it is odd that they could be living, given that stone is so inert that it is used as a symbol of death;¹ to be petrified is to remain motionless (Isa 50:7). Still, stone is also, and perhaps preeminently, a symbol of firmness, solidity, and immutability,² and in NT usage the metaphor and its meaning are expressed simultaneously to the point that the latter wins out over the former. Furthermore, the idea of life is not contradictory to that of stone. After all, “God can raise up children for Abraham from stones” (Matt 3:9; Luke 3:8; a pun on the Hebrew ‘a<^>banîm, “stones,” and habanîm, “children”); and if the disciples are silent, the stones will begin to cry out (Luke 19:40; cf. 4 Ezra 5:5).

Now Simon bar-Jona, who received from the Lord the unusual nickname Lithos, reflected on its meaning and elaborated a “theology of stone”: “As you draw near to him, the living stone (lithon zonta) rejected by men, but with God chosen, precious . . . you yourselves, like living stones (hos lithoi zontes), be built into a spiritual house. . . . See, I am putting in Zion a choice stone, a cornerstone, precious. . . . This stone that the builders rejected has become the head of the corner and a stone of stumbling” (1Pet 2:4-8). Christ is like a stone of great price chosen by God³ to become the “cornerstone” of the church-temple⁴ that he will build (John 2:19; Eph 2:20-22) and which will therefore not be built by human hands (Mark 14:58; Acts 7:49). To the contrary (men . . . de), the builders scorned and rejected this stone,⁵ and it became an occasion for falling, a “stone of stumbling” for unbelievers (hos lithou proskommati, Isa 8:14; Rom 9:32-33).

Since believers are “transformed in the same image” as their Lord (2Cor 3:18), it is natural for them to take the form of “living stones” so as to be built into the same structure. Since the turn of phrase is unusual, St. Peter softens it with hos: like or as stones. No doubt he borrowed the idea from the Latin language, in which a stone is considered to be “living” if it has not yet been cut out of the mountain, “the mother country of rocks” (Ovid, Met. 7.204), “a living rock still held in the earth by its roots” (ibid. 14.713), still lodged in its natural abode.⁶ In this sense, the repetition “living stone—living stones” would imply that Christians, far from being added to Christ like heterogenous elements in the building of the church, share in the same nature and in its value for building, since they remain forever an integral part of it (cf. Deut 32:18; Isa 51:1). This nuance does not exclude the idea of growth, which is demanded by the context, so the image is that of the ongoing concretion of these living stones.⁷

¹ Philo reports a very old tradition according to which “those who dare to look at the Gorgon’s head are immediately transformed into stones and rocks” (εὐθὺς λίθους καὶ πέτρους γίνεσθαι, To Gaius 237; cf. Pindar, Pyth. 10.47, describing the Gorgon as “petrifying death”).

² Yahweh is “the Rock, the God of truth” (Deut 32:4; cf. 2Sam 22:32, 47); “the Rock of Israel” (2Sam 23:3; Isa 30:29), the unshakable support for his people’s faith (Ps 18:3; 19:15; 62:3, 7).

³ —Εκλεκτόν, ἔντιμον, come from Isa 28:16 (J. Schreiner, Sion-Jerusalem Jahwes Königssitz, Munich, 1963, p. 168); cf. 1QS 8.7–8; 1QH 6.26; 7.8–9, J. de Waard, A Comparative Study of the Old Testament Text in the Dead Sea Scrolls and in the New Testament, Leiden, 1965, pp. 54ff. J. M. Ford, “The Jewel of Discernment: A Study of Stone Symbolism,” in BZ, 1967, pp. 109–116; M. Black, “The Christological Use of the Old Testament in the New Testament,” in NTS, vol. 18, 1971, pp. 11ff.

⁴ —Ἀκρογωνιαί—ος can be the foundation stone (introduced in the rock of Zion or built into the base of the wall built there, cf. R. J. McKelvey, “Christ the Cornerstone,” in NTS, vol. 8, 1962, pp. 352–359) or the capstone that crowns the building: the summit or keystone (cf. Jer 51:26; P. Dhorme, Emploi métaphorique, p. 24; J. Jeremias, “ἄκρογωνιαί—ος,” in TDNT, vol. 1, p. 792; ibid. λίθος, vol. 4, pp. 269–280), or better, the extremity of the corner (ἄκρον being sometimes “peak, height,” sometimes “edge, limit, end”); the corner blocks in a building, blocks of very hard stone, reinforce the sections of the walls (cf. A. K. Orlandos, Technique architecturale, vol. 2, pp. 5, 119; R. Martin, Manuel d’architecture grecque, pp. 165, 219, 235, 459, 462). The image suggests Christ’s unparalleled position (cf. Zech 4:7; Abraham, the cornerstone of the world, Str-B, vol. 1, pp. 733, 875ff.), the bonding power of believers who adhere to him (cf. G. Klinzing, Die Umdeutung des Kultus in der Qumrangemeinde und im N.T., Gütersloh, 1971, p. 188; R. J. McKelvey, The New Temple, Oxford, 1969, pp. 195ff.). See also O. Betz, “Felsenmann und Felsengemeinde,” in ZNW, 1957, pp. 49–77. J. Pfammatter, Die Kirche als Bau, Rome, 1960, pp. 97ff., 169ff. K. T. Schäfer, “Zu Deutung von ἄκρογωνιαί—ος,” in Festschrift J. Schmid, Regensburg, 1963, pp. 223ff.

⁵ The prophecy of Ps 98:22, which Jesus applied to himself (Matt 21:42; Mark 12:10; Luke 20:17—ἀποδοκίμασαν); cf. Acts 4:11—ὁ ἐ—ξουθενηθεὶς = scorned. P. Sciascia, Lapis reprobatus, Rome, 1959; J. Duncan M. Derrett, “The Stone that the Builders Rejected,” in F. L. Cross, SE, vol. 4, pp. 180–186 (giving the bibliography).

⁶ Ovid, Met. 5.315; Virgil, Aen. 1.166; 3.688. The inhabitants of Halicarnassus “promise to seat the foundations of the temple on living rock” (Tacitus, Ann. 4.55); cf. J. C. Plumpe, “Vivum Saxum, Vivi Lapides: The Concept of ‘Living Stones’ in Classical and Christian Antiquity,” in Traditio, vol. 1, 1943, pp. 1–14.

⁷ Cf. St. Augustine: “It is at the present time that the city is being built. The stones are cut in the mountains by the hands of the preachers of the truth; they are squared to form part of an eternal structure. Many stones are still in the worker’s hands to be brought to that perfection which will fit them to the structure of the temple” (Augustine, En. in Ps. 121 4). St. Paul usually evoked this ecclesial vitality by the image of the growth of a body (Col 2:19; P. S. Minear, Images of the Church in the New Testament, London, 1961), St. Peter by that of a “spiritual dwelling” (1Pet 2:5), the church being “the house of the living God” (1Tim 3:15).

λιθόστρωτος

lithostrotos, pavement

lithostrotos, S 3038; EDNT 2.353; MM 376; L&N 7.71; BAGD 474

“Pilate sat down in judgment at the place called Lithostrotos, in Hebrew Gabbatha.”¹ Etymologically, lithostrotos is “[a place_ paved with stone.”² The word is attested by four papyri from the third-fourth century, always as an adjective: the Sosias bank is to the south of the Colonnade, on the paved avenue (epi tou lithostrotou dromou, P.Oxy. 2138, 15); on the paved avenue of the god Hermes Trismegalos (epi tou lithostrotou dromou Hermou theou trismegalou, P.Flor. 50, 97). By correcting the text slightly, H. Schmitz (The Oxyrhynchus Papyri, vol. 17, p. 256) brings a reading from another papyrus into conformity with this: pros to lithostroto dromo Hermou theou trismeg (P.Amh. 98, 2). There is also a mutilated administrative letter from Hermopolis, epi tou lithostrotou (P.Stras. 138, 7; republished in SB 8020).

As a noun, lithostratos commonly means the pavement of the temple,³ and in John 19:13 it is a proper place-name. At Delos, the dedication of a pavement in the first century: Poplios Plotios Leukiou Rhomaios to lithostroton.⁴ A century later, at Kourion, when J. Seppius Celer was consul, Trajan built or extended a lithostrotos, a paved route, to the propylaeum leading to the Paphian Way.⁵

¹ John 19:13. On the identification of the site as the Fortress Antonia or Herod’s Palace, cf. L. H. Vincent, “Le Lithostrotos évangélique,” in RB, 1952, pp. 513–550; P. Benoit, “Prétoire, Lithostroton et Gabbatha,” ibid.,

pp. 531–550 (reprinted in Exégèse et théologie, pp. 316–339 = ET, vol. 1, pp. 167–188); Sr. Marie Aline de Sion, “La Forteresse Antonia à Jérusalem et la question du Prétoire,” Jerusalem, 1955; J. Starcky, “Lithostroton,” in DBSup, vol. 5, 398–405.

² Cf. Julius Pollux, Onom. 7.121, λιθόστρωτον ἔδαφος καὶ λιθολόγημα καὶ λελιθωμένον.

³ 2Chr 7:3—All the sons of Israel fall to their knees on the pavement (Hebrew rispâh; cf. the palace of Ahasuerus at Susa, Esth 1:6; but Cant 3:10, concerning the throne of Solomon, is not clear); Ep. Arist. 88: “the floor of the temple is entirely paved” (τὸ δὲ πα—ν ἔδαφος λιθόστρωτον καθέστηκε); Josephus, War 5.192; 6.85: “Julian the centurion slipped running across the pavement” (κατὰ λιθοστρώτου τρέχων); 6.189: “crushed by this weight against the pavement, he died immediately.”

⁴ Edited by P. Roussel, Délos colonie athénienne, Paris, 1916, p. 422, published again in Inscriptions de Délos: Dédicaces postérieures à 166 av. J.-C., Paris, 1937, n. 2302. Among the inscriptions from the sanctuaries of Egyptian gods at Delos, τὸν πυλω—να καὶ . . . τὸ λιθόστρωτον (P. Roussel, Les Cultes égyptien à Délos, Paris-Nancy, 1915–1916, n. 144, 3–4), τὸ λιθόστρωτον καὶ τὰς κινκλίδας (ibid. n. 146), τοὺς βωμοὺς καὶ το λιθόστρωτον καὶ τὰς σφίγγας (ibid. n. 173, 9); “Hermogenes built me and also the pavement” (καὶ τὴν λιθόστρωτον, IGLS, n. 1115, 3); “Apollonia had the steps put over the pavements” (τὰς βαθμίδας ται—ς λιθοστρώτοις ἐ—πέθηκε, ibid., n. 1259, 58); likewise at Sidon and at Amathonte, inscriptions cited by L. Robert (Opera Minora Selecta, vol. 2, p. 900), who offers this definition: “Λιθόστρωτος refers to a pavement (French un pavage, un dallage), whether of a court or an avenue.”

⁵ Λιθόστρωτον κατεσκεύασεν τὴν λείπουσαν ἀπὸ τῆς προούσης λιθοστρώτου μέχρι τοῦ φέροντος εἰ—ς τὴν Παφίαν ὁδὸν προπύλου, I.Kour., n. 111, 7–9 (with the observations of R. S. Bagnall, T. Drew-Bear, in ChrEg, 1974, pp. 190–194); inscription found in 1939. Cf. the avenue (δρόμος) of the temple of Heliopolis, which had a stone pavement (Strabo 17.1.28, λιθόστρωτον ἔδαφος), or the soldiers playing on the municipal lithostroton (Appian, BCiv. 3.26, ε—ν λιθοστρώτῳ πόλει).

λικμάω

likmao, to winnow, shake, scatter, pulverize, destroy

likmao, S 3039; TDNT 4.280–281; EDNT 2.353; MM 376; L&N 19.47; BAGD 474

After quoting Ps 118:22 (“The stone that the builders rejected is become the head of the corner”—Luke 20:17), Jesus adds this comment: “Whoever falls on this stone will be shattered, and the one on whom it falls will be broken to pieces” (eph’ ho d’ an pese likmesei auton, verse 18). At least this is the translation suggested by the context for the NT hapax likmao.¹ But in secular texts this denominative verb, formed from likmos, “winnowing basket,” means “to winnow,”² likmesis is the winnowing,³ the likmetes is the winnower (P.Phil. 17, 10 and 23; cf. likmainontes andres, Ostr. Tait-Préaux 1723, 8; second century), and there is a winnowing tax (likmetra, P.Oslo 33, 15, AD 29; SB 7373).

In the LXX there is another meaning, derived from the one just discussed: first “shake” (“I will shake the house of Israel, as one shakes with a sieve”—Amos 9:9, Hebrew nûa’), then “carry off, scatter to the wind.” The wicked person, carried off as if by a gale, becomes a wanderer, “the wind will chase him away from his place” (Job 27:21; Hebrew sa’ar, in the piel); “the nations are dispersed like dust before the wind” (Isa 17:13); “I will scatter them to the winds” (Jer 49:32; Hebrew zarâh, in the piel); “They will destroy the ramparts of Tyre and demolish its towers; I will sweep away her dust” (Ezek 26:4; Hebrew sahâh, in the piel). Still with an agricultural connection, Isa 30:24 prophesies: “Your oxen and asses will eat fodder spread out with the shovel and the fork” (Hebrew mizreh). So we get to the well established meaning of likmao as “scatter, disseminate,” which is used predominantly with the technical sense of divine punishment: “I will scatter the Egyptians (diaspero) and disperse them (likmeso autous)” (Ezek 29:12; repeated in 30:23, 26); “I scattered them (diespeira) and they were dispersed (elikmesa)” (36:19). To punish Israel’s sins, Yahweh “will disperse them beyond the River” (1Kgs 14:15; cf. Isa 30:22; Wis 11:20). Hence the axiom of divine justice: “The one who dispersed Israel will gather him together again” (ho likmesas . . . synaxeï auton, Jer 31:10).

There is a transition from the idea of winnowing to that of sorting, culling; then chase away, scatter, reduce to dust, and finally destroy or crush.⁴ The best parallel to Luke 20:18 is Dan 2:44 (Theodotion’s version): “He will pulverize and break up all these kingdoms” (leptynei kai likmesei pasas tas basileias).⁵

¹ Matt 21:44 is a gloss borrowed from Luke 20:18. For the opposing view, see R. Swaeles, “L’Arrière-Fond scripturaire de Mt. XXI, 43 et son lien avec Mt. XXI, 44,” in NTS, vol. 6, 1966, pp. 310–313.

² Joseph decides “the harvest must be gathered in bundles, without any threshing or sorting . . . , so that each year prosperity may be recalled; the men shall thresh and winnow” (ἀλοώντων καὶ λικμώντων, Philo, Joseph 112). Barley is winnowed: γραφάτω τω—παρ αὐτοῦ οὐκέτι ἀργήσας τὰ

λοιπὰ λικμῆσαι (BGU 1872, 9; cf. line 12, 15, 23; from 50 BC; cf. P.Oxy. 1482, 3); one winnows τὴν ἄλωνίαν, the threshing-floor (P.Ryl. 442, 3 = SB 9408, 94, 97, 100, 103; 9409, col. VII, 26–28; 9410, col. VI, 10). Same meaning in Ruth 3:2—“Tonight he must winnow the barley on the threshing-floor” (cf. Josephus, Ant. 5.328).

³ P.Petaus 53, 12 (second century AD); SB 9409, col. VII, 78. In a lease for a vegetable garden in the third century, reference is made to “all my expenses from sowing time to harvest and winnowing” (ἀπό τε κατασπορα—ς μέχρι συμκομιδῆς καὶ λικμῆσεως, P.Mich. 609, 22), “after the winnowing we will share the produce equally” (line 27).

⁴ F. Delebecque, observing that λικμάω presents an image, and recalling that “winnow” means to separate the grain from the chaff, cites Luke 3:17, the “winnowing shovel,” and chooses the meaning “pulverize.” Hence his translation: “The one on whom [this stone_ falls will be ground to powder by it” (Evangile de Luc, p. 126).

⁵ The corresponding Hebrew verb is sûp, “perish, cease to exist, disappear.” A. Deissmann (Bible Studies, p. 225) cites BGU 146, 8 (second-third century) where λικμάω would be synonymous with συνθλάω (break, grind together; cf. the Vulgate at Luke 20:18—comminuere; Matt 21:44—conterere): ε—πῆλθαν —Αγαθοκλῆς καὶ δοῦλος Σαραπίωνος —Οννώφρευς καὶ ἄλλος ξένος ε—ργάτης αὐτοῦ τῆ ἄλωνία μου καὶ ε—λίκμησάν μου τὸ λάχανον καὶ οὐχ ὀλίγην ζημείαν μοι ε—ζημιωσάμην; these rogues smashed to bits, destroyed my bean vegetable harvest; cf. λάχανον in Josephus, War 4.541: “Whoever ventured outside the gates to gather vegetables or dead wood. . . .”

λόγιος

logios, eloquent, articulate, learned, eminent

logios, S 3052; TDNT 4.136–137; EDNT 2.356; NIDNTT 3.1081, 1106, 1117; MM 378; L&N 27.20, 33.32; BAGD 476

A Jew of Alexandrian origin, Apollos was upon his arrival at Ephesus introduced as an aner logios (Acts 18:24; biblical hapax). This is a term of honor that was current in the first century BC,¹ but it is not easy to translate, because it can refer to rather varied qualities.

(a) The most widespread meaning of logios would seem to be “eloquent, articulate, speaking well.” “Eloquent men tend to make long expositions and long speeches” (Philo, Post. Cain 53); “Does not a slight sickness suffice to paralyse the tongue, to stitch shut the mouth of seasoned orators?” (ton pany logion, Cherub. 116). “You are the most unjust of men not to be grateful at all when, mute that you were, I made you eloquent” (logios men ex aphonou).² Plutarch associates hoi logiotatoi kai kalliphonotatoi (“having the best voices,” De sol. an. 973 a; cf. Con. praec. 17: hoi philologoi logious). “I myself might justly rebuke those eloquent Greeks . . . who sit in judgment and revile” (Josephus, War 1.13). “Timothy remembered Philopappos and Maximus Statilius . . . those most eloquent and very dear men.”³ If the gods who preside over arts and letters are theoi logioi,⁴ Hermes is the one for whom this epithet is most suitable: “Hermes passed for the most eloquent of the gods” (Lucian, Gall. 2; cf. Pseudol. 24). Beginning in the fifth century, and especially with Justinian, it is the normal description for a lawyer, and especially for the defensor civitatis, corresponding to the Latin eloquentissimus: to logiotato ekdiko Herakleous poleos.⁵ Lawyers are usually addressed logiotate ekdike kyrie (P.Oxy. 902, 18; 1885, 17; P.Flor. 377, 18) or lamprotate ekdike, logiotate kyrie (P.Oxy. 1883, 10). This sense of the word—mastery of the art of oratory—would be quite suitable for Apollos, who is fairly bubbling with enthusiasm and fervor (zeon to pneumatii elalei, Acts 18:25), preaching with parresia (boldness, verse 26), with contagious assurance and conviction, which won him such prestige in the community at Corinth (1Cor 1:12; 3:4-6, 22; 4:6; 16:12).

(b) Eloquence often goes along with erudition,⁶ and logios also means “learned, scholarly, well-read.” “There were more sensible and learned youths than he (Tiberius) in his day” (Philo, To Gaius 142). “Learned people (hoi logioi) thought that the security of the temple was dissolving by itself” (Josephus, War 6.295). Plutarch: tous sophous kai logious (De prim. frigid. 955 d); “the most learned of the Romans” (Num. 12.2), “the most learned of the Delphians” (De def. or. 42); “Aristotle, the most learned of the philosophers” (Alex. 7.2); “She does not refuse to converse with the learned” (Heliodorus, Aeth. 2.33.7; cf. 3.19.3). Since Phrynichus notes that the ancients called logios a person who knew the costume of each people and could thus make them known (ed. Lobeck, p. 198), this term can be given the nuance “informed” or “competent,” like Diodorus Siculus, according to Eusebius (Praep. Evang. 1.6.9). Thus well-informed writers tell about marvellous cures effected by Sarapis (Strabo 17.1.7); “we have received a very old tradition handed down by well-informed men from all of Greece” (Philo, To Gaius 237); “These truths were already known among the most illustrious learned ancients” (Post. Cain 162); “Judas the son of Sariphaeus and Matthias the son of Margalothus, the most learned of the Jews and peerless interpreters of their ancestral laws” (Josephus, Ant. 17.149); “the most learned (hoi logiotatoi) of the natives retell a myth” (Diodorus Siculus 2.4.3; cf. Dionysius of Halicarnassus 5.17.3; 6.1.2). The adjective is applied especially to the Egyptians who passed on to the historians their knowledge of their ancient traditions: “The account that I had from the most learned high priests of this learned land of Egypt.”⁷ So logios could be translated “expert,” as with Hippodamus of Miletus, who “professed to be an expert (logios boulomenos) about all of nature” (Aristotle, Pol. 2.8.1.1267b), the Etruscan haruspices (hoi logioi) in interpreting dreams (Plutarch, Sull. 7.7; cf. De def. or. 433 d: hoi logiotatoi Delphon), Akosinos the expert physician (iatros logios, Heliodorus, Aeth. 4.7.4). Applied to Apollos, this meaning of the word is particularly felicitous, since he was “powerful in the Scriptures . . . and taught accurately about Jesus” (Acts 18:24-25). Thus he passed on a tradition concerning which he was perfectly informed, and he had a complete mastery of the Holy Scriptures. He was a scholar who could communicate his convictions energetically.

(c) Finally, logios is a title of honor,⁸ and this nuance is not to be ruled out in Acts 18:24, where we could take aner logios to mean an “eminent or quite distinguished man.” Thus in the third century, huios logios means “noble son” (P.Oxy. 2476, 4). “To His Magnificence the archon and his very distinguished colleague” (kai to logiotato autou sympono, 1919, 2; seventh century); archontos Pyrrakou tou logiou.⁹ “Timothy was remembered . . . by his very distinguished and very dear friends” (emnesthe . . . ton logiotaton kai philtaton, Dittenberger, Or. 408). This nuance of affection and admiration¹⁰ is probably involved in the use of the term by St. Luke, who was clearly impressed by the prestigious young Alexandrian academician.

¹ In the first century BC, P.Lond. 2710, 6 describes Petesouchos as ἄνδρα λόγιον (ed. J. Seyfarth, “Φράτρα und φρατρία im nachklassischen Griechentum,” in Aeg. 1955, p. 17; republished in SB 7835). Plutarch says that Pittheus was an ἀνὴρ λόγιος (Thes. 3.2). Cf. the praise of Zeno: πλὴν ε—πεὶ λόγιον ἄνθρωπον ε—παινοῦμεν (A. Traversa, Index Stoicorum Herculanensis, Genoa, 1952, p. 13).

² Plutarch, Pomp. 51.8; De frat. amor. 16; Ti. Gracch. 2.1; Cic. 49.5. On the cultural and social importance of the art of oratory in the Hellenistic Period, cf. H. I. Marrou, Histoire de l'éducation, pp. 269–291 = ET, pp. 267–281; Pindar, Pyth. 1.183: “the sound of fame . . . reveals to orators and to poets”; Pindar, Nem. 6.51: “Songs and speeches tell of their great deeds.” The λογικός is a master of rhetoric or eloquence (MAMA 6.126.4; cf. I.Car., p. 196); cf. Plutarch, De Pyth. or. 405 a.

³ Τω—ν λογιότατων καὶ φιλότατων (J. Baillet, Inscriptions grecques et latines des tombeaux des rois à Thèbes, Cairo, 1920, n. 76, 5); cf. CCAG 8; IV, 178, 17: λογίους μὲν πάνυ ποιει— καὶ φίλους βασιλέων; 184, 10: λογίους πεπαιδευμένους.

⁴ Cf. E. Orth, Logios, Leipzig, 1926, pp. 86ff.

⁵ Stud.Pal. XX, 129, 1 (fifth century); P.Oxy. 902, 1: To Flavius Isaac, τῷ λογιωτάτῳ σχολαστικῷ ε—κδίκῳ (fifth century); 2177, 37–40; PSI 76, 11: διὰ τοῦ λογιωτάτου ε—κδίκου τῆς —Αλεξανδρέων (sixth century); BGU 836, 7: διὰ τοῦ λογιωτάτου ε—κδίκου τῆς —Αρσινοϊτών (from the time of Justinian); cf. 401, 7 (seventh century); P.Lond. 1732, 4; P.Apoll. 46, 5: “I have proposed in the presence of the most holy bishop, the most holy counsel (τοῦ λογιωτάτου ε—κδίκου), the Lord Basilios . . .” (eighth century). Jur.Pap., n. 20, 81. Cf. E. von Druffel, Papyrologische Studien zum byzantinischen Urkundenwesen im Anschluß an P. Heidelberg 311, 2d ed., Munich, 1970, pp. 40, 52.

⁶ Philo, Virtues 174: the proud person “thinks that he is the most just, the most eloquent, the most learned” (δικαιότατος, λογιώτατος, ε—πιστημονικώτατος). Menecrates of Sosandra: ι—ατρὸν καὶ φιλόσοφον, ἥρωα, λό[γιον] (or —γιστήν), στρατηγόν (V. Nutton, “Menecrates of Sosandra, Doctor or Vet?,” in ZPE XXII, 1976, p. 93).

⁷ Ep. Arist. 6. Herodotus 2.2: “The priests of Heliopolis are held to be the most learned of the Egyptians”; 2.77: “Among the Egyptians, those who inhabit the part of Egypt where grains are sown . . . are by far the most learned”; Philo, Moses 1.23: the learned (or competent, hoi logioi) Egyptians passed on to Moses the knowledge of the sciences and philosophy. Josephus, Ant. 1.165; 2.75; Plutarch, Sol. 26.1: “Psenopis of Heliopolis and Sonkhis of Saïs were the most learned of the priests”; according to Theophrastus, the Egyptian race is the most cultivated (τὸ λογιώτατον, in Porphyry, Abst. 2.5; cf. Eusebius, Praep. Evang. 1.9.7).

⁸ Cf. P.Lips. 37, 24: τῇ σῆ λογιότητι (fourth century); P.Oxy. 902, 13 (fifth century), SB 6000, col. 6 (sixth century); 4490, 9 (seventh century); Eusebius, Praep. Evang. 1.9.7)

⁹ C. Michel, Recueil, 1170 (first century); Dio Cassius 60.19.1: “Aulus Plautius, distinguished (λογιώτατος) senator.” Frequently used for πρυτάνεις in the inscriptions, cf. E. Orth, Logios, pp. 70ff.

¹⁰ Cf. the introduction of Lamprias by Plutarch (Plutarch, Quaest. conv. 1.622 e). A woman says of her husband: μετὰ συναινέσεως Μάρκου τοῦ λογιωτάτου μου συμβίου (P.Oxy. 126, 6; from the sixth century). Λογιότης became a title of respect in the protocol for Christian letter-writing, SB 8003, 8 (fourth century); P.Ross.Georg. III, 9, 19 (= M. Naldini, Il Cristianesimo in Egitto, n. 77). L. Dinneen, Titles of Address in Christian Greek Epistolography, Washington, 1929, pp. 47–48.

λοιδορέω, λοιδορία, λοίδορος

loidoreo, to insult; loidoria, insult; loidoros, insulter

loidoreo, S 3058; TDNT 4.293–294; EDNT 2.359; NIDNTT 3.346–347; MM 380; L&N 33.393; BDF §§152(1), 420(2); BAGD 479 | loidoria, S 3059; TDNT 4.293–294; EDNT 2.360; NIDNTT 3.346; MM 380; L&N 33.393; BAGD 479 | loidoros, S 3060; TDNT 4.293–294; EDNT 2.360; NIDNTT 3.346–347; MM 380; L&N 33.395; BAGD 479

The meaning of these terms evolved within biblical Greek, even though a number of usages have parallels in the secular language.¹ In the LXX, they are used especially to translate the Hebrew rîb, “to quarrel,” and in the Pentateuch often refer to the dispute of Meribah.² This is also the meaning of these terms in the Wisdom writings, with respect to the quarrelsome woman (Prov 25:24; 27:15; Hebrew madôn) and the quarrelsome man (26:21), and it is specified that “it is an honor for a man to refrain from dispute” (20:3). The sense becomes more pejorative in Prov 10:18—“insult,” Hebrew dibâh—and in Ben Sirach (22:24; 27:21), where insults go together with curses (29:6) and the insulter with the proud (23:8). Finally, the coarsest insults go together with blasphemies (2Macc 12:14) and are the expression of hatred (Josephus, Ant. 17.37).

In the NT, the Pharisees abuse the man born blind (John 9:28), and when St. Paul called the high priest a white-washed wall, he was accused of insulting him (Acts 23:4); loidoria is thus a form of hybris.³ Words lead to blows; insults provoke fights, and blood flows.⁴ Christ was subjected to insults and blows,⁵ and Christian slaves are urged to imitate his determined silence: “Abused, he did not abuse in return.”⁶ The apostles give an example: they do not fail to reply with patience and forgiveness,⁷ and all Christians should likewise refrain from returning harm for harm (1Pet 3:9), blessing those who curse them (Luke 6:28; Rom 12:14). The Lord abolishes the lex talionis (Matt 5:38-39), replacing it with the response of love.

This is not without merit, for every insult is an offense against one’s honor,⁸ especially since it is often accompanied by scornful mocking.⁹ But St. Paul does not tolerate any concession, but places the mocker between the idolator and the drunkard as being unworthy to be called a brother (1Cor 5:11) and excluded from the kingdom of God (6:10). This severity is astonishing. We must remember, however, that the entire Bible similarly denounces sins of speech¹⁰ and that “most people enjoy listening to insults” (Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.4). People insulted each other for the most trifling reasons.¹¹ There were even “insult duels” (Philo, Husbandry 110; Stobaeus, Flor. 19.4; vol. 3, p. 530). Common folk went at it no holds barred. Epictetus presents the man who, at the theater, took sides in an improper way: “So why did they insult you? Because everyone detests whatever hampers him. They wanted to give the wreath to someone, you preferred someone else. They were hampering you and you them. You turned out to be stronger. They did what they could—insulted the one who hampered them. . . . Don’t farmers revile Zeus when he hampers them? Don’t soldiers revile him? Is Caesar not reviled endlessly . . . ?” (3.4.6–7).

If the texts that are hardest on loidoria are those in 1 Cor, the reason must be that this vice was especially widespread among the lower-class folk descended from the freedmen with whom Caesar had populated the city in 44 BC, whose numbers were swelled by colonists so vulgar that they provoked the complaints of the poets Alciphron (Alciphron, Ep. 3.15) and Crinagoras (Anth. Pal. 9.284). We also know what a passion they had for the Cynics, who specialized in uncouth aggressiveness: “Here are your outstanding characteristics: being impudent and rude and insulting everyone equally, kings like commoners; that is how you attract attention and make yourself seem manly . . . all the traits of a wild beast or a savage animal. Far from you are modesty, decency, and moderation.”¹²

¹ For example, Jer 29:27—“Why did you not reprimand Jeremiah?” (Hebrew ga’ar). Cf. 1Tim 5:14—the conduct of the young widows should not give occasion for any λοιδορία, any injurious accusation, any damaging criticism; Xenophon, Symp. 4.32: “When I was rich, I was often criticized harshly for visiting Socrates”; Plutarch, Nic. 2.1: “His birth (he was called a foreigner, having been born on Cos) brought him harsh attacks”; P.Cair.Zen. 59840, 14: “It is not without dispute that I have occupied the premises.”

² Exod 17:7; cf. verse 2; Num 20:3, 13, 24; Deut 33:8.

³ The two terms are associated, PSI 222, 14; as are λοιδορος and ὑβρις (T. Benj. 5.4), λοιδορέω and ὑβρίζω (Dittenberger, Syl. 1109, 75, P.Mil.Vogl. 24, 37: λέγει μοι λοιδορεῖσθαι ὑπὲρ αὐτῆς τὰ πλειοστά ἀδίκως καὶ ὑβριστικῶς).

⁴ Exod 21:18—“When men quarrel and one strikes his neighbor with a stone or with his fist”; Sir 22:24—“Before bloodshed come insults”; Philo, Dreams 2.168: a meeting of drinkers “full of anxiety, dejection, brawling, insults, blows, and injuries, of people who are muttering, yelling, grabbing each other by the throat, wrestling, pulling at each other’s ears, nose . . .”; P.Oxy. 237; col. VI, 21: ε—πὶ φθόνῳ δὲ μόνον λοιδορούμενος καὶ δεινὰ πάσχων ἀπὸ ε—μοῦ; Acta Alexandrinorum XVIII, col. I, 2: λοιδοροῦντα καὶ βιάζοντα.

⁵ Cf. Matt 27:39, 41, 44; Mark 15:29; Luke 23:11, 35-36; John 19:2-5.

⁶ 1Pet 2:23—ὅς λοιδορούμενος οὐκ ἀντελοιδορεῖ. Cf. Philo, Decalogue 75: “In these petitions, they envisioned not oaths, but curses that would provoke their anger and stir them up to lash back with insults and invective of their own”; Josephus, War 2.302: “Florus ordered that those who had insulted him should be sent to him, adding that they would taste his vengeance if they did not turn over the guilty parties to him. The eminent people ... begged for pardon for those who had spoken ill of Florus.”

⁷ 1Cor 4:12—λοιδορούμενοι, εὐλογοῦμεν; cf. L. Cerfaux, “L’Antinomie paulinienne de la vie apostolique,” in RSR, 1951, pp. 221–235.

⁸ Xenophon, Hier. 1.14: “what is more painful to hear, namely, insult.” Plutarch, C. Gracch. 4.5–6: “You insult Cornelia, who brought Tiberius into the world!”; Plutarch, Dem. 22.3; Cic. 26.7. Cf. P.Tebt. 44, 16: ε—λοιδορήσέν με καὶ ἀσχημόνειν; C. Spicq, Justice, vol. 2, pp. 369–392.

⁹ Cf. this witness who, while walking down the street, saw Athenaïs mock and strike Chrysis (P.Hib. 200, 7).

¹⁰ Cf. C. Spicq, Justice, vol. 2, pp. 105ff., insults, defamation, bickering, mockery, etc.

¹¹ Xenophon, An. 7.5.11: “Seuthes started insulting Heracleides for not having invited Xenophon as well”; Theophrastus, Char. 28.5: “If someone has just left a group, the slanderer straightaway sets upon the absent party, and once he has started, insults his entire family”; Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.148: “Apollonius did not tie up his gripes in a bundle like Apion; instead he broadcast them here and there, sometimes insulting us as atheists and misanthropes . . .”; Plutarch, Pel. 8.8: “Chlidon asked for the bridle. His wife, caught unprepared, told him that she could not give it to him because she had lent it to a friend. There followed insults, then ill-omened words”; Diodorus Siculus 20.33: “Lysiscus, who had had some wine, was spouting insults against his prince. Nevertheless, Agathocles . . . replied only with jokes to this violent attack. But his son Archagathus could not contain himself and went on the attack. After dinner was over . . . Lysiscus began insulting Archagathus along the way. . . . Archagathus, beside himself with anger and unable to contain himself, took a pike from one of the guards who was nearby and plunged it into the side of Lysiscus, who died on the spot”; P.Oxy. 2264, 43. —In Galen there are insulting tirades against his colleagues (B. P. Reardon, Courants littéraires grecs, Paris, 1971, p. 61). Derision, mockery, sarcasm were forms of criticism in ancient literature (G. W. Coats, “Self-Abasement and Insult Formulas,” in JBL, 1970, pp. 14–26).

Lucian is no doubt the richest source of these (J. Bompaire, Lucien écrivain, pp. 473–484). Cf. C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, vol. 1, pp. 86–88; 150, n. 3; 503; vol. 2, pp. 610, 686.

¹² Lucian, Vit. Auct. 10; editor T. Beaupère comments: “Lucian misses no opportunity to stigmatize the uncouthness of the Cynic. Boisterous (βοω—ντος, 11), foul-mouthed and aggressive, he is generally characterized by the insults that he dispenses as unsparingly as a barking dog (ύλακτήση, 7) after those who draw near (cf. Fug. 14: βοα—ν, μα—λλον δὲ . . . ύλακτει—ν καὶ λοιδορει—σθαι ἅπασι; and Fug. 27: λοιδορον; Nec. 4: λοιδορούμενον)” (Paris, 1967, vol. 2, p. 51, n. 96).

λουτρόν

loutron, bath

loutron, S 3067; TDNT 4.295–307; EDNT 2.361; NIDNTT 1.150–153; MM 381; L&N 53.43; BAGD 480

This is not the place for a theological study of baptism (Eph 5:26; Titus 3:5), on which the secular texts shed no light. But if a sacrament is a sign of a sacred reality, it is important to ask what that sign represented for first-century Jew or Greek. In the case of loutron, there are three meanings: the place where one bathes, the bathroom;¹ bath water (Sophocles, Ant. 1201: lousantes hagnon loutron); the action of bathing. This third meaning is the one used in the LXX.²

(a) The bath, public and private, was quite widespread in antiquity,³ and the papyri supply abundant documentation for these bath houses, their founders, their employees, their management, their functioning,⁴ and their prices.⁵ The bath is in the first instance a hygienic practice, a cleansing—one washes to be clean⁶—but there are many other motives: bathing for pleasure or enjoyment in the rivers,⁷ baths for relaxation, to dispel cares,⁸ bathing to counter the heat (Sus 15, Theodotus; Aesop, Fab. 73), baths to complement athletic exercises,⁹ remedial baths to treat sickness¹⁰ or for the aged, and for farmers exhausted by their toils: gerontika loutra therma (Plato, Leg. 6.761 c).

(b) If bathing is first of all due to the desire for cleanliness, water is also a means of achieving purity and getting rid of moral stains. Philo highlights this correspondence between the efficacy of water for the body and the symbolism of the soul: “They cleanse their bodies with baths and lustrations, but they do not wish to be bothered to cleanse their souls of life-staining passions” (Cherub. 95); “By thus washing away that which makes dirty, by making use of the lustral waters of intelligence and its means of purification, it should shine splendidly” (Change of Names 124; cf. Plant. 116, 162). Similarly the Pythian Oracle: “Proceed with purity of heart, stranger, into the sanctuary of the pure god. Wash at the spring of the nymphs. A few drops suffice for the good; but the ocean would not be enough water to purify the wicked” (Anth. Pal. 14.71; cf. Euripides, Hipp. 317: “my hands are pure; it is my heart that is stained”). Thus the bath has a religious significance and is a rite practiced not only in Israel and by Jewish sects¹¹ but also among the Greeks, and perhaps among all peoples,¹² especially when drawing near to the deity: “One cannot enter the sanctuary without first washing the body in a complete bath” (Philo, Unchang. God 8). This purifying effect of bathing is highlighted in Eph 5:26—“Christ loved the church; he gave himself up for it, so as to sanctify it by purification through the washing of water with a word (to loutro tou hydatos en rhemati), because he wanted to present it to himself all shining, without spot or stain or anything of the sort, but holy and pure.”¹³ The instrumental dative to loutro specifies the manner—“purification carried out by means of and in the form of a bath with water,”¹⁴—qualified by en rhemati, a reference to the sacramental formula. This is a reference to baptism, which washes away sins (apolouesthai, Acts 22:16; 1Cor 6:11) and whitens the soul (leukaino, Rev 7:14).

The whole pericope teaches that the union of Christ with humanity¹⁵ is the model for conjugal love in the church: a love that is intimate, a love that is fecund.¹⁶ From that point on loutron does not envisage cleanliness or a purification that is necessary after a sexual act,¹⁷ but the fecundity which for the Greeks was the principal purpose of marriage.¹⁸ It is reminiscent of the prenuptial bath of young women, the loutron . . . nymphikon;¹⁹ since water was for the earth a source of fertility,²⁰ the nuptial bath would be a fertility rite, intended to enhance the likelihood of procreation; at the very least it enhances access to a new mode of existence (Euripides, IT 818). In Eph 5:26, purification-cleanliness (katharizo) is also sanctification-consecration (hina auten hagiase): Christ takes as his bride the church, which he has washed of its sins (cf. Acts 22:16).

(c) If water is the condition of life and fertility, then bathing or immersion, by the very structure of the act—entering and leaving—symbolizes also the erasure of the past, the end of a former existence, and makes a renewal possible: one is born again of the water and of the Spirit.²¹ The baptized person is a new creation.²² The rite of the loutron symbolizes this transformation.²³ Having been begotten by the bath, one comes out from it strong and well. Hence Titus 3:5—“He saved us, according to his mercy, by a bath of regeneration and renewal of the Holy Spirit.”²⁴ St. Ambrose comments accurately: “The father has begotten you by the washing” (Sacr. 5.19; Sources Chrétiennes, 25, p. 93).

¹ Ps.-Xenophon, Ath. 2.10; P.Oxy. 1252, verso 22; BGU 14, col. III, 18; Dittenberger, Or. 339, 33; cf. L. Robert, Études épigraphiques, p. 131. J. Ysebaert, Greek Baptismal Terminology, pp. 12, 21, 62ff.

² Cant 4:2; 6:5—“Your teeth are like a flock of sheared sheep coming out after bathing (ἀπὸ τοῦ λουτροῦ; or from the watering place; Hebrew rahshah)”; Sir 34:25—βαπτίζόμενος ἀπὸ νεκροῦ καὶ πάλιν ἀπτόμενος αὐτοῦ, τὸ ὠφέλησεν ε—ν τω— λουτρῶ— αὐτοῦ, i.e., someone who plunges or immerses himself (in water) after defiling contact with a corpse, then touches it again—what does he profit from his washing (his purifying bath, ablution)? Cf. Josephus, Ant. 8.356: “In his grief the king took no bath and no food”; Ag. Apion 1.282: the healed leper is commanded to undertake “certain purifications: washing in spring water. . . .”

³ R. Ginouvès, Balaneutiké: Recherches sur le bain dans l'antiquité grecque, Paris, 1962. Plautus, Poen. 217ff.: “From daybreak till now you and I have been doing only one thing: bathing ourselves, rubbing ourselves down, drying ourselves, dressing up, polishing up, polishing up again.”

⁴ P.Oxy. 1252, verso 22; 892, 11; 1889, 8; 1921, 12–13 (mica panes fitted as windows for two bath houses, cf. L. Robert, Opera Minora Selecta, vol. 2, p. 933), 1925, 38: ε—πάνω τῆς θύρας τοῦ λουτροῦ; 2006, 2: βαλανεὺς τοῦ λουτροῦ; 2569, 7; 2599, 31; 2718, 12; P.Mich.Zen. 38, 33; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XVI, 22, 5; 30, 1, 5; P.land. 146, col. XI, 5 (rental agreement for a bathing tunic); P.Ross.Georg. III, 46, 1; Stud.Pal. XX, 238, verso 8. Women complain that they were struck and chased from their bath, in a public bath (P.Enteux. 83) or burned by hot water (P.Enteux. 82; on hot baths, cf. Xenophon, Oec. 5.9; Athenaeus 1.18 c; 5.207 f; Dittenberger, Syl. 888, 124: θερμῶ—ν ὑδάτων λουτρά; Vitruvius, Arch. 5.11.2; Julius Pollux, Onom. 7.166; Stobaeus, Flor. 97.31; vol. 5, pp. 814–815). Cf. Prosop.Ptol., vol. 5, pp. 91ff. H. Maehler, “Zwei neue Bremer Papyri,” in ChrEg, 1966, p. 346; R. Etienne, La Vie quotidienne à Pompéi, Paris, 1966, pp. 411–425. Benefactors offered λουτρά to the ephebes (I.Priene CXII, 76–77) or to their city (“Inscription de Iotapè,” in L. Robert, Documents p. 75).

⁵ Theophrastus, Char. 9.8; LSAM, n. 23, 10. On ritual baths, cf. LSAMSup, n. 25 A 9; 108, 6 (Rhodes, first century AD). LSCG, n. 52, 22 (Athens, first century AD).

⁶ John 13:10. Hence the accessories: sponge, strigil, soap; the latter from a potash or alkali base (Job 9:30; Jer 2:22; P.Enteux. 82; cf. R. Ginouvès, Balaneutiké, p. 142), sometimes perfume from the iris (Athenaeus 9.409 e; cf. Plutarch, Dem. 27).

⁷ Sib. Or. 4.165: “Bathe your whole body in streams of fresh water” (around AD 80). Heated baths: εἰ—ς μακαρίαν τὸ λουτρόν (Antiphanes, frag. 245; in J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 2, p. 290), accompanied with unguents and perfumes (Isa 57:9; Sus 15; cf. 2Sam 11:2); cf. in 92 BC at the mysteries of Andania: ἀλείμματος καὶ λουτροῦ, Dittenberger, Syl. 736, 106 = LSCG, n. 65. On the art of the bath (βαλανευτική), which goes together with adornment (κοσμητική), cf. Plato, Soph. 227 a; Plato, Plt. 282 a.

⁸ Λουτρόν ἀλεξίπονος (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1961, n. 854).

⁹ Aristophanes, Av. 140: “you meet my son leaving the gymnasium, all bathed”; SEG XIII, 488, 9: ὕδωρ εἰ—ς τὴν παλαίστραν, Cf. J. Delorme, Gymnasion, Paris, 1960, pp. 304–311 et passim.

¹⁰ Cf. Naaman’s bath (2Kgs 5:1-14); Hippocrates, Acut. 18 (ed. Littré, vol. 2, pp. 365ff.); Pausanias 2.27.6; probably prescribed by the Ebionites and the Elchasaïtes. Charlatans forbid baths for epileptics (Hippocrates, Morb. Sac. 1; ed. Littré, vol. 6, p.355).

¹¹ Lev 15:21ff.; 17:15-16; 22:6; Isa 1:16—“Wash yourselves, purify yourselves”; Ezek 36:25—“I shall pour out pure water on you and you will be pure; I will purify you from all your stains”; Ps 51:4—“Wash my guilt away completely, and purify me of my sin.” The translators of the LXX wash their hands before praying and before translating the sacred text (Ep. Arist. 305). The Essenes replaced the cultic sacrifices with baths, and thus they made themselves worthy to sit at the common table (Josephus, War 2.129); running water, which is the purest water, is used for purification (2.138; cf. Recueil L. Cerfaux, vol. 1, pp. 321–336. H. Braun, “Die Täufer taufe und die qumranischen Waschungen,” in Theologia Viatorum, vol. 9, 1963, pp. 1ff.). The hermit Banous “took numerous purifying baths, day and night, in cold water” (Josephus, Life 11); the Hemerobaptists “bathed each day in water to wash themselves and purify themselves of all guilt” (Epiphanius, Pan. 17); likewise the Nasareans, the Masbotheans, and the Sabeans; cf. J. Thomas, Le Mouvement baptiste en Palestine et en Syrie (150 av. J.-C.–300 ap. J.-C.), Gembloux, 1935. Christ was reticent about ablutions and washings, cf. Matt 15:1-20; 23:25-26; Mark 7:1-23.

¹² Aristophanes, Ran. 355: the hierophant excludes from initiation one who is not pure in spirit, γνώμην μὴ καθαρεύει. An inscription of the temple at Epidaurus: “Let no one who is not pure enter this fragrant temple; to be pure is to have a pure conscience” (Porphyry, Abst. 2.19; Clement of Alexandria, Strom. 5.1; PG IX, 28); Theophrastus, Char. 16; Euripides, Or. 1602–1603; Aristophanes, Av. 958, 959; Pax 956. Cf. A. J. Festugière, “La Grèce: La Religion,” in M. Gorce, R. Mortier, Histoire générale des religions, Paris, 1944, vol. 2, pp. 54ff., 115; L. Moulinier, Le Pur et l’impur dans la pensée des Grecs, Paris, 1952, pp. 25ff., 102ff. et passim.

¹³ J. Cambier, “Le Grand Mystère concernant le Christ et son Eglise, Ephésiens V, 22–33,” in Bib, 1966, pp. 43–90; C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 1, p. 289; M. Barth, Ephesians, vol. 2, pp. 691ff.

¹⁴ H. Schlier, Der Brief an die Epheser, Düsseldorf, 1957, p. 257. Cf. Heb 10:22—ῥεραντισμένοι τὰς καρδίας ἀπὸ συνειδήσεως πονηρα—ς καὶ λελουσμένοι τὸ σῶ—μα ὕδατι καθαρω—; Philo, Spec. Laws 1.258, 261.

¹⁵ On this ι—ερός γάμος, cf. A. Robert, R. Tournay, Le Cantique des Cantiques, Paris, 1963, pp. 355ff.; E. des Places, La Religion grecque, Paris, 1969, p. 29, 88, 90; H. Graillot, “Hiéros gamos,” in DAGR, vol. 3, pp. 177–181; A. Klinz, in PW, Suppl. 6, 107–113; M. Launey, “L’Athlète Théogène et le ΙΕΡΟΣ ΓΑΜΟΣ d’Héraclès Thasien,” in RArch, 1941, 2, pp. 22–49; L. Cerfaux, J. Tondriau, Culte des souverains, pp. 119, 423; R. A. Batey, “Jewish Gnosticism and the ‘Hieros Gamos’ of Eph. V, 31–33,” in NTS, vol. 10, 1963, pp. 121–127; G. Freymuth, “Zum Hieros Gamos in den antiken Mysterien,” in MusHelv, 1964, pp. 86–95; J. G. Février, “A propos du hiéros gamos de Pyrgi,” in Journal Asiatique, 1965, pp. 11–14; Y. Grandjean, Arétalogie d’Isis, p. 57.

¹⁶ J. A. Robillard, “Le Symbolisme du mariage selon saint Paul,” in RSPT, 1932, pp. 243–247.

¹⁷ Cf. I.Perg., 264 (second century AD, republished in SEG IV, 681; LSAM, n. 14; cf. 18); I.Lind. 487.

¹⁸ Solon saw marriage as “a union for life of a man and a woman in order to have children” (Plutarch, Sol. 20.6; cf. 22.4). According to Lycurgus, one marries girls “only so that they may have children” (Num. 26.1–3); Ps.-Demosthenes, C. Neaera 122; Xenophon, Oec. 7.10–14; Philo, Rewards 139: “women whom they married legitimately in order to have legitimate children”; Josephus, War 2.161: the Essenes “marry not for pleasure but to procreate children.”

¹⁹ Aristophanes, Lys. 378: “If by chance you need to wash, I will give you a bath, myself . . . and a nuptial bath besides”; cf. Aristophanes, Pax 843ff.; Euripides, Phoen. 347: “Nor did Ismenus associate with your wedding by supplying a nuptial bath”; Aeschylus, PV 556: “The wedding song that I

sang around the bath and around the bed for your marriage”; Thucydides 2.15.5: “This water (of Callirhoe) is used for marriages and for other sacred acts”; Hippolytus, In Dan. 16.3. A. Médebielle (Epîtres de la captivité, Paris, 1938, p. 67) correctly cites Ezek 16:4, 9; cf. 36:25-27; Plutarch, Amat. nar. 772 b; R. Ginouvès (Balaneutiké, pp. 267ff.), the lexicographers, Eustathius, Suda, Photius, who mention this bath, practiced before the celebration of a marriage. Cf. M. Collignon, “Louthrophoros,” in DAGR, vol. 3, 1317; J. Leipoldt, Die urchristliche Taufe im Lichte der Religionsgeschichte, Leipzig, 1928; G. Wagner, Pagan Baptism and Pagan Mysteries, Edinburgh-London, 1967; Oepke, “λούω,” TDNT, vol. 4, pp. 298–300. In Israel, cf. b. shabb. 77b 27; ‘Abot R. Nat. 41 (Str-B, vol. 1, p. 506, c).

²⁰ Cf. Isa 55:10—“the rain will cause the earth to bring forth” (hiphil of yalad). P. Reymond, L’Eau, sa vie et sa signification dans l’Ancien Testament, Leiden, 1958, pp. 1–8, 241ff.

²¹ John 3:5. Cf. F. M. Braun, Jean le Théologien, vol. 3, Paris, 1966, pp. 85ff.; C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, pp. 61–102.

²² 2Cor 5:17; Rom 7:6; Gal 6:15; 1Pet 2:2; “The water makes entirely new the old person whom it has received” (inscription of a Constantinian baptistry, cited by P. T. Camelot, Spiritualité de baptême, Paris, 1960, p. 145).

²³ Cf. πίπτειν ε—ς γένεσιν (Porphyry, De antr. nymph. 13); Hymn to Mandoulis: “After being bathed in the holy water of immortality, you appeared as a child” (SB 4127, 14); cf. A. D. Nock, “A Vision of Mandulis Aion,” in HTR, 1934, pp. 53–104; A. J. Festugière, Hermès Trismégiste, vol. 1, pp. 49–50.

²⁴ Διὰ λουτροῦ παλιγγενεσίας καὶ ἀνακαινώσεως πνεύματος ἁγίου. A. J. Dey, Παλιγγενεσία, Münster, 1937; to the references given by C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, vol. 2, p. 653, add F. M. Braun, Jean le Théologien, pp. 154ff.; G. R. Beasley-Murray, Baptism in the New Testament, London, 1962, pp. 210, 223, 231; R. Le Déaut, Nuit Pascale, pp. 239–257; J. K. Parrat, “The Holy Spirit and Baptism,” in ExpT 82, 1971, p. 271. Cf. the myth of the restoration of the youth of Pelias, in Apollodorus, Bibl. 1.9.27: ποιήσει νέον; Diodorus Siculus 4.41–52 (P. J. Sijpesteijn, “The Rejuvenation of Pelias,” in ZPE, 1972, p. 109, col. II, 38).

λύκος

lykos, wolf

lykos, S 3074; TDNT 4.308–311; EDNT 2.362; MM 381; L&N 4.11, 88.121; BAGD 481

The biblical wolf (Hebrew ze'ab) is a predator, a ferocious beast, associated with the lion (Jer 5:6; Prov 28:15; Jos. Asen. 12.9–10), feared for its voraciousness.¹ It tears its prey to pieces: lykos harpax (Gen 49:27; Ezek 22:27). A common carnivore in Transjordan and more ferocious than the jackal, it terrorizes shepherds. It is described as “thirsty” (lykos dipson, Prov 28:15; the Hebrew has “bear,” dob), the wolf of the steppes (Jer 5:6), the wolf of the evening.²

The wolf has always been mentioned as attacking above all ewes or lambs. Between them no truce is possible,³ and the golden age, when all living creatures will be at peace, is described as a time when wolves and lambs will live and feed together.⁴ In a metaphorical sense, the wolf became a literary cliché, symbolizing the wicked exploiter of the weak (Prov 28:15), especially leaders, rulers, and judges who ruin their subjects, extort from them, or reduce them to servitude.⁵ This shows how fearsome a prospect the Lord set before his disciples: “I send you as sheep in the midst of wolves” (Matt 10:16; Luke 10:3). They are in danger of being devoured!

In principle, the flock is in the care of a shepherd who will defend them against wild beasts, but “the hireling . . . sees the wolf coming, leaves the sheep, and runs away—and the wolf ravages and scatters them (kai ho lykos harpazei auta kai skorpizei)—because he is a hireling and does not care for the sheep.”⁶ For “the wolves hunt down and catch the one that is deprived of protection” (Xenophon, Eq. Mag. 4.18), and the wage-earning servant is not interested in the flock because it does not belong to him. Just the opposite of the Good Shepherd, he sees to his own safety before that of the sheep.

False prophets, teachers of lies, present the most reassuring exteriors (en endymasi probaton), but in reality they are “ravening wolves” (lykoi harpages)⁷ who destroy or disturb the faith and life of the disciples. So St. Paul exhorts the Ephesian elders to be watchful: “I know that after I leave grievous wolves will enter in among you and will not spare the flock.”⁸ become like lions, cruel, brutal, savage . . .”; Marcus Aurelius 11.15.5: “Nothing is more hateful than the friendship of the wolf”; Plutarch, Dem. 23.5.

¹ SB 9125, 4: κατέφαγεν τί ὡς λύκος. It devours even corpses: when the door of a tomb was left open, certain corpses that were still in good condition were eaten by wolves (UPZ 187, 19 = P. Paris VI, 19; from 129 BC). Aristophanes, Lys. 629: “The Lacedaemonians, who are not to be trusted any more than a wolf with a gaping maw”; Epictetus 1.3.7: “It is because of this relation with the flesh that certain ones among us, inclining towards it, become like wolves, faithless, treacherous, pestilent; others

² Hab 1:8; Zeph 3:3 (ὄξύτερος); the Massoretes read ‘ereb, “evening”; but the Hebrew ‘arabâh, “steppe, desert,” would mean “Arabian wolf”; cf. Marcion, “that wolf of Pontus” (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 5.13.4).

³ Sir 13:17—“How could the wolf be the companion of the lamb?” When the Greek warriors threw themselves against the Trojans, “one would say that baneful wolves pounce on goats and lambs, catching them apart from the sheep, when the shepherd’s thoughtlessness has left them in the mountains, separated from the flock” (Homer, Il. 16.352–355); “Returning hate for hate, I shall rush upon the enemy like a wolf” (Pindar, Pyth. 2.84): “A war . . . that is undeclared and that admits of no truce: the war of the wolves against the lambs, of all wild beasts, in the sea and on land, against all humans; no mortal is in a position to put an end to it” (Philo, Rewards 87).

⁴ Isa 11:6; 65:25. Cf. Aristophanes, Pax 1976: “It does not please the blessed gods to end the cries of war until a wolf shall marry a ewe.”

⁵ Ezek 22:27; Hab 1:8; Zeph 3:3. J. Dupont (Discours de Milet, pp. 209ff.) cites Plautus, Pseud. 140: “One would rather leave wolves with the sheep than such guards with you”; Terence, Eun. 832: to entrust a young woman to an unworthy man is to “hand over the sheep to the wolf”; Ovid, Ars am. 2.363–364: “Fool, to entrust timid doves to a vulture, a well-filled sheepfold to the wolf of the mountains”; 3.8: “you open the fold to a fierce she-wolf”; cf. Met. 11.365–375; Cicero, Phil. 3.27: “O praeclarum custodem ovium, ut aiunt, lupum”; Dio Cassius 56.16: “You send to tend your flock neither dogs nor shepherds but wolves”; Themistius, Or. 1.9 d, addressing the emperor: “Do not allow the one whom you have appointed to tend the flock to escape the judgment he deserves if he proves to be a wolf rather than a shepherd”; cf. 4 Ezra 5:18—“in the hands of hateful wolves” (the Romans); 2Clem. 5.2–4.

⁶ John 10:12; cf. P.Mert. 24, 12: παρακαλω— σε, οὕτως αὐτω—ν ε—πιμέλου μὴ ὡς μισθωσίμων ἀλλὰ ὡς ι—διοκτήτων σου; Apollonius of Tyana 8.22: ἵνα μὴ ε—μπίπτωσι τῇ ποιμνῇ οἱ— λύκοι.

⁷ Matt 7:15; cf. Did. 16.3; Dio Chrysostom 14.2. G. Otranto, “Matteo VII, 15–16 a e gli ψευδοπροφήται nell’esegesi patristica,” in Vetera Christianorum, Bari, 1969, pp. 33–45; O. Böcher, “Wölfe in Schafspelzen:

Zum religionsgeschichtlichen Hintergrund von Matth. VII, 15,” in TZ, vol. 24, 1968, pp. 405–426.

⁸ Acts 20:29—λύκοι βαρει—ς. The adjective βαρύς, “heavy,” is used for a burden (Matt 23:4), hence “difficult to bear or remove” (of serious accusations, Acts 25:7; of overwhelming commandments, 1John 5:3; Philo, Spec. Laws 1.299), “tyrannical” (2Cor 10:10) and here “disastrous” or “cruel.” On the disturbances caused by false prophets in the Christian community, cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, pp. 278–285; E. Cothenet, “Prophétisme,” in DBSup, vol. 8, 1273ff.; O. Böcher, “Wölfe in Schafspelzen”; G. W. H. Lampe, “‘Grievous Wolves’ (Acts XX, 29),” in B. Lindars, S. S. Smalley, eds., Christ and Spirit in the New Testament (C. F. D. Moule Festschrift), Cambridge, 1973, pp. 253–268. Cf. at Qumran the “Teachers of Ephraim” (4QpNah 2.8) and the preacher of falsehood, A. M. Denis, Les Thèmes de connaissance dans le Document de Damas, Louvain, 1967, p. 106.

λυπέω, λύπη, λυπηρός

lypeo, to pain, make sad, grieve; lype, grief, distress, sorrow; lyperos, causing or marked by grief, pain

lypeo, S 3076; TDNT 4.313–322; EDNT 2.362–364; NIDNTT 2.419–420; MM 382; L&N 25.275; BDF §§196, 235(3); BAGD 481 | lype, S 3077; TDNT 4.313–322; EDNT 2.362–364; MM 382; L&N 25.272, 25.273, 25.285; BAGD 482 | lyperos, BAGD 482

Grief or displeasure (lype) can affect the soul (lypeo, “make sad, sadden”; in the middle, lypeomai, “be distressed, be sad”) with more or less force; but it is always the opposite of joy, elation, happiness.¹ It is used first of all for the physical suffering associated with childbirth (Gen 3:16, Hebrew ‘isabôn; cf. Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.200, 216–219) and of man’s painful toil (Gen 3:17; 5:29; Philo, Worse Attacks Better 121), both being part of the human condition in punishment for sin: “Short and painful is our life.”²

Since “pain is preceded by fear and followed by grief” (4Macc 1:23; cf. Philo, Worse Attacks Better 119), grief resides in the heart³ or in the soul (Bar 2:18; Sir 30:21; Matt 26:38); it is true torment (Sir 37:2), bitterness and dejection (Matt 26:37, erxato lypeisthai kai ademonein), accompanied by groanings (Isa 35:10; Ps 55:2; Wis 11:12), by tears and pangs of anguish (2Cor 2:3–4; Tob 3:1); makes everything mournful (Isa 1:5; Lam 1:22; Hebrew daway); saps one’s strength of body (Sir 38:18), of character (1Macc 6:4; Philo, Heir 270; Decalogue 144), of mind; and dries out the bones (Prov 15:13; 17:22). Sadness causes sleeplessness but can also cause drowsiness (Luke 22:45—koimomenous . . . apo tes lypes).

The sorrowing person lets himself go (Josephus, Ant. 8.356) and becomes ill (1Macc 6:8–9), may even die: “I am dying of deep grief in a foreign land” (6:13). Sarah, daughter of Raguel, “was so deeply grieved that she wanted to hang herself” (Tob 3:10). This is the kind of deep grief that Jesus calls “sorrowing unto death,”⁴ and St. Paul warns against letting a person “be overwhelmed by excessive grief” (me pos te perissotera lype katapothē ho toioutos, 2Cor 2:7). Such excessive sorrow⁵ can even lead a person to curse God (Isa 8:21).

The pagan Isidoros prayed to Isis to deliver him from all sorrow,⁶ and the Letter of Aristeeas asks “How can a person be free of all sorrow?”⁷ Ben Sirach prescribes: “Do not give your soul over to sorrow. . . . Remove grief far from you, for it has destroyed many, and there is no profit in it.”⁸ The wisdom writers denounce those who bring grief to others,⁹ especially the son who grieves his mother (Prov 10:1; Tob 4:3—me lypeses autēn; 10:13; cf. Bar 4:8) and the daughter who grieves her father.¹⁰ The NT is more subtle and recognizes that there is such a thing as virtuous grief:¹¹ that which is stirred by unfortunate events¹² or by the acceptance of servitude in conformity with the divine will.¹³ Peter is distressed that the Lord seems to doubt his loyalty (John 21:17, elypethē); the apostles are all sad at the announcement that Jesus will die (Matt 17:23; elypethesan sphodra) and at his leaving.¹⁴

While the apostle clearly renounces coming to Corinth en lype, since his visit could only bring grief to the community (2Cor 2:1; cf. Dio Chrysostom 30.9), he is not sorry that his severe letter brought sorrow to the recipients;¹⁵ for, he says, there are two kinds of sorrow: that which is “according to God” (to kata theon lypethenai, 2Cor 7:11), and which stirs to repentance (eis metanoian, verse 9; cf. Plutarch, De tranq. anim. 19; Desol.n. 3), fervor, zeal, and faithfulness;¹⁶ and a “worldly sorrow” that brings death;¹⁷ this would be the sorrow of the rich man who was attached to his goods and refused to follow Jesus (“he went away sorrowing”),¹⁸ of the Christian who gives alms unwillingly.¹⁹ It is also the displeasure of Herod when Salome asks him for the head of John the Baptist (Matt 14:9; cf. Dan 6:14).

There is another series of texts in which the meaning “grief, sorrow, distress” cannot be retained, and where we must substitute “irritation, indignation, disgust.” This is especially clear in the parable of the Unmerciful Servant, whose master had unconditionally annulled his enormous debt (ten million dollars!), but who refused to listen to the plea of one of his fellow debtors who owed him an insignificant sum and threw him into prison. His fellow workers, according to Matt 18:31, elypethesan sphodra—were outraged or shocked at such conduct.²⁰ This connotation of exasperation with lypeomai comes from the LXX, which sometimes links this verb with another denoting anger,²¹ sometimes gives it the meaning “irritation, exasperation,” translating the Hebrew verbs harah ²² and especially *qasap*²³—nuances that are known both in Greek and in the Koine.²⁴

This is certainly how we must interpret the lype of the Twelve when the master tells them that one of them will betray him (Matt 26:22; Mark 14:19); of course they were deeply grieved, but first and foremost they were indignant. Similarly, in the conflict between the strong (dynatoi) and weak (astheneis) at Rome over the issue of foods, St. Paul raises the point of brotherly love: “for if your brother is grieved on account of food” (ei gar dia bromo ho adelphos sou lypeitai, Rom 14:15). This is a euphemism. The brother is not envisioned as being saddened or even annoyed, but shocked, hurt.²⁵ Finally, “Do not grieve the Holy Spirit” (Eph 4:30) means do not offend him.²⁶

¹ Sir 12:9; Prov 14:10, 13; Isa 35:10; 51:11; John 16:20-22: the disciples are overwhelmed by sorrow, but their λύπη—sorrow at the death of Jesus—will change into joy because of Christ’s resurrection (20:10; cf. P.Oxy. 1874, 21: the Lord will change sorrow into joy), like the woman who experiences pain when she is giving birth but rejoices that she has brought a person into the world. 2Cor 2:2-3; 6:10—despite all indications that the apostles are afflicted, they are actually joyful: ὡς λυπούμενοι, ἀεὶ δὲ χαίροντες; 7:9; 9:7; Heb 12:11—in the raising of children, correction always causes grief (Plutarch, De sera 3) and is not felt to be a cause for rejoicing; 1Pet 1:6—even in their present afflictions (λυπηθέντες), Christians rejoice (ἀγαλλία—σθε), thanks to the certainty of their salvation. This paradox of joy in the midst of painful trials was taught by Jesus (Matt 5:12), lived by Jesus (John 15:11) and his apostles (Acts 5:41), taught to converts (Rom 5:3-4; 1Pet 4:13), preached to all believers (Rom 8:18; 2Cor 4:17; 6:10; 7:4; Jas 1:2; W. Nauck, “Freude im Leiden,” in ZNW, 1955, pp. 68–80). Cf. Aristotle, Rh. 1.2.1356a15; Eth. Nic. 10.1–5 (ἡδονή is a good, λύπη is a κακόν); Xenophon, Hell. 7.1.32; Philo, Worse Attacks Better 124, 140; Change of Names 163, 167; Abraham 22: “The multitude . . . joyful about that which should cause them to weep, grieving (λυπούμενος) over that which should bring joy”; 151: the soul vacillates and changes, from sorrow (λύπη) to joy (χαρά), to fear, to anger . . . ; To Gaius 15: “as they left behind the life of luxury, their faces darkened . . . with a sorrow (λύπη) equal to the joy (χαρά) that had preceded it”; Jos. Asen. 9.1: Aseneth was gripped by joy, sorrow, and great fright.” T. Jud. 25.4: οἱ—ε—ν λύπη τελευτήσαντες ἀναστήσονται ε—ν χαρᾷ; IGLS 343, 2: “joy of enemies, grief of children” (other references in Bultmann, “λύπη,” in TDNT, vol. 4, pp. 313–314). To remedy sorrow, the sages recommend consolation or encouragement (Sir 38:17; Wis 8:9), the Lord’s favor (Tob 7:17), even intoxicating drinks (Prov 31:6; Philo, Dreams 2.165).

² Wis 2:1—ὀλίγος ε—στὶ καὶ λυπηρὸς ὁ βίος ἡμῶ—ν; Jer 15:18—“Why is my sorrow (Hebrew ke’eb) endless and my wound incurable?”; Jacob: “You will bring down my gray hairs in sorrow to Sheol” (Gen 42:3; cf. 44:29, 31; Tob 3:10; Isa 50:11: ε—ν λύπη κοιμηθήσεσθε; Enoch 102.5–7); Philo, Abraham 202: “The human race is subject to sorrow and fear”; 204: “Let no one imagine that joy descends unmixed from heaven to earth, free of admixtures of sorrow”; 207; Rewards 71; Virtues 200: sorrows and fears are divine punishments; Pss. Sol. 4.17.

³ Deut 15:10; Isa 1:5; Prov 15:13; Sir 26:28; 48:18, 20; Lam 1:22; John 16:6; Rom 9:2—“I have great sadness and unceasing sorrow in my heart.”

⁴ Matt 26:38; cf. Jonah 4:9; Sir 37:2; cf. UPZ 18, 13: ἀποθνήσκει ε—κει—, ὑπὸ τῆς λύπης; Josephus, Ant. 6.337: Saul, rendered speechless by sorrow, ἄφωνος ὑπὸ λύπης; Jos. Asen. 29.9: “Pharaoh will weep for his first-born son and make himself sick with grief.”

⁵ Λύπη μεγάλη, λυπει—σθαι σφόδρα, Rom 9:2; Gen 34:7; Tob 3:6; 9:4; Jonah 4:1; Dan 6:15; 1Macc 10:68; 14:16; T. Abr. A 7; T. Job 7.8; 34.5; Jos. Asen. 8.8: “When Aseneth heard Joseph’s words, she was overcome with grief and began to sob . . . and her eyes filled with tears”; 24.1: Pharaoh’s son was downcast and deeply grieved (ε—βαρει—το . . . καὶ ε—λυπει—το σφόδρα) because of Aseneth, suffered (ἔπασχε κακῶ—ς; cf. 24.11–12). In the fourth century, the physician Eudaimon writes to his mother and his brothers to ask for news: “Many fellow-citizens have returned with no letter (from you) and we are very disturbed (ε—λυπήθημεν) . . . you have not consoled us (παρηγορι—τε) by reassuring us of your health” (P.Fouad 80, 4); in the second century, Tabetheus writes to his brother Tiberianos: “I am very upset” (ε—λοιπήθην πολλά, P.Mich. 473, 9; line 26: “I am tortured by the pain that he caused me,” ε—θλίβην λυπηθεὶς ὑπὸ αὐτόν); “I am deeply pained by what is happening to Ptolemaios” (P.Tebt. 760, 22; third century). Soëris writes to his sister Aline: “I hear that you are not sick, which had made me very sad” (P.Brem. 64, 7). Obviously there are lesser griefs: an annoyance (1Macc 10:22), a vexation (10:68), the emotion caused by the announcement at Sparta and Rome of the death of Jonathan (14:16), cares (Wis 8:9). This is the most common meaning in the letters among the papyri: Apollonius is asked to pay off a debt: “Otherwise, we shall be in a predicament” (P.Tebt. 767, 13; second century BC; cf. UPZ 113, 13); Isidoros sends his instructions to Chenanoubis: “See that you do not act otherwise or cause us trouble” (P.Yale 78, 11; second century AD); “Do not be disturbed about what has happened to the village” (P.Copenhagen 10, 4; republished in SB 9423); “Do not be troubled about that” (P.Michael. 38, 9); “You cannot grieve about this sojourn at Coptos” (P.Mich. 214, 10). Apollonios to his brother Terentianos, a soldier: “Do not worry about your children; they are in good health.... Do not be concerned about us, and take care of yourself” (ibid. 464, 8 and 16). Apollonios to his brother Sempronios: “When I went to Rome I learned that you you had left before my arrival, and I was very sorry not to see you” (ibid. 487, 5); “Alexander was annoyed at not finding you here” (ibid. 497, 15); μὴ λυποῦ περὶ τῆς μητρός, ἤδη γὰρ κομψω—ς ἔχι (P.Athen. 60, 8); “If it had been a cloak, I would not have worried about it” (P.Tebt. 278, 29). Menas writes to two comites briefly, so as not to bother them (P.Oxy. 1841, 1). “Do not be troubled” (P.Ross.Georg. III, 3, 17; cf. SB 6263, 22; 9249, 5; UPZ 146, 38); “I am troubled about this” (P.Ross.Georg. III, 15, 2); “I see that you love your friend; I can’t be distressed about it” (P.Oxy. 1865, 4). “What is it about me that displeases you?” (λυπηρόν, Menander, Mis., in P.Oxy. 2656, 309; cf. 2860, 14).

⁶ Λύπης μὴ ἀνάπαυσον ἀπάσης (SB 8138, 36 = SEG VIII, 548; cf. V. F. Vanderlip, Four Greek Hymns, p. 18).

⁷ Ep. Arist. 232; cf. 268: “What should we grieve about? —The misfortunes of our friends. . . . For those who have died and are therefore freed from all evils reason admits no sorrow; but it is for themselves and their own interests that all people grieve.” This sentiment agrees with a tomb inscription that is common for Jews, pagans, and Christians alike: “Do not grieve; no one is immortal” (SB 6133, 10; 6200, 1; 6222, 34; 7305, 3; 10059, 10; 10067, 711; 10483, 3). There are such only in Paradise, where there will be no ὀδύνη, no λύπη, no στεναγμός, ibid. 7428, 12; 7429, 8; 7430, 9; 7906, 8; 8235, 10; 8763, 9; P.Ness. 96, 6; Enoch 25.6.

⁸ Sir 30:21, 23; 38:20. Obviously, death is the greatest cause of grief (1Thess 4:13), but Ben Sirach says to moderate expressions of sorrow at funerals (30:5; 38:17). A father is not grieved at the death of a son whom he has raised well (Sir 30:5; cf. 4Macc 16:12—the mother of the Maccabees “was not sad when her sons died”; but ματέρι πένθος ἔφυς, λύπη πατρί, in CIRB 146, 8). Letters of consolation say how much the writer shares in the grief of the bereaved: ε—λυπήθην ἀκούσας . . . ὅτι παιδίον ε—τελεύτησε (SB 8090, 5); πολὺ ε—ληπίθιν (P.Oxy. 1874, 9; cf. 115, 3); P.Lund II, 3, 5; P.Ross.Georg. III, 2, 4.

⁹ Sir 36:20—“The perverse heart brings grief” (cf. J. Strugnell, “Of Cabbages and Kings’ or Queens: Notes on Ben Sira XXXVI, 19–21,” in J. M. Efrid, Studies in Honor of W. F. Stinespring, Durham, 1972, pp. 204–209); 4:2—“Do not grieve a person who is hungry”; 18:15; Prov 10:10—“The one who winks (the good-for-nothing) causes grief”; 15:1. Cf. T. Benj. 6.3: ὁ ἀγαθὸς ἀνὴρ . . . οὐ λυπεῖ— τὸν πλησίον.

¹⁰ Sir 22:4; cf. 3:12; Tob 9:4—“If I delay too long, my father will be greatly distressed”; 10:3, 13; Ep. Arist. 238: “How can one give one’s father and mother all the thanks that they deserve? —By not causing them the least bit of grief.” Conversely: “Pamper a child, and he will terrify you. Play with him, and he will cause you grief” (Sir 30:9).

¹¹ The OT characterizes remorse as a λύπη ἁμαρτιω—ν (Sir 14:1; cf. Isa 32:11; Bar 4:33), an expression retained by theologians: “sin, by its very nature, begets sorrow in the sinner” (St. Thomas Aquinas, I-II, q. 87, a. 2; cf. q. 35–36; 39, a. 1). Cf. Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.211; Spec. Laws 1.314; Rewards 170. For the Stoics, grief is the punishment for disobedience to divine laws (Epictetus 3.11.2–3; 3.24.43; 4.4.32).

¹² In healing Epaphroditus, God spared Paul sorrow upon sorrow, ἵνα μὴ λύπην ε—πὶ λύπην σχω— (Phil 2:27; cf. SB 7354, 7: ε—ποίησα δύο ἡμέρας λυπούμενος; second century AD).

¹³ 1Pet 2:19—It is noble for Christian slaves to endure troubles that are inflicted unjustly (ὑποφέρει τις λύπης πάσχων ἀδίκως). Cf. P.Ryl. 27, 211: through divination a slave learns that he “will become a master and be freed from all sorrow” (δεσποτεῦσαι καὶ πάσης λύπης ἀπαλλαγῆναι); P.Berl.Zill. 14, 15.

¹⁴ John 16:6. The sorrow of separation from a dear friend (cf. Sir 37:2) is often mentioned in the epistolary papyri: “Do not be grieved at their leaving” (μὴ λυπει—σθε ε—πὶ τοι—ς χωρισθει—σι, P.Grenf. II, 36, 9; from 95 BC); “Since you left us we have been sad” (P.Brem. 58, 6). Isaios to his father: “the suddenness of your departure grieved me” (P.Gron. 17, 5; third-fourth century); “Your absence cause me great sorrow” (μάλιστα ε—λύπησέν με ἢ σὴ ἀπουσία, PSI 895, 3).

¹⁵ 2Cor 7:8. Bad news brings grief: “As I had just gone to bed, annoyed and upset by the letter that I had received” (Josephus, Life 208). “Finally I received the letter from Arabas; I read it and was grieved” (ἀνέγνων καὶ ε—λυπήθην, BGU 1079, 9; from AD 41); 1879, 10; cf. P.Fouad 86, 8: “Even if we do not write to let you know how deeply grieved we were by your being hindered from coming here” (sixth century).

¹⁶ There is also sorrow according to God in grieving over iniquity (πολλὴ δὲ λύπη μοί ε—στι, τέκνα μου, διὰ τὰς ἀσελγείας καὶ γοητείας ἅς ποιήσετε εἰ—ς τὸ βασίλειον, T. Jud. 23.1), or in sharing in a neighbor’s sorrow: ὡς λελυπημένον εἰ—ς ε—μέ (P.Ryl. 712, 5, T. Abr. B 12); in AD 107, Apollinarios writes to his brother Tasoucharion: “If you are grieved, I am distressed” (ε—άν γὰρ ὑμι—ς λυπησθε ε—γὼ ἀδημονω—, P.Mich. 465, 25;

cf. line 30: “I insist that you must not cause any grief for my Lady Julia”; C. Préaux, “Une source nouvelle sur l’annexion de l’Arabie par Trajan,” in Phoibos, vol. 5, Mélanges J. Hombert, Brussels, 1950–51, pp. 123–139). Tobias, when he has become blind: “All my brothers grieve over me” (Tob 2:10; cf. 7:7; 10:6).

¹⁷ 2Cor 7:10—ἡ δὲ τοῦ κόσμου λύπη; i.e., distress or melancholy, discouragement that breaks the spirit, and which at worst chafes at reproach or punishment and becomes more obdurate in evil; whereas sorrow according to God admits its faults and tries to correct them—a decided benefit!

¹⁸ Matt 19:22; Mark 10:22—ἀπῆλθεν λυπούμενος; Luke 18:23—περίλυπος ε—γενήθη (cf. Isa 57:17; Dan 2:12). On this episode, cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 1, pp. 32–38; J. de Waard, A Comparative Study of the Old Testament Text in the Dead Sea Scrolls and in the New Testament, Leiden, 1965, p. 34; A. F. J. Klijn, “The Question of the Rich Young Man,” in Placita Pleiadia (Festschrift G. Sevenster), pp. 149ff.; S. Légasse, L’Appel du riche, Paris, 1966, pp. 184–226.

¹⁹ 2Cor 9:7—Having the option of choosing freely (προήρηται) how much to contribute to the collection, the Christian should give μὴ ε—κ λύπης ἢ ε—ξ ἀνάγκης, “for God loves a cheerful giver” who does not feel weighed down by the sacrifice he is making (cf. Deut 15:10; C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 1, pp. 227ff.). Collections were not popular, cf. LSCG, pp. 219, 243.

²⁰ On this parable, cf. C. Spicq, Dieu et l’homme, pp. 54–61; R. Sugranyes de Franch, Etudes sur le droit palestinien à l’époque évangélique, Fribourg, 1946; W. Thompson, Matthew’s Advice to a Divided Community, Mt. XVII, 22–XVIII, 35, Rome, 1970, pp. 203–237; J. Duncan M. Derrett, “The Parable of the Unmerciful Servant,” in RIDA, 1965, pp. 3–19 (reprinted in Law in the NT, pp. 32–47); J. Dupont, Béatitudes, vol. 3, pp. 620ff.

²¹ Gen 45:5, Joseph addressing his brothers: “Now do not grieve and let there be no anger in your eyes”; Esth 1:12—“The king was very annoyed and his anger heated up”; Sir 26:28—“At two things my heart is grieved, and at three anger arises within me”; Jonah 4:1—“Jonah was greatly distressed and became angry”; 4:4—“Do you dwell to be grieved?”; 4:9; Prov 15:1; cf. Mark 3:5—περιβλεψάμενος αὐτοὺς μετ’ὀργῆς, συλλυπούμενος. . . .

²² Burn with anger, be irritated; cf. Gen 4:5 (Cain); 34:7—“They were greatly indignant because an outrage had been committed in Israel”; Neh 5:6—“I was very irritated when I heard their complaints and these words.”

²³ Become angry, be indignant; cf. 1Sam 29:4—“the lords of the Philistines were angry at David”; 2Kgs 13:19—“the man of God (Elisha) was angry at him”; Esth 2:21—“two of the king’s eunuchs, keepers of the door, were angry and sought to assassinate King Ahasuerus”; Isa 8:21—“when they are hungry, they will become exasperated”; 57:17; cf. 1Macc 10:68.

²⁴ Cf. indignation at a scandal (Demosthenes, C. Con. 54.4; P.Col.Zen. I, 6, 5); be disgusted: λυπει— τὴν ἀκοὴν τῶ— κόρω (Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Pomp. 3).

²⁵ Cf. the nuance “to harm, wrong” in Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Isoc. 2; C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 2, pp. 186–194.

²⁶ For the formulation, cf. 2Sam 13:21—“David did not grieve the spirit of his son Amnon, for he loved him.”

λύτρον, λυτρόω, λύτρωσις, ἀπολύτρωσις, ἀντίλυτρον

lytron, ransom; lytroo, to set free, redeem, deliver; lytrosis, apolytrosis, redemption, liberation, deliverance; antilytron, ransom

lytron, S 3083; TDNT 4.328–335, 340–349; EDNT 2.364–366; NIDNTT 3.189–192, 194–197; MM 382–383; L&N 37.130; BAGD 482 | lytroo, S 3084; TDNT 4.328–335; EDNT 2.366; NIDNTT 3.189–190, 192; MM 383; L&N 37.128; BDF §180; BAGD 482–483 | lytrosis, S 3085; TDNT 4.328–335, 351; EDNT 2.366; NIDNTT 2.189–190, 193, 198–199; MM 383; L&N 37.128; BAGD 483 | apolytrosis, S 629; TDNT 4.328–335, 351–356; EDNT 1.138–140; NIDNTT 3.189–190, 193, 199–200; L&N 37.128; BAGD 96 | antilytron, S 487; TDNT 4.328–335; EDNT 2.366; NIDNTT 3.189, 197; L&N 37.130; BAGD 75; ND 2.90, 3.72

We have to remember that these terms derive, directly or indirectly, from the verb lyo, “loose, destroy, dissolve,” because they almost always refer to an emancipation, a liberation.

I. — In the LXX (ninety times), the verb lytroo usually has God as its subject and corresponds to the Hebrew ga'al, “set free” (in the subject capacity as go'el);¹ or to padâh, “redeem, deliver, save”; or to paraq, “pull away” (from danger). God is the liberator, the go'el of his people: “I will deliver you from servitude (in Egypt). I will redeem you with outstretched arm.”² The issue is not the means, only the fact: deliverance from slavery, that of a foreign yoke. This is exactly the sense in which St. Luke understands lytrosis: “The Lord, the God of Israel, has come and he has carried out the deliverance of his people (from their enemies)” (Luke 1:68;

cf. Ps111:9; Mic 4:10); “Those who were awaiting Jerusalem’s deliverance” (Luke 24:38); the Emmaus disciples thought that Jesus “would deliver Israel” (lytroomai, Luke 24:21); the signs presaging the ruin of Jerusalem will allow the persecuted disciples to lift up their heads “because your deliverance draws near” (Luke 21:28, engizei he apolytrosis hymon).

If lytroot is ordinarily used for the liberation of a prisoner or a slave, it is also used for deliverance from difficulties, cares, some constraint, danger: “Yahweh has delivered my soul from all distress” (2Sam 4:9, Hebrew padah; 1Kgs 1:29); “awaiting the liberation of our body” (Rom 8:23, apolytrosis; cf. Eph 1:14; 4:30). Martyrs do not accept deliverance (ten apolytrosin) at the price of recantation, because they are counting on a better resurrection (Heb 11:35). Hence, lytroot is synonymous with sozo in its secular sense: “preserve safe and sound, spare”;³ this leads to its psychological and religious usages: “He is the one who will deliver Israel from all its sins.”⁴ In none of the texts hitherto cited is there any idea of providing compensation or a sum of money to “purchase” freedom.⁵ It is even said, “You were sold for free; you will be redeemed without money.”⁶

II. — In contrast, in the sphere of human relations, it is possible to “redeem” a field, a house, even a person who has become another’s property: “When your brother is in difficulty and sells his property, then his closest redeemer shall come and shall redeem (Hebrew ga’al) the thing sold by his brother” (Lev 25:25). If a brother has sold himself to a resident alien, “after he has been sold, there remains for him a right of redemption; one of his brothers shall redeem him.”⁷ This meaning of lytroot (recuperating one’s property by paying off its price) occurs constantly in the papyri: “You shall give to my friend Serapion a hundred drachmas and you shall recover my garments” (lytrosasa mou to himatia).⁸ Stratonikos writes to his wife, “A sign when I told you to redeem the new tunic (semeion hote eipa soi lytrosai ton kainon chitona) and give them the receipt that is in the nook (thyris) of the vestibule” (SB 7574, 3; cf. 9834 a 9). “The aforementioned mortgage shall remain valid and the borrower shall not be free (lytrosontai) until he has first paid the above-named sum with interest” (P.Mich. 333, 25; from AD 52; cf. P.Erl. 60, 9). A father, Cyrinus, “paid fifty solidi to deliver his son” (P.Ness. 56, 8). This is the meaning evoked by primitive catechesis in referring to salvation as redemption: Jesus Christ “gave himself for us in order to free us from all iniquity” (hina lytrosetai hemas apo pases anomias);⁹ “It is not with corruptible goods, with silver or gold, that you have been redeemed from the foolish way of life that you inherited from your fathers, but with precious blood” (1Pet 1:18; cf. Isa 52:3).

III. — Neither St. Paul nor St. Peter originated this metaphor for salvation (redemption); it comes from the Lord himself: “The Son of Man came . . . to give his life as a ransom for the many” (dounai ten psychen autou lytron anti pollon).¹⁰ Salvation is a liberation. The death of the just is a ransom acceptable to God.¹¹ Humans, being slaves of darkness and sin (Rom 6:17, 20; Col 1:13) were incapable of liberating themselves (Matt 16:26), and Christ gave his life as the price for their emancipation.¹² This meaning of lytron —price of deliverance (of a slave or prisoner), ransom— is the meaning in the LXX,¹³ and the disciples understood it spontaneously, since emancipation from servitude or captivity upon the payment of ransom was so common in the first century.

For the liberation of a slave in 167 BC (P.Hamb. 96, 16 and 21); in AD 86, P.Oxy. 48, 6 (epi lytrois); in 88 for six drachmas (2843, 19: lytron argyriou); in the year 100 (49, 8; 349, 6; 722, 30, 40); in the second century (Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 23, 7; 24, 6–7; P.Stras. 238, 21–22; SB 6294, 10); in the third century a manumissio inter amicos: “I free Helen, a slave born in my house, and I receive for her ransom two thousand two hundred Augustan drachmas.”¹⁴ In place of the lytra (the plural is the more common form), there is also the expression timas argyriou (SEG XVI, 355–360), which evokes the verbs of purchasing agorazo (1Cor 6:20; 7:23; 2Pet 2:1; Rev 5:9; 14:3–4) and exagorazo (Gal 3:13; 4:5), emphasizing the payment by Christ for the disciples whose Master and Lord he has become. If a slave did not have enough money to free himself, his friends got up a subscription; thus the Jewish community of Oxyrhynchus paid fourteen talents of silver to free a mother and her two children (metaxy philon eleutherosamen, P.Oxy. 1265, 8–9 = C.Pap.Jud. 473).

We are just as well informed concerning the liberation of prisoners of war. Often in antiquity wars were waged to acquire laborers, and the armies were followed by slave merchants.¹⁵ The axiom occurs constantly: “The one who is taken in war belongs to the conqueror” (Aristotle, Pol. 1.6.1.1255a6–7); the law of war transformed prisoners into slaves (Heliodorus, Aeth. 8.3.8; cf. 9.23.5; Philo, Moses 1.142). The prisoner, who was like captured booty (Plato, Resp. 5.468 a–b), took on an exchange value and would not be freed except for ransom.¹⁶ “According to the law, one who was ransomed from enemies became the property of the one who freed him and was not released except by ransom.”¹⁷ Here again, generous souls intervened. Thus Philopoemen spent the income from his expeditions to ransom captives (lyseis aichmaloton, Plutarch, Phil. 4.5; cf. Arat. 11.2, lytrosin aichmaloton); and a slave Antiochus was consecrated to Pythian Apollo “after he paid their ransom (that of his masters, who were captives abroad) to redeem them from the enemy” (apeilaphotes par’ autou lytra ek polemion).¹⁸

IV. — These sociological facts are illuminating, especially in that they show that the one freed is the property of the one who has paid the ransom, but the metaphor must not be reified. Philo often gives lytron a spiritual meaning: “Firstfruits and ceremonies constitute the ransom of our soul, because they deliver it from brutal masters and return it to freedom.”¹⁹ In an inventory of third-century BC offerings, “(someone) dedicated . . . another small vial on the profit from ransoms” (allo phialon to apo ton lytron, I.Did. 428, 9). In an inscription at Koula, lytron means “presents this ransom.”²⁰ It can also be the payment of a debt to the deity (Lucian, Dial.D. 4.2). In this sense, a human sacrifice can be offered to deliver a people: “It was the custom of the ancients, in cases of grave danger, that the leaders of the city or of the people, in order to avert the destruction of everyone, would hand over the most beloved of their children to be sacrificed as a ransom to the avenging gods” (lytron tois timorais daimosin).²¹ This is the way in which the blood of Jesus had expiatory value. The “price” paid was the “precious” blood (1Pet 1:19, timo haimati).

This “redemption/deliverance” by means of ransom is in Heb 9:12 called “an eternal redemption” (aionian lytrosin),²² that is, forever valid.²³ Elsewhere what is at issue is the “remission of sins” (Eph 1:7; Col 1:14; cf. Rom 8:2), of “transgressions of the time of the first covenant” (Heb 9:15), linked with righteousness and sanctification (1Cor 1:30; Rom 3:24), always referred to using the compound form apolytrolos.²⁴ This term thus becomes almost synonymous with salvation. When the Holy Spirit is its author, it is the definitive consummation of the kingdom of glory (Eph 1:14; 4:30), but it is always “the redemption that is in Christ Jesus” (Rom 3:24), whereby the redeemed belong to God.²⁵

¹ As a legal term, the Hebrew ga'al refers to the power of the closest relative (the go'el) with respect to a member of his family whose property (Lev 25:25-28; Jer 32:7; Ruth 2:20; 4:4) or person have come into the possession of a stranger or whose blood has been shed (Num 35:12, 19, 21, 24ff.; Deut 19:6, 12; Josh 20:3, 5, 9; 2Sam 14:11; 1Kgs 16:11). It is the go'el 's responsibility to “redeem” this property or this person. He must marry the deceased's widow if the family name is in danger of extinction (Deut 25:5-10; Ruth 3:9-13; 4:6); but if there is a violent death, he cannot accept “reparation” (Hebrew koper; Num 35:31ff.). A. R. Johnson, “The Primary Meaning of lag,” in VTSup I, 1953, pp. 67–79; D. Daube, The New Testament and Rabbinic Judaism, London, 1956, pp. 268–284; J. L. Cunchillos, “Rachat,” in DBSup, vol. 10, col. 1045–1054.

² Exod 6:6; 16:13—“This people that you have redeemed” (= delivered); Deut 7:8—“Yahweh brought you out with a strong hand and freed you from the house of bondage”; 9:26; 13:6; 15:15; 21:8; Isa 43:1—“I have redeemed you . . . you are mine”; 44:6, 24; 47:4. Prov 23:11—“Their avenger (ὁ . . . λυτρούμενος αὐτούς = go'el) is mighty; he will overcome”; Jer 50:34.

³ Ps 7:2—“Yahweh, save me from all my persecutors; deliver me”; 25:22; 26:11; 31:5; 34:22; 44:26; 59:1; 106:10; Sir 51:2; Dan 6:28; 1Macc 4:11. Philo comments on Exod 13:13—“The word ‘redeem’ presupposes the following interpretation: freeing the soul from a preoccupation that has no results, no end” (Sacr. Abel and Cain 114). M. Holleaux (Etudes d'épigraphie, vol. 1, p. 375) noted the equivalency of λυτρόω, σώζω, ἀνασώζω (likewise L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 11–12, Paris, 1960, p. 136, n. 1); cf. διασώζω (I.Rhamn. XV, 20: livestock left in a secure place for safekeeping); συνδιασώζω (Dittenberger, Syl. 341, 21). Cf. D. Hill, Greek Words and Hebrew Meanings, pp. 49, 70ff.

⁴ Ps 130:8; cf. λυτρωτής, Ps 19:14—“Yahweh, my help and my Redeemer”; 78:35—“They remembered that Elohim . . . the Most High God is their Redeemer” (Hebrew go'el); Acts 7:35—God sent Moses “as leader and liberator.”

⁵ Λυτρόω, deliver by paying ransom, cf. IG II2, 283, 8; 399, 16; 1130; IV, 750, 25; 756, 15–16; XII, 3, 328, 11; XII, 5, 36 (= Dittenberger, Syl. 520); 284 B; Dittenberger, Syl. 604, 5. In the fourth century BC, a decree at Athens honors Eurylochos of Kydonia who “ransomed (λυτρωσάμενος) many Athenians and sent them back from Crete to their country” (ISE, n. 2). Cf. P. Brulé, La Piraterie crétoise hellénistique, Paris, 1978, pp. 59ff.

⁶ Isa 52:3; cf. Ps 49:7—“No rich person can redeem his brother or pay his ransom to God; the redemption of his life is too costly.”

⁷ Lev 25:48–49, 30, 33; 27:13—“If the one making the offering wishes to redeem the animal presented to the priest, one fifth is added to your estimate”; 27:19, 20, 15: a part of a field or an unclean animal is redeemed according to you estimate plus a fifth; Philo, Spec. Laws 2.116: “Houses in fields are always redeemable.”

⁸ P.Oxy. 530, 14 (second century); 114, 2: “Now take care to recover my things from Serapion” (νῦν μελησάτω σοι λυτρώσασθαι τὰ ε—μὰ παρὰ Σαραπίωνα, second-third century); 936, 19: “The cloak that I have not recovered” (third century); P.Eleph. 19, 9; UPZ 19, 18.

⁹ Titus 2:14. Cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, pp. 828–849; L. Morris, The Apostolic Preaching of the Cross, London, 1955, pp. 35ff. S. Lyonnet, L. Sabourin, Sin, Redemption, and Sacrifice, Rome, 1970, pp. 79–103.

¹⁰ Matt 20:28; Mark 10:45 (with the commentaries of M. J. Lagrange, on this verse, and A. Médebielle, “La Vie donnée en rançon,” in Bib, 1923, pp. 3–40); cf. 1Tim 2:6—“There is only one God, and one Mediator between God and humans, the human Jesus Christ, who gave himself as a ransom for all” (ὁ δοὺς ε—αυτὸν ἀντίλυτρον ὑπὲρ πάντων). The compound ἀντίλυτρον has exactly the same meaning as the simple λύτρον and corresponds to λύτρον ἀντί in the Synoptics (cf. Josephus, Ant. 14.107: the priest Eleazar offered Crassus a gold bar, hoping that he would accept it instead of all the other things that he could take, λύτρον ἀντὶ πάντων ἔδωκεν). It is unknown in the papyri until the eighth century. Aristotle uses the verb ἀντιλυτρόω with regard to the precedence of obligations born of friendship: “by unanimous consent one must ransom one’s father rather than oneself . . . one must pay his debt” (Eth. Nic. 9.2.1164b35).

¹¹ Cf. Isa 53. C. K. Barrett refuses this dependence relative to the Suffering Servant (“The Background of Mark 10:45,” in A. J. B. Higgins, New Testament Essays, Manchester, 1959, pp. 1–18). In any event, the rabbis considered the death could be an act of expiation for oneself and for others (kapparah, cf. m. Sanh. 6.2; 2Macc 7:37ff.; 4Macc 17:22; Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 121: “the wise man is the ransom of the wicked”; cf. 126, 128. M. J. Lagrange, Le Messianisme chez les Juifs, Paris, 1909, pp. 236ff.).

¹² This is not a pure substitution; this cannot be valid except as a function of solidarity of “the man Christ Jesus” (1Tim 2:6) with his brothers (Heb 2:11); cf. L. Sabourin, Rédemption sacrificielle, Paris, 1961, pp. 147, 247, 325, and passim.

¹³ Exod 21:30—“He shall pay the ransom of his life” (Hebrew koper); 30:12; Lev 19:20—“the slave . . . has not been freed” (pidyôn); 25:24—“You shall grant the right of redemption (Hebrew geullâh) to the land, because the land is Yahweh’s”; ransom of the firstborn, Num 3:46, 48, 49, 51; 18:15 (padâh); 35:31—“You shall not accept ransom (koper) for the life of a murderer who is liable to death, but he shall be put to death”; Isa 45:13—“He will send back our exiles for no payment and no recompense”; Prov 6:35—indemnity.

¹⁴ Ἑλληνην δούλην μου οἱ—κογενῆ ἠλευθέρωσα καὶ ἔσχον ὑπὲρ λύτρων αὐτῆς δραχμὰς σεβαστὰς δισκειλίας διακοσίας, Chrest.Mitt., n. 362, 19; P.Oxy. 3117, 32. On Mark 10:45, M. J. Lagrange cites the first edition of Dittenberger, Syl. 863 (not reprinted in the third edition): Ammia was redeemed by her freedwoman, who paid the λύτρα. Other cases cited by C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, pp. 836ff. Cf. M. Foucart, Mémoire sur l’affranchissement des esclaves, Paris, 1867; A. Calderini, La manomissione e la condizione dei liberti in Grecia, Milan, 1908, pp. 210–216. Λύτρα are also the price paid to free land sold as security; once “liberated,” this land reverted to its original owner (ἀπέχειν τὴν λύτρα τῆς σημαινομένης ἀρουραν μίαν, BGU 1260, 12). Harkonnesis “declares that he has received from Nahomsesis as ransom money (εἰ—ς λύτρα) for the fourth part of the grain field . . .” (Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIX, 7, A4 and B 4); SB 5865, 4; P.Turner 19, 7.

¹⁵ 1Macc 3:41; cf. ἀνδραποδιστής (1Tim 1:10), ἀνδραποδοκάπηλος (Lucian, Ind. 24), ἀνδραπόδων κάπηλος (Philostratus, VA 8.7.161; cf. Suetonius, Aug. 29); cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, pp. 834ff.; P. Ducrey, Le Traitement des prisonniers, pp. 238–246. Cato “especially bought prisoners of war when they were still little so that they could be raised and trained like young dogs or athletes” (Plutarch, Cat. 21.1).

¹⁶ Homer, Il. 11.104–112; cf. 6.46–48; 10.380; 11.131; Demosthenes, Embassy 19.166, 169; Aeschines, Fals. Leg. 2.100; Diodorus Siculus 9.13.1; 10.24.3; 17.54.1; 19.73.10; Arrian, Anab. 2.25.1; Philo, Spec. Laws 2.122; 3.150; Joseph 193; Flacc. 60; Josephus, Ant. 12.33, 46; 14.107, 371; War 1.274, 384; Life 419. On these literary texts, cf. Lammert, “λύτρον,” in PW, XIV, 1, col. 73–76. Darius asked Alexander to accept ten thousand talents as ransom for captives (Plutarch, Alex. 29.7; cf. Flam. 13.6–8; Fab. 7.5–6, 8).

¹⁷ Demosthenes, C. Nicostr. 53.11; cf. the law at Gortyn: if a free man is bought abroad, “he shall remain at the disposal of the one who has bought him until he has reimbursed what he owes” (I.Cret. IV, 72; VI, 46–50). A. Albertoni, “Redemptus ab hostibus,” in Rivista di diritto internazionale, vol. 17, 1925, pp. 358–378; 500–527. Obviously, the amount of the ransom varied greatly: ninety Jewish prisoners for one talent, according to 2Macc 8:11; but one talent for each young man or young woman according to Josephus, Ant. 12.209; cf. 25, 28. In Syria, Phoenicia, twenty drachmas per capita (Ep. Arist. 22). Cf. Diodorus Siculus 14.111.4; 17.14.4; 20.84.6; 28.13.

¹⁸ RIJG, vol. 2, p. 247. Cf. B. B. Warfield, “The New Testament Terminology of Redemption,” in Princeton Theological Review, vol. 15, 1917, pp. 201–249; D. Hill, Greek Words and Hebrew Meanings, pp. 49–81; M. Carrez, “Rachat,” in DBSup, vol. 10, col. 1055–1064.

¹⁹ Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 117; cf. Conf. Tongues 93; Heir 186; Spec. Laws 1.77; 2.95. “It is completely correct to call the Levites ‘ransom’; for nothing does a better job of freeing the intelligence than to make oneself a ‘refugee and suppliant’ with God. This is the testimony of the consecrated tribe of Levites” (Heir 124, on Num 3:12). Cf. Aeschylus, Cho. 48 (chorus): “Is there a blood ransom (λύτρον αἵματος) shed on the ground?”

²⁰ Cited by A. Deissmann, Light, p. 328, n. 1.

²¹ Philo of Byblos, in Eusebius, Praep. Evang. 1.10.44; the king sacrificed his son as a λύτρον in the public interest.

²² This same expression is used in 1QM 1.12; 15.1; 18.11; and in the Palestinian Targum, where it is contrasted with “temporary redemption,” cf. R. Le Déaut, Nuit Pascale, p. 233, n. 53.

²³ In the LXX, the action noun λύτρωσις is used for the redemption of the firstborn (geullâh), Lev 25:29; Num 18:16; for the redemption of a life (Ps 49:8). God “has sent redemption to his people” (Ps 111:9, Hebrew peçût); “with Yahweh there is abundant redemption” (Ps 30:7, peçût). In the papyri, there is above all the sense of surety and guarantee; for example, that nothing further is owed to the treasury on the object sold or paid for (αὐτοῦ λυτρώσεως βέβαιοι ἀπὸ δημοσίων, P.Rein. 42, 5); gold objects are left as security (P.Oslo 130, 15; first century AD); recovery of security (εἰς λύτρωσιν ἰματίου, P.Tebt. 1091, 2 and 4); cf. P.Ryl. 213, 164; SB 9834 a 14.

²⁴ —Απολύτρωσις, ten times in the NT, unknown in the papyri, is found only once in the LXX, in the words of Nebuchadnezzar: ὁ χρόνος μου τῆς ἀπολυτρώσεως ἦλθε (Dan 4:34). Cf. Ep. Arist. 12: “the liberation of the people deported from Judea by the king’s father”; Philo, Good Man Free 114, a Laconian child commits suicide “despairing of his redemption”; Josephus, Ant. 12.27: “the price of the ransom would have been more than four hundred talents.”

²⁵ Eph 1:14; cf. Acts 20:28; Titus 2:14—λαὸν περιούσιον (cf. Exod 19:5; Deut 14:2); 1Pet 2:9—λαὸς εἰς περιποίησιν (Isa 43:21). H. Schürmann, Comment Jésus a-t-il vécu sa mort?, Paris, 1977.

μαίνομαι

mainomai, to be furious, enraged, mad, insane

mainomai, S 3105; TDNT 4.360–361; EDNT 2.375–376; NIDNTT 1.527–530, 3.230; MM 385–386; L&N 30.24; BAGD 486

Occurring frequently in classical Greek (cf. Preisker, in TDNT, vol. 4, pp. 360–361), this verb has two meanings in the Koine: “be furious, enraged,”¹ and “be raving mad, insane.” The latter meaning, which is the most common, is the only meaning in the LXX.² This madness often takes on the familiar sense of a person thought to be the self-deceived, like Rhoda when she announces that Peter is at the door and everyone knows that he is in prison: Maine —“You are raving!”³ Those people are called crazy whose words or actions fly in the face of common sense, whose reasoning or conduct is not understood,⁴ who do not observe propriety and decorum. When St. Paul defends his cause before Festus and affirms the resurrection of Christ, the procurator interrupts him: “Maine, Paule. You are mad, Paul. Your great learning has driven you insane (eis manian).” To which he replies: “I am not mad, most excellent Festus. To the contrary, my words are true and sensible.”⁵ This could be compared to Philo: “You are raving, it is not possible, you are completely mad.’ ‘I am neither mad nor silly enough to lose sight of the course of an argument” (Flacc. 6).

This sort of madness is specifically that which is attributed to the preachers of a religion that one refuses to follow or to believers whose convictions are astounding. Thus it was said of Jesus: “He is possessed by a demon and has a deranged mind.”⁶

¹ Josephus, War 1.352: “The combatants, as if drunk with rage, rained blows on all ages indiscriminately”; 4Macc 7:5—“Eleazar broke the furious waves of passion”; cf. Philo, Spec. Laws 3.126: “mad with rage, beside themselves, they took up arms”; Menander, Dysk. 82: “Make way, I have a maniac on my heels!”

² Jer 25:16 “The nations will go mad (hithpolel of the Hebrew verb halal) because of the sword”; cf. Philo, Cherub. 32: “give a sword to a madman”; Jer 29:26—a madman (pual of shaga') who acts as if inspired is to be handed over to stocks and leg irons; Wis 14:28—“Either they are delirious with joy, or they make false prophecies.” In 2Macc 4:4, μαίνεσθαι is an error for the proper name Menestheus (F. M. Abel, Maccabées, p. 330).

³ Acts 12:15. Cf. Menander, Dysk. 16: “That lout is completely crocked.” One not initiated or an unbeliever present at a worship service in Corinth where Christians are speaking in tongues will say “What a bunch of crazies!” (1Cor 14:23). Cf. Philo, Flacc. 162: “There was nothing to distinguish him from people who are mad”; Alleg. Interp. 3.210: “a person who is drunk or crazy often speaks and acts like a person who has eaten nothing.”

⁴ The constant meaning in Philo. “Are you wise or mad to imagine such a thing?” (Cherub. 69); “No mere slave is crazy enough to oppose a master” (To Gaius 233); “Have they not lost their reason? Are they not mad? —who try so hard to be unseasonably candid, daring to defy kings and sometimes tyrants in word or deed” (Dreams 2.83). “The worst of them, even if mad (μανέντες), would not underestimate . . .” (Moses 1.161). God judges the building of the tower of Babel as an act of folly (Josephus, Ant. 1.116); P.Cair.Zen. 59041, 11: ἅμα δὲ καὶ μαινομένου ὅτι οὐκ ἠβούλετο αἰ—τούμενος ἀργύριον δοῦναι; T. Jos. 8.3: ὡς οὖν εἶδον ὅτι μαινομένη κρατεῖ— μου τὸν χιτῶ—να.

⁵ Acts 26:24. Moulton-Milligan compare P.Oxy. 33, col. IV, 10, where the emperor replies calmly to the condemned Appian, who, threatened with immediate execution, is beside himself: “We are used to bringing back to their senses those who are mad and have lost their mind” (—Αππιανέ, ει—ὠαμεν καὶ ἡμεῖ—ς μαινομένους καὶ ἀπονενοημένους σωφρονίζειν). To which Appian replies: “I swear by your fortune that I am neither mad nor out of my mind” (νὴ τὴν σὴν τύχην οὔτε μαίνομαι οὔτε ἀπονενόημαι, line 14). Republished by H. A. Musurillo, Pagan Martyrs, p. 67, cf. pp. 218ff.

⁶ John 10:20—Δαιμόνιον ἔχει καὶ μαίνεται; cf. Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.204: “The soothsayer and several others were angry and hurled curses at him. ‘Why are you raving, O unfortunate ones,’ he said.” Antiochus says to the seven young men: “I advise you not to give yourselves over to the same madness as this old man (Eleazar) who has just been tortured” (4Macc 8:5). They brought in the fourth brother and said to him: “Do not give yourself over also to the same madness as your brothers, but obey the king and save yourself” (10:13). G. Mussies (Dio Chrysostom, p. 114) cites as parallels Dio Chrysostom 8.36; 9.8; 12.8.

μακάριος, οὐαί

makarios, happy, blessed; ouai, woe

makarios, S 3107; TDNT 4.362–370; EDNT 2.376–379; NIDNTT 1.215–216; MM 386; L&N 25.119; BDF §127(4); BAGD 486–487 | ouai, S 3759; EDNT 2.540; NIDNTT 3.1051–1054; MM 464; L&N 22.9; BDF §§4(2a), 58, 136(5), 190(2), 412(5); BAGD 591

The adjective makarios can have the most commonplace meanings, as to describe a “happy day” (Plutarch, Oth. 15.4) and “happy times,”¹ or a hero like Perseus, who had wings and could change irksome people into stone (Menander, Dysk. 153). It takes on an affective nuance in the interjection o makari (“my dear”)² and means “blessed” in religious texts.

In fact, it is the successor of makar, which Homer used as an epithet with the gods,³ almost synonymous with “immortal,” and which remained in constant use throughout the Hellenistic period.⁴ If the deity is by definition removed from the vicissitudes of existence here below, then the blessed deceased who live in the isles of the blessed (makaron nesoi) are likened to him.⁵ The adjective makarios makes its appearance with Pindar, who uses it to describe a mortal, Karrhotos, son of Alexibias;⁶ likewise Xenophon: “He considered himself most happy at the thought of having a right-hand man who would give him the leisure to do what he pleased” (Cyr. 8.3.48). But given the vicissitudes of existence here below, Aristotle said that a person could be called happy only after his death (Eth. Nic.

1.1100a11–1101a21; 10.1178b33ff.). In addition, if the term is still applied to the living in the Hellenistic period,⁷ it becomes more and more a description of the dead.⁸ A name is preceded by ho makarios (he makaria), which can be translated, depending on whether the person so described is pagan, Jewish, or Christian, “late,” “happy,” or “blessed.”⁹

The first biblical beatitude is that of Leah, who, when her servant gave birth to a second son of Jacob, stated, “I am happy, because my daughters will call me happy!” So she called his name Asher,” that is, Felix (Gen 30:13; cited by Philo, Migr. Abr. 95). The queen of Sheba exclaims before Solomon, “Happy are your wives, and happy are your servants here who stand constantly before you, hearing your wisdom” (1Kgs 10:8; 2Chr 9:7). These human macarisms are rare in the LXX,¹⁰ and not once is Yahweh called “blessed” after the fashion of the Greek gods.¹¹ On the contrary, it is God alone who grants humans happiness, and the originality of the OT lies in multiplying beatitudes in favor of those who believe, love, and adore Yahweh;¹² happy are those who hope in him, count on him, take shelter and find their strength in him!¹³

This “fear of Yahweh” is such that one takes pleasure in his commandments (Ps 1:1; 112:1; 128:1-2; Prov 8:32; Sir 34:15; 1 Enoch 99.10) and sees the Lord’s hand in trials (Ps 94:12; Job 5:17; Tob 13:16; Pss. Sol. 10.1). The originality of the OT is to frame exhortations to virtue in macarisms.¹⁴ One can only be happy if one is purified of sin (Ps 32:1-2, quoted at Rom 4:7-8; Sir 14:2; 31:8; cf. Wis 3:13—“Happy is the sterile woman who has remained pure”), practices justice (Ps 106:3; Prov 20:7; Isa 56:2), walks in the law of Yahweh (Ps 119:1-2), cares for the poor (Ps 41:1), does not blunder with one’s lips (Sir 14:1; 28:19), and if having been told what pleases God (Bar 4:4) one has found wisdom (Prov 3:13; Sir 14:20; 25:9) and awaits the fulfillment of the prophecies about the events of the eschaton.¹⁵

Philo, expressing his Jewish faith in terms of his Greek culture, is the one who insisted the most on “the blessed and fortunate nature of God.”¹⁶ God is even the only one to know felicity, because he is the only true Beauty, the Uncreated, the Immortal,¹⁷ “the Being who knows immutability, felicity, and triple beatitude.”¹⁸ The man who has a “desire for immortality and a happy life” (Philo, Contemp. Life 13) “will live a life of felicity and beatitude, marked by the teachings of piety and holiness.”¹⁹ Hence the macarism, “Happy are those to whom it has been granted to use the potions of wisdom.”²⁰

All the thinkers of antiquity expressed their opinions on happiness. Homer identified it with wealth,²¹ that is, possession of the good things of life, which implies a good wife and children.²² Others think of power (Euripides, IT 543; Bacch. 904), fame or glory (Stobaeus, Ecl. 3.1.106; vol. 3, p. 57, 12), a life of pleasure (Euripides, Alc. 169), “to be able to live in joy without suffering any disfavor of fate makes for happiness for mortals” (El.

1357–1359); hence freedom from any trouble or misery (Plato, Resp. 5.465 d), full, constant, unmixed satisfaction that is lacking in nothing; but the futility of this dream allows the conclusion that “Among humans none is happy.”²³ In addition, Aristotle (Top. 2.112a) defined the happy person, following Xenocrates (frag. 81), as “the one whose soul is virtuous” (cf. Marcus Aurelius 7.17; Isocrates, De Pace 8.143); but how can this be attained, since according to Livy “We can no longer endure either our vices or their remedies”?²⁴

It is in terms of this context that we must understand the nine beatitudes of Matt 5:3-12 and Luke 6:20-22.²⁵ They constitute not only the exordium of the Sermon on the Mount but the specific teaching of the Messiah to the members of the kingdom that he is founding,²⁶ and hence the essence of the gospel ethic,²⁷ which is summed up in the axiom “Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also” (Matt 6:21). More than a fundamental attitude of a person, this appeal is that of an option that is as radical as it is paradoxical. First of all, Jesus is making an appeal to happiness. It is impossible to insist too strongly on the meaning of this makarios, repeated ten times (in Matt) and intensified by the present imperatives “Rejoice and be glad (chairete kai agalliaithe), for your reward is great in heaven.”²⁸ This is much more than contentment; it is an interior joy that becomes external, elation translated into shouts, songs, acclamations. The explanation is that God will be the source of this beatitude. —Secondly, the new faith implies a reversal of all human values; happiness is no longer attached to wealth, to having enough, to a good reputation, power, possession of the goods of this world, but to poverty alone, because these beatitudes envision one or another aspect of the ptochoi of the OT.²⁹ These are essentially religious souls, in submission to God’s law, obedient to his will. God is their only recourse and their only hope, and they are entirely ready to accept his gifts. They are profoundly humble, modest, unassuming, the “little ones” who are not taken into account and who possess nothing on earth; they are starving and weeping. More than scorned, they are exploited by the powerful and the rich, who prey on them, oppress them, and persecute them. It is to these afflicted ones that the Holy Spirit promises happiness, consolation, and satisfaction. These are the little people whom God wished to save and to whom he wished to give justice.³⁰ It is therefore to them that the good news is announced (Matt 11:5; Luke 7:22), along with consolation (Sir 48:24) and peace (Isa 52:7). The poor are the beneficiaries of the coming or appearing of the reign of God and his justice,³¹ because they wait for it (Mark 15:43; Luke 2:25); their hearts are open to it, because their miserable condition makes them appreciate spiritual values, which are the only true wealth. Hence St. Matthew’s specification “poor in spirit,”³² which applies to the indigent as well as to the wealthy who are detached from their possessions. Poverty, according to Jesus, is that of all people who are dissatisfied with earthly goods—all is vanity—and who have from the outset a sense of their own personal nakedness. Happy are those who are so aware of the nothingness of the earth and who cry out “Come, Lord Jesus!” (1Cor 16:22; Rev 22:20). Finally, their wage (misthos) will be “great in heaven” (Matt 5:12; Luke 6:23), surpassing in every way the efforts and sacrifices they have undertaken: “In good measure, shaken, pressed down, running over will it be given into your bosom” (Luke 6:38), literally unimaginable and unspeakable (1Cor 2:9). They will enter “into the joy of the Lord” himself (Matt 25:21, 23), which is an infinity of conscious perfection;³³ “being with Christ, which is better by far” (Phil 1:23).

In the NT, not until the Pastoral Epistles is God described as makarios: “the gospel of the glory of the blessed God” (1Tim 1:11); “the blessed and only Sovereign” (1Tim 6:15). It is correct to see here a polemical intention against the imperial cult,³⁴ because makarios describes the only Dynastes (Luke 1:52; Acts 8:27), a title of the Most High (Sir 46:5–6), who reigns in the heavens and over the world (2Macc 12:15; 15:4, 23). Humans owe him worship and absolute obedience.³⁵

Regarding Christ, happiness lies in recognizing him as he is, in not being “scandalized by him” (Matt 11:6; Luke 7:23), in seeing and hearing him (Matt 13:16; Luke 10:23). This discernment is a gift of the Father (Matt 16:17). It is the beatitude of faith, that of the Virgin Mary—“Blessed is she who has believed” (makaria he pisteusasa, Luke 1:45) the word of the Lord—but also a mother’s honor.³⁶ The last macarism pronounced by Jesus is for all those who believe without relying on a visible presence (John 20:29). To this we may join the beatitudes of hope. In the course of their earthly pilgrimage, Christians “await the blessed hope (ten makarian elpida) and appearing of the glory of our great God and Savior, Jesus Christ” (Titus 2:13). Their life has meaning only in light of this “final end,” which is the object of all their hopes: their meeting with Jesus Christ, who is currently invisible. Describing this hope as “blessed” means that its object is at once infallible and divine. From now on he rejoices the soul: “Happy are they who are invited to the marriage feast of the Lamb” (Rev 19:9). They prepare for this and remain watchful (Rev 16:15); they wash their garments and remain pure in order to have the right to the tree of life (Rev 22:14). Since they have had a share in the first resurrection, the second death (that of sin and damnation) will have no power over them (Rev 20:6). They listen obediently and observe what God has taught them (Rev 1:3; 22:7). Rev 14:13 therefore can set forth this paradox: ‘Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord from now on. Yes,’ says the Spirit, ‘for they rest from their labors; for their works follow with them.’”³⁷

The other beatitudes have to do with faithfulness, that of watchful and diligent servants who will be rewarded by their master (Luke 12:37, 38, 43; 24:46); of disciples who conform to the example of humble, loving service set by the Lord (“Happy are you if you do it”);³⁸ of the charitable, because “it is more blessed to give than to receive.”³⁹ Happiness is envisaged not on the psychological but on the eschatological level, because God will reward the giver, as Jesus promised: “You will be happy in that they (the poor, the crippled, the lame, and the blind) will not be able to repay (your invitation), because they (God) will repay you at the resurrection of the just” (Luke^o4:14).

By virtue of this divine judgment, the happiness of Christians will always lie in perfect unity of loyalty and conscience⁴⁰ and in exact conformity to God’s will in every action: “The one who looks intently into the perfect law, the law of liberty, and remains (thus), and becomes not a forgetful hearer but a doer—this person will be happy in what he does” (Jas 1:25), even if he is abused and suffers for righteousness.⁴¹ One is then identified with Christ and, after enduring the trial, assured of receiving the “crown of life” (Jas 1:12). In the NT, makarios always describes persons, never actions (cf. 4Macc 7:22). It is therefore not poverty as such that is blessed, but the poor; and poverty is not a matter of possessing nothing but of being detached from everything.

St. Luke follows the beatitudes of the Sermon on the Mount with what are quite improperly called four “maledictions” against the rich. Introduced by the adversative conjunction plen, “nevertheless, only,”⁴² they are designed to reinforce the beatitude of the poor, conformably to Semitic usage, which links blessing and cursing.⁴³ Here, however, rather than the traditional contrast between eulogeo and [epi_kataraomai (sole exception, Eccl 10:16-17: ouai soi, polis . . . makaria sy), St. Luke uses ouai, which is almost unknown in secular Greek,⁴⁴ but which attests that this is not a “malediction.”⁴⁵

So what is the meaning of this interjection? Ouai is a transliteration of the Hebrew ’ôy, hôy, a sort of onomatopoeia,⁴⁶ a cry of pain, terror, indignation, and sometimes threat, a declaration of misfortune and a complaint against a certain person or group, given one’s misery or privations. According to the context it must be translated “Alas,” “Ah,” or “Woe.”⁴⁷ In the LXX, ouai is said of a nation or a city that is “lost”⁴⁸ or is sinning;⁴⁹ complaints are made about ills that beset (1Sam 4:8), betrayal (Isa 24:16; Jer 10:19), an enemy invasion (Jer 4:13; 6:4), but also of woes that are the consequences of our sins (Lam 5:16; cf. Isa 3:9). Complaints are voiced about “the one who is alone and falls, who has no one to help him up” (Eccl 4:10), but more often ouai expresses sometimes the terror experienced in the face of the horrible fate that awaits the wicked, the ungodly, the sinner,⁵⁰ “because today the time of their punishment has arrived” (Jer 50:27), sometimes the moaning that marks funerary lamentation and which takes this form: “Alas, my brother! Alas, my sister!” (Jer 22:18; 34:5; Amos 5:16; Ezek 2:10).

Thus the supposed Lucan “maledictions” of the Sermon on the Mount are at the same time a threat to and a lamentation over the rich, the satisfied, those who feast, laugh, and are flattered by their friends.⁵¹ They are truly the most miserable of all people, because wealth makes it very difficult to get into the kingdom of God (Luke 18:24-25). Not that wealth is cursed—Jesus was surrounded by wealth (Mary of Bethany, the holy women, Zacchaeus, Joseph of Arimathea, Nicodemus, etc.)—but the satisfactions that it provides usually make it difficult to detect the attraction of spiritual goods; they fix the heart on earth (Luke 8:14; 12:34). When filled with earthly goods, what does one want from God? So, unfortunate indeed are those who have been deceived concerning true values and risk losing out on eternal beatitude. But, Jesus affirms, this depends on God alone and on his mercy—precisely for the rich (Luke 18:27).

More serious are the “maledictions” uttered against the “scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites . . . blind guides, because you close up the kingdom of heaven against men”;⁵² these evil teachers lead the people to spiritual ruin, making “sons of Gehenna.” To them applies the statement, “Woe to the world because of stumblingblocks . . . woe to the man through whom a cause of stumbling arises. It would be better for him to have a millstone hung around his neck and be thrown into the sea” (Matt 18:7; Luke 17:1). This is the case with Judas, who is not cursed, but for whom the Lord laments, “Woe to the one through whom the Son of Man is betrayed. It would have been better for him not to have been born” (Matt 26:24; Mark 14:21; Luke 22:22). How could one not bewail such a disastrous fate?

The other NT ouais are almost trivial in comparison with these spiritual catastrophes: “Woe to me if I preach not the gospel” (1Cor 9:16) means “I would be unfortunate and worthy of laments if I were not faithful to my calling.” In the time of the desolation of Judea, “Woe to those who (must flee and) are pregnant and those who are nursing in those times” (Matt 24:19; Mark 13:17; Luke 21:23). At the end of time, the distress will be such that the angels announce, “Woe, woe, woe to those who live on the earth.”⁵³ The two last lamentations have as their object the destruction of the wealth (Rev 18:16) of those who “enriched themselves” (18:19).

¹ SB 10288 a 10 (AD 125); Dittenberger, Or. 519, 9; Acts 26:2—“I count myself happy, King Agrippa, to make my defense today before you”; Josephus, Ant. 16.108: “We would be happy to have persuaded you.” Cf. μάκαρ: “a happy silence” (Synesius, Hymn. 5.22).

² Menander, Dysk. 103 (cf. the fragment of Menander in J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 3 A, p. 349, line 66); but μαράριε ἄνθρωπε (ibid. 701) can be translated “My dear sir” (J. M. Jacques, “Mon cher Monsieur”) or better “Happy man” (V. Martin, “L’heureux homme”) who makes the most of good fortune; Aristophanes, Av. 1271: “O Pisthetairos, O happy one, O most wise, O most glorious . . .”; Vesp. 1275; Eq. 1206; Xenophon, Hell.

2.4.17: “Happy are those among us who as conquerors will see the best of days”; Plutarch, Art. 17.8—“You are admirable (μακάριος) to become angry for an old and miserable eunuch” (after the French of R. Flacelière).

³ Homer, Il. 24.99: “All the blessed everliving gods are seated grouped in assembly”; Od. 14.83; 18.426; Ps.-Homer, H. Aphr. 1.92—“Whichever blessed deity you are, Artemis or Leto or golden Aphrodite or noble Themis or Athena with the piercing eyes”; 1.195; Hesiod, Th. 33: “the race of the blessed everliving ones”; Op. 136, 139. The texts are noted by G. L. Dirichlet, De veterum macarismis, Giessen, 1914.

⁴ An epigram from Corcyra begins Ζεῦ μάκαρ (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1964, p. 175, n. 217). A monument of Agrius: “The twelve gods who with Zeus are called blessed” (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 114, col. II, 11; cf. III, 12); dedication of a foot to Isis “the blessed” (ibid. 109, 2), “the most holy among the blessed” (ibid. 175, col. IV, 2; cf. 176, 19). Even in the fourth century, Bishop Synesius of Cyrene would sing of Christ as “blessed” (μάκαρ), creator and sovereign of the universe (Hymn. 1.21, 95, 113, 275, 303, 384, 496, 526, 570, 733; 2.26, 80, 92, 169, 240, 297; 6.2, “blessed, immortal”; 7.4).

⁵ Hesiod, Op. 171; Pindar, Ol. 2.127; Antoninus Liberalis, Met. 33.3; IG XIV, 1973, 2 (epitaph of Aelia Porte). Epitaph of an anonymous woman: “The gods sent me to the isles of the blessed and the sacred countryside of shady Elysium” (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 38, 9); epitaph of Casius, who “has departed to the society of the blessed beneath the heavenly vault” (ibid. n. 27, 4); Serapias, “going up to the land of the blessed” (52, 2); a young man of Lycopolis who died at age 16: “the children of the immortals . . . dwell in the Elysian plain of the blessed” (73, 8; cf. 80, 10); “‘Who is this man?’ will ask one of those who walk along the tomb; ‘Who is so happy, so fortunate, hidden by you?’” (27, 8). If μάκαρ refers to the felicity known by the deceased and sometimes by those still living, it is thanks to divine favor (175, col. III, 7). “Happy son of Atreus, man favored by the gods and by destiny” (Homer, Il. 3.182; quoted by Plutarch, De tranq. anim. 11).

⁶ Pindar, Pyth. 5.47: “Honor to you; after your great work the noblest praises will perpetuate your memory”; Isocrates, Evag. 9.70: “Evagoras was from the beginning the most happy of men”; Plato, Menex. 249 d: “Aspasia is happy indeed if she, a simple woman, could compose such speeches”; cf. Libanius, Autobiogr. 1.1: “Happy (εὐδαίμων) because of the applause that my discourses received.”

⁷ Plutarch, Art. 12.6: “I pray the gods to make him rich and happy”; 14.2; 15.2: “He has made you happy and the envy of all”; Chariton, Chaer. 1.3.7: “Their parents judged themselves happy as they contemplated the perfect agreement of their children”; 8.1.11: “O happy woman, she has for herself the most attractive of men”; 8.8.16: “Grant that we may live in happiness” (βίον μακάριον); P.Mich. 202, 7, when Valeria asked her sister Thermution to come and raise a child, she assured her that she will be happy with her situation (μακερεία ε—άν ποιήσης, AD 105); cf. Josephus, Ant. 9.264: μακαρίους γὰρ ἔσεσθαι. P.Got. 21, 2–3 is a reproduction of the Letter to Abgar (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 1.13.10), in which the Lord congratulates and blesses his correspondent: μακάριος εἶς . . . καὶ μακαρία ἡ πόλις σου (cf. H. C. Youtie, Scriptiunculae, vol. 1, pp. 455–459).

⁸ Theognis 1.1013: “O happy one, fortunate, favored by fate, who hast descended into the dark abode of Hades before knowing battle . . .” From Plato on, Plato, Hp. Ma. 293, an irksome person is sent ε—ς μακαρίαν = to beatitude (the beatitude of the dead); Aristophanes, Eq. 1151; Ran. 85; that is, “Hades take you,” or “go to the devil.”

⁹ [French “feu, bienheureux ou béni.” In the opening paragraphs of this article Spicq uses bienheureux in pagan contexts, béni in Christian contexts. I have generally rendered his bienheureux “happy,” but in some cases the English “blessed” has to do for bienheureux as well as for béni (as with the μακάρων νῆσοι). English has no exact equivalent of bienheureux. —Tr.] P.Erl. 68, 1–2; C.P.Herm. 64, 1; P.Oxy. 1838, 1; 1887, 6; 2238, 4; 2416, 7; 2478, 29; P.Princ. 95, 2; 145, 15; P.Lond. 1915, 14; 1917, 26; 1921, 30; P.Berl.Zill. 6, 22; P.Ross.Georg. III, 39, 5; P.Ant. 103, 11; P.Apoll. 51, 5–8; 57, 10; SB 9771, 2; 9776, 5; 10045 a 1; 10059, 1; B. Lifshitz, Synagogues juives, n. 73 a, 84, 91; IGUR, n. 842; E. Bernard, Inscriptions métriques, n. 16, 4; 61, 5; CII 688; IGLS 727, 5–6; 728, 2–3; 1827; 2206; 2209. At Corinth (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1969, p. 458, n. 230), in Nubia (ibid. 1946–47, p. 370, n. 251; 1967, p. 564, n. 671). Often it is the memory of the deceased that is described as blessed (ibid. 1969, p. 458, n. 227; 1971, p. 523, n. 668); P.Berl.Zill. 7, 5; P.Erl. 67, 28; 73, 12. C.P.Herm. 30, 4, 25; P.Alex. 37, 5; P.Giss. 55, 6; P.Oxy. 1882, 10; 1890, 3; 1892, 7; 2237, 5; etc. Cf. Chariton, Chaer. 6.2.9: “I would have found felicity if I had been buried . . . in the tomb of Syracuse, but you kept me from dying.”

¹⁰ Cf. Ps 137:8-9: “Daughter of Babel, happy are those who will inflict on you the treatment that you inflicted on us. Happy are those who will take your children and smash them against the rock”; Eccl 10:17—“Happy is the land whose king is the son of free men”; Sir 25:8—“Happy is the man who lives with an intelligent woman”; 26:1; Isa 32:20—“Happy will you be to sow every place where there is water.” Μακάριος translates the Hebrew ‘ashrê followed by a determinative (a noun, or a pronomial suffix in the second person singular or plural); cf. W. Janzen, “Ashrê in the Old Testament,” in HTR, 1965, pp. 215–226; A. George, “La ‘Forme’ des béatitudes jusqu’à Jésus,” in Mélanges Bibliques A. Robert, Paris, 1957, pp. 398–403; M. Bouttier, “Heureux,” in J. J. von Allmen, Vocabulaire biblique, Neuchâtel-Paris, 1954, p. 121; H. Cazelles, “Béatitude,” in Catholicisme, vol. 1, col. 1342–1346.

¹¹ The Bible has no instances of εὐτυχής, “favored by fortune,” ὄλβιος, “prosperous” thanks to the protection of the gods; cf. Heliodorus, Aeth. 3.2.4; Anth. Pal. 6.274.3; 9.485, 11; Aristophanes, Lys. 1286 (Juno, the august and blessed [ὄλβία] wife of Zeus), εὐδαίμων, “under the protection of a good genius,” cf. M. Heinze, “Der Eudaimonismus in der griechischen Philosophie,” in Vorsokratiker: Demokrit, Sokrates, Leipzig, 1883, pp. 643–758; C. de Heer, ΜΑΚΑΡ-ΕΥΔΑΙΜΩΝ-ΟΛΒΙΟΣ-ΕΥΤΥΧΗΣ, Amsterdam, 1969; Marianne McDonald, Terms for Happiness in Euripides, Göttingen, 1978, pp. 292ff., 322ff.

¹² Benediction of Moses: “Happy are you, O Israel. Who is like you, a people saved by Yahweh, whose sword is your exaltation?” (Deut 33:29). “Blessed will be all those who love you forever” (Tob 13:14–15); “Happy is the nation who has Yahweh for its god. Happy are the people whom he has chosen for his heritage” (Ps 33:12; 144:15); “Happy are those who live in your house; they will always praise you” (Ps 84:4; 65:4). E. LipiĔski, “Macarismes et psaumes de congratulation,” in RB, 1968, pp. 321–367.

¹³ Ps 2:12; 34:8; 40:4; 84:5, 12; 146:5; Isa 30:18.

¹⁴ For this reason, the biblical beatitude fits into the wisdom genre. Some have found a cultic origin for it; but often it is a simple cry of admiration or joy, or even a simple observation and proclamation. Nevertheless, in the religious context in which it is inserted, the beatitude is almost always a benediction; cf. C. H. Dodd, “The Beatitudes,” in Mélanges Bibliques A. Robert, Paris, 1957, pp. 404–410; C. C. McCown, “The Beatitudes in the Light of Ancient Ideals,” in JBL, 1927, pp. 50–61.

¹⁵ Dan 12:12. Usually, the happiness mentioned is already present and includes—apart from peace of soul—earthly satisfactions (family, prosperity, etc.); but it can also be a guarantee of future felicity (Isa 30:18–26; Dan 12:12); “Happy are they who will live in those days to behold the happiness of Israel in the reunion of the tribes” (Pss. Sol. 17.50); “Happy are those who will live in those days to behold the benefits of the Lord that he will procure for the generation to come under the scepter of discipline of the Lord Messiah” (Pss. Sol. 18.7–8); “Europe will be blessed with a fecund heaven, and for many years wholesome, without storm or hail . . . O happy one, the man or woman who shall live in those times” (Sib. Or. 3.368–372; cf. Luke 14:15; Rev 19:9). But to be assured of eschatological felicity is already now a source of happiness. This is the case with most of the NT macarisms: “be joyful in the hope” (Rom 12:12).

¹⁶ Creation 135: μακαρίας καὶ εὐδαίμονος φύσεως; 146; Unchang. God 108; Decalogue 104; Heir 111; Spec. Laws 1.329; 4.48; Dreams 2.230; Abraham 87. The linking of εὐδαίμων and μακάριος is constant (Plato, Resp. 1.354 a; Leg. 2.660 e; Isocrates, Panath. 12.288; Aristophanes, Plut. 655; Atticus, frag. 2.87, 118 etc.).

¹⁷ Cherub. 86; Sacr. Abel and Cain 40, 95, 101; Unchang. God 26; Spec. Laws 2.53: “God alone possesses happiness and felicity, being exempt from all ill and filled with perfect goods . . . , who showers particular goods on heaven and earth”; To Gaius 5. Cf. Josephus, Ant. 10.278: “God, the blessed and immortal being”; Ag. Apion 2.190: “God, perfect and blessed, governs the universe”; Epicurus, in Diogenes Laertius 10.123(27).

¹⁸ Spec. Laws 3.178; 4.123. This superlative is found already in Homer, Od. 5.306 (τρισμακάρες); 6.153, 155; Aristophanes, Ach. 400: “O thrice happy Euripides, whose slave is so quick with an answer”; Philemon, frag. 93, 1 (in Stobaeus, Flor. 98.34.13; vol. 5, p. 828); cf. Lucian, Vit. Auct. 12, βίος τρισμακάριστος, a super-happy life!

¹⁹ Philo, Creation 172. Philo evokes the opinion of secular people: “those who are said to be happy and favored by fortune,” the rich and the powerful (Decalogue 4) and defines “this state of felicity that is freedom” (Good Man Free 157), but wonders whether the calm and serene life, with true felicity and happiness, is possible (Heir 285).

²⁰ Philo, Dreams 1.50; cf. Abraham 115; Spec. Laws 4.115; Rewards 122. Cf. Euripides, Bacch. 72: “Happy is the fortunate man, instructed in the divine mysteries, who sanctifies his life and make his soul fervent” (cf. A. J. Festugière, Etudes de religion, pp.72ff.).

²¹ Il. 16.596; 24.536; Od. 14.206; 17.420; 19.76. Cf. Plutarch, Art. 12.6: “I pray the gods to make you happy and rich”; 14.2; Polybius 3.91.6; Libanius, Autobiogr. 1.154: “You count happy those who have wealth.”

²² Od. 4.208; cf. Euripides, Med. 1025; IT 915.

²³ Euripides, Med. 1228. Cf. J. de Romilly, "Le thème du bonheur dans les Bacchantes," in REG, 1963, pp. 361–380.

²⁴ Livy, preface. Cf. A. Becker, De L'Instinct du bonheur à l'extase de la béatitude, Paris, 1967, pp. 46ff.

²⁵ The beatitudes in Matt are in the third person, are general in scope, and are benedictions; those of Luke are in the second person, have in view instead Jesus' immediate hearers, and are as much consolations as they are religious and moral imperatives. Cf. J. Dupont, Béatitudes, 3d ed., Bruges-Louvain, 1958 (gives the bibliography, pp. 347ff.); vol. 2, 2d ed., Paris, 1969; vol. 3, 2d ed., Paris, 1973; L. Pirot, "Béatitudes évangéliques," in SDB, vol. 1, col. 927–939; J. Thomé, Selig seid Ihr: Gedanken zur Bergpredigt, Regensburg, 1937; R. E. Roberts, The Happy Heart: A Study in the Beatitudes, London, 1936; J. Theissing, "Die Seligpreisungen," in Die Lehre Jesu von der ewigen Seligkeit, Breslau, 1940, pp. 5–21; E. Percy, Die Botschaft Jesu, Lund, 1953, pp. 40–108; G. Braumann, "Zum Traditionsgeschichtlichen Problem der Seligpreisungen Mt. V, 3–12," in NovT, 1960, pp. 253–260; J. Merle Rife, "Matthew's Beatitudes and the Septuagint," in B. L. Daniels, M. J. Suggs, Studies in the History and Text of the New Testament in Honor of K. W. Clark, Salt Lake City, 1967, pp. 107–112; N. Walter, "Die Bearbeitung der Seligpreisungen durch Matthäus," in F. L. Cross, SE, 1968, vol. 4, pp. 246–258; S. Agouridès, "La Tradition des Béatitudes chez Matthieu et Luc," in Mélanges Rigaux, pp. 9–27; Hauck, "μακάριος," in TDNT, vol. 4, pp. 362–364; G. Strecker, "Die Makarismen der Bergpredigt," in NTS, vol. 17, 1971, pp. 255–275 (French translation in M. Didier, L'Évangile selon Matthieu, Gembloux, 1972, pp. 185–208; in English, see The Sermon on the Mount: An Exegetical Commentary, Nashville, 1988, pp. 27–47); H. Frankmölle, "Die Makarismen' (Matth. V, 1–12; Luk. VI, 20–23)," in BZ, 1971, pp. 52–75; E. Schweizer, "Formgeschichtliches zu den Seligpreisungen Jesu," in NTS, vol. 19, 1972, pp. 121–126; A. J. Festugière, Observations stylistiques sur l'Évangile de S. Jean, Paris, 1974, pp. 87ff.; R. Guelich, "The Matthean Beatitudes: 'Entrance Requirements' or Eschatological Blessings," in JBL, 1975, pp. 416ff.; W. Zimmerli, "Die Seligpreisungen der Bergpredigt und das Alte Testament," in Donum Gentilicium in Honour of D. Daube, Oxford, 1978, pp. 8–26.

²⁶ Cf. A. Lemonnyer, "Le Messianisme des Béatitudes," in RSPT, 1922, pp. 373–389.

²⁷ Cf. Y. Trémel, "Béatitudes et morale évangélique," in Lumière et vie, vol. 21, 1955, pp. 83–102; S. Pinckaers, La Quête du bonheur, 2d ed., Paris, 1969.

²⁸ Matt 5:12; Luke 6:23. Χαίρω and ἀγαλλιάω are linked in Hab 3:18; Ps 125:2; Tob 13:15; Luke 1:14; John 8:56; 1Pet 1:8; 4:13; Rev 19:6-7. P. Humbert, “‘Laetari et exultare’ dans le vocabulaire de l’Ancien Testament,” in Opuscles d’un Hébraïsant, Neuchâtel, 1958, pp. 119–145.

²⁹ It is a modern deviation in pastoral theology to identify the gospel “poor” with today’s poverty-stricken people, those deprived of monetary resources; because these are most often a-religious, aggressive, and anti-authority, if not in outright rebellion. On the biblical “poor,” cf. I. Loeb, La Littérature des pauvres dans la Bible, Paris, 1892; H. Birkeland, ‘Anî und ‘Anaw in den Psalmen, Oslo, 1933; C. van Leeuwen, Le Développement du sens social en Israël avant l’ère chrétienne, Assen, 1955; A. Gelin, Les Pauvres de Yahweh, Paris, 1953; idem, “Heureux les pauvres,” in Grands thèmes bibliques, Paris, 1958, pp. 79–83; P. van den Berghe, “‘Ani et ‘anaw dans les Psaumes,” in R. De Langhe, Le Psautier, Louvain, 1962, pp. 273–275; R. Martin-Achard, “Jahwé et les ‘anawîm,” in TZ, 1965, pp. 349–357.

³⁰ Isa 29:19-21; 25:4-5; 61:1-3; Lam 3:58-59; Ps 35:10; 40:18; 43:1; 54:3, 5.

³¹ Cf. R. Schnackenburg, God’s Rule.

³² This interiorized poverty is already indicated by Ps 34:19, “the crushed in spirit,” a humility of spirit taken up at Qumran (1QS 3.8; 4.2–3; 1QH 14.3). But in the War Rule (1QM 11.10; 14.7) the formula ‘anwê-rûah (cf. Isa 66:2), of which “poor in spirit” in Matt is a kind of copy (cf. J. Dupont, “Les Pauvres en esprit,” in A la rencontre de Dieu: Mémoires A. Gelin, Le Puy, 1961, pp. 265–272; idem, “Les πτωχοὶ τῷ πνεύματι de Matthieu V, 3 et les ‘anwêy rûach de Qumrân,” in Neutestamentliche Aufsätze (Festschrift für J. Schmid), Regensburg, 1963, pp. 54–64; S. Légasse, “Les Pauvres en esprit et les ‘volontaires’ de Qumrân,” in NTS, vol. 8, 1961–62, pp. 336–345). It follows that the Matthean beatitude has a good chance of being original, with Luke suppressing “in spirit,” a radicalism not surprising in an author who knew wealth and whose gospel so forcefully emphasizes its fragility, emptiness, and incompatibility with the service of God (Luke 16:13).

³³ To suggest what this beatitude is like, the NT uses images of a feast at Christ’s table (Luke 22:30), of a wedding (Matt 22:1-14), of thrones and crowns (= honor; cf. 1Cor 9:25; 2Tim 4:8; Jas 1:12; 1Pet 5:4; Rev 2:10), glory (2Cor 4:17; Eph 1:18), security (John 14:2), rest (Heb 4:10; Rev

14:13), stability (Heb 12:18), etc. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, pp. 292ff.

³⁴ Beginning with Sulla, who took the name Felix after being acclaimed savior and father of the country (Dio Cassius 44.5; cf. L. Cerfaux, J. Tondriau, Culte des souverains, pp. 283–308), Felicitas, along with Victoria Augusti and Aeternitas augusta, were divine attributes connected to the Imperium Majus (G. Wissowa, Religion und Kultus der Römer, 2d ed., Munich, 1912, pp. 266ff.). The prince's Authority and Happiness went together (cf. Cicero, Leg. Man. 10.28; 16.47–49).

³⁵ Cf. the invocation of the Danaids to Zeus: “Lord of lords, Blessed One among the blessed, Sovereign Power over sovereigns, blessed (ὄλβιε) Zeus, hear us!” (Aeschylus, Suppl. 524–527).

³⁶ Luke 11:27-28: “A woman raising her voice from the midst of the crowd said, ‘Happy are the womb that bore you and the breasts that nursed you.’ He said to her, ‘Happy rather are those who hear the word of God and put it into practice.’” Mothers are commonly pronounced blessed; cf. Gen 30:13; Musaeus, Hero and Leander 138: “Blessed (ὄλβίη) is the mother who gave you birth, and most fortunate of all (μακαρτάτη) the womb that brought you into the world” (this superlative occurs already in Homer, Od. 6.158; Sophocles, frag. 410; cf. τρισμακάρες, Od. 6.154); Euripides, Ion 308: “Your mother is happy indeed”; Hyps., in P.Oxy. 852, frag. I, col. I, 5; 2Apoc. Bar. 54.10—“Blessed is my mother among those who bear; may she who brought me into the world be praised among women”; Tg. Ps.-J. Gen 49:25—“Happy are the breasts that nursed you and the womb where you reposed.” Rabbi Johanan b. Zakkai: “Blessed is she who gave birth to you” (Pirque ‘Abot 2.8). —The opposite in time of calamity: “These are the days when they will say, ‘Happy are the women who are barren and the wombs that never gave birth, and the breasts that never nursed’” (Luke 23:29); cf. Euripides, Andr. 395: “Why did I have to have a son, and double with his the weight of my misery?”; Alc. 882: “I envy mortals who are strangers to marriage and paternity.” Hence 1Cor 7:40—the widow is happier if she does not remarry, being free to consecrate herself entirely to the service of God and neighbor.

³⁷ The happiness is strictly present (ἄρτι). Believers reach the next world at the same time as their works, which God will reward on the spot with “eternal rest.” There is no delay, no waiting; cf. 4Macc 10:15; 12:1; F. F. Bruce, “The Spirit in Apocalypse,” in B. Lindars, S. Smalley, Christ and Spirit in the New Testament . . . in Honour of C. F. D. Moule, Cambridge, 1973, pp. 342ff.

³⁸ John 13:17; cf. Hesiod, Op. 826: “Happy and fortunate is the one who knows everything about days and performs his toil without offending the Immortals, consulting the heavenly wishes and avoiding every fault.”

³⁹ Acts 20:35 (cf. Sir 4:31; Rabbi Meir, in Eccl. Rab. 5.14; Did. 4.5; 1Clem. 2.1; etc.). Valuations on this subject are diverse. J. Dupont (Discours de Milet, pp. 324ff.) cites contrary opinions (Aristophanes, Eccl. 777–783; Athenaeus, Deip. 8.27), but the Lord’s judgment was already that of Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 4.1.7; Thucydides 2.97.4; Plutarch, Caes. 16.4; Mor. 173 d; 181 f; 778 c; Artemidorus Daldianus, Onir. 4.3: “making a gift and giving is better than receiving”; Pollux, Onom. 3.113. Cf. U. Holzmeister, “‘Beatum est dare, non accipere?’ Act. XX, 25,” in VD, 1949, pp. 98–101

⁴⁰ Rom 14:22. The concrete action matters little. What matters is to cast aside personal prejudices, to wish only to please God, to care for one’s neighbor.

⁴¹ 1Pet 3:14; 4:14 (a macarism of the persecuted, Matt 5:11; Luke 6:22). For the textual criticism, K. Aland, Die alten Übersetzungen des Neuen Testaments, 1972, p. 100. Cf. A. Garcia del Moral y Garrido, Interpretación de Is. XI, 2 en I Petr. IV, 14, Granada, 1962; J. Knox, “Pliny and I Peter: A Note on I Peter IV, 14–16 and III, 15,” in JBL, 1953, pp. 187–189.

⁴² Cf. Matt 18:7; Luke 6:24; 22:22. M. E. Thrall, Greek Particles in the New Testament, Grand Rapids, 1962, pp. 21–24.

⁴³ Deut 11:21-28: “Today I set before you blessing and cursing”; the song of Deborah: “Curse . . . Blessed be . . .” (Judg 5:23-24); Isa 3:10-11 (a beatitude and a vae); Tob 13:14—“Cursed will be all those who hate you; blessed will be all those who love you”; 2Apoc. Bar. 10.6–7: “Happy is the one who was never born . . . but misfortune to us, the living who have seen the sorrows of Zion”; 1 Enoch 99.10–11 (blessed are . . . woe to . . .); Rev 12:12—“Rejoice, O heavens . . . woe to the earth and sea”; b. Yoma 87a : “Happy are the just. Not only do they acquire merit for themselves, but they prepare merit also for their children and infants to the end of all generations. Woe to the wicked. Not only do they become guilty themselves, but they also make their children and infants guilty to the end of all generations”; b. Ber. 61b : “Happy are you, Aqiba, because you were arrested for the words of Torah. Woe to you, Pappos, because you were arrested for empty words”; b. Sukk. 56b : “Abbaye said, ‘Woe to the ungodly, woe to the one close to him! Happy the righteous, and happy the one close to him!’” (Cf. J. Dupont, Béatitudes, vol. 1, pp. 229–342; vol. 3, pp. 28–40). A. Lefèvre, “Malédiction et bénédiction,” in DBSup, vol. 5, col. 746 (analyzes the Hebrew words for “curse”: ‘arar, qalal, ‘alâh, qillel).

⁴⁴ Only three or four examples are known. Epictetus 3.19.1: the profane person says, “Woe to me because of my child, or my brother; woe to me because of my father,” while the philosopher says, “Woe to me (οὐαί μοι) because of myself”; 22.32—“Woe to me (οὐαί μοι) because the Greeks are in danger.” A mime from the second century AD: οὐαί μοι, ταλαίπωρε, ἄκληρε (P.Oxy. 413, 184). An apocryphal gospel: οὐαί, τυφλοὶ μὴ ὀρω—ντες (P.Oxy. 840, 31 and 45). Cf. P.Cologne Mani inv. 4780 (= ZPE 19, 1975, p. 12): οὐαὶ, οὐαὶ, alas, alas, the blood flows (10, 4). This is thought to be an Alexandrian borrowing of the Latin vae, then adopted by Koine.

⁴⁵ Cf. W. Schottroff, Der altisraelistische Fluchspruch, Neukirchen-Vluyn, 1969.

⁴⁶ In the funerary lamentations, “in its simplest form, it was a shrill and repeated cry, which Mic 1:8 compares to that of the jackal or the ostrich” (R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel, vol. 1, p. 60). P. Humbert (Problèmes du livre d’Habucac, Neuchâtel, 1944, pp. 18–23) distributed the occurrences of hōy in the OT among imprecatory particle, exclamation of mourning, exclamatory particle, and threat. It fits especially into the prophetic vocabulary. The most elaborate study is that of J. Vermeylen, Du prophète Isaïe à l’Apocalyptique, Paris, 1978, v 2, pp. 603–652.

⁴⁷ Cf. Prov 23:29—“Who has these ahs? Who has these alases?” (a warning against wine and drunkenness, cf. Isa 5:11, 22; 28:1). Οὐαί can be used alone and absolutely (Luke 17:1) or followed by a dative of person (Matt 11:21; 23:13), a vocative (Luke 6:25), repeated twice (Ezek 16:23) or three times (Rev 8:13), with the nominative for the vocative (Rev 18:10, 19); with the verb (1Cor 9:16—οὐαί μοί ε—στιν); as a substantive: “the woe” (ἡ οὐαί, Job 31:3; Jer 46:19; 51:2; Rev 9:12; 11:14).

⁴⁸ Num 21:219 (cited by Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.225, 231); Zeph 2:5; Isa 10:5; 18:1; Jer 48:1; Ezek 24:9; Jdt 16:17; Eccl 10:16-17; cf. Rev 18:10, 16, 19; Josephus, War 6.306: αἰ—αὶ (sic) Ἱεροσολύμοις.

⁴⁹ Isa 1:4; 5:18; cf. the prophetic complaint against Chorazin and Bethsaida (Matt 11:21; Luke 10:13). A. George, “Paroles de Jésus sur ses miracles,” in J. Dupont, Jésus aux origines de la Christologie, Gembloux, 1975, pp. 293ff.

⁵⁰ Isa 3:11; 5:20; 10:1; 29:15; 30:1; 33:1; Jer 13:27; Hos 7:13; 9:12; Sir 2:12, 13, 14; 41:8.

⁵¹ Cf. the threat of ruin: “Woe to the one who enriches himself with that which is not his own” (Hab 2:6, 12; Isa 5:8); 1QpHab 8.7: “Woe to the one who gets rich off of what does not belong to him”; 9.12: “Woe to the one who plunders wicked plunder”; 10.5; cf. 11.2; 12.4.

⁵² Matt 23:13-16, 23, 25, 27, 29; Luke 11:42-44, 46, 52. We may compare the diatribe against false teachers in Jude 11: “Woe to them, because they have followed the way of Cain; they have given themselves up to the error of Balaam for pay.” These are the ungodly, criminals, the greedy. Cf. G. H. Boobyer, “The Verbs in Jude 11,” in NTS, v 5, 1958, pp. 46–47.

⁵³ Rev 8:13; 9:12; 11:14; 12:12; 18:12; cf. G. Mussies, “ΔΥΟ in Apocalypse IX, 12 and 16,” in NovT, 1967, pp. 151–154.

μαραίνω

maraino, to wither, dry out

maraino, S 3133; EDNT 2.385; MM 388; L&N 13.94; BDF §72; BAGD 491

Jas 1:11 compares the fragility of wealth to that of vegetation scorched by the hot sun: “The sun arises with the searing wind and dries out the plant, whose flower is fallen and lovely appearance lost. Thus the rich person will wither in his undertakings” (houtos kai ho plousios en tais poreiais autou maranthesetai).¹ Used in cultured Greek from Homer on,² marainomai often refers to plants that dry out, flowers that fade.³ The best parallel is Philo, Spec. Laws 1.311: God does not derive glory from wealth, or opinion, or sovereignty, realities that do not partake of the nature of a true good; “the time of their failure comes quickly, and they wither before they have fully come to flower.”⁴

This verb is also used for the sick and for people who are exhausted, or for a disappointed lover,⁵ but especially in epitaphs for those who died prematurely and unexpectedly: “Fate, which ends all things miserably, or the common law of death, consumed me.”⁶

¹ Πορεία: “walk, trip” (Luke 13:22) here has its derivative meaning “move, enterprise, line of conduct” (1*Clem.* 48.4); cf. J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1955, p. 202, n. 46.

² Ps.-Homer, H. Hermes 1.140: extinguish or snuff out coals; cf. Aristotle, Cael. 3.6.305a11: “Fire can end in two ways: by the action of an opposite, when it is extinguished; or on its own, when it dies out” (μαραρινόμενον). Plutarch, Pyrrh. 15.8; Mar. 27.6: the wind weakens or dies down; Aratus, Phaen. 862.

³ Job 15:30 (Hebrew yabesh); 24:24; Wis 2:8—“Let us crown ourselves with rosebuds before they fade”; Plutarch, Pomp. 31.5: “laurels that are dried out and completely withered”; cf. Josephus, Ant. 11.56: beauty fades with time.

⁴ Καιρὸν ὀξὺν ἔχει τῆς μεταβολῆς, μαραινόμενα τρόπον τινά, πρὶν ἀνθῆσαι βεβαίως. Unchang. God 38: dead leaves; Dreams 2.109: the flowers of virtue wither; 199: “let this vine be sterile; let it never have green shoots; let it be forever withered.” As opposed to physical beauty (Joseph 130; Spec. Laws 1.325), beauty of soul does not fade (Moses 2.140). Cf. Enoch 96.6—“You will suddenly receive your recompense; you will be consumed and dried up because you have forsaken the fount of life.”

⁵ Josephus, War 6.274: “Many people worn out by hunger”; Plutarch, Fab. 2.4: “He advised letting Hannibal’s strength dissipate on its own”; Thucydides 2.49.6: “While the disease was active, the body was not exhausted (οὐκ ἐμαραίνετο); it even resisted in a surprising manner”; Hippocrates, Epid. 7.84: a painless swelling near the spleen suddenly went down; Anth. Pal. 5.3: I am consumed by all of these varied shameful sights; T. Sim. 3.3: ὁ δὲ φθονῶ—ν μαραίνεται.

⁶ The dead person who felt good (SEG VIII, 621, 5 = SB 7871 = E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 97); cf. SB 5199, 2; L. Robert, Gladiateurs, n. 41, 8; Moulton-Milligan, on this word. Philo, Migr. Abr. 141: “When the whole sensible realm, which must die, is consumed”; Dreams 1.11: “When physical strength declines, weighed down by years.”

μάρτυς

martys, witness

see also αὐτόπτης

martys, S 3144; TDNT 4.474–408; EDNT 2.393–395; NIDNTT 3.1038, 1041–1044, 1046–1047; MM 390; L&N 20.67, 33.270; BDF §§396, 397(3); BAGD 494

The components of this term’s meaning can be analyzed as follows:
(a) A witness is a person who was present at a material fact or at the accomplishment of a legal action. He is informed because he was there; he saw or heard:¹ “I have seen and I bear witness (martyreo) that he is God’s Chosen One” (John 1:34; cf. verse 15); “We testify concerning that which we have seen” (3:11); “The one who came from heaven testifies concerning that which he has seen and heard.”² God, who knows everything and is everywhere present, from whom nothing is hidden, is the witness par excellence, “faithful and trustworthy.”³

(b) The biblical martyr is not a mere eyewitness,⁴ simply present at a happening; he is active (cf. C.P.Herm. 31, 4: martyras martyrountas; 32, 25), called upon to tell what he has seen and heard, to proclaim what he knows.⁵ The mission of the Twelve is to bear witness to the resurrection of Christ: “You are witnesses of these things” (hymeis martyres touton, Luke 24:48); “You shall be my witnesses” (esesthe mou martyres).⁶ This proclamation is Paul’s calling: “The God of our fathers chose you in advance ... to see the Just One and hear the voice of his mouth, because you shall be a witness to him to all people concerning the things that you have seen and heard” (Acts 22:15; cf. 26:16; 1Cor 1:6; 2:1). The apostle testifies concerning Jesus,⁷ which is why St. John wrote his Gospel and his apocalypse.⁸ All missionary preaching is a martyrion announcing the advent of salvation (1Cor 1:6; 2:1; 2Thess 1:10; 1Tim 2:6; 2Tim 1:8), so that it can be said that the disciples “hold to the testimony of Jesus” (Rev 12:17; cf. 19:10; 20:4; Acts 22:20).

(c) These missionary-preachers are not content to tell about the deeds and words of Jesus—and this is where their testimony differs from a legal witness—they express their personal conviction and identify with the cause that they defend. In proclaiming of the Lordship of Jesus, they make public confession of their faith. It is not simply a matter of reporting facts—which need to be interpreted—but of speaking and vindicating the truth, of somehow insisting on doing it justice. In the secular world, legal actions were originally oral actions done in the presence of witnesses, and subsequently these actions done in writing, so witnesses sign and authenticate the document, guaranteeing its validity.⁹ The document could be a will, an adoption, a contract, the renewal of a lease, etc.;¹⁰ also “the witnesses’ names are written in the act” (P.Magd. 12, 3), and their deposition is often confirmed by an oath.¹¹ When there are a great many witnesses, as in 2Tim 2:2; Heb 12:1, their credibility is heightened, their persuasion is stronger, and the validity of their testimony is strengthened.¹² In many texts in the NT, as in the papyri, the witness does not stop at supplying proofs, “he vouched for the outcome of the matter in which he had taken part. The witness was originally a defender and assistant. He was responsible not only to tell what he had seen and heard, but more than that to intervene in the suit. The witness was really a guarantor and stood surety.”¹³ Testimony, in the prophetic and kerygmatic sense (Rev 11:3), is thus not only a means of persuasion (Aristotle, Rh. 1.1354a1–7), but it adds the seal of conviction, which guarantees the truthfulness of the message. It is above all in this sense of “guarantor” that we must interpret the expression “Jesus, the faithful and true witness” (Rev 1:5; 3:14; cf. engyos, Heb 7:22), just as God had stood surety for him (John 8:18; cf. 3:33; 6:27; 1John 5:9). The same thing is true of the martyrion embodied in missionary preaching (2Thess 1:10; 1Tim 2:6; 2Tim 1:8), for the apostle devotes himself to it body and soul. The same is even the case with the scribes and Pharisees: “Woe to you, because you build the tombs of the prophets, when it was your fathers who killed them. Thus you are witnesses.”¹⁴

(d) So there is not only oral testimony; actions also are part of the act of testifying—martyria ton ergon.¹⁵ The supreme testimony, leaving no room for discussion, is the “testimony” of the self, the giving up of life: martyrdom. At the end of the first century, the name martys was given to the Christian who had sealed his profession of faith with his blood; for example, at Pergamum, there was “Antipas, my faithful witness, who was killed among you.”¹⁶

(e) Testimony is given before hearers (cf. Epictetus 3.24.113) who form an opinion on what has happened on the basis of the solidity of the account that they hear and the credibility of the martys. NT witnesses, if they are set on proclaiming the gospel message, have as their main goal to persuade: “so that you may also believe.”¹⁷

¹ Lev 5:1—“If someone sins in that he heard the adjuration to testify and, although he was a witness (Hebrew ‘ed) and either saw something or knew something, did not testify, and thus incurred guilt. . . .”

² John 3:32; cf. 19:35; 21:24; 1John 1:2—“Life was manifested, and we have seen, and we bear witness (ε—ωράκαμεν καὶ μαρτυροῦμεν) and we announce to you . . .”; 4:14—“We have seen and we bear witness”; Rev 1:2. Cf. Jer 29:23—“It is I who know and bear witness”; John 8:14—“My testimony is true, because I know whence I have come and whither I am going.” “The creditor says that he has witnesses who know (μάρτυρας ε—πισταμένους) that the deceased owed him two solidi” (P.Apoll. 24, 5); “Stotoëtis says . . . that there were people present who could testify concerning the murder” (παρει—ναι τοὺς μαρτυρήσαι δυναμένους τὸν φόνον, P.Amh. 66, 35). In birth certificates, the witnesses who certify the identity are γνωστῆρες (P.Oxy. 1451, 27).

³ Jer 42:5; cf. Job 16:19; Wis 1:6—“God is a witness of a person’s inmost self, a sincere observer of his heart; and what his tongue speaks God hears”; Ps 19:8—“The testimony (μαρτυρία, Hebrew ‘edût) of the Lord is sure”; Sir 31:23. In oath formulas, God is called as witness (θεὸς μάρτυς), cf. Gen 31:44; 1Sam 20:23, 42; Mal 3:5; Rom 1:9; 2Cor 1:23; Phil 1:8; 1Thess 2:5, 10. 1John 5:9—“God’s testimony is greater than that of humans”; Josephus, War 1.595; Ant. 1.209; T. Levi 19.3; cf. SEG IX, 7, 24 (=SB 9935), μάρτυρας δὲ τοῦτων ποιοῦμαι Δία τε τὸν Καπετώλιον καὶ τοὺς μεγάλους θεοὺς καὶ τὸν Ἥλιον (Cyrene, 155 BC; cf. T. Liebmann-Frankfort, “Valeur juridique et signification politique des testaments faits par les rois hellénistiques en faveur des Romains,” in RIDA, 1966, pp. 73–94). P.Oxy. 471, 64: μαρτύρονται, Κύριε, τὴν σὴν τύχην; P.Mert. 46, 11: μάρτυρα ἔχω θεὸν τοῦ θεοῦ; Philostratus, Gym. 45; Plutarch, De Alex. fort. 2.6: διὰ θεοῦ—ν μαρτύρων; Philo, Decalogue 86: “An oath is God’s testimony invoked concerning contested matters”; Joseph 265: “I call God as witness to my conscience, to guarantee my loyalty to my commitments.” The verb μαρτύρομαι, “I solemnly attest, I swear” (Acts 26:22; Gal 5:3; Eph 4:17; 1Thess 2:12), is often confused in the Koine with μαρτυρέω, “I am witness”; cf. P.Cair.Isid. 62, 25; 66, 18; 70, 9; P.Oslo 128, 16; P.Princ. 38, 5; SB 7518, 10; 8265, 4; P.Thead. 21, 16: “I address this petition to you and can prove it through witnesses.”

⁴ Ἀυτόπτης, Luke 1:2. Like Xerxes at the battle of Salamina (Herodotus 8.69), Titus is present at the siege of Jerusalem, not as a mere spectator, but as a judge to punish or reward the actions of the soldiers, αυτόπτης καὶ μάρτυς (Josephus, War 6.134). In Wis 1:6, God is a witness in order to punish. Cf. the deposition of a witness, telling what he has seen (P.Hib. 200), and his response to the judge’s questioning (P.Amh. 30; UPZ 119 and 120; cf. P.Cair.Zen. 59347; SB 6762).

⁵ Sometimes in the most commonplace sense: to attest to someone’s good conduct, testify concerning services performed: 2Cor 8:3; Luke 4:22; Josephus, Ant. 6.355; 12.134; 15.130; P.Oxy. 930, 16; 2407, 4; 2775, 10; P.Brem. 61, 19: οἶδα γὰρ πω—ς με τειμα—ς καὶ μαρτυρω— πολλάκις πα—σι ἃ πεποίηκάς μοι; P.Mich. 203, 16; 499, 10; Dittenberger, Syl. 374, 37; IGLS 1303, 15; MAMA VI, 97, 12 (cf. L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 3, p. 22; L. Robert, Etudes anatoliennes, pp. 343–350).

⁶ Acts 1:8; cf. 1:22; 2:32—“That God raised this Jesus we are all witnesses”; 3:15; 5:32; 10:39–42: “We are witnesses of all that he did in the land of the Jews and at Jerusalem. . . . God raised him on the third day and allowed him to be seen, not by all the people, but by witnesses chosen in advance by God, us who ate and drank with him, after he was raised from the dead; and he commanded us to preach to the people and to bear witness (κήρυξαι καὶ διαμαρτύρασθαι) that he is the judge, appointed by God, of the living and the dead”; John 15:27; Acts 4:33. Cf. E. Burnier, La Notion de témoignage dans the N.T., Lausanne, 1939; L. Cerfaux, “Témoins du Christ,” in Angelicum, 1943, pp. 166–183 (reprinted in Recueil L. Cerfaux, vol. 2, pp. 157–174); P.H. Menoud, “Jésus et ses témoins,” in Eglise et théologie, 1960, pp. 1–14; H. Anderson, “The Easter Witness of the Evangelists,” in Essays in Memory of G. H. C. MacGregor, Oxford, 1965, pp. 35–55; E. Güttgemanns, Der leidende Apostel und sein Herr, Göttingen, 1966; O. Michel, “Zeuge und Zeugnis,” in Neues Testament und

Geschichte (Festschrift O. Cullmann), Tübingen, 1972, pp. 15–31; A. A. Trites, New Testament Concept of Witness, Cambridge, 1977.

⁷ Acts 22:18—σου μαρτυρίαν περὶ ἐ—μοῦ; cf. 23:11; 26:22; 1Cor 15:15—“If Christ is not risen . . . we are false witnesses of God, because we have testified in spite of God that he raised Christ.” The mission of John the Baptist was to provide a μαρτυρία for Jesus that would identify him (John 1:7, 15, 19).

⁸ John 19:35—“The one who has seen bears witness—and his testimony is truthful—and that one knows that he speaks the truth”; 21:24; Rev 1:9.

⁹ The persons called to witness seal the document: ἐ—μαρτύρατο τοὺς τόδε τὸ μαρτυροποιήμα σφραγίζειν μέλλοντας (P.Oxy. 1114, 23); cf. P.Princ. 38, 5; SB 7518, 10; 8265, 4.

¹⁰ P.Ryl. 160 a 6: “We ordered the witnesses to sign” (from AD 14–37; cf. 582, 21). The plural μάρτυρες, introducing the names of witnesses, appears from the third century BC (P.Corn. 2, 15; P.Sorb. 15, 15). In the second century, there would be as many as six witnesses (P.Tebt. 818, 23 = C.Pap.Jud. 24), seven (N. Lewis, “A Centurion’s Will Linking Two of the Fourth-Century Karanis Archives,” in Proceedings XIII, pp. 227ff.), and even fourteen, on an act of emancipation at Delphi (J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. 42, 11; cf. CII 709–711); but P.Oxy. 1298, 10: “I have you as my only witness”; P.Oxy. 1162, 14: “Emmanuel is my witness.” Cf. P.Fouad 32, 17: “presenting this copy, and producing as witnesses, among those who witnessed the will, Dionysius, Diogenes, Sarapion,” etc.; P.Dura 15, 7; 17, 9; 19, 18; P.Cair.Isid. 74, 14; 79, 16; P.Mich. 287, 15; P.Mert. 6, 30; 75, 20; 91, 15; P.Ross.Georg. II, 6, 31; SB 8974, col. III, 42; 9377, 13; 9642, col. I, 17; col. IV, 18. Similarly μαρτυρέω, P.Oxy. 105, 13: Σαραπίων . . . μαρτυρω—, “I Sarapion, am witness”; P.Dura 23, 13–15; 27, 5–7; 29, 23–24; 31, 56–58; P.Oxf. 16, 19–21; P.Princ. 82, 91–94; P.Ness. 16, 45; 45, 13–14; P.Rein. 107, 7: “I am a witness of the guarantee that I heard from Eiot, who is also the contracting party”; P.Apoll. 57, 3: “Papnouthis, notary of Apollonopolis of Amont . . . I witness to the present contract”; 58, 4; P.Alex. 38, 7; P.Oxy. 2237, 23: μαρτυρω— τω— γραμματίῳ ὡς πρόκειται; Pap. Lugd.Bat. XVI, 13, 17–22.

¹¹ P.Hal. 222–223; cf. E. Seidl, Der Eid im Ptolemäischen Recht, Munich, 1929; W. Hellebrand, Das Prozeßzeugnis im Rechte der gräko-ägyptischen Papyri, Munich, 1934. In the Hellenistic period, in Greece and at Rome, a witness is called in to help one of the parties in a legal process, which is an agon, (cf. Heb 12:1). By the position that he takes he manifests his solidarity with one of the parties in the facts to which he testifies; he confirms or denies (μαρτυρει—ν) the deposition (μαρτυρία) that is given to him (cf. C. Préaux, “La Preuve à l’époque hellénistique principalement dans l’Egypte grecque,” in La Preuve, Recueils de la Société J. Bodin XVI, 1, p. 213; B. Cohen, “Testimonial Compulsion in Jewish, Roman and Moslem Law,” in Iura, vol. 9, 1958, pp. 1–21). Hence the expression μαρτυρει— μοι, “He bears witness for me” (P. Enteux. 86; P. Cair. Zen. 59347; SB 6762), and the μαρτύριον of Matt 10:17; Mark 13:9; cf. Matt 24:14.

¹² In a criminal case, the testimony of a single witness cannot be accepted (Deut 19:15; Matt 18:16; 2Cor 13:1; 1Tim 5:19; Heb 10:28; Josephus, Ant. 4.219; H. Van Vliet, No Single Testimony, Utrecht, 1958). In Heb 12:1, the “cloud” is a noble image for a crowd; cf. Heliodorus, Aeth. 9.5.10; Aristophanes, Av. 295, 578 (cf. J. Taillardat, Images d’Aristophane, p. 378). Cf. Ps.-Longinus, Subl. 14.2: great heroes are our judges and witnesses; Tacitus, Germ. 7.4; Plutarch, De gen. 24. Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.17, contrasts οι— πολλοί and ἅπαντες μεμαρτυρήκασιν, and notes that Gaius considered it impossible to break his word “before so many witnesses” (Ant. 18.299).

¹³ F. Pringsheim, “Le Témoignage dans la Grèce et Rome archaïque,” in RIDA, vol. 6, 1951, p. 162; cf. vol. 10, 1963, p. 260; B. Moreau, “La Notion d’évangélisation chez saint Paul,” in LTP, 1968, p. 264; N. Brox, Zeuge und Märtyrer, Munich, 1961; idem, “Témoignage,” in Encyclopédie de la foi, Paris, 1967, vol. 4, pp. 285–294.

¹⁴ Luke 11:48—ἄρα μάρτυρές ε—στε. The builders seal the crime of their ancestors. They take part in it and stand surety for it; cf. Bo Reicke, “Zum Begriff ‘Martys’” in Nuntius, vol. 7, 1952, p. 52.

¹⁵ John 10:25, 37-38; 5:36; cf. μαρτύριον ὀρθοῦ βίου (Kaibel, Epigrammata, 397, 1; Josephus, Ant. 6.346: τὴν μαρτυρίαν ε—π ἄρετῆ; IGLS, I, 53: ε—μῆς εὐσεβείας ἔχη μάρτυρα; SB 5628, 4: “their heart performed well; I was witness.” Cf. in the fourth century, “the canal that he had cleared out, not without toil” is a “testimony to the valiant Alexander” and a reward for his labors, in E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 124, 2). Through his conduct, the witness demonstrates his conviction: μαρτυρίαν ποιήσασθαι (P. Fay. 21, 22; P. Ant. 100, 3; P. Dura 17, 28; Epictetus 1.29.47–49, 56; 3.22.86; 4.8.32). Cf. Pap. Lugd. Bat. VI, 38, 15; SB 7363, 15; P. Ant. 88, 12 (cf. J. Bingen, “La Pétition P. Ant. II, 88,” in Essays in Honor of C. Bradford Welles (American Studies in Papyrology), vol. 1, New Haven, 1966, pp. 231–234). Thus the testimony of the believer is distinguished from that of the false witness, 1Cor 15:15 (cf. C. Beffré, “Le Témoignage comme expérience et comme langage,” in E. Castelli, Le Témoignage, Paris, 1972, pp. 291–307). The false witness prefers lies (Prov 6:19; 12:17; 14:5, 25; 19:5, 9; 21:28), deceives his hearers (Prov 24:28) and can be the object of legal action (P.Hal., pp. 24–78). Greedy or miserly Christians would be denounced by their gold or silver, εἰς μαρτύριον ὑμῶν—ν ἔσται (Jas 5:3; cf. Gen 21:30; 31:44; Deut 31:12, 26). The true witness is characterized by objectivity and rectitude: ἀγαθοῦ γὰρ ταῦτ ἔσται μάρτυρος ὡς ἀρεψίας καὶ ὀρθότητος σημει—α (SB 7183, 2; Dittenberger, Syl. 344, 43). On competence to give testimony, cf. the minimum age (P.Cair.Zen. 59491), slaves (P.Lille 1, 29; PSI 406, 43), women (P.Cair.Zen. 59443; P.Amh. 30; P.Enteux. 4, verso 11); women were refused in rabbinic jurisprudence (Gen. Rab. 20 (13c 33); Pirqe R. El. 14; Josephus, Ant. 4.219; cf. Str-B, vol. 3, p. 251), but with exceptions (m. Rosh Hash. 1.8; cf. Str-B, vol. 3, p. 560).

¹⁶ Rev 2:13 (cf. G. Mussies, “Antipas,” in NovT, 1964, pp. 242–244; T. Holtz, Die Christologie der Apokalypse des Johannes, Berlin, 1962, pp. 55ff.); 6:9; cf. 17:6—“I saw the woman become drunk with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus” (μεθύουσαν ἐ—κ τοῦ αἵματος τῶ—ν μαρτύρων —Ἰησοῦ); Acts 22:20. P.Ross.Georg. III, 55, 7: “Justos, oikonomos of the holy church of the great martyr Theodoros”; P.Oxy. 1357, 5; IGLS 297, 1; 2513; 2524, 3; 2530; I.Thas., n. 363; SB 7439, 8; cf. T. Camelot, “L’Engagement chrétien: Du baptême au martyre,” in Nova et Vetera, 1949, pp. 326, 348; T. W. Manson, “Martyrs and Martyrdom,” in BJRL, 1957, pp. 463–484; P. Rossano, “Le Témoignage du nom chrétien dans les Actes des Martyrs du IIe siècle,” in Castelli, Le Témoignage, pp. 331–340; A. A. Trites, “Μάρτυς and Martyrdom in the Apocalypse,” in NovT, 1973, pp. 72–80; E. Günther, ΜΑΡΤΥΣ: Die Geschichte eines Wortes, Gütersloh, 1941; idem, “Zeuge und Märtyrer,” in ZNW, 1956, pp. 145–161.

¹⁷ John 19:35; cf. 1:7. Cf. Socrates: “I want to prove to him (βούλομαι ἀντὶ— μαρτυρηῆσαι) that the love of the soul is better than that of the body” (Xenophon, Symp. 8.12). Cf. I. de la Potterie, “La Notion de témoignage dans saint Jean,” in Sacra Pagina, Paris-Gembloux, 1959, vol. 2, pp. 193–208; idem, “Jean-Baptiste et Jésus témoins de la vérité dans le IVe Evangile,” in Castelli, Le Témoignage, pp. 317–329; B. Trépanier, “Contribution à une recherche de l’idée de témoin dans les écrits johanniques,” in Revue de l’Université d’Ottawa, vol. 15, 1945, pp. 5–63; C. Masson, “Le Témoignage de Jean,” in RTP, 1950, pp. 120–127; J. C. Hindley, “Witness in the Fourth Gospel,” in SJT, 1965, pp. 319–337; J. M. Boice, Witness and Revelation in the Gospel of John, Grand Rapids, 1970; J. Beutler, Das Zeugnisthema im Johannesevangelium unter Berücksichtigung der Johannesbriefe, Rome, 1971.

μαστιγῶ, μαστίζω, μάστιξ

mastigoo, mastizo, to whip; mastix, whip, scourge

mastigoo, S 3146; TDNT 4.515–518; EDNT 2.395–396; NIDNTT 1.161–164; MM 390; L&N 19.9, 38.11; BAGD 495 | mastizo, S 3147; TDNT 4.515–518; EDNT 2.396; NIDNTT 1.161–162; MM 390; L&N 19.9; BAGD 495 | mastix, S 3148; TDNT 4.518–519; EDNT 2.396; NIDNTT 1.161–163; MM 390; L&N 19.9, 23.153; BAGD 495

The whip (mastix) was not only used for correcting horses (Prov 26:3; cf. Nah 3:12; Diodorus Siculus 17.60.4) but was the special implement of Israelite discipline (Hebrew mûsar), whether wielded by the father against his children,¹ by the authorities against lawbreakers,² or by God himself for the perfecting or purifying of his own people³ as well as for the punishing of sinners.⁴ The theia mastix (2Macc 9:11; cf. 3:26), obviously metaphorical,⁵ encompasses all the evils inflicted upon humans, especially sicknesses and diseases—“as many as had afflictions” (hosoi eichon mastigas)⁶—which were considered to be punishment for sins.

Beatings were painful and cruel⁷ and could lead to death (Xenophon, Cyr. 1.3.18; Cicero, Verr. 2.4, 39, 85, “moriere virgis”; Dig. 48.19.8.3: “plerique dum torquentur deficere solent”). Beginning with Deut 25:2-3, whipping is a judicial punishment⁸ and a method of torture.⁹ In use in the first century, it was applied to the disciples: “They will whip you in their synagogues” (Matt 10:17); “I send you prophets, sages, scribes. Some of them you will kill and crucify, and some you will whip in your synagogues and chase from city to city.”¹⁰ In the Greco-Roman world, the whip was a punishment or torture reserved for slaves,¹¹ at least according to the law;¹² thus it is understandable that St. Paul should have said to the centurion, “Are you permitted to whip a Roman citizen who has not been condemned?”¹³ Customarily whipping was carried out after a death sentence had been passed (Matt 27:26; Mark 15:15). But according to John 19:1, “then Pilate took Jesus and had him whipped”; the procurator was not satisfied that the accused was guilty, but only wanted to give some satisfaction to the accusers by having Jesus punished so that he could then set him free.¹⁴

Because the custom (synetheia, John 18:39) was to free a prisoner at each Passover,¹⁵ Pilate offered to release Jesus or Barabbas. Was this really a pardon (indulgentia) or an abolitio to forestall sentencing, carried out at the great festivals? Exegetes differ as to the legal character of this proceeding, which has no basis in imperial law.¹⁶ But that is just the point: this is not a matter of official, written law, but a custom that varied from country to country, depending more or less on the will of the authorities, whereby amnesty was granted to prisoners on the occasion of a great festival.¹⁷ The twofold witness of Mark and John is beyond suspicion.

According to John 18:39, in Palestine this ritual was attached to the Passover, the religious festival celebrating the anniversary of the liberation of the chosen people.¹⁸ A case in which an official took similar initiative has been pointed out by A. Deissmann;¹⁹ it is the account of a hearing in the year 85, in which the prefect of Egypt, G. Septimus Vegetus, addresses Phibion: “You deserve to be whipped (axios men es mastigothenai) . . . however, I will pardon you as a concession to the crowd.”²⁰

¹ Sir 30:1—“Whoever loves his son will continually whip him”; 22:6—“Rods and discipline belong to wisdom”; cf. Jer 5:3; 6:7; Prov 19:25.

² 1Kgs 12:14; 2Chr 10:11, 14; Prov 19:29; Sir 40:9—for sinners, “death, blood, discord, the sword, distress, destruction, the whip”; 2Macc 7:1, the king wants to compel the seven brothers, “by torturing them with whips and cords, to partake of the pork, which was forbidden by the law.” Cf. 4Macc 6:3, 6; 9:12; Acts 22:24—the chiliarch orders that Paul be whipped and questioned. The policeman (μαστιγοφόρος, P.Tebt. 179) effectively whips delinquents (P.Cair.Zen. 59080, 4).

³ Heb 12:6; Jdt 8:27; Jer 5:3; Tob 11:15; 13:2, 4, 10; Prov 3:12; Wis 12:22.

⁴ Ps 89:33—“I will punish their transgression with the rod and their guilt with blows”; 32:10 (cited by 1Clem. 22.8); 39:11; Sir 23:11; Wis 16:16—“the godless have been whipped with the strength of your arm”; cf. Job 21:9—“the rod of God is not upon them”; Heliodorus is “scourged by heaven” (2Macc 3:34). Eschatological punishment is referred to as an “eternal whip” in the epitaph of Gemellus of Emeneia in the third century: λήψεται παρὰ τοῦ ἀθανάτου θεοῦ μάστιγα αἰ—ώνιον (published by L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 11–12, Paris, 1960, pp. 436–439); a formula more Jewish than Christian, cf. Pss. Sol. 10.1—“Happy the man whom the Lord has remembered to correct, who has been turned away from evil with the whip”; the citation of Ps 91:10—“the whip will not approach your tent,” in IGLS, 1483; Enoch 22.11; 25.6.

⁵ Like Sir 23:2—“Who will apply the whip to my thoughts and training in wisdom through discipline to my heart?”; Ps 73:5, 14; and above all “the whip of the tongue,” a scourge that wreaks such havoc; Job 5:21; Sir 26:6; 28:17; 1Clem. 56.10.

⁶ Mark 3:10; cf. 5:29, 34; Luke 7:21 (J. F. Craghan, “A Redactional Study of Lk VII, 21 in the Light of Dt XIX, 15,” in CBQ, 1967, pp. 353–367); cf. G. Crespy, La Guérison par la foi, Neuchâtel-Paris, 1952; J. Hempel, “Heilung als Symbol und Wirklichkeit in biblischen Schriften,” in Nachrichten der

Akad. der Wiss. in Göttingen, I, Philolog.-histor. Klasse, n. 3, Göttingen, 1958, pp. 237–314; G. von Rad, OT Theology, vol. 1, pp. 272ff.

⁷ 2Macc 6:30, cf. 3:38; Sir 30:14; PSI 28, 4: πικραι—ς μάστιξιν; cf. Horace, Sat. 1.2.41: “ille flagellis ad mortem caesus”; 1.3.119: “horribile flagellum.”

⁸ Cf. Diodorus Siculus 1.77; Josephus, Life 147: “I had the most ambitious of the band (of brigands) beaten severely, I ordered that his hand be cut off and he be hanged by the neck, and in this condition I sent him back to those who had sent him to me”; P.Oxy. 2339, 10–11 (first century); PSI 816, 6; P.Tebt. 797, 11; UPZ 119, 39 and 44.

⁹ Heb 11:36—“Others endured mocking and whipping”; Philo, Flacc. 85: “The Jews were whipped, hanged, put on the wheel, tortured, and put to death”; Josephus, War 2.306–308: “Florus, at his tribunal, had whipped and crucified those men of equestrian rank who, although they were Jews by birth, had that Roman dignity”; 5.449, the Jerusalemites captured during Titus’s siege, “whipped and tortured in the cruelest fashion, were crucified by the Romans opposite the rampart”; SEG VIII, 246, 17. On the linking of insults and whipping, cf. UPZ 12, 39.

¹⁰ Matt 23:34. There is a tendency to consider verses 34–36 as a quotation from an otherwise unknown Jewish writing in which Wisdom is speaking; Jesus would be using the text for his own purpose (S. Légasse, “Scribes et disciples de Jésus,” in RB, 1961, pp. 323–332). M. D. Dubarle compares the Ethiopic version of Jub. 1.12 (“L’Inspiration de la Septante,” in RSPT, 1965, p. 222, n. 7). Cf. O. J. F. Seitz, “The Commission of Prophets and ‘Apostles’: A Re-examination of Matthew XXIII, 34 with Luke XI, 49,” in F. L. Cross, SE, vol. 4, pp. 236–240.

¹¹ Tob 3:9, the servants to the daughter of Raguel: “Why are you whipping us?”; Epictetus 4.1.39; P.Oxy. 903, 9; 1643, 11: if a runaway slave is caught, he is thrown in prison and whipped. In the second century BC, a regulation by the astynomoi of Pergamum forbids the polluting of public fountains. If the offender is a free man, he is fined and his cattle confiscated; if he is a slave who has acted on his master’s orders, he is shackled and beaten with fifty lashes. If he acted on his own initiative, he will be beaten with a hundred lashes and will remain in chains for ten days; when he is freed, he will receive not less than fifty lashes (Dittenberger, Or. 483, 177 = SEG XIII, 521, 190ff.). A legal fragment from the third century AD, “let the one who received the slave have him beaten with at least a hundred lashes and marked on the forehead, conformably to the terms of the regulation” (P.Lille 29, col. II, 34; but col. I, 15: “no one shall be allowed to sell slaves for export, nor to mark them, nor to whip them”); Pap.Lugd.Bat. XVI, 33, 20: μαστιγοῦν ὡς δούλους (AD 147). In the fourth century, the praeses of the Thebaid, Aurelius Herodes, declares that the use of the whip (ι—μάντες) for slaves is distressing (ἀνιαρόν) if not forbidden outright, but that for free men it is illegal and unjust (P.Oxy. 1186).

¹² Cf. under Tiberius, “not only were slaves tortured for testimony against their masters, but also free men and citizens” (Dio Cassius 57.19). On Jewish and Roman laws concerning whipping, cf. C. Schneider, “μαστιγῶω,” in TDNT, vol. 4, pp. 515–519.

¹³ Acts 22:25; the verb μαστιζῶ, used here, is not as strong as the intensive μαστιγῶω or the Latinizing φραγελλῶω (Matt 27:26; Mark 15:15), although they are both used to translate the Hebrew najâh (Num 22:25; cf. Wis 5:11—the air beaten by the wings of a bird) and can be synonymous (Gos. Pet. 9); here it seems to be deliberately chosen as a euphemism.

¹⁴ Luke 23:16, 22; cf. A. N. Sherwin-White, Roman Society, pp. 24–47; T. A. Burkill, “The Condemnation of Jesus,” in NovT, 1970, pp. 321–342.

¹⁵ Cf. Mark 15:6—“at each feast, he freed a prisoner for them, the one for whom they interceded.” J. Colin (Les Villes libres de l’orient gréco-romain et l’envoi au supplice par acclamation populaire, Brussels, 1965, pp. 36–37) proposes that Herod must have suggested to Pilate that he assemble the crowd (συνηγμένων) to decide the fate of Jesus. This popular intervention in criminal trials was expressed in the Greco-Roman world by cries (ε—πιβόησις, ἀναβόησας; cf. Matt 27:22–23; Mark 15:18; Acts 25:24), which amounted to a vote of condemnation or grace (cf. H. Z. Maccoby, “Jesus and Barabbas,” in NTS, vol. 16, 1969, pp. 55–60). Thus the governor of Lyon, to please the crowd—τω— ὄχλῳ χαριζόμενος—would hand over Attalus to the beasts (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 5.1.50; republished by H. Musurillo, Christian Martyrs, p. 78). Cf. the demands of the people at the coming of Archelaus, “crying out to him to free the prisoners” (Josephus, War 2.4) and b. Pesah. 8.6a, which mentions as a guest at the Passover “the one who has been assured that he will be freed from prison” (C. B. Cheval, “The Releasing of a Prisoner on the Eve of Passover,” in JBL, 1941, pp. 273–278); Cf. J. Blinzler, Trial of Jesus, pp. 205–221.

¹⁶ See C. K. Barrett, St. John, p. 448; R. E. Brown, John, vol. 2, p. 855.

¹⁷ Cf. vol. 2, p. 455, n. 14; some cite as a Roman analogy the lectisternia (Livy 5.13; Dionysius of Halicarnassus 12.9), but the prisoners were only freed from their chains for a week, after which they were put back in irons.

¹⁸ Even if Passover, a spring festival, is admitted to be a feast of the new year, celebrated by family rites independent from the sanctuary and the altar (L. Segal, The Hebrew Passover, from the Earliest Times to A.D. 70, Leiden, 1963), it must be acknowledged that the ritual “actualized” the original liberation. Since it was a memorial of deliverance, it is natural enough that it should have been celebrated by the liberation of a prisoner, like those carried out elsewhere with other themes, but with a legal basis.

¹⁹ A. Deissmann, Light, pp. 269–270.

²⁰ P.Flor. 61, 59, 61: χαρίζομαι δέ σε τοι—ς ὄχλοις καὶ φιλανθρωπότερός σοι ἔσομαι; republished by Chrest.Wilck., n. 80. Cf. A. Steinwenter, “Bibel und Rechtsgeschichte,” in JJP, vol. 15, 1965, p. 9. —On χαρίζομαι, “concede, grant” as a favor, especially with respect to “making a gift of” a prisoner (Acts 3:14; 25:11, 16; Phlm 22; Plutarch, C. Gracch. 4.3), cf. J. Dupont (“Aequitas Romana,” in RSR, 1961, pp. 359ff.), who concludes: “Luke uses χαρίζομαι in the precise sense that the verb has with reference to a magistrate who, rather than holding to the letter of the law, departs from it in order to oblige those who appeal to his leniency” (p. 361).

μεγαλει—ος, μεγαλειότης, μεγαλοπρεπής, μεγαλύνω,
μεγαλωσύνη, μέγεθος

megaleios, sovereign, mighty, magnificent; megaleiotes, greatness, grandeur; megaloprepes, magnificent; megalyno, to magnify, exalt, call great; megalosyne, majesty, greatness; megethos, greatness

megaleios, S 3167; TDNT 4.541; EDNT 2.398; MM 392; L&N 76.8; BAGD 496 | megaleiotes, S 3168; TDNT 4.541–542; EDNT 2.399; NIDNTT 2.424–426; MM 392; L&N 76.2, 87.21; BAGD 496 | megaloprepes, S 3169; TDNT 4.542–543; EDNT 2.399; MM 392; L&N 12.6, 79.14; BAGD 497 | megalyno, S 3170; TDNT 4.543; EDNT 2.399; NIDNTT 2.424–425; MM 392; L&N 33.358, 79.124, 87.15; BAGD 497 | megalosyne, S 3172; TDNT 4.544; EDNT 2.399; NIDNTT 2.424–426; MM 392; L&N 12.5, 87.21; BAGD 497 | megethos, S 3174; TDNT 4.544; EDNT 2.401; MM 393; L&N 78.2; BAGD 498

I. — According to Sir 45:24, God granted to Phinehas and his descendants “the sovereign dignity of the priesthood” (hierosynes megaleion). In AD 37, to megaleion is used for the emperor (Dittenberger, Syl. 798, 4). In the third-fourth century, it is a title used for an authority to whom a petition is addressed (deomai tou sou megaliou, P.Michael. 30, 10), whether the prefect,¹ the strategos (P.Oxy. 1204, 10; 2113, 21;

P.Mert. 91, 18; P.Panop. Beatty 2, 157), the logistes (PSI 767, 12; P.Oxy. 2187, 6, 22), the defensor civitatis (P.Ross.Georg. V, 27, 11). But when the crowd at Pentecost is said to have marveled at hearing in their own languages ta megaleia tou theou (Acts 2:11; NT hapax), the expression is based on the LXX, where the word is used only with a religious meaning:² God's grandeur (Deut 11:2, Hebrew godel), power (Sir 43:15; 2Macc 3:34; 7:17), wisdom (Sir 42:21), glory (17:13). The word suggests mighty deeds, magnificent works,³ such as creation, the miracles surrounding the exodus, or salvific manifestations (3Macc 7:22). They are evident, and they bring praise to their author.

The noun megaleiotes similarly refers to the grandeur of God,⁴ but also to that of his people (Dan 7:27; Hebrew rebû) and of Solomon (2Esdr 4:10). In the papyri, it is used for the greatness of the pyramids (Dittenberger, Or. 666, 26 = SB 8303, first century) and as an honorific title (P.Oslo 83, 13; P.Oxy. 2131, 17; 3028, 6), especially for the emperor from the first century on. Claudius writes to the Alexandrians in 41: "Each one reading this letter individually will wonder at the majesty of our god Caesar and show gratitude."⁵

II. —According to Anaximenes, to megaloprepesteron is the opposite of to tapeinoteron (Rhet. ad Alex. 2.3.32; cf. 2.6.4). In 112 BC, Hermias asks Horus to receive the Roman senator Lucius Memmius with special magnificence.⁶ Megaloprepes is the adjective for Jeremiah in 2Macc 15:13, and in the papyri of the fifth to seventh centuries is it used for anyone at all who is being honored or asked for a favor: a secretary (P.Oxy. 1843, 1), a benefactor (PSI 1425 recto 9), a master (P.Lond. 1786, 2, 30; P.Ant. 198 verso), an archon (Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 8, 6; P.Mert. 43, 16, 25; SB 9453, 4), a praeses provinciae,⁷ and consuls (P.Stras. 317, 1; P.Ness. 15, 1). In the eighth century, the term became purely a stock phrase used in letter-writing, as can be seen in the papyri of Apollonos Ano, which are weighted down with "your magnificent Brotherliness" (P.Apoll. 9, 1; 15, 1; 26, 1; 55, 2) or "Friendliness" (21, 1) and the ridiculous "I embrace your Magnificence through this letter" (31, 6; 46, 11). But in the Bible, megaloprepes always retains its meaning as a designation for God (Deut 33:26; 2Macc 8:15). At the transfiguration, the voice comes from "the magnificent glory," meaning the divine glory;⁸ cf. the megalosyne of Heb 1:3.

III. —There is no meaningful pagan parallel to the biblical megalyno,⁹ which in some instances is used in a secular way,¹⁰ for if a person¹¹ or a kingdom¹² grows in stature and in power, this increase is the fruit of divine blessing (Gen 12:2; 1Chr 29:25; 2Chr 1:1; Sir 45:2; Wis 19:22). The word has religious meaning in that the faith confesses that God is great,¹³ as are his grace (Ps 57:10) and his works (1Sam 12:24). Furthermore, to call God great, or magnify him (megalyno) is to exalt or celebrate him,¹⁴ which is the principal business of the psalmist: "I will exalt the name of Elohim through thanksgiving" (Ps 69:31). So also the Virgin Mary: "My soul magnifies the Lord.”¹⁵ Again, it is in line with the LXX use of the word when St. Paul speaks of magnifying Christ by his life or by his death, i.e., giving him glory and praise, because the Lord is exalted when the gospel is proclaimed.¹⁶ This nuance can already be detected in 1Cor 10:15—“As your faith grows, we shall be enlarged in our sphere of action, among you and even beyond” (cf. 1QH 5.25; Odes Sol. 29.1, 11).

If God’s mercy shows his greatness (Luke 1:58), believers proclaim it (Acts 10:46; 19:17); and they also exalt his apostles (5:13).

IV. — Megalosyne, unknown in the papyri,¹⁷ is a divine attribute: “Yahweh is great and worthy of praise, and his majesty (Hebrew geʿôlâh) is unsearchable,”¹⁸ sometimes associated with his power,¹⁹ sometimes with his mercy.²⁰ Finally, the word is used as a name for God himself: the great high priest has taken his seat on high, in the heavens, “at the right hand of the Majesty.”²¹ Hence David’s doxology, “Thine, O Yahweh, is the majesty, the might, the splendor, the glory” (1Chr 29:11), taken up by Jude 25: “To the only God, our Savior, through Jesus Christ our Lord, be glory, majesty, dominion, power, before all ages and forever, Amen.”²²

V. — In Eph 1:19 (the extraordinary or infinite greatness of the divine power, to hyperballon megethos tes dynameos autou), the NT hapax to megethos recalls Exod 15:16 (Hebrew gadol); and 2Macc 15:24, which thus describes the arm of God. In the LXX, it ordinarily translates the Hebrew qômâh, referring to the loftiness of an object,²³ or the height of plants and people (1Sam 16:7; Cant 7:8; Xenophon, Cyr. 1.4.3). In the latter case, moral and social stature can be the point;²⁴ which is a point of contact with the usage of the papyri, where from 60 BC (BGU 1816, 25) to megethos is a term of honor,²⁵ especially for the prefect, analagous to megaloprepes, and is an essential element of petitions addressed to him.²⁶ Even loftier expressions are required for the emperor (Dittenberger, Or. 519, 24), and the nuance of might appears in the third-century formula “I take refuge with your Majesty” (epi to son megethos katapheugo, P.Tebt. 326, 4; P.Stras. 5, 6; cf. Xenophon, Symp. 8.1). But the exact parallels to Eph 1:19 come from Philo: “In approaching the altar . . . you must keep your eyes fixed on the greatness of God” (to tou theou megethos apoblepon, Spec. Laws 1.293); “God grants his benefits not in proportion to his own grace, which is infinite and endless, but according to the capacity of those who receive them.”²⁷

¹ P.Oxy. 71, col. II, 5: “I make this request of your Greatness in all confidence”; 2133, 5, 26; 2343, 11; 2407, 5; P.Thead. 13, 6; 19, 5: “Your Greatness, Lord Prefect, is accustomed to render justice to wronged orphans”; P.Cair.Isid. 66, 19; 73, 17; 74, 18; 76, 3; P.Ryl. 659, 3; SB 9188, 3.

² With the exception of Tob 11:15, where Tobias tells his father about the “important” things that have happened in Media.

³ Ps 71:19—ε—ποίησας μεγαλει—α (Hebrew geʿolōt); 105:1; 106:21; Sir 17:8–9; 18:4; 36:7.

⁴ The divine μεγαλειότης appears in a miracle (Luke 9:43); Pseudo-Peter is supposed to have seen the μεγαλειότης of Christ at Tabor (2Pet 1:16). Artemis (μεγάλη ἑά) could be robbed of her majesty by conversions to the new Christian faith (Acts 19:27); cf. Jer 33:9 (Hebrew tip’eret); 1Esdr 4:40; Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.168: “This conception of God . . . agrees with nature as with the divine grandeur”; Ant. 1.24; 8.111: “We cannot but praise your greatness and give thanks” (Solomon’s prayer).

⁵ P.Lond. 1912, 8; cf. the edict of Tiberius Julius Alexander, in AD 68, “as for the most important questions, those relating to the power and majesty of the emperor, I shall make them known in all truth” (Dittenberger, Or. 669, 9).

⁶ P.Tebt. 33, 6. Cf. Clement of Rome’s praise for the lavish hospitality of the Corinthians: τὸ μεγαλοπρεπὲς τῆς φιλοξενίας ὑμῶ—ν ἦθος (1Clem. 1.2); and the high priests who carried out their office with the greatest magnificence (μεγαλοπρεπω—ς). L. Robert, Gladiateurs, n. 80, 12 (Sinope), n. 100 (Attaleia), n. 164, 10 (Stratonicea, second century).

⁷ Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 8, 6; P.Oxy. 1880, 3; 1885, 15; 1888, 2; 1919, 2; 2480, 62; a consul: Εὐτυχῶ—ς ε—πὶ μεγαλοπρεπεστάτου Παύλου ὑπατικοῦ τὸ ἔργον τοῦτο (C. H. Kraeling, Ptolemais, Chicago, 1962, p. 211, n. 10); the strategos (P.Oxy. 1899, 3: τῶ— μεγαλοπρεπεστάτῳ καὶ ε—νδοξοτάτῳ στρατηγῶ—; P.Harr. 157 verso 3; cf. P.Alex. 216, p. 44: τῆς ὑμετέρας μεγαλοπρεποῦς δόξης), above all for the comites, beginning in the fourth century (PGrVindob inv. 25838, 8, in Proceedings X, p. 118; republished in SB 9840); “the most magnificent count John” (P.Fouad 87, 2); P.Ant. 92, 4; C.P.Herm. 24, 6; P.Mich. 160, 4; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 10, 7; SB 6311, 2; 8028, 1; 9398, 5; 9588 verso; 9598, 3; 9616, recto 15. Plutarch, Cic. 50.2. As if the superlative were not enough, modifiers were piled up: μεγαλοπρεπεστάτῳ καὶ εὐδοκιμωτάτῳ καὶ περιβλέπτῳ κώμητι (6270, 2; cf. P.Oxy. 1841, 6; 1856, 9; 1897, 1; 1942, 1; 1982, 3), etc. Cf. J. O’Callaghan, “Epitètos de trato en la correspondencia cristiana,” in SPap, 1964, p. 89. For the adverb μεγαλοπρεπω—ς, cf. I.Sard., LV, 7; L. Robert, in J. des Gagniers, Laodicée, p. 267, n. 9.

⁸ 2Pet 1:17. The rabbis refer to God as ἡ μεγάλη δόξα (T. Levi 3.4; Enoch 102.3; Asc. Isa. 11.32; cf. J. Bonsirven, Judaïsme palestinien, vol. 1, p.

131). Cf. E. Dabrowski, La Transfiguration de Jésus, Rome, 1939, pp. 13, 43, 181; A. M. Ramsey, The Glory of God and the Transfiguration of Christ, 2d ed., London, 1967, 148–151; M. Sabbe, La Rédaction du récit de la Transfiguration, Rech Bib, vol. 6, Bruges, 1962, pp. 72–100.

⁹ A sixth-century letter, P.Ant. 100, 1, is probably Christian, and the verb is restored: σεμνύνεταιί τε καὶ με[γαλύνεται? . . .

¹⁰ Gen 43:34 (Hebrew rabâh): surpass, become more abundant (cf. Zech 12:7); Amos 8:5—making the shekel (a unit of weight) bigger; cf. have worth (1Sam 26:24; Jdt 12:18); cf. Eccl 2:9—“I became great and surpassed those before me in Jerusalem”; 1:16; 2:4.

¹¹ 1Sam 2:21, 26; 3:19; Ezek 16:7 (Hebrew gadal). Cf. Xenophon, Ap. 32: “Socrates, praising himself before the tribunal”; Plutarch, Lyc. 14.6: “exalted by their praises”; Lys. 7.5: “exalting justice when it profited him to do so”; Thucydides 8.81.2: “Alcibiades, exaggerating his influence over Tissaphernes.” Epigram from around 200 BC for a winner in the Nemean games: “Do not glory in your ships alone, O Sidon” (NCIG, n. 35, 11 = J. Ebert, Griechische Epigramme, n. 64).

¹² 2Sam 5:10 (2Chr 6:9); 22:51; 1Kgs 1:37, 47; 10:23; 2Chr 9:22; Ps 18:51; cf. Dan 4:29.

¹³ Ps 40:17; 70:5; 92:6; 126:2; Mal 1:5.

¹⁴ 2Sam 7:22—“You are magnified, Yahweh Elohim, for there is no one like you” (prayer of David); 7:26; 1Chr 17:24—“may your name always be magnified in these terms: Yahweh of hosts, God of Israel, is a God for Israel”; Ps 34:4—“Magnify Yahweh with me, and let us exalt his name together”; Sir 43:31—“Who will exalt him in accord with what he is?”

¹⁵ Luke 1:46. No doubt a reminiscence of this text is found in a letter of a Christian woman to her spiritual father: “When I received your letter, my lord Father, I felt very honored and joyful, that such a father should think of me” (ε—δεξάμην σου τὰ γράμματα, κύριέ μου πάτερ, καὶ πάνυ ε—μεγαλύνθην καὶ ε—γαλλείασα ὅτι τοιοῦτος μου πατήρ τὴν μνήμην ποιει—ται, P.Oxy. 1592, 3; from the third-fourth century).

¹⁶ Phil 1:20; cf. T. Levi 18.3: “his star rises in the sky . . . the light of knowledge shines . . . καὶ μεγαλυνθήσεται ε—ν τῇ οι—κουμένη”; 1QM 11.15: “to show your greatness and holiness in the eyes of the rest of the nations.”

¹⁷ Used uncharacteristically for the majesty of the cedars (Zech 11:13), of a city (Jer 33:9; cf. Enoch 98.2), of a king (Theodotion's version of Dan 4:19, 33; 5:18-19; cf. 1Macc 9:22), of the "great thing" accomplished by God (2Sam 7:21, 23; 1Chr17:19).

¹⁸ Ps 145:3; Enoch 5.4: "You offend his majesty"; Wis 18:24—"your majesty was on the diadem on his [Aaron's] head"; T. Levi 3.9—"the face of his majesty"; 18.8.

¹⁹ Ps 79:11—"By the greatness (Hebrew godel) of your arm, preserve those condemned to death"; Prov 18:10—ε—κ μεγαλωσύνης ι—σχύος ὄνομα Κυρίου (Hebrew migdal).

²⁰ Sir 2:18—"As is his majesty, so also is his mercy"; 18:5—"Who can measure the strength of his greatness? And who will attempt to tell of his mercy?"; Ep. Arist. 192: God does not smite those whom he does not hear according to their sins "or according to the greatness of his might (κατὰ τὴν μεγαλωσύνην τῆς ι—σχύος); mildness (ε—πειικεία) is God's demeanor."

²¹ Heb 1:3; 8:1. At Qumran, the "Words of the Book that Michael Spoke to the Angels" (4QMilMik) call God "the Majesty, the Master of the world" (A. Starcky, in RB, 1956, p. 66).

²² Cf. Sir 44:2—"this majesty from eternity." Liturgy magnifies this μεγαλωσύνη; Deut 32:3—δότε μεγαλωσυνὴν τω—θεω—ἡμω—ν; Tob 14:2—"He continues to bless God and give thanks to God's majesty" (a); Ps 145:6—"I will tell of your majesty"; 150:2—"Praise him for the fullness of his majesty"; Dan 2:20—"May the name of God be blessed from eternity to eternity, for wisdom and greatness belong to him."

²³ The loftiness of the cedars (2Kgs 19:23; Ezek 31:3, 4, 10, 14), a vine (Ezek 17:6; 19:11), the wooden cherubim (1Kgs 6:23; cf. 7:35). Cf. P.Mich. 465, 20: διὰ τὸ μέγεθος τῆς ὁδοῦ (AD 107); P.Tebt. 815, frag. 4, verso 2: μέσος μεγέθει μελίχρως; also frag. 8, verso 7, 11, 15. Josephus, Ant. 14.370: "Herod was not disheartened by the magnitude of the danger."

²⁴ Wis 6:7—"The Lord of all will not regard persons; he will not show favor for greatness"; 13:5—"Beginning from the grandeur and the beauty of creatures, by analogy one contemplates their author." Cf. "Mandoulis, glad for the glory of the Romans, because of their grandeur he gave the Pythian oracles" (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 168, 27).

²⁵ P.Fouad 83, 8; P.Oxy. 1938, 2, 5; 2107, 8; 2187, 13; 2343, 3; P.Ross.Georg. III, 32, 7, 12; P.Mert. 91, 2: “I received the request, with the benevolent signature of the hand of your Majesty”; P.Cair.Isid. 62, 24: “We wish to inform your Majesty”; Stud.Pal. XX, 54, col. II, 14; 128, 5, 9.

²⁶ P.Oxy. 71, col. I, 4: “I address this request to you in full confidence that I will receive justice from your Majesty” (fourth century); 1467, 18: προσφωνω— τω— σω— μεγέθι; 1876, 3; 1877, 3; 1878, 3.

²⁷ Philo, Creation 23. Cf. the inscription of Bouzos: ε—νορκιαιζόμεθα δὲ τὸ μέγεθος τοῦ θεοῦ καὶ τοὺς καταχθονίους δαίμονας, ed. W. M. Ramsay (The Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, Oxford, 1897; vol. 1, 2, p. 700, n. 635), who thinks he sees a Christian influence.

μεθοδεία

methodeia, method, technique, machination

methodeia, S 3180; TDNT 5.102–103; EDNT 2.401; NIDNTT 3.935, 943; MM 394; L&N 88.158; BDF §23; BAGD 499

This noun is unknown in Greek before Eph 4:14; 6:11. It is derived from the verb methodeuo, “follow closely,” then “pursue by devious means,” hence “capture, trick, seduce.”¹ The noun methodos is also used in both positive and negative senses.² In the papyri, methodeia does not appear before AD 421, and it is always used in the administrative and financial sense of “method” of collecting taxes.³ But in Eph 4:14, it refers to the shrewdness (panourgia) of the false teachers, whose “devices” lead people into error (plane), and in Eph 6:11 it has to do with the devil’s ambushes or ensnaring maneuvers. So this methodeia can be defined as the well-thought-out, methodical art of leading astray, what we would call “machinations.” The Suda gives this definition: methodeias: technas e dolous.

¹ A hapax in the LXX (2Sam 19:28), it translates the piel of the Hebrew ragal, “to spy.” The same pejorative meaning occurs in Philo, Moses 2.212: “Philosophy, not that practised by the wordmongers and sophists” (οὐκ ὅπερ μεθοδεύουσιν οἱ— λογοθῆραι . . .). In the papyri, the verb appears for the first time in AD 102, with the same nuance, “trick” or “dupe” the strategos (P.Oxy. 2342, 27). Well attested in the fourth to sixth centuries, it seems to have been used mostly in financial jargon, with respect to taxes “received (collected) on the sacred revenues of the land” (μεθοδεύεσθαι ὑπὲρ τω—ν τῆς γῆς εὐσεβω—ν εἰ—σφορω—ν, P.Ryl. 659, 21; from the fourth century; cf. P.Mert. 45, 2; P.Lund II, 5, 13; Stud.Pal. XX, 139, 9; SB 8092, 13; 9608, 6: τοὺς ὑπὸ ε—μαὶ κτήτορας οὐκ ε—δυνήθην μεθωδεύσαι). In scientific language, “all that is determined methodically by science (τὰ τέχνη μεθοδευμένα) must lead to infallible conclusions” (Geminus, Intro. to Astronomy 17.24); “Predictions drawn from meteorological prognostications . . . are not scientifically or systematically (μεθοδεύοντα) established” (XVII, 6), following the French translation of G. Aujac (Geminus), who offers this definition: “The verb and the noun indicate a reasoning process involving rigor, logic, and scientific reasoning” (p. 192).

² 2Macc 13:18—“The king, having tested the bravery of the Jews, tried to attack the place using stratagems” (or tricks, διὰ μεθόδων). In a favorable sense (cf. PSI 1335, 17; from the third century), μέθοδος refers to a collection of mathematical proofs, lines of reasoning, and operations directed toward a determinate result (cf. C. Mugler, Terminologie géométrique, p. 282). Julius Pollux, Onom. 5.165, associates ἀμφισβήτησις, καὶ ε—πιδικασία καὶ μέθοδος.

³ P.Oxy. 1134, 9; cf. 136, 17, 24; P.Amh. II, 149, 15; P.Got. 45, 6.

μεριστής

meristes, apportioner, distributor

meristes, S 3312; EDNT 2.409; MM 398; L&N 63.25; BAGD 505

“Someone in the crowd said to him, ‘Master, tell my brother to share the inheritance with me’ (merisasthai met’ emou). He said to him, ‘Man, who appointed me a judge or apportioner (kriten e meristen) between you?’ (Luke 12:14). Derived from meris, “part,” meristes can mean nothing else in this context but “apportioner, distributor.”¹ “Here it can mean only the person who arranges things in actual fact, as opposed to the krites, who gives a legal solution” (M. J. Lagrange, on this verse). But this term is rare, though far from unknown.² It is an epithet for Sarapis³ and a function of Ammon: “His maternal grandfather is the distributor of life, Ammon, who is also Zeus of Greece and Asia.”⁴ These are “distributions” in Magnesia: “to give them distributions for sacrifice” (dounai de autois tous meristas eis thysian, I.Magn. 54, 36); and in Istria financial officials known as “distributors,”⁵ who are thus the best parallel to the biblical text.

We do not know what difference of opinion set the two brothers in Luke 12:14 at odds, but A. Steinwenter has noted the legal importance of the text⁶ and we know from “house-by-house inventory declarations (kat’oikian apographai)” how frequent transfers of real property were,⁷ notably “dividings of inheritance,”⁸ where the origin of the property ownership is noted (“having belonged to,” P.Brux. 1–18) and respective parts that revert to each of the co-owners (hekasto meros, P.Brux. 16), a third (11), two-thirds (18), a fourth (16). A whole property can be owned jointly by four (10) or three (P.Wisc. 18) brothers, or two, as in Luke 12:14. One understands the difficulty of specifying the rights of each one and the ease of abusive claims.⁹ To illustrate the difference of opinion in the Gospel, we may cite the case of Aurelia Maria, from the village of Hermopolis. She complains to the prefect that her deceased parents had left her all their human property (panta ta anthropina), but her brother Onnophris seized them and sold some. She appeals to the prefect’s “philanthropy” to compel him to restore everything and proceed to “an equitable distribution” (ex isou diameristhenai, cf. PSI 452, 8: ex isoumerous).¹⁰

¹ Cf. G. Redard, Noms grecs en -ΤΗΣ, -ΤΙΣ, pp. 43ff., persons who carry out a trade or fulfill a function, cf. τεχνίτης, τραπεζίτης, etc.

² Cf. Julius Pollux, Onom. 4.24.176, regarding weights (σταθμω—ν ὀνόματα), names μερισταί between ε—μερίσω and ἀντιμοιρει—; 8.10.136, on Athenian tribunals, associating νεμηταί καὶ μερισταί. The Suda has only μερίτης, which it defines ὁ τινὸς πράγματος μεταλαγχάνων, and refers to Polybius 8.29.6.

³ Pap.Graec.Mag. 13, 638: κοσμοκράτωρ, μυριώτατος, μέγιστε, τροφεῦ, μεριστά, Σάραπι.

⁴ Hymn to Isis from the first century BC: Μητροπάτωρ τούτου δ ε—στὶν ζωῆς ὁ μεριστής, Ἄμμων . . . (SEG VIII, 551, 25 = SB 8141 = V. F. Vanderlip, Four Greek Hymns, pp. 63, 70 = E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 175, col. IV, 25). Cf. Y. Grandjean, Aréologie d’Isis, p. 18, line 26: Isis “instituted justice so that each of us . . . might live also in conditions of equality” (ζῆν ἀπὸ τω—ν ἴσων εἰ—δη). Vettius Valens 62.4: lord of the horoscope, μεριστής χρόνων ζωῆς.

⁵ Τὸ δὲ ἀνάλωμα δοῦναι τὸν οἰ—κονόμον, μερίσαε δὲ τοὺς μεριστάς (SEG XXIV, 1099, 16); cf. D. M. Pippidi, Epigraphische Beiträge zur Geschichte Histrias in hellenistischer und römischer Zeit, Berlin, 1962, p. 41; ISE, II, n. 128.

⁶ A. Steinwenter, “Bibel und Rechtsgeschichte,” in JJP, v 15, 1965, p. 16. He refers to H. Kreller, Erbrechtliche Untersuchungen auf Grund der graeco-aegyptischen Papyrusurkunden, Leipzig-Berlin, 1919, pp. 95ff. R. Taubenschlag, Law of Greco-Roman Egypt, pp. 222ff.

⁷ The list of these apographai was prepared by M. Hombert, C. Préaux, Recherches sur le recensement dans l’Égypte romaine, Leiden, 1952 (= Pap.Lugd.Bat. V), pp. 172ff., completed by G. Nachtergaele, P.Brux., pp. 51ff. Cf. H. C. Youtie, Scriptiunculae, vol. 2, pp. 652–660. Cf. SB 10630–10638, 10759 (AD 33–34).

⁸ Divisio, διαίρεσις, P.Mil.Vogl. 23, col. I, 22; P.Fouad 35, 9 (προδιαίρεσις; AD 48). Inherited goods fall into three groups: (1) property shared under the present contract; (2) goods that will be shared under a new contract, within a fixed time; (3) goods that will be divided under a preliminary, friendly sharing, prior to the drawing up of the legal contract in proper form at the notary’s.

⁹ Cf. P.Ant. 88: at Hermopolis, Taapollon died, leaving as his heirs two children, a son and a daughter (Peues and Aïas). The latter took over the property that had belonged to her mother and held that she owned it legitimately, or at least she did nothing to see to its division. Hence the accusation of Peues, who claims that his sister wants to evict him from the inheritance of which she wants to defraud him: ε—πέρχεται ἀφαρπάζειν περιωμένη (line 7): good interpretation by J. Bingen, “La Pétition P. Ant. II, 88,” in Essays in Honor of C. Bradford Welles (American Studies in Papyrology, vol. 1), New York, 1966, pp. 231–234. Compare the claims of heirs in succession to a grandfather, an uncle, etc., P.Enteux. 16–19.

¹⁰ P.Lond. 406, vol. 2, p. 280 = P.Abinn. 56 = Chrest.Mitt., n. 128.

μεσίτης

mesites, mediator, intermediary

mesites, S 3316; TDNT 4.598–624; EDNT 2.409; NIDNTT 1.372–376; MM 398; L&N 31.22, 40.6; BAGD 506

Unknown in classical Greek and derived from mesos, the noun mesites is commonly used in the Hellenistic period, especially in literary writings; it is less frequent in the papyri and rare in the inscriptions. It is used for someone who stands or walks in the middle, between two persons or two groups; the context indicates the reasons for this intervention. For example, Herod intervened on behalf of those who were seeking something from Agrippa (ton par’ Agrippa tinon epizetoumenon mesites en, Josephus, Ant. 16.24). He had “great influence in persuading Agrippa to perform good deeds, although he was not slow to do them on his own. Thus he reconciled the inhabitants of Ilium with Agrippa when he was angry with them” (Ant. 16.25–26). Thus this vague term “intermediary” can refer to very different persons,¹ but it usually has legal connotations.

I. — Its only occurrence in the LXX refers to an arbiter in a dispute (Job 9:33, Hebrew bayin), which is the most frequent meaning in the papyri: the krites mesites, “Akylos, judge-arbiter in the trial of Apollonios.”² In a judicial register from the third century, it is recounted that the opposing parties “accused each other; they shall appear within ten days. . . . We appointed Dorion as arbiter for them” (P.Lille 28, 11; cf. P.Mil.Vogl. 25, col.IV, 36).

II. — If the mediator intervenes in business transactions as a negotiator or business broker (P.Tebt. 406, 10), he is most often mentioned as a peacemaker whose business it is to reconcile opposing parties. The Suda gives this definition: mesites: ho eirenopoios. It is significant that in speaking of a mediator-conciliator, Philo always mentions that he intervenes in an atmosphere of “paralyzing fear” (Dreams 1.142) and where someone is frightened.³ The mediator’s commonest role is to have a treaty signed by two enemy states. The consul Q. Marcius Philippus asks the Rhodians to intervene between kings Antiochus and Ptolemy, who are fighting (tous Rhodious mesitas apodeixai).⁴

III. — The mesites also plays the part of a witness, in the legal sense of the word, and thus the term becomes synonymous with martys (BGU 419, 8). At a marriage between a soldier and a widow, the inventory of the paraphernalia was done before andron hikanon mesiton (men who were capable witnesses, P.Dura 30, 13) who could recognize the existence of a debt (P.Cair.Isid. 62, 15; reprinted in SB 9167), being present at the paying of a sum of money.⁵

IV. — Finally, mesites designates one who stands surety, thus becoming synonymous with enguos.⁶ The mesites is the guardian of oaths (Josephus, Ant. 4.133; Epictetus, Ench. 33, 5; Heraclitus, All. 23.8), of deposits,⁷ and of contracts: Medea, Jason’s repudiated wife, wanting to take vengeance on her husband, cut her children’s throats, fled from Corinth, and took refuge at Thebes with Hercules, “for he, the guarantor of the pact concluded at Colchis (touton gar mesiten gegonota ton homologion) had promised to protect her if Jason should break faith” (Diodorus Siculus 4.54.7). The friendship of Orestes and Pylades is placed under the protection and the guarantee of the deity; thus it takes on a changeless character.⁸

It is Philo who first gave mesites a religious meaning (cf. also T. Dan 6.2), attributing a mediating and conciliating character to the angels (Dreams 1.142–143) and to Moses (hoia mesites kai diallaktes) making prayers and supplications and asking forgiveness for sins (Moses 2.166). St. Paul also makes this last attribution.⁹ But 1Tim 2:5, setting forth a baptismal profession of faith or a liturgical acclamation, stipulates “for there is one God, one mediator between God and humans, the human Christ Jesus.”¹⁰ Not only does this text describe Christ as a mediator, placing him in the middle as an intermediary between God and humans, the sole valid representative of both parties; but it also specifies that “he gave himself as a ransom for all” in order to actualize the salvation willed by God. Thus he reconciled those whom sin had set at variance. This is not a temporary assignment, but his permanent function: the God-Man was, so to speak, born to be the Peacemaker!

In Heb 8:6; 9:15; 12:24, where Christ is portrayed as the great high priest, mediation becomes a new chapter in NT Christology. It is specified that the essence of his priestly mediation is not simply to intercede on our behalf (Heb 7:25) but first and foremost to offer himself as a sacrifice and thus redeem our sins; but it is also stated that he opens the heavens and provides access to the blessed city. The fact that Christ’s mediation is always set in relation to the diatheke kainē (new covenant) shows that Christ is first and foremost the pledge or guarantee of the covenant; his shed blood is the surety that guarantees God’s performance of all of its clauses and which is valid for all humankind.¹¹ This meaning—“guarantee+surety”—is to be noted in favor of the soteriological optimism of the new covenant.

¹ P.Ant. 94, 11: “The intermediary Philip asked the eminent person . . . to pay” (Christian letter of the sixth century). In the Byzantine period, the μεσίτης was a representative of the taxpayers (P.land. 154, 6; cf. Stud.Pal. XX, 21, 3; 128, 3). Cf. L. Mitteis, “Zur Papyruspublication IV: Μεσίτης,” in Hermes, 1985, pp. 616ff.

² P.Rein. 44, 3 (second century AD); P.Catt. I, 3 (Chrest.Mitt., n. 88, col. I, 3); P.Cair.Goodsp. 29, col. III, 5: “If it seems good to you, give us an arbiter so that the opposing party may restore to the plaintiff the . . .”; P.Abinn. 46, 3; BGU 1676, 6: οἱ—μεσίται ἀκούσαντες ἀπὸ τῶ—ν ἀντιδίκων σου; P.Oxy. 1298, 19; SB 7264, 4: ἔδωκε Ἡρώνα δικαστὴν καὶ μεσεῖτην τοῦ πράγματος; Stud.Pal. XX, 86, 10. Cf. Josephus, Ant. 16.118: “Before the emperor, the supreme master and our arbiter in this circumstance (ε—πὶ τῶ— πάντων δεσπότη . . . μεσιτεύοντι), here is the arrangement that we propose”; Thucydides 4.83, 3–5: μέσῳ δικαστῆ. Aristotle called this mediator or arbiter in cases of disagreement μεσίδιος (Eth. Nic. 5.4.1132a23; cf. Pol. 5.6.1306a28). Cf. B. Cohen, “Arbitration in Jewish and Roman Law,” in RIDA, vol. 5, 1958, pp. 165–223.

³ Moses 2.166; cf. Plant. 10: “the divine Logos . . . intercedes in the midst of enemy threats by mediation and persuasion (μεσιτεύοντες) and performs his arbitration.” Cf. Josephus, Ant. 7.193: Joab, having been asked by Absalom to placate his father, goes to intercede with the king, ε—μεσίτευσε πρὸς τὸν βασιλέα; Dittenberger, Or. 437, 76: Sardis and Ephesus conclude a pact to put an end to their disagreements and decide that in case of conflict they will have recourse to the mediation of Pergamum. Athena intervenes as a mediator (μεσι—τιν) to calm the wrath of Achilles against Agamemnon (Heraclitus, All. 20.12); “the peace concluded thanks to the mediation of the Carthaginians” (τῆς μεσιτευθείσης ει—ρήνης ὑπὸ Καρχηδονίων, Diodorus Siculus 19, summary).

⁴ Polybius 28.15.8; cf. 11.34.3: Euthydemus of Magnesia asks Telea to intervene to reestablish peace, μεσιτεῦσαι τὴν διάλυσιν εὐνοϊκω—ς. The peoples of Acragas, Gela, and Messina make peace with Agathocles through the mediation of the Carthaginian Hamilcar (Diodorus Siculus 19.71.6; cf. Dionysius of Halicarnassus 9.59.5). The soldiers offer to be mediators of a reconciliation, μεσιτεύειν τὰς διαλλαγὰς (Nicolaus of Damascus, Vit. Caes. 99.29.4).

⁵ P.Dura 129, 4: ε—πὶ μεσιτω—ν. In CPR I, 19, lines 10, 14, 16, 23, the witness—a priest of a Christian community who was present at the signing of a commercial agreement—is successively called μεσίτης, ὁ μεταξύ, ὁ μεταξύ μεσίτης.

⁶ Cf. Heb 7:22. This is the equivalent of the Attic μεσέγγυος, which the Suda defines as μεσίτης, ε—γγυητής; cf. P.Lond. 370, 6, 9, 14 (vol. 2, p. 251); P.Stras. 41, 14; Stud.Pal. XX, 193, 1: Κυρίῳ μεσίτη μεγάλων ὀρίων; cf. 168, 1; 170, 3. cf. Z. W. Falk, “Zum jüdischen Bürgschaftsrecht,” in RIDA, 1963, pp. 43–54.

⁷ Unlike loans, which are agreed upon by contract in the presence of witnesses, the accepting of a deposit is secret: “This transaction, which is not seen, has as its witness an absolutely invisible God (μεσιτεύει θεός). It is he whom the parties logically take as witness” (Philo, Spec. Laws 4.31). From the sense of “answer for, give a guarantee” (P.Stras. 284, 4; SB 7339, 11; Heb 6:7—“God intervenes with an oath” = offers himself as guarantor, answers for), the verb μεσιτεύω comes to mean “place a deposit” (P.Berlin 11808, 11; published as P.Berl.Möller 2, 11; p. 29) and becomes synonymous with μεσιδιόω, “to place a deposit with a third party, entrust to a neutral party” (P.Rein. 7, 22; P.Magd. 30, 3; PSI 551, 10). Thus a pact of friendship between Miletus and Heraclea was “deposited” at Priene (Dittenberger, Syl. 633, 87).

⁸ Lucian, Am. 47: θεὸν δὲ τω—ν πρὸς ἀλλήλους παθω—ν μεσίτην λαβόντες ὡς ε—φε—νὸς σκάφου τοῦ βίου συνέπλευσα. Lucian also has the feminine μεσι—τις (Am. 27, 54); a single papyrological attestation of the feminine is found in P.Jena, inv. 23, 13, from the second century, published by F. Uebel, “Eingabe eines Frauenvormunds,” in P.Coll.Youtie I, p. 216: ἀποδεδωκέναι διὰ χειρὸς παρούσης αἰδος μεσεΐτιδος). The substantive μεσιτεία, which does not appear before the first century AD—Josephus, Ant. 20.62: “Izates wrote to the Parthians advising them to receive Artabanus, offering them his good faith, his oaths, and his mediation (δεξιᾶς καὶ ὄρκους καὶ μεσιτεΐαν) to assure them that their deeds would be forgotten”; cf. P.Fouad 85, 14: “hasten to safeguard your rights, either by the intervention of Cleticos or by that of your friends.” Cf. in the second century the meaning “central position, median,” in the mathematician Nicomachus of Gerasa (Ar. 1.7.2; ed. R. Hoche, Leipzig, 1866), and “undertaking, transaction” in the fabulist Babrius (Myth. 93.8; ed. O. Crusius, Leipzig, 1897; cf. 39.2: the crayfish who wanted to make peace between the dolphins and the whales). In the papyri, it figures in contracts for loans, sales, and mortgages in the sense of “guarantee.” Cf. SB 10294, 10; P.Stras. 324, 15; P.Bour. 15, 137, 141; P.Fam.Tebt. 11, 5; P.Lond. 1173, 11; BGU 78, 9; 445, 9; 1676, 5; P.Mich. 232, 7, 13 (AD 36 = SB 7568); 238, 3, 17; 333, 23, 27, 37, 44 (AD 52). A. B. Schwarz, Hypothek und Hypallagma, Leipzig, 1911, p. 144; Chrest.Mitt., 1, p. 131.

⁹ Gal 3:19-20; A. Stegmann, “ὁ δὲ μεσίτης ἐ—νὸς οὐκ ἔστιν, Gal 2:20,” in BZ, 1934, pp. 30–42; cf. As. Mos. 1.14; 3.12 (cf. M. P. Nilsson, “The High God and the Mediator,” in HTR, 1963, pp. 101–120; J. Scharbert, Heilsmittler im Alten Testament und im alten Orient, Freiburg, 1964, pp. 294ff.); Words of the Heavenly Lights 2.11: “Moses had asked pardon for their sin.” On Moses, the man of God, advocate, intercessor, and mediator, cf. N. Johannson, Parakletoi, Lund, 1940, pp. 5, 67, 161. The rabbis have no term for mediator and simply transcribe Nwsym. They use Nwsrs (Aramaic srswra) for an intermediary who negotiates, for a business broker, and only give it a religious meaning late by applying it to God or to Moses, Deut. Rab. 3.12; 201a; Exod. Rab. 43.32.11; 3.3.13; 6.2.2; b. Meg. 74.12f. Cf. Str-B, vol. 2, 302ff.; vol. 3, 512ff.; 556.

¹⁰ Εἷς γὰρ θεός, εἷς καὶ μεσίτης θεοῦ καὶ ἀνθρώπων, ἄνθρωπος Χριστὸς —Ιησοῦς. Cf. E. Miguéns, “Unus Deus, Unus Mediator,” in De Mariologia et Oecumenismo, Rome, 1962, pp. 59–69.

¹¹ D. Bornhäuser, “Der ‘Mittler,’” in NKZ, 1928, pp. 21–24, 552–553; J. Gründler, “Noch einmal: Der Mittler,” NKZ, 1928, pp. 549–552; G. Redard, Noms grecs en -ΤΗΣ, -ΤΙΣ, pp. 25, 260, 1; M. Schulze, “Der Mittler,” in Reinhold Seeberg Festchrift, vol. 1 Leipzig, 1929, pp. 225–238; A. Richardson, An Introduction to the Theology of the New Testament, London, 1958, pp. 229ff.; Y. Congar, Jésus-Christ, notre Médiateur, notre Seigneur, Paris, 1969 = ET Jesus Christ, trans. L. O’Neill, New York, 1966;

A. Oepke, “μεσίτης,” in TDNT, vol. 4, pp. 598–624; C. Spicq, “Médiation,” in DBSup, vol. 5, 1020–1083.

μεταλλάσσω

metallasso, to exchange, leave, pass away

metallasso, S 3337; TDNT 1.259; EDNT 2.414; NIDNTT 3.166–167; MM 403; L&N 57.142, 68.50; BDF §179(2); BAGD 511

Allasso and almost all of its compound forms (diallasso, katallasso) have the basic meaning “to change”; but just as apallasso often has the nuance “put an end to, cease,” metallasso, in the Koine, almost always has the sense of “pass away.” This is its only meaning in the OT¹ and by far its predominant meaning in the papyri. In AD 124, a contract for remarriage successively takes up the eventuality of the death of each spouse: “If the same Eleaios, son of Simon, should die (metallazei . . . ton bion) before the same Salome. . . . If Salome, daughter of John Galgoula, should die (metallazei ton bion) before the same Elaios” (P.Mur. 115, 10, 12); “If one of the two dies” (P.Dura 17, 35; BGU 1574, 11; 1662, 6; 1783, 11); in the will of Taptollion at the beginning of the second century, “If any of them should die childless and intestate.”²

If, in literary Koine and several papyri or inscriptions, metallasso retains its classical meaning “leave” a place or “change, exchange,”³ the usage just discussed shows how radical a change is envisioned: it is a substitution. Hence the nuance “exchange” in Rom 1:25-26: the pagans have turned aside and distanced themselves from the true knowledge of God and traded him for the lie of idols (metellaxan ten aletheian tou theou en to pseudei). This is not an evolution but a substitution.⁴ The punishment that followed was the perversion of sexual relations: a traffic contrary to nature.⁵ The verb metallasso in the second verse is used to mark the strict correspondence between moral deviation on the one hand and the “replacing” of God with idols on the other hand. It looks like a weaker usage, but it nevertheless evinces a subversion and even a sort of contradiction between two attitudes.

¹ Esth 2:7 (Hebrew mût); 2Macc 4:7—“Seleucus had departed this life (μεταλλάξαντος δὲ τὸν βίον) and Antiochus had succeeded him”; 6:31; 7:7, 13, 14; 4:37—“Antiochus wept when he remembered the prudence and moderation of the deceased” (τοῦ μετηλλαχότος); 5:1; 7:40—“Thus the young man passed away”; 14:16—“Thus it was that he died.” Cf. Berossus: “Nabopalassar died after a reign of twenty-one years” (in Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.136); Sib. Or. 7.96: μεταλλάξη ε—ς τέφρην.

² Pap.Lugd.Bat. XVI, 13, 12: ε—άν δέ τις αὐτω—ν μεταλλάζει ἄτεκνος καὶ ἀδιάθετος; cf. P.Mich. 530, 14; 549, 7. All the possibilities are covered; the wife declares that her first husband is now deceased (ibid. 14, 3; cf. P.Oxy. 1282, 18, in AD 83; BGU 1148, 8, from 13 BC; P.Mert. 13, 7: “the property left by my former husband Heron, now deceased,” in 98–102; 1833, 5; 1849, 16; P.Mil. 226, 13; SB 9642, col. I, 3; Stud.Pal. XX, 13, verso 9), the husband says that his wife is deceased (P.Fuad I Univ. 13, 8; P.Mil. 84, 3; P.Corn. 18, 6; SB 9377, 3), parents certify that their son is dead (P.Oxy. 477, 14; P.Fouad 35, 6: “Tathoonas, who is of age, the daughter of his deceased son Sarapion,” in AD 48; P.Oslo 130, 3; P.Ryl. 659, 6; SB 7333, 28; cf. the princess Berenice, μετήλλαξεν τὸν βίον, Dittenberger, Or. 56, 55; cf. 326, 15. In 142 BC, a pregnant woman who has been brutalized fears that her child has died: ὃ ἔχει ε—γ γαστρὶ παιδίον ἔκτρομα γίνεσθαι μεταλλάξαν τὸν βίον, P.Tebt. 800, 31); children fear that a brother is dead (P.Mich. 171, 6; from AD 58; P.Mert. 14, 17; P.Oslo 141, 7; P.Tebt. 785, 10, from 138 BC; SB 6291, 10; 7284, 15) or that their father (BGU 1793, 8, from 50 BC; 1818, 3; P.Tebt. 780, 4) or their mother (P.Ryl. 108, 9; P.Cair.Isid. 62, 9; SB 9201, 11) is no longer alive, etc.

³ BGU 1761, 6 (50 BC); SEG III, 674, 24; I.Thas. 192, 22. Certain Egyptians wished “to change and adopt Jewish citizenship” (Philo, Virtues 108).

⁴ Cf. the total, reciprocal, and universal reconciliation expressed by ἀποκαταλλάσσω, Col 1:20–22; Eph 2:16.

⁵ Rom 1:26—μετήλλαξαν τὴν φυσικὴν χρῆσιν εἰ—ς τὴν παρὰ φύσιν; cf. with respect to Sodom: ε—νήλλαξε τάξιν φύσεως (T. Naph. 3.4). On this vice, cf. Aroc. Pet. 32.

μετανοέω, μετάνοια

metanoëo, to know after, change one’s mind, repent; metanoia, repentance

metanoëo, S 3340; TDNT 4.975–1008; EDNT 2.415–419; NIDNTT 1.357–359; MM 403–404; L&N 41.52; BDF §235(2); BAGD 511–512 | metanoia, S 3341; TDNT 4.975–1008; EDNT 2.415–419; NIDNTT 1.357–358; MM 405; L&N 41.52; BAGD 512; ND 4.160

Repentance in the literal sense is very close both to metamelomai (“be afflicted, troubled by a certain misdeed that one has committed”), which can express every kind of regret, sorrow, and disgust,¹ and also to epistrepho (“turn toward, pay attention, turn back, convert”).² This is proved by the fact that these terms are often linked³ or even used in each other's place.⁴ Nevertheless, metanoeo, in accordance with its very etymology, has a meaning of its own, attested in secular literature as well as in Scripture.⁵

I. — Just as pronoeo means “know before, foresee,” metanoeo is literally “know after,”⁶ the particle meta indicating proximity or concomitance. This is the sense of its earliest known use, by Epicharmus (460 BC): “The wise man must not know after but know before” (ou metanoein, alla pronoein chre ton andra ton sophon).⁷ To repent is first of all to change one's mind (Plato, Euthd. 279 c; Diodorus Siculus 1.67.5), change intentions (Josephus, Ant. 2.322), change plans (Ag. Apion 1.274), and reflect,⁸ which implies a time later than the first knowledge (Wis 12:10—topon metanoias; Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.106: “God grants time to repent”); one “reconsiders” a first opinion (Isa 46:8).

II. — Still in line with its etymology, metanoeo has to do first of all with a change of mind or feelings resulting from this after-knowledge: “But when we reflected . . . we had to change our minds.”⁹ According to the Tabula of Cebes 10, the function of metanoia is to introduce “a new form of thought and feeling”; after coming under the influence of Deception (apate), whence derive ignorance and error, there is no other recourse than Repentance.¹⁰ For Philo, the soul declares that it repents of its errors in past judgments, the fruit of thoughtlessness; it must open itself to repentance, which is the younger sibling of perfect innocence (Dreams 1.91; cf. Virtues 180; Josephus, Ant. 7.264); in the face of difficulties, it changes its conceptions (Dreams 1.182), but it can “return to better feelings.”¹¹

III. — What characterizes this evolution is that it is accompanied by regret, sorrow, or shame at the former opinion or attitude: “The next day regrets (metanoia) developed, with the reflection (analogismos) that the resolution settled upon was cruel and serious—to wipe out an entire city rather than the responsible parties alone.”¹² “He will not have to reproach himself, do battle against himself, repent, torment himself” (Epictetus 2.22.35); “The Athenians were taken by profound repentance and deeply missed (pothos) Cimon” (Plutarch, Per. 10.3); “Blame and reprimand beget shame and repentance (metanoian kai aischynen), the former being similar to sorrow, the latter to fear.”¹³ “They will speak to one another with regret (metanoountes) and with anguished spirits they will moan” (Wis 5:3); “Those who repent and anguish (tous metanoountas kai achthomenous) of their former error say, ‘Unhappy people that we are.’”¹⁴ Aristobulus, full of remorse over the murder of his brother, falls ill, afflicted with great pain and vomiting blood (Josephus, Ant. 13.314).

If metanoia “is a sort of reproach (epilepsis tis) that one addresses to oneself when one thinks that one has let something useful go by . . . an honest man would never be able to repent of letting a pleasure go by”

(Marcus Aurelius 8.10), the regret can simply be over being caught in some deed (Philo, Virtues 152) or having given up some good (Virtues 208), or even over having done something good, as when Pharaoh repented of having let the Hebrews leave (Moses 1.167; cf. Flacc. 181; To Gaius 303, 337, 339). Plutarch, Tim. 6.4: “Repentance makes us ashamed of even a good action, while determination based on science and reason does not vary, even when our undertakings have failed.”

IV. — Normally repentance follows the offense (Plutarch, Cam. 38.5); in any event, it entails a change of conduct or of future status,¹⁵ and in principle it could be for the better or for the worse, as with two murderers who spared a child because it smiled at them but then repented (metenoesan) and sought to kill it (Plutarch, Conv. sept. sap. 21). “The person who claims to have repented while still committing injustices is not in his right mind” (Flight 160); it is all a question of loyalty and faithfulness: “The law orders giving absolution to a person on the condition that he proves the sincerity of his repentance not by a simple promise but by actions” (Spec. Laws 1.236); “I would pardon him for the past if in the future he would repent and be loyal to me” (Josephus, Life 110); “I promised pardon on the condition that they would change their attitude” (Life 262). In the OT, the object of repentance is sins committed (Wis 11:23; 12:19; Sir 17:24; 48:15) as much as the malice that inspired them (Jer 8:6; 18:6), but it is not simply a case of a psychological evolution of a person coming around to himself, but of satisfying God’s requirements. Metanoia becomes a religious idea, because it is God who leads the human heart to repentance¹⁶ and pardons only those who are repentant.¹⁷ Ep.Arist. 188 inherits this conception: “The best thing you can do to maintain the royal power is to imitate God’s indefectible mercy; for in showing magnanimity and in punishing the guilty with more indulgence than they deserve, you will turn them away from evil and lead them to repentance.”¹⁸

V. — In the NT, metanoeo and metanoia (56 occurrences) retain this basic meaning, “change opinions, regret, be grieved about something,” but they are used almost exclusively for the attitude of unbelievers and sinners returning to God,¹⁹ and they are laden with a new theological density; they form an essential part of the kerygma lexicon, urging “conversion” to Christianity. There is no longer any question of distinguishing between change of thoughts, of heart, of actions. The change is that of the soul, of the whole person (the new creature), who is purified of stains and whose life is transformed, metamorphosed. It is significant that the present imperative metanoete sums up the preaching of John the Baptist in the wilderness (Matt 3:2; Mark 1:15) in connection with faith, entrance into the kingdom of God, and purification from sins.²⁰ This latter is not just any regret or repudiation²¹ but affliction, “remorse” that inspires a desire to make reparation, even expiation.²² Jesus defined his mission: “I did not come to call the righteous but sinners to repentance” (Luke 5:32); “If you do not repent, you will all perish”;²³ and he sends the Twelve to make the same proclamation: “They preached repentance” (ekeryxan hina metanoosin, Mark 6:12; Luke 24:47).

St. Peter would be faithful to this assignment on the day of Pentecost: “Repent (metanoesate, aorist imperative) and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins” (Acts 2:38; cf. 3:19). He requires Simon Magus to make this break with wickedness (8:22); and if he presents Christ as Savior “in order to give Israel repentance and remission of sins” (5:31), St. Paul would understand that this gift was for the Gentiles (11:18) and all people (17:30; 20:21).

The apostle Paul knows that no one can be converted unless led by divine mercy: “God’s kindness calls you to repentance” (Rom 2:4; 2Pet 3:9), but he fears that many will not have repented of the impurities that they have committed (2Cor 12:21). According to Heb 6:1, metanoia is part of the first baptismal catechism, “repentance from dead works and faith in God”; but the renewal of repentance is impossible for an apostate (Heb 6:6), as it was for Esau, although he sought it with tears (Heb 12:17; cf. Wis 12:10). In Revelation, Christ urges “lukewarm” or discouraged Christians to correct themselves, to return to their first works and have zeal (2:5, 16, 21, 22; 3:3, 19), but he denounces the “rest of humankind,” unrepentant idolaters, fornicators, blasphemers.²⁴

The modern pastoral definition of repentance—“remorse at having offended God with the firm intention of making up for one’s offenses and falling into them no more”—is quite in line with Revelation. Nevertheless, the essence is missing: namely, that this contrition is inspired by the knowledge of God and has as its effect eternal salvation.

¹ Matt 21:32; 27:3; 2Cor 7:8; Heb 7:21; cf. R. C. Trench, Synonyms, p. 258.

² Acts 3:19; 9:35; 11:21; 14:15; 26:18, 20; 1Thess 1:9; Jas 5:19; Epictetus 2.20.23. Cf. M. Méhat, “Pour l’histoire du mot ε—πιστροφή: aux origines de l’idée de conversion,” in REG, 1955, p. IX; P. Aubin, Le Problème de la “conversion”: Etude sur un terme commun à l’hellénisme et au christianisme des trois premiers siècles, Paris, 1963; W. Barclay, Turning to God, London, 1963.

³ Isa 46:8—“Repent, you who err, turn back from the bottom of your heart”; Jer 18:8; Joel 2:14—“Who knows whether the Lord will not turn back and repent”; Luke 17:3-4; Acts 3:19—“Repent and be converted so that your sins may be forgiven”; 26:20—“I preached repentance and conversion to God by the practice of works fit for repentance.”

⁴ Notably in Rev 2:5, 16, 21, 22; 3:3, 19; 9:20, 21; 16:20, where μετανοέω has the sense “be converted.”

⁵ Cf. L. Alvarez Verdes, “Μετάνοια—μετανοει—ν en el Griego extrabiblico,” in Homenaje a J. Prado, Madrid, 1975, pp. 503–525; E. F. Thomson, “Μετανοέω and Μεταμέλει in Greek Literature until 100 A. D.,” in Historical and Linguistic Studies in Literature related to the N. T., 2d series, vol. 1, Chicago, 1909, pp. 358–364; A. H. Dirksen, The New Testament Concept of Metanoia, Washington, 1932; E. K. Dietrich, Die Umkehr im A. T. und im Judentum, Stuttgart, 1936; E. Norden, Agnostos Theos, 1913, pp. 134ff.; H. Pohlmann, Die Metanoia als Zentralbegriff der christlichen Frömmigkeit, Leipzig, 1938; R. Schnackenburg, “Typen der Metanoia-Predigt im N. T.,” in MTZ, vol. 1, 1950–1954, pp. 1–13; H. Braun, Gesammelte Studien zum Neuen Testament und seiner Umwelt, Tübingen, 1961, pp. 70–85; J. Dupont, “Repentir et conversion d’après les Actes des Apôtres,” in ScEccl, 1960, pp. 137–173; B. Michiels, “La Conception lucanienne de la conversion,” in ETL, 1965, pp. 42–75; B. W. Blackwelder, Light from the Greek New Testament, 2d ed., Grand Rapids, 1976, pp. 45ff., 85ff. J. Guillet, “Metanoia,” in Dict.spir., vol. 10, col. 1093–1099; F. Bovon, Luc le théologien, Neuchâtel-Paris, 1978, 290–307. Würthwein, Behm, “μετανοέω, μετάνοια,” in TDNT, vol. 4, pp. 948–1008.

⁶ Cf. Clement of Alexandria, Strom. 2.6.26.5: “Repentance (μετάνοια) is late knowledge, while knowledge (γνώσις) is primitive innocence.” Cf. A. Méhat, “Remarques sur quelques passages du I^{er} Stromate de Clément d’Alexandrie,” in REG, 1956, pp. 41–49.

⁷ In Stobaeus, Ecl. 1.14 (vol. 3, p. 6); likewise Democritus and Gorgias (H. Diels, Fragmente der Vorsokratiker, pp. 158, 14; 302, 28). Cf. BGU 747, col. I, 11.

⁸ Prov 14:15—As opposed to the simple person who believes everything, the prudent person gives himself time for reflection (ἔρχεται εἰς μετάνοιαν); 20:25; 24:32; Philo, Spec. Laws 1.58: “Some people are so foolish that they do not even leave themselves any room for a change of heart” (εἰς μετάνοιαν).

⁹ Xenophon, Cyr. 1.1.3; cf. Hell. 1.7.19: “The best means of learning the truth and not having to repent later”; Demosthenes, 2 C. Aristog. 17: “What decree has he proposed that you have not decided to abandon after being at first persuaded?”; Plutarch, Alex. 11.7: Alexander wished to allow the city of Thebes to report its decision; Josephus, Ant. 16.125: a change of heart (μετάνοια) cannot heal certain hatreds.

¹⁰ This is by no means a Stoic notion. For the Stoics, metanoia is not a virtue but a πάθος, a passion unworthy of the wise man (cf. Chrysippus, in Stobaeus, Ecl. 2.7.11 m; vol. 2, p. 113, 5ff.). Rather, it is a Neopythagorean conception, according to R. Joly, Le Tableau de Cébès et la philosophie religieuse, Brussels, 1963, p. 38. Thanks to repentance, the chastised soul becomes reasonable again (R. Joly, “Note sur μετάνοια,” in RHR 160, 1961, pp. 149–156).

¹¹ Philo, Spec. Laws 4.18. Cf. the metanoia of Chaereas, which is a change of feelings (μεταβαλλόμενος); Chariton, Chaer. 1.3.7; 1.14.10.

¹² Thucydides 3.36.4; Antiphon, 1 Tetr. 12: “Be afraid that one day you will recognize your fault and repent of it (μὴ μετανοήσαντες τὴν ἀμαρτίαν γινώ—τε), for in such a case repentance is without remedy”; Sophocles, El. 581: “If you wish to establish this principle for all, do you not risk establishing your own unhappiness and having to repent of it?”

¹³ Plutarch, De virt. mor. 12; Aem. 41.11: “Timoleon, prostrate with repentance and sorrow”; De adul. et am. 12 (δηγμός); Ant. 24.10—“When Antonius became aware of offences, he felt sharp remorse and he acknowledged them before those who had suffered from them”; Conv. sept. sap. 12: “wealth spent without regret” (μήτε δαπανώ—σι μετάνοία); Ps.-Plutarch, De lib. ed. 14; Plutarch, De sol. an. 3: λύπη δι’ ἀλγηδόνης ἦν μετάνοιαν ὀνομάζομεν. Jer 31:19 has Ephraim say, “I repented; I was ashamed and confounded.”

¹⁴ Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.211; Joseph 87: “Healed of the long illness that had afflicted their souls, they now cursed their past acts and repented of them.” For Philo, metanoia is a healing, like recovery from an illness (Alleg. Interp. 2.60; 3.106; Spec. Laws 1.253), or a return to one’s country (Cherub. 2), a solid and salutary rock on which the shipwrecked land (Post. Cain 178). Only God, “the One who is, experiences no regret” (Unchang. God 33, 72; Moses 1.283; cf. 1Sam 15:29—“The glory of Israel [God] does not change or repent, for he is not a man that he should repent”), but the wise person repents in hope of pardon (Flight 99, 157) and orients himself toward that which is better (Abraham 17; 26–27; Virtues 176). What is more, Moses offers “repentant sinners great rewards” (Virtues 175); “Admirable are the precepts that call to repentance, by which we learn to transform the order of our lives and make them pass from disorder to a better state” (Virtues 183). Metanoia “grasps ardor and love for the better, is urgent to leave behind covetousness and deep-rooted injustice to reach soberness, justice, and the other virtues” (Rewards 15, 22). “The person who is penitent is saved” (Spec. Laws 1.253). Cf. Josephus, War 5.415:

“There remains for you a way of salvation, if you wish it, because God is willing to be appeased by those who confess and repent.”

¹⁵ Philo, Spec. Laws 4.221: to repent of seditious undertakings. Because Enoch “was translated” elsewhere, he became “an example of repentance” (Sir 44:16). Cf. IGLS 297, 10, the Christian Silvanus “knew how to change his life according to the Holy Scriptures.”

¹⁶ Cf. Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.213: “There are many souls that God has not granted repentance even though they desired it”; Spec. Laws 1.187: the Day of Atonement is “a day of purification and deliverance from sins which are pardoned by the grace of the merciful deity, who honors repentance equally with perfect innocence”; Change of Names 235: “The priest appeases God by means of three species of (cultic or ritual) repentance: cattle, birds, or white flour.”

¹⁷ A good number of texts evoke God’s repentances (thirty-seven, according to A. W. Argyle, “God’s Repentance and the LXX,” in ExpT, vol. 75, 1964, p. 367). Sometimes God does not change and does not repent (1Sam 15:29) because he is incensed (Zech 8:14): “I have decided and I shall not repent and I shall not go back” (Jer 4:28); sometimes “Yahweh repented of this; It will not be, says Yahweh” (Amos 7:3, 6; niphal of naham); God is merciful, “repenting in the face of calamity” (Joel 2:13; Jonah 4:2; Jer 18:8); sometimes one remains in doubt: “Perhaps Elohim will turn back and repent” (Jonah 3:9-10); this depends on the honest conversion of sinners. Μετανοέω then means “change a decision.” This is the case with the only three papyripublished since Moulton-Milligan, BGU 1816, 9, 13; P.Oxy. 2270, 12–13; P.Michael. 41, 49 (leaving out of consideration papyri from the Byzantine era, P.Flor. 298, 54, μοναστήριον τῆς μετανοίας; P.Oxy. 1354, 4, εἰς τὸν ἅγιον Σερῆνον ἡμέρα μετανοίας).

¹⁸ Cf. 2Tim 2:25—those who oppose must be taught gently, because God can “grant that they will repent and recognize the truth.” Δοῦναι μετάνοιαν is a traditional turn of phrase, with God always as the subject (Wis 12:10, 19; Acts 5:31; 11:18; Sib. Or. 4.168); cf. 2Pet 3:9—God “shows patience toward you, not wishing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance.”

¹⁹ The only (relative) exception would be 2Cor 7:9-10: “You were grieved to the point that you repented (ε—λυπήθητε εἰς μετάνοιαν) . . . grief (λύπη) according to God works unto salvation a repentance that is not regrettable (μετάνοιαν εἰς σωτηρίαν ἀμεταμέλητον).”

²⁰ Matt 3:8—“Then show forth fruit worthy of repentance” (καρπὸν ἄξιον τῆς μετανοίας, cf. Luke 3:8; Acts 26:20, ἄξια τῆς μετανοίας ἔργα); the good works are carried out in the desire to set past offenses aright and live better. John’s baptism “by repentance” is received with feelings of contrition in preparation for the remission of sins (Matt 3:11), κηρύσσων βάπτισμα μετανοίας εἰς ἄφεσιν ἁμαρτιῶν (Mark 1:4; cf. Luke 3:8; Acts 13:24, 19:4).

²¹ Cf. the letter of Attalus I to Amlada: “Seeing that you had repented of your former offenses” (θεωρῶν οὖν ὑμᾶς μετανοηκότας τε ἐπὶ τοῖς προημαρτημένοις, Dittenberger, Or. 751, 10 = C. B. Welles, Royal Correspondence, n. 54, 9); cf. 2Cor 12:21.

²² Jesus reproached Chorazin and Bethsaida for not having repented, when Tyre and Sidon “would have repented in sackcloth and ashes” (Matt 11:20-21; Luke 10:13; cf. Josephus, Ant. 7.153), as “the men of Nineveh repented at Jonah’s preaching” (Matt 12:41; Luke 11:32). Our word “penitence” comes from the Latin poenitere, “repent,” which derives from the Dorian ποινά, “compensation paid for an offense,” “amends, punishment” (A. Ernout, A. Meillet, Dictionnaire étymologique de la langue latine, Paris, 1932, p. 747). To repent is to suffer privations.

²³ Luke 13:3, 5; cf. 15:7—“There will be more joy in heaven for one sinner who repents than for ninety-nine righteous people who have no need of repentance”; 16:30, the wicked rich man thinks that his brothers will repent and change their conduct if they see someone from the dead; 17:3-4: if a sinning brother repents, one must forgive him.

²⁴ Rev 9:20, 21; 16:11, 20; cf. Rom 2:5—“Through you hardening and your impenitent (ἀμετανόητος) heart, you store up wrath. . . .” This adjective (biblical hapax), attested in the first century (T. Gad 7.5) is common enough in the legal papyri (donations, sales) to express an unchangeable willingness, P.Grenf. II, 68, 4; P.Stras. 29, 31; P.Berl.Zill. VI, 14: ἐκουσία γνώμη καὶ προαιρέσει διὰ ἀμετανοήτω καὶ ἀδόλω βουλήσει; C.P.Herm. 35, 13; SB 9193, 2; 9464, 11. Cf. C. Spicq, “ἀμεταμέλητος in Rom. VI, 29,” in RB, 1960, pp. 210–219.

μετέχω, μετοχή, μέτοχος

metecho, to share, participate; metoche, participation; metochos, partner

metecho, S 3348; TDNT 2.830–832; EDNT 2.420; NIDNTT 1.635–636, 639; MM 405; L&N 23.2, 34.31, 34.32, 57.6; BDF §169(1); BAGD 514 | metoche, S 3352; TDNT 2.830–832; EDNT 2.420; NIDNTT 1.635–636;

MM 406; L&N 34.7; BAGD 514 | metochos, S 3353; TDNT 2.830–832; EDNT 2.420; NIDNTT 1.635–636, 639; MM 406; L&N 34.8; BDF §182(1); BAGD 514; ND 1.84–85

Only the context permits a judgment as to whether a given metochos is an ordinary companion or an associate in the legal or moral sense.¹ It is synonymous with *koinonos*² and indicates a certain de facto or de jure alliance;³ for example, those who share a house (P.Petaus 13, 14; 14, 13, 16, 58, 112), georgoi metochoi (farmers; SB 266, g 5; cf. P.Petaus 126, 2), especially those who have a common profession⁴ or public function, in particular tax collectors.⁵ Beginning with the third century BC, we see associates, like Zeno and Crito, and eventually Sostratos, acting as metochoi, pooling their funds and making them available to the actual farmers, Demetrios and Hippocrates; they takes risks, but they also get a large part of the profits.⁶ A century later: “Paid to the bank of Hermouthis for a quarter of the fishermen of Memnoneia . . . by Pamonthes, son of Teos and his associate, 1,800 drachmas” (Pamonthes . . . kai ho metochos, P.Rein. 125,5). These are parallels to Luke 5:7—“Simon and the others who were in the same boat . . . signaled to their associates (metochois; cf. verse 10: koinonoi) in the other boat that they should come help them.” These men not only worked and fished together; they pooled their resources to pay for boats, nets, and the right to fish on the lake, and they divided the fishing revenues according to their respective interests in the partnership.⁷ So we must think of Peter and the first apostles not only as living in community but also as being partners in the firm of “Simon and Co.,” so closely associated that they were together to hear John the Baptist on the banks of the Jordan, that they went back to fishing together, and that, in full agreement, they abandoned “their net” and their business to follow Jesus. The participation together (metoche) constituted a perfect community (cf. Ps 122:3—he metoche autes epi to auto) and better: a mutual affinity.⁸

A metochos can have a share in material goods or in spiritual realities;⁹ the emphasis is then on matching rights of ownership, as with the baptized, who are “sharers of the heavenly calling” (kleseos epouraniou metochoi, Heb 3:1), “sharers of the Holy Spirit” (metochous genethentas pneumatou hagiou, 6:4), “sharers in Christ” (metochoi gar tou Christou gegonamen, 3:14). Since they are all sons of God (2:9, 13), belonging to the same family (2:11), brothers of Christ (2:12), Christians share Christ’s lot, have common use of his riches (6:4), and are associated with him in the closest possible way.¹⁰

This nuance of intimate sharing, of assimilation, already suggested by the use of the verb metecho for eating¹¹ or instruction,¹² is revealed by its interchangeability with koinoneo: “So, since children have flesh and blood in common (kekoinoneken), he also shares (meteschen) in these same things.”¹³ If metecho is used for a band of malefactors,¹⁴ it is used above all for sharing in honors and responsibilities: “I have reached the age of sixty-eight and I should be enrolled among the members of the gerousia who have lived the same number of years, so as to share in the privileges of the gerousia.”¹⁵ Finally, one may share in priestly and cultic functions. A decree from Delphi for Telesagoros of Abai stipulates “that he have a share (metechein) in the exercise of every office and every priesthood to which the noble families of Delphi have a share (metechousi)” (SEG II, 294, 11; first third of the first century AD). An epigram of Serenos: “It was for libations and sacrifices that we came here (to Philae), desiring to participate in them” (deomenoi kai touton metaschein, SB 8681, 8; second century). At Imbros: “Let the praktores participate in the sacred affairs (metechein ton hieron) like all the other Imbrians.”¹⁶ This sacred meaning is that of 1Cor 10:17, where the Christians share in a single Loaf: hoi gar pantes ek tou henos artou metechomen (cf. verse 16, koinonia); and 10:21, where it is said that one cannot participate in the Lord’s table and in the table of demons. One takes part by communing with others.¹⁷

¹ In the sense of companion, Eccl 4:10—“If one falls, the other helps his companion up”; T. Benj. 2.5; P.Mich. 188, 10; 189, 15–16; 583, 9, 11, 30, 32 (AD 78); 597, 4 (AD 51); P.Lips. 106, 11 (AD 98); P.Giss. 32, 2; P.Hib. 263, 31; P.Princ. 132, 4; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XVI, 29, 1, 10; P.Oxy. 2236, 15; SB 9674 a 3: ὁ μέτοχός μου; 9699, 435. In the sense of associate, 1Sam 20:30; Ps 119:63; Prov 29:10—ἄνδρες αἰ—μάτων μέτοχοι = bloody men; Hos 4:17—“Ephraim is the associate of idols”; Enoch 104.6. Cf. P.Lille 60, 1: “Dorotheos to his associate, greetings”; P.Adl. 12, 7; 14, 13, 21, col. II, 7 (98 BC); P.Bon. 11 d, col. I, 4; BGU 1598, col. I, 4: “Akousilaos and his associates” (16 BC); 1893, 156; 1897, 134; 1897 a 23; 1898, 24, 30; 1900, 18, 21; etc. On associated weavers, cf. P. J. Sijpesteijn, “Receipts for Various Taxes, Penthemeros Certificates, and Customs House Receipts,” in P.Coll.Youtie I, pp. 287ff., n. 34, 7; 39, 4; 40, 4.

² Cf. BGU 1123, 4: ὁμολογοῦμεν εἶναι τοὺς τρεῖς μετόχους καὶ κοινωνοὺς καὶ κυρίου ἕκαστον κατὰ τὸ τρίτον μέρος ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν εἰς τὸν αἰὲν χρόνον τῆς προκειμένης μισθώσεως (from the time of Augustus); P.Bour. 13, 1: ὁμολογοῦσι τεθεισθαι πρὸς ε—αυτοὺς μετοχὴν καὶ κοινωνίαν (February 27, 98). Cf. H. Seesemann, Der Begriff KOINΩNIA im Neuen Testament, Giessen, 1933; P. C. Bori, KOINΩNIA: L’idea della comunione nell’ ecclesiologia recente e nel Nuovo Testamento, Brescia, 1972.

³ The corresponding Hebrew haber signifies a link, an attachment, a joining. God anointed Moses “in preference over his companions” (Ps 45:8 = Heb 1:9), princes or sovereigns who had likewise received the royal

anointing. Cf. the colleagues of the priesthood (APF, 1962, pp. 124–129); P.Brem. 26, 3: καὶ μετόχων πρεσβυτέρων κώμης —Ιβιω—νος; BGU 63, 5; P.Lond. 847, 8 (vol. 3, p. 54). The corresponding Hebrew $h<\emptyset>a<\hat{\ }>barîm$ (Job 11:30) = the confederates, the Hebrews. The Pharisees call themselves $h<\emptyset>a<\hat{\ }>berîm$, “confreres,” members of a religious assembly, forming a sort of congregation; cf. M.J. Lagrange, Le Judaïsme avant Jésus-Christ, Paris, 1931, p. 276.

⁴ Bankers, P.Corn. 41, 5: ἀπὸ τῆς Παλαμήδους καὶ μετόχων τραπέζης Διονυσιάδος (AD 151); P.Mil. 62, 9; P.Oxy. 2720, 2 (first half of the first century); 2961, 6; 1962–2969; SB 9296, 9; 9514, 9; cobblers (P.Oxy. 2767, 5); business persons: “Petosiris . . . and Petermouthis . . . , both sellers of cooked lentils at Memphis, affirm that they have formed an association and partnership beginning with the month of Kaisareios . . . Petosiris having farmed for the same year . . . of Isidoros and his farming partners . . . the agoranomia and the other taxes on vetch-selling (ὄρβιοπωλία) in the nome of Memphis” (P.Bour. 13, 2); “the weavers of Philadelphia, acting through Triadelphos, have paid to the cashier at Lucius . . . and associates, tax-collectors . . . 116 drachmas” (P.Phil. 24, 4; BGU 1591, 4; P.Stras. 411, 5). But peasants (and priests) are sometimes content to refer to their companions merely as οἱ—λοιποὶ (P.Stras. 307, 2; cf. 449, 2; 462, bis 6).

⁵ P.Ryl. 189, 1; 192, 5; P.Mert. 64, 3; P.Oslo 89, 14; 90, 8; 91, 6, 27; P.Rein. 135, 1: “Paniscos and his fellow collectors”; μέτοχοι πράκτορες (P.Alex. 16, 2, 11; 124, 4; p. 28; 464, 2, p. 29; BGU 1584, 4, 17, 23; 1585, 5; 1586, 6; P.Corn. 16, 3; 42, 3; P.Fouad 66, 4; P.Mich. 384, 3; 385, 36; 386, 3; 387, 4; 390, 4; P.Oslo 116, 1; P.Oxf. 9, 5; P.Princ. 44, 3; 125, 3; P.Stras. 199, 1; 357, 5; 365, 4; 411, 3; P.Petaus 124, 3; SB 8982, 3; 8983, 3; 8124, 6; 9128, 4; 9142, 1: Πικω—ς πράκτωρ καὶ μέτοχοι —Ωρυσ Ψεναμούσιος Πεκύσιος; 10778, 1; 10791, 1; 10960, 4, 9; ZPE, vol. 6, 1970, p. 94: Μω—ρος καὶ μέτοχοι πράκτορου στεφανικοῦ κώμης θεογονίδος Ἡερακλείδης etc.); μέτοχοι σιτολόγοι (P.Oxy. 2840, 4, from AD 75; 2841, 5, from AD 85; 2842, 4, from AD 29; P.Oslo 28, 4; P.Mert. 16, 4; P.Oxy. 2185, 2; P.Ross.Georg. V, 13, 5; P.Mil. 103, 11; 171, 3; 172, 4; 176, 2, 8; 245, 4; 246, 4; P.Mich. 391, 5; 392, 3, 393, 6; 394, 3; P.Stras. 369, 4; 372, 4; 457, 5; SB 9087, 12; 9244, 5; 9378, 11; 9382 a 1; 9493, a 6; 9652, 3; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XI, 19, 4); μέτοχοι ε—πιτηρηταί (P.Fouad 64, 1; P.Mich. 224, 5604 P.Oslo 117, 5; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XVI, 37, 6; SB 9427, 3; 10206, 6; 10310, 1: —Απολλώνιος καὶ μέτοχοι ε—πιτηρηταὶ τέλους; 10339, 1; 10340, 1; 10425, 1; 10583, 1); μέτοχοι ἀγορανόμοι (P.Fouad 35, 17; from AD 48; P.Giss. 28, 15; SB 10248, 26).

⁶ Cf. O.Wilck. pp. 544ff. C. Préaux, “La Société grecque en Egypte au IIIe siècle avant notre ère,” in JJP, 1956, vol. 10, pp. 387ff. On farming partners, cf. Harper, “The Relation of ἀρχώνης, μέτοχοι, and ἔγγυοι to Each Other, to the Government and to the Tax Contract in Ptolemaic Egypt,” in Aeg, 1934, pp. 269–285; C. Préaux, Economie royale, pp. 450–459.

⁷ Cf. A. Biever, “Au bord du lac de Tibériade,” in Conférences de Saint-Etienne, Paris, 1911, pp. 304ff. A seine was very expensive, costing more than fifteen hundred dollars; the fishing license cost even more. At Mippur, the Murashû bank outfitted five Jews with five nets and was to receive as a rental fee “five hundred fish of good quality” within twenty days (cf. G. Cardascia, Les Archives de Murashû, Paris, 1951, p. 171; cf. pp. 136, 197).

⁸ 2Cor 6:14—μετοχή is parallel to συμφώνησις (J. Gnllka, “II Kor. VI, 14–VII, 1 im Lichte der Qumranschriften und des Zwölf-Patriarchen-Testaments,” in Festschrift J. Schmid, Regensburg, 1962, pp. 86–99; reprinted in J. Murphy O’Connor, Paul and Qumran, London, 1968, pp. 48–68; J. A. Fitzmyer, Semitic Background, pp. 205–217; B. Gärtner, The Temple and the Community in Qumran and the N.T., Cambridge, 1965, pp. 49ff.; R. J. McKelvey, The New Temple, Oxford, 1969, pp. 93ff.). Cf. Philo, Alleg. Interp. 1.22: “participation in the intelligible”; P.Cair.Zen. 59362: when Philemon disputes with his father-in-law concerning the respective shares in an orchard (περὶ μετοχῆς τοῦ παραδείσου), their case comes before the strategos; P.Dura 25, 6, 24: τὸν ἔχοντα τὸ λοιπὸν μέρος τῆς αὐτῆς ἀμπέλου μετοχῆς; Jur.Pap., n. XI, 62: εἶναι τέ σε μάλιστα . . . ἄμοιρον παντελω—ς πάσης μετοχῆς καὶ σχέσεως κληρονομίας; L. Robert (Etudes épigraphiques, p. 131): foreigners in transit have the right to share in any liberality, banquet, distribution of oil, etc. (μετοχῆς δὲ καὶ τοι—ς παρεπιδ[ημοῦσιν]); P.Lond. 941, 8; vol. 3, p. 119: κατὰ μετοχὴν τοῦ ἄλλου ἡμίσιους τω—ν ὅλων οἰ—κοπέδων.

⁹ Heb 12:8—“If you receive no reproof—in which all have their share (ἡ—ς μέτοχοι γεγόνασιν πάντες)—then you are bastards and not sons.” An epitaph of a Teian: “Meli, who had a share in perfect piety” (ὄς πάσης εὐσεβίας μέτοχος, E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. II, 2). Epitaph of a young Jew who rests in his tomb “without having had a share in marriage” (οὐδὲ γάμου μέτοχος, CII 1512, 3 = SEG I, 572).

¹⁰ The Peshitta glosses, “We are mixed in with Christ,” and Chrysostom comments “Together with him we are but one . . . , we are consubstantial (συνουσιώθημεν) with Christ.”

¹¹ Wis 16:3; 1Cor 9:10; 10:30; Heb 5:13 (cf. Philo, Migr. Abr. 29: “This race . . . which has no need of an early rearing comparable to nursing”; Joseph 196: the governor gives the order “to invite these people to share the table and the salt”). Other meanings: “Do not let a stranger share your wife” (Prov 5:17); “The priests, neglecting the sacrifices, hastened to the wrestling arena to take part in the unlawful exercises” (2Macc 4:14); Jason “had no place in the tomb of his fathers” (5:10); Judas Maccabeus ate only vegetables “so as not to share in defilement” (πρὸς τὸ μὴ μετασχει—ν τοῦ μολυσμοῦ, 5:27).

¹² Sir 51:28—μετάσχετε παιδείας; Ep. Arist. 248: to desire that the children should share in σωφροσύνη is an effect of the divine power; 264: “to share principles of conduct”; Philostratus, Gym. 14: “I will explain the extent to which gymnastics shares in each of these sciences (medicine and training).”

¹³ Heb 2:14; cf. I.Magn. XLIV, 17, 19: μετέχειν τα—ς τε θυσίας καὶ τοῦ ἄγω—νος ... τοὺς κοινωνησοῦντας τα—ς τε θυσίας; P.Oxy. 1408, 26: εἰ—σὶ δὲ ὑποδεχομένων πολλοὶ τρόποι οἱ— μὲν τὰρ κοινωνοῦντες τω—ν ἀδικημάτων ὑποδέχονται, οἱ— δὲ οὐ μετέχοντες μὲν κα[. . . . On shared blood, cf. Heb 7:13—“The one for whom these things were said belonged to another tribe” (φυλῆς ε—τέρας μετέσχηκεν); cf. this decree of Canopus: μετέχειν δὲ καὶ τοὺς ε—κ τῆς πέμπτης φυλῆς τω—ν Εὐεργετω—ν θεω—ν τω—ν ἄγνειω—ν (Dittenberger, Or. 56, 31 = SB 8858).

¹⁴ I.Thas. 18, 3: “If the denouncer (of an insurrectionist movement) is in on the plot (τις τω—ν μετεχόντων), he shall receive the bonus.” For participation in farm work, cf. P.Tebt. 309, 20; P.Corn. 15, 17; P.Cair.Zen. 59294, 16; 59474, 12.

¹⁵ P.Ryl. 599, 11: ὡς τὸ μετέχειν τω—ν τῆς γερουσίας τιμίων. An honorific decree from Samothrace: “have a share (μετέχοντα) in all of the other privileges that the other proxenoi share (μετέχουσιν),” (I.Thas. 169, 16–17, 21); Ep. Arist. 224: “Everyone wants to share in this honor”; P.Oxy. 2918, 16: “that I may be able to take part in the common privilege” (τῆς κοινῆς φιλανθρωπίας μετασχει—ν).

¹⁶ NCIG, n. 21, 2; cf. Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.31: “one who shares in the priesthood” (τὸν μετέχοντα τῆς ι—ερωσύνης); 1.232: “Amenophis seemed to share in the divine nature.”

¹⁷ Cf. the request to participate in a distribution—many references given in Index X to P.Oxy. XL, p. 132.

μετεωρίζομαι

meteorizomai, to be raised, suspended, exalted; to be in suspense, be anxious meteorizomai, S 3349; TDNT 4.630–631; EDNT 2.420; MM 405; L&N 25.232; BAGD 514

After prescribing “Take no thought for what you shall eat or what you shall drink,” Jesus adds kai me meteorizesthe (Luke 12:29). The Vulgate translates literally et nolite in sublime tolli. And indeed the ordinary meaning of the verb is “to be raised, suspended” in a physical sense;¹ but it is hard to see what sense this definition makes of the text, which urges confidence and denounces anxiety.

With the support of Thucydides 8.16.2, which uses meteorizo for a boat driven to the open sea, some have leapt to the conclusion that this verb can mean “agitate (with disquiet),” a meaning nowhere else attested.² As for other meanings, the sense of prideful exaltation or haughtiness, the preponderant denotation in the LXX, does not fit here.³

M. J. Lagrange (on Luke 12:29) is right to point out that the moral sense of meteoros, which started from “to be on high, be suspended” and evolved into “be in suspense, be anxious.” He cites Josephus, Ant. 8.218: the crowd is agitated, anxious to hear what Rehoboam will say; War 4.118: “Titus knew that many, giving in to private hatred and personal hostility, would denounce innocent people if he sought out the guilty. So it was better to leave the guilty party in suspense and fear” (einai meteoron en phobo).⁴

The denominative verb meteorizomai is well-attested in this sense: Herod, when he named his successors, was very disturbed (memeteoristo polla) because of their rivalry and the hopes that he had given his sons (Josephus, Ant. 16.135).⁵ In the second century, Julius Clemens writes to his brother Arrianus: “You know that I am anxious (ginoskon hoti meteorizomai) if you do not write me frequently concerning your affairs” (P.Mich. 484, 5–6); “I am very anxious and astonished concerning this” (Pap.Lugd.Bat. 1,13, 2). In the following century, Appia urges his mother Serapias: “Do not be upset; we are doing well” (Kyria, me meteorizou, kalos diagomen). Thus we can with complete certainty translate Luke 12:29 “do not be anxious.”⁶ This is not a crux interpretum.

¹ Mic 4:1—“the mountain of the house of Yahweh will be raised above the hills” (niphral of the Hebrew verb nasa'); Ezek 10:16, 17, 19—the cherubim are raised above the earth (Hebrew rûm); Philo, Spec. Laws 3.159: “hoist to the top of a gallows”; P.Oxy. 904, 6: καθ ε—κάστην ἡμέραν μετεωρίζομενον σχοινίοις καὶ πληγαι—ς κατακοπτόμενον κατὰ τὸ σω—μα; cf. Menander, Dysk. 395: “If I take him in my arms, once airborne (μετέωρος) he clamps his teeth onto a branch”; T. Abr. A 2.14. The adjective μετέωρος denotes height (Sir 22:18; 37:14), “high mountain” (Ezek 17:23), “raised hill” (Isa 30:25; 57:7), “above = heaven” (Jer 31:37), the loftiest boughs of a tree (Isa 17:6); “the platform, that lofty place” (Philo, Flacc. 142); “reason raises its thoughts to the heights” (Drunkness 128). Aristotle’s ὀχετοὶ μετέωροι (Ath. Pol. 50) are open drain-pipes to the ground (cf. J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1958, p. 215, n. 134). “The rest of the route was at high elevations, where the air was entirely healthy” (Diodorus Siculus 19.20.2). In geometry: that which is situated above a plane (C. Mugler, Terminologie géométrique, pp. 290, 291). E. Delebecque translates “do not be the wind’s plaything” and observes that the verb μετεωρίζομαι, “like the adjective μετέωρος, is used literally or figuratively for a person or a thing that leaves the ground behind and rises into the clouds or takes to the high sea; thus becoming, like the Socrates of Aristophanes’ caricature, whose feet are not on the ground, the plaything of the wind, or like a ship or a city that is in danger, the plaything of the waves. Hence the idea is not ‘anxiety’ It is rather ‘useless agitation’ . . . and even more ‘instability’; if the expression were not a bit too familiar, the verb could be translated ‘perdre le nord’ [literally ‘lose the north’; meaning lose one’s bearings, lose one’s head], the ‘north,’ i.e., God, being the exclusive direction of the voyage of life; and this direction is given by faith. . . . Without it, one loses one’s equilibrium, becomes disoriented, the plaything of the wind” (Evangile de Luc, Paris, 1976, p. 83). In astronomy, meteors are various phenomena that pass between heaven and earth, for which the atmosphere is the cause or the locus (comets, falling stars, rainbows); the comparative μετεωρότερος, “higher and higher,” occurs frequently; cf. Geminus, Intro. to Astronomy 5.31; 13.13.

² It would be a transitus de genere ad genus to cite μετεωρισμός (Hebrew mishbar), “wave, breaker,” in Ps 42:8; 88:7; Jonah 2:4. Elsewhere, Agathocles “encouraged (μετεωρίζων) a good many people with his promises” (Diodorus Siculus 19.6.6); but this historian uses the verb for revolutionary agitation and seditious movements (17.5.2; 17.29.4; cf. 17.72.3—stirred up by drunkenness).

³ Ps 131:1; Obad 4 (hiphil of the Hebrew gabah); 2Macc 5:17: “Antiochus was exalted in his own mind”; 7:34; Polybius 3.70.1: “Sempronius, proud and lifted up by success”; cf. μετέωρος: the haughty (2Sam 22:28; Isa 2:12-13; 18:2); used especially for an insolent look (Isa 5:15; cf. Sir 23:4; 26:9); Epictetus 3.24.75: “You may find joy again and go about with head lifted up (μετέωρος πορεύη) at Athens.” The pejorative nuance, lift oneself up = be swollen with pride = be carried away with delusions = become unnaturally bombastic, recurs constantly in Philo, Heir 71, 269; Alleg. Interp. 3.186; Post. Cain 115; Spec. Laws 1.44; Moses 1.195; 2.139; Drunkness 93; cf.

Dreams 2.16. Anth. Pal. 9.528 attributes an epigram to “Palladas the proud”; P. Waltz rightly sees in the pejorative epithet μετέωρος in this text the equivalent of ἀλαζών and rejects its interpretation by certain commentators as “suspended, hence incredulous” (“Sur quelques épigrammes ‘protreptiques,’” in REG, 1946–47, p. 209).

⁴ We might add Polybius 5.18.5: “their minds were in suspense”; 3.107.6: “the allies were hesitant in their thoughts” (τω—ν δὲ συμμάχων πάντων μετεώρων ὄντων ται—ς διανοίαις). In the papyri, τὰ μετέωρα means “difficulties” (P.Mich. 476, 17; second century AD; cf. P.Köln 56, 14), pending matters, not finished (479, 16; P.Ryl. 144, 10, from AD 38; P.Brem. 3, 6), in litigation (P.Mich. 477, 36–37; P.Brem. 20, 13), notably contracts that are not legally complete or that have disputed clauses (P.Oxy. 238, 1, from AD 72; 1219, 5; P.Fay. 116, 12; from AD 104). In BGU 417, 4, 6, τὰ μετέωρα is in opposition to ἀμέριμνος (line 7; cf. Moulton-Milligan, on this word). Thus in 280 BC, Samos drafts a decree for the judges from Miletus, Myndos, and Halicarnassus “to regulate contracts in litigation” (ε—πὶ τὰ μετέωρα συμβόλαια, SEG I, 363, 3 and 6); cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 364, 43. P.Mich. inv. 855, 12: πολλὰ μετεωρίζομαι = I still have much unfinished business (ed. H. C. Youtie, in ZPE, vol. 27, 1977, p. 149).

⁵ [Note that neither the text nor this interpretation of it is certain. Niese reads μεμετεώριστο, but the readings νενεωτέριστο and ε—νεωτέριστο are found in the codices. LCL follows Niese, but translates “there was already considerable unrest.” Cf. War 1.466–467, which contrasts the discord among the sons with Herod’s fond hopes for unity among them.]

⁶ The Old Latin got it right: nolite solliciti esse; likewise the Peshitta. On the other ancient versions, cf. J. Molitor, “Zur Übersetzung von μετεωρίζεσθε, Lk 12, 29,” in BZ, 1966, pp. 107–108,

μετριοπαθέω

metriopatheo, to suffer (or experience emotion) with moderation; to sympathize

metriopatheo, S 3356; TDNT 5.938; EDNT 2.421; MM 406; L&N 88.65; BDF §187(7); BAGD 514–515

According to Heb 5:2, the high priest must be able to sympathize with the ignorant and the straying (metriopathein dynamenos). At least that is the sense suggested by the context, which insists that Jesus was really human, that he was in every respect like his brothers, and that he learned to be merciful through his experience of human weakness. But according to its etymology (paschein metrios or kata to metron) the biblical hapax metriopatheo, which unknown in the papyri and the inscriptions and is a term of school philosophy, would mean “suffer with moderation,” as at Ep. Arist. 256: philosophy requires “properly carrying out the present responsibility while remaining within measure” (metriopathe).

According to Aristotle (see Diogenes Laertius 5.31; De vit. et poes. Hom. 135), followed by the Stoics, metriopatheia —“patience, the daughter of moderation” (Plutarch, De frat. amor. 18)—is the golden mean between indifference or insensitivity (apatheia) and extreme reaction, hypersensitivity, frantic excitement (ametria ton pathon). The sage must be neither too easily moved (pathetikos) nor unfeeling (apathes) but metriopathes (cf. Plutarch, De virt. mor. 12; Ps.-Plutarch, Cons. ad Apoll. 3 and 22; Plutarch, De cohib. ira 458 c; De frat. amor. 489 c), far from excess.¹ This is an eminently Philonian virtue: “The excellent and profitable lessons of reason . . . neither immoderate convulsions . . . nor impassibility . . . preferring the golden mean to the extremes, holding to moderation in the emotions (metriopathein)” (Abraham 257); “In my view, modesty, truthfulness, moderation in the emotions (metriopatheia), humility, and innocence are weighty . . . ; immodesty, lying, excess in the emotions (he ametria ton pathon), pride, wickedness are enemies” (Virtues 195); “Moses thinks that he must remove and suppress the short-tempered element of the soul, because what he prefers is not moderation in the emotions (ou metriopatheian) but the total absence of the emotions” (Alleg. Interp. 3.129); “Aaron strives for moderations in the emotions” (ibid. 3.132); “The one who is perfect thinks of nothing petty or base; moderating the emotions is not his desire (oude metriopathein bouletai); he goes well beyond this, having entirely suppressed the passions everywhere” (ibid. 3.134); “Well-trained in misfortune . . . I have been treated as a prisoner, I have lived as a foreigner, I have worked for wages, I have toiled at another’s bidding, I have been threatened even with death . . . I have personally suffered a thousand unendurable evils. Through it all, I have learned to moderate my emotions (eph’ hois paideutheis metriopathein), and I have not given in” (Joseph 26).

On the basis of these texts, some commentators interpret Heb 5:2 to mean “who can restrain his anger against the ignorant and the wayward.”² As opposed to Moses, who gave in to unbridled wrath stirred up by sin (Exod 32:19), the high priest should be mild, though not weak and not excessively indulgent. But this golden moderation, this balance, has no point of contact with the immoderate spectacle of Christ’s suffering at Gethsemane (Heb 5:7-8), nor with the fact that he learned compassion for his human brothers and sisters precisely through being engulfed in weakness himself (5:2). Moreover, Philo made of metriopatheia a virtue of those who were on the way (like Aaron), whereas apatheia was for him the virtue of those who had achieved perfection, like Moses (Alleg. Interp. 3.144); and it is impossible to detract in the slightest from the perfection (teleiosis) of the high priest of the new covenant, which is so insistently affirmed by Hebrews—a major element of which is merciful lovingkindness.

So it seems preferable to consider metriopatheo in the vocabulary of this letter as a synonym of sympatheo (Heb 4:5), associated with feelings of magnanimity,³ of epieikeia,⁴ of praotes.⁵ These connotations of goodness, kindness, patience suggest that Christ's metriopatheia is not to be understood in terms of the traditional Stoic vocabulary, nor even, as is often the case with compound forms, according to its etymology. Rather, it means that commiseration, sympathy is innate in the priest's nature. Being weak himself (5:2), he puts himself on the level of sinners (Gal 6:1); his moderation in compassion comes from within, from his experience of his own weakness (astheneia, Heb 4:15; 5:2; cf. Matt 26:41), though without sin. This innocence makes him even more merciful.⁶

¹ Cf. the physician's attitude, according to Hippocrates: "being in the forefront and being lavish stir scorn, even when it would be useful" (Hippocrates, Medic. 1). With Plutarch, μετριοπαθεία, often associated with πραότης, is above all a good disposition of character, cf. Plutarch, De sera 551 c; Adv. Col. 1119 c.

² E. J. Yarnold, "Μετριοπαθει—ν apud Hebr. V, 2," in VD, 1960, pp. 149–155.

³ Just as Vespasian and Titus demonstrate long-suffering toward the Jews (Josephus, Ant. 12.128, μεγαλοφροσύνη).

⁴ Philo, Spec. Laws 3.96: "The most conciliatory and least passionate men."

⁵ Plutarch, De frat. amor. 18; cf. De cohib. ira 10; Publ. 6.5–6; Brutus having ordered the execution of his two sons and having taken part in it without showing any sign of emotion, R. Flacelière comments: "Plutarch, employing the philosophical vocabulary, wonders whether this is a case of ἀπάθεια (domination of emotion by reason) or of ἀναλγησία (lack of feeling owing to violent wrath), and remarks that neither of the two is normally appropriate for a human, the one being characteristic of the gods and the other of savage beasts" (Plutarque: Vies, vol. 2, Paris, 1961, p. 56).

⁶ J. Roloff, "Der mitleidende Hohepriester" in Jesus Christus in Historie und Theologie (Festschrift H. Conzelmann), Tübingen, 1975, pp. 143–166.

μιμνήσκομαι, μνεία, μνήμη, μνημονεύω, μνημόσυνον mimneskomai, to remember, mention; mneia, memory, mention; mneme, memory, mention, faculty of memory; mnemoneuo, to remember, keep in mind; mnemosynon, monument, memorial, thing remembered

mimneskomai, S 3403; TDNT 4.672–678; EDNT 2.430; NIDNTT 3.230, 233, 240–242, 245; MM 412–413; L&N 29.7, 29.16; BDF §§26, 155(1), 175, 311(2), 341, 396, 416(2); BAGD 522 | mneia, S 3417; TDNT 4.678–679; EDNT 2.434; NIDNTT 3.230, 238, 242, 246; MM 414; L&N 29.7, 29.18; BAGD 524 | mneme, S 3420; TDNT 4.679; EDNT 2.435; NIDNTT 3.230–231, 238, 240; MM 415; L&N 29.7; BAGD 524–525 | mnemoneuo, S 3421; TDNT 4.682–683; EDNT 2.435–436; NIDNTT 3.230, 240–243; MM 415; L&N 29.7; BDF §175; BAGD 525 | mnemosynon, S 3422; EDNT 2.436; NIDNTT 3.230, 233, 236, 238, 242; MM 415; L&N 29.12; BDF §110(2); BAGD 525

From Homer¹ to the papyri, the verb mimnesko in the middle voice means “have in one’s head, think about, remember, mention,” and is normally construed with the genitive for the object of memory.² Its meanings can be divided into three principal groups: (a) “put oneself in mind of, recall”:³ “Farewell, and remember the things that I have said” (erroso kai memneso ton eiremenon, P.Mert. 12, 26; AD 58); “You know the one I am talking about” (P.Mert. 85, 6); “For it is necessary to remember your nobility” (anankaion gar esti mimneskesthai tes kalokagathias sou).⁴ Sometimes there is a legal nuance: “inform, make appeal”; in a letter from the first half of the first century, Nemesios protests against the decision of an archaimachirophoros: “It is necessary that they inform (or appeal to) the strategos.”⁵ Sometimes the nuance is affective (“I evoke for you”) and expresses commonality of feelings: “Remember us, as we remember you” (P.Ant. 44, 16); “Every time I think of you . . . I weep” (P.Mich. 465, 9); “with us he constantly mentioned you.”⁶

(b) To mention is also to evoke the memory of, recall, commemorate;⁷ it is in this sense that the verb appears in tomb inscriptions⁸ and takes on a religious value. A pilgrim in his proskynema associates his wife and children;⁹ “I heard (the voice of Memnon) four times and I remembered (kai emnesthen) Zeno and Arianus, my brothers.”¹⁰ A husband carries out an act of adoration by proxy for his absent wife.¹¹ In letters, the writer asks to be remembered in prayers (BGU 2006, 3; second century BC; C.P.Herm. 9, 9; 47, 6).

(c) To remember is again to “take care, concern oneself with,” a reason for acting:¹² kata touto memnemenos (P.Oxy. 2407, 34); “You did not write me at all, and you took no thought for the security of the house” (1070, 48); “Take care to send me the letter from Evangelus by the hand of someone trustworthy” (mnestheti pempasai moi . . . ten epistolen, 2984, 11).

These meanings are also found in the LXX,¹³ which almost always translates the Hebrew verb zakar with mimneskomai,¹⁴ giving it considerable theological resonance. To be sure, the psychological meaning (“memory of the past”) is attested a number of times: people remember the fish eaten in Egypt (Num 11:5; cf. Ezek 23:27; Ps 137:1, 6) and things that happened in a foreign land (Wis 19:10), money left on deposit (Tob 4:1), and fatherly words of command (6:15), but the evocation of the past is blurred in favor of the nuance “consider, reflect,” usually with a view to beneficent intervention. This sort of memory is first of all attributed to God, who “remembers” to put aside evil and bless people.¹⁵ It is an expression of his faithfulness: he remembers his covenant in answering prayers (Exod 2:24; Ps 105:8; 106:45; 111:5). He remembers that men are of flesh (Ps 78:39; 88:5; 89:47; 103:14; 136:23); his mercy stirs wonder: “What is man that you remember him, the son of Adam that you concern yourself with him?” (Ps 8:4 = Heb 2:6-9), despite his smallness! The faith of Israel is expressed in this conviction: “Yahweh remembers us; he will bless us,”¹⁶ and “religion” means beseeching God to remember.¹⁷ God is asked not to remember ancestors’ offenses (Ps 79:8; Bar 3:5) or personal transgressions (Ps 25:7); “Even in your wrath, remember with pity” (Hab 3:2; Jer 31:20), because the Lord acts according to his grace (Ps 25:6; Isa 64:8), remains attached to his own (Ps 74:2; 106:4) and remembers their sacrifices and offerings (Ps 20:3). Confidence is absolute: “Remember me and take care of me.”¹⁸

On the human side, the great moral principle is to think of Yahweh, after the fashion of Tobias: “I remembered God with all my soul”:¹⁹ remaining mindful of all his marvelous deeds,²⁰ notably the whole history of Israel under the manifest guidance of Providence (Deut 7:18; 8:2, 18; 9:7; 15:15; 16:3, 12; 24:18, 22; 32:7), but also remembering the Lord’s commandments and the law of Moses to do them (Exod 20:8; Num 15:39-40; Deut 5:15; Josh 1:13; Ps 103:18; Isa 68:11; Mal 3:22); one takes into account prophecies (Tob 2:6) and the words of an angel (Tob 8:2). So this memory is a source of obedience, a taking into consideration that inspires courage and faithfulness (Amos 1:9), especially in times of distress (Isa 20:16, Hebrew paqad = look upon with attention and interest). It is expressed also in worship, where the Lord’s benefits are celebrated: “Remember that his name is exalted” (Isa 12:4; 63:7); “Remember to magnify his work, which is sung by men” (Job 36:24; Bar 2:32); “I want to commemorate your name in every generation” (Ps 45:17; 71:16; 78:35; Isa 17:10); close relations are associated with this celebration, as when Jonathan writes to the Spartans, “We do not cease to remember you on our feasts and other holy days in the sacrifices that we offer” (1Macc 12:11).

This memory, which is in reality a reflection, is a preponderant element in Israelite moral pedagogy. The wicked do not think about doing mercy (Ps 109:16), take no thought for the poor (Eccl 9:15; Sir 16:17), have no interest in wisdom (Sir 15:8; Bar 3:23; Isa 57:11); but the wise person remembers his parents with gratitude (Sir 7:28; 23:14), remembers that “we all will die” (8:7) and that the divine wrath will not be slow in coming (7:16). Thus “memory” has bearing on the future: “In all your actions, remember your end and you will not sin.”²¹ Moral conduct is determined by this “memory,” this judicious judgment,²² informed by the experience of the past²³ and by human psychology.²⁴

The meanings of the verb are less numerous in Philo and Josephus, where the meaning “mention, cite” is by far the most frequent²⁵ and “remember the past” only a little less so: “the intelligence thinks the present, remembers (memnetai) the past, awaits the future.”²⁶ But one also remembers the future: according to Solon, it is in the fifth cycle of life that “man thinks of marriage” (Philo, Creation 104), is preoccupied with it (cf. Heir 12); “Remember that you will even have to make war against the Romans” (Josephus, Life 209). That is to say, this remembering consists of thinking, meditating, reflecting,²⁷ and finally “taking into account” certain information in view of an action to be undertaken.²⁸ Only Philo uses the verb with a religious sense: God is “the one who ought to be remembered constantly”;²⁹ “If you remember your own nothingness . . . you will also remember God’s transcendence” (Sacr. Abel and Cain 55); finally, the meaning of memorial: in celebrating a sacred meal, one remembers the sacrifices (Plant. 162: ton thysion memnemenoi; cf. Decalogue 94).

In the NT, “remembering” has lost much of its importance, probably because of what was completely new in the covenant instituted by Jesus.³⁰ God’s remembering is mentioned only four times: first, in the words of the Virgin Mary (Luke 1:54) and of Zacharias (Luke 1:72), in terms that partake very much of OT language (Ps 98:3; 106:8), to celebrate the mirabilia Dei, God’s merciful intervention in messianic salvation; then in two texts in Hebrews that are simply quotations. Heb 2:16 quotes Ps 8:5 (“What is man that you should remember him?”);³¹ Heb 8:12 quotes Jer 31:34 (“I will remember their sins no longer”).³²

On the other hand, the human activity of remembering is often mentioned, notably with regard to the recent past (“If you remember that your brother has something against you” [Matt 5:23]), and especially with regard to words that have been uttered: the Pharisees and the chief priests remember that Jesus had announced his resurrection (Matt 27:63), and Peter remembers that the Master had predicted his denial; but this is a matter of recalling a prophecy to memory, as for example when the angels remind the holy women (Luke 24:6, 8), and this is not a simple evocation but includes understanding, as when the apostles come to understand the purification of the temple while meditating on Ps 69:10 (John 2:17, 22), or the triumph of Palm Sunday in light of Zech 9:9 (John 12:16). In baptizing the centurion Cornelius, Peter remembers what Jesus had said concerning the baptism in the Holy Spirit (Acts 11:16). To remember words “spoken aforetime” (proieiremenon) by the prophets, the apostles, and the Lord and Savior Jesus Christ means not only to accept and believe them but to obey them, because this submission is the rule of thought and of life (Jude 17; 2Pet 3:2). In addition, St. Paul praises the Corinthians for remembering him (mou memnesthe) “and holding to the traditions just as I transmitted them to you.”³³

As in the wisdom writers, “remembering” can be a simple recollection that allows reflection,³⁴ but also the origin of beneficent and helpful conduct,³⁵ and there is mixed with it a positive affective reaction to helping the unfortunate.³⁶ St. Paul, imprisoned at Rome, remembers Timothy’s tears (2Tim 1:4), probably on the occasion of the apostle’s arrest. The captive cannot get this wrenching farewell scene out of his mind.

Mneia. — This substantive has two meanings: “memory” and “mention” (to make mention of someone). In the former case,³⁷ it is used especially with the verb echo (“keep the memory”).³⁸ In this sense, “you always keep a good memory of us” (echete mneian hemon agathen pantote, 1Tim 3:6).

Classical Greek and the LXX usually use the formula mneian poieo, “make mention of.”³⁹ The inscriptions from the Hellenistic era give a religious value: “I, Menelaos, come to the great goddess Isis, and I mention (mneian poioumenos) my own people for good.”⁴⁰ It appears many times in letters, beginning in the third century with the correspondence of Zeno: “making mention on every occasion” (em panti kairo mneian poioumenoi, SB 6720, 3); “to make mention of us” (peri hemon mneian poesai, 6784; 8142 = SEG VIII, 552). The soldier Antonius Maximus writes to his sister Sabina: “making mention of thee before the gods here” (mneian sou poioumenos para tois enthade theois).⁴¹ A woman, Isias, writes to her “brother” Hephaestion (her husband?), a refugee at the Serapeum at Memphis: “All those who are in the household continually make mention of you” (hoi en oiko pantes sou diapantos mneian poioumenos).⁴² So we can see that Paul was conforming to good contemporary usage from his first letter (“always making mention concerning you all,” pantote peri panton hymon mneian poioumenoi)⁴³ to his last (“without ceasing I keep your memory” [2Tim 1:3]).

Mneme. — This action noun is quite often synonymous with the preceding word, but it especially evokes the faculty of memory⁴⁴ and not the objective memory itself (mnema, a commemorative monument, tomb, etc.). Facts are entrusted to memory (2Macc 2:25); one remembers what is past (Wis 11:12). In making psalms, one remembers the holiness and goodness of God (Ps 30:4; 97:12; 145:7); but according to Eccl 1:11, the memory of the ancients, the wise (2:16), the dead is lost.⁴⁵ Mnemen echo is to retain the memory,⁴⁶ mnemen poieo is to mention, evoke, bring to mind.⁴⁷ This latter meaning is that of the NT hapax: “I will be zealous that on every occasion after my departure you will be able to bring these things to mind” (tentouton mnemen poieisthai, 2Pet 1:15; parallel to hypomimneskein peri touton, 1:12, and en hypomnesei, 1:13). To evaluate this effort, we should remember that Philo wrote his treatise On the Special Laws “to awaken the memory of lovers of knowledge” (Spec. Laws 4.238), because “the ancient tradition is transmitted . . . to the memory of contemporaries and of the generations that follow” (Sacr. Abel and Cain 78). Indeed, Philo is the theologian of mneme, an innate faculty (Creation 18; Alleg. Interp. 2.43; 3.91–93; Spec. Laws 1.334), but one given by God, so that it is almost always seen as beneficent, forgetfulness being an illness of the memory (Prelim. Stud. 39–41; Change of Names 84; Virtues 176). Of course, it is first of all the recording of the past⁴⁸ and “through memories, the flame of noble qualities is kept alive” (Migr. Abr. 16; Dreams 2.37); but for Philo, the memory is above all a religious faculty: a memory of the good (Alleg. Interp. 3.18; Husbandry 133); “memory is for keeping and observing the holy precepts”⁴⁹ and it is indispensable to the disciple for profiting from the Master’s counsel.⁵⁰

Mnemoneuo. — This denominative verb, which is construed either with the genitive or with the accusative, is practically synonymous with mimnesko,⁵¹ like its meaning “recall, remember” both in the classical literature⁵² and in the papyri: “I exhort you to remember me in your holy prayer”;⁵³ “urging you to remember me also” (parakalon mnemoneues kamou, C.P.Herm. 8, 10); “Remember your oath concerning the holy church.”⁵⁴ Likewise in the LXX, where one remembers the past,⁵⁵ but this evocation is especially a reflection, a thinking that determines conduct.⁵⁶

Philo gives mnemoneuo its exact nuance “keep in mind” in his commentary on Gen 2:15—“‘keep’ (phylatto) means ‘remember’ (mnemoneuo)” (Alleg. Interp. 1.89). Quite fundamental for the soul: “a memory free of forgetfulness, keeping everything that merits being kept.”⁵⁷ This is the meaning of the verb that the evangelists place exclusively in Jesus’ mouth: “Do you not retain the memory (ou mnemoneuete) of the five loaves that fed the five thousand?”⁵⁸ Likewise St. Paul, who keeps in mind the virtues of the Thessalonians (1Thess 1:3), exhorts Christians to remember him affectionately (Acts 20:31; 1Thess 2:9; col. 4:18) and to be faithful to his teachings (2Thess 2:5) or to those of Christ (Acts 20:35). Converted Gentiles must retain the memory of the time when they were “without Christ” (Eph 2:11), and this evocation is always a call to faithfulness⁵⁹ and devotion (Gal 2:10). Consequently, to “retain the memory of Jesus Christ” (2Tim 2:8) is not simply the act of remembering but thinking and deepening one’s faith by drawing out the consequences.⁶⁰

According to Heb 11:15, the patriarchs did not hold on to the memory of (attachment to) their native land, and on his deathbed Joseph calls to mind the exodus of the Israelites.⁶¹ The exhortation to preserve the memory of the *hegoumenoi*⁶² is always a recommendation to faithfulness.

Mnemosynon. — This neuter noun, a substantivized form of the adjective mnemosynos, normally means that which one remembers or “that which evokes a memory.”⁶³ Herodotus uses the word in the sense of material constructions or creations that perpetuate the memory of a person: “Queen Nitocris left monuments (mnemosyna) which I will describe” (1.185); “Moeris built as a monument of his reign” the propylaea of the sanctuary of Hephaestus.⁶⁴ In the LXX, mnemosynon means “the one evoked” when it translates the Hebrew zeker,⁶⁵ but it is part of the liturgical vocabulary and translates sometimes the Hebrew ‘azkarah regarding an oblation: “the priest shall burn the memorial portion on the altar” (Lev 2:2, 9, 16; 5:12; 6:8; Num 5:26; Sir 15:16), this good odor which is pleasing to God (cf. Sir 38:11; Tob 12:12); sometimes zakarôn: Passover in the Feast of Unleavened Bread (Exod 12:14; 13:9), the stones in the ephod (Exod 28:12; 39:7; Josh 4:7), the breastplate (Exod 28:29; 30:6), the bells (Sir 45:9, 11; 50:16) are calls to remembrance for Israel, especially the remembrance of their offenses.⁶⁶ In any event, the sacrifice of the righteous is acceptable, “his memorial will not be forgotten” (Sir 35:7).

Given the spiritualization of the cult in the Hellenistic period⁶⁷ and the Israelite tradition guaranteeing that the memory of the righteous will be a blessing, we can understand the reward Jesus gave Mary of Bethany, who anointed his body with a view to his burial: “Everywhere throughout the world . . . what she has done will be told in memory of her” (eis mnemosynon autes),⁶⁸ that is, in her honor. Following the LXX, we must understand that this zakarôn will be universally remembered and applauded,⁶⁹ but also that it is acceptable to heaven, where God blesses this woman. Similarly, the angel affirms to Cornelius, “Your prayers and alms have ascended as a memorial before God,”⁷⁰ that is, have been accepted with favor.

¹ F. Bader, “Notes sur les emplois homériques de μμνήσκομαι,” in RevPhil, 1968, pp. 49–53; the middle imperative can have causative value. On the infix σκ, cf. A. Debrunner, “διδάσκω,” in Mélanges E. Boisacq, Brussels, 1937, vol. 1, pp. 261ff.

² There is also the construction with ὅτι, cf. Matt 5:23; John 12:16; P.Brem. 53, 10; P.Stras. 334 b 10; P.Laur. 64, 19; SB 9440, 7.

³ Homer, Il. 5.263: “Do not forget to make a dash against the horses of Aeneas”; 6.222: “I do not remember Tydeus”; 17.364: “They did not forget to stay always in groups”; Xenophon, Cyr. 1.6.3: “I remember hearing you say”; 1.6.8: “I remember that you said that”; Thucydides 2.45.2: “If I must evoke feminine memories”; Ps.-Phocylides 109: “If you are rich, remember that you are mortal”; P.Oxy. 2779, 4: “He told me to remind you regarding the subject of sowing” (from 3 BC); 3022, 7: Emperor Trajan remembers the benefits granted by his father.

⁴ P.Hamb. 37, 4; 182, 7; SB 10653, 5: μνησθεῖς τω—ν ἀνανκω—ν; P.Bon. 42, 2: μνήσθητι τω—ν τρητω—ν (cf. H. C. Youtie, Scriptiunculae, vol. 1, p. 323); P.Hamb. 129, 29: σὺ δὲ μνήσθητι τοῦ πορφυρίου; P.Oxy. 2599, 33: “remember the oath when you come”; P.Princ. 169, 5; BGU 1578, 13: μνημισκομένην τω—ν ἀπ̄ ε—μοῦ εἰ—ς αὐτὴν πάντων; P.Apoll. 40, 1: “I remember having received from our master . . . the order to . . .”; P.Ryl. 81,21.

⁵ P.Mich. 656, 9: δεῖ— ε— δὶ αὐτοῦς στρατηγῶ— μνησθῆναι; P.Lille 8, 11: “You will do well to remind Theodoros that he orders him to return my animals”; 12, 1: “I verbally reminded (ε—μνήσθην σοι) you of the matter of the hundred arourai”; BGU 451, 14; P.Lond. 2056, 3 and 8: “Be so good as to inform Euthychos regarding the assistant Harendotes”; 2066, 1; SB 4303, 1; P.Cair.Isid. 73, 16; P.Oxy. 2416, 17: “does not mention this in the appended summary”; 3357, 12.

⁶ P.Mich. 497, 17; P.Oslo 47, 3 (AD 1); P.Warr. 14, 16; SB 9399, 16; P.Tebt. 410, 18; C.P.Herm. 5, 5: “It is normal—like you when you write to others—that you should remember us.” Polite monastic remark in the sixth century: “I beg you to remember my meager self” (P.Fouad 88, 5; 89, 5).

⁷ Homer, Od. 4.151: “I was remembering him” (ε—γὼ μεμνημένος); 4.331: “remember now these things for me”; Herodotus 1.36: “Croesus, remembering the dream that he had had”; Pindar, Isthm. 8.59: “the council of the Blessed Ones has not forgotten him”; Plato, Lach. 200 d: “each time that I evoke this subject . . .”; Xenophon, Cyr. 8.2.12: “They would not have dared mention anything disagreeable concerning Cyrus”; Philostratus, Gym. 1: “admirable athletes, worthy to be remembered” (θαυμασίους καὶ μεμνησθαι ἀξίους); P.Oxy.Hels. 48, 7: “not once did you mention me (in your correspondence).”

⁸ Commemorating a mother, a good wife (ISE, n. 479, 672, 869: ἀεὶ μνησθοι—ς); SB 9022, 7, 3: Εἰ—ς ἀεὶ μνηστὸν τὸ ὄνομα. Excellent inventory in A. Rehm, “MNHΣH,” in Philologus, 1941, pp. 1–30. Since then, J. and L. Robert have often noted inscriptions with ε—μνήσθη (“Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1953, p. 193, n. 232; 1955, p. 263, n. 201; 1958, p. 312, n. 438) or μνησθῆ (1953, p. 180, n. 205; p. 182, n. 206; 1958, p. 340, n. 55), etc.

⁹ Epigram of Celsus: “I dedicated this writing remembering my wife and my dear children” (E. Bernand, Philae, n. 166, 2 = SB 8423). The members of a thiasos “came to adore the Venerable Isis, remembering the members of their households” (μνησθέντες τῶ—ν οἰ—κείων, Philae, n. 157, 8 = SB 4094); Lucius Anianus Similis “mentioned (to the deity) Polla and Theodoros” (Philae, n. 272, 2).

¹⁰ A. and E. Bernand, Memnon, n. 69, 4 (= SB 8257); 78, 5.

¹¹ A. and E. Bernand, Memnon, n. 102, 4: “Act of adoration for my wife Apollonarian, after my visit and after remembering.” Cf. “May Severus . . . owner of the ship, remember Ioannes and Claudia” (A. Bernand, El-Kanaïs, n. 57, 1 = SB 4028). One must remember the feast of Isis at the Serapeum (P.Oxy. 525, 9).

¹² Homer, Od. 18.267, Ulysses to Penelope: “Take care of everything. Think (μνησθαι) of my father and mother; for them, remain always the same in our palace.”

¹³ P. A. H. de Boer, Gedenken und Gedächtnis in der Welt des Alten Testaments, Stuttgart, 1962; B. S. Childs, Memory and Tradition in Israel, London, 1962; W. Schottroff, “Gedenken” im Alten Orient und im Alten Testament: Die Wurzel “zakar” im semitischen Sprachkreis, Neukirchen-Vluyn, 1964; A. Solignac, “Mémoire,” in Dict.spir., vol. 10, col. 991–1002.

¹⁴ H. Gross, “Zur Wurzel zkr,” in BZ, 1960, pp. 227–237; M. Thurian, L’Eucharistie, mémorial du Seigneur, 2d ed., Neuchâtel-Paris, 1963, pp. 32ff.

¹⁵ When God remembers Noah, it is to stop the flood (Gen 8:1; 9:15-16); he remembers Abraham when he makes Lot escape catastrophe (Gen 19:29) and by bringing his people out of Egypt (Ps 105:42; cf. 98:3); he remembers Rachel to open her womb (Gen 30:22). Certainly God also remembers to punish the wicked (Hos 7:2; 8:13; 9:9; Jer 14:10; Ps 9:12; 74:22; 89:50; 87:7; Sir 49:9; 1Macc 7:38), as Ahasuerus remembered Vashti to punish her (Esth 2:1); but memory is often beneficent (1Sam 25:31; Judg 9:2; 2Macc 9:26); it is said of Pharaoh that he remembered (Hebrew nasa’) his chief cupbearer when he restored him to his post (Gen 40:13-14, 20), and anger is expressed that one who has been helped does not remember his benefactor (Gen 40:23; 2Chr 24:22).

¹⁶ Ps 115:12; cf. Samson: “Lord Yahweh, deign to remember me and make me strong” (Judg 16:28), Hannah (1Sam 1:11, 19), Hezekiah (2Kgs 20:3 = Isa 38:3).

¹⁷ Isa 62:6—“They oblige Yahweh to remember”; Lev 26:42; Deut 9:27; 2Chr 6:42; Neh 1:8; 5:19; 6:14, 31; 1Macc 4:10; 2Macc 1:2; Jer 14:21; Lam 3:19-20; 5:1; Ezek 16:60; Tob 3:3; Job 7:7; 10:9; Ps 119:49; 132:1.

¹⁸ Jer 15:15; cf. 2:2—“I remember the piety of your youth”; Isa 43:25—“I will no longer remember your sins”; Jer 31:34; 33:8; Bel 38: “You remembered me, O God, and you did not abandon those who love you.”

¹⁹ Tob 1:12; 2:2; Neh 4:8 (14): “Remember the Lord, great and mighty, and fight for your brothers”; Ps 42:6—“I remember you in the land of Jordan”; 77:3, 11; 119:55—“and I observed your law”; Jonah 2:8—“and I prayed”; Eccl 12:1—“Remember your Creator.”

²⁰ Isa 44:21—“Remember these things, Jacob. . . . I formed you, you shall not forget”; 46:8-9; Jdt 8:26—“Remember all that God has done” with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; the miracles and the liberation from Egypt (Judg 8:34; Neh 9:17; Ps 78:42; 106:7); “Remember the marvels that he has done, his prodigies” (Ps 105:5); “I will recall the works of the Lord” (Sir 42:15); “I remember your mercy, Lord, your work from eternity” (Sir 51:8); 1Macc 2:51; 4:9.

²¹ Sir 7:36; 14:12; 18:24; 28:6; 38:20; 41:3; Isa 47:7; cf. “the man who has gratitude remembers what will come after” (Sir 3:31; Lam 1:9).

²² “He hardly thinks about the days of his life, because God occupies him with the joy of his heart” (Eccl 5:19; 11:8; Prov 31:7); “he does not hold a grudge against his neighbor” (Sir 28:7); “he remembers that it is bad to be grudging” (Sir 31:13).

²³ Ps 42:4; 77:6; 143:5; Job 4:7—“Remember then; who is the innocent person who has perished”; Isa 65:17; Mic 6:5; 4Macc 15:28.

²⁴ “In the day of evil one no longer remembers the good” (Sir 11:25; 18:25; Isa 54:4).

²⁵ Alleg. Interp. 1.33, 90; 2.68; Sacr. Abel and Cain 11; Worse Attacks Better 99, 108; Unchang. God 119; Plant. 160: “Why did I mention this? To show . . .”; Drunkenness 210; Migr. Abr. 221; Heir 286; etc. Josephus, War 4.180; 5.336; Ant. 1.26, 93–94, 118, 133, 159; 2.177; 4.159; 7.101, 369; 8.144, 260, 324; 10.219; 12.113; Ag. Apion 1.144, 168, 172, etc.

²⁶ Alleg. Interp. 2.42; Cherub. 76; Husbandry 136; Decalogue 6; Prelim. Stud. 40: “The soul of the one who remembers (τοῦ μεμνημένου) brings all that it has learned to fruition”; Dreams 2.29, 114: “I remember having heard”; 2.232; Moses 1.173; Spec. Laws 2.216: know by heart; 4.215; To Gaius 19, 30. Josephus, War 1.634; 4.34; Ant. 4.120, 194; 8.209; 14.255; Ag. Apion 1.243: recall a prediction.

²⁷ Philo, Joseph 265: “Should we not think only the father who is created?”; Moses 1.89; Flacc. 5; Josephus, War 6.107: “Remember that I address these exhortations to you as your fellow-countryman.”

²⁸ Philo, Moses 1.28; Flacc. 133; To Gaius 44. A much commoner meaning in Josephus: “Taking into account Josephus’s instructions, these men stopped their ears against the cries” (War 3.266; 4.69; 7.18; Ant. 7.386); taking account of benefits received (Ant. 1.194; 2.56; 14.358; 18.358; Life 353), keeping in mind (Ant. 5.95; 6.251; 12.280). To remember the laws is to observe them (5.333; 6.234); to remember an oath is to be faithful to it (6.241; 7.111). Cf. the legal meaning: “It would be ridiculous for me to refer to my own decree” (Ant. 19.306).

²⁹ Decalogue 62; cf. Unchang. God 73: “God remembers from his perfect goodness” and saves the human race from destruction; cf. Ep. Arist. 155: to remember the great marvels worked by the Lord (τὰ μεγάλα καὶ θαυμαστά); 168: Scripture reminds us of God’s sovereign domain (μεμνημένοι τοῦ δυναστεύοντος θεοῦ).

³⁰ Nevertheless ἀνάμνησις, the “remembering” of the Eucharist (Luke 22:19; 1Cor 11:24-25) takes on exceptional importance. Just as the Israelite celebration of the Passover “recalled” the deliverance from Egypt (Exod 12:14), the Eucharist “commemorates” salvation by the cross; but in reality it actualizes all the effects of Calvary and does not merely evoke a memory (cf. Heb 10:3); hence the substitution of the word anamnesis.

³¹ Cf. H. Cazelles, “Note sur le Psaume 8,” in Parole de Dieu et sacerdoce, Paris, 1962, pp. 79–91; M. Adinolfi, “De mariologicis Lyrani Postillis,” in Anton, 1959, pp.321–326; J. Coppens, “La Nouvelle Alliance en Jér. XXXI, 34,” in CBQ, 1963, pp.12–21; R. Martin-Achard, “La Nouvelle Alliance selon Jérémie,” in RTP, 1962, pp. 81–92; W.H. Schmidt, “Gott und Mensch in Ps. 8,” in TZ, 1969, pp. 1–15; O. Linton, “Le Parellelismus membrorum dans le Nouveau Testament,” in Mélanges Rigaux, pp. 489–507; C. F. D. Moule, “Neglected Features in the Problem of ‘the Son of Man,’” in Neues Testament und Kirche, für R. Schnackenburg, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna, 1974, pp. 413–428.

³² Cf. B. Kipper, De Restitutione Populi Israel apud Prophetam Jeremiam, São Leopoldo, 1957.

³³ 1Cor 11:2 (cf. L. Cerfaux, “La Tradition selon saint Paul,” in Recueil L. Cerfaux, vol. 2, pp. 253–263); Herodotus 9.45; Chariton, Chaer. 6.5.1. These traditions of “received religion” are first of all the word of God, the gospel, the message of Christ transmitted by the apostles commissioned by the Lord, but also the organization of the communities, the principles of liturgy and rules of conduct (for example, that regarding women in worship meetings). St. Paul had the mission and the authority to put them into effect and to determine their concrete formulation so as to assure the uniformity of the Christian life in all the churches.

³⁴ Luke 16:25—Abraham said to the wicked rich man, “Remember that you had good things during your lifetime and Lazarus ill. . . .”

³⁵ Luke 23:42, the repentant thief: “Jesus, remember me when you come into your kingdom”; cf. Gen 40:14.

³⁶ Heb 13:3—“Remember prisoners, as if you were imprisoned with them”; we feel and share in their misfortune when we remember them as if their misfortune were ours; through compassion we become “coprisoners.” — The sense “memorialize” is attested in Acts 10:31, where the angel tells Cornelius, “Your alms have been remembered before God.” He has been informed concerning them. Rev 16:19—“Babylon the great was remembered before God to give her the cup of wine of God’s wrath.”

³⁷ Menander, Dysk. 67: “I leave to my friend a memory of the manner in which I treat these sorts of matters.”

³⁸ Plato, Menex. 244 a: μνείαν ἔχειν = keep the memory of war deaths; Sophocles, El. 392. The LXX transcribes the Hebrew superlative, μνεία μνησθήτη = a profound memory (Deut 7:18; Jer 31:20). To keep the memory is the opposite of “forget” (Ezek 21:37; 25:10; Wis 5:14).

³⁹ Plato, Prt. 317 e: “Now is the time to remind me of what you were saying just now regarding this young man”; Plato, Phdr. 254 a: “to propose the joys of love”; Ps 111:4—“He has caused his marvels to be remembered”; Isa 32:10; 23:16; 26:8; Zech 13:2; Job 17:13; Ep. Arist. 158, 161; I. Priene 50, 10: the inhabitants of Erythrae decide to reward a judge from Priene “so that they may see that the people remember good men” (μνείαν ποιούμενος τω—ν καλω—ν καὶ ἀγαθω—ν ἀνδρω—ν); I. Magn. 90, 16.

⁴⁰ E. Bernand, Philae, n. 43, 3 (= SB 8673); 46, 4; 130, 3 (28 BC, = SB 8672); 132, 4 (= SB 8655); 151, 4 (AD 4, = SB 4086).

⁴¹ BGU 632, 5 (second century AD), cf. A. Deissmann, Light, p. 184.

⁴² P.Lond. 42, 6; vol. 1, p. 30 (from 172 BC) = UPZ 59, 6; Dittenberger, Syl. 685, 79; Or. 257, 3–4.

⁴³ 1Thess 1:2; cf. Rom 1:9—“Without ceasing I make mention of you, constantly asking in my prayers . . .”; Phil 1:3; Eph 1:16; Phlm 4.

⁴⁴ Aristotle composed a treatise Περὶ μνήμης καὶ ἀναμνήσεως in which he insists on the application of memory to the past alone and notes that “studies conserve the memory by leading to recollection” (Mem. 451a). P.Ryl. 233, 12: one keeps the memory of the price of what one has bought; P.Oxy. 237, col. VI, 30; very often in epitaphs: μνήμης χάριν (T. Drew-Bear, Phrygie, pp. 80, 92, 93, 101, 102, 108; IGUR, n. 614, 690, 992; IGLS 45, 89, 155, 161, 712, 736, 2851, etc.). Theognis 798: “No one retains the memory of worthless people”; Herodotus 4.144: because of a remark that he made, “Megabazus left an imperishable memory”; Thucydides 2.54.3; Diodorus Siculus 5.73.1: Jupiter sees to it that “the memory of his children shall endure forever among humans”; Sophocles, OT 1131, the servant responds to Oedipus’s question, “Did you meet him?”—“Not so that my memory (μνήμη) should respond so quickly”; Plato, Tim. 26 b: “I do not know if I could retrieve the memory (ε—ν μνήμη λαβει—ν) of all that I heard yesterday”; Leg. 6.783 c: “Let us keep in mind what we have just heard”; cf. Euthd. 275 d: “In beginning my account I need to invoke the Muses and Memory”; Philo, Plant. 129; on the goddess Mneme, cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 985, 11; Pausanias 1.17.1; on the μνήμη θεοῦ, cf. Philo, Migr. Abr. 56; Spec. Laws 2.171; Virtues 165; Contemp. Life 26; Epictetus 2.18; Marcus Aurelius 6.7; 10.6–8 (H. J. Sieben, “Mnèmè Theou,” in Dict.spir., vol. 10, 1407–1414).

⁴⁵ Eccl 9:15; but the mneme of the righteous will be a benediction (Prov 10:7; cf. 2Macc 7:20); “May the memory of the young who volunteered for their country endure forever” (μνήμη διαμένη; at Thespieae, under Marcus Aurelius; cf. NCIG, n. XV, 23), whence the meaning “memorial” (Plato, Leg. 5.741 c: “They will deposit records in the temple as a memorial for the future”) and “commemoration,” cf. Aristotle, Rh. 1.5.1361a34: “The parts of honor are sacrifices, commemorations (mnemai) in verse or in prose . . .”; SB 8421, 4: ει—ς μνάμαν; cf. Philo, Decalogue 62. In the Byzantine period, Mnemosyneme is qualified hyperbolically: τῆς λογίας μνήμης (PSI 786, 6), τῆς περιβλέπτου μ. (P.Oxy. 2478, 9; 2780, 10; SB 11079, 10), τῆς ἀρίστης μ. (P.Warr. 3, 6; Stud.Pal. XX, 135, 4; P.Oxy. 2995, 1; BGU 2146; 2155, etc.), τῆς ὑπερφυοῦς μ. (Stud.Pal. XX, 216, 5), τῆς λαμπρα—ς μ. (P.Mich. 611, 3; BGU 2185, P.Erl. 67, 6; P.Stras. 319, 2; P.Warr. 3, 3; PSI 963, 12), τῆς ε—νδόξου μ. (P.Erl. 87, 8; P.Oxy. 3204, 4), τῆς μεγαλοπρεποῦς μ. (P.Hamb. 68, 21; PSI 1367, 7; P.Laur. 26, 24; SB 8949, 7); τῆς εὐλαβοῦς

μ. (P.Princ. 82, 6; P.Mich. 612, 3; 659, 88, 154, 327; Stud.Pal. XX, 243, 7), τῆς μακαρίας μ. (P.Erl. 67, 28; 73, 12; P.Oxy. 1320; BGU 2149, 2202; P.Wash.Univ. 17, 5–6).

⁴⁶ Ep. Arist. 159 (cf. 153, 279); Sophocles, OT 1246; OC 509; El. 346; BGU 2351, 5: ε—ν μνήμη ἔχω.

⁴⁷ Herodotus 1.15: “I will mention Andys, son of Gyges”; Polybius 2.7.12; 2.71.1; Aristotle, Rh. 3.12.4.1414a; <I+>P.Fay. 19, 10: τω—ν πραγμάτων μνήμην ποιει—σθαι; P.Lond. 1929, 10: “I will do justice to you in the belief that you mention us in every place” (ποιει—ς ἡμω—ν μνήμην); P.Oxy. 3150, 32. Cf. G. Petzl, “MNHMHΣ (MNEIAS) mit Dativ und Genetiv,” in ZPE, vol. 41, 1981, p. 106.

⁴⁸ Abraham 11; Dreams 2.209–210; Moses 1.48; 2.263; Spec. Laws 4.82; etc.

⁴⁹ Alleg. Interp. 1.55; Worse Attacks Better 65; Post. Cain 62; Plant. 31; Sobr. 5, 28–29; Heir 170; Spec. Laws 3.21; 4.142, 161.

⁵⁰ Post. Cain 148–153; Flight 200; Change of Names 101, 212, 270; Spec. Laws 4.107; Unchang. God 43; Drunkenness 137; Migr. Abr. 154, 205; To Gaius 310.

⁵¹ Cf. the letter of Jonathan to the Spartans: “At all times we do not cease to remember you (μιμνησκομεθα) . . . as it is right and fitting to remember brothers (μνημονεύειν ἀδελφω—ν)” (1Macc 12:11). Compare “make mention” in an unfavorable sense, Rev 16:19; 18:5; Plutarch, Them. 32.1: “Plato mentions Cleophanthus as an excellent horseman”; P.Bour. 20, 31: “because you mentioned a trustee. . . .”

⁵² Herodotus 1.36: “Croesus, remembering the dream that he had had”; Aeschylus, Pers. 783: “My son does not remember my words”; Plato, Resp. 5.480 a (with ὅτι): “Do you not remember that we said these last days . . .”; Sophocles, Phil. 121: “Do you recall my counsels well?”; Aristophanes, Eccl. 264; Plutarch, Oth. 1.1: “the new emperor invited Marius Celsus not to remember his liberation” (τῆς ἀφέσεως μνημονεύειν).

⁵³ Παρακαλω— ὅπως μνημονεύσης μου ε—ν τε—ς ἀγίαις εὐχε—ς σου, P.Lond. 1923, 12 (letter from the fourth century). Moulton-Milligan cited P.Heid. 6, 15, from the same period: παρακαλω— [ο]ὔν, δέσποτα, μνημον[ε]ύης μοι ει—ς τὰς ἀγίας σου εὐχάς; PSI 651, 2: καλω—ς ἂν ποιοι—ς (cf. Mayser, Grammatik, p. 326) μνημονεύων ἡμω—ν (third century BC); P.Stras. 41, 40: “I do not remember having taken part in the negotiations”; Dittenberger, Syl. 284, 8: μνημονεύων (ὁ δῆμος) ἀεὶ τω—ν εὐεργετω—ν καὶ ζώντων καὶ τετελυτηκότων (fourth century BC); 620, 25.

⁵⁴ Μνημόνευσον τὸν ὄρκον σου περὶ τῆς ἀγίας ε—κκλησίας, PSI 973, 5; P.Princ. 102, 16; SB 6262, 17: μνημόνευσον δὲ ε—ρχόμενος ὧν ἔγραψά σοι πολλάκις; 8303, 23; 8393, 3; 9608, 7; 9763, 12, 20; P.Ant. 44, 15–16; P.Bon. 22 a 1, 9: μνημονευθέντων κακούργων; C.Ord.Ptol. 42, 26, “what none of our ancestors has done in human memory.”

⁵⁵ Exod 13:3; 2Kgs 9:25 (ὅτι); 1Chr 16:12, 15; Ps 6:5; 43:18; 2Macc 10:6.

⁵⁶ The woman of Tekoa says to the king “that the king should deign to remember Yahweh, your God” (2Sam 14:11; Tob 4:5); remembering God’s might (Jdt 13:19) and his judgments (Sus 9 [Theodotion], hence the future), recommendations for putting them into practice (Tob 4:19); one thinks of one’s friends (Sir 37:6; Ps 63:6), which brings up the affective aspect of memory; Antiochus writes to the Jews: “I remember you affectionately” (ὕμω—ν δὲ ε—μνημόνευον φιλοστόργως, 2Macc 9:21).

⁵⁷ Philo, Virtues 176: τω—ν ἀξίων μνημονεύεσθαι. Cf. Wis 2:4—“No one will remember our actions” (οὐθεὶς μνημονεύσει); Sophocles, Aj. 1273: “Did you not remember the day when you were blocked up in your enclosure?”; Xenophon, An. 4.3.2: “The numerous trials that they had just endured passed through their minds” (μνημονεύοντες). Regarding Mnemosyne, the mother of the Muses: “All that we wish to preserve in our memory (μνημονεῦσαι) of what we have seen, heard, or thought of for ourselves” is imprinted in this wax (Plato, Tht. 191 d).

⁵⁸ Matt 16:9 = Mark 8:18; Luke 17:32—“Keep in mind Lot’s wife” (E. Delebecque’s French: “Conservez en mémoire la femme de Lot”); John 15:20; 16:4, 21: a woman who has brought a child into the world does not retain the memory of her pains.

⁵⁹ Rev 2:5; 3:3. Cf. S. E. Johnson, “Christianity in Sardis,” in A. Wikgren, Early Christian Origins: Studies in Honor of H. R. Willoughby, Chicago, 1961, pp. 81–90.

⁶⁰ Cf. P. Trummer, Die Paulustradition der Pastoralbriefe, Graz, 1976, pp. 234ff.

⁶¹ Heb 11:22—ε—μνημόνευσεν περί. We could also translate “remembered” with reference to Gen 15:13–16. But Joseph’s brothers had to promise to return his body to the Holy Land, hence “he called to mind” this prophecy. This repatriation is explained by Philo, Dreams 2.102–110

(J. Laporte, De Josepho, Paris, 1964, pp. 22–23). Contrary to Israelite customs, Joseph’s body was embalmed and placed in a coffin (Gen 50:26; cf. J. Vergote, Joseph en Egypte, Louvain, 1959, pp. 197ff.).

⁶² Heb 13:7. Etymologically, hegoumenos means “leader, guide” (cf. C. Spicq, Hébreux, vol. 2, on this text), but in usage it refers to a head or chief, for example the Roman authorities (SEG XVIII, 143, 5; in AD 43), the princeps (ZPE, vol. 17, 1975, p. 144, n. 14), the governor of the Thebaid (P.Panop.Beatty 1, 78, 126, 143, 385), the heads of a village (P.Bon. 20, 21; P.Yale 62, 1), the president of the council of elders governing the Jewish community at Alexandria (Ep. Arist. 309–310), the head of a school (P.Petaus, p. 166; Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Amm. 1 7); cf. I.Car., n. VI, 9; p. 107, n.1.

⁶³ There is also the meaning “mark.” Hippocrates, Prorrh. 2.20: a rough and thick scar “leaves an ineffaceable mark” (μνημόσυνον ὑποκαταλιπει—ν); Ps.-Aristotle, Mir. Ausc. 838a32: the traces of Hercules’ journey through Italy; Aristophanes, Vesp. 538, 559 and Plutarch, An ignis 2.957 b: notes taken as a reminder; Mir. Ausc. 943b12 and Plutarch, De vit. aere al. 2.831 d: proof, memento of love. The term is unknown in the papyri.

⁶⁴ Herodotus 2.101; cf. 4.88: dedication of a painting sacred to Hera—a mnemosynon of the bridge of boats at the Bosphorus; 4.166: “Darius wanted to leave as a monument of his reign something that no other king had accomplished.” At Amphipolis, there is a monument of the reign of Brasidas (Thucydides 5.11.1); a “memorial monument” (Dio Cassius 54.23.6); IGLS 1425: Ruphinus (?) raised this memorial.”

⁶⁵ Exod 3:15; Deut 32:26; Hos 12:6. If the memory of Yahweh endures from generation to generation (Ps 102:12; 135:13), that of the wicked disappears (Job 18:17; Ps 9:6; 34:16; 109:15; Sir 10:17; 44:9), while that of the righteous will be eternally remembered (Ps 112:6; Sir 39:9; 45:1; 46:11; 49:1, 13; Esth 9:27-28; 1Macc 3:7). The memory of Wisdom is sweeter than honey (Sir 24:20; cf. Hos 14:8), but that of death is bitter (Sir 41:1). It is noted that by his death Eleazar left a μνημόσυνον ἀρετῆς (2Macc 6:31), ordinarily translated “a memorial of virtue” but better “a mark, a proof,” like the “trace” left in the world (Wis 10:8; cf. Neh 2:20) and the faithful remnant of Israel (Bar 4:5). S. Daniel, Recherches sur le vocabulaire du culte dans la Septante, Paris, 1966, p. 231; cf. 160, 226ff., 236.

⁶⁶ Num 5:15, 18; cf. 16:40 [17:5]—the coverings of the altar are a “memorial for the sons of Israel.” One writes in a book for a memorial (Exod 17:14; Mal 3:16). A treaty engraved on bronze tablets is “a document of peace and alliance” (1Macc 8:22; cf. 14:23).

⁶⁷ H. Wenschkewitz, Die Spiritualisierung der Kultusbegriffe Tempel, Priester und Opfer im N.T., Leipzig, 1932.

⁶⁸ Matt 26:13 = Mark 14:9. Cf. J. Jeremias, Abba, pp. 115–120.

⁶⁹ The exceptional diffusion of the memory of the event could be compared to the “trumpet blasts” of the great Sabbath (Lev 23:24).

⁷⁰ Acts 10:4 (cf. Tob 12:12); W. C. van Unnik, Sparsa Collecta, vol. 1, Leiden, 1973, pp. 213–252. We note that ‘azkarah in Lev 24:7 was translated anamnesis; cf. Heb 10:3.

μισθός, μισθόομαι

misthos, reward, compensation, wage, punishment; misthoomai, to hire or lease see also ὀψώνιον; δοῦλος, οἰ—κέτης, οἰ—κει—ος, μίσθιος, μισθώτος, μίσθωμα; ὑπηρέτης

misthos, S 3407; TDNT 4.695–728; EDNT 2.432–433; NIDNTT 3.138–139, 141–145; MM 413; L&N 38.14, 57.173; BAGD 523 | misthoomai, S 3409; TDNT 4.695–728; EDNT 2.432; NIDNTT 3.138–139; MM 413–414; L&N 57.172; BAGD 523

It is not right that *misthos*¹ is usually translated “wage” in most NT texts,² even though the meaning “reward, counter-gift” is basic. Hector says to the Trojans, “Who among you will undertake to accomplish the deed (ergon) of which I speak, for a great reward (doro epi megalō)? The price of his trouble will be assured him (misthos de hoi arkios estai);”³ “We have come on Zeus’s command to hire our services out by the year to the noble Laomedon for an agreed wage” (mistho epi rheto).⁴ The price is freely agreed to, pursuant to an understanding between the two parties;⁵ it is justly payable, because it corresponds to the value of that which is supplied.⁶ The misthos is remuneration for work.⁷ Plato gave the definition: “Those who sell the use of their strength, calling misthos the price of their trouble, are described as misthotoi” (Resp. 2.371 e).

Wages are mentioned constantly in papyri that record contracts (P.Tebt. 815, from the third century BC, misthoi rise from three or four obols to one drachma four obols). In AD 99, a twenty-six-year-old woman, Tenetkoueis, is hired by an olive presser; she will receive a wage at the same rate as the workers from the village of Euhemeria (P.Fay. 91, 23). In 48, Menodoros takes on Fuscus as an apprentice flax-weaver: “I will pay you (Fuscus’s father) a monthly wage of four drachmas. . . . He will have three days off each month, for which I will not dock his salary. . . . If I breach this contract at any point, I will immediately pay you damages and expenses, the wages due from me.”⁸ In contracts for wet-nurses,⁹ certain bonuses are added to the wage: Helen undertakes “to nurse Corinthia at home with her own milk for two years ... receiving for her expenses and nursing a monthly wage of ten drachmas plus two kotylai of oil, one keramion of wine . . .”¹⁰ Misthos is used for the wages of agricultural workers (P.Apoll. 48, 2, 5, georgoi misthioi) as well as for the pay of sailors¹¹ or stonecutters (P.Mich. 37, 2, 15), grooms (P.Oxy. 1862, 27; 1863, 8), brickmakers (P.Mert. 44, 2), harvesters (P.Mert. 91, 12), camel-drivers (P.Oxy. 1911, 156), shepherds (P.Princ. 152, 8), a barber (P.Magd. 15, 3, verso), a building contractor (P.Köln 104, 9: oikodomou; P.Oxy. 2875), a gilder (P.Köln 52, 16, 18, 64, 66, 71), a domestic.¹² It is often noted that wages are paid daily.¹³

A ruler or general pays his troops in many different ways (opsonion, metrema, doma, etc.), and first of all in rations (trophe, food allowance) and misthos, wages in kind¹⁴ 227–228.

(“Eumenes promised his men that he would pay them in three days”);¹⁵ but this usage is completely exceptional in the papyri (P.Ross.Georg. V, 61 A, 11).

Misthos can have wider meanings, both literal and figurative. Panouptaeiom specifies to his wife that the man who has come to her should receive a reward of forty drachmas (misthou tou erchomainou epise, P.Ant. 43, 22). Pindar evoked the “sweet reward” (misthos glykys) that every man draws from his labors (Isthm. 1.41), and Aristophanes refers to a drink as “a bowl of wages to gulp down” (Eq. 905). In addition, misthos — which always refers to a compensation—often takes on the nuance of an emolument, an honorarium, reward, notably in the realm of arts and letters: “You wish to give Protagoras money to pay him for his lessons” (Plato, Prt. 311 b); a sophist gives himself out “as a master in education and in virtue, daring to claim at the outset a wage in exchange for his lessons.”¹⁶ King Attalus II of Pergamum makes a foundation at Delphi in 169–159 “so that the regular wages of teachers may be guaranteed.”¹⁷ Honoraria for physicians are justified: “Physicians receive their honoraria for having healed their patients” (arnyntai ton misthon tous kamnontas hygiasantas).¹⁸ For the construction of the temple of Asclepius at Epidaurus, “Theodotus, the architect, receives an annual salary of 352 drachmas” (C. Michel, Recueil, n. 584, 9). There are emoluments for poets (Aristophanes, Ran. 367), actors (P.Oxy. 1025, 19), dancers, and flute-players.¹⁹

There are “allowances” for officials and magistrates,²⁰ who for all that are not wage earners, but they are granted a misthos —which can be an honor²¹—because those who fulfill an arche in the city serve the interests of the citizens (Plato, Resp. 1.345 e –347 d); this reward is like an honor and privilege (Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 5.1134b6ff.). Also, misthos often means “costs, expenses, disbursements,” as for funeral expenses (misthos tois erkasi auton, P.Fay. 103, 3), expenditures for clothing (IG XI, 2; 110, 17); “We will pay your travel expenses.”²² Hence the meaning “present, bribe,”²³ so often pejorative: Balaam was bought “for money (epi mistho) by the enemies” (Philo, Migr. Abr. 114); Lampon, the corrupt bailiff, “got his accursed wage (ton eparaton misthon), or better, his bribe (to misthoma).”²⁴ Euripides reports an accusation of venality against soothsayers: “Teiresias, you want to be paid well (misthos pherein) for observations of winged omens as well as sacrificial victims” (Bacch. 257). Misthos refers to honoraria that priests received for their cultic activities (Dittenberger, Syl. 42, 91 and 130). An ordinance of Ptolemy II and Cleopatra II protects temple revenues, notably earnings on workshops and wages (P.Tebt. 6, 25 = C.Ord.Ptol. 47). Eating consecrated bread is a privilege granted to priests “as a reward (misthon) for the services that they provide.”²⁵

In classical and Hellenistic Greek, misthos sometimes has the figurative sense of “retribution, punishment,”²⁶ sometimes “recompense.” Isocrates: “For a sophist, the noblest and greatest recompense (misthos) is that some of his disciples should turn out to be men of courage and intelligence, esteemed by their fellow citizens” (Antid. 15.220); Pindar: “Glory in sincere praise is the recompense that befits good men” (Nem. 7.63); “I will go to seek at Salamis the gratitude of the Athenians as recompense” (Pyth. 1.77; cf. Euripides, IT 593); Ps.-Plutarch: “Agamedes and Trophonius, after building the temple at Delphi, asked Apollo for their reward.”²⁷ Christianity would retain this meaning, using misthos to describe the recompense that God gives his elect.²⁸

In the semantic evolution of misthos (Hebrew sakar), the language of the LXX accentuates first of all the “worker’s wage” by accentuating its moral character as “justly due.” It contrasts it with “free service,”²⁹ it is a compensation for labor (Tob 2:14; 5:3; 12:1; Eccl 4:9; Wis 10:17; cf. Philo, Moses 1.141–142), the price of works produced (2Chr 15:7; Jer 31:16) and of services rendered (Deut 15:18). Its sum is freely agreed.³⁰ Not only is it a very serious thing not to pay the worker his wage (Jer 22:13; Mal 3:5; Sir 34:22—misthon misthiou), but it is insisted that it must not be deferred,³¹ because the hireling counts on it (Job 7:2; cf. Philo, Husbandry 5; Plant. 36), even if he wastes it (Hag 1:6), because it is thanks to his misthos that he can feed himself and rest (Sir 11:18). Otherwise, and above all, the LXX uses misthos in the sense of reward, usually divine, beginning with the text where Yahweh declares to Abram, “Fear not, I will be your shield; your reward will be very great.”³² Boaz says to Ruth, “May God return what you have done to you, and may your reward be perfect from Yahweh” (Ruth 2:12). As much as the godless cannot expect any remuneration (Wis 2:22), so much “the one who sows righteousness has an assured reward” (Prov 11:18); “the righteous live forever; their reward is with the Lord” (Wis 5:15); “You who fear the Lord, have confidence in him; your reward will not be lost” (Sir 2:8); “The Lord’s blessing is the recompense of the godly person” (Sir 11:22; cf. Isa 40:10; 62:11); “The Lord gave me my tongue as my reward; with it will I praise him.”³³

In the four Gospels, the word misthos is found exclusively in the sayings of Christ, notably in the Sermon on the Mount, where it retains its OT meaning of “compensation, recompense,”³⁴ but at the same time enriches and focuses it in terms of the interiority and spirituality of the new ethics. If the principle of reward—a major aspect of a religious ethic—remains fundamental (God repays each one according to his or her works), it is applied in an original manner under the new covenant, which is contrasted with the old covenant, especially in St. Matthew. The first text is the beatitude: “When they insult you and persecute you and speak all manner of evil against you falsely on my account, rejoice and be very glad, because your reward will be great in heaven” (hoti ho misthos hymon polys en tois ouranois).³⁵ This formulation recalls Gen 15:1—the clear sense is that the persecuted will receive ample compensation for their suffering—but its grandeur suggests that it is not a case of just remuneration. In addition, the recompense is not for the suffering, but for the virtues of endurance, even gladness, that were displayed, and these are the fruit of the Holy Spirit.

Finally, and especially, it has to do with disciples of Jesus who are persecuted “because of him” (heneken emou) and who will receive their reward from God “in heaven,” which can only be eternal beatitude. So this is not a just wage but a free and lavish gift, even though it is granted because of evils borne. In the same sense: “If you love those who love you, what reward will you get for that (tina misthon echete)? Do not the publicans do the same?”³⁶ The question, addressed to the disciples, as opposed to sinners (publicans), teaches that benevolent deeds inspired by mere natural goodness by virtue of purely human sympathy or friendship, do not deserve any particular “reward”; the Most High is not grateful for them. The disciples must show respect and benevolence toward their neighbor (friend or enemy) by the love of God. Then God will take notice of what is done for him and will grant what is more than a wage: his favor.

More straightforward still is the exhortation not to practice one’s “righteousness” in order “to be seen by men (pros to theathenai), lest you have no reward with your Father who is in heaven (misthon ouk echete para to patri hymon).”³⁷ When a person practices Jewish acts of righteousness—alms, prayer, fasting³⁸—in order to “be seen” so as to be praised, these honors given by humans are the only compensation that one will be able to receive; there will be none other. One must therefore live righteously, religiously, that is to say, for God and before God, in order to please him, in God's sight alone, who will then give a reward according to his own measure (which means a magnificent reward) for that which was done for him; hundredfold is more than a wage.

Almost all the other uses of misthos by Jesus have in view the apostles as missionaries, and first of all the hospitality given them: "The one who receives a prophet as a prophet³⁹ will receive a prophet's reward (misthon prophetou lepsetai), and the one who receives a righteous person as a righteous person will receive a righteous person's reward."⁴⁰ For a disciple of Jesus, God is the only "rewarder" who is worth anything, even with regard to insignificant gestures: "Whoever gives a glass of cold water to one of these little ones (thirsty representatives of the gospel) because he is my disciple, I tell you truly, will not lose his reward."⁴¹ This "little one" (Hebrew qaton; cf. Sipre Deut. 345) is the Lord's property (cf. Mark 9:41—hoti Christou este, "because you are Christ's"). His human worth matters little; the kindness shown him has a sure reward, which here must be the living water that wells up to eternal life (John 4:14). Remarkable bonus or recompense! The apostles might have had scruples about being a burden to hearers who received them, but Jesus reassures them: "Remain in that house, eating and drinking whatever they have, for the worker is worthy of his hire" (axios gar ho ergates tou misthou autou).⁴² Here the wage is room and board (cf. Matt 10:10—axios gar ho ergates tes trophes autou). What one receives in a receptive home is not alms; it is the due of those sent by God.⁴³ The Lord applies the requirement of Israelite law to his disciples and consequently understands misthos in its meaning of a just remuneration for work done or service rendered.

This is especially so in the parable of the Workers in the Vineyard,⁴⁴ where the owner makes a series of hirings (misthosasthai ergatas, Matt 20:1, 7) at the first hour of the day, at nine o'clock, at noon, at three o'clock, and even at five o'clock. He agrees on a wage (symphonesas, 20:2) and promises to give what is just (ho ean e dikaion doso hymin, 20:4). That same evening, conformably to Deut 24:15, he orders his steward to distribute the wages ("give them their wage," apodos autois ton misthon, 20:8), that is, the freely agreed and equitable reward for the labor provided. We are familiar with the indignation of the workers hired at daybreak at receiving the same wage as those who had worked only one hour (20:17). Was this a breach of justice? No. The master emphasizes to the complainant, "I have done you no wrong; you had an agreement with me; take what is due you" (20:13-14). But, as master and lord, he is autonomous and free if it pleases him to grant more to someone else "because I am good" (20:15). This is the essence of the parable: if the righteous are justly remunerated by God, God can without offending against anyone give freely to sinners. That is to say that entrance into the kingdom is not a wage or a reward but a gift. This parable makes clear and explicit the fundamental teaching of the Gospels: God is the only payer of a misthos that is worth anything in the spiritual order, and that says something about the role that his justice and agape play; the theology of “merit” must take this into account.⁴⁵

With St. Paul, misthos almost always means “wage.”⁴⁶ Paul and Apollos had worked together, but in different ways, for the “edification” of the church at Corinth: “The one who plants and the one who waters are one; but each will receive his own wage according to his own work.”⁴⁷ It is clear that there is a reward and that it is proportional to the work (idion twice repeated: his own wage, his own work) and individual (for each one, hekastos); moreover, there are different degrees of misthos, because there are good (1Cor 3:14) and mediocre (3:15) workers; consequently, the wage is not eternal life, but a particular gift. Finally, gospel workers are like hired servants whose kopos (labor) God values and consequently rewards: he pays them for what they have done.⁴⁸ Still regarding his ministry, the apostle writes “If I work willingly (according to my own initiative, ei hekon touto prasso), I have a wage (misthon echo); but if I am compelled (akon), it is a stewardship (a responsibility, oikonomian) that is entrusted to me. What then is my wage (tis oun mou estin ho misthos)? —That in evangelizing, I may set forth the gospel free of charge.”⁴⁹ This text is difficult, but we recall that a slave who does only his duty does not expect a reward from his master (cf. Luke 17:10). If the apostle wants to obtain a reward from God, it will not be for his stewardship of the preaching of the gospel; he must do something more: preach free of charge, without counting on receiving any material advantage in return. It is the disinterestedness that will be rewarded. This initial gratuity suggests the gratuity of the divine compensation.

2John 8 preserves the metaphorical meaning of spiritual reward. By following the heretical teachers, Christians would lose the fruit of their apostles’ labor: “Take care that you do not lose what we have gained but receive a complete (or perfect) wage,”⁵⁰ that is, heavenly beatitude, the recompense for orthodoxy and fidelity, resulting from the “what we have done” (ha ergasametha) of the preachers. The supreme rewards will be given at the end of the world (Rev 11:18, dounai ton misthon), but will have to do especially with reward, since punishment and recompense (admission to the heavenly Jerusalem) will be distributed by the sovereign Judge (cf. Isa 40:1; 52:11) according to the disposition of each: “Behold, I come quickly, and my recompense is with me (ho misthos mou met emou) to render to each as his work is (hos to ergon estin autou)” (Rev 22:12). For the faithful, Christ draws upon his goods to pour out his generosity upon them: “Bringing my reward with me’ almost means ‘I am your reward.’”⁵¹

Misthoo. — Its only NT occurrence is the aorist middle infinitive⁵² at Matt 20:1, 7 (misthosasthai ergatas), a form used constantly in the papyri

and meaning “hire for oneself,” the object being sometimes a thing, a house, a field, sometimes a person. It will suffice to cite some examples, first for the hiring of workers (P.Lips. 111, 11, misthosai ergatas) or the leasing of two slaves for a year,⁵³ but more often it has to do with the leasing of land,⁵⁴ whether a field (for example, for one year, with the rent being half of the harvest)⁵⁵ or a farm,⁵⁶ or fruit groves (P.Stras. 321, 3; AD 93–94), a palm and olive grove (“I propose to you that I lease [misthosasthai] the olive and date harvest for the past year 13 and coming to maturity this year 14 from the palm and olive grove that belongs to the town of Philadelphia”),⁵⁷ but also a lease of a flock (P.Alex. 12, 5; C.P.Herm. 27, 11), of a dwelling,⁵⁸ a room (BGU 2204, 9, 28) or several rooms (P.Yale 71; P.Stras. 338, 7), a butcher shop (P.Alex. 32, 6; P.Oxy. 1890), a windmill (P.Mil.Vogl. 53, 7), a cellar (P.Oxy. 3203, 9), a grange (BGU 606, 16), baths (P.Mich. 312, AD 34), a weaving shop (P.Oxy. 1035, 1), a perfumery and ointment factory (P.Fay. 93, 6), even fishing rights (P.Oxy. 3270, 8), or the farming out for a year of the phoretra (transport expenses) revenues.⁵⁹

¹ Μίσθωσις and μισθωτής are not used in the NT.

² E. Will (“Notes sur ΜΙΣΘΟΣ,” in J. Bingen, Le Monde grecque: Hommage à Claire Préaux, Brussels, 1975, pp. 426–438) has taken a stand against this overuse of “wage,” which suggests a material remuneration paid (by an individual or a collective) to a worker (either for a professional or a manual worker). In fact, the first four occurrences of misthos in Josephus require four different translations: reward (War 1.356), subsidy (1.571), wage (1.605; cf. 2.296), price (2.109; cf. 5.419; Ant. 16.336). Cf. O. Schulthess, “μισθός,” in PW, vol. 15, 2078ff. E. Würthwein, H. Preisker, “μισθός,” in TDNT, vol. 4, pp. 695–728.

³ Homer, Il. 10.303–304; cf. E. Benveniste, Le Vocabulaire des institutions indoeuropéennes, Paris, 1961, pp. 163–167.

⁴ Homer, Il. 21.445; cf. Herodotus 8.4.2: the Euboeans convinced Themistocles—with the help of a sum of thirty talents (ε—πὶ μισθω—) —to see to it that the fleet remained in place.

⁵ In an apprenticeship contract for a shorthand-writing slave, in AD 155: “the wage agreed between us: one hundred twenty silver drachmas” (μισθοῦ τοῦ συμπεφωνημένου, P.Oxy. 724, 5); PSI 962, 31.

⁶ Plato, Prt. 328 b: “I believe that I am better able than anyone to render others the service of making them perfectly raised men, and that I therefore deserve the wage that I claim” (ἀξίως τοῦ μισθοῦ ὃν πράττομαι).

⁷ I.Cret. II, 5, 1 (Axos); P.Köln 144, 26: wage for each aroura (152 BC); P.Got. 9, 12: annual wage of Aurelius Victor for his work as dyer and tapestry-maker; P.Oslo 137, 6; Demosthenes, Corona 18.51: “How did you deserve Alexander’s hospitality? I would not call you . . . Alexander’s friend . . . since at least one ought not to call harvesters or those who do something else to earn a wage (τοὺς ἄλλο τι μισθοῦ πράττοντας) friends and guests of those who pay them (τω—ν μισθωσαμένων).” So the wage is a profit (Xenophon, Oec. 1.4), but it is contrasted with free service: “Who is more disinterested than I, who accept from no one any gifts or wages” (οὔτε δω—ρα οὔτε μισθὸν δέχομαι, Ap. 16). The formula ἄνευ μισθοῦ can mean “without unfortunate consequence, without expense, without cost” (Plato, Leg. 1.650 a; P.Gen. 34, 5; P.Oxy. 2586, 20; BGU 1067, 15), but also “without pay.” A sick and aged smith asks Antonius Philoxenus “that I may fulfill my service at your feet . . . so that I may fulfill the works that you want without wages (ἄνευ μισθοῦ), with the iron supplied by you” (P.Rein. 113, 13). In 120–118, Ptolemy Euergetes II and Cleopatra III forbid requiring “flax weavers, makers of linen cloth and garments, to work for free or at reduced wages” (P.Tebt. 5, 251 = C.Ord.Ptol. 53 and 55). At Delphi, the amphictyonic regulation regarding the Pythian Games (380/79 BC) forbids (regarding lodgings in religious centers) “that anyone should not pay rent to anyone” (μισθὸν μηδένᾶ φέρειν μηδενί, Dittenberger, Syl. 145; LSCG, n. 78, 23; G. Rougement, Delphes, I, n. X, 23). This text with P.Mich. 666, 22 (τοῦ μισθοῦ τῆς ξυλίνης ὀργάνης) and Dittenberger, Syl. 975, 40–42 (cf. 502, 11); Exod 22:14 proves that misthos can have the meaning “rent” (against D. Behrend, Attische Pachturkunden: Ein Beitrag zur Beschreibung der μίσθωσις nach den griechischen Inschriften, Munich, 1970, p. 29). — Ἄμισθοι are unpaid volunteers (Dittenberger, Or. 266, 56).

⁸ P.Fouad 37, 3, 5, 6, 9 (cf. H. C. Youtie, Scriptiunculae, vol. 1, p. 192). In the year 10, the apprenticeship contract of Pasion in his two brothers’ weaving workshop: “We have provided the weaving tax and the wage of our brother Pasion” (P.Tebt. 384, 20), P.Lond. 846, 10 (vol. 3, p. 131); “I undertake to work for you at my own trade for the wage . . . for one year beginning . . .” (P.Rein. 105, 3).

⁹ BGU 1106, 14: μισθὸν τοῦ τε γάλακτος (13 BC); P.Athen. 20, 17, 30, 38.

¹⁰ P.Bour. 14, 13 (second century). Cf. P.Ant. 91, 9; P.Alex. 13, 3: the ass-tender Horion is to receive wine in payment for his work with animals; cf. the reimbursement with the temporary use of a camel (BGU 21, col. II, 14; III, 20).

¹¹ C.P.Herm. 69, 21: τω—ν μισθω—ν ναυβίων; P.Apoll. 28, 3, 4, 20; P.Panop.Beatty 2,209; SB 9760, 3: μισθοῦ μαυτω—ν; 10299, 166 and 201; P. J. Sijpesteijn, K. A. Worp, P.Vindob.Tandem, n. 31, 7 and 11; A. J. M. Meyer-Termeer, Die Haftung der Schiffer im griechischen und römischen Recht, Zutphen, 1978, p. 81, 14.

¹² P.Enteux. 48, 4: Pistos accompanied the Thracian holder of a hundred arourai, Aristocrates, in the army. Perhaps Aristocrates did not pay his wages in full, generating the following complaint: “I concluded a contractual agreement with him . . . whereby I was to accompany him in the army as his servant for a monthly wage, the sum of which was set by agreement between him and me”; SB 9653, 15.

¹³ Τὸν ἡμερήσιον μισθόν (P.Fay. 91, 23; P.Brem. 15, 12; P.Oxy. 2721, 13; P.Ross. Georg. II, 18, 302; SB 7557, 8–9; P.Corn. 9, 9: λαμβανόντων ὑμω—ν ὑπὲρ μισθοῦ καθῆμέραν ε—κάστην). The verb λαμβάνω is the most used (P.Cair.Isid. 81, 24; PSI 873, 11; P.Mich. 241, 28; 574, 10; P.Oxy. 2586, 36; 2875, 28; P.Ross.Georg. II, 18, 18; IV, 4, 6; SB 7676, 13, 24; 8026, 17; 9267, 5; P.Vindob.Sal. 8, 7), but also κομίζομαι (P.Corn. 5, 11; C.P.Herm. 19, 7), ἀπέχει τὸν μ. (BGU 1511, 10; 1647, 13; 1663, 16), παρέχω (P.Hamb. 68, 38), πληρόομαι (C.P.Herm. 69, 8; P.Mert. 38, 6; P.Oxy. 2721, 30; P.Ross.Georg. IV, 3, 7; 5, 15), ἔχω (P.Cair.Isid. 123, 4: I received from you my son’s wages), εἰ—μί (P.Ryl. 583, 19 and 67), δέχομαι (Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 4, 2, P.Mil. 48, 8; O.Bodl. 1751; P.Mich. 624, 5; SB 9011, 8; P.Vindob.Sal. 9, 9), δίδωμι (P.Mich. 349, 5; P.Oxy. 1970, 24–25, 2153, 13; P.Ross.Georg. IV, 2, 12).

¹⁴ Cf. M. Launey, Armées hellénistiques, pp. 725–733. He cites (p. 400) a governor of Maronea who offers thanks for services rendered, particularly in advance of pay (εἰ—ς τοὺς μισθοὺς τοι—ς διαφυλάξασι Τράλεσι); cf. JG, XII, 8, 156, lines 11–12 and Dittenberger, Or. 595, 10 and 26: τὸν μισθὸν τῆς στατίωνος (the station of the Tyrians at Puteoli). The language varies; in the third century BC the wages of a gardener (PSI 336, 14; 1013, 2) or of a vintner (369, 8), paid in denarii, is called ὀψώνιον; but this is converted into wine in P.Cair.Zen. 59615, 3; cf. T. Reekmans, “Notes sur quelques papyrus du 3e siècle avant J.C.,” in Antidorum W. Peremans, Louvain, 1968, pp.

¹⁵ Xenophon, An. 1.2.11; cf. 7.3.13; 7.6.1; Hell. 6.2.16; Thucydides 1.143.2: “for the sake of a few days’ high pay”; 8.45.6.

¹⁶ Plato, Prt. 349 a, μισθὸν ἀξιώσας ἄρνησθαι; cf. Philo, Joseph 125: “sophists for a wage” (ε—πὶ μισθω—); Spec. Laws 4.163: “professional scribes” (οἱ—μισθοῦ γράφοντες); Philo, Moses 1.24: “advocates paid with money”; Ps.-Aristotle, Rh. Al. 36.1444a35–b3: “If someone says that we argue a case for a misthos, we admit it ironically. . . . We must establish distinctions for you between the different types of misthoi ” (ε—πὶ χρήμασιν, ε—πὶ χάρισιν, ε—πὶ τιμωρίαις, ε—πὶ τιμαί—ς).

¹⁷ Dittenberger, Syl. 672, 10 and 20; P.Oxy. 2190, 31 (first century). Pensions are guaranteed in the fourth century BC, Dittenberger, Syl. 244, I, 58, 60; II, 56; 252, 36. At Thespieae, an annual wage of four minas is provided for the one who trains adolescents for military service (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1971, p. 441, n. 339).

¹⁸ Aristotle, Pol. 3.16.1287a7; cf. Theognis 1.434; Aristophanes, Plut. 408. N. van Brock (Vocabulaire médical, p. 71) notes the constant use of misthos for this bonus: Heraclitus, frag. 58; Diodorus Siculus 1.82: “In military expeditions and in voyages, the Egyptians, when they fall ill, receive care without paying any honorarium. The physicians are maintained at the expense of the public treasury”; Tabula of Edalion (Cypriot, GDI 60, 2–4): King Stasikypros and the citizens of Edalion ordered Onasilos the physician . . . to care free of charge (ἄνευ μισθοῦ) for men wounded in combat. Hippocrates, Jusj. 1: “I will teach without pay” (ἄνευ μισθοῦ); Hippocrates, Praec. 4: “You shall not be concerned with fixing your pay, because we think that this concern is harmful to the patient in an acute illness.” Pollux, Onom. 4.177.

¹⁹ Josephus, War 3.437; P.Fam.Tebt. 54, 12, 14; P.Grenf. II, 67, 11.

²⁰ A judge’s pay (Aristophanes, Vesp. 605ff.; cf. J. Taillardat, Images d’Aristophane, n. 686, 688), pay for dikastai (SB 8988, 42).

²¹ In the first century, misthos suggests above all a sum of money (Philo, Flacc. 141; Josephus, Ant. 17.81; P.Amst. 91, 3: ἀπόλαβε τὴν τιμὴν τοῦ μισθοῦ; cf. Thucydides 6.8.1). Cf. the stipendium, J. Lesquier, L’Armée romaine d’Egypte, Cairo, 1918, pp. 248ff.

²² P.Wisc. 74, 14; cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 245, col. I, 33; Josephus, Life 297–298: “I was wrong to pay the commission at the cost of the public treasury” (τὸν μισθὸν ε—κ τοῦ κοινοῦ); Ant. 1.250; bonus for generous hospitality.

²³ Sophocles, Ant. 294: “They stirred up the guards to act as they did by paying them”; Pindar, Pyth. 3.55: “gold will tempt him also to snatch a man from the jaws of death for a magnificent wage.”

²⁴ Philo, Flacc. 134; cf. To Gaius 172: the Alexandrian delegates bribed Gaius in secret with enormous commissions (ε—μεμίσθωντο αὐτὸν μεγάλοις μισθοι—ς); Josephus, Ant. 14.485: poor compensation for the murder of so many citizens; 19.131: the price of denunciations; Ag. Apion 2.32: “to pay the Alexandrians for the honorary citizenship he received from them”; War 4.207: “many Jews bribed poor citizens and sent them to keep their places”; Ant. 7.127; 9.77; 11.174: pay assassins.

²⁵ Philo, Spec. Laws 2.183; cf. 1.156: the tithe was established as a salary for the temple servants and constitutes their part of the inheritance; 4.98; Josephus, Ant. 4.206: a prostitute’s wage cannot be used to offer sacrifices; 6.48: “the prophet did not receive a wage.” Cf. Num 18:31—the Levites can eat the portion they reserve of their victims, “because it is a wage for you in exchange for your service in the Tent of Meeting”; Mic 3:11—“the priests teach for a wage.”

²⁶ Herodotus 8.116: when the six sons of the king of Bisaltae disobeyed by entering the service of the Persians against the Greeks, this was their punishment (τοῦτον τὸν μισθὸν ἔλαβον): their father gouged their eyes out; Callimachus, Hymn. Art. 263: “the son of Atreus paid dearly for his boasting”; Euripides, Hipp. 1050: “behold the retribution of a godless person”; Josephus, Ant. 19.68: the price of disobedience; Ag. Apion 2.249; Dionysius of Halicarnassus 10.51; Stele of Moschion: “the just wage of foolishness” (μισθὸν ἀμαθίης, E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 108, 17); 2Macc 8:33—Callisthenes and others were burned up in one house and thus “received the just wage of their profanation.”

²⁷ Ps.-Plutarch, Cons. ad Apoll. 14: αἰ—τει—ν παρὰ τοῦ —Απόλλωνος μισθόν; Philo, Heir 26: Abraham to God, “What was I that you should agree with me upon a reward (ἵνα μισθὸν ὁμολογήης), which is much more perfect than a grace and a gift (χάριτος καὶ δωρεα—ς ἀγαθόν)”; Josephus, Ant. 18.309: a recompense given by God.

²⁸ Cf. the epitaph of Makaria: “as a reward for her trials (μισθὸν ἔχουσα πόνων), she has heavenly crowns” (SB 5719).

²⁹ Cf. the “wage” given Jacob by Laban (Gen 29:15, Hebrew maskoret, 30:28, 32, 33; 31:7, 8, 41); Josephus, Ant. 1.298; 6.7: price, payment of what is due; 7.121; 9.190; of a debt (18.306).

³⁰ Exod 2:9—“Pharaoh’s daughter said, ‘Take this child and nurse him for me; I will give you your pay’” (Philo, Moses 1.17); 1Kgs 5:20; Solomon to Hiram: “I will give as compensation to your workers whatever you tell me” (Josephus, Ant. 8.52); Tob 5:14–15: “Tell me what wage I will have to pay you.”

³¹ Lev 19:13; Tob 5:14; Deut 24:14-15: “You shall give him his pay on that very day”; Philo, Spec. Laws 4.195–196; Virtues 88; Flacc. 140; Good Man Free 86: the Essenes put into a common pool all that they receive for their day’s work.

³² Gen 15:1 (Josephus, Ant. 1.183). Philo had a work called Περὶ μισθῶ—ν, concerning “rewards” (Heir 1–2). In her edition of this latter work (Paris, 1966, p. 18, n. 1), M. Harl notes the five or six Philonian terms that refer to the idea of reward: ἀγαθόν, δωρέα, ἄθλον, γέρας, μισθός, χάρις; cf. the promise of reward: διαθήκη, ὑπόσχεσις. On Gen 30:18 (“Issachar is my reward”), Philo comments: “which means, the work is not without end, but is crowned and recompensed (μισθοδοτούμενος) by God” (Philo, Alleg. Interp. 1.80; Plant. 134; Dreams 2.34: “Issachar is the symbol of rewards”); Josephus, Ant. 1.308. Cf. E. Pax, “Studien zum Vergeltungsproblem der Psalmen,” in Studia Biblica Franciscana 11, Jerusalem, 1960–61, pp. 56–112.

³³ Sir 51:22; cf. Philo, Plant. 136: “For the one who gives thanks, the very act of giving thanks is a quite sufficient reward”; Drunkennes 94.

³⁴ The theme has often been studied in terms of theological preoccupations (merit—a word that does not occur in the Bible—disinterested ethics, etc.), cf. L. Ihmels, Der Lohngedanke in der Ethik Jesu, 1908; F. K. Karner, Der Vergeltungsgedanke in der Ethik Jesu, Leipzig, 1927; K. Weiss, Die Frohbotschaft Jesu über Lohn und Vollkommenheit: Zur evangelischen Parabel von den Arbeitern im Weinberg, Matth. XX, 1–16 (Neutestamentliche Abhandlungen, XII, 1927); O. Michel, “Der Lohngedanke in der Verkündigung Jesu,” in ZST, vol. 9, 1931–32, pp. 47–54; M. Wagner, “Der Lohngedanke im Evangelium,” in NKZ, 1932, pp. 106–112; 129–139; P. S. Minear, And Great Shall Be Your Reward, New Haven, 1941; B. Reicke, “The New Testament Conception of Reward,” in Aux sources de la tradition chrétienne (Mélanges M. Goguel), Neuchâtel-Paris, 1950, pp. 195–206; W. Pesch, Der Lohngedanke in der Lehre Jesu verglichen mit der religiösen Lohnlehre des Spätjudentums, Munich, 1955; M. F. Berrouard, “Le Mérite dans les évangiles synoptiques . . . dans les épîtres de saint Paul,” in Istina, 1956, pp. 191–209; 313–332; G. Bornkamm, “Der Lohngedanke im Neuen Testament,” in Studien zu Antike und Urchristentum, 1959, vol. 2, pp. 69–92; R. de Ru, “The Conception of Reward in the Teaching of Jesus,” in NovT, 1966, pp. 202–222.

³⁵ Matt 5:12; cf. Luke 6:3, 35; J. Dupont, Béatitudes, vol. 2, pp. 349ff.

³⁶ Matt 5:46; cf. Luke 6:32—ποία ὑμῶν χάρις ἐστίν; C. Spicq, Agarè, vol. 1, pp. 16–27; J. Dupont, Béatitudes, vol. 3, p. 261.

³⁷ Matt 6:1; cf. J. Dupont, Béatitudes, vol. 3, pp. 245ff., 260ff.

³⁸ Matt 6:2, 5, 16 denounces first alms given publicly (ε—λημοσύνη = sedakâh), (with the sounding of a trumpet; cf. Sir 31:11; Str-B, vol. 1, pp. 388ff.) in order to garner human praise, then prayer in which one situates oneself so as to be witnessed by everyone, and finally fasting in which one mars one's appearance in order to appear to be fasting. In all three cases, ἀπέχουσιν τὸν μισθὸν αὐτῶ—ν. Human acclaim is contrasted with divine approval; the former is worthless; only the latter is valuable, precisely because it amounts to much more than a strict compensation. Cf. B. Gerhardsson, "Geistiger Opferdienst nach Matth. VI, 1–6, 16–21," in Neues Testament und Geschichte (Festschrift O. Cullmann), Zurich-Tübingen, 1972, pp. 69–77.

³⁹ Ει—ς ὄνομα προφήτου is a Hebraism: ει—ς ὄνομα = leshem = in the name of, in the capacity of, as (cf. Sipre Deut. 306; Mek. on Exod 12:21; t. Ber. 2.11). Here, the preacher is received on account of his relationship to the Lord who sends him. This is not hospitality practiced out of mere politeness, or even out of benevolence, but because one has to do with a "man of God" (1Tim 6:20). So it is as if one were receiving God himself (John 13:20). Consequently, the reward will be given by God himself—and logically, this will be intimacy with him (Rev 3:20).

⁴⁰ Matt 10:41. It would seem that here a "righteous person" is a teacher in the Christian community, cf. D. Hill, "ΔΙΚΑΙΟΙ as a Quasi-Technical Term," in NTS, vol. 11, 1965, pp. 296–302.

⁴¹ Matt 10:42—οὐ μὴ ἀπολέσῃ τὸν μισθὸν αὐτοῦ. On ὕδωρ ψυχρὸν, cf. A. Schlatter, Der Evangelist Matthäus, pp. 353ff.

⁴² Luke 10:7, quoted by St. Paul with regard to presbyters, especially teachers (1Tim 5:18): sacred ministers have the right to remuneration (cf. C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, on this verse).

⁴³ Cf. John 4:36—"the harvester receives a wage (ὁ θερίζων μισθὸν λαμβάνει) and gathers fruit for eternal life," i.e., souls whom he has led to God; Jas 5:4—"Behold the wage of the workers (ὁ μισθὸς τῶ—ν ε—ργατῶ—ν) who have harvested your fields and whom you have failed to pay"; ε—ργάτης is very often an agricultural worker, laborer, or harvester (Wis 17:16) hired by an owner who is required to remunerate him, cf. J. Mayor, The Epistle of St. James, London, 1910; J. Marty, L'Épître de Jacques, on this verse.

⁴⁴ Matt 20:1-16; cf. D. Buzy, Les Paraboles, Paris, 1932, pp. 205–237; J. Dupont, “La Parabole des ouvriers de la vigne,” in NRT, 1957, pp. 785–797; C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 1, pp. 158ff.; J. B. Bauer, “Gnadenlohn oder Tageslohn (Mt. XX, 8–16),” in Bib, 1961, pp. 224–228; J. D. M. Derrett, “Fresh Light on the Parable of the Wicked Vinedressers,” in RIDA, 1963, pp. 11–41 (= Derrett, Law in the NT, pp. 286–312); J. Jeremias, Parables, pp. 37ff., 136ff.; A. Feuillet, “Les Ouvriers envoyés à la vigne,” in RevThom, 1979, pp. 5–24; F. Manns, “L’Arrière-plan socio-économique de la Parabole des ouvriers de la onzième heure et ses limites,” in Anton, 1980, pp. 259–268. Str-B (vol. 4, Excursus 10, pp. 484–500) cites the Talmud: When a worker received a full day’s pay after two hours of work, his companions complained about the inequity. The master responded, “Ah, but this man did more in two hours than you did all day long” (p. 493).

⁴⁵ We must take account at the same time of the maxim of Antigonus of Soko (second century BC): “Do not be like servants who serve their master with an eye on reward; be like servants who serve their master without thinking about receiving a reward; then the fear of heaven will be upon you” (Pirqa ‘Abot 1.3); and that of St. Thomas: “Our works derive their merit from the fact that they proceed from the grace of the Holy Spirit” (In Rom., chap. 6, lect. 4, end); “All good that belongs to man comes from God” (I-II, q. 114, a. 1). In Acts 1:18, the question concerns the wages of iniquity (μισθὸς τῆς ἀδικίας) that Judas received; likewise regarding Balaam in 2Pet 2:15 (cf. Jude 11; G. H. Boobyer, “The Verbs in Jude 11,” in NTS, vol. 5, 1958 pp. 45–47; Str-B, vol. 3, 771), a type of the self-interested teacher who seeks monetary profit (Philo, Moses 1.268; b. Sanh. 106a ; Num. Rab. 109a , 189b , 192b), and finally of false prophets and false apostles who “will be paid back with harm as the wage of their iniquity” (2Pet 2:13); this retribution is in conformity with classical and Hellenistic Greek, cf. above.

⁴⁶ G. P. Wetter, Der Vergeltungsgedanke bei Paulus, Göttingen, 1912; F. V. Filson, St. Paul’s Conception of Recompense, Leipzig, 1931.

⁴⁷ 1Cor 3:8 (cf. G. Didier, Désintéressement du Chrétien: La Rétribution dans la morale de St Paul, Paris, 1955, pp. 47ff.). There is always a correspondence between work done and the payment of the just wage: “For the one who works (τῷ ἐργαζομένῳ) the wage is not counted as a favor (χάρις); it is a debt (ὀφείλημα)” (Rom 4:4); cf. P. Bonnetain, “Grâce,” in DBSup, vol. 3, col. 1230–1234; W. Pesch, “Der Sonderlohn für die Verkündiger des Evangeliums (I Kor. III, 8, 14f. und Parallelen),” in Neutestamentliche Aufsätze (Festschrift J. Schmid), Regensburg, 1963, pp. 199–206.

⁴⁸ Same concept of reward for works in 1Cor 3:14—“If a person’s work (τὸ ἔργον) that he has added in building endures (resists the trial by fire that will make its quality known), he will receive a wage (μισθὸν λήμψεται),” which is not salvation, “since those are saved who do not receive it” (G. Didier, Désintéressement du Chrétien, pp. 48ff.). It is an eschatological gift granted for work of genuine worth, which is recognized as such after verification (dokimasia). It is wrong to apply this text to Purgatory, a place of purification; cf. C. Spicq, “Purgatoire,” in DBSup, vol. 9, col. 560ff.; J. Michel, “Gerichtsfeuer und Purgatorium zu 1 Cor. III, 12–15,” in AnBib 17, Rome, 1963, pp. 395–401; C. W. Fishburne, “I Corinthians III, 10–15 and the Testament of Abraham,” in NTS, vol. 17, 1970, pp. 109–115.

⁴⁹ 1Cor 9:17-18. G. Didier (Désintéressement du Chrétien, pp. 64ff.) sums up the traditional exegesis thus: “Only a free worker has the right to a wage; the worker who is under compulsion earns nothing (verse 17 a). Thus Paul earns no wage (from God) for the work of evangelization. How can he nevertheless obtain a wage (from God; verse 17 b)? —By adding something else to his apostolate, which is a forced labor: namely, his refusal of any human reward (verse 18). This something additional is done freely and hence earns a wage.” But this interpretation gives the second misthos the sense of “claim to a wage,” which it never has elsewhere, and gives the present indicative πράσσω the value of an optative: “If the initiative were mine in this task, I would have the right to a reward.” In reality, this is not an unreal hypothesis but Paul’s actual case: acting of his own free will, the apostle has the right to a wage; compelled, he is nothing but a steward-slave. So what is his wage? —the gratuity of his ministry. G. Didier cites St. Augustine (Op. Mon. 8.9; PL 40.555): Paul renounces all earthly wages; his misthos is to place the preaching of the gospel above any suspicion of venality!

⁵⁰ Μισθὸν πλήρη ἀπολάβητε (B); cf. Xenophon, An. 7.5.5: Xenophon reproaches Heraclides for not taking to heart the interests of Seuthes; “otherwise, you would have come with the full pay” (πλήρη τὸν μισθόν); Ruth 2:12—“May Yahweh return to you what you have done, and may your recompense from Yahweh be perfect” (γένοιτο ὁ μισθός σου πλήρης).

⁵¹ L. Cerfaux, J. Cambier, L’Apocalypse de saint Jean aux Chrétiens, Paris, 1955, p.197.

⁵² The denominative active μισθόω means “lease out,” cf. the accounts of an agonothetes for the Basileia at Lebadaea in the second century BC: “I leased out the hippodrome for . . . drachmas, it was leased by Melesias” (ε—μισθωσα δὲ τὸν ἰ—ππόδρομον . . . ε—μισθώσατο Μελησίας, NCIG, n. 22, A 31–32). The μίσθωσις is the act of leasing, lending, or farming out; ὁ

μισθωσάμενος (IG, XII, 7, 62, line 1; Amorgos, rental contract for the precincts of Zeus Temenites; fourth century BC) or μεμισθωμένος (P.Phil. 14, 21; P.Amst. 41, 7, 14; P.Köln 149, 25; P.Soterichos 1, 12, 18; 2, 11) is the tenant (lessee); ὁ μισθώσας is the hirer-out (lessor).

⁵³ P.Princ. 151; cf. Plato, Resp. 9.580 b: “Shall we hire a herald, or must I myself proclaim that . . .”; Prt. 347 c: “they rent at a high price a voice that is not their own, the voice of flute-players”; Leg. 7.800 e; Menander, Dysk. 665: the cook Sicon, “if someone hires me again”; Josephus, Ant. 9.164: the high priest Jodas hired stonecutters and carpenters; 9.188: Amasias hired 100,000 soldiers for one hundred talents of silver; 9.192.

⁵⁴ At Heraclea, in the fourth century BC, “The lessees shall have the fruits in perpetuity so long as they provide guarantees and pay the rent every year. . . . On these terms they have leased (ε—μισθώσαντο) the first plot . . .” (RIJG, vol. 1, pp. 200, 100; 212, 179; cf. p. 236, 3, 10, 11, 15, 19). In 109 BC, lease on the land called “The Point,” where the tenant, Techratis, undertakes to plant wild chickling (ἄρακος); no rent is imposed, but she must give the produce of one-half aroura to the owner, Totoes, who will in exchange supply two artabai of wheat (Pap.Lugd.Bat. 19; 3, 5). Cf. Lysias 17.8: “Those to whom I leased the estate of Sphettos”; Josephus, War 1.362: “Herod leased, for an annual rent of two hundred talents, the lands that had been detached from his realm”; 1.398; Ant. 16.291: the Arabs did not pay the rent for the lands that they had leased from Herod; cf. 15.96.

⁵⁵ P.Ant. 89, 5; cf. in the third century BC: “the land that he had rented from the royal treasury” (ἦν ε—μεμίσθωτο γῆν, P.Lille 3, 75); P.Mich. 565, 3; 634, 6 (in AD 25–26); 314, 1; 315, 1 (AD 44–45); P.Soterichos 3, 4 (AD 69–90); P.Warr. 11, 5 (AD 98); BGU 1644, 7; 1646, 6; 2036, 12; 2133, 5; 2137–2139, etc.; P.Berl.Zill. 5, 9; 7, 9; Pap.Lugd.Bat. II, 8, 27; 10, 10; P.Oxy. 2137, 13; 3255–3260; C.P.Herm. 22, 8; P.Mil.Vogl. 63, 9; 83, 3; 89, 7; 130–141; etc. PSI 30, 2; P.Stras. 465, 8, etc.

⁵⁶ P.Corn. 8, 11 (first century); 10, 4, 11, 5, 20; P.Rein. 99, 4 (30 BC), a public farmer guarantees by his oath to Augustus a lease of public land which he contracted as the lessee; P.Phil. 13, 3 (second century), lease proposal for the rental for four years of a fifteen-aroura grain field; 15, 6; P.Fam.Tebt. 5, 2; 28, 4; P.Mich. 184, 5; 630, 5 (lease and sub-lease of seed).

⁵⁷ P.Phil. 12, 4; P.Ryl. 600 (AD 8); P.Mich. 562, 4; 564, 5; P.Stras. 336 a 10; P.Phil. 13, 4: “I propose to you that I lease (μισθώσασθαι) for the harvest set out during the eighteenth year and coming to maturity the next year, the nineteenth, the palm grove belonging to you and located at . . .”;

P.Hamb. 99, 6 (first century); P.Oxf. 13, 5 (second century); P.Mich. 631, 2; BGU 2333, 4 (barley harvest).

⁵⁸ BGU 2202, 7, 23; P.Mert. 76, 16, 32, 38; P.Mich. 612, 8; cf. Demosthenes, C.Aphob. 1; 27.15: οἶκον μισθοῦν.

⁵⁹ P.Alex. 11, 4: μισθώσασθαι παρ ὑμῶ—ν. Cf. the adjudication of the price of 300 talents for the building of the temple of Delphi (Herodotus 2.180) and the rental of a ship (Herodotus 1.24; Epictetus 3.9.14).

μίσθωμα

misthoma, (agreed) price, pay, rent; rented dwelling see also δοῦλος; μισθός, μισθόομαι; ὑπηρέτης

misthoma, S 3410; EDNT 2.433; NIDNTT 3.138–139; MM 414; L&N 57.175; BAGD 523

Acts 28:30—emeinen de dietian holen en idio misthomati: During his stay at Rome, Paul lived for two whole years in the lodgings that he rented. At least that is how most commentators translate this text, understanding misthoma from the context to mean “rented dwelling”: the apostle lived “in his own private home,” where he received visitors and friends.

But misthoma, unknown in the papyri, never has this meaning. It always refers to an agreed-upon price, a wage. For example: “The Delphians had to pay a fourth of the (agreed) cost of the building of the temple”;¹ a ban on “carrying a prostitute’s hire to the temple” (misthoma pornes, Philo, Spec. Laws 1.280; cf. 104; Machon, in Athenaeus 13.581 a); Lampon, the corrupt clerk, “got his accursed pay (misthon), or rather his payoff (to misthoma)” (Philo, Flacc. 134). The same usage is found in the inscriptions of the fourth-third century BC. At Amorgos, in a rental contract on the precincts of Zeus Teminites, “the lessee shall put down a security deposit ... and pay the lease each year in the month Thargelion.”² At Naxos, in a mortgage on the property of some minors, the tenant agrees that each year until the children are of age he will pay a rent of 400 drachmas to secure 3500 drachmas of capital: “For the house and the tile roof mortgaged for the benefit of the minor children of Epiphron, for a capital sum of 3500 and an annual lease of 400 drachmas.”³

The interesting point about the epigraphical data is that it attests the frequent use of misthoma in contracts for the lease of real estate. Through the locatio-conductio, one person agrees to allow another the use of a property in return for a fixed price. This is how the Vulgate interprets Acts 28:30—in *suo conducto*⁴—and this usage of misthoma is seen as a latinism. Certainly en idio misthomati could be interpreted to mean “at his own expense”;⁵ but it seems preferable to give to this noun the meaning that French tourist agencies give the word location, the action of taking a lease. Hence it would mean the apartment or lodging that Paul had personally rented.⁶

¹ Herodotus 2.180: τεταρτημόριον τοῦ μισθώματος; Isocrates, Areop. 7.29: “They auctioned off the most sacred ceremonies cheap”; Demosthenes, Embassy 125; Aristotle, Ath. Pol. 47.2: μισθοῦσι δὲ τὰ μισθώματα πάντα, the ten sellers (πωλήται) carry out all state auctions.”

² J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. 35, 4: καὶ τὸ μίσθωμα ἀποδώσει ε—μ μηνὶ θαρρηλιω—νι.

³ NCIG, n. 25, D, 7: τω—ν μισθομάτων τετρακοσίων δραχμω—ν τοῦ ε—νιαυτοῦ ε—κάστου. Cf. an Athenian decree relating to the cult of Poseidon and Erechtheus: ἀναλίσκεν δ ὅ τι γίγνεται ε—κ τω—ν μισθωμάτων (LSCG, n. 31, 9); Dittenberger, Syl. 204, 67; 271, 28; 1024, 38; 1106, 14; 1200, 15: ὑποτελεῖ— δὲ μίσθωμα Νικήρατος Κτησεφω—ντι καθ ἕκαστον ε—νιαυτὸν ἀργυρίου δραχμᾶς πεντακοσίας ἀτελεῖ—ς. We know that μισθός, with its quite varied meanings (pay for work; benefits, honoraria, bonuses for professionals; wages; cf. Plato, Resp. 1.345 e—347 d; 2.372 e; recompense, price, cf. the Gospels; E. Will, “Notes sur μισθός,” in Le Monde grec: Hommages à C. Préaux, Brussels, 1975, pp. 426–438), used also for the rent for a building (Dittenberger, Syl. 145.22–23; 975, 40–42), the fee charged for an apartment (LSCG, n. 78). Not only does it follow upon a contractual agreement; it is a fiscal term. Cf. the horsemen and hoplites who have to pay to Apollo a tax on their μισθός, which is deducted at the source by the τόξαρχος, IG 12, 79.

⁴ It is worth noting that J. J. Wettstein—apart from an erroneous reference to Philo (ε—ν μισθώματι οἰ—κει—ν)—cites Latin texts almost exclusively; Seneca, Ben. 7.5.2: “I rented your house (conduxi domum a te). So there is something in it that belongs to you, something to me. The building is yours; the use of it is mine. . . . Inasmuch as it is leased to me (conductum meum), even though you are the owner you have no right of entry”; Martial, Epigr. 11.83: “No one lives with you for free, unless he is rich and childless. No one, Sosiabanus, pays more rent for his house than you”; Juvenal, Sat. 3.235: “You will procure . . . a very pleasant house for the annual rent that you pay at Rome for an ill-lit slum” (quanti nunc tenebras unum conducis in annum); Suetonius, Vit. 7: Vitellius, “putting up in a rented apartment his wife and children, whom he left at Rome, rented out his own house for the rest of the year.” Cf. Theophrastus 23.9: καὶ ε—ν μισθωτῇ οἰ—κίᾳ οἰ—κω—ν, “although he is only a tenant in the house where he lives.”

⁵ Cf. E. Haenchen, Acts, p. 726, who compares Acts 28:16—μένειν καθ' ε—αυτόν; 28:23—ἦλθον πρὸς αὐτόν ἐι—ς τὴν ξενίαν. Completing the data given by H. J. Cadbury (“Lexical Notes on Luke-Acts, III: Luke’s Interest in Lodging,” in JBL, vol. 45, 1926, pp. 319ff.), who mentions this translation by Ephraem in the fourth century, E. Hansack (“‘Er lebte . . . von seinem eigenen Einkommen,’ Apg. XXVIII, 30,” in BZ, 1975, pp. 249–253) cites several very minor attestations (a Life of Chrysostom by George Alexandrinus in the eighth century, its translation into Slavic from the ninth-tenth century, its reconstruction by Symeon Metaphrastus in the tenth century) and concludes that the apostle lived in Rome on the income he earned by working with his hands.

⁶ E. Jacquier comments on μίσθωμα: “money paid on a lease, or that which is leased by paying rent. Paul rented a home, either with funds that he earned through his own trade or with money that he received from the Philippians (Phil 4:10, 14, 18). According to the Aramaic version of the commentary of St. Ephraem on Acts, the money came from Paul’s sale of his cloak and his books” (Actes des Apôtres, Paris, 1926, p. 761).

μνηστεύω

mnesteuo, to seek a woman’s hand in marriage, become engaged, marry

mnesteuo, S 3423; EDNT 2.436; MM 415; L&N 34.74; BDF §§68, 188, 191(4), 316(1); BAGD 525

The Homeric occurrences of this verb (“seek a woman’s hand in marriage”)¹ show that this specialized meaning derives from a broader meaning (“solicit, seek”),² whence come all the various nuances in the matrimonial process: “court,”³ seek a wife (Theognis 1112), aspire to marriage (Plato, Leg. 6.773 b, mnestheuein gamon), ask for a woman’s hand (the youngest son of Astraeus asks for Helen’s hand in marriage).⁴ Iphigenia, having set out on a journey to join her fiancé, declared that “his marriage proposal made her leave the land of the Greeks.”⁵ In the LXX, the verb translates the Hebrew ‘aras and usually means “become engaged,”⁶ but it means marriage when the angel says to Tobias, “I will speak to Raguel so that he will give you his daughter in marriage” (Tob 6:12), and the ambiguity remains when God promises eternal engagement/marriage, with no rupture forever.⁷

In the NT, the verb is used only three times, always in the passive, and always referring to the Virgin Mary, and the meaning “engaged” is incontestable in the first two occurrences. Regarding Christ’s genealogy: “Mary, his mother, was engaged to Joseph (aorist participle, mnesteutheises tes metros autou); before they had lived together, she was found pregnant by the power of the Holy Spirit.”⁸ Likewise when the angel was sent “to a virgin engaged to a man named Joseph (perfect participle, emnesteumenen andri), and the virgin’s name was Mary.”⁹ The title parthenos, written up front, before the young woman’s name, is a personal title of honor par excellence, and the perfect tense of the participle suggests that this virginity abides. As for the coming to Bethlehem for the census “with Mary, his fiancée, who was pregnant” (Luke 2:5), we can still understand the perfect participle (emnesteumene auto) as referring literally to engagement, but we cannot exclude the possibility that the marriage had been accomplished, so “wife” is also a possible translation.

¹ Homer, Od. 6.34: the noblest of the Phaeacians “seek your hand”; 14.91: “they will not court decently”; 18.277: the suitors seek to please the noble daughter of a rich house.

² Herodotus 1.96: “Deioces aspired to power”; Isocrates, De Pace 8.15: seek votes; Plutarch, Caes. 58.1; Josephus, War 2.414: incite to war; Ant. 17.2: intrigue.

³ Euripides, Alc. 720; Apollodorus, Bibl. 2.7.5: Hercules courted Deianira; Josephus, Ant. 5.286. Jos. Asen. 1.9: Aseneth had many suitors.

⁴ Theocritus 18.6; cf. Xenophon, Hell. 6.4.37: Alexander “tried to win the hand of Jason’s widow” (ε—μνήστειε); Callimachus, Hymn. Art. 3.265: wishing to attempt the virginity of Artemis, Otos and Oarion “sought a wedding not for their good (to Artemis).”

⁵ Euripides, IT 208. In Isocrates, Hel. 10.39, Helen was of marriageable age.

⁶ Deut 20:7—“the man who has become engaged to a woman and who has not yet taken her” (verse cited by Philo, Husbandry 148, the only time he uses the verb); 22:23: “if a young virgin is engaged to a man”; 22:25, 27, 28. We may hesitate over the translation of 1Macc 3:56, μνηστευομένοις γυναίκας: “those who had just taken wives” (= young marrieds) or “those who had just become engaged”; cf. Josephus, Ant. 4.298.

⁷ Hos 2:21-22. Both meanings are found also in Josephus: “If a man marries a virgin . . .” (Ant. 4.246). God blesses the union (1.255); but usually reference is to a man’s asking for a young woman’s hand in marriage (Ag. Apion 2.200; War 1.508; Ant. 1.245; 9.197; 13.80). To the two papyri pointed out by the dictionaries (P.Flor. 36, 4; P.Cair.Masp. 6, col. II, 8) we can add only a text from Stesichorus included in P.Oxy. 2618, frag. I, col. II, 8: a mother seeking a wife (μναστεύσοισα) for her son.

⁸ Matt 1:18. M. J. Lagrange (on this verse) specifies that μνηστεύω is in the middle voice when it refers to someone who takes a wife, but in the passive for the young woman who is given.

⁹ Luke 1:27. Cf. G. M. Perrella, “Bma V. M., cum caelestem exceptit nuntium, So Joseph sponsalibus solis non vero nuptiis juncta erat,” in DivThom, 1932, pp. 378–398.

μορφή

morphe, stature, form, condition, feature, external appearance, reproduction see also εἰ—κῶν

morphe, S 3444; TDNT 4.742–752; EDNT 2.442–443; NIDNTT 1.705–708; MM 417; L&N 58.2, 58.15; BAGD 528

Current in classical and Hellenistic Greek, with a wide range of meanings—“stature, form, condition, feature, external appearance, reproduction”—morphe is used relatively little in the Bible. Gideon asks Zebah and Zalmunna, “What were the men like that you killed at Tabor?” They said, ‘They were like you, each of them having the features (Hebrew to’ar) of sons of kings” (hos eidos morphes huion basileon, Judg 8:18). Eliphaz did not recognize the features (Hebrew temûnâh; a representation of a person or thing) of the person before him (ouk en morphē pro ophthalmōn mou, Job 4:6; cf. Wis 18:1). In many sacred and secular texts, the word refers to good looks, an attractive appearance, charming features.¹

Beginning with Isa 44:13, where the sculptor of idols gives them a human form (hos morphēn andros), this meaning of distinctive or characteristic form or structure (Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Dem. 50, 54; Heraclitus, All. 65.2) is applied especially to a person, notably in Philo: “The body was created when the artist took a lump of clay and shaped it into a human form” (Creation 135; Philo, Migr. Abr. 3); “When the woman in turn had been fashioned, the man saw a sister appearance (eidos) and a kindred form (syngene morphēn), and he rejoiced.”² But morphe is used especially for a form represented in an image or sculpture: “Gaius filled the synagogues with images (eikonon) and statues in his own form (tes idias morphes)” (Philo, To Gaius 346; cf. Josephus, Life 65); “This sanctuary . . . had never admitted an image fashioned by human hand” (ibid. 290); “the golden shields bore no figure nor any other forbidden thing” (ibid. 299).

This meaning recurs constantly in epigrams, notably those of the Palatine Anthology: “It was a god who caused this metal to flow into the likeness of his bodily form” (2.314, eidei morphes; 1.34; cf. 36. 50; 11.412) “Painter, you capture only the forms; the voice is beyond your grasp” (11.433). Hence the meaning “feature, bearing”: “The image of my form (eikona morphes), once engraved by bold Eros in the burning depths of your heart” (5.274; cf. Moschus, Eur. 2.10: the woman “had the features of a foreigner”; Euripides, in Stobaeus, Flor. 34.33; vol. 5, p. 836); “Everything about his features (morphe) inspired veneration.”³ Next it comes to mean the “look, physique” of a person,⁴ “countenance, portrait”: “A messenger of Zeus, Callistratus, offers you this likeness of him” (13.2; cf. 13.24; cf. Plutarch, Ages. 2.4: We have no portrait of him, tes de morphes eikona ouk echomen), often with an aesthetic sense.⁵ Thus Antiochus I of Commagene has himself “represented” in the mid-first century BC.⁶

In the tomb inscriptions, morphe is commonly used to refer to the former or the present “form” of the deceased, the two not being the same. At the end of the high imperial period, the epitaph of a black slave at Antinoöpolis contrasts psyche and morphe: “My soul embellished the blackness of my appearance . . . ; in the tomb I have hidden everything, my thoughts and the form that clothed me before”;⁷ “His sons prepared the likeness of their noble father with a body of stone (morpheenta lithou) as a memorial.”⁸

Although morphe is often very close in meaning to eikon,⁹ and later on even becomes synonymous with it in Gnosticism,¹⁰ the texts cited disallow identifying them, as does this inscription from Laodicea, which distinguishes the two terms: “I bear the (bodily) form of Docticius, but the image of his divine virtue is carried on the lips of each person.”¹¹ This should be taken into account in the translation of Phil 2:6-7 (hos en morphē theou ... morphēn doulou labon), which the Bible de Jérusalem correctly renders “Lui, de condition divine . . . prenant la condition d’esclave.”¹² It is characteristic of morphe to be modified, to appear to be changed, to take on new features,¹³ like the risen Lord appearing to the disciples at Emmaus en hetera morphē.¹⁴ He had a new mode of being and a new appearance, analogous to that at the transfiguration (metamorphousthai, Matt 17:2). This is why in epiphanies of heavenly beings the morphe is indeed said to be different, but not without affinities with earthly forms.¹⁵

This changing of morphe is to be compared on the one hand with the theme of “descent and ascent” because of the double morphe in Phil 2:6-7 (morphe theou, morphē doulou)—which owes nothing to the gnostic redeemer myth, which had not yet been concocted—and on the other hand with the consistent meaning of this term in the magical papyri. Whereas the Christian faith affirms that God is invisible and that no human has seen him or can see him (John 1:18; 6:46; 1John 4:12; Rom 1:20; 1Tim 1:17; 6:16), the magicians call upon the deity as having a “form”¹⁶ and pray him to appear in his “true form.”¹⁷ This is a signal favor, for the Eight Books of Moses acknowledge that no one has been able to see this true divine form.¹⁸ The devotee of Hermes Trismegistos knows that his god appears in the East in the form of an ibis, in the West in the form of a dog’s head, in the North in the form of a serpent, and in the south in the form of a wolf.¹⁹ What the mystic wishes to contemplate and be united with is “the sacred form” (Pap.Graec.Mag. 4, 216; vol. 1, p. 78; cf. XIII, 271; vol. 2, p. 101), the “gracious or joyous form,”²⁰ and in the case of Aphrodite, her beauty made manifest: *epikaloumai se . . . deixasa ten kalen sou morphen.*²¹

It is clear from all of these examples that the use of morphe in the hymn in Phil 2 is entirely to be expected in a context of metamorphosis or incarnation, but that it would be risky to give it a precise theological meaning.

² Tob 1:13; Dan 1:9, 15; (Theodotion 4:36; 5:6; Aramaic zîn); Pindar, Ol. 6.76; 9.65; Nem. 3.19; 11.13; Plutarch, De E ap. Delph. 18: “our exterior (εἶδος), our form (μορφή), and our thought never remain identical”; an inscription from Epidaurus from 320 BC, νεανίσκον εὐπρεπῆ τὰμ μορφάν (Dittenberger, Syl. 1168, 119); in 161, Ptolemy asks Sarapion: ἀνδαποδω—σοί χάρειν καὶ μορφήν πρὸς τὸν βασιλέα (UPZ 53, 30), a formula repeated ibid. 33, 9; 34, 6; 35, 13, 29; 36, 11, 24; 52, 26 (cf. P. M. Fraser, “Two Studies on the Cult of Sarapis in the Hellenistic World,” in Opuscula Atheniensi, vol. 3, Lund, 1960, p. 41). Cf. the texts in C. Spicq, “Note sur ΜΟΡΦΗ dans les papyrus et quelques inscriptions,” in RB, 1973, pp. 38ff. In classical Greek, “μορφή means ‘form,’ where form entails a whole that is in principle harmonious. . . . The word can be equivalent to ‘beauty’” (P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique, p. 174, who cites Sandoz, “Les Noms grecs de la forme,” thesis, Neuchâtel, 1971, pp. 55–68, 107–119).

³ Creation 151; God does not have a human form (οὐ . . . ἀνθρωπόμορφος, Philo, Change of Names 54; Prelim. Stud. 115; Conf. Tongues 135). At the burning bush, “in the midst of the flame, there arose an extremely beautiful form (μορφή) unlike any visible object, an image truly divine in appearance . . . a form that might be taken to be the image of the One who is” (ει—κόννα τοῦ ὄντος, Moses 1.66); To Gaius 211: the Jews carry their laws in their soul like divine statues, whose forms and contours they contemplate (τύπους καὶ μορφάς, Spec. Laws 1.47); cf. 4Macc 15:4: “We marvelously implant in a child as in a figurine the likeness of our soul and our body” (ψυχῆς τε καὶ μορφῆς ὁμοιότητα); Sib. Or. 3.8: “you humans, who have a form fashioned by God in his own image” (ἔχοντες ε—ν ει—κόνι μορφήν); Lucian, Syr. D. 14: “Derceto has the form of a fish” (μορφήν ι—χθύος); Hyginus, Poet. Astr. 30: “ibi figuran piscium forma mutasse.” The virtues of Cato and of Phocion have “the same appearance” (Plutarch, Phoc. 3.8).

⁴ Anth. Pal. 2.324; cf. 6.20. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Din. 8, the country-dweller differs from the denizen of the city not in bodily form but in bearing (τῆς μορφῆς). On nuances of bearing or figure, cf. Anth. Pal. 2.88; 15.9.

⁵ The physique of Ulysses, which no one but his dog recognized (11.77); cf. Polybius 4.21.2: “we differ from each other in physique” (μορφαι—ς); P.Oxy. 3008, 8ff., διαφορά δὲ φαινομένη τούτων οὐκ ἔστιν οὔτε σχήματος οὔτε χρώματος οὔτε μεγέθους οὔτε μορφῆς (third century).

⁶ “In addition to the elegance that was mine before (ε—πὶ μορφῇ τῇ πρίν), I now have an even more striking brilliance” (1.13); “Is it not your beauty (μορφῇ) that saved you by smiting the heart of Neoptolemos” (2.102); “The child received Eros’s own name and beauty” (7.628); “On the face of Ajax shone the charm of fatherly beauty” (2.272; cf. 2.280, 285; 5.15, 139, 154; 6.18, 200, 354); cf. Xenophon, Oec. 6.16: “I could understand that certain ones hid entirely perverse souls under an attractive physical appearance”; SB 8363, 1 (= A. and E. Bernand, Memnon, n. 30, 3): “You are charmed by the pleasing beauty of our queen”; Ps.-Theocritus 20.14: “Eunica’s beauty (τα— μορφα—) caused a great deal of trouble”; Ps.-Theocritus 23.2, 14; Bion, Adon. 1.31: “The charms of Adonis perished with him”; frag. 11.5: “Eros, gifted with a soul, had nothing like his beauty” (μορφα—); 12.1; Apollodorus, Bibl. 1.4.3: Hera was jealous of Side’s beauty. This meaning—graceful figure—is frequent in the papyri, cf. C. Spicq, “Note sur ΜΟΡΦΗ,” pp. 41ff.

⁷ Dittenberger, Or. 383, 27; republished in IGLS, n. 1 and 52; H. Waldmann, Die kommagenischen Kultreformen, Leiden, 1973, pp. 17ff.; J. Waldis, Sprache und Stil der großen griechischen Inschrift vom Nemrud-Dagh, Heidelberg, 1920, pp. 64–65.

⁸ SB 8071, 10 (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 26, 10); cf. Bion, Epith. Achil. 3.7; Philo (Etern. World 5) cites Euripides (frag. 839): “nothing dies of all that exists; but being scattered here and there, it presents a new form to the eyes”; ibid. 79: “destruction is the result of the suppression of the dominant quality; for wax, when you change its form, or when you smooth it so thoroughly that it does not even show the outline of a new form” (τύπον μορφῆς). Cf. Aeneas Tacticus, Polior. 40.4, to defend their city, the inhabitants of Sinope gave women’s bodies a masculine appearance (τω—ν γυναικω—ν . . . σώματα μορφώσαντες . . . ὡς ε—ξ ἄνδρας).

⁹ IG III, 716. A dedication from the third century BC, in SEG II, 355 (republished by G. Klaffenbach, IG, vol. 9, part 1, editio minor, fasc. 1, n.

51, 5); in the second century, I.Did., CXVIII, 8; in the second-first century, a stele of Panticapaeum: μορφὰν δ' ἐ—ν πέτρᾳ λεύσσει σέω (GVI, vol. 1, n. 1989, 13; republished in CIRB, n. 130); I.Bulg., n. 1611, 2; B. D. Meritt, Corinth VIII, 1: Greek Inscriptions, Cambridge, Mass., 1931, n. 89, 1–2: τίς μορφήν τῆ δ' ἐ—νέγλυψε λίθῳ; μορφήν λαοτόμος μὲν ἐ—ῆ μειμήσατο τέχνη; Kaibel, Epigrammata, n. 1118.

¹⁰ Plutarch, Per. 31, 3; in describing the fighting of the Amazons, “Pheidias had chiseled a figure in his form (μορφῆν) . . . and he had made a very handsome likeness of Pericles”; Corp. Herm. 1, 12: “the man was very handsome, reproducing the image (εἰ—κόνᾳ) of his Father; for it is truly with his own form (τῆς ἰ—δίας μορφῆς) that God fell in love.” A funerary epigram referring to the bodies of two young people (ἡλικίην μορφήν διοίην γεγόμεσθα) mentions that two images (εἰ—κόνᾳς) have been placed near their tomb (I.Bulg., n. 1611, 12). Cf. Rom 8:29: συμμόρφους τῆς εἰ—κόνος τοῦ υἱ—οῦ αὐτοῦ; 2Cor 3:18—τὴν αὐτὴν εἰ—κόνᾳ μεταμορφούμεθα (C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, p. 741, n. 2–3).

¹¹ Cf. J. Jervell, Imago Dei, Göttingen, 1960, pp. 167, 204, 230. But in Aristotelian rhetoric, εἰ—κὼν meant “comparison”: ἔστι δὲ καὶ ἡ εἰ—κὼν μεταφορά, “comparison is also a metaphor. . . . Comparison is useful even in prose. . . . An example of comparison is that which Androtion let fly at Idrieus” (Aristotle, Rh. 3.4.1406b).

¹² MAMA VI, 14, 1: Δοκτικίου μορφῆς μὲν ἔχοι τύπον εἰ—κόνᾳ δ' αὖτε θεσπεσίας ἀρετῆς φορέει στόμα φω—τος ἐ—κάστου. Republished with commentary by L. Robert (“Les Inscriptions,” in J. des Gagniers, Laodicée, p. 339), who also edits a Hellenistic epigram of Chios (Kaibel, Epigrammata 866) issuing from the presbyters for a personage (ἄρξαντα τοῦ πρεσβυτικοῦ). It is said of the κλεινὰ πρεσβυτέρων ξύνοδος, in line 3: εἰ—κὼν ἀναστήσασα σέθεν, μορφα—ς τύπον ἔμπνουν.

¹³ Text cited in the third century, in P.Egerton 3 (H. I. Bell, T. C. Skeat, Fragments of an Unknown Gospel 2, 84). Excellent analysis by P. Henry, “Kénose,” in DBSup, vol. 5, pp. 18ff. Cf. the splendid station of life of orators, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Proem.1.

¹⁴ Rom 12:2—μεταμορφοῦσθε; 2Cor 3:18—μεταμορφούμεθα (cf. G. Terrien, Le Discernement dans les écrits pauliniens, Paris, 1973, pp. 141ff.); cf. Plato: “A long interval suffices to change the name, the form (μορφήν), the nature, the fortune” (in Anth. Pal. 9.51). Poseidon gives Periclymenos the power to change his appearance (μεταβάλλειν τὰς μορφάς, Apollodorus, Bibl. 1.9.9; cf. 2.1.3; 2.5.11; 2.7.3; 3.4.3; 3.5.6). Water can take the most varied forms (Heraclitus, All. 22.3). Athena takes on the form of Mentor (ibid. 63.8). Caligula disguises himself, changing “the substance of one body into many forms” (Philo, To Gaius 80). It is only for the μορφή θεοῦ that there are no counterfeits, as with counterfeit coins (ibid. 110). The French forme is defined as “the changeable appearance taken on by something whose nature remains unchanged” (P. Robert, Dictionnaire alphabétique et analogique de la langue française, Paris, 1963, vol. 3, p. 106).

¹⁵ Mark 16:12. Jesus’ outward appearance had indeed changed, since the disciples took him for just another traveler, the apostles thought he was a ghost, and Mary Magdalene thought she was dealing with the gardener. The apocryphal writings multiply instances of metamorphosis: ἔβλεπον τὸ εἶδος αὐτοῦ ἐ—νηλλαγμένον ἐ—ν ἐ—τέρᾳ μορφῇ (Acts Thom. 8); ὁ κύριος —Ιησοῦς Χριστὸς ἐ—ν μορφῇ παιδίου (Acts Pet. Andr. 2, 16); Acts Phil. 148; Mart. Matt. 23; Acts John 28: τοιοῦτός ἐι—μι τῇ μορφῇ τὸν κύριόν σου . . . σχήματος μορφῆς; Sib. Or. 8.458. Philo mentions those who try to learn the forms of bodies (σωμάτων μορφάς, Abraham 147). Plutarch, De E ap. Delph. 5; De Pyth. or. 29; Dittenberger, Syl. 1238, 13, link μορφή and σχῆμα.

¹⁶ The apostles saw the soul of Mary placed in the hands of St. Michael; her soul “had a human form in all its details” (Apocryphum de Dormitione BMV 35; ed. A. Wenger, L’Assomption de la T. S. Vierge dans la tradition byzantine, Paris, 1955, p. 232); “The angels of the sun have a like appearance (like that of the solar cock). Although they do not actually have a form, they appear to us under this form, since we are locked up in a form” (Proclus, Art. sacr., ed. J. Bidez, Catalogue des manuscrits alchimiques grecs, vol. 6, Brussels, 1928, p. 150). The appearance to Gideon, νεανίσκου μορφῇ (Josephus, Ant. 5.213), that of the death of Abraham, in the form of an archangel, bright and shining like the sun, τὴν ἡλιόμορφον μορφήν (T. Abr. A 17; cf. 16, 18).

¹⁷ Ὁ ζῶ—ν θεός, ὁ ἔχων μορφήν (Pap.Graec.Mag. II, n. XII, 80 = p. 62); ἠ—κέ μοι, ὁ δεσπότης τῶ—ν μορφῶ—ν (ibid. XII, 50, p. 60). The expression θεοῦ μορφή is found in Philo, To Gaius 110; Corp. Herm. 1.14; Dio Chrysostom 29.9 (cf. 7.148: σχῆμα δούλου).

¹⁸ —Ἐπικαλοῦμαί σε, Κύριε, ἵνα μοι φανῆς ἀγαθῇ μορφῇ (Pap.Graec.Mag. 13, 73 and 584; pp. 91, 115). According to Moschus, Zeus, metamorphosed into a bull, “by another change took on his own form” (μορφῇ, Eur. 2.163). The demigods, like Proteus, have the ability to change and reshape the substance of their own bodies into a multitude of different forms (Philo, To Gaius 80; cf. Heraclitus, All. 66.1).

¹⁹ Pap.Graec.Mag. 13, 70 and 581, pp. 90, 114. The Orac. Chald. emphasize the appearing of the form and the view or knowledge that results from it (frag. 37, 145,148).

²⁰ Invocation to Hermes Cosmocrator in the fourth century: “Appear to me graciously in your form . . . let your gracious form (μορφήν ι—λαράν) appear to me” (Pap.Graec.Mag. 5.415; vol. 1, p. 194); P.Lond. I, 46, 416–417). Cf. a prayer of the third century that the deity transform the medium, a child, into a shining, immortal form (Pap.Graec.Mag. VII, 563; vol. 2, p. 25; P.Lond. 121).

²¹ Pap.Graec.Mag. 4, 3221, vol. 1, p. 178; P.Lond. 121, 241 (Morpho is an epithet of Aphrodite, Pausanias 3.15.18). Finally, these magical invocations have as their object to obtain favors, grace, food, success, power, from Hermes: δός μοι τήν χάριν, μορφήν, κάλλος (Pap.Graec.Mag. 8, 27; vol. 2, p. 46); cf. III, 580 (vol. 1, p. 56): “Give me a good appearance, beauty in the eyes of all who see me.”

μόχθος

mochthos, toil, labor, misery
see also κοπιᾶω, κόπος

mochthos, S 3449; EDNT 2.444; NIDNTT 1.262; MM 418; L&N 42.48; BAGD 528

This noun is a Pauline word in the NT and always refers to the difficult conditions under which he carries out his ministry, at Thessalonica (1Thess 2:9; 2Thess 3:8) and throughout his whole life (en kopō kai mochthō, 2Cor 11:27). This must be a traditional pairing (cf. Euripides, Ion 103: ponous ek paidos mochthoumen aei), for it is attested not only in Jer 20:18; Sag 10:10; T. Jud. 18.4; but also in Philo, who, citing Num 23:21, “there will be no misery in Israel” (Hebrew ‘awen), glosses: “there will be no misery or distress among the Hebrews” (ouk estai ponos e mochthos en Hebraiois, Moses 1.284). Job’s wife complains to her husband, “In vain have I toiled in misery” (eis kenon ekopiasa meta mochthon, T. Job 24.2). In an ordinary figure of speech of this sort, it is not possible to distinguish precisely the meanings of the components.¹

Be that as it may, the word is much used in the LXX, notably twenty-two times in Ecclesiastes, where it refers to the miserable toil and trouble of humans under the sun, translating the Hebrew ‘amal (cf. Deut 26:7). Its use to translate perej (Lev 25:43, 46, 53; Ezek 34:4) and ye’ōa’ (toil, exertion, Isa 55:2; Jer 3:24; Ezek 23:29) shows both the variety of its connotations and the miserable nature of the work or tribulations so described. Pauline mochthos should be compared to the Hebrew tela'âh, “fatigue, misery, adversity, evil,” used by Moses when he tells his father-in-law “all the difficulties he had encountered on the way” (Exod 18:8) and when he addresses the king of Edom, “You know the difficulties that we have encountered” (Num 20:14; cf. Neh 9:32).

Mochthos is rare in the papyri and does not appear before the fourth century (P.Ryl. 28, 117; cf. P.Lond. 1674, 63; from the sixth century). In two inscriptions where it is used it has the same meaning as in St. Paul: the trials of life. In an epitaph, a young man who died at age nineteen addresses his father: “By way of consolation I address these words to you. . . . Sheltered from sorrow, I led a good life before leaving for Hades. With you I had an abundance, I knew no deprivation, I never experienced misery in my life.”² Twice each year Agrios offers a banquet for the people of Panopolis “inviting the priests of each class and his comrades in toil.”³

Philostratus (Gym. 47; cf. mochtheo, 42) uses this term for athletic exercises; Xenophon (Symp. 2.4) uses it for the toils of free men; Vettius Valens (12.2; cf. 77, 14) and Manetho (6.383) for the hard labor of porters.⁴

¹ “The expression must above all be taken as a whole, without putting too much weight on its parts” (B. Rigaux, Thessaloniciens, p. 423).

² Οὐδέ ποτ' ε—ν βιότῳ μόχθον; E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 75, 6.

³ Μόχθων τε συνεργούς; monument of Agrios, ibid., n. 114, col. IV, 4. IGLS 1125, 6: “the underworld is for us the end of vain misery.” A woman to her husband: Οὐ μόχθων κοινωνὲ, παρήγορε, σεμνὲ, Διονύσιε, ε—ν τάχι μ' ἔλιπες (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1953, p. 175, n. 194; cf. p. 194, n. 238; these critics show that μόχθοι, πόνοι are poetic terms for the woes and fatigue of governors, ibid., 1961, p. 220, n. 536; Hellenica, vol. 4, p. 21, n. 3, where a noteworthy citation is this epigram from Ephesus—τήνδε φιλαγρύπνον ὀλίγην χάριν εὔραο μόχθων—after H.Grégoire, Asie Mineure, n. 99).

⁴ These are cited by F. Cumont, L'Égypte des astrologues, p. 104, n. 2.

μῦθος

mythos, discourse, account, myth, fable, legend

mythos, S 3454; TDNT 4.762–795; EDNT 2.445; NIDNTT 2.643–645, 647; MM 418–419; L&N 33.13; BAGD 529

This word, which can be transliterated “myth” or translated “fable, legend” (cf. Aesop), is used only once in the OT,¹ but Titus and Timothy are told that in their teaching they must not make any concession to fables (1Tim 1:4; 4:7, paraitou), which are opposed to the truth (Titus 1:14; 2Tim 4:4). 2Pet 1:16, connecting the object of faith with historical reality, says: “It was not by following sophistic fables that we acquainted you with the power and advent of our Lord Jesus Christ,² but having beheld his majesty with our own eyes.”³ Thus it is amazing that modern exegetes and theologians have undertaken to demythologize the Bible⁴ and that literary types use the term and the idea of myth quite ambiguously.

In classical Greek, mythos has some very commonplace and very diverse meanings: word (Ps.-Plutarch, Cons. ad Apoll. 2: mythos eumenes, a friend’s kindly word), discourse, conversation, proverb, message, order, rule, opinion, counsel (as opposed to ergon), story, tale.⁵ Beginning with Pindar, however, it takes on a technical value. Sometimes it means “fable, story, apologue,⁶ allegory, fiction used for instruction”⁷—and is thus often synonymous with dupery, illusion, the unreal,⁸ as opposed to a veracious account (logos), one that is credible (pistos), true (alethes).⁹ Sometimes it means myth proper, i.e., the whole collection of legends or traditional stories concerning the gods, the demigods, or events before the first known historical facts: mythology or cosmogony.¹⁰ In the beginning, after all, in Greece as in the ancient orient, myth and cult were closely linked; no people on the earth, except the Hindus, had a world so rich in myths as the Greeks,¹¹ especially with Homer, who was supposed to have taught in myth concerning all religious, moral, and human truths. But how to “add faith to Homer and his fables” (Epictetus 3.24.18) when the gods sleep, lose their temper, lie, become frightened, commit multiple adulteries and rapes and other outrageous acts? Furthermore, beginning in the sixth century BC with Xenophon of Colophon and Theagenes of Rhegium, then with Plato and the Pythagoreans, in reaction to the traditional religion, a theological reinterpretation of the myths was elaborated:¹² thanks to allegory, the immoral legends were transposed and purified to yield a deeper, covert meaning (hyponoia), an idea or reality that was not accessible or utterable in straightforward language.¹³ Thus myth becomes a didactic literary genre, a form of exposition, a means of demonstration that expresses reality in a pictorial form¹⁴—what the rhetor Heraclitus calls a “philosophy in symbols.”¹⁵ It matters little that “these things never happened but always are so,”¹⁶ and it is a “pious investigation”¹⁷ to discern beneath the material component and the symbolic expression a certain religious truth or moral idea. The heterodox Ephesians and Cretans, trained according to the currently fashionable principles of hermeneutics, must have applied this method of symbolic and allegorical interpretation to the Bible, producing all kinds of intellectual fantasies.

But the pagans themselves denounced the fallacious character of the legendary accounts: “Those who risk speaking or writing about those countries must be seen as ignorant or as spinners of tales” (agnoein kai mythous diatithesthai, Polybius 3.38). Strabo, contrasting history against myth and lies (5.1.9; 9.3.11–12), mentions that honors supposedly awarded at Rhea and on Crete belong to the realm of legend and not history (tous de legontas mythologeion mallon e historein, 10.3.20). With respect to the stories about the Amazons: “In the case of all the other peoples, myth and history each have their own domain and are cleanly separated: myth is the name given all that is ancient, fabulous, or outlandish; while history is the label for the truth, whether the event be ancient or recent, and with rare exceptions does not admit anything fantastic” (11.5.3; cf. 11.6.2, philomythia = love of legends). With regard to the production of electrum, Diodorus Siculus observes: “A number of the ancients recorded fables (mythous) that we do not believe at all and which are refuted by the facts. . . . We must hold fast to historical truth” (prosekteon tais alethinais historiais, 5.23; cf. 4.8.4; 4.77.9). Plutarch contrasts tales and fictions (mythode kai plasmatian) to a true account (alethei logo, Cam. 22.3; cf. De glor. Ath. 4: ho de mythos einai bouletai logos pseudes eoikos alethino; Art. 1: mython apithanon kai paraphoron . . . pantodapen pylaian; De def. or. 46.1; De Pyth. or. 2); “The terra firma of history rests on facts; I could with justification speak on more remote ages. Beyond that lies the land of marvels and tragic legends, populated by poets and mythologers, and there one finds no proof, no certitude” (Thes. 1.2–3). In De Is. et Os. 20, Plutarch notes that this history of the two divinities “in no way resembles the contradictory fables, the vain fictions that the poets and mythologers, after the fashion of spiders weaving their webs, spin out from themselves and build upon with no foundation . . . despite the difficulties that myth presents when it narrates the woes suffered by the gods.”¹⁸ “It is history that separates the truth from legend” (tou mythodous apekrithe to alethes, De Pyth. or. 24). Mythos is “a useless fabrication” (plasma kenon, De def. or. 46).

This negative evaluation of the mythoi is shared by Jewish authors,¹⁹ notably by Philo, who calls them surmises (Post. Cain 2), contradictory fabrications (Sacr. Abel and Cain 13), fiction (Decalogue 56). He constantly writes of the mythou plasma and the commandment to flee it (Rewards 8), because this counterfeit is opposed to the truth (Flight 42); “they left behind mythical fictions to stand in the clarity of the truth” (ibid. 102); “the life devoted to unreason is fiction and myth . . . a life submerged in lies, always missing the truth” (Prelim. Stud. 61; cf. Migr. Abr. 76); “shameless Pleasure, creator of prodigies and spinner of tales, decked out like a tragic actor” (Sacr. Abel and Cain 28) is contrasted with austere—but true—Virtue. “Those who pursue fictionless truth rather than imaginary myths” (Rewards 162; cf. Heir 228); “going to dwell with Truth and the veneration of the only venerable Being, far from mythical fictions” (Spec. Laws 4.178; cf. 1.43). “Among lawmakers, some prescribed, baldly and in the open, that which was just in their eyes; others encompassed their thought in superfluous swelling, deceived the multitudes with clouds of illusion, masking the truth under mythic fictions . . . a lying strategy, full of fraud” (Creation 1–2; cf. 157). “Perhaps someone thinks that the lawmaker (Moses) is alluding to the fables of the poets concerning giants (cf. Gen 6:4), but tale-weaving is entirely foreign to him, and he walks in the footsteps of truth itself” (Giants 58); “let no one see a myth in his words” (ibid. 7; cf. Husbandry 97).

The rejection of myth in the Pastorals and in 2Pet 1:16 is along the same lines. We must insist on the definition given by Suda: “myth: a false account posing as the truth” (mythos: logos pseudēs eikonizōn ten aletheian). Dreamed-up tales, fables that are invented and hence unreal, are opposed to the logoi of the true faith (1Tim 4:6; 2Tim 4:4).

¹ Sir 20:19. The use of this word in Wis 17:4 is an error in A for μυχός. The μυθολόγοι of Bar 3:23 are fortune-tellers or interpreters of parables.

² Cf. Josephus, Ant., Proem. 4, μύθοις ε—ξακολουθήσαντες; P. Berlin 7927, 8: μυθολογίαις ε—πακολουθοῦσι; Xenophon, Cyn. 13.5: “words not facily thrown together” (τοι—ς ὀνόμασιν οὐ σεσοφισμένοις); Ps.-Phocylides 130, βέλτερος ἀπλήεντος ἔφω σεσοφισμένος ἀνήρ (ed. Young, 1961, p. 106); Philo, Worse Attacks Better 1, 38, 41–42, 72–73.

³ The apostles, witnessing facts and passing on that which they have seen and heard, are contrasted with speculators who elaborate unfounded, entirely fabricated doctrines (cf. J. Munck, “The New Testament and Gnosticism,” in Essays in Honor of O. A. Piper, London, 1962, pp. 224–238; G. Lindeskog, “Empirie und Glaube im Neuen Testament,” in Verborum Veritas: Festschrift G. Stählin, Wuppertal, 1970, pp. 294ff.). Commenting on Gen 19:26, Philo affirms: “Moses did not invent a fable” (Flight 121); and his editor, E. Starobinski-Safran (Paris, 1970, p. 284) dedicates a note to this point, demonstrating that “in the eyes of the Alexandrian, fable-making is entirely foreign to the Scriptures”; cf. Conf. Tongues 2–14 (cf. G. Dellings, Studien zum Neuen Testament und zum hellenistischen Judentum, Göttingen, 1970, pp. 114–129); this was already the conclusion of Ep. Arist. 168.

⁴ The psychologist C. G. Jung extended the concept of the “mythic” to embrace all religions, especially Christianity (cf. S. Bartinas, “Mitos astrales en la Biblia,” in Estudios Eclesiásticos, 1968, pp. 327–344; G. Petzke, Die Traditionen über Apollonius von Tyana und das Neue Testament, pp.

196ff.). “Modern biblical criticism incorporates the Bible and the biblical world under the category of myth . . . because myth is the ancient world’s universal and autonomous mode of thought, representation, and expression” (H. Fries, “Le Mythe et la révélation,” in Questions théologiques aujourd’hui, Paris, 1964, vol. 1, pp. 17–18). See E. Castelli, Mythe et foi, Paris, 1966 (with the revisions of J. P. Audet, in RB, 1967, pp. 438ff.); P. Barthel, Interprétation du langage et théologie biblique, 2d ed., Leiden, 1967; L. Malevez, Le Message chrétien et le mythe, Brussels-Bruges-Paris, 1954.

⁵ In Homer, Plato, Aeschylus, Isocrates, Euripides; Ep. Arist. 137; Philo, To Gaius 112; Plant. 130; Worse Attacks Better 178; P.Oxy. 2192, 36; P.Mur. 109, 3; etc. Cf. H. Fournier, Les Verbes “dire,” pp. 49, 215ff. E. Cassirer, Sprache und Mythos, Leipzig, 1925; O. Cullmann, “Le Mythe dans les écrits du N.T.,” in Numen, 1954, vol. 1, pp. 120–135 (reprinted in Etudes de théologie biblique, Neuchâtel, 1968, pp. 132ff.); H. Riesenfeld, “The Mythological Background of New Testament Christology,” in W. D. Davies, D. Daube, Essays on the Background of the New Testament and Its Eschatology, pp. 81–95; C. K. Barrett, “Myth and the New Testament,” in ExpT, vol. 68, 1957, pp. 345–348, 359–362; W. Aly, “Mythos,” in PW, vol. 16, 1374–1403; Stählin, in TDNT, vol. 4, pp. 762–795; P. Grelot, La Bible, Parole de Dieu, Paris-Tournai, 1965, pp. 124ff.

⁶ Dio Cassius calls the apologue of Menenius Agrippa a μῦθος (1.33). Μῦθοι are especially old stories (cf. Plato, Resp. 10.621 b; Leg. 7.804 e: μύθους παλαιούς; 9.865 d: ἀρχαίοι μύθοι) that women tell children (Resp. 1.350 e; 2.377 a; Grg. 527 a); Aristotle, HA 8.24.605a5: “The stories in circulation . . . are above all fables dreamed up by women and magicians”; Aristophanes, Lys. 781, 805; Polybius 12.24.5: “In his own explanations, he is full of visions, prodigies, and unbelievable fables (μύθων ἀπιθάνων); is a word, of base superstition and womanish fantasies”; Achilles Tatius, Leuc. et Clit. 1.8.4; Plutarch, with respect to the lives of separated souls on the moon: “it is good to tell to women, because it is romantic” (διὰ τὸ μυθω—δες, De aud. poet. 16 e); Strabo 1.3.2; Numenius: “These marvelous things sometimes happen to people. So are we told not only by those who may be suspected of inventing fables (μυθοποιοῦντες), but also those who have given long proof of their philosophical rigor . . .” (frag. 29; ed. E. des Places, p. 80). Galen heaps his scorn on a Pamphilus who prescribes certain incantations during the gathering of medicinal herbs: “This person has been taken in by old wives’ tales and the magical practices of Egyptian drivelers” (Galen, De simpl. medicam. temp., 6, proem.; in C. G. Kühn, Medicorum Graecorum Opera, vol. 11, p. 972).

⁷ Fables are invented or used by speechmakers and lawyers (Lycurgus, Leoc. 95; Seneca, Ben. 1.4.6); fable is a rhetorical figure related to historical examples and parables, used to explain or defend a cause (Aristotle, Rh. 2.20.1393a-b; cf. I. Heinemann, “Zur griechischen Allegoristik,” in Mnemosyne, 1949, pp. 9ff.; A. Garcia Calvo, “Dialectica y mito,” in Acta del Congreso español de estudios clásicos, Madrid, 1964, pp.300–317; J. G. Griffiths, “The Tradition of Allegory in Egypt,” in Religions en Egyptehellénistique et romaine [Strasbourg colloquium, 1967], Paris, 1969, pp. 45–57). On the meaning of μῦθος in Lucian—the telling of an anecdote, a historical vignette, a stylistic device learned from rhetoric—cf. J. Bompaigne, Lucien écrivain, p.444, n. 4.

⁸ Demosthenes, C. Poly. 50.40: “words in the air”; Aristophanes, Vesp. 566; Plutarch, Thes. 28.1; Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 76; Prelim. Stud. 62: “Esau, the opposite of Jacob in every way, is . . . the companion of all that is fiction, fabrication, mythical nonsense, or rather theater and myth personified.”

⁹ Theognis 2.1035–1036; Pindar, Nem. 7.22–23; Ol. 1.28–29: “sometimes the sayings of mortals leave truth behind; fables ornamented with clever fictions deceive us” (ε-ξαπατω-ντι μῦθοι); Plato, Phdr. 229 c –230 a; Aristotle, Poet. 9.1451a-b; HA 6.31; Euripides, Cyc. 376; Sophocles, Trach. 66; Isocrates, Panath. 12.1; Callimachus, Epigr. 13; Strabo 5.32: τὰ μὲν μυθώδη, τὰ δ ε-γγυτέρω πίστεως; “Those who have spread this idea have sacrificed to mythological invention rather than to history” (10.3.20; cf. 10.3.22, 23); Polybius 3.38.3: “Those who speak or write of it know nothing about it and only retell fables”; Plutarch hesitates to retell the myth of Thespesios, thinking that his account (λόγος) could be taken for a fable (μῦθος) (Plutarch, De sera 561 B); “this narrative has more in common with fable . . . than with sensible words (λόγοις)” (De gen. 21); Maximus of Tyre 10.1: εἶτε μῦθος εἶτε καὶ ἀληθῆς λόγος. Cf. W. Nestle, Vom Mythos zum Logos, 2d ed., Stuttgart, 1942.

¹⁰ P.Oxy. 1381, 172: τὸν τῆς κοσμοποιΐας . . . μῦθων; Cornutus, Theol. Graec. 8: “what the learned priests tell of the ancient stories” (μύθω τω-ν παλαιω-ν); cf. Plato, Leg. 9.872 d–e; Aristotle, Metaph. 1.2; 11.8; A. and E. Bernand, Memnon, n. 29, 4; 36, 4; 101, 4; R. Follet, “Mystères,” in DBSup, vol. 6, pp. 3–10; J. Henninger, H. Cazelles, R. Marle, “Mythe,” ibid. pp. 225–267.

¹¹ Cf. A. H. Krappe, Mythologie universelle, Paris, 1930; M. P. Nilsson, “Mythologie,” in Histoire générale des religions: Grèce, ed. M. Gorce, R. Mortier, 5 vols., Paris, Quillet, 1944, pp. 151–289. J. Maier, Vom Kultus zur Gnosis, Salzburg, 1964.

¹² Plato (Resp. 2.377. c–e; 378 d; Tim. 26 e) expels the μυθοποιοί from his city (Resp. 3.398 a; Leg. 12.941 a–d); “Plato declares that no poet must be allowed in the republic, and he excludes Homer . . . to keep the true conception of God from being obscured by his fables” (Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.256). “Vult (Chrysippus) Orphei, Musaei, Hesiodi, Homerique fabellas accommodare ad ea quae ipse in primo libro de dis immortalibus dixerat, ut etiam veterrimi poetae, qui haec ne suspicite quidem sunt, Stoici fuisse videantur” (“[Chrysippus] wishes to accommodate the tales of Orpheus, Musaeus, Hesiod, and Homer to the things that he himself has said in his first book on the immortal gods, so that even the oldest poets, although they had no inkling of these things, might seem to have been Stoics,” Cicero, Nat. D. 1.15). Cf. P. Decharme, La critique des traditions religieuses chez les Grecs, Paris, 1904; A. Delatte, Etudes sur la littérature pythagoricienne, 1915, pp. 109ff.; F. C. Grant, Hellenistic Religions, New York, 1953, pp. 71ff.; R. Pettazzoni, La Religion dans la Grèce antique, Paris, 1953, pp. 180, 236ff.; J. Carcopino, De Pythagore aux apôtres, Paris, 1956, pp. 24–26, 79–85; J. Pépin, Mythe et allégorie, Paris, 1958, pp. 190ff.; above all F. Buffière, Les Mythes d’Homère et la pensée grecque, Paris, 1956.

¹³ “Who then dares call Homer impious?” asks the rhetor Heraclitus (All. 3.1); “A colossal suit has been filed against Homer for his irreverence toward the gods. He is all impiety, if nothing in him is allegory. Sacrilegious stories (ι–ερόσυλοι μύθοι), the delirious fabric of blasphemous follies is unfurled across the two poems” (1.1–2); “To avert this impiety, there is only one recourse: show that the (Homeric) story is an allegory” (ἡλληγορημένον τὸν μῦθον, 22.1; cf. 24.2, 8; 70.13). “If there are people who, in their ignorance, do not understand Homer’s allegorical language, who have not been able to penetrate the hidden reaches of his wisdom, who cannot recognize the truth and reject it; who do not understand the philosophical meaning of a myth and hold on to the fictitious appearances, let these people stay clear of our path” (3.2; cf. 53.2); cf. Philo, Contemp. Life 28; Plutarch, De Is. et Os. 20. 68; Quaest. conv. 1.1, 3; De aud. poet. 4.

¹⁴ Plato, Prt. 320 c; Tim. 29 d. “Λόγος is, properly speaking, ἀ–λήθεια, the unveiling, the exposing of the reality that is imagined and obscurely glimpsed in μῦθος” (F. Romano, Logos e mitos nella psicologia de Platone, Padua, 1964, p. 233). J. Bompaire, Lucien écrivain (Lucien écrivain, pp. 191–200) has demonstrated the existence of a school mythology, a reflection of the poetic mythology, as attested, for example, by the treatise of Ps.-Menander, Περὶ ε–πιδεικτικῶ–ν, which recommends the use of myths on multiple occasions. If the sophists show a particular taste for these legends, they are being faithful to a rhetorical tradition.

¹⁵ All. 75.1: συμβολικῶς ἐφιλοσόφησε. Y. Vernière, Symboles et mythes dans la pensée de Plutarque, Paris, 1977.

¹⁶ Sallustius, De Deis et Mundo 4.9: ταῦτα δὲ ἐγένετο μὲν οὐδέποτε, ἔστι δὲ ἀεὶ.

¹⁷ Heraclitus, All. 68.9: εὐσεβῶς ἐρευνα—ν.

¹⁸ Cf. Sallustius, De Deis et Mundo 3.1ff. Corp. Herm. 23.50: “an incredible fable that there existed a Chaos”; SB 8217, 4: ἔπλασε μῦθον (second century AD). For Lucian, myths are lies (Lucian, JConf. 1–2; JTr. 40); cf. H. D. Betz, Lukian von Samosata und das Neue Testament, p. 24; K. Barwick, “Die Gliederung der Narratio in der rhetorischen Theorie,” in Hermes, 1928, pp. 270ff.

¹⁹ Ep. Arist. 322 concludes its exposé: I think that his account will interest you more than the books of the mythologers, τὰ τῶν μυθολόγων βιβλία; cf. in Eusebius: ἔκτοποι μυθολογίαι = outlandish mythical tales (Praep. Evang. 1.9.17; 1.10.40–41), fictions, ἀναπλάσματα (1.9.18; 1.10.55).

μυκτηρίζω, ἐκμυκτηρίζω

mykterizo, ekmykterizo, to turn up one’s nose at, ridicule, mock

mykterizo, S 3456; TDNT 4.796; EDNT 2.445; MM 419; L&N 33.409; BAGD 529 | ekmykterizo, S 1592; TDNT 4.796–799; EDNT 1.419; L&N 33.409; BAGD 243

Translating Gal 6:7 “God is not mocked” is accurate—even though the context means “God is not trifled with, is not duped”¹—but does not convey the nuance or ridicule and humiliation, disdain, scoffing insult, which would be better conveyed by our expressions “thumb one’s nose at” or “hold up to ridicule.”

Derived from mykter, “nostril,” these verbs mean “turn up or wrinkle the nose” as a sign of mockery or scorn.² Mockery and derision are expressed by words or deeds, by tricks of facial expression: laughing and making faces, ridiculing someone, letting him know how little one thinks of him, thus reducing him to a sort of psychological, moral, or social nothing. This amounts to an assault on that person’s dignity, on the right that everyone has to respect from others, on the basic need to be thought well of by others, which is an important element in human happiness.³

In this farcical mimicry that constitutes mockery of another person, the ancients attached a particular sense of scorn or disgust to wrinkles (Latin ruga) of the nose: Naso rugato; ⁴ Horace, Sat. 1.6.5–6: “You do not turn up your nose at men of low birth” (“[non] naso suspendis adunco ignotos”); Sat. 2.8.64: Balatron turns up his nose with each word (“suspendens omnia naso”); Persius, Sat. 3.87: “These things make the public and the brawny youths wrinkle their noses and double up with bursts of laughter”; 5.91: “Let anger fall from your nose and a wrinkled grimace” (“ira cadat naso rugosaque sanna”); Quintilian, Inst. 11.3.80: “Scorn, contempt, and loathing are usually signaled with the nose” (“Naribus . . . derisus, contemptus, fastidium significari solet”).

In the LXX, mykterizo and ekmykterizo sometimes translate the Hebrew hatal, “mock,” as with Elijah’s sarcasm at the expense of the prophets of Baal (1Kgs 8:27), but most often they translate la’ag, which has connotations of shame and ridicule (Jer 20:7; Ezek 23:32; Job 22:19; 34:7; Ps 2:4; 44:14; 80:7). In Neh 3:36 and Prov 11:12; 15:20; 23:9, the verb bûz emphasizes the scorn or shame endured, like na’as (Prov 15:5). To be the butt of sarcasm⁵ is bitter (2Macc 7:39). When scorning a neighbor and letting him know that one has a low opinion of him, one often shakes one’s head to express mockery (2Kgs 19:21 = Isa 37:22; Ps 22:8; cf. Job 6:4), grinds one’s teeth (Ps 35:16), or even spits: Nicanor, in mocking the priests and treating them with scorn, went so far as to defile them (1Macc 7:34). In the NT, ekmykterizo is used for the Pharisees and officials who turn up their nose at Jesus (Luke 16:14; 23:35); for scornful laughter (katagelao, 8:53); for making sport of him (empaizo, Matt 27:29, 31, 41; Luke 23:36). They abuse him (oneidizo, Matt 27:44), insult him (blasphemeo, Luke 22:65), they shake their heads (Matt 27:40), just as the apostles would be derided (chleuazo, Acts 17:32; diachleuazo, 2:13).

To laugh at God and scorn him is to attack his transcendence, for he is the very essence of perfection; hence it is a blasphemy radically opposed to faith.

μυκτηρίζω, ε—κμυκτηρίζω

mykterizo, ekmykterizo, to turn up one’s nose at, ridicule, mock

mykterizo, S 3456; TDNT 4.796; EDNT 2.445; MM 419; L&N 33.409; BAGD 529 | ekmykterizo, S 1592; TDNT 4.796–799; EDNT 1.419; L&N 33.409; BAGD 243

Translating Gal 6:7 “God is not mocked” is accurate—even though the context means “God is not trifled with, is not duped”⁶—but does not convey the nuance or ridicule and humiliation, disdain, scoffing insult, which would be better conveyed by our expressions “thumb one’s nose at” or “hold up to ridicule.”

Derived from mykter, “nostril,” these verbs mean “turn up or wrinkle the nose” as a sign of mockery or scorn.⁷ Mockery and derision are expressed by words or deeds, by tricks of facial expression: laughing and making faces, ridiculing someone, letting him know how little one thinks of him, thus reducing him to a sort of psychological, moral, or social nothing. This amounts to an assault on that person’s dignity, on the right that everyone has to respect from others, on the basic need to be thought well of by others, which is an important element in human happiness.⁸

In this farcical mimicry that constitutes mockery of another person, the ancients attached a particular sense of scorn or disgust to wrinkles (Latin ruga) of the nose: Naso rugato;⁹ Horace, Sat. 1.6.5–6: “You do not turn up your nose at men of low birth” (“[non] naso suspendis adunco ignotos”); Sat. 2.8.64: Balatron turns up his nose with each word (“suspendens omnia naso”); Persius, Sat. 3.87: “These things make the public and the brawny youths wrinkle their noses and double up with bursts of laughter”; 5.91: “Let anger fall from your nose and a wrinkled grimace” (“ira cadat naso rugosaque sanna”); Quintilian, Inst. 11.3.80: “Scorn, contempt, and loathing are usually signaled with the nose” (“Naribus . . . derisus, contemptus, fastidium significari solet”).

In the LXX, mykterizo and ekmykterizo sometimes translate the Hebrew hatal, “mock,” as with Elijah’s sarcasm at the expense of the prophets of Baal (1Kgs 8:27), but most often they translate la’ag, which has connotations of shame and ridicule (Jer 20:7; Ezek 23:32; Job 22:19; 34:7; Ps 2:4; 44:14; 80:7). In Neh 3:36 and Prov 11:12; 15:20; 23:9, the verb bûz emphasizes the scorn or shame endured, like na’as (Prov 15:5). To be the butt of sarcasm¹⁰ is bitter (2Macc 7:39). When scorning a neighbor and letting him know that one has a low opinion of him, one often shakes one’s head to express mockery (2Kgs 19:21 = Isa 37:22; Ps 22:8; cf. Job 6:4), grinds one’s teeth (Ps 35:16), or even spits: Nicanor, in mocking the priests and treating them with scorn, went so far as to defile them (1Macc 7:34). In the NT, ekmykterizo is used for the Pharisees and officials who turn up their nose at Jesus (Luke 16:14; 23:35); for scornful laughter (katagelao, 8:53); for making sport of him (empaizo, Matt 27:29, 31, 41; Luke 23:36). They abuse him (oneidizo, Matt 27:44), insult him (blasphemeo, Luke 22:65), they shake their heads (Matt 27:40), just as the apostles would be derided (chleuazo, Acts 17:32; diachleuazo, 2:13).

To laugh at God and scorn him is to attack his transcendence, for he is the very essence of perfection; hence it is a blasphemy radically opposed to faith.

¹ M. J. Lagrange, Galates, p. 159; E. D. Burton, Epistle to the Galatians, p. 340.

² In the sense of turn in another direction, in Hippocrates, Epid. 7.123: “nature, having burst in, turned aside (ἀπεστράφη); having turned aside, there was a discharge from the nose (ε—μυκτήρισην).” Cf. Julius Pollux, Onom. 2.78, on diseases of the nose, head colds, polyps, etc., cites Lysias: μυκτηρίζειν δὲ, Λυσίας, καὶ τὸ μυσάττεσθαι, ἀπὸ τοῦ μυκτῆρι ε—νδείκνυσθαι τὸ δυσχεραίνειν. At the beginning of the second century BC, in a letter severely reprimanding a subordinate who risks breaking his neck by playing the fool: If he continues thus, they will mock him, ὑπὸ τούτων μυκτηρίζεσθαι (P. Tebt. 758, 11). Caesar Augustus writes to Livy concerning Claudius: “We must not expose ourselves along with him to the mockery of people who are accustomed to mock and ridicule such things” (τὰ τοιαῦτα σκώπτειν καὶ μυκτηρίζειν εἰ—ωθόσιν, Suetonius, Claud. 4).

³ Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 1.3.1095a22, b24ff.; 4.7.1123b1ff.; Rh. 1.5.1360b–1361a; 1.11.1371a; cf. C. Spicq, Péchés d’injustice, pp. 374ff.

⁴ The nose is the locus of mocking, scorn, and anger. “The arrogance of the wicked is expressed by . . . a turning up of the nose in Ps 10:4” (P. Dhorme, Emploi métaphorique, p. 81). “Often the nostrils are somewhat contracted, as if to tighten their openings. At the same time a slight whistling is produced, a brief inhalation. These actions are the same as those produced by the perception of a disagreeable odor that we want to avoid or be rid of. . . . We seem to want to convey to the person whom we scorn that he smells bad” (G. Dumas, Nouveau traité de psychologie, Paris, 1933, vol. 3, pp. 310–311).

⁵ Μυκτηρισμός; cf. the references to the word in D. B. Durham, Vocabulary of Menander, p. 80.

⁶ M. J. Lagrange, Galates, p. 159; E. D. Burton, Epistle to the Galatians, p. 340.

⁷ In the sense of turn in another direction, in Hippocrates, Epid. 7.123: “nature, having burst in, turned aside (ἀπεστράφη); having turned aside, there was a discharge from the nose (ε—μυκτήρισην).” Cf. Julius Pollux, Onom. 2.78, on diseases of the nose, head colds, polyps, etc., cites Lysias: μυκτηρίζειν δὲ, Λυσίας, καὶ τὸ μυσάττεσθαι, ἀπὸ τοῦ μυκτῆρι ε—νδείκνυσθαι τὸ δυσχεραίνειν. At the beginning of the second century BC, in a letter severely reprimanding a subordinate who risks breaking his neck by playing the fool: If he continues thus, they will mock him, ὑπὸ τούτων μυκτηρίζεσθαι (P. Tebt. 758, 11). Caesar Augustus writes to Livy concerning Claudius: “We must not expose ourselves along with him to the mockery of people who are accustomed to mock and ridicule such things” (τὰ τοιαῦτα σκώπτειν καὶ μυκτηρίζειν εἰ—ωθόσιν, Suetonius, Claud. 4).

⁸ Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 1.3.1095a22, b24ff.; 4.7.1123b1ff.; Rh. 1.5.1360b–1361a; 1.11.1371a; cf. C. Spicq, Péchés d’injustice, pp. 374ff.

⁹ The nose is the locus of mocking, scorn, and anger. “The arrogance of the wicked is expressed by . . . a turning up of the nose in Ps 10:4” (P. Dhorme, Emploi métaphorique, p. 81). “Often the nostrils are somewhat contracted, as if to tighten their openings. At the same time a slight whistling is produced, a brief inhalation. These actions are the same as those produced by the perception of a disagreeable odor that we want to avoid or be rid of. . . . We seem to want to convey to the person whom we scorn that he smells bad” (G. Dumas, Nouveau traité de psychologie, Paris, 1933, vol. 3, pp. 310–311).

¹⁰ Μυκτηρισμός; cf. the references to the word in D. B. Durham, Vocabulary of Menander, p. 80.

μωραίνω, μωρία, μωρολογία, μωρός

moraino, to be dazed, mad, foolish, act stupidly; lose savor, become insipid; moria, disorder, folly, nonsense; morologia, foolish talk, nonsense; moros, foolish, dull, insipid

moraino, S 3471; TDNT 4.832–847; EDNT 2.449–450; NIDNTT 3.1023, 1025; L&N 32.59; BAGD 531 | moria, S 2472; TDNT 4.832–847; EDNT 2.449–450; NIDNTT 3.1023, 1025–1026; L&N 32.57; BAGD 531 | morologia, S 3473; TDNT 4.832–847; EDNT 2.450; NIDNTT 3.1026; MM 420; L&N 33.379; BAGD 531 | moros, S 3474; TDNT 4.832–847; EDNT 2.449–450; NIDNTT 3.1023–1026; MM 420–421; L&N 32.55, 32.58; BDF §§13, 263(4); BAGD 531

A denominative formed from moros, the verb moraino is sometimes intransitive (“be dazed, besotted, mad; to speak or act foolishly”), sometimes transitive (in the passive, “become mad”).¹ But since moros also has the meaning “dull, inert,”² “flat, insipid” (Dioscorides 4.19: rhixai geusameno morai), we can understand that the corresponding verb might mean “lose savor, become insipid.” Thus Jesus compares his disciples to a salt acting on humankind; they are intended to give it a new quality: “You are the salt of the earth, but if the salt becomes tasteless (ean de to halas moranthe), with what will it be salted? It is no longer good for anything other than being thrown out and trodden underfoot” (Matt 5:13). Salt has a double function: preserving and seasoning the foods to which it gives taste and savor. That is to say, “it has no worth apart from its action on other objects.”³ If it becomes tasteless,⁴ it loses its property⁵ and becomes analon, “saltless” (Mark 9:50), ceases to be salt; thenceforth it is unusable, because it is impossible to imagine what could be used to season it anew, a salt to salt it with.⁶ Thus the disciple—salt that ought to add seasoning—if he loses the “virtue” of the gospel, is no longer good for anything.⁷ Certainly it is impossible to imagine “desalted” salt, but the aorist passive subjunctive moranthe is to be taken metaphorically as applying to disciples who are no longer worthwhile in the spiritual order; they are denatured or nonexistent, “nothings.”

This is a monstrous evolution. St. Paul denounces it from the other direction, in pagans or thinkers: the most cultivated of people have substituted for the worship of the true creator God the worship of human or animal images! Concerning this idolatrous perversion, he says, “Claiming to be wise, they became stupid” (phaskontes einai sophoi emoranthesen).⁸ Here the verb moraino has its LXX meaning, “be foolish, do something stupid” (Hebrew ba’ar); cf. “All men are beasts, lacking in knowledge.”⁹

This very pejorative meaning belongs to the adjective moros and the noun moria. The first means “blunted, dazed, stupid” in classical Greek¹⁰ and in Koine: “Was he so stupid that he did not understand that this way would lead to this end?” (Epictetus 2.2.16); “deceits of foolish words of ventriloquists.”¹¹ Moria similarly means disorder, extravagance, stupidity, nonsense. Herodotus 1.131: “The Persians accuse of folly those who erect statues of gods, temples, and altars”; 1.146: “It is nonsense to say that the Ionians of Asia are more Ionians than the other Ionians”; Plato, Leg. 7.818d: “It would be foolish to believe that these sciences are not necessary to those who seek understanding.”¹²

But in the LXX, moros has become a religious¹³ and wisdom adjective, especially in Ben Sirach, where the “foolish person” is especially one who lacks judgment (moros is synonymous with aphron and anous, Ps 49:11; and with asynetos, Ps 92:7), who is misguided and thinks only in insanities (Sir 16:23), is incapable of learning (21:14; 22:7, 10) because lacking intelligence (22:11) and memory. He is a weak mind (42:8), lacking character (22:18) and nobility (Isa 32:5), incapable of keeping a secret (Sir 8:17). So he must be avoided (4:27), because his speech is as stupid (20:16—“A fool says, ‘I have no friend’”; 19:11; 20:20) as it is irritating (21:16; 27:13); he speaks without thinking (21:26) and says nothing (33:5) even though he speaks up loudly (21:20) to set forth his nonsense (Isa 32:6). His conduct is all just as stupid (Sir 21:18); he makes insults (18:18) and knows no discretion (21:22). It is impossible to love him (20:13; 25:2), above all because he is a schismatic (50:26). According to the literal sense of the texts, the moros would be a fool, an uncouth being, lacking education and culture, with no discernment, circumspection, or wisdom, committing countless blunders. But this lack of intelligence is contrasted with the wisdom and “good sense” that are God’s gifts,¹⁴ so that the moros cannot discern God’s ways; he is lacking in spiritual sense and remains as it were in a stupor in the face of the revelation of the divine mysteries and the divine will.

Such is the meaning of moria, moros, moraino —whose crudity must be retained—in 1Cor 1:18-27: “The language of the cross is nonsense (moria) for those who are en route to perdition. . . . Has God not smitten the wisdom of the world with nonsense (emoranen)? . . . It pleased God, through the nonsense (dia tes morias) of preaching to save those who believe . . . a crucified Christ, nonsense (moria) to the Gentiles, but the power of God and the wisdom of God. . . . God’s nonsense (to moron) is wiser than men. . . .” Is there anything more absurd for a reasonable person to hear than a preacher’s declaration that a Jew who was poor, condemned to death by the highest political and religious authorities of his nation, was crucified like a slave? He is risen! This is the Son of God, and he has saved the world! The proclamation of this ignominy is not folly—it is nonsense.¹⁵ God’s making folly of the “wisdom of the world,” which wants the means to be proportional to the end, is what confirmed the vocation of the first Christians. God did not choose them from among the philosophers, the wealthy, the powerful, but from the small, the humble: “God chose the stupid things (ta mora) of the world to shame the wise” (1Cor 2:27). That means that people must believe, must give themselves over to God in adherence to mysteries that derail human logic and human good sense: “Let no one be deceived! If anyone believes that he is wise among you in this world, let him become stupid (moros) in order to become wise, for this world’s wisdom is stupidity (moria) with God.”¹⁶

There remain three NT texts where moros functions in accord with current usage without any theological meaning. The most trivial is the parable that is unfortunately called the parable of the Ten Virgins;¹⁷ it is simply a matter of young women of whom five were little twits (morai; Matt 25:2, 3, 8) and the others “sensible” (phronimoi). The most serious is that of the man who in anger calls his fellow a fool: more! This insult is punished by “the gehenna of fire,”¹⁸ because it is an expression of hatred, and “whoever hates his brother is a murderer” (1John 3:15). Finally, the Lord himself twice calls the scribes and Pharisees moroi kai typhloi (fools and blind, Matt 23:17) in denouncing their casuistry, which set the gold in the temple above the sanctuary itself—which is absurd.¹⁹

¹ Aristotle, HA 9.3.610b30: “goats (when grasped by the beard) halt as if dazed”; Eth. Nic. 7.6.1148b2, Satyros invoking his father as a god: “this was pure folly” (λίαν γὰρ ε—δόκει μωραίνειν); 2Sam 24:10, David, after ordering the numbering of the population, confessed, “I have behaved like a true fool, I have acted stupidly” (ε—μωράνθην σφόδρα, translating the niphal of the Hebrew sakal). Euripides, Med. 614: “If you refuse these offers, woman, you will be foolish” (μωρανει—ς); Andr. 674: “a wife committing folly (μωραίνουσαν) in his halls”; Aeschylus, Pers. 719: “the wretch attempted this folly”; Cherub. 116: “the artisan of lies, the bearer of illusions, the mad one (ὁ μωραίνων), shows himself to be the very opposite of saneness (ἄνους) in his delirium.” The only papyrological attestation is from the second century AD; a letter from a woman to her brother Apollonius, who is in poor health: οὐκ ἄγνοει—ς, πω—ς πάλιν ὁ μωρὸς διενοχλει— μοι χάριν τῆς μητρὸς αὐτοῦ μωραίνων καὶ οὐκ ἔχων σε τὸν ε—κτινάξοντα αὐτοῦ τὴν μωρίαν (P.Brem. 61, 27).

² Hippocrates, Genit. 2.1: “The nerves having become hard and inert (νεῦρα σκληρὰ καὶ μωρὰ) by obstruction, cannot be tender and relax”; Aristotle, HA 9.41.62816: among wasps at the approach of winter, “the workers seem sluggish” (μωροί).

³ M. J. Lagrange, Matthieu, on this text.

⁴ M. J. Lagrange (on this text) observes that “in Greek, as in Latin, σοφός, wise, is connected to the idea of flavor [insipidus and insipiens; cf. fatuus, tasteless and foolish; Hebrew tapel, tiplâh, tasteless and foolish, Job 1:22; 6:6; Lam 2:14] . . . Salt was first of all wisdom: if the truly wise lose the taste for divine things, how can it be restored to them? They cannot be salted, as is the case with foods; the question is how to restore to the salt its original vigor. St. Hilary noted that in reality salt does not become tasteless. This is true of very pure salt (sodium chloride), but commercial salt is weakened by humidity. Hence salt that has become tasteless has no more strength for anything: εἰ—ς οὐδὲν ἰ—σχύει (cf. Jer 31:14).”

⁵ E. H. Riesenfeld (“Salz als Katalysator und Antikatalysator,” in Die Naturwissenschaft, vol. 23, 1935, pp. 311–320; J. Schroeter, “Le Sel dans l’antiquité et dans la préhistoire,” in Revue Ciba, 1944, col. 1406–1412) claims that salt can really become tasteless. He mentions Arab butchers, who to stoke up the fire cover the bottoms of their ovens with sheets of salt, using dried camel and donkey manure for fuel. The salt sheets catalyze the combustion of these materials; but after several years, due to the effect of the heat, the small salt crystals are transformed by chemical reactions; rather than stirring up the flame, the salt hinders the fire. It is tasteless, so that there is nothing to do but throw it out, since it is no longer good for anything, even manure (cf. Pliny, HN 31.40: “Any field where there is salt is barren and produces nothing”); likewise L. Köhler, “Wo nun das Salz dumm wird,” in Kleine Lichter: Fünfzig Bibelstellen erklärt, Zurich, 1945, pp. 74–76; J. B. Bauer, “Quod si sal infatuatum fuerit,” in VD, 1951, pp. 228–230; R. De Langhe, “Judaïsme ou Hellénisme en rapport avec le Nouveau Testament,” in L’Attente du Messie (Recherches bibliques 1), Bruges, 1954, pp. 165ff. — It seems preferable to think of the salt of the Dead Sea, a mixture of pure salt, lime, and other elements. When it rains, the salt dissolves, and the solid residue is then salt only in name (O. Cullmann, “Que signifie le sel dans la parabole de Jésus?” in RHPR, 1957, pp. 36–43); cf. R. Schnackenburg, “Irh seid das Salz der Erde, das Licht der Welt: Zu Matthäus V, 13–16,” in Mélanges Tisserant, pp. 365–387; G. Bertram, “μωρός,” in TDNT, vol. 4, pp. 832–847.

⁶ Matt 5:13—ε—ν τίνι ἀλισθήσεται; Mark 9:50—ε—ν τίνι αὐτὸ ἀρτύσετε; Luke 14:35—ε—ν τίνι ἀρτυθήσεται; cf. L. Vaganay, “‘Car chacun doit être salé au feu’ (Marc, IX, 49),” in Mémorial J. Chaine, Lyon, 1950, pp. 367–372. M. Black (Aramaic Approach, pp. 166ff.) compares the Babylonian Talmud: “Salt, if it become ‘putrid’ (seri), wherewith shall it be salted?” (b. Bek. 8b), which could be a well-known saying; cf. Pliny, HN 31.41: “rain makes salt milder.” F. Perles, “La Parabole du sel sourd,” in REJ, 1926, pp. 122–123.

⁷ “The salt is thrown out, according to the everything-in-the-street law, which was the principle of garbage disposal in the ancient Orient. Understand that the disciple will be excluded from Jesus’ following . . . will be trodden underfoot; an image of the scorn—even on the part of humans—that is the lot of disciples who have fallen away from their fervor” (M. J. Lagrange).

⁸ Rom 1:22 (E. Klostermann, “Die adäquate Vergeltung in Rom. I, 22–31,” in ZNW, 1933, pp. 1–6; S. Lyonnet, “Notes sur l’exégèse de l’Épître aux Romains,” in Bib, 1957, pp. 35ff. J. Jeremias, Abba, pp. 290–292). Cf. P.Cair.Zen. 59534, 49: ἵνα δοκῆ μωρὸς εἶναι.

⁹ Jer 10:14; cf. 51:17; Isa 19:11—“The princes of Tanis are fools”; 44:25—“I reduce their knowledge to folly”; Sir 23:14—“Remember your father and your mother . . . lest you behave as a fool.”

¹⁰ Regarding persons: “begin by knowing before saying that I am either sensible or mad” (ἢ φρονούσαν ἢ μώραν, Sophocles, El. 890); “O great fools (ὦ πλει—στα μω—ροι), so you have lost your heads (φρηνω—ν τετώμενοι)” (El. 1326); “He speaks like the fool that he is” (Euripides, Bacch. 369); regarding things: “Could I know that you speak only foolishness?” (Sophocles, OT 433); “You seem quite naive” (Sophocles, Aj. 594); “It is not fitting that you should speak folly” (Euripides, Heracl. 682). Cf. the substantive τὸ μω—ρον, “the folly of love” (Euripides, Hipp. 966).

¹¹ Sib. Or. 3.226; cf. P.Tebt. 750, 20: “If they think that Petosiris and his brothers will look after the animals, they are crazy” (second century BC); 278, 35; P.Ross.Georg. III, 31, 2, μωροὶ ἄνθρωποι εἰ—σιν; SB 9549, col. I, 5; 7655, 22: οὐδὲν τω—ν λεχθέντων ὑμι—ν ε—στὶν ἀληθὲς πλὴν ὡς μω—ρος καὶ παιδίον καὶ ἀνόητος; P.Berlin 16336 (in C. Austin, Comicorum Graecorum Fragmenta, n. 280, 4: μὴ δὴ με μω—ρον ὄντα; third century AD).

¹² Aeschylus, Ag. 1670: “You will pay me dearly for today’s folly”; Euripides, Hipp. 644: “The resourceless woman is kept from folly by the limits of her wits”; Thucydides 5.41: “The Lacedaemonians found this to be folly”; Josephus, Ant. 17.209: “foolish demands”; Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.70: the faculties of perception without intelligence “are caught in the act of folly and stupidity”; Unchang. God 164: prudence (φρόνησις) is between wiliness (πανουργία) and naivete (μωρία); Philo, Sobr. 11: “Through folly and unreason (μωρία καὶ ἀνοία) adults often fail in the responsibilities imposed by the accomplishment of an upright life”; SB 10773, 8: πάμπολλα γὰρ μωρὰ ε—ποίησα καὶ οὐκ ε—νόησα (letter in the fifth century); P.Mich. 530, 25: “It would be nonsense (μηδεμίαν μορίαν, sic) for you to affirm under pretext . . .”; P.Vindob.Sal. 22, 7: τὴν μωρίαν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου (= arrogance). In the LXX, two occurrences of moria: “Better a man who hides his folly than a man who hides his wisdom” (Sir 20:31; cf. 51:15).

¹³ Deut 32:6—“Is that how you will pay back Yahweh, you stupid and senseless people” (λαὸς μωρός [Hebrew nabal] καὶ οὐχὶ σοφός, quoted by Philo, Sobr. 10). Cf. Ps 94:8—“Understand then, you senseless ones among the people, and you fools, when will you come to your senses?”; Sus 48: “Are you so foolish, sons of Israel?”; it is absurd to condemn without having exercised judgment. Cf. W. Caspari, “Über den biblischen Begriff der Torheit,” in NKZ, 1928, pp. 668–695. — Μωρολογία is a sin in speech: “Profane talk (αι—σχρότης), nonsense (μωρολογία, Latin stultiloquium), jokes (εὐτραπελία) are not fitting” (Eph 5:4). Buffoonery was especially in vogue at Ephesus (Plautus, Mil. Glor. 3.1), but μωρολογία is denounced as a vice of the garrulous person. Aristotle, HA 1.11.492a: “Large ears show foolishness and verbosity”; Plutarch, De garr. 4.504 b: “Philosophers define drunkenness as folly spouted by a drunkard”; Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.115: “Apion overburdens the pack-ass, that is, himself, with folly and lies.”

¹⁴ Neh 9:20; Job 32:8; Prov 2:1-6; Wis 8:21; Dan 2:21 (cf. C. Spicq, “La Vertu de prudence dans l’Ancien Testament,” in RB, 1933, pp. 1–24). In this sense, Jesus pronounces those people stupid who hear his words and do not put them into practice, like a person who builds his house on sand

(Matt 7:26). We may quote Rabbi Eleazar ben Azaria: “To what shall we compare a person who abounds more in knowledge than in works? To a tree with abundant branches and scanty roots: when the wind comes, it pulls it up and turns it over” (Pirque ‘Abot 3.17).

¹⁵ “These terms (moria, moraino) express not so much the notion of folly in terms of wild possession (which would be μανία, etc.) as they do the idea of stupidity, mindlessness, nonsense, silliness” (P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique, under moros); “What is μωρία? Something worse than a ‘folly’ that could appear as a grandiose rapture in its disorder; μωρός means first of all ‘dull’ or ‘flat,’ and the corresponding substantive means something poor, mean, the product of a weak imagination, in short, nonsense, stupid naivete, stupidity. . . . Μωροί are people who are scorned, who get no attention, rather than dangerous madmen who must be combated. . . . The gospel of the Crucified One was flimsy nonsense for those who thought that a new message of salvation should necessarily present itself as a new philosophy, . . . that considered stupid something that was beyond them” (E. B. Allo, Première Epître aux Corinthiens, p. 14). Cf. 1Cor 2:14—“The natural (NRSVmg) person (who does not understand the arguments of natural reason) does not receive the things of the Spirit of God; for him they are stupidity”; 4:10—“We are fools (moroi) because of Christ, but you are wise (φρόνιμοι) in Christ.” Cf. the Christian letter of the sixth century, τὰ γὰρ μωρὰ ἐ—ξελέξατο ὁ θεὸς ἵνα κατασχύνῃ (SB 11144, 3).

¹⁶ 1Tim 3:18-19; cf. 2Tim 2:23—“Have nothing to do with nonsensical and undisciplined arguments” (= Titus 3:9). This has to do with stupid, pseudo-theological speculations, representing the incompetence of nebulous, self-taught rhetors (Eph 4:14; cf. ἀπαίδευτος, 2Pet 2:16; P.Mert. 81, 11; Philo, Prelim. Stud. 88: ἀμαθίας καὶ ἀπαιδευσίας; Sir 51:23); these sophists teach things they know nothing about (1Tim 1:7).

¹⁷ M. Meinertz, “Die Tragweite des Gleichnisses von den zehn Jungfrauen,” in A. Wikenhauser, Synoptische Studien, Munich, 1954, pp. 94–106; F. A. Strobel, “Zum Verständnis von Mt. XXV, 1–13,” in NovT, 1958, pp. 199–227; K. L. Donfried, “The Allegory of the Ten Virgins,” in JBL, 1974, pp. 415–428; W. Schenk, “Auferweckung der Toten oder Gericht nach den Werken: Tradition und Redaktion in Matthäus XXV, 1–13,” in NovT, 1978, pp. 278–299.

¹⁸ Matt 5:22. A. Schlatter (Der Evangelist Matthäus, p. 169) cites the Mek. on Exod 15:1 and 20:2—the parable of a king who appoints two stewards, one over straw, the other over treasures. The first, having come under suspicion, complains at not having received responsibility for treasures; the other says to him, “Fool (requa)! You were unfaithful with the straw,” a fortiori for the treasures. M. Ed. 5.2—“Better for me to be called idiot my whole life long than to spend one hour as a godless person before the Place.” Cf. P. Wernberg-Möller, “A Semitic Idiom in Matt. V, 22,” in NTS, vol. 3, pp. 71–73.

¹⁹ We may compare not only Philo, Cherub. 75—“You do not know, O fool (ὦ μωρέ), that . . .”—but also the frequency of the word as a kind of nickname: Μάρων ε—πικαλούμενος μωρός (BGU 1046, col. II, 22). Herminos, also called Moron, is enrolled as a member of a club (P.Lond. 1178, 41; vol. 3, p. 217); P.Petaus 118, 4: Κάστωρ ὁ μορός. At Dura-Europus, μωρά is added three times to names of women (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1946–47, p. 356, n. 200). This epithet can be affectionate: Φοῦσκος Σαραπίωνι τω— ἀληθινω— μωρω— πλει—στα χαίρειν (SB 10557,1).

ναύκληρος

naukleros, ship’s owner and manager

naukleros, S 3490; EDNT 2.458; MM 422–423; L&N 54.29; BAGD 534; 4.16, 17

It took a storm and the wreck of a great ship and its two hundred seventy-six passengers at the island of Malta to get the word naukleros into the Bible: “The centurion paid more attention to the pilot and the ship’s owner (to kybernete kai to nauklero) than to what Paul said” (Acts 27:11); but even though this person is mentioned abundantly, from the sixth-fifth century BC, in literary and papyrological texts,¹ it is very difficult to define his role,² although this was a major figure in the maritime world and in associations of seafaring folk.³ Each translator of Acts 27:11 gives it a different meaning.⁴

What is remarkable is that here St. Luke associates the naukleros with the kybernetes (like Philo, Spec. Laws 4.186; Dreams 2.86; Josephus, Ant. 9.209; P.Lille 24, 3–4; P.Hib. 39, 5–6; 98, 12–13) as constituting the principal personages on board and forming together with the *proreus*⁵ a sort of senior staff of the vessel.⁶ We can understand, then, that the centurion would consult with the authorities, whose judgment in matters of navigation would obviously carry more weight than the opinion of his prisoner.

The kybernetes is rightly named first, because of his technical knowledge of maritime questions⁷—whereas the naukleros is not necessarily an expert—and he commands the sailors;⁸ he is a professional navigator, and it is he who, if need be, will order jettisoning the cargo (ho kybernetes ekeleue , Achilles Tatius, Leuc. et Clit. 3.2.9; cf. 1.1.5; Athenaeus 2.37 c). So he is clearly the master on board, at the head of the hierarchy.⁹ This is why he is called kyrios (Artemidorus Daldianus, Onir. 2.23), and his authority is often likened to that of a political leader;¹⁰ but then what has the naukleros come to do here?

According to the etymology—naus, “ship” and kleros, the “lot” or “share” allotted by fate—the naukleros thalassios (P.Oxy. 87, 6–7), or magister navis,¹¹ does not in principle direct the navigation of a ship, but he is its owner, and hence its manager (Xenophon, An. 7.2.12; Strabo 2.3.4), especially in the classical period.¹² This means that he is an important person whose opinions must be heard and taken into consideration,¹³ because he is also the ship’s operator, and—unlike modern shipowners—he travels on his own ship (nauklerokybernetes ploiou idiou or idiotikou)¹⁴ and is a merchant (naukleros emporos, naucerus mercator, Plautus, Mil. Glor. 1109–1110; 1175–1182; Tacitus, Ann. 12.5). Now there were risks both for merchant and for maritime transporter: paying back the loans that were made for the big venture, seeing to it that the merchandise arrived at the agreed place, preserving them from any deterioration;¹⁵ but there are also all the dangers of the sea, pirates, serious damage (P.Magd. 11, 3–4 = P.Enteux. 27), storms, and the possible necessity of jettisoning the cargo and of shipwreck.¹⁶ Thus he has his say in all of these conjunctures, and we can understand that the centurion in Acts should have insisted on consulting him; but as the naukleros could be simply the owner’s agent (P.Lond. 1940, 63) and the charterer of the vessel (P.Lille 22 and 23; cf. P.Tebt. 823–825; 1034–1035; P.Ryl. 576), or even an anonymous mariner,¹⁷ we cannot say for certain what kind of person the naukleros in Acts 27:11 was. It would seem that he was the owner, but this possibility would be excluded if his ship was carrying the annonae (the Roman tax in kind on the grain harvest), for then it would belong to the imperial fleet. In that case, he would be the public transport official. It is best to consider him to be the naukleos agoges, the transport official (P.Magd. 11, 5).

¹ Cf. Prosop.Ptol., vol. 5, pp. 150–153, n. 14013–14045; L. Robert, “Listes de nauclères de Nicomédie,” in RevPhil, 1939, pp. 170–171; 1943, pp. 187–188; H. Hauben, “An Annotated List of Ptolemaic Naukleri with a Discussion of B.G.U. X, 1933,” in ZPE 8, 1971, pp. 259–275; idem, “Nouvelles remarques sur les nauclères d’Egypte à l’époque des Lagides,” ZPE 28, 1978, pp. 99–107; idem, “Le Transport fluvial en Egypte ptolémaïque: Les Bateaux du roi et de la reine,” in Pap.Bru. XIX, 1979, pp. 68–77; idem, “A Jewish Shipowner in Third-Century Ptolemaic Egypt,” in Ancient Society, vol. 10, 1969, pp. 167–170; J. Scherer, “Reçu de loyer délivré à un nauclère pour la location d’un bateau (P. Sorb. inv. 2935),” in BASP, 1978, pp. 95–101. The papyri usually know only naukleroi from the Nile, but some travel to Phoenicia and Palestine (P.Cair.Zen. 59010) or connect Caunos, Rhodes, and Alexandria (P.Lond. 1979), Ashkelon (SB 9571). Naukleria became a leitourgia (P.Oxy. 1418, 8; U. Wilcken, Grundzüge, I, 1, p. 377).

² “A complex and changing personage, the naukleros appears sometimes as the shipowner, sometimes as a simple transporter of merchandise, or again as the captain of a boat. As much as the date, it is the nature of the witness that allows us to define or specify the quality of the naukleros” (Julie Vélissaropoulos, Les Naoclères grecs, Geneva-Paris, 1980, p. 1). Cf. J. Rougé, Recherches sur l’organisation du commerce maritime en Méditerranée sous l’Empire romain, Paris, 1966.

³ We cite the epitaph of Telesphoros, βουλευτής καὶ ναύκληρος (SEG XXVII, n. 828); “Let Severus . . . the naukleros remember Ioannes and Claudia” (SB 4028 = A. Bernand, El-Kanaïs, n. 57); three “Siegelstempel”: Πέτρου ναυκλήρου, Πέτρου ναυκλήρου, —Ιωάννου ναυκλήρου ι—νδικτιω—νος ε? (R. Merkelbach, I.Chalced., n. 109). A “receipt” from a naukleros, BGU 2400 (with the bibliography, p. 85).

⁴ E. Jacquier, Actes, p. 728, lists modern correspondences: owner, lessee, charterer, captain, ship’s manager. . . . In general, it would be best to consider the naukleros a transport contractor, responsible for the cargo, which he has previously accepted and measured (diacheiristikon), and which he often accompanies. He is also responsible for the payment of the crew.

⁵ But the proreus (“bow officer”), not mentioned here, was subordinate to the kybernetes (“stern officer”). Cf. Xenophon, Oec. 8.14: “The second to the captain, who is called ‘prow officer’ (πρωρέυς)”; Plutarch, Agis 1.4: “the watchers on the prow (οι—πρωρει—ς) see before the kyberneteis what is coming up ahead, but they fix their eyes on them and execute their orders”; Artemidorus Daldianus, Onir. 1.35: “Above the rower is the chief of the rowers on board, and above him the helmsman, above him the pilot, and above him the ship’s commander”; cf. Aristophanes, Eq. 542–544: “One must start out by being a rower before setting one’s hand to the rudder, then become helmsman (πρωρατεῦσαι) and observe the winds, then finally commander (κυβερνα—ν) in one’s own right”; Ezek 27:29.

⁶ How much more romanticized is the account of the storm that threatened to sink Jonah’s ship as he went from Jaffa to Tarsus in Cilicia: “The sailors (οι—ναῦται) and the pilots (καὶ κυβερνήται) and even the captain (καὶ αὐτὸς ὁ ναύκληρος) began to pray” to escape danger, and as Jonah was suspected of being the cause, he was thrown into the water (Josephus, Ant. 9.209, 212). Cf. the historian's own shipwreck (Life 15).

⁷ Ὁ κυβερνήτης τοῦ πλοιαρίου (PSI 431, 4; P.Cair.Zen. 59514, 4–5; P.Col.Zen. 71, 7; UPZ 180 a, col. 46, 1). The kybernetes is responsible for the rudder (Plautus, Poen. 272 e; Aristotle, Rh. 2.20.4; Plutarch, Mor. 812 e) and watches over the sails (Plato, Hipparch. 226 b), but he is much more than a helmsman (Xenophon, An. 5.8.20). “While seeming to be led by the ship that he governs, he leads it and makes it go to the ports that he wants to reach” (Philo, Husbandry 69). In an aretology of Isis, from P.Oxy. 1380, 69, the goddess is described as κυβερνήτις of navigators (cf. 121–122). Y. Grandjean, Arétalogie d'Isis, p. 61.

⁸ Plato, Resp. 1.341 c: “the kybernetes is the chief of the sailors”; Ps.-Plato, Alc. Maj. 125 d: “What is the trade that makes a man capable of commanding those who participate in the sailing of a ship? —The trade of pilot”; Philo, Spec. Laws 4.186: “The relation of the king to his state is of the same sort as that . . . of the general to his army, and admiral to his troops and crews, or again of the naukleros to his cargoes and barges, like that of the kybernetes to his sailors.”

⁹ Tertullian, Apol. 47.7; cf. J. Vélissaropoulos, Les Naucières grecs, pp. 79ff.; J. Rougé, Recherches sur l'organisation du commerce maritime en Méditerranée sous l'Empire romain, pp. 224ff.

¹⁰ Aeschylus, Sept. 2–3: “the leader who, in his toil at the rudder of the city, takes the helm in his hand and does not let his eyelids close”; Epictetus 4.1.118; Dio Chrysostom, 1 Mon. 29; 3 Mon. 28; Themistius, Or. 15; Maximus of Tyre 40.5; Athenaeus 5.209 c.

¹¹ Livy 29.25.7–12; Dig. 14.1.1.1: “It is to him that the care of the entire ship is entrusted” (“magistrum navis accipere debemus cui totius cura mandata est”); Plutarch, Mor. 807 b; Hesychius, on this word: ὁ δεσπότης τοῦ πλοίου (M. I. Finkelstein, “Ἐμπορος, ναύκληρος, and κάπηλος: A Prolegomenon to the Study of Athenian Trade,” in CP, vol. 30, 1935, pp. 320–336). P. Chantraine (Dictionnaire étymologique, p. 737) specifies that “the ναύκληρος does not sail at the ‘head’ of the ship, that is, the prow, but he commands it.” The term is applied also to the master of a house; cf. Isaeus, Philoct. 6.19: “a freedman managed (ε—ναυκλήρει) an apartment building at the Piraeus”; Pollux, Onom. 1.74.10; 10.20.

¹² J. Vélissaropoulos, Les Naucières grecs, p. 50, quotes (from Demosthenes) Hegestratus (C. Zenoth.), Apaturius (C. Apat.), Hyblesius (C. Lacr.), Dionysodorus (C. Dionys.), Nikippus (C. Poly. 17), Lampis (C.

Arist. 211). Cf. a naukleros from Phoenicia, the owner of two ships, who goes to Athens, then Delos (Athenaeus 4.173 b–c), or the Samian Kolaios, who discovered the mines at Tartessus, which made him rich (Herodotus 4.152); SEG XXI, 37, 4. Cf. H. Hauben, “An Annotated List of Ptolemaic Naukleroï with a Discussion of B.G.U. X, 1933,” in ZPE 8, 1971, pp. 259–275; idem, “Nouvelles remarques sur les nauclères d’Égypte à l’époque des Lagides,” ZPE 28, 1978, pp. 99–107; in reply to the complaints of the exiled Cicero, the philosopher Philiscus writes in 58 BC: “Naukleroï do not let great losses get them down; they are right to say, ‘The sea gave us this wealth, the sea has taken it away from us’ (Dio Cassius 38.20.4); cf. P.Lond. 1979; SB 8754. A ship can be the property of a number of naukleroï (ibid. 9571); P.Vindob. 19792, 6: συνναυκλήροις; cf. L. Casson, “New Light on Maritime Loans,” in Symbolae R. Taubenschlag, Warsaw, 1957, vol. 2, pp. 89–93.

¹³ The naukleros must nevertheless submit to the decisions of the authorities: “Not one naukleros would have brought me not just against the will of Dionysius but even without an express embarkation order from him” (Plato, Ep. 7.329 e); Xenophon, An. 7.2.12: “He forbade naukleroï to transport the troops.”

¹⁴ P.Flor. 75; P.Cair.Goodsp. 14; Stud.Pal. 1, 34; P. J. Sijpesteijn, K. A. Worp, “Documents on Transport by Ship,” in ZPE 20, 1976, p. 158, line 1; Chrest.Wilck., n. 434, 4. Philo almost always links naukleros and emporos (Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 116; Rewards 11; cf. Good Man Free 67). J. Vélissaropoulos is correct to write “Naukleros ... escapes every modern definition. None of the terms of today’s maritime vocabulary supplies the equivalent of naukleros. . . . The owner of the ship was at the same time the transporter of his own merchandise and a navigational expert. This is no longer the case in our days. Moreover, the contemporary charterer is neither the owner nor the shipper” (Les Nauclères grecs, pp. 48–49). B. Bravo, “Remarques sur les assises sociales, les formes d’organisation et la terminologie du commerce maritime à l’époque archaïque,” in DHA, III, Besançon-Paris, 1977, pp. 26–32.

¹⁵ The transporter was obliged to deliver the merchandise “safe and sound, free of any nautical fraud” (SB 8754, 17–18; P.Oxy. 2125, 28–29; 3111, 14; 3250, 19–20; P.Theod. 47, 9; P.Laur. 6, 7; P.Warr. 5, 9–10; P.Ross.Georg. II, 18, 129; Stud.Pal. XX, 32, 20–22). Cf. J. Vélissaropoulos, Les Nauclères grecs, pp. 311ff.

¹⁶ Cf. St. Augustine, In Psalm. 136, 3: “In a shipwreck, you are naked and are you right to lament”? St. John Chrysostom, Ep. Theod. 2 (PG 47.309): “No merchant stops sailing because he has suffered shipwreck and lost his cargo, but he goes to sea again, to its waves and its vast expanses”; Hom. 3 in Laz. et Div., PG 48.966. On the “Rhodian law,” cf. J. Rougé, Recherches sur l’organisation du commerce maritime en Méditerranée sous l’Empire romain, pp. 397ff.

¹⁷ Cf. Philo, Creation 147: “merchants and sailors (ἔμποροι καὶ ναύκληροι), seekers after purple, and all those who fish for shellfish”; Flacc. 57: after episodes of pillaging, “neither sailor nor merchant (μὴ ναυκλήρου μὴ ε—μπόρου) nor artisan was up to devoting himself to his former occupation.” Ναυκληρία is maritime commerce (Ps.-Plutarch, X orat. 834 e).

νοσφίζομαι

nosphizomai, to set aside, remove, divert, steal

nosphizomai, S 3557; EDNT 2.478; MM 430; L&N 57.246; BAGD 543–544

Christian slaves are not to steal anything at all (Titus 2:10, me nosphizomenous). But Ananias and Sapphira kept back a portion of the price of the sale of their property (Acts 5:2-3). Derived from nosphi (“apart, aside,” SB 8511, 10), nosphizesthai apo means “set aside” (P.Rev., col. 27, 10; I.Thas. 336, 2: “Fate took away my life at the age of eighteen”), “remove,” and hence “divert to one’s own profit, steal,” as with Menelaus, who “stole several gold vases from the temple” (2Macc 4:32; cf. Josh_j:1).

In the Hellenistic period, nosphizo occurs commonly in the literature, sometimes with respect to plunder,¹ sometimes with respect to fraudulent removal or restitution.² Its use is identical in the papyri, where the dishonesty of these diversions is emphasized.³ Moulton-Milligan cites this oath from the third century AD, in which a man swears that he will “peculate” nothing (oute autos nospheioumai) and adds that if he finds out that someone is stealing (nosphizomenos) he will denounce him.⁴ The guilty party must make double restitution.⁵ In AD 25, a contract for paramone (continued service by a slave whose manumission is deferred) provides for sanctions if something belonging to Harmosis is damaged or stolen (e katablaptousi e nosphizomenos halisketai ton Harmosios, P.Mich. 587,20).

¹ The discourse of Cyrus on the dividing of spoils: “I am not unaware that it is possible . . . for us to carry off (νοσφίσασθαι) as much as we want” (Xenophon, Cyr. 4.2.42). Cf. Philo, Moses 1.253: After their victory over the

Caananites, the Israelites “carry out all their promised thanksgivings, not diverting anything as plunder.”

² Memmius accuses Marcus “of diverting large sums of money” (Plutarch, Luc. 37.2). Capito, a tax collector in Judea who was poor when he arrived, “made a fortune by appropriating funds that he had fraudulently diverted” (Philo, To Gaius 199). When someone finds an animal at large and cannot identify the owner, he can keep it, taking God as his witness that he has not “appropriated another’s property” (μὴ νοσφίζεσθαι ἀλλότρια, Josephus, Ant. 4.274).

³ Cf. νοσφισμός. P.Berl.Zill. I, 94: μηθεῖς ε—κ τω—ν κατὰ μέρος γένηται κλοπιμὸς τούτων νοσφισμός; P.Mich. 587, 29.

⁴ P.Paris III, 56 b 10, 12. In the second century AD, a woman’s conscience is tormented περὶ ὧν ε—νοσφίσαστο ἔν τε ε—νδομενεῖα καὶ ἀποθέτοις (P.Ryl. 116, 10). P.Cair.Zen. 59484, 4: ε—φάνη ε—π ἀληθείας ὅτι νενόσφισθαι ἀπὸ τω—ν ἀμφιτάπων.

⁵ P.Yale 26, 3: ε—άν δέ τι κλέπτων ἢ νοσφιζόμενος ἀλίσκηται Πόρος, ἀποτεισάτω τὸ βλάβος διπλοῦν (third century AD). Cf. νόσφισμα (in a servant’s contract from the first century): τὸ δ ε—πιδειχέν κλέμμα ἢ νόσφισμα διπλοῦν (PSI 1120, 4).

νουθεσία, νουθετέω

nouthesia, admonition, reprimand; noutheteo, to instruct, lecture, admonish, reprimand

nouthesia, S 3559; TDNT 4.1019–1022; EDNT 2.478; NIDNTT 1.568–569; MM 430; L&N 33.339; BAGD 544 | noutheteo, S 3560; TDNT 4.1019–1022; EDNT 2.478; NIDNTT 1.567–568; MM 430; L&N 33.339; BAGD 544

A compound of nous and tithemi, the verb noutheteo basically means “put something in someone’s mind,” hence “instruct, lecture,” sometimes by way of refreshing the memory, sometimes by way of making observations or giving warnings. In the latter case, nouthesia often means “reproach” or “reprimand” (Wis 16:6). These meanings are common to secular and biblical Greek, although the latter places greater emphasis on corporal punishment,¹ punishment being above all an element of child-rearing.

Eliphaz says to Job: “You instructed many people.”² This is not so much a matter of doctrinal teaching as of instruction aimed at developing the ability to reflect,³ correcting errors and reinforcing what is good. Events, warnings, punishments are practical lessons that make one aware of faults committed, warn the guilty and dispose them to correct themselves: a disaster is “a warning to all those who are able to reflect”;⁴ how much more the reprimands of those who have the competence and the authority!⁵ In other words, nouthesia is a major component of education (paideia): “If you desire to become the slave of the wise person, then you will accept your share of reprimands and correction” (nouthesias kai sophronismou), which make up for a lack of moral training (apaideusia, Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.193); “What is good and profitable for those who need to be rebuked is admonition” (nouthesia, Prelim. Stud. 157); “ill treatment according to the law gives the world a perfect good: admonition, which cannot be praised too highly” (ibid. 160); the irrational powers are mastered “with blows of reprimand and correction” (Worse Attacks Better 3); “After training the people entrusted to his rule through relatively mild directives and exhortations, then by more severe threats and admonitions, Moses called upon them to give a practical demonstration of the lessons they had learned” (Rewards 4; cf. Migr. Abr. 14).

Obviously, parents are responsible to reprimand, admonish, and correct their children;⁶ and divine nouthesia is nearly always described as fatherly child-rearing, which reprimands and punishes with moderation, with regret, and as little as possible;⁷ God corrects or warns people with great consideration (Ep. Arist. 207). He admonishes to avoid having to punish (Philo, Moses 1.110). This is a model for the training of believers by the leaders of the community,⁸ in particular by St. Paul, who never ceased warning or reprimanding with tears each Ephesian⁹ or Corinthian Christian: “I write these things not to shame you, but as to beloved and respected children, to set your minds aright. . . . You do not have many fathers.”¹⁰ All apostolic pastoral care can be summed up in these warnings-admonitions: “Warning every person and instructing every person in all wisdom, in order to make every person perfect in Christ.”¹¹ In the brotherly life, after all, reciprocal warnings waken the conscience of the delinquent¹² and lead back to the right path those who have gone astray (T. Benj. 4.5; T. Jos. 6.8); “reprimands and rebukes bring about repentance and shame, one of which leads to sorrow and the other to fear” (Plutarch, De virt. mor. 12; cf. De adul. et am. 28). The exact nuance varies from case to case: “Teach each other in all wisdom, admonishing one another” (didaskontes kai nouthetountes heautous, Col 3:16); “Rebuke those who are disorderly” (1Thess 5:14); but even the disobedient person must not be treated as an enemy—“reprimand him as a brother” (2Thess 3:15; cf. in the Roman period: “do not take it too hard that I write to rebuke you,” me bareos eche mou ta grammata nouthetounta se, SB 6263, 26; third century; 7975, 18 = PSI 1334). Brotherly correction presupposes that Christians are spiritual adults and are, like the Roman Christians, “able to warn each other” (Rom 15:14).

¹ Cf. G. Bornkamm, “Sohnschaft und Leiden,” in Festschrift J. Jeremias, Berlin, 1960, pp. 188–198; but these sanctions are not unknown among the Greeks: ῥάβδου νουθέτησις (Plato, Leg. 3.700 c); πληγαί—ς νουθετεῖ—ν (9.879 d; cf. Resp. 8.560 a); ζημίας καὶ νουθεσίαις (P.Stras. 226, 15; minutes of a hearing, from AD 90).

² Job 4:3 (piel of the Hebrew yasar). P. Dhorme comments correctly: “The characteristic meaning of the verb yasar in the piel is ‘redress, correct,’ either verbally, hence ‘to lecture,’ or by punishment, hence ‘to punish.’ The twofold meaning ‘lecture’ and ‘punish’ is found also with mûsar, ‘lesson’ (5:17; 20:3), ‘warning’ (36:10), but also ‘punishment’ (Isa 53:5)” (Le Livre de Job, Paris, 1926, p. 39). St. Augustine defines the Israelite παιδεία: “per molestias eruditio” (Augustine, En. in Ps., on Ps 118:66). At Qumran, cf. A. M. Denis, Les Thèmes de connaissance dans le Document de Damas, Louvain, 1967, pp. 91ff. In rabbinic Judaism, cf. J. A. Sanders, Suffering as Divine Discipline in the Old Testament and Post-biblical Literature, Rochester, 1955; E. Lohse, Märtyrer und Gottesknecht, Göttingen, 1955, pp. 25–37; 193–203. In Greece, cf. J. Coste, “Notion grecque et notion biblique de la ‘souffrance éducatrice,’” in RSR, 1955, pp. 481–523; C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 2, p. 29; Théologie morale, vol. 2, pp. 571ff., 589ff. Clement of Alexandria analyses the twelve possible forms of νουθέτησις, which he defines: “Warning is a reproach that is full of concern, that renders the mind informed. This is what the Pedagogue does . . .” (Clement of Alexandria, Paed. 1.76.1), and he concludes: “To reprimand is also to warn. Moreover, warning is etymologically that which makes the mind informed; thus reprimands produce intelligence” (1.94.2). This is probably more accurate than Cicero’s definition: “Admonitio est quasi lenior objurgatio” (cited by R. C. Trench, Synonyms, p. 112).

³ Cf. the translation by νουθετέω of the hithpael of the Hebrew bîn, “understand, perceive, attend to” in Job 37:14; 38:18; cf. bînâh, 34:16; 36:12; Philo, Spec. Laws 3.141: “He claimed that the blows (πληγὰς) were intended only to teach a lesson (ἔνεκα νουθεσίας)”; Post. Cain 68: “cattle without reason and defenseless, left with no attendant to monitor them and train them” (τοῦ νουθετήσοντός τε καὶ παιδεύσοντος); Diodorus Siculus 17.7.2.

⁴ Philo, Rewards 133: πρὸς νουθεσίαν τω—ν δυναμένων σωφρονίζεσθαι; cf. Prelim. Stud. 118; Wis 12:2, 26; 1Cor 10:11; Alcibiades is “kept by his circle of flatterers from listening to one who wished to admonish and instruct him” (τοῦ νουθετοῦντος καὶ παιδεύοντος, Plutarch, Alc. 4.2; cf. Sol. 29.5); “I would have sent this child to Rome after correcting him with blows” (πληγαί—ς νουθετήσας, Sert. 19.11; cf. P.Brem. 61, 31); “I have no idea how he could be forced to become better nor how his mind could be changed by remonstrating” (ἄν μεταπει—σαι νουθετω—ν). “The law is what defends him from compulsion; against persuasion, his character” (Menander, Dysk. 252).

⁵ Athletes who give themselves over to the pleasures of Venus must be reprimanded (Philostratus, Gym. 52); “Heracles by his many recommendations smote the ignorance of each of the men with many wounds” (Heraclitus, All. 34.2); “Whatever the name is of the priest who alone can correct us and make us wiser” (ὕφ ου— νουθετηθῆναι καὶ σωφρονισθῆναι, Philo, Unchang. God 134); the high priest Jonathan often reproached Felix for his poor administration of Judea (Josephus, Ant. 20.162). 2Aporc. Bar. 44.2–4. Cf. the ranking official who asks the bishop to admonish an offender (παρακαλω— . . . νουθετῆσαι αὐτόν, P. Grenf. II, 93, 3).

⁶ “Parents, do not exasperate your children; but in raising them, use training and correction inspired by the Lord” (Eph 6:4; cf. the parallels given by G. Mussies, Dio Chrysostom, pp. 188–189). Eli is blamed for not having rebuked his sons, who had cursed God (1Sam 3:13); Philo, Spec. Laws 2.232: “Fathers have the right to admonish their children severely”; Josephus, Ant. 4.260: parents are the first to admonish their children verbally (λόγοις αὐτοὺς νουθετεῖτωσαν), because they have the authority of judges over their offspring; 8.217: his father punished him with the whip (μάστιξιν . . . ε—νουθέτει); T. Reub. 3.8—νουθεσίας πατέρων αὐτοῦ.

⁷ Wis 11:10—ὡς πατήρ νουθετω—ν; Pss. Sol. 13.8—“God will correct (νουθετήσει) the just as a beloved son, and his punishment (ἡ παιδεία) is like that of an eldest son.” Citing Deut 8:5—“like a man, God will discipline his son by correction”—Philo comments: “Thus it is for the effectiveness of the correction and admonition (παιδείας ἔνεκα καὶ νουθεσίας) that this is said” (Unchang. God 54); God does not exact punishment in proportion to the sins of the people, but does as fathers do with their children (οι—πατέρες ε—πὶ τοι—ς τέκνοις, Josephus, Ant. 3.311); T. Job 37.8—νουθέτησόν με πρὸς πάντα, εἰ— σὺ εἶ ὁ θεράπων τοῦ θεοῦ.

⁸ 1Thess 5:12—“Those who are your leaders in the Lord and who rebuke you”; Titus 3:10—“Break with a heretical person after two or three warnings.” Cf. Moses’ pedagogical prudence: “At the outset, the lawgiver takes to task and reprimands (νουθετεῖ—ν τε καὶ παιδεύειν) only one desire” (Philo, Spec. Laws 4.96). “Those who are of good will he admonishes and makes wiser through his excellent laws, which the good obey willingly, the wicked unwillingly” (Virtues 94).

⁹ Acts 20:31; cf. J. Dupont, Discours de Milet, pp. 229ff.

¹⁰ 1Cor 4:14. For textual criticism and commentary on this verse, cf. P. Gutierrez, Paternité spirituelle, pp. 119ff. Ὡς (τέκνα) denotes the quality or tenor of the apostle's view of his children, and even very small children, because their rivalries and jealousies are childish (cf. 4:10), so that νουθετω—ν has here the sense of returning to reason or to good sense rather than of reprimanding. —Αγαπητά expresses respect as much as affection, the former sentiment being in opposition to ε—ντρέπων. Cf. Philo, Post. Cain 97: “the switch is the symbol of education (παιδεία): if no one makes you feel shame, and if no one gives you blows for some fault, there is no way you will accept an admonition (νουθεσίαν) and correct yourself (σωφρονισμόν)”; cf. Dio Chrysostom 31.104.

¹¹ Col 1:28—νουθετοῦντες . . . καὶ διδάσκοντες; cf. Plato, Prt. 323 d, νουθετει—ν καὶ διδάσκειν; Resp. 3.399 b: διδαχὴ καὶ νουθέτησις; Xenophon, Mem. 1.2.21:νουθετικοὶ λόγοι; Plutarch, De cohib. ira 2: παραινήσεις καὶ νουθεσίαι.

¹² For Philo, the conscience “teaches, reprimands, exhorts to changes in one's life” (διδάσκει, νουθετει—, παραινει— μεταβάλλεσθαι, Decalogue 87), “is not ashamed to reprimand, using sometimes violent threats, sometimes more moderate warnings (μετριωτέραις νουθεσίαις), threats against those who seem to be sinning deliberately, warnings to those who are sinning in spite of themselves, through lack of foresight, that they may not stumble in this way” (Creation 128).

νωθρός

nothros, dull, sluggish, negligent, stupid

nothros, S 3576; TDNT 4.1126; EDNT 2.483; MM 432; L&N 32.47, 88.249; BAGD 547

Setting out to explicate a lofty theological theme, the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews is worried about the receptivity of his readers, “since you have become nothroi in hearing” (epei nothroi gegonate tais akoais).¹ The three occurrences of nothros in the LXX belong to the Wisdom writers.² Julius Pollux (Onom. 1.3.43) gives as synonyms bradys, nothes, ameles, argon, diagon; ³ so it means “slow, lazy, faltering, slack, timid, negligent.” In Polybius, it is applied above all to the intellectual faculties: “Hanno showed his stupidity” (1.74.13); “There was not one who was foolish enough or stupid enough (oudena houtos alogiston oude nothron) to hope ever to return to his country by fleeing” (3.63.7); “This same man was slow of thought (nothros men en tais epinoiais), timid in accomplishment (atolmos d' en tais epibolais), and incapable of facing danger head on.”⁴

But dullness is seen also in achievements: “Minucius denigrated Fabius in front of everyone, presenting him as a man who, in the conduct of operations, acted with laxity and laziness” (hos agennos chromenon tois pragmasi kai nothros, Polybius 3.90.6); “Aratus, in every undertaking and in all combat operations, showed timidity and indolence” (pasi tois tou polemou pragmasin atolmos echreto kai nothros, 4.60.2); Parmenion was “slow and not very active” in battle (Plutarch, Alex. 33.10). “Why do we continue to be lazy, careless, apathetic, and looking for excuses not to work?”⁵ Incompetent trainers, through their poor technique, get their athletes into bad shape, make them lazy, sluggish, less daring, not in a condition appropriate to their age.⁶ A Christian inscription from Eumeneia: “Aurelius Zotikos (?) Lykidas, I call God to witness that I built this tomb at my own expense, since my brother Amianos was negligent (nothros echontos Amianou tou adelphou mou), and I order that Phronime and Maxima, my sisters, be placed in it.”⁷ The brother (apparently the older brother) did not prepare and maintain the tomb of the two sisters.

So nothrotēs is culpable negligence, the failure to perform an obligation or a customary duty (cf. UPZ 110, 95), and it is this inertia or lackadaisical attitude toward Christian doctrine that the author of Hebrews denounces in his readers. Whereas when they were converted they must have been eager to learn about Christ and the tradition of the church (Heb 2:3; cf. Acts 2:42), they subsequently became—and remain, cf. the perfect gegōnate—listless, in a depressed state, as it were, like people weakened by sickness after the fever has fallen.

This medical meaning is well attested in the papyri, even though it is not a technical term but corresponds to our expressions “to be unwell, to suffer from an illness,” especially in letters: “I feel very poorly (leian de nothreuomai); perhaps it is the climate? I do not know” (P.Mert. 82, 14; second century; cf. nothron de estin leian, in W. H. S. Jones, The Medical Writings of Anonymus Londinensis, Cambridge, 1947, p. 104; Hermes Trismegistus, frag. 24, 14: “The south produces limpness, because it receives clouds that the atmosphere creates through condensation”); “I did not find anyone to send to you because I was sick” (P.Mich. 477, 36); “Until today I was worried about you because you were doing poorly when you left me”;⁸ P.Tebt. 421, 5: “Your sister is ill” (cf. 422, 5). Psychological health depends on the body; bodies are fitted to the souls that descend to become incarnate: “for lively (oxesi) souls, lively (oxea) bodies; for sluggish (bradesi) souls, sluggish (bradea) bodies; for active (energesin) souls, active (energe) bodies; for lazy (nothrais) souls, lazy (nothra) bodies, for strong (dynatais) souls, strong (dynata) bodies.”⁹

Thus nothros is used in reference to body and soul alike, for interior dispositions as well as practical accomplishments. The “dull” or “listless” recipients of Hebrews suffer first of all from a kind of depression, a lower intensity in their spiritual life; but this also translates into indolence and laziness in intellectual labor, notably in devotion to the exegesis of the Word of God.

¹ Heb 5:11 (cf. 6:12; not elsewhere in the NT); νωθοὶ ται—ς ἀκοαι—ς (cf. Herondas 4.53: “a slave’s ears are stopped by laziness”; Heliodorus, Aeth. 5.1.5: νωθρότερος ὄντην ἀκοήν) should be understood figuratively of recipients who are “slow to comprehend”; in German denkfaul; in English, dull; J. Héring s.b. Hébreux, p. 54 translates: “votre intelligence s’est émoussée” (“your understanding is blunted”).

² Sir 4:29—“Do not be brash (θρασύς) in your speech, nonchalant and careless in your deeds (νωθρός καὶ παρειμένος ἐ—ν τοι—ς ἔργοις σου”); 11:12—“Such a person is slow (νωθρός) and in need of help, lacking in strength and abounding in poverty”; Prov 22:29—“A person who is eager for toil will enter the service of kings, but he will not remain in the service of obscure men,” (ἀνδράσι νῶροι—ς). Cf. νωθοκάρδιος, translating the niphal of the Hebrew ‘awâh, “be crooked, bent, prostrate” in Prov 12:18; νωθρότης in 3Macc 4:5—τὴν ἐ—κ τοῦ γήρωσ νωθρότητα ποδω—ν ἐ—πίκυφον; P.Amh. II, 78, 15: ἐ—ν νωθρία μου γενομένου (second century).

³ Cf. Philo, Heir 254: “The wicked person is slow, a laggard, always ready to postpone works of education”; Plutarch, Fab. 1.5: “his slowness and his difficulty in taking instructions given to him” (βραδέως δὲ καὶ διαπόνως δεχόμενον τὰς μαθήσεις); Aesop, Fab. 66, end: “Better to be led by men who are dull but not wicked than by men who are muddleheaded and wicked.”

⁴ Polybius 4.8.5; cf. 12.25 c 3: “Strato the physician gives the impression of being much sillier and stupider than he is” (εὐηθέστερος αὐτοῦ καὶ νωθρότερος). This meaning comes from Plato: “Those who are steadier are dull to apply themselves to study and prone to forget” (Plato, Tht. 144 b); in Aesop, Fab. 199 (the lion, the fox, and the hart), “the bear is an oaf.” Cf. νωθρότης, “dullness of wit,” Diodorus Siculus 2.50; John Chrysostom, Sacerdot. 3.12; PG, vol. 48, p. 649.

⁵ Musonius, frag. 44, line 1 (ed. C. E. Lutz, p. 138); cf. Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 8.1.7: “on account of our full freedom, we fell into negligence and sloth” (ἐ—πὶ χαυνότητα καὶ νωθρίαν). On P.Mil.Vogl. II, 44, 19, M.

Papathomopoulos comments: “After the participle ὑποκριθει—σα, we must expect a direct object, perhaps νωθρείαν, ‘dejection, weariness, torpor, indifference, negligence’”; cf. P.Amh. II, 78, 15: καὶ ε—ν νωθρία μου γενομένου, “as I was indisposed” or “as I had given in to indolence, as I had neglected by affairs” (“Un argument sur papyrus de la Médée d’Euripide,” in RechPap, vol. 3, Paris, 1964, p. 44); cf. Josephus, War 1.203.

⁶ Philostratus, Gym. 46: ἀργίαν γυμνάζουσι καὶ ἀναβολὰς καὶ νωθροὺς εἶναι καὶ ἀτολμοτέρους τῆς αὐτῶ—ν ἀκμῆς. Cf. Anth. Pal. 9.597: “I was paralyzed . . . missing my former vigor”; Plutarch, Phoc. 6.2: Chabrias was “usually listless and difficult to stir up”; Plutarch, Cat. Min. 1.6: “in his studies Cato was lazy and slow to catch on” (νωθρὸς ἦν ἀναλαβει—ν καὶ βραδύς); Callimachus, Hec., frag. 275: νωθρὸς ὀδίτης.

⁷ Ed. L. Robert (Hellenica, vol. 11–12, Paris, 1960, p. 430), who comments: “The genitive absolute contains the explanation, and probably the condemnation, of the abstention of the brother Amianos. The words νωθρός, νωθρεύειν, νωθρῶ—ς indicate laziness and listlessness (‘pignis, piger, torpidus,’ according to the Thesaurus—characteristic examples that have this unique meaning in TDNT, vol. 4, p. 1126 under the word νωθρός). It is because of the lazy indifference of Amianos that Lykidas had to substitute for him. It is not impossible that Amianos had a good reason and that his health was to blame; for numerous papyri of the second-third century clearly give νωθρία and νωθρεύειν the meaning ‘to be not well.’ . . . In that case, Lykidas’ words would be by way of excuse for his brother, for whom he had to substitute. It seems more likely to me that this is a criticism of his brother’s negligence.” Cf. SB 10801, 12: διὰ δὲ τὴν νωθρίαν τοῦ ἀδελφοῦ οὐκ εὐτοήσα (letter of the third century).

⁸ P.Mich. 479, 7, διότι νωθρευόμενος ἀπ ε—μοῦ ε—ξήλθες; P.Brem. 61, 15: “I worry every day that you may fall ill again” (μὴ πάλιν νωθρὸς ᾗς); BGU 449, 4: “I found out that you were ill.” Cf. the hapax νωθραίνω, P.Oxy. 2609, 6: ὁ υι—ός μου Ἐλενος νενώθραντε ὀλίγας ἡμέρας (fourth century; cf. the editor’s note); PSI 1386, verso 6 (first century); νωθρία, SB 7571, 4. P.Wisc. 84, 5.

⁹ Corp. Herm., frag. 26, 4; cf. 26, 22: the portion of earth that they received made them heavy and dull (βαρέα καὶ νωθρά), the portion of air made them agile (εὐκίνητα). Iamblichus, Myst. 5.16.221: “When we purify the soul of ancient defilements, free it from disease, fill it with health, or rid it of heaviness and dullness (τὸ βαρὺ καὶ νωθρόν) to give it nimbleness and dynamism or acquire some other good for it.”

ξενία, ξενίζω, ξενοδοχέω, ξένος

xenia, a house, apartment, or room for guests; xenizo, to receive and give lodging to a guest; to startle through novelty, surprise by being unusual; xenodocheo, to receive a guest, show hospitality; xenos, strange, foreign; stranger, foreigner, guest

see also παρεπίδημος; φιλοξενία, φιλόξενος

xenia, S 3578; TDNT 2.1–36; EDNT 2.485; MM 433; L&N 7.31, 34.57; BAGD 547 | xenizo, S 3579; TDNT 5.1–36; EDNT 2.485; MM 433; L&N 34.57; BDF §§126(2), 196; BAGD 547–548 | xenodocheo, S 3580; TDNT 5.1–36; EDNT 2.485–486; NIDNTT 1.686; MM 433; L&N 34.57; BAGD 548 | xenos, S 3581; TDNT 5.1–36; EDNT 2.486; NIDNTT 1.686–689; MM 433–434; L&N 28.34; BDF §182(3); BAGD 548

In the Bible, foreigner/stranger is not a technical or official designation. It refers to anything that is foreign whether in the category of language, land, social groups, or religion (Acts 17:18—xenon daimonion . . . katangeleus; Achilles Tatius 2.30: deomai pros theon xenon kai enchorion; Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.251, 267), and the emphasis is on the psychological reality.¹ The xenos is sometimes simply a guest,² sometimes a traveler (2Sam 12:4, Hebrew ‘arâh), a passerby,³ or a traveler who has no place to sleep (Matt 25:35, 38, 43, 44) and is seeking shelter.⁴ Most often it refers to immigrants or non-natives,⁵ who are not part of a town, city, or country;⁶ these can be business travelers (P.Oxy. 1672, 4; first century AD; Pap.Lugd. Bat. XVI, 29, 17), but the Egyptian papyri that supply lists of them designate as xenoi above all “foreign laborers”⁷—most often, it would seem, construction workers.

Among the foreigners, some held important posts or carried out important functions, as attested by various honorific decrees;⁸ others had significant and more or less durable relations with a given community.⁹ Sometimes they were tolerated,¹⁰ and sometimes viewed with suspicion or scorn,¹¹ but a helpful and hospitable attitude is also attested. There was always a place for Hellenistic philanthropy,¹² and one of its most common manifestations was hospitality. Thus xenos means “guest-friend,” as Ariaeus was the guest-friend of Menon (Xenophon, An. 2.4.15); and in Rom 16:23 Gaius of Corinth (1Cor 1:14) provides lodging not only for St. Paul, but for every traveling Christian, and probably opens his house for meetings of the community as well.¹³ Nevertheless, the foreigner per se is usually a mysterious, unfamiliar person (P.Hib. 27, 38)—at least unexpected—who is hard to understand and hard to get on with. Furthermore, the adjective xenos is used for unusual rains (Wis 16:16), a strange death (19:5), remarkable or odd tastes (16:2–5), “differing and strange” or surprising doctrines.¹⁴

These remarks do not yet account for Eph 2:12—“At that time, you were without Christ, excluded from the commonwealth of Israel, strangers to the covenants of the promise (of salvation)”—and 2:19—“You are no longer strangers or sojourners (ouketi este xenoï kai paroikoi) but fellow-citizens of the saints, you belong to the household of God” (cf. Philo, Cherub. 120ff.). Xenos here has its classical Greek technical—political and legal—function. If the cultural foreigner is a barbarian, one who does not speak Greek,¹⁵ he is politically excluded from the polis and deprived of citizenship¹⁶ both in his home city and in the city to which he has come;¹⁷ he is in a sense an outlaw, possessing neither right nor privilege, unable to own land or marry a citizen; he is an inferior being, a second-class person (Plutarch, De Alex. fort. 1.6) who can be expelled (Thucydides 2.39.1), under the jurisdiction of the tribunal for foreigners (Dittenberger, Syl. 364; 619, 50; 647, 35). It is to this privation of rights that St. Paul refers; Christ’s work was to assimilate the Gentiles completely to Israel in the house of God. Already in the OT, God loved and protected the “sojourner” (Hebrew ger; Lev 19:10; 23:22; Deut 10:18; Philo, Moses 1.36), who was in a way integrated by the law into the chosen people (Exod 12:48; 20:10; Deut 14:29; cf. Ezek 47:22). This people had been a “stranger” in Egypt (Exod 22:20; 23:9) and was obligated to show hospitality to the stranger and love him as one of its own (Lev 19:34; cf. Stählin, “ξένος,” in TDNT, vol. 5, pp.9–10).

The verb xenizo, “to lodge, receive a guest,” has no theological connotations in the Bible.¹⁸ The biblical hapax xenodocheo, condemned by Atticists,¹⁹ is used with respect to the Christian widow who should be written on the church roll “if she has shown hospitality” (1Tim 5:10), this eagerness to put up guests being one of the prime works of charity,²⁰ practiced notably by women,²¹ and widows excelled at it (1Kgs 17:10).

In the Bible, xenia, derived from xenizo, refers to the house or apartment, the place where friends or strangers are received.²² Thus St. Paul asks Philemon: “Prepare me a room” (verse 22). This is by far the commonest meaning in the papyri: “I am writing so that you may be able to help Apis and put him up” (xenian de auto poieses, P.Oxy. 1064, 10; cf. 118, verso 18); someone asks for purple in order to be able to show hospitality (931,7); in the building of a house, provisions are made for chapels and for guest quarters.²³ The preparation of the door for such a room by carpenters is noted a number of times in accounting records.²⁴ But xenia is also a gathering and dinner to which acquaintances are invited.²⁵ Since ta xenia also refers to gifts given on the occasion of a visit by a VIP,²⁶ some have wished to give the word this meaning in Acts 28:23, where the Jews of Rome come to see Paul eis ten xenian; ²⁷ which, however, seems to refer to his apartment.

¹ Ruth says to Boaz: “How have I found favor in your eyes that you should recognize me when I am a foreigner” (Ruth 2:10; Hebrew nojrîâh); cf. 2Sam 15:19; Ps 69:9—“I became a stranger to my brothers”; Lam 5:2—“Our houses have been handed over to foreigners.” The Ethiopians are a foreign and formidable people, ξένον λαὸν καὶ χαλεπὸν (Isa 18:2). “Dear friend, you are acting faithfully in what you are doing for the brothers, even though they are strangers to you” (3John 5).

² 1Sam 9:13 (Hebrew qara); cf. in the second century BC, the distinction between the members of a club (σύνδειπνοι) and the guests (χένοι), P.Tebt. 118, 4.

³ It is inserted with this meaning in tomb inscriptions: ὦ ξένε! (SB 7423, 14); “Paeonia was my country, stranger, but Fate did not give me the thread that would have brought me to old age” (I.Thas. 339, 1; cf. I.Lind. 487, 24); SB 7475, 13; in the sense of “dear guest” (Plutarch, De Pyth. or. 23); “fugitive,” cf. P.Apoll. 9, 4: “If there are any foreign ship-caulkers in your pagarchy, arrest them as well.”

⁴ Job 31:32, Hebrew ger; Heb 11:13—the patriarchs avowed that they were “foreigners and exiles on the earth,” ξένοι καὶ παρεπίδημοι. On παρεπίδημος: a foreigner temporarily sojourning outside of his homeland, cf. 1Pet 1:1; 2:11; P.Tor. 8, 6: τω—ν παρεπιδημούντων καὶ κατοικούντων ε—ν ταύταις (κώμαις) = UPZ 196, 14; C.P.Herm. 6, 13; Dittenberger, Or. 268, 9; 339, 29; cf. J. Modrzejewski, “Servitude pour dettes ou legs de créance,” in RechPap, vol. 2, Paris, 1962, p. 93. For the union with πάροικοι and κάτοικοι, cf. C. Spicq, Vie chrétienne, pp. 60ff.

⁵ Matt 27:7—“They bought the potter’s field as a cemetery for foreigners” (those who died while staying at Jerusalem; cf. “foreign land holds my body,” I.Thas., 339, 6); Acts 17:21—“all the Athenians and the resident aliens” (οι— ε—πιδημοῦντες ξένοι); Philo, Flacc. 54: ξένους καὶ ε—πήλυδας; cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 1157, 80ff.

⁶ Philo, Husbandry 65; Conf. Tongues 76–82; P.Corn. 22, 1, 30, 128, 129 (first century); O.Mich. 165, 1; BGU 1843, 8; P.Petaus 118, 12; SB 9025, 8. “There came here, among the foreigners, the foreigner Ariston of Naupactus” (A. Bernand, El-Kanaïs, n. 6, 1–2); I.Lind., n. 51, c 1, 27; n. 88, 286–288. Cf. P. Jouguet, Vie municipale, pp. 91ff. The bibliography is considerable, cf. Stählin, “ξένος,” in TDNT, vol. 5, pp. 1–2. —The expression ε—πὶ ξένης (2Macc 5:9; cf. 9:28) means “to be far off” (PSI 1161, 7; 1230, 10; P.Oxy. 2479, 9–10). “Do not worry about me because I am far from home (ὅτι ε—πὶ ξένης εἰ—μὶ); I am getting acquainted with the places (αὐτόπτως γὰρ εἰ—μὶ τω—ν τόπων), and I am not a stranger here

(καὶ οὐκ εἰ—μι ξένος τῶ—ν ε—νθάδε)” (P.Oxy. 1154, 7–10; first century); “it is better for you to be at home, whatever may happen, than far away” (ἢ ε—πὶ ξένης, P.Fay. 136, 10). A woman was attacked and robbed while her husband was away (τοῦ ἀνδρός μου ὄντος ε—πὶ ξένης, BGU 22, 34); cf. R. Taubenschlag, Law of Greco-Roman Egypt, pp. 18–26; A. Calderini, “οἱ—ε—πὶ ξένης,” in JEA, 1954; H. J. Mason, Greek Terms, p. 70.

⁷ —Εργάζεται ξένοι (P.Ryl. 650, 3; cf. 642, 12, 16; P.Mich. 620, 40; SB 9406, 236). “I investigate strangers who come from anywhere at any time to settle here” (C.P.Herm. 6, 13); “Send me the list of foreigners who are in your pagarchy. . . . Have the foreigners pay three solidi per capita” (P.Apoll. 13, 5–6; cf. P.Cair.Isid. 126, 5; PSI 1266, 3). At Euhemeria, in the fourth century, “there are no foreigners in our town” (P.Ross.Georg. III, 8, 13).

⁸ Ambassadors, judges, athletes, physicians, actors. They were given privileges (P.Oxy. 2106, 18; 4210, 14; 2476, 6; cf. O.Bodl. 1999, 6 = SB 6096); cf. C. Préaux, “Les Etrangers à l’époque hellénistique,” in L’Etranger (Recueils de la Société J. Bodin, IX, 1), Brussels, 1958, pp. 141–193; L. Robert, “Les Juges étrangers dans la cité grecque: Ξένιον,” in Festschrift für Pan. J. Zépos, Athens-Freiburg-Cologne, 1973, pp. 765, 782; E. Olshausen, Proposographie der hellenistischen Königsgesandten (Studia Hellenistica 19), Louvain, 1974; G. Nachtergaeel, “Envoyés royaux d’époque hellénistique,” in ChrEg, 1975, pp. 249–262.

⁹ Mercenaries, “foreign forces,” who could be laid off (1Macc 11:38; cf. 2Macc 10:24; I.Rhamn., n. 20, 7; with the editor’s note. At Cos, cf. J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1953, p. 158, n. 152); or allies, cf. P. Gauthier, “Les ΞΕΝΟΙ dans les textes athéniens de la seconde moitié du Ve siècle av. J.-C.,” in REG, 1971, pp. 44–79.

¹⁰ Diodorus Siculus 20.84.2. On this indifference, cf. a distressed man who feels quite alone even though he knows many foreigners (P.Apoll. 70, 8).

¹¹ Plutarch, Lyc. 27.6–9. The inhabitants of Sodom are μισόξενοι (Josephus, Ant. 1.194; cf. 5.141ff.). The plaintiff in a theft case notes that the guilty party refused to make restitution, “treating me as a nobody because I am a foreigner” (P.Magd. 8, 11; third century BC; cf. PSI 1161; P.Bour. 25, 11–12). Among the ξένοι there were individuals who cannot be assimilated, undesirable refugees, political exiles, and criminals (P.Cair.Isid. 139: ξένους τῆς κώμης ὄντας). The Jews in Egypt were permitted to stay only for a determinate period (Ep. Arist. 108–110), forced to take up residence (Josephus, War 2.495; Philo, Flacc. 55; To Gaius 132), excluded from the grain distributions (Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.60–63); and Claudius even forbids them to immigrate (P.Lond. 1912, 96–98).

¹² Cf. this request for intervention on behalf of a foreigner: χαρειει—ς καὶ τούτω ε—πει ξένος ἄνθρωπός ε—στι (P.Mich. 506, 11). In AD 210, Flaviania Philokrateia donates ten thousand Attic drachmas “so that during the three days of the festival all may have the right to anointings with oil—citizens, foreigners, and slaves” (I.Bulg. 2265, 26); T. Abr. A 3. Cf. φιλόξενος (1Tim 3:2; Titus 1:8; 1Pet 4:9), φιλοξενία (Rom 12:13; Heb 13:2).

¹³ Cf. Wis 19:14: εὐεργέτας ξένους. Numerous inscriptions link ξένος and φίλος (cf. L. Robert, Etudes épigraphiques, p. 142; I.Thas. 186, 12), likewise Xenophon, An. 2.1.5; IGLS 1999, 3; T. Abr. A 1. On the evolution from ξενία to προξενία, cf. P. Gauthier, Symbola, pp. 18ff. Idem, “Notes sur l'étranger et l'hospitalité en Grèce et à Rome,” in Ancient Society, vol. 4, Louvain, 1973, pp. 3ff.

¹⁴ Heb 13:9; cf. 1Pet 4:12; Aristotle, Rh. 3.3.1406a 15: “Unusual expressions make the style less commonplace and give it a foreign flavor”; Josephus, War 2.414: “strange innovations in worship”; Philo, Moses 1.213. In the account of a cure by Sarapis in the third century AD: “A certain Libyan suffers from a strange illness” (Λίβυς τις ἀνὴρ πάσχει νόσον ξένην, Sel.Pap. III, p. 426). —Similar ξενίζω: to startle through novelty, surprise by being unusual: “These are strange words that you speak to us” (Acts 17:20); “Do not be surprised at the fiery trial” (1Pet 4:12; cf. verse 4); “Antiochus had inflicted varied and novel tortures on the bowels of others” (πολλαι—ς καὶ ξενιζούσαις συμφοραι—ς, 2Macc 9:6; cf. 3Macc 7:3—ξενιζούσαις . . . τιμωρίαῖς). Cf. Polybius 1.23.5: “The Carthaginians . . . disconcerted by this paraphernalia”; 3.68.9: “at first they were surprised by this unexpected result”; 3.114.4: “From all this resulted a strange and terrifying appearance”; Marcus Aurelius 8.15: “just as one would be ashamed to be surprised at the fig tree’s producing figs.” This is the commonest meaning in the papyri: “I am surprised and astonished at this, sir . . .” (Pap.Lugd.Bat. I, 13, 2); “I am astonished that you should have sent the workers . . .” (P.Ross.Georg. III, 14, 1); officials sought to give farm laborers “rural and provincial duties that were foreign to them” (ται—ς τε ἀγροικικαι—ς καὶ χωρικαι—ς ξενιζούσαις, C.Ord.Ptol. 76, 25 = SB 7337; cf. UPZ 146, 6).

¹⁵ Plutarch, De def. or. 5; cf. Homer, Il. 2.867; Herodotus 8.20; 9.43; Rom 1:14; 1Cor 14:1. Cf. A. Aymard, “Les Etrangers dans les cités grecques,” in L'Etranger (Recueils de la Société J. Bodin, XI, 1), Brussels, 1958, pp. 119–139. On βάρβαρος in P.Col.Zen. 66, cf. H. C. Youtie, Scriptiunculae, vol. 2, p. 793.

¹⁶ Plutarch, Sol. 24.4; Per. 37.2–5; Aristotle, Ath. Pol. 26.4; SEG IX, 1. Philo (Post. Cain 109) and Josephus (Life 372) contrast citizens and foreigners, οἱ—πολι—ται καὶ ξένοι (likewise IGLS 51, 45). Of course, exceptions were made because of services rendered to the city (Plutarch, Agis and Cleom. 8 and 32); Dittenberger, Syl. 117, 742; Or. 229); cf. ε—πιδαμία (Syl. 1248).

¹⁷ Cf. R. Taubenschlag, “Citizens and Non-Citizens in the papyri,” in Opera Minora, vol. 2, pp. 211–221.

¹⁸ Sir 29:25; Acts 10:6, 23; 21:16; 28:7; Heb 13:2 (= IGLS 1963). Cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 1025, 40 (fourth-third century BC); PSI 1241, 30: ξενίζομαι δὲ ε—γὰ καὶ ὁ σὺν ε—μοὶ πλεύσας Σαραπίων . . . εἰ—ς τὴν ῥύμην—Ωριγένους ε—ν οἰ—κία Ἡρακλείδου (republished SB 7562).

¹⁹ Phrynichus: πανδοχει—ον, οἱ— διὰ τοῦ χ’ λέγοντες ἀμαρτάνουσιν. διὰ γὰρ τοῦ κ’ χρῆ λέγειν πανδοκει—ον καὶ πανδοκεύς καὶ πανδοκεύτρια (ed. C. Lobeck, p. 307). In the papyri (ξενοδοχει—α does not appear in them before the sixth century, cf. G. Husson, “L’Hospitalité dans les papyrus byzantins,” in Proceedings XIII, pp. 174ff.), ξενοδοχει—ον is “the hospitality,” the place set aside for guests in a monastery (P.Oxy. 2044, 18; 2480, 44; cf. 1910, 4). According to Dio Cassius, the soldiers of Antoninus “spent the winter in the houses, consuming the property of their hosts” (πάντα τὰ τω—ν ξενοδοκούντων σφα—ς, 78.3). Theophrastus correctly wrote ξενοδοκία: how to find a good welcome with strangers (Char. 23.9).

²⁰ Matt 25:35; Rom 12:13; Heb 13:2 (C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, pp. 809–815; P. Miquel, “Hospitalité,” in Dict. spir., vol. 7, pp. 808ff.). P.Lond. 1917, 4 and 14 puts φιλοξενία in relationship with the Holy Spirit. Hospitality is a virtue that was practiced marvelously by the pagans from the time of Homer (H. I. Kakride, Notion de l’amitié; V. T. Avery, “Homeric Hospitality in Alcaeus and Horace,” in CP, 1964, pp. 107–109). At Chersonesus, a benefactor of the city is praised for having practiced personal hospitality toward the citizens of the city in times of scarcity (B. Latyshev, Inscriptiones Antiquae, vol. 3, n. 68, 25). Cimon, the most hospitable of the Greeks (Plutarch, Cim. 10.4) had a meal prepared at his home each day for a large number of people, including poor people, and surpassed the ancient hospitality and beneficence of the Athenians (10.1, 6). In AD 43, Junia Theodora “does not cease, through her devotion, to offer hospitality to all the Lycians and receive them in her own home” (SEG XVIII, 143, 25ff.). Judaism particularly praises the hospitality of Abraham (Philo, Abraham 107–118; T. Abr. A 1, 4, 17) and of Job (T. Job 10, 14).

²¹ 2Kgs 4:8; Luke 10:38; Acts 16:15; Rom 16:1–2; Heb 11:31; Jas 2:25.

²² Soldiers have the right to lodging (edict of Germanicus, AD 19, SB 3924, 8). This was a very heavy burden; the inhabitants of Phana in Syria built a ξένων to avoid having to receive soldiers into their homes (edict of the legate Julius Saturninus; Dittenberger, Or. 609). In AD 49, an edict of the prefect Cnaius Vergilius Capito bans abuses: “Let traveling officials receive nothing but lodging, and nothing that is not provided for by the rules of Maximus” (ibid. 665, 20 = SEG VII, 794 = SB 8248). The Suda and Hesychius give as an equivalent term κατάλυμα, and the latter adds καταγωγει—ον. In Sir 29:27—“My brother is here; I need lodging”—the manuscripts S and A have translated with οι—κίας instead of ξενίας; cf. the ordinance of Domitian in IGLS 1998, 11 (with the editors’ note).

²³ P.Brem. XV, 4: ξυλικὰ ἔργα τω—ν τε ι—ερω—ν καὶ τῆς ξενίας (second century); cf. P.Oslo 87, 12. A raid on a neighboring town caused an influx of guests at the hostelry of Pinuris: ἔβαλον γὰρ εἰ—ς κώμην εἰ—ς τὴν ξενίαν (P.Oxy. 1853, 3; sixth-seventh century). In the fourth-fifth century, προβῆ τὸ ἔργον τῆς μικρα—ς ξενίας τῆς περὶ τὴν ληνόν (PSI 50, 16). Cf. ξενίδιον (diminutive of ξενία, cf. οι—κία—οι—κίδιον), a small house for strangers, premises designed for dwelling, P.Tebt. 335, 17.

²⁴ SB 9406, 122 and 201: θυρουρω— ξενίας μέτρα (ἔξ); 9408, col. 124; 9409, col. I, 112: Κοπρέα θιλουρὸς ξενίας μέτρα πέντε; col. III, 80 (third century).

²⁵ An Athenian decree from the fourth century BC asks that “the envoys Sotis and Theodosios be praised for their good offices on behalf of travelers going from Athens to the Bosphorus, and that they be invited to dinner (ε—πὶ ξένια) at the πρυτανει—ον the next day” (Dittenberger, Syl. 206, 52). In the second-third century, “The decurion invites you to his soirée (εἰ—ς τὴν ξενίαν ε—αυτοῦ) the sixth before Calends, at eight hours.”

²⁶ O.Wilck I, pp. 389ff. H. Bolkestein, Wohltätigkeit und Armenpflege im vorchristlichen Altertum, Utrecht, 1939, pp. 218ff., 231, 343. Cf. P.Grenf. II, 14 b verso 2 (third century BC); P.Tebt. 33, 11 (112 BC).

²⁷ Thus Moulton-Milligan, citing SB 3924, 7: καὶ ε—πὶ σκηνώσεις καταλαμβάνεσθαι ξενίας πρὸς βίαν (AD 19); ε—ὰν γὰρ δέη, αὐτὸς Βαίβιος ε—κ τοῦ ἴσου καὶ δικαίου τὰς ξενίας διαδώσει (ibid., line 17). Cf. τὰ ξένια, “hospitality gifts” or “products imported from abroad,” A. Bernand, Pan, n. 86, 11, p. 259.

ὄγκος

onkos, bulk, mass, weight, fullness, turgidity

onkos, S 3591; TDNT 5.1–36; EDNT 2.491; MM 437; L&N 13.149; BAGD 553

This biblical hapax (Heb 12:1) has at least three meanings. (a) “The bulk of a body, its mass, or its volume.”¹ What Plato called ton ton sarkon onkon,² Aristotle³ and Philo label onkos somatikos: “We must offer the first fruits of our bodily mass, which is truly built of earth and wood” (Prelim. Stud. 96); “When our crowded and noisy element desires the houses that are in Egypt, that is, the bodily mass, it lapses into pleasures that bring death.”⁴ (b) “Weight, heaviness.” Cf. Philostratus: “Those who eat to excess have sagging brows, shortness of breath, hollows under their collarbones, flabby sides; they show a certain heaviness” (onkou ti endeiknymenoi, Gym. 48); “When the mind is grasped by one of the themes of philosophical contemplation, it submits to its impulse and follows it until it forgets all bodily heaviness” (ton somatikon onkon);⁵ (c) “fullness”; in a positive sense, “gravity”;⁶ in a pejorative sense, “turgidity, distension.” In Hippocrates, Diodorus Siculus, and Aelian, it often refers to obesity; but usually it means a fatuousness, an outgrowth of pride or vanity. Hesychius gives this definition: *onkos: physema, hyperephania, eparsis, megethos.*⁷

The sports metaphor in Heb 12:1—“casting aside every weight” (onkon apothemenoi panta)—conforms on the one hand to the traditional discipline of the athlete who runs stripped (gymnos), unburdened of every weight, with complete freedom of movement.⁸ On the other hand, it fits in with the Philonian principle of what could be called “spiritual unballasting,” which is necessary for all virtuous people.⁹ Commenting on Gen 37:17—“they are gone from here”—where he sees an allusion to the weight of the body (somatikon onkon), Philo understands Moses to be showing that “all those who, in order to attain virtue, persevere in the effort, after leaving behind the terrestrial regions, have decided to rise without dragging along with them any of the miseries of the body. He declares that he has heard them say, ‘Let us leave for Dothan.’ Now Dothan stands for suitable detachment” (Worse Attacks Better 27); “Our soul often moves by itself, having shed all the weight of the body (holon ton somatikon onkon ekdysa) and cleared away the press of the senses” (Dreams 1.43); “If you seek God, O my thought, seek him after exiting yourself; as long as you abide in the weights of the body (menousa de en tois somatikois onkois) or in the presumptions of the intelligence, you are not in pursuit of divine things” (Alleg. Interp. 3.47). At this point it is difficult to remove the author of Hebrews from the spirituality and vocabulary of the Alexandrian philosopher.

¹ Aristotle, Cael. 3.1.299b7: “The dense differs from the rare in being more abundant in an equal volume” (ε—ν ἴσῳ ὄγκῳ); Aristotle, Part. An. 3.13.674a5: “The viscera are distinguished from the flesh not only by their volume (τω— ὄγκῳ τοῦ σώματος) but also by the fact that the flesh is on the outside of the body, whereas the viscera are on the interior.” Cf. P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique, p. 773.

² Plato, Leg. 12.959 c; we must not think that “the being that is ours is this heap of flesh that is in the process of being buried.”

³ Aristotle, Ph. 4.1.209a3: “Supposing that place exists . . . the question is what it is, whether it is so to speak a bodily mass or some other nature.” Plutarch, Quaest. conv. 5.485 c.

⁴ Philo, Alleg. Interp. 2.77. A letter from the fourth century: “having for this reason borrowed a large sum of money” (ε—κ τούτου ὄγκον ἀργυρίου δανεισάμενος, P.Lond. 1915, 20); cf. the horoscope from the first-second century, ε—πίτριτος ὄγκῳ (ibid. 130, 107 = vol. 1, p. 136).

⁵ Philo, Migr. Abr. 191; cf. Alleg. Interp. 3.149: “There is no proportion between the weights of the body (τοι—ς σωματικοι—ς ὄγκοις) and the desire of a soul that does not have self-mastery”; Sacr. Abel and Cain 63: celebrating the Passover “having taken upon ourselves the weight of the flesh (τὸν σάρκινον ὄγκον), I mean our sandals”; Plutarch, De def. or. 20. A metrical epitaph: τίς θάνεν—Ἡρωῖς—Πω—ς καὶ πότε—Γαστρὸς ἔχουσα ὄγκον ε—ν ὠδει—σιν θηκαμένα τε βάρος (SEG VIII, 802 = SB 7288, 2). P. Roussel (“Une inscription funéraire d’Egypte,” in REA, 1914, pp. 349–350) compares Euripides, Ion 16: γαστρὸς δῖνηεγκ ὄγκον and Nauck, Tragicorum Graecorum Fragmenta, 2d ed., anon. n. 186: πλήρει γὰρ ὄγκῳ γαστρὸς αὔξεται Κύπρις.

⁶ Aristotle, Rh. 3.6.1407b26: ὄγκος τῆς λέξεως, a stately style; Philo, Joseph 65: “the austere and rigid person . . . who always shows himself to be grave and solemn” (ὄγκῳ καὶ σεμνότητι); Josephus, War 4.319: “Ananias, despite the gravity of his noble birth, his dignity, and his honors, loved to treat the most humble folk as his equals”; 7.443: “Catullus inflated the affair considerably”; Plutarch, De Pyth. or. 22: “We want the voice and the utterance of the Pythia . . . to be in rhythmic cadence, with gravity (ὄγκῳ), modulations, stylistic figures, and the accompaniment of a flute”; cf. 29.

⁷ Cf. Sophocles, Aj. 129: “Do not be swelled up with pride any more”; Philo, Drunkness 128: “Reason increases its volume not by the vain swelling of pride, but by the immense development of virtue”; Prelim. Stud. 128: “to swell up, to be full of clouds of vanity, to be all decked out in excessive pretension”; Creation 1, certain lawmakers surround “their thought with superfluous swelling”; Decalogue 43: “Since I am a man I will allow myself neither splendor (ὄγκον) nor grand tragic airs”; Moses 1.153; Worse Attacks Better 113; Husbandry 61; Josephus, Ant. 18.222; Plutarch, Cor. 13.4: “Marcius, all swelled up with self-importance and pride” (μεστὸς ὦν ὄγκου καὶ μέγας); Plutarch, De gen. 579 f 11: “pretentious invention”; Plutarch, Agis 3.9: ostentation. De audiendo 4; Plutarch, De Pyth. or. 25: “without emphasis or studied elegance . . . a tragic and emphatic style.” P.Ross.Georg. III, 10, 25; IV, 27; I d 5.

⁸ The athlete must “submit to all kinds of abstinence” (1Cor 9:25), “hold to a strict discipline, eat according to the rules, give up cakes” (Epictetus, Ench. 29; cf. Epictetus, Diatr. 1.24.2). His diet especially was supervised (Seneca, Lucil. 2.17.1), because everything had to be eliminated that could hinder breathing or the free movement of the limbs, i.e., all clothing, and if possible all superfluous fat (ἀποτίθημι: put away from oneself, out of oneself, Rom 13:12; Eph 4:22; Col 3:8).

⁹ Cf. Philo, Contemp. Life 27: each evening, the Therapeutai “pray that their souls, completely cleansed of the tumult of the senses and the objects of sensory perception . . . may follow the paths of truth” (ὄχλου must be read and not ὄγκου; cf. the possible confusion of ὄκνος and ὄγκος in P.Lond. III, 1164, h 8; T. C. Skeat, in Hommages à C. Préaux, Brussels, 1975, p. 792).

ὀθόνη, ὀθόνιον

othone, othonion, linen cloth, strip, bandage

othone, S 3607; EDNT 2.493; MM 439; L&N 3.153; BAGD 555 | othonion, S 3608; EDNT 2.493; MM 439; L&N 6.154; BAGD 555

In their various usages, these two nouns are nearly synonymous,¹ and the diminutive—usually occurring in the plural—is diminutive in form only, retaining the same meaning as the noun from which it is derived.² The basic meaning is “linen cloth” of whatever shape or size (cf. P.Cair.Zen. 59594, 3: epanekein diaphora ton othonion; P.Mich. 607, 30: othonion Tarsikon Aigyption); but the emphasis is on its fineness and whiteness.³ At Joppa, Peter saw an “object” (skeuos) descend from heaven, like a large piece of cloth.⁴

The three occurrences of othonion in the OT refer to garments of finecloth (Judg 14:13; Hos 2:5, 9), which is the dominant meaning in the papyri.⁵ It is known that in Egypt the production of these fine materials was monopolized by the state workshops and the temples, which paid a fee to the treasury for the right to make them: telos othonion.⁶ Hence the abundance of texts beginning with the third century BC: while Petosiris was at the temple of Moithymis, brigands entered his house, robbed his wife and his mother of their clothing, and took his daughter's "linen robe worth one hundred drachmas."⁷ Othonia and linen tunics are bequeathed in wills (P.Oxy. 15, 12), a woman wears one to her home as a dowry (Pap.Lugd.Bat. II, 5, 17). They are mentioned in inventories along with names of garments such as himation, chiton, chlamys, hypokamisa, sindon, etc.⁸ In various instances a kainon othonion is specified (P.Hib. 793, col. VI,1), the color saffron (P.Oxy. 1679, 5), children's clothing (P.Alex. 39, 11, hyper othonion ton teknon) or a mother's clothes (SB 9876, 7; cf. P.Lond. 1942, 4–5), or the fact that someone lacks othonia (S. Witkowski, Epistulae Privatae Graecae 1, 3).

On the basis of these usages, a number of modern interpreters identify the othonia which according to St. John covered the body of Jesus in the tomb⁹ as the winding-sheet (sindon), the piece of cloth mentioned by the Synoptics.¹⁰ Thus the othonia would be a large linen sheet of fine weave.¹¹ But this interpretation accounts for neither the plural form, which should at least be translated "linens" (these are mentioned a number of times in burials),¹² nor the force of the verb deo in John 19:40, where we are told that Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus "took Jesus' body and bound it with othonia."¹³ We may compare Lazarus leaving the tomb, wrapped hand and foot in bandages. Jesus says to them, "Unbind him and let him go" (John 11:44). If he had been simply wrapped in a shroud, he could have freed himself; but he could not, because he was fettered, bound hand and foot. Clearly the othonia are precisely these wrappings, these bandages, which hold the body fast and allow the close fitting of the large shroud,¹⁴ conformably to Jewish custom.¹⁵

If this meaning of othonion is not attested in the papyri, it is current in the medical vocabulary¹⁶ and was remarked upon by Dom Augustin Calmet and J. J. Wettstein (on Luke 24:12). Hippocrates knew the meaning "fine linen,"¹⁷ but he repeatedly uses the plural for the strips that the physician uses for fractures and dislocations (Liqu. 1.2; 5.2; 7.1); they have to be strong, but also light, fine, supple, clean, and appropriately sized (Off. 8, 11, 12, 22). If they are wrapped too tight, the compression causes swelling,¹⁸ etc. Among the objects in the physician's supply chest, J. Pollux mentions the othonion together with bandages and ties, desma, epidesma, telamon (Onom. 4.181).

So even though the translation "bandages, strips of linen" did not appear in French Bibles until 1879 with the versions of E. Reuss and L.

Second, E. Delebecque is quite right to translate Luke 24:12 “He saw only the bandages,”¹⁹ and F. M. Braun was right to translate John 19:40 “They wrapped him in linens, binding him with bandages, according to the burial custom of the Jews.”²⁰

¹ Cf. P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique, on this word. —Οθόνη is not used in the LXX, and ὀθόνιον is not used in Philo.

² Cf. F. M. Abel, Grammaire, p. 114, 26 s.

³ Philo, Dreams 1.217: “The finest linen does not tear . . . when it is perfectly clean, it has a glittering and shining whiteness.” Hence the variant at Acts 10:11—ὡς ὀθόνην λαμπράν in Const. App. 6.12.6. Cf. Acts Thom. 168: ἤνεγκαν οὖν ε—νδύματα κάλλιστα ὀθόναις πολλαι—ς. The fineness of Egyptian linens was famous, cf. F. Cumont, L’Egypte des astrologues, p. 118, n. 4.

⁴ Acts 10:11; 11:5 (ὀθόνη). In the fourth century AD, Theophanes, an official in the Roman administration, while traveling from Egypt to Antioch, prepared a list of the things that he was taking with him (ἀναγραφὴ σκευω—ν), including clothing: ὀθονίων ὁμοίως (P.Ryl. 627, 9; cf. J. Blinzler, “—Οόνια und andere Stoffbezeichnungen im Wäschekatalog des Ägypters Theophanes und im N.T.,” in Philologus, 1955, pp. 158–166). The dimension of a “cloth” can be considerable, since ὀθόνη refers to the sail of a ship, in Philo, Moses 2.90: “pieces of fine linen (ὀθόναι), like the sails of a ship, were fitted to the columns” of the tabernacle; Mart. Pol. 15.2: “The fire presented the likeness of a room, like the sail (ὀθόνη) of a ship filled by the wind, walling in the body of the martyr.” C. Lavergne, “La Preuve de la résurrection de Jésus d’après Jean XX, 7,” in Sindon III, 5–6 (Turin) 1961, pp. 8ff.

⁵ Cf. in addition the vestments of the high priest (Philo, Spec. Laws 1.84), the light tunic (ibid. 2.20: λεπτήν ὀθόνην; cf. Aeneas Tacticus 18.12), worn in summer (Contemp. Life 38); Josephus, Ant. 5.290; 12.117 (= Ep. Arist. 320): the king sent to Eleazar some pieces of fine linen or cambric (βυσσίνης ὀθόνης); Rosetta Stone: “Ptolemy put back in the royal treasury two-thirds of the flaxen cloth that was delivered in the temples” (Dittenberger, Or. XC, 18); P.Eleph. 27 a 16: βυσσίνων ὀθονίων; P.Stras. 91, 16. Cf. Rev 18:12, 16; 19:8, 14. E. Wipszycka, L’Industrie textile dans l’Egypte romaine, Warsaw, 1965, pp. 109ff.

⁶ O.Bodl. 1068–1070; εἰ—ς τιμὴν ὀθονίων βασιλικω—ν (ibid., part 4, n. 6, p. 154; second century BC); P.Rev. (ed. J. Bingen, col. 93, 7; 98, 9); P.Amh. 29, 13; BGU 1376; P.Tebt. 5, 63: “remission of the arrears due on the tax of the ε—πιστάται and on the exchange value of the supplies of fine linen”; P.Oxy. 1414, 11: a request to readjust the wages of the λινόφοι οί— μέλλοντες ὑφαίνειν τὴν ὀθόνην τοῦ ι—εροῦ ἀναβολικοῦ; P.Rein. 120, 3; 121, 3: Psenchonsis has paid to the bank of Diospolis first two thousand drachmas, then one thousand, on the price of the royal linens; P.Hib. 67, 10; 68, 6 (third century BC). Hence the instruction given by a διοικητής to a subordinate who was supposed to visit the workshops where the linen was woven and see that the linen was good (P.Hib. 703, 88, 97). Cf. U. Wilcken, Griechische Ostraca, vol. 1, pp. 266–269; U. Wilcken, Grundzüge, I, 1, pp. 245ff.; I, 2, n. 308.

⁷ SB 9068, 22; cf. 9867, 7; P.Grenf. 38, 14. —Οθόνια are bought and sold (ibid. 9557, 38, 43, 48); P.Hib. 794, 12; P.Stras. 174, 4; S. Witkowski, Epistulae Privatae Graecae 41, 5: πέπρακα τὸ ὀθόνιον (δραχμῶ—ν) φ? καὶ τὸ εἰ—μάτιον (δραχμῶ—ν) τπ?; they are sent out (Stud.Pal. XX, 149, 7; P.land. 151, 8; P.Hamb. 106, 4: ἀπεσταλμένα σοι ὀθόνια); the price is often mentioned (P.Hib. 211, 8; 769, 45; 890, 32; P.Lond. 29, 2; vol. 1, p. 163; SB 9557, 48), but it varies: “I have heard that you have ὀθόνια at a good price” (P.Giss. 68, 11); a night shirt (ὀθονιον ε—γκοιμήτριον) costs one thousand drachmas in the second century BC (UPZ 85, 8); “I gave Demetrios two ὀθόνια for five thousand drachmas” (UPZ 85, 42; cf. P.Bon. 38 A, col. I, 11). In the third century BC, weavers offer their services and specify what they will be paid: three qualified men and a woman would have to work six days to weave a fine piece of linen: ε—πιβάλλει ε—κάστω ὀθονίῳ σώματα γ—, γυνὴ μία καὶ ε—ν ἡμέραιθ ἕξ ε—κτήμνησαι (PSI 599, 11–14).

⁸ Stud.Pal. XX, 245, 8, 13, 14; P.Apoll. 104, 1; SB 9535, 11; 9568, 1; P.Oxy. 1741; UPZ 91, 4; 93, 4; 101, 20; P.Madrid, inv. 16, 1 (published by P. Photiades, “Un papyrus documentaire de la collection de Madrid,” in Emerita, 39, 1961, pp. 117–119); P.Sorb., inv. 2142, 4 (published by A. Bataille, “Un inventaire de vêtements inédits,” in Eos XLVII = Symbolae R. Taubenschlag, vol. 2, pp. 83–88 = SB 9750). P.Ryl. 627, 9; cf. Ps.-Callisthenes 1.3.3: ὀθόνην ἀμφιασάμενος οἷα προφήτης Αἰ—γύπτιος.

⁹ John 20:5—John leans over and βλέπει κείμενα τὰ ὀθόνια; verse 6, Peter in turn θεωρεῖ— τὰ ὀθόνια κείμενα; verse 7: the shroud, rolled up separately, οὐ μετὰ τῶ—ν ὀθονίων. Luke 24:12: Peter βλέπει τὰ ὀθόνια μόνα. Cf. A. Vaccari, “Ἐδησαν αὐτὸ ὀθονίοις (John XIX, 40),” in Miscellanea Biblica B. Ubach, Montserrat, 1953, pp. 375–386; S. Bartina, “—Οθόνια ex papyrorum testimoniis linteamina,” in SPap, 1965, pp. 7–38; R. E. Brown, John, vol. 2, p. 941.

¹⁰ Matt 27:59; Mark 15:46; Luke 23:53. P. Savio, “Sindone e sudario,” in Salesianum, 1954, pp. 408–416; cf. Josephus, Ant. 3.110, 112, 153; but the σινδών in Mark 14:51-52 is a dressing gown.

¹¹ At Lagina, a priest offered τὰ ὀθόνια, fine linen fabric, for the adorning of the goddess (L. Robert, Etudes anatoliennes, p. 552). Josephus, War 5.212, 213. There were fine linens in Aseneth’s room (ὀθόναι ἐπίσημοι, Jos. Asen. 2.7). According to Adam and Eve 48.4 (= Apoc. Mos. 40.2), God orders the archangels to wrap Adam’s body in fine linen cloth; but T. Jud. 26.3 says not to wrap the deceased in expensive material. A similar ban appears in P.Berlin 3115 (from 110–107?): “Do not give linen or a ceremonial veil to a man of Djeme who has died” (edited with commentary by F. de Cenival, Les Associations religieuses en Egypte d’après les documents démotiques, Cairo, 1972, pp. 125, 127).

¹² In the third century BC, ἄλλα εἰς ταφὰς ὀνόναι (P.Hib. 794, 5); in the second century AD, Arsis asks Apollonius to buy fine linens (ὀθόνια εὖωνα) to bury his son Charemon (P.Giss. 68, 11, 25).

¹³ M. J. Lagrange comments “ὀθόνιον in the plural, as at Luke 24:12, to indicate a sheet cut up into strips, or simply strips” (on this text); cf. C. K. Barrett, St. John, p. 465. Dioscorides, Mat. Med. 5.72.2: ἐν ὀθονίῳ . . . ἐνελήσας ὀθονίῳ.

¹⁴ So we should picture the body of Jesus rolled up in a large linen cloth (Matt), bound up with bandages (like Lazarus), with a cloth or shroud on the head, the hands and the feet wrapped separately; cf. J. Blinzler, Trial of Jesus.

¹⁵ S. Safrai, “Home and Family,” in Jewish People in the First Century, Assen-Amsterdam, 1976, vol. 2, pp. 776ff., cites m. Šem. 12.10: “Men may wrap and bind men, but not women. Women may wrap and bind both men and women.” The Talmud refers to linens for wrapping corpses as sadin and takrikim, cf. Str-B, on Matt 27:59, vol. 1, p. 1048.

¹⁶ W. K. Hobart (Medical Language, pp. 218–219) gives numerous references to Hippocrates, Galen, Dioscorides (2.68; 3.84), etc. Cf. Aristophanes, Ach. 1176; Josephus, Ant. 3.152, 3.154; War 5.232: “the wrapping that attached the garment at the chest was made of five pieces, embroidered with flowers; the colors were gold, purple, scarlet, linen, and violet.” —Ἀρχαὶ ὀθόνης refers to the ends or tips of the bandage.

¹⁷ Hippocrates, Acut. 7.2: an infusion is filtered through a linen (δι’ ὀθονίου).

¹⁸ Hippocrates, Fract. 20–21, 27, 32–48; cf. 4, 7, 9–11, 24–26, 31: “Those who for lack of bandages (μὴ ἔχοντες ὀθόνια) are forced to use wool for fresh wounds are to be excused entirely. When there are no bandages (ἄνευ ὀθονίων), there is hardly anything better for these cases than wool”; Art. 50, 62.

¹⁹ “Il voit les bandelettes, seules,” Evangile de Luc, Paris, 1976.

²⁰ “Ils l’enveloppèrent dans les linges, le liant au moyen de bandelettes, selon la manière d’ensevelir pratiquée chez les Juifs,” F. M. Braun, Le Linceul de Turin et l’Evangile de Jean, Tournai-Paris, 1939, p. 30. R. Schnackenburg (John, vol. 3, p. 297) translates: “bind it in linen cloths.” In Gos. 12 App. 21, Jesus says to Thomas: “I will show you the hands of Lazarus, bound in their bandages, wrapped in shrouds, who arose thence, coming out of the tomb” (PO, II, 2, p. 137). Ibid. 25: “Lazarus came out, wrapped in bandages with a shroud over his face. His head was tied up with kouria ” (p. 141). Ibid. 56: “They found the shrouds on the ground with no one there . . . if someone had taken the body (they would have taken) the bandages as well” (p. 172).

οι—κονομέω, οι—κονομία, οι—κονόμος

oikonomeo, to administrate, manage affairs; oikonomia, management of a household, a city, or the world; oikonomos, steward, household manager, city treasurer

oikonomeo, S 3621; EDNT 2.498–500; NIDNTT 2.253–255; MM 442; L&N 46.1; BAGD 559 | oikonomia, S 3622; EDNT 2.498–500; NIDNTT 2.253–256; MM 442; L&N 30.68, 42.25, 46.1; BAGD 559–560 | oikonomos, S 3623; TDNT 5.149–151; EDNT 2.498–500; NIDNTT 2.253–255; MM 442–443; L&N 37.39, 46.4, 57.231; BAGD 560; ND 4.160–161

Oikonomos and oikonomia are derived from oikonomeo, a compound of oikos, “house,” and by extension “things pertaining to the house,” and nemo, “distribute, apportion,” and then “administrate, rule.” Oikonomeo can mean “manage one’s affairs” (Ps 112:5) as well as “make an inventory” (2Macc 3:14), “make arrangements, arrange” (PSI 584, 17; 597, 3); “distribute” parts of sacrificial animals (Fouilles de Delphes III, 3; 238, 6). But in the literal sense of the word, oikonomia, which suggests good order, is as much an art (techne) as a science (episteme), whether it means taking care of property (cf. Xenophon’s Oeconomicus) or seeing to the relations between master and slaves (cf. Aristotle’s Oeconomica). In the first century, oikonomia means the management of a household (oikos), the administration of a city (polis), the running of the world (kosmos), and, in a religious sense, the governing of the universe by God.¹

The first mention of oikonomos in the NT is Luke 12:42—“Who then is the faithful and prudent steward whom the master will set over all his household to distribute the ration of wheat at the appointed time?”² For the oikonomos is chosen for his abilities to carry out this function: hard-working, zealous, competent, circumspect.³ “What is required of stewards is that they be found faithful,”⁴ worthy of the master’s confidence. The person in question is a slave⁵ who distributes the work or the pay among his colleagues. We are quite familiar with these oikonomoi, these majordomos “over the household” (2Kgs 4:6, Hebrew ‘al-habayit; 16:9; 18:3), notably Eliakim (2Kgs 18:18, 37; 19:2; Isa 36:3, 22; 37:2), a confidential aide and sometime ambassador of King Hezekiah, associated with the elders and the priests, the court archivists and scribes, and in charge of administrating the royal property;⁶ he is master of the palace. Similarly, Artemidorus is “chief of the household” for Apollonius (the dioiketes of Ptolemy II Philadelphus): ho epi tes oikias,⁷ who distributes the rations to the servants, for the most part slaves, and accounts for the cost of the upkeep of their clothing.⁸ Above all, there is Zeno, the steward and business agent of the same master: he oversees the livestock (P.Cair.Zen. 59166; 59340), directs the brewery (59297), processes the oil (P.Rev. col. 40, 2–8; 46, 8–20; 47, 1–9; 51, 19), controls the textile revenues (ibid. 107, 1–2; cf. P.Tebt. 703,87–117), the brick-making labor (P.Cair.Zen. 59451), the dikes (59296) and irrigation works (59277; 59825), constructs buildings, hires staff (59329, 59610; PSI 345), makes decisions about the farming land (P.Mich.Zen. 76): “I have sent you the oikonomos Heracleides as you asked so that he may make the arrangements for the grape harvest” (P.Fay. 133, 2); he also manages the workforce (P.Cair.Zen. 59062; 59342), especially the reapers (59301; 59451; P.Mich.Zen. 73), whose wages he pays (P.Col.Zen. 45; P.Wisc. 1). He buys and sells, is responsible for transfers of funds (P.Col.Zen. 75; P.Rev. 41, 14–19), has an account at the bank at Philadelphia (P.Cair.Zen. 59022; 59297; P.Mich.Zen. 38). On occasion, he settles disputes and acts as police chief.⁹ Such freedom of action, extensive authority, and power¹⁰ cannot have been free of abuses, but these are rarely attested.¹¹ In Luke 16:1-3, the oikonomos is not a slave like the steward of a woman of consular rank (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1960, p. 195, n. 355; J. Schmidt, Vie et mort des esclaves dans la Rome antique, Paris, 1973, p. 24), but a free man like Arion, who managed all the wealth of Hyrcanus (Josephus, Ant. 12.199–200: hos hapanta to en Alexandria chremata autou dokei). He was steward over extensive property and was guilty of misappropriation of funds: “There was a rich man who had a steward (hos eichen oikonomon) who was accused of squandering his wealth. . . . 'Prepare the accounts of your administration, for you can no longer be steward.' So the steward said to himself, 'What shall I do? For my master is taking the oikonomia from me?'"¹² "Prepare the accounts of your administration" (apodos ton logon tes oikonomias sou, cf. Matt 25:14-30; Luke 19:11-27) is the start of an accounting operation through which the official gives an account to his master¹³ in accord with the precise rules set forth by Callistratus (Dig. 35.1.82). P. Jouanique¹⁴ groups these rules under four headings: (a) Examination of records ("legendas offerre rationes"): presentation of receipts, of papers that give evidence of receipts and disbursements, etc.; (b) Verification of figures ("computendas offerre rationes"): comparison of the balance to cash on hand; (c) Material payment of the balance in cash ("reliqua solvere"); (d) Settlement of account ("subscribere rationes"). We know how the oikonomos falsified the acknowledgements of debt—that was an easy matter¹⁵—but what is remarkable is his statement of his intentions. "I know what I will do, so that they will receive me into their houses when I have been removed from the oikonomia " (Luke 16:4) corresponds exactly with the words of Sostratus: "Money is an unstable thing. If you are sure that you will have it forever, keep it and do not share with anyone. But if you are not its master . . . do not refuse to be generous with it. . . . To the extent that you have control over it, use it generously, help everyone, enrich as many people as possible through your own means. There is an imperishable treasure. And if ever your fortunes change, you will get your recompense. It is better to have a true friend before you than hidden riches that you keep buried in the ground" (Menander, Dysk. 797–812).

An oikonomos in the NT may be not only the majordomo of a household or the overseer of a rural estate but a city treasurer, like Erastus, ho oikonomos tes poleos.¹⁶ This official is not a mere cashier, although it is his job to pay for an inscription or provide the crowns for benefactors,¹⁷ but a financial administrator with very wide-ranging powers (C.Ord.Ptol. 24, 3; 33, 9) who organizes banquets (I.Magn. 101, 89) and provides for sacrifices, at which he is associated with the priests.¹⁸ This must have been a person of some importance, since oikonomoi are mentioned so often in the inscriptions—for example, "Diodorus the younger, being oikonomos, dedicated the statue of Agathe Tyche, under the strategia of Claudius Proclus Cestianus"¹⁹—and since King Ptolemy Euergetes II and Queen Cleopatra address them together with high officials: "to the *stratego*i, garrison commanders, epistatai of the guards and police chiefs, epimeletai, oikonomoi, and basilogrammateis, and other officers of the royal administration."²⁰ In an official letter, the oikonomos is to be consulted on the same level as the epistates, the police chief, and the royal scribe (P.Ryl. 572, 41; cf. 575, 8).

So when St. Paul asks: "Let people think of us as servants of Christ and stewards of the mysteries of God" (hos hyperetas Christou kai oikonomos mysterion theou, 1Cor 4:1; cf. 9:17), or when he stipulates that “the episkopos must be blameless as God’s steward” (hos theou oikonomon),²¹ he positions this post precisely: having governmental authority over subordinates, but more importantly being itself subordinate to God. No matter how extensive the powers of oikonomoi, they are not the owners of the treasures of truth²² and grace that are entrusted to them; as they administer these treasures they must remain aware of their dependency and of the accounting that they will have to give. Hence their obligation to be faithful.

This extension of oikonomia to the religious sphere is not novel.²³ The apostle uses it especially in the prison epistles: “the oikonomia of the fullness of time,”²⁴ “the oikonomia of the grace of God, which he has entrusted to me for you” (Eph 3:2), “the oikonomia of the hidden mystery” (3:9); “I have become a minister (of the church) according to God’s oikonomia (plan of salvation), the carrying out of which has been entrusted to me for you” (Col 1:25). Oikonomia is the activity of the oikonomos (Luke 16:2-4), in the form of the dispensation of salvation, its actualization for each one, thanks to the minister of God. In the papyri, oikonomia certainly refers to the act of administering,²⁵ but more often to legal or judicial action: “He is debarred, from such time as he receives a copy of the present petition, from carrying out any legal proceedings against me or molesting either my person or the above-named guarantors” (P.Rein. 7, 34; second century BC). A mother of three children who knows how to write pleads for the right to sign, without being represented by a kyrios, in any transaction (choris kyriou chrematizein en hais poiountai oikonomiais, P.Oxy. 1467, 8; cf. P.Magd. 32, 6; Epictetus 3.24.92: a ruling and a well-ordered measure); a transaction (P.Tebt. 30, 18), a procedure (P.Tebt. 318, 18), a sale contract (Pap.Lugd.Bat. II, 7, 27), a proxy (P.Fouad 36, 32; P.Mil. 39, 5), an agreement (P.Mich. 262, 10; AD 35), an arrangement (P.Tebt. 764, 24; SB 9454, 9), any contract.²⁶ Ministers of the church are therefore written into the new “covenant” to actualize the redemptive purpose and plan of salvation; their job is to put it into effect as well as possible. They are dispensers of salvation,²⁷ but only in that they “put into effect the measures” (cf. Ep. Arist. 24; Polybius 4.67.9) taken by God from all eternity.

¹ God is like a διοικητής (cf. Wis 12:18; 15:1) who is in charge of the world (Ep. Arist. 143, 201, 254; cf. Philo, Creation 17; Decalogue 53; Quest. Gen. 4.110; Quest. Exod. 2.39) and carries out his purposes through intermediaries: Destiny, the heavenly bodies, nature, the λόγος, and even each human individual (Epictetus 3.22.2; cf. Luke 12:42-47; 1Pet 4:10; Philo, Rewards 113). Diodorus Siculus calls historians who write universal history “ministers (ὑπουργοί) of divine providence . . . allocating to each individual the portion allotted to him by destiny” (1.1; cf. 5.1); Polybius 1.4.1–4; 5.31; Josephus, Ant. 2.24; 4.47; 18.284; War 3.6. Cf. J. Reumann, “OIKONOMIA—Terms in Paul in Comparison with Lucan Heilsgeschichte,” in NTS, vol. 13, 1967, pp. 147–167; A. J. Festugière, Dieu cosmique, pp. 77ff. H. J. Mason, Greek Terms, p. 71.

² Τὸ σιτομέτριον = dimensum cibum = peras; cf. A. Deissmann, Bible Studies, pp. 158ff.; E. J. Bickerman, “The Maxim of Antigonus of Socho,” in HTR, 1951, p. 155.

³ P.Tebt. 27, 21: φρόντισον ὅπως . . . πρὸς ται—ς οι—κονομίαις καὶ ἀρχιφυλακείαις προχειρισθ—σιν ἀξιόλογοι (114 BC). Pliny, Pan. 78. The οι—κονόμος is the dispensator, cf. CIG 3738: Γενέαλις Καίσαρος δούλου οι—κονόμος ε—πὶ τοῦ σείτου = CIL III, 333: “Genialis Caesaris Augusti servos verna dispensator ad frumentum.” Οι—κονόμοι may be promoted: the dispensator is a former actor or villicus. A villicus advances from one statio of the portorium to another (cf. G. Boulvert, Les Esclaves et les affranchis impériaux sous le Haut-Empire romain, Aix-en-Provence, 1964, vol. 2, pp. 607ff., 619; cf. vol. 1, p. 156). Cf. S. J. de Laet, Portorium, Bruges, 1949, pp. 287ff.; 274, n. 3; 380ff.; 394, 414.

⁴ 1Cor 4:2—ἵνα πιστός τις εὑρεθῆ; cf. Num 12:7 (Sir 45:4; Heb 3:2; Moses); 1Sam 22:14 (David); Neh 9:8 (Abraham); 1Sam 2:35 (the priests); Matt 25:21; Luke 16:10 (the disciple); Eph 6:21; Col 4:7 (Tychicus); cf. ChrEg, 1951, p. 366.

⁵ This is why St. Paul does not expect to be rewarded for his stewardship of the apostolate (1Cor 9:17; cf. J. Reumann, “Οι—κονομία = Covenant: Terms for Heilsgeschichte in Early Christian Usage,” in NovT, 1959, pp. 282–299). Cf. a freed slave, MAMA VIII, 386.

⁶ Cf. R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel, vol. 1, pp. 122, 129–130. Cf. Esth 1:8—“The king had ordered all the stewards of his household (Hebrew rab-bayit) to serve each one as he wished” and the act of adoration to Isis done in 89 by Trypho “for Castor, the king’s kinsman, idios logos, and oikonomos” (Κάστωρος τοῦ συγγενοῦς καὶ πρὸς τω— ι—δίῳ λόγῳ καὶ οι—κονόμου τοῦ βασιλέως, Dittenberger, Or. 188 = SB 8403; cf. the commentary of A. Bernand, Philae, I, n. 32, 3; cf. Josephus, Ant. 12.190; 8.164—Salome sends her ships μετὰ τω—ν ι—δίῳν οι—κονόμων). With this authority, οι—κονόμος is assimilated to ε—πίτροπος (2Macc 11:1; 13:2). While still a child, the heir is master of his inheritance but cannot exercise his rights, “being in submission to tutors and stewards” who manage his property (Gal 4:2); cf. the edict of Tiberius Julius Alexander: “I order that every imperial procurator or oikonomos have his seat here” (ε—πίτροπος τοῦ Κυρίου ἢ οι—κονόμος, Dittenberger, Or., 669, 22; cf. J. S. Callaway, “Paul’s Letter to the Galatians and Plato’s Lysis,” in JBL, 1948, pp. 353–355).

⁷ P.Cair.Zen. 59159, 16; cf. Prosop.Ptol., vol. 1, n. 62–64. The list of oikonomoi is supplied, n. 1002–1097; vol. 2, n. 2510–2513; vol. 8, pp. 81ff. P.Tebt. 703, 87–117 is a “steward’s manual.”

⁸ P.Cair.Zen. 59398; 59539; 59698–59700, 59707, 59709. Among these servants are a table steward and a gardener (59059), porters (59292, 58, 76; 59326, 190; 59333; 59493), slaves (59076; 59606), a harp player (59028; 59059; 59087, 59699).

⁹ P.Lille 4; P.Cair.Zen. 59368; PSI 359; P.Lond. 208, 4. All of this is extracted from C. Préaux, Les Grecs en Egypte d’après les archives de Zénon, Brussels, 1947; C. Préaux, Economie royale; cf. A. Swiderek, “Les Κάϊσαροι οι—κονόμοι de l’Egypt romaine,” in ChrEg, vol. 45, 1970, p. 158.

¹⁰ Whether with respect to property, procurement, sales, or a will, the verb οι—κονομέω is used for a sovereign right to act: “Anthistia Cronous shall have possession and ownership of the property designated below . . . and shall dispose of it as she sees fit” (καὶ οι—κονομει—ν περὶ αὐτῶ—ν ὡς ἄν θέλῃ, P.Phil. 11, 19); Thesis gives her husband Ptolion full authority to collect sums that are due to her, to bring in the harvests, and to manage all of her property as he will” (καὶ οι—κονομει—ν περὶ αὐτῶ—ν ὡς ε—άν αι—ρήται, P.Fouad 35, 9; in AD 48; cf. 39, 7; P.Mich. 428, 9; P.Oxy. 2134, 22; 2136, 11; 2236, 26; P.Stras. 314, 24; P.Ryl. 709, 9; P.Ross.Georg. II, 30, 13); “Artemis shall have full ownership of this house; she shall receive all of its produce and use it and dispose of it as she sees fit” (P.Thead. 1, 14). The right to arrange, inhabit, administer, build, sell, transfer, give, do anything whatsoever with authority and without hindrance (C.P.Herm. 25, 14; cf. P.Oxy. 2270, 6), “oversee and administer and control all the affairs of the monastery” (P.Lond. 1913, 13; from the fourth century; cf. P.Michael. 40, 30; 42 A 23). With respect to Isa 22:21 (Hebrew memshalâh), J. Reumann has emphasized this mastery of the oikonomos (NTS, vol. 13, 1967, p. 151). The best explanation of the tasks of the oikonomos is provided by the instructions given one by a διοικητής (P.Tebt. 703; cf. V. Poláček, “P.Tebt. 703: Its Significance Then and Today,” in Proceedings XII, pp. 411–426). Cf. Harmachis, ὁ παρὰ Ὁρου τοῦ οι—κονόμου (P.Stras. 563; cf. 113, 7; P.Tebt. 825 b 7–8). This important local representative of the oikonomos receives from him the order to conclude a transaction with the agent of the σιτόλογος (P.Stras. 562): a shipment of grain from Alexandria to the royal θησαυρός (granary) at Techto (?); cf. W. Clarysse, “Harmachis, Agent of the Oikonomos,” in Ancient Society, vol. 7, 1976, pp. 185–207.

¹¹ For example, mismanaging revenues (P.Rev. 19, 15–16; 46, 4); attaching the wages of a pseudo-debtor who owed nothing (P.Enteux. 87).

¹² In Isa 22:19, Yahweh deposes Shebna, the majordomo of Hezekiah, and installs Eliakim, a good steward, in his place (cf. Pharaoh and Joseph: παραδίδωσιν αὐτῷ— τὴν οἰ—κονομίαν, Josephus, Ant. 2.89; cf. 2.57). Cf. A. Rücker, “Über das Gleichnis vom ungerechten Verwalter,” in Biblische Studien, vol. 17, 1912; A. Feuillet, “Les Riches Intendants du Christ,” in RSR, 1947, pp. 30–54; A. Descamps, “La Composition littéraire de Luc XVI, 9–13,” in NovT, 1956, pp. 47–53; F. Maas, “Das Gleichnis vom ungerechten Haushalter,” in Theologia Viatorum, vol. 8, 1962, pp. 173–184; D. R. Fletcher, “The Riddle of the Unjust Steward,” in JBL, 1963, pp. 15–30; E. Kamlah, “Die Parabel vom ungerechten Verwalter,” in Festschrift O. Michel, Leiden, 1963, pp. 276–294; H. Kosmala, “The Parable of the Unjust Steward in the Light of Qumran,” in ASTI, vol. 3, 1964, pp. 114–121; C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, pp. 371, 438, n. 2; R. G. Lunt, “The Parable of the Unjust Steward,” in ExpT, vol. 77, 1966, pp. 132–136; H. Drexler, “Zu Lukas XVI, 1–7,” in ZNW, 1967, pp. 286ff. G. Hubrecht, “Essai de commentaire juridique de la Parabole de l’Intendant infidèle,” in Mélanges J. Brethe de la Gressaye, Bordeaux, 1967, pp. 325–330. J. M. Derrett, Law in the NT, pp. 48–77; J.A. Fitzmyer, Semitic Background, pp. 161–184; E. Kraemer, Das Rätsel der Parabel vom ungerechten Verwalter: Lk XVI, 1–13, Zurich, 1972; J. Dupont, Béatitudes, vol. 3, pp. 118ff.; G. Schwarz, “. . . lobte den betrügerischen Verwalter? (Lukas, 16, 8ff.),” in BZ, 1974, pp. 94–96; E. Delebecque, Etudes grecques, pp. 89–97.

¹³ Cato, Agr. 5.3. Cf. P.Hib. 69, the steward and chief banker Asclepiades gives this order to Clitarchus, banker of the τοπαρχία of Koites: “Come on the eighth of Aphyr and bring the accounts of Phaophi and of the balance of cash assets.” At Elephantine, in 223–222, Euphronius, on a tour of inspection, did not find Milo at his post; he orders him to come and find him, bringing written records to justify his whole administration, and giving oral explanations: κομίζων πάντα τὰ γράμματα καὶ εἴ τι ἄλλο ὠικονόμηκας καὶ ὧν πεποίησαι διαγραφῶ—ν τὰ ἀντίγραφα (copies of estimates), βουλόμεθα γὰρ συνλαλα—σαι περὶ ὧν ε—πέστειλα (P.Eleph. 9, 4–7). Cf. P.Vindob.Worp 15, 3: “send me the information by the steward” (ZPE, vol. 14, 1974, p. 44). Under the Lagids, the verification of accounts was called διαλογισμός.

¹⁴ P. Jouanique, “Rationem reddere,” in BAGB, 1961, pp. 228–233.

¹⁵ Cf. H. Erman, “La Falsification des actes dans l’Antiquité,” in Mélanges Nicole, Geneva, 1905, pp. 111–134. In addition, a number of documents bear the words “the debtor undertakes to maintain the certificate καθαρὸν ἀπὸ ε—πιγραφῆς καὶ ἀλείφατος, i.e., he will refrain from adding anything by way of surcharge (or above the lines?) and from erasing anything (BGU 578, 15; 666, 31; 717, 24; P.Giss. 96, 15; P.Lips. 10, col. II, 4; P.Tebt. 396, 19; P.Oxy. 719, 27 P.Ryl. 163, 17)” (J. Vergote, “Le Nouveau Testament et la papyrologie juridique,” in Symbolae R. Taubenschlag dedicatae, Warsaw, 1957, vol. 2, p. 158). Consequently, J. Vergote notes that Col 2:14—ε—ξαλείψας τὸ καθ ἡμω—ν χειρόγραφον τοι—ς δόγμασι ὃ ἦν ὑπεναντίον ἡμι—ν should be translated “He has erased (not “destroyed”) the certificate of debt on our account which was, through its clauses, directed against us.”

¹⁶ Rom 16:23; cf. H. J. Cadbury, “Erastus of Corinth,” in JBL, 1931, pp. 42–58, who uses the collection of P. Landvogt, Epigraphische Untersuchungen über den OIKONOMOS, Strasbourg, 1908. Add to this documentation the texts edited by L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 10, p. 83, n. 3; Etudes anatoliennes, pp. 241–243; 263, n. 1; 310. Cf. Chrest.Wilck., vol. 1, pp. 150–152. Cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 1252: πόλεως Κώων οι—κονόμου; Or. 669, 22; A. E. Samuel, “P. Tebt. 703 and the Oikonomos,” in Studi E. Volterra, Milan, 1971, pp. 451–460.

¹⁷ Cf. I.Priene, 6, 30; 83, 10; 99, 13; 109, 266; cf. 108, 347 and 376. I.Magn. 12, 19; 89, 85; 94, 9; 97, 84; 100 a 39; 101, 82 and 89. At Ephesus, M. Ulpius Augusti libertus Pepentinus qui “dispensavit in provincia Asiae annis triginta” (CIL III, 7130). At Mylasa, each tribe had two oikonomoi (C. Michel, Recueil, n. 725, 19). In the Fayum, the οι—κονόμοι σιτικω—ν carried out the λειτουργία of the grain distribution (Dittenberger, Or. 177, 8; 179, 7). “The owners of flocks shall declare to the oikonomos appointed in each ὑπαρχία . . . the exempt and the taxable cattle” (SB 8008, 1 = C.Ord.Ptol. 21; 22, 5). On the oikonomos -treasurer, cf. P.Copenhagen 11, col. I, 3; IV, 7; P.Tebt. 296, 12; P.Oxy. 2116, 11; 2408, 7, 9, 12; 2588, 4, etc.

¹⁸ Cf. LSAM, n. 32, 11; 33, 73; 34, 5.

¹⁹ Inscription from Smyrna, edited by H. W. Pleket (Rijksmuseum, n. 7) and translated by L. Robert (Hellenica, vol. 11–12, pp. 228–230), who notes that Diodorus must have been the city oikonomos and that “the participle οι—κονομω—ν shows that Diodorus was not a permanent, professional ‘steward,’ like the slave of a property owner, but someone carrying out a term of office, probably for the city or for an association.” Cf. idem, I.Sard.Rob., pp. 33ff.

²⁰ C.Ord.Ptol. 47, 4 (140 BC); cf. 53, 142: “No one shall exact any contribution ... for the profit of the strategoï, the epistatai of the guards, the police chiefs, the oikonomoi, their agents, or other functionaries.” Cf. “Metiochus, the oikonomos of our most divine master Emperor Severus Pertinax” (P.Achm. 8, 13; cf. P.Oxy. 929, 25); “Zenodorus, oikonomos and toparchos” (P.Hib. 240, 1–2). In the Byzantine papyri, where oikonomoi of monasteries appear quite frequently (P.Ant. 189, 4; P.Fouad 86, 12; P.Oxy. 1898, 19; 1917, 26; 2206, 4; 2419, 3; 2478, 7), they are described in quite laudatory terms: καταξιώσατε τὸν εὐλαβέστατον οἰκονόμον (P.Oxy. 1875, 10; 1900, 7; P.Stras. 318, 9; P.Ross.Georg. III, 55, 6).

²¹ Titus 1:7 (C. Spicq, “L’Origine évangélique des vertus épiscopales,” in RB, 1946, pp. 36–46); cf. 1Tim 1:4.

²² The Cynic preacher was as a “servant of Zeus, the father of all” (τοῦ κοινοῦ πατρὸς ὑπηρετής, Epictetus 3.22.82, 95), his oikonomos (3.22.3).

²³ Cf. in 163 BC, the men approved for the affairs of the temple of Sarapis and Asclepius (οἱ πρὸς τοῖς χειρισμοῖς ἐν τῷ Σαραπειεῖῳ καὶ Ἀσκληπιεῖῳ τεταγμένοι, UPZ 42, 19–20, 34; cf. 56, 7); O.Joach. 1, 7; 5, 6; 6, 3; 7, 6; 8, 7; 13, 7; 17, 7 (texts mentioned by J. Reumann, “Stewards of God’: Pre-Christian Religious Application of Oikonomos in Greek,” in JBL, 1958, pp. 339–349); Dittenberger, Or. 50, 12; 51, 26. S. Witkowski, Epistulae Privatae Graecae 2, 2: γίνωσκέ με τὸν ἰεροποιῶν ὠικονομημένον.

²⁴ Eph 1:10. Oikonomia can be translated either “plan, dispensation, strategy” (Heilsgeschichte), that is secret, a revealed mystery—the meaning in Jewish apocalyptic writings and in the magical papyri (cf. J. T. Sanders, “Hymnic Elements in Ephesians I–III,” in ZNW, 1965, pp. 230ff.); or “the business activity of an administrator of the interests of a private individual or a city”—a definition that suits the office of the apostle or episkopos (1Cor 4:1–2; 1Tim 1:4; Titus 1:7); cf. M. Barth, Ephesians, vol. 1, pp. 86ff.

²⁵ BGU 1818, 11 (first century BC); 1865, 3; Pap.Lugd.Bat. VI, 1, 29 (first century AD). The foundation of King Attalus II of Pergamum includes: “In the future, let the nomination of the commissaires and the administration be done as follows” (J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. XIII, 33). P.Sorb. 10, 4: “Write me quickly to say how you fulfilled your charge” (τὴν οἰκονομίαν ἣν πεποίησθε). In the sense of working things out, cf. P.Mert. 76, 10 (second century); Xenophon, Cyr. 5.3.25. In SB 8886 = Dittenberger, Or. 177, Philometer, “oikonomos of grain taxes of the circumscription of Herakleides” decides how to allocate food to those who work in his circumscription (first century BC; likewise SB 8888 = Dittenberger, Or. 179). In T. Abr. B 7, Michael explained to Abraham “the whole plan” concerning him (ἤκουσας τὴν οἰ—κονομίαν σου; cf. Diodorus Siculus 1.81.3: “the oikonomia of the private life”). Οἴκοι are posts, stationes.

²⁶ P.Mich. 340, 15 (AD 45); 276, 14 (AD 47). Οἰ—κονομία often has the meaning “document”: ὁ νομικὸς ὁ τὴν οἰ—κονομίαν γράψας (BGU 361, col. III, 2; cf. 1573, 5–6, 14; P.Ross.Georg. II, 20, 8); διὰ τω—ν περὶ τούτων οἰ—κονομείων δηλοῦνται (P.Mich. 186, 11, from AD 72; 187, 8; 235, 10, from AD 41; 262, 31; 303, 8; 322 a 17, 18, from AD 46; 341, 2, from AD 47; P.Mil. 191, 14–15; 192, 13–14). Cf. L. Robert, “Les Inscriptions,” in J. des Gagniers, Laodicée, p. 270.

²⁷ Cf. J. Reumann, “Heilsgeschichte in Luke,” in F. L. Cross, SE, vol. 4, pp. 86–115; K. Duchatelez, “La Notion d’économie et ses richesses théologiques,” in NRT, 1970, pp. 267–292 (with bibliography).

ὀκνέω, ὀκνηρός

okneo, to hesitate, delay; okneros, lazy, idle, negligent, burdensome

okneo, S 3635; EDNT 2.505; MM 444–445; L&N 67.125; BDF §392(1b); BAGD 563 | okneros, S 3636; TDNT 5.166–167; EDNT 2.506; MM 445; L&N 22.8, 88.250; BAGD 563

In literary Greek of the first century, okneo means “hesitate.”¹ This is often its meaning in the LXX (Tob 12:13), where, however, it translates the niphal of the Hebrew ‘asal,² always with negation: “Do not hesitate to set out” (Judg 18:9); “Do not be slow to give thanks to God” (Tob 12:6); “Let this comely slave not delay to come to my lord” (Jdt 12:13). In Sir 7:35, me oknei is synonymous with me amelei: “Do not hesitate to visit the sick, for it is for such deeds that you will be loved.” When the disciples of Joppa ask Peter to come without delay, they use the same turn of phrase as Balak to Balaam in Num 22:16—me okneses dielthein.³

The adjective okneros (Hebrew ‘asel) is always pejorative in the Bible.⁴ It refers to the lazy person, or the loafer, who stays in bed (Prov 6:9; 26:4), whose “hands refuse to work.”⁵ Such a person is eminently worthy of scorn, inspires disgust,⁶ even has the face to justify his inactivity.⁷ This is the case with the wicked and idle servant (ponere doule kai oknere) of the parable of the talents (Matt 25:26), who not only has failed to work to produce a profit on his master’s property but in addition makes excuses for his idleness.⁸

The nuance of culpable unconcern in Rom 12:11 (te spoude me okneroi) is well attested in the papyri, where the author of a letter forbids

the neglect of his instructions (P.Mich. 221, 14; P.Oslo 82, 9; 128, 12; P.Oxy. 2190, 44; 2275, 9; 2596, 11; SB 9497, 26). The recipient is expected to be active, diligent, quick to act (P.Mert. 22, 3; P.Oxy. 1775, 8: ouk oknesa oute palin emelesa; PSI 837, 15; Menander, Mis.: okneros kai tremon eiserchomai, in P.Oxy. 2656, 266), especially when it comes to helping someone in need: spoudasate auto aoknos . . . kai hemis ouk oknesomen (P.Lond. 1916, 16; cf. 2090, 6; PSI 1414, 21).

As for the remark in Phil 3:1—“To write the same things to you is not burdensome to me” (ta auta graphein hymin, emoi men ouk okneron)—is not only a common formula in letters, but an expression of fervor and zeal in affection, used with loved ones: “It is not burdensome for me to write to you” (ou me okneso soi graphin, P.Mich. 491, 14); “Do not be afraid to write letters, because I am extremely glad to get them” (ibid. 482, 22); “Dearest brother, do not hesitate to write to me” (glykytate adelphe, graphon moi me oknei, P.Mert. 85, 16); “Do not hesitate to write me concerning your health” (me okneses graphein moi peri tes hygias sou, P.Harr. 107, 15; cf. P.Mich. 490, 12; SB 10652, B 11); Diogenes writing to his mother in the first century: “If you write to me about anything at all that you need, do not hesitate to write to me; you know that I will do it immediately.”⁹

¹ Philo, Etern. World 84: “I hesitate to say what is not permitted to think”; Josephus, Life 251: “When informed about the matter, I did not hesitate to show myself”; Ag. Apion 1.15: “They do not hesitate to narrate the same events in the most contradictory fashion” (same meaning: ὀκνηρός ἦν, Pharaoh hesitated to kill Moses, Ant. 2.236). 4Macc 14.4: “None of the seven young men trembled, none hesitated before the death sentence.”

² Except at Num 22:16, the niphal of mana', “refuse”: “Do not decline to come to me.”

³ Acts 9:38; cf. P.Oxy. 1769, 7: μὴ ὀκνήσεις οὖν προσελθί—ν αὐτῷ— περὶ οὐ—ε—ὰν χρήζης (third century AD); P.Mich. 213, 14; cf. P.Tebt. 752, 2: μὴ ὀκνήσης τοῦ εἰ—ς οἶκον ἀποστει—λαι.

⁴ Prov 6:6, 9; 20:4; 26:14-15; 31:27—the virtuous woman “does not eat the bread of idleness” (Hebrew aslūt).

⁵ Prov 21:25; 26:15—“The sluggard dips his hand in the dish, but it is too much trouble to bring it back up to his mouth”; cf. Sir 37:11.

⁶ Sir 22:1–2: “The sluggard is like a defiled stone . . . like a heap of manure.”

⁷ “The sluggard says, ‘There is a lion outside, I will be killed on the street’” (Prov 22:13; cf. 26:13).

⁸ Hence the “supreme disdain” (M. J. Lagrange, on this verse). Πονηρός here has the sense of “contemptible, vile” as in Matt 18:32 (cf. C. Spicq, Dieu et l’homme, p. 59, n. 3). It is an adjective used for sycophants (Demosthenes, C. Eub. 57.32) and rogues (J. Taillardat, Images d’Aristophane, p. 241, n. 430). Cf. Philo, Heir 254: τὸν φαῦλον ὡς βραδὺν καὶ ὀκνηρὸς, “The wicked person is slow, sluggish, always ready to postpone deeds of training, and not those of intemperance”; Philo, Spec. Laws 1.99: the abuse of wine “enervates the bodily faculties, makes the limbs difficult to move, increases the tendency to idleness, and produces irresistible sleepiness”; Plutarch, Them. 2.3: Themistocles was a lazy student (ὀκνηρῶ—ς καὶ ἀπροθύμως), not motivated for the pleasurable arts.

⁹ P. Corn. 49, 10: μὴ ὀκνί— μιν γράφειν, εἰ—δῆα ὅτι ἀνόχως ποιήσο; cf. P. Oxy. 743, 39 (= S. Witkowski, Epistulae Privatae Graecae 71, cf. 25, 7: εὐχαριστήσεις οὐμ μοι σαυτοῦ τε ε—πιμελόμενος καὶ μὴ ὀκνω—ν γράφειν ἡμ—ν); PSI 621, 6; 971, 26. On the expression βραδέως γράφων, cf. H. C. Youtie, Scriptiunculae, vol. 2, pp. 629–651; ZPE, vol. 22, 1976, p. 51.

ὀλοκληρία, ὀλόκληρος

holokleria, wholeness, health; holokleros, whole, intact, without defect, healthy

holokleria, S 3647; TDNT 3.767; EDNT 2.508; MM 446; L&N 23.131; BAGD 564 | holokleros, S 3648; TDNT 3.766–767; EDNT 2.508; MM 446; L&N 59.30; BAGD 564; ND 4.161–162

Holokleros —one of many compounds of kleros —means first of all “whole, intact,” the state of being complete, not mutilated. In the LXX, it refers to rough stones, not worked by iron tools, that are used for building the altar of Yahweh (Deut 27:6; Josh 8:31; 1Macc 4:47; cf. Josephus, Ant. 12.318), seven full weeks (Lev 23:15), intact wood, untouched by fire.¹ Hence “complete justice” (Wis 15:3) and “perfect, mature piety” (4Macc 15:17). Priestly and cultic regulations require that the priest and the sacrificial victim be holokleroi, i.e., without any defect, absolutely whole physically.² On the spiritual level, Jas 1:4 notes as a fruit of endurance “that you may be perfect and complete, lacking in nothing”; and 1Thess 5:23, “May the God of peace himself sanctify you wholly and preserve you wholly (holokleron)—body, spirit, and soul—without fault.”³

The inscriptions and papyri from the imperial period make holokleria-holokleros synonymous with hygieia-hygies:⁴ good health. For example, two female feet in a votive offering to Artemis, at Kula in Lydia: “For the wholeness of my feet” (hyper tes holoklerias [ton] podon, Dittenberger, Syl. 1142, 3; first-second century). In the same city, a woman who appeared at the temple with an unclean cloak recovered her health and offered this votive inscription: egenomen holokleros (L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 10, 1955); at the prytaneion at Ephesus, Favonia thanks the gods “because I am well” (hoti hololkerousan me, ibid.). At Sardis, after a dream, a barber dedicated an Asclepius to the nymphs for his health (anetheken tais Nymphais autou holokleria Asklepeion, I.Sard. VII, 94).

The papyrological attestations are even more numerous: from the third century: “Above all I pray for your health” (pro men panton euchome soi ten holoklerian, P.Mich. 214, 4; cf. 216, 4; 219, 2, 5; 221, 3; P.Oxy. 1158, 2; 2598, 4; P.Alex. 627, 4; P.lond. 100, 4; PSI 831, 4; 972, 3; 1412, 4; P.Lond. 1917, 3; P.Princ. 73, 3; 101, 4; SB 6222, 2; 9605, 6); “I pray that you may be entirely healthy” (errosthai se holoklerounta euchomai, P.Oxy. 1490, 11; cf. 1495, 4); “You wrote nothing concerning your health . . . write back to me about your health” (antigrapson moi proton men peri tes holoklerias sou, 1593, 5–9; 2601, 28; P.Ryl. 624, 11); “Having made careful inquiry concerning your health” (akreibos pynthanomenos peri tes holoklerias sou, 1667, 3; cf. 1668, 2–3; 1670, 3; 1678, 2; 1680, 3; 1683, 6; C.P.Herm. 14, 5). It is in this sense of the word that St. Peter declares concerning a miraculous healing, “Faith gave him this perfect health (or this complete healing)” (ten holoklerian tauten, Acts 3:16).

¹ Ezek 14:5 (Hebrew tamîm); cf. P.Mich. 612, 12 and P.Genova 22, 11; P.Princ. 84, 5, 10; PSI 1239, 8; P.Lond. 935, 7; P.Oxy. 3126, col. II, 7; P.Mil. 37, 12; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XVI, 29, R 2; P.Berl.Zill. 5, 12; C.P.Herm. 35, 18; P.Stras. 190, 14; 247, 8, 10; 248, 7; 238, 13; 417 bis, 10: a whole house; P.Yale 71, 9: a whole banquet room; 61, 9: three full days; 66, 12 and P.Oxy. 2270, 3: total price; P.Fouad 21, 15: “Let the imperial constitution be applied to you in its entirety,” etc. Philo, Abraham 47; Epictetus 3.26.7: “a man in perfect condition”; 25: “an intact vase”; 4.1.66, 151; Plutarch, Quaest. conv. 2.3: “That which is whole precedes that which is cut off”; Phoc. 7.5; Lucian, Philops. 8.

² Zech 11:16; Plato, Leg. 4.759 c; Philo, Spec. Laws 1.283: “intact mind”; Josephus, Ant. 3.278; 8.118; 14.366; Dittenberger, Syl. 736, 10 (Andania); 1009, 10 (Chalcedon); 1012, 5 (Cos). LSAM, n. 42, B 6 (at Miletus, a victim that is healthy, in good condition); LSCG, n. 85, 1: ι—ερεϊ—α τέλεια . . . ὀλόκληρα.

³ We may compare ὀλόκληρον . . . τηρηθείη with an inscription from Asia Minor: ὑπὲρ τῆς ὀλοκληρίας καὶ διαμονῆς (cited by L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 10, 1955, pp. 96–103), then the magical papyrus P.Lond. CXXI, 590: διαφύλασσε μου τὸ σω—μα τὴν ψυχὴν ὀλόκληρον (vol. 1, p. 103); Diogenes Laertius 7.107: “the wholeness of bodies”; Dio Chrysostom 12.34. For the exegesis, cf. A. J. Festugière, Idéal religieux, pp. 196–220.

⁴ This point has been established by L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 10, 1955, pp. 96–103, and taken up anew by N. van Brock, Vocabulaire médical, pp. 187–190; M. Guarducci, Epigrafia greca, vol. 3, pp. 58–59; cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 1012, 8: ἅ δὲ πριαμένα ἔστω ὑγιῆς καὶ ὀλόκληρος; P.Genova 38, 5: περὶ τῆς σῆς ὑγίας καὶ ὀλοκληρίας; LSCG, n. 162, 14. SB 10772, 4: γινώσκιν ὑμα—ς θέλω ὅτι μέχρι τούτου ὀλόκληρός εἰ—μι (letter from Sarapammon to his family); 10841, 3: πρὸ μὲν πάντων εὐχομαι τὴν ὀλοκληρίαν σου παρὰ τω—κυρίῳ θεω— ὅπως ὀλοκληροῦντα σε ἀπολάβω (Christian letter from the fourth century).

ὁμοθυμαδόν, ὁμόφρων

homothymadon, together, unanimously, in unity; homophon, of one mind

homothymadon, S 3661; TDNT 5.185–186; EDNT 2.511; NIDNTT 3.908–909; MM 448; L&N 31.23; BDF §122; BAGD 566 | homophon, S 3675; EDNT 2.517; MM 450; L&N 30.21; BAGD 569

Homothymadon, which occurs especially in Job (14 times) and in Acts (10 times) and corresponds to the Hebrew yahad, yahdaw, has at least three meanings:

(a) “Together,” when said of people, a crowd, a mass of individuals: “They threw themselves all together” upon Steven (Acts 7:57); at the silversmiths’ riot at Ephesus, “They rushed all together to the theater.”¹ As the adverb yahad often means “also, likewise” (cf. Job 6:2; 17:16; 31:38; 34:15), homothymadon expresses simultaneity: “All the people answered at once,”² as one person.

(b) Conformably to its etymology (homos, “same,” and thymos, “soul” or “heart”), homothymadon designates not only a gathering of persons, but their agreement together, even their unanimity. The authorities at the Jerusalem Council decide: “It seemed good to us, being of one accord, to chose men and send them to you with our beloved Barnabas and Paul.”³ When approaching someone “together,” whether “to sympathize with him and comfort him,” as when Job’s friends come (Job 2:11), or to offer congratulations (Jdt 15:9), the point is that the feelings of the participants are in harmony.⁴ Thus the apostles and the believers are “together” at Solomon's Portico (Acts 5:12), and thus the Samaritan crowds follow Philip's preaching (8:6).

(c) Homothymadon expresses in a unique way the brotherly communion of believers praying to God.⁵ Unity of hearts in one and the same movement is the characteristic of prayer, so much so that the prayer of a "discordant" Christian will not be heard. Homothymadon became a technical term for the unity of the Jerusalemites in calling upon the Lord⁶ and for the unity required of all disciples by Rom 15:5-6: they must try to have a common mind (to auto phronein) in Christ, "so that with one heart and one mouth you may glorify the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ."

This oneness of heart is described as brotherly harmony by 1Pet 3:8—"Finally, be of one mind, sympathetic, brotherly, with motherly tenderness" (pantes homophrones, sympatheis, philadelphoi, eusplanchnoi).⁷ As early as Homer, homophrosyne is praised as a virtue,⁸ establishing accord and harmony of thoughts and feelings,⁹ among fellow-citizens or members of a group,¹⁰ between spouses,¹¹ especially between brothers. This is precisely the nuance of 1Pet 3:8. According to Strabo, "The Lacedaemonians thought it difficult to face the Parthians head on, because of their numbers, their perfect harmony, and the fact that they regarded each other as brothers" (pantes homophronas, hos an allelon adelphous nomizomenous, 6.3.3). In a funerary epigram for the two brothers Letoios and Paulos: "Farewell, two brothers with one heart (o glykero kai homophrone)! On your tomb there should be erected an altar to Concord (bomos Homophrosynes)." ¹² Philo thought that Moses in his legislation envisaged "agreement, community feeling, concord (homophrosyne), a balance of temperaments, all that could bring homes and cities, peoples and countries, and the whole human race to supreme happiness" (Virtues 119). Christian harmony will be more intimate and more binding: "that they may be one" (ina osin hen, John 17:22).

¹ Acts 19:29; cf. 12:20; 18:12; Num 27:21—"he and all the sons of Israel with him, the whole community"; Jdt 15:5—"The sons of Israel all together threw themselves" upon the enemy; Job 16:11; 19:12; 3:18—"the group of prisoners"; 21:26; 24:4; 40:8; Jer 26:21—"They fled together"; Wis 18:5, 12; Josephus, Ant. 19.357; UPZ 110, 93: πα—σι τοι—ς κατὰ τὴν χώραν ὁμοθυμαδὸν (second century BC). In AD 22, the inhabitants of Bousiris honor the general Cn. Pompeius Sabinus: συνελθόντες ὁμοθυμαδὸν τάδε ε—ψηφίσαντο (SEG VIII, 527, 3 = SB 7738, 3).

² Exod 19:8; Lam 2:8—the ramparts and the walls fell down simultaneously; Philo, To Gaius 356: "We cried out together, 'Lord Gaius, that is a slander against us'"; Josephus, Ant. 15.277; cry out in one voice; Ep. Arist. 178: "In a single voice, everyone, participants and newcomers, replied, 'Hail, O King!"; Sib. Or. 3.458: "An earthquake will annihilate entire troops, and large numbers of shades will enter Hades simultaneously."

³ Acts 15:25; T. Naph. 6.10—πάντες ὁμοθυμαδὸν ἠγαλλιασάμεθα. In 85 BC, at Ephesus, the creditors agree to exonerate their debtors: ὁμοθυμαδὸν πάντων τῶ—ν πολιτῶ—ν (Dittenberger, Syl. 742, 13; cf. 1104, 28: unanimity of the synod in 57 BC); "The inhabitants of the town are unanimous in seeking your protection" (P. Tebt. 40, 8; second century BC); according to a leaf of the journal of a strategos: μετὰ τῆς πλείστης σπουδῆς καὶ χαρᾶ—ς ὁμοθυμαδὸν εὐφημοῦντων κατήντησεν ε—πὶ τὸν . . . ι—ερὸν (BGU 1768, 7); ε—πιβούλους ὁμοθυμαδὸν σκῆψιν (fourth century). Cf. the honorific decree in honor of M. Alfidius, line 35 (published by M. Merkelbach, in ZPE, vol. 18, 1975, p. 147).

⁴ Cf. the Hymn to Isis: καὶ πτηνω—ν τε γένη ὁμοθυμαδὸν ἔκλυεν αὐτοῦ (SB 8141, 15). Polybius 5.71.1: "The inhabitants all rallied to him with one accord."

⁵ Jdt 4:12—"They all called upon the God of Israel together"; 13:17; Wis 10:20—"They gave thanks with one accord to your saving hand"; Philo, Moses 1.72: "Each one individually and all together began to supplicate and pray with one accord"; Flacc. 122: "Standing in the most open place, they intoned with one accord . . . 'O very great King of mortals and immortals.'"

⁶ Acts 1:14—"They all persevered in prayer with one accord"; 2:46—"Each day they continued to meet with one accord in the temple"; 4:24; cf. J. M. Nielen, Gebet und Gottesdienst im Neuen Testament, Freiburg, 1937, pp. 145ff., 172, 218; P. H. Menoud, La Vie de l'Eglise naissante, Neuchâtel, 1952.

⁷ Cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, pp. 787ff.

⁸ Homer, Il. 22.263: "wolves and lambs do not have hearts to agree with each other"; Theognis 1.81: "Companions, who, having one heart (ὁμόφρονα θυμὸν ἔχοντες), can share sorrows as well as joys"; Dio Chrysostom 38.15.

⁹ Dittenberger, Or. 515, 4: κοινὴν ὁμόφρονα γνώμην (second century AD); CIRB, n. 147, 6: τὴν στήλλην ἔθεμεν ὁμόφρονες ὁμονοοῦντες; GVI, n. 690, 2.

¹⁰ Cf. the oath of the Athenian ephebes in the fourth century (in Stobaeus 43.48; vol. 4, p. 14, line 14): they undertake to obey the laws established by the agreement of the majority, οὓς τινὰς ἂν ἄλλους τὸ πλῆθος ἰδρύσῃται ὁμοφρόνως (cf. L. Robert, Études épigraphiques, pp. 298, 302). Philo: “This is no way to honor someone . . . teaching the inhabitants of the other cities to scorn harmony” (ἐ—ν ται—ς πόλεσιν ὁμοφροσύνης ἀλογει—ν, Flacc. 52).

¹¹ Hierocles the Stoic, Marriage, in Stobaeus 22.1.24 (vol. 4, p. 505): συμπαθοῦς εὐνοίας . . . ὁμοφρονέοντε; cf. the epithalamium wishing the spouses ὁμοφροσύνη, E. Heitsch, Die griechischen Dichterfragmente, 2d ed., Göttingen, n. 25, 4; 37, 19. Moses’ father and mother were more deeply united by their virtuous ὁμοφροσύνη than by blood relationship (Philo, Moses 1.7).

¹² Anth. Pal. 7.551.7. Cf. a very mutilated Jewish epitaph from Theon, second century AD, in which ὁμοφροσύνη is followed by φιλάδελφος (CII 1489, 6; C.Pap.Jud. III, n. 1489; SEG VIII, 374; GVI, n. 1143).

ὁμολογουμένως

homologoumenos, incontestably, obviously, as agreed by all homologoumenos, S 3672; TDNT 5.199–220; EDNT 2.516–517; MM 449–450; L&N 33.276; BAGD 569

This adverb (a biblical hapax), formed from the present passive participle of homologeō, introduces the hymn to the risen Christ at 1Tim 3:16—“and homologoumenos great is the mystery of godliness” (mega estin to tes eusebeias mysterion); this mystery is the object of “the common faith” of the church (Titus 1:4). This adverb may have either a rhetorical or a legal meaning. In the former case, it means “incontestably, ineluctably” and describes an indubitable axiom or the conclusion of an unimpeachable argument;¹ thus it is almost synonymous with “obviously.”² This is how the Vulgate interprets the text: “manifeste magnum . . .”

But in the Stoic vocabulary, homologoumenos means that which must be affirmed or confessed, that which must be agreed to,³ and refers to an agreement.⁴ Thus it is used by jurists for something that supports testimony, a fact that is universally recognized, is beyond dispute, “in everyone’s opinion.”⁵ This meaning of unanimous consent is the most widely attested: “Then everyone was unanimous in this opinion of them” (Polybius 2.39.10); “Zeus, the first of the gods, as we all recognize” (ho ton theon megistos homologoumenos);⁶ “All people, if you ask them, will agree” (Sallustius, De Deis et Mundo 1.2); Melchizedek is recognized as a “just king, by unanimous consent”;⁷ “Iberians and others, unanimously recognized as the most warlike of the barbarians in those parts”

(Thucydides 6.90.3). So we must translate 1Tim 3:16: “Yes, as all agree, great is the mystery of godliness.”⁸

But given the theological context, homologoumenos calls to mind the homologia of the baptismal credo (Rom 10:10), which is not a mere contractual agreement but a proclamation and a promise.⁹ Here it is “as a spontaneous cry”¹⁰ on the part of all Christians: “omnium confessione” (Ambrosiaster).

¹ Xenophon, Oec. 1.11: “Incontestably, Socrates, our argument is progressing”; Epictetus 1.4.7; Polybius 2.14.4; 3.47.2.

² Xenophon, Hell. 2.3.38: “It was a matter . . . of handing over to the courts those who were obviously sycophants”; UPZ 162, col. V, 32: ὅστε ὁμολογουμένως ε—αυτοῦ καταμαρτυροῦντα συμφανὲς καθεστακέναι (117 BC); hence “officially, publicly”; ibid. 161, 65: ὁμολογουμένως δ ε—πὶ συκοφαντία καὶ σεισμω—ε—παγειοχότος τὸ ἔγκλημα (119 BC); cf. Ep. Arist. 24: “Professing (the manuscripts vary between ὁμολογουμένως and ὁμολογούμενοι) to do justice to everyone, we have decreed.”

³ 4Macc three times says: “Admittedly, devout reason rules over the passions” (6:31; 7:16; 16:1).

⁴ Epictetus 3.1.25: “What does ‘rationally’ (λογικω—ς) mean? It means in agreement with nature and perfectly (φύσει ὁμολογουμένως καὶ τελέως).”

⁵ Demosthenes, C. Con. 54.25.44; Demosthenes, C. Aphob. 3.14.39; Isocrates, Evag. 9.68. Cf. Philo, Flight 205: τὰ ὁμολογούμενα = that which is admitted by all; Anaximenes, Rhet. ad Alex. 12.6: ὁμολογουμένων πίστεις ε—πιφέρων; Polybius 3.105.9: “At Rome we can see indisputably how . . . important a general’s prudence is.”

⁶ Diodorus of Sinope, in Athenaeus 6.239 b; cf. J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 3 A, p. 220. Diodorus Siculus 17.21.4.

⁷ Josephus, Ant. 1.180: ἦν δὲ τοιοῦτος ὁμολογουμένως; 2.229: everything points to Moses’ being the noblest of the Hebrews.

⁸ The initial καὶ is emphatic and thus reinforces the statement. It is not a coordinating conjunction but an adverb, frequently in the papyri having the sense of “really, truly, certainly”; cf. E. Mayser, Grammatik 2/3, pp. 141, 144.

⁹ On the homologia of faith, cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, pp. 265ff., vol. 2, pp. 846ff.; V. H. Neufeld, The Earliest Christian Confessions, Grand Rapids, 1963; N. Hofer, “Das Bekenntnis ‘Herr ist Jesus’ und das Taufen auf den Namen des Herrn Jesus,” in Tübinger theol. Quartalschrift, 1965, pp. 1–12; W. Kramer, Christ, Lord, Son of God, London, 1966, pp. 15ff.; P. von der Osten-Sacken, “Christologie, Homologie,” in ZNW, 1967, pp. 255ff. The homologia of hope, cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, pp. 336, n. 5; of love (vol. 2, p. 510), of gratitude (vol. 1, p. 458, n. 2). As opposed to the Roman consensus (cf. F. de Visscher, Le Droit des tombeaux romains, Milan, 1963, p. 122), Hellenistic homologia is based on the certified commitment of a number of persons (1Tim 6:12-13; cf. A. Manzmman, Griechischen Stiftungsurkunde, Münster, 1962, pp. 81–87; D. Simon, Studien zur Praxis der Stipulationsklausel, Munich, 1964, pp. 3ff.; W. Barclay, “The New Testament and the Papyri,” in Essays in Memory of G.H.C. MacGregor, Oxford, 1965, pp. 77–78; H. F. von Soden, Untersuchungen zur Homologie in den griechischen Papyri Ägyptens bis Diokletian, Cologne-Vienna, 1973). The homologia of the baptized should be compared with the OT berit, which means first of all a personal commitment or promise, a mutual agreement, covenant, cf. E. Kutsch, Verheißung und Gesetz: Untersuchungen zum sogenannten “Bund” im Alten Testament, Berlin–New York, 1973.

¹⁰ G. Delling, Worship in the New Testament, London, 1962, p. 78.

ὀνειδίζω, ὀνειδισμός, ὀνειδος

oneidizo, to reproach, blame, curse, mock, blaspheme; oneidismos, reproach, cursing, mockery, blasphemy; oneidos, reproach, shame, disgrace

oneidizo, S 3679; TDNT 5.239–240; EDNT 2.517–518; MM 450; L&N 33.389, 33.422; BDF §152(1); BAGD 570 | oneidismos, S 3680; TDNT 5.241–242; EDNT 2.517–518; MM 450; L&N 33.389; BAGD 570 | oneidos, S 3681; TDNT 5.238–239; EDNT 2.517–518; MM 450; L&N 87.73; BAGD 570

These terms have an especially wide range of meaning (cf. the Hebrew harap, herpâh), from simple reproach to cursing and blasphemy, with invective, mockery, affront, insult, and abuse included in between. In the language of the LXX, oneidizo has a technical meaning, because it goes along with declarations of war,¹ is the deed of enemies.² It is also an Israelite term for the period of slavery in Egypt and for all the defeats suffered by the chosen people: a dishonor.³ When directed toward God oneidismos is impious blasphemy,⁴ and Israel suffers oneidismos “on account of” the Lord.⁵ Whatever its source, oneidismos is shameful, causes blushing, and is dreaded above all else, because it implies scorn,⁶ as with the Sabbaths that are the object of derision (1Macc 1:39).

We must remember this semantic resonance when we hear the beatitude concerning insults and persecutions,⁷ the insults directed at Christ by the bandits crucified with him (Matt 27:44; Mark 15:32), and the application to Christ of Ps 69:10 (“The insults of those who insult you have fallen upon me,” Rom 15:3). In three instances, oneidizo has the meaning “cast blame” for a real or imagined fault,⁸ in conformity with a usage well attested in the OT.⁹

The substantive oneidismos, unknown in the papyri, is used for the candidate for the episcopacy (who would be subject to ridicule and derision, if he did not have “a good reputation with outsiders” [1Tim 3:7]); and for Christians in the world, insulted and persecuted for their faithfulness to God, the emphasis being on insults and shame (Heb 10:33). They are exhorted to go outside the camp,¹⁰ that is, to give up on Mosaic religion, worship, laws, and observances to join Christ “in bearing his shame” (Heb 13:13). The Lord was condemned as a blasphemer, ridiculed by his people, crucified like a slave; his passion was the supreme ignominy (aischyne, 12:2). Those who are his will experience similar shameful treatment when they break ranks with their former coreligionists; they will be humiliated, despoiled, ostracized. In faithfulness they will not fall short of Moses, who deemed “the shame of Christ a superior wealth to the treasures of Egypt” (11:26). By way of anticipation, he took his share of the abusive treatment of which the coming Savior would be victim. Christians continue to do so.¹¹ Reading these uses of oneidismos, which are all in agreement, may give us a precise idea of the words meaning, but it cannot make real to us the emotive density of this term in the world of the first-century Christians.

¹ Goliath insults Israel (1Sam 17:10, 25, 26, 36, 45; 2Sam 21:21; 1Chr 20:7; Sir 47:4), as do the Moabites and the Ammonites (Zeph 2:8). David and his gallants insult the Philistines (2Sam 23:9). In this latter, text, ὀνειδίζειν ε—ν (= the Hebrew preposition ל’) is a Hebraism, repeated by 1Pet 4:14.

² Ps 42:11, 55:13; 74:10. Insults are also forthcoming from the proud (Sir 27:28; 23:15) and the insane (18:18; 20:15; Ps 74:22).

³ Josh 5:9; Neh 1:3; 5:9; 1Macc 4:58. These humiliations are considered to be divine punishment, Isa 43:28; Jer 23:40; 24:9; 25:9; 42:18; 44:12; Bar 2:4; 3:8; Ezek 22:4; Dan 9:16; Tob 3:4; Jet 4:12; cf. Joel 2:19.

⁴ 2Kgs 19:4, 16, 22, 23; 2Chr 32:17; Isa 37:4, 6, 17, 23, 24; cf. Ps 74:18; 79:12; 89:50-51; 102:8; Isa 55:7.

⁵ Jer 15:15; 20:8; Ps 69:7, 9. An insult affects those close to the one insulted, Tob 3:10; Sir 41:7; 1Macc 10:70; cf. Judg 8:15.

⁶ Neh 4:4; Tob 3:7—Sarah, daughter of Raguel, is insulted by her father's servant girls because she has no child (cf. Isa 37:3); Ps 44:10-11: "Shame covers my face at the voice of the insulter and the blasphemer"; 69:20—"the derision has broken my heart . . . I await compassion"; 119:39—"turn away from me the disgrace that I fear"; Isa 50:1; 54:4; Jer 15:9—"she is ashamed and confounded" (Hebrew hapar, blush with shame); 51:51—"We were ashamed when we heard the insults, dishonor covered our faces." — Thus one must not insult those who are close (Ps 14:3; cf. Sir 29:23), especially friends, Sir 22:20, 22; 31:31; 41:25. Cf. BGU 1024, col. VII, 20: αι—σχω—ς τὴν ε—π̄ ἀνθρώποις τύχην ὀνειδίζουσιν. —The NT hapax ὀνειδος (Luke 1:25, the disgrace of barren women; cf. Gen 30:23), emphasizes shame: the foreign land prepares only dishonor for the rich (Ep. Arist. 249), εἰ—ς ὄλεθρον Βελίαρ καὶ ὀνειδος αι—ώνιον (T. Reub. 6.3). Is it likely that these people "would have accepted laws made against themselves to their own shame and at their own expense?" (Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.285). "They will hide the idols in the crevasses of rocks by way of contempt" (Sib. Or. 3.607); PSI 1337, 15. Perhaps Menander, Dysk. 245: "If an adventure comes to her, the shame affects me as well" (V. Martin's restoration).

⁷ Matt 5:11; Luke 6:22 (cf. J. Dupont, Béatitudes, vol. 2, pp. 290–292; vol. 3, pp. 81, 84, 331); 1Pet 4:14 (cf. the passive, οὐκ ὀνειδισθήσεται ἡ τῆς ἀτιμίας παρασημείωσις, P.Giss. 40, col. II, 5). For the textual criticism, cf. K. Aland, Die alten Übersetzungen des Neuen Testaments, Berlin, 1972, p. 100; for the exegesis, cf. A. Garcia del Moral y Garrido, Interpretación apostólica de Is. XI, 2 en I Pdr. IV, 14, Grenada, 1962; J. Knox, "Pliny and I Peter: A Note on I Peter IV, 14–16 and III, 15," in JBL, 1953, pp. 187–189; C. Spicq, Epîtres de saint Pierre, pp. 155ff.

⁸ Matt 11:20—Jesus reproaches Chorazin and Bethsaida for not repenting; and he reproaches the Eleven for their unbelief (Mark 15:32; cf. Dio Chrysostom 77.8.38). According to Jas 1:5—"God gives to all liberally and without reproach"; cf. Sir 41:25—"After giving do not reproach"; 18:13–16; Philo, Flight 30: cast blame; Josephus, Ant. 10.139: reproach for ingratitude; 4.189; 18.360; 19.319; Heliodorus, Aeth. 7.27.5: reproach for casualness; Plutarch, De adul. et am. 22: πα—σα μὲν γὰρ ὀνειδιζομένη χάρις ε—παχθῆς καὶ ἄχαρις καὶ οὐκ ἀνεκτῆ; P.Oxy. 2110, 34 (on the ethics of the donor, cf. Dio Chrysostom 12.77 and other references in H.

Almqvist, Plutarch und das Neue Testament, Uppsala, 1946, p. 130); other parallels in J. B. Mayor, The Epistle of St. James, 3d ed., London, 1910, pp. 39ff., “Aeschines reproached Demosthenes for his corruption” (Diodorus Siculus 17.4.8; cf. 17.15.2).

⁹ Wis 2:12—“The just reproach us for our offenses against the law.” Sir 42:14—“The woman covered with shame draws reproaches”; 8:5—“Do not reproach the man who repents of his sins.”

¹⁰ Just as the Teacher of Righteousness, on account of the profanation of the sanctuary, urged his followers to “go out of Judea” (CD 4.11; 6.5; 7.13; 20.22, 27; 1QpHab 8.11–13; 9.5).

¹¹ St. Thomas Aquinas: “Improperium Christi, id est, pro fide Christi; eadem enim est fides antiquorum et nostra.” Cf. K. H. Schelkle, Die Passion Jesu in der Verkündigung des N.T., Heidelberg, 1949, pp. 108ff.

ὄνος

onos, ass, donkey

onos, S 3688; TDNT 5.283–287; EDNT 2.522; MM 452; L&N 4.31; BAGD 574

A distinction is made between the wild ass (the onos agrios or onager, Gen 16:12; Isa 32:14; Job 39:5-8; Ps 104:11), which is described as “swift” (Hebrew pere’) or “fleeing” (Hebrew arôd), and the domestic ass,¹ which is bigger and faster than the Western variety.² It is a valuable commodity for inhabitants of Palestine,³ because, at very little expense, it is good for everything: beast of burden (Gen 42:26; 45:23; 1Sam 25:18; Neh 13:15; Josephus, Life 119; P.Oslo 48, 5; P.Ryl. 142; BGU 362, col. I, 6; PSI 1037, 10) and trace animal for farm jobs,⁴ it serves as a mount (Exod 4:20; Num 22:21; P.Oxy. 112; P.Fouad 28, 4: epikathemenos ono; AD 59), because it is sure-footed and easily governed;⁵ she-asses (Hebrew atôn), which are even more peaceable and manageable, are preferred by women (Num 22:23, 33; 2Kgs 4:24). Originally, the great and the wealthy rode asses (Judg 5:10; 10:4; 12:14), but later they reserved for themselves the horse, which was used in the army.⁶ So Zech 9:9 announced that the Messiah, the modest prince of peace, would enter the capital “riding an ass, the colt of an ass.”

This prophecy was effectively realized when Jesus made his messianic entry into Jerusalem.⁷ One of the interests of the Matthean redaction is to note the relation of the colt,⁸ which was male,⁹ with its mother: “the colt with her” (polon met’ autes, Matt 21:2). Because this foal had never been ridden,¹⁰ its mother was led along with it to make it more docile: “they led the ass and the colt” (egagon ton onon kai ton polon, 21:7). We have numerous papyri relating the sale of an ass with her young and giving the description of one or the other (BGU 982; PSI 882; P. Grenf. II, 46; P. Wisc. 15; P. Oxy. 3145; etc.) notably P. Stras. 251 (AD 69–79), and this latter published with a learned commentary by Sophia M. E. van Lith in CPR VI, 3, n. 2: In AD 114, in the Arsinoite, an ass and her male offspring were sold for eighty-eight drachmas;¹¹ the color, sex, [teeth], and age of the animal are specified: peprakenai auto onon theleian myochroun kai ton epakolouthounta polon arrena melanon anaporriphous. The mother is referred to as a “female ass” (onon theleian), gray in color;¹² her colt is male (polon arrena) and full-grown (epakolouthounta). The last term, anaporriphous, used constantly in the sale of slaves or animals, is a guarantee against hidden faults and can be translated, “not subject to rejection” or “no annulment of sale possible.”¹³

¹ Hebrew h<Ø>a<^>môr; about a hundred occurrences in the OT, cf. Exod 13:10; 32:33; 23:4; Isa 1:3; 32:20; etc.

² Jacob blessed Issachar with the title “bony ass” (Gen 49:14), i.e., solidly built.

³ The thirty sons of Jair of Gilead, one of the judges of Israel, rode thirty donkeys (Judg 10:4); the forty sons and thirty grandsons of Abdon rode seventy (Judg 12:14). Job’s livestock holdings comprised “seven thousand sheep, three thousand camels, five hundred yoke of oxen, and five hundred she-asses” (Job 1:3). Exod 20:17 forbids coveting a neighbor’s ass, along with his wife, his servant, and his ox. In an inheritance, the asses are divided (P. Oxy. 2583). In the second century AD, there is a tax on asses in the Theban region (P. Sorb. 67).

⁴ Isa 30:24; 32:20; cf. μύλος ὀνικός, Matt 18:6; Mark 9:42 (cf. A. Deissmann, Light, pp. 81). We have toll receipts (BGU 1593–1595; P. Rein. 95; SB 10906–10908, 10910–10912), for example for the entry of nine artabai of vetch seed divided up between three asses, for which a certain Pauties paid three taxes charged at the toll posts controlling the traffic of merchandise between the Arsinoite and the desert (P. Köln 92–93). The triple taxation then could apply to one and the same transport. It was sometimes impossible to procure pack animals (P. Köln 110); but supplying beasts for the transport of grains collected into the public granaries as taxes was a leitourgia (P. Köln 116–118). Cf. F. Vigouroux, “âne,” in Dictionnaire de la Bible, vol. 1, col. 566–573; W. Corswant, Dictionnaire d’archéologie biblique, p. 28. According to the late rabbis, the ass played a role in Jewish eschatology, cf. A. Schlatter, Der Evangelist Matthäus, p.

608; K. Stendahl, The School of St. Matthew, 1954, pp. 118–120; O. Michel, “ὄνος,” in TDNT, vol. 5, pp. 283–287. In Greece, as in our day, “ass” could be pejorative. According to Lysippus, “If you have not seen Athens, you are only a clod. If you have seen it and not been taken with it, you are only an ass. If you are content to go far from it, you are only a pack-saddled ass” Ps.-Dicaearchus, frag. 59, 1–5, in Fragmenta Historicorum Graecorum, vol. 2, pp. 254–255). But one also takes care of one’s ass: παρακληθεῖς προνόησαι ἡ—ς σοι ἔπεμψα ὄνου (P.Köln 161, 5).

⁵ It can be ridden without a saddle; a covering of thick cloth is stretched over its back and tied around or strapped up to keep it from slipping (Gen 22:3; Judg 19:10; 2Sam 16:1; 17:23; 19:27; 2Kgs 4:24). Menander, Dysk. 403: “These accursed women tied four donkey-loads on my back.” The apostles laid out their garments on the ass that Jesus borrowed to ride (Matt 21:7; Mark 11:7).

⁶ Pss. Sol. 17.37; cf. C. W. F. Smith, “The Horse and the Ass in the Bible,” in ATR, 1945, pp. 86–97.

⁷ Matt 21:2, 5, 7; John 12:14–15; cf. K. Pieper, “Zum Einzug Jesu in Jerusalem,” in BZ, 1913, pp. 397–402; J. D. M. Derrett, “Law in the New Testament: The Palm Sunday Colt,” in NovT, 1971, pp. 241–258; R. Bartnicki, “Das Zitat von Zach. IX, 9–10 und die Tiere im Bericht von Matthäus über den Einzug Jesu in Jerusalem (Mt. XXI, 1–11),” NovT, 1976, pp. 161–166.

⁸ Πω—λον (Matt 21:2; P.Lond. 339; vol. 2, p. 200); P.Oslo 134; P.Sarap. 3 (declaration of asses; cf. H. C. Youtie, Scriptiunculae, vol. 2, pp. 1021ff.). P.Cair.Isid. 77, 12; 136, 4–6; John 12:15—ὄνάριον (a little ass; Epictetus 2.24.18; 4.1.79; P.Oxy. 63, 11); ὄναρίδιον (P.Ryl. 239, 21); cf. P.Mert. 120: τὸν ὄνον ἔχουσιν ὑποτίθιον.

⁹ Hebrew ‘ayir; cf. R. de Langhe, “Judaïsme ou Hellénisme en rapport avec le Nouveau Testament,” in L’Attente du Messie (Recherches bibliques 1), Bruges, 1954, p. 163.

¹⁰ Mark 11:2; Luke 19:35. Symbolically, the colt’s never having been ridden before would be a sign of Christ’s transcendence, like being born of a virgin or buried in a new tomb. It has also been envisaged as a “type” of Christ’s triumph over the Gentiles, whereas the ass would represent the synagogue, which had long borne the yoke but today was no more than a cipher; cf. A. Durand, “Pro Consensu Evangelistarum,” in RSR, 1911, pp. 298–300.

¹¹ One hundred drachmas in 69–79 (P. Stras. 251; P. Oxy. 2846); 108 in AD 98 (BGU 1066), 48 in 131 (P. Mich. 552). In the second century, 56 drachmas (P. Fay. 92), 60 (P. Aberd. 55), 106 (P. Grenf. II, 46), 270 (P. Stras. 504), 280 (P. Mich. 551), 306 (PSI 38). In the third century, 600 drachmas (P. Oxy. 1707), 1500 (PSI 79), 3800 (P. Stras. 139 = SB 8021), 4000 (P. Mert. 106).

¹² Μυόχρους (as at P. Gen. 23, 5; PSI 882, 1ff., 1417, 8; P. Dura 97; BGU 1568, 4) or μυόχρωμος (P. Corn. 13, 12; P. Mert. 20, 3; SB 11015); other she-asses are white or black (λευκὸς μυόχρους, μέλας μυόχρους); P. Cair. Isid. 84, 8; P. Mert. 15, 25; P. Mil. Vogl. 82. —Αμμόχρωμον appeared for the first time as a color in CPR VII, 4, n. 36, 6.

¹³ Cf. BGU 584, 806, 987; P. Oxy. 94; P. Mich. 264–265 (lines 9 and 22); P. Athen. 27; P. Gen. 23. M. J. Bry, Essai sur la vente dans les papyrus gréco-égyptiens, Paris, 1909, p. 295; F. Pringsheim, The Greek Law of Sale, Weimar, 1950, pp. 481–483. Isocrates, a wine producer (οἰνοποιός) wants to fence off his land so that the asses cannot eat his fruit (P. Athen. 4 = Pap. Lugd. Bat. XX, 52, 12). “Two jars for transport by ass” (τὰ ὄνικα μώστια δύο, SB 6801, 29 = Pap. Lugd. Bat. XX, 54, 29; cf. ὄνικα σάγματα, PSI 527, 2).

ὀρέγομαι, ὄρεξις

oregomai, to extend oneself, reach out, aim for, aspire to; orexis, passionate desire

oregomai, S 3713; TDNT 5.447–448; EDNT 2.531; NIDNTT 1.460–461; MM 456; L&N 25.15; BDF §171(1); BAGD 579–580 | orexis, S 3715; TDNT 5.447–448; EDNT 2.531; NIDNTT 1.460–461; MM 456; L&N 25.16; BAGD 580

In the Bible these terms do not have the technical meaning that they have as part of the Stoic vocabulary.¹ The NT hapax orexis in Rom 1:27—“the men were consumed with desire one for another”—has the banal sense of our word passion.²

The verb orego in the middle voice (“extend oneself, stretch oneself out”), when used with the genitive, means “tend toward, aim for, aspire to, try to reach.” In a pejorative sense, it is used of the greedy, whose orexis for money causes them to flaunt the demands of faith and morality;³ in a positive sense, it is used for the patriarchs, who aspired to the heavenly country.⁴ In both cases, the inclination is so intense that it requires the sacrifice of other good things; thus an orexis is a passionate desire.

Oregomai has the sense of “be ambitious” in 1Tim 3:1—“If anyone aspires to the episcopacy, he desires a noble work.”⁵ This desire for a duty or a function has no philosophical connotation; it is almost a literary commonplace: “Of the things that God offers and gives, what is there that is not great and worthy of aspiration?” (oregei, Philo, Abraham 39); “John dreamed (oregomenon) only of revolution and burned to have command (epithymian echonta)” (Josephus, Life 70); “angry that they wanted to change the status quo and aspired to novelties” (kai neoteron oregoito);⁶ “they each aspired to this first place” (Thucydides 2.65.10); “Tyndarides having aspired too openly to the supreme power.”⁷

¹ Cf. “The treatises on desire and aversion” (τὰ περὶ ὀρέξεως δὲ καὶ ἐκκλίσεως, Epictetus 4.4.16; cf. 4.1.84); the philosophers teach that desire has good things as its object, and aversion, evil things (ibid. 1.4.1; cf. 2.2.4). Ὀρεξις is the spontaneous movement that underlies the intervention of reason, cf. Aristotle, De An. 2.3.414b2; 3.9.433a6; Pol. 3.6.3.1278b21: “People desire to live together”; Plutarch, De E ap. Delph. 1: “an appetite of the soul that propels toward truth.”

² Cf. Sir 18:30—“Depart from your covetings”; 23:6—“May sensual attraction not take hold of me”; Wis 15:5—passion awakened in the fool; 16:2–3: appetite; Philo, Dreams 1.140: the angels “have never desired terrestrial things”; Abraham 96: “all the desires that draw one toward pleasure were taken from him”; Giants 35: “Let our appetites not be stirred up by contact with any friend of the flesh at all”; Alleg. Interp. 3.115: “in the region of the belly and beneath the belly resides desire, an unreasoning tendency” (ἐνταῦθα γὰρ κατοικεῖ ἐπιθυμία, ὀρεξις ἄλογος); 4Macc 1:33—“Is it not reason that has the power to tame this appetite?” Tamar wanted to escape the violence of passion (Josephus, Ant. 7.169). Cf. Plutarch, De laude 18: to stir up and sharpen the appetite (τὴν ὀρεξιν); Plutarch, De cupid. divit. 2, the desire to drink (ὀρεξις) corresponds to the desire to eat (ἐπιθυμία).

³ 1Tim 6:10; cf. Ep. Arist. 211: μὴ πολλῶν ὀρέγου, “do not seek fortune, but only what you need to reign”; Wis 14:2—“desire for gain”; Dio Chrysostom 17.12. This is the sense of Hesychius’ definition: ὀρέγεται: ἐπιθυμεῖ—.

⁴ Heb 11:16; cf. Philo, Virtues 218: Abraham wanted to be part of the divine family, τῆς πρὸς θεὸν συγγενείας ὀρεχθέντα; P. Michael. 27, 11: ὀρεγούση τῇ σήμερον ἡμέρα ἐν τῇ ἄρτι ὥρᾳ ἤδη ἤδη ταχὺ ταχύ (magical papyrus from the third-fourth century). Cf. those who aspire to better things and those who aspire to worse things: τοῖς τῶν κρείττωνων ὀρεγομένοις καὶ τοῖς τῶν χειρόνων (Musonius 7; ed. C. E. Lutz, p. 58, 5).

⁵ Εἴ τις ἐπισκοπῆς ὀρέγεται, καλοῦ ἔργου ἐπιθυμεῖ—. It was necessary to exalt the episcopacy in a time and a milieu where people valued above all the gifts of teaching (apostles, prophets, teachers), then those of power (miracles, healings; 1Cor 12:8ff., 28ff.). “Administration” is in the next to last place, like leadership (Rom 12:6-8) and pastors (Eph 4:11). Compared with “prophecy,” administrative duties have little allure (1Cor 6:4; 14:1; Did. 15). Hence the exhortations to honor those who preside and toil (1Thess 5:12), leaders who stay alert (Heb 13:17), and the official who must bear the burden of hospitality (1Tim 3:2; cf. C. Spicq, “Si quis episcopatum desiderat,” in RSPT, 1940, pp. 316–325). In the demotic papyri, the regulations consider it a fault to refuse the duty of “representative” of the association when one is appointed to it, cf. F. de Cenival, “Les Associations dans les temples égyptiens,” in Religions en Egypte hellénistique et romaine, Colloquium, Strasbourg, 1967, Paris, 1969, p. 12).

⁶ Plutarch, Sol. 29.4; cf. Plutarch, Art. 8: κελεύεις με τὸν βασιλείας ὀρεγόμενον ἀνάξιον εἶναι βασιλείας; Plutarch, Phoc. 17.1.

⁷ Diodorus Siculus 11.86; cf. 15.50, Thebes prepared for the war “full of enthusiasm and aspired to greater undertakings”; 16.65; Polemo, Declam. 35: ἔρωτι δόξην καὶ μεγάλων ἔργων ὀρεγόμενον. Cf. the inscription of New Colophon in the third century BC, ὀρεγόμενος τῶν καλλίστων, in M. Holleaux, Etudes d'épigraphie, vol. 2, p. 59. Charidemus is suspected of having the ambition to command (τῆς στρατηγίας ὀρέγεται, Diodorus Siculus, 17.30.4); “If Darius aspired to the highest rank” (17.54.6).

ὀρθοποδέω

orthopodeo, to walk steadily, without wobbling

orthopodeo, S 3716; TDNT 5.451; EDNT 2.531; NIDNTT 3.351–352; MM 456; L&N 41.36; BDF §120(4); BAGD 580

Gal 2:14—hote eidon hoti ouk orthopodousin pros ten aletheian tou euangeliou. M. J. Lagrange translates: “When I saw that they were not walking straight according to the truth of the gospel, I said to Cephas . . .” and comments: “orthopodein has not been found elsewhere: it can mean only ‘walk straight’ (the classical euthyporein) in contrast to those who walk to the side, like a boat tacking into the wind. In ethical terms, it means to act with uprightness and loyalty.”¹ But the Bible de Jérusalem translates: “Quand je vis qu’à l’égard de la vérité, leur marche manquait de fermeté” (“When I saw that with respect to the truth of the gospel their walk was lacking in firmness”; cf. NJB, “When I saw, though, that their behaviour was not true to the gospel.”) So should we translate “walk straight” or “have a firm step”? The question is settled by three papyri:

(a) A letter of December 7, AD 117: ne ten sen moi soterian kai ten tou tekniou mou kai orthopodian; ² (b) a papyrus at the University of Michigan (inv. 337): to pedeion orthopodei en emoi hina; ³ (c) Nicander of Colophon (Alex. 419): orthopodes bainontes anis smygeroion tithenes.

In each case, the word refers to children who are beginning to get around on their own two legs without having to hold the nurse’s hand to keep from falling. Thus our verb would be the opposite of choleuein, “walk unsteadily, limp” (Heb 12:13); “the unbeliever will have twisted feet, as it were, and will be entirely unable to walk right.”⁴ So orthopodeo is just the right word for indicting Peter’s vacillations at Antioch, “hobbling back and forth” (cf. Gal 2:12).

¹ “Lorsque je vis qu’ils ne marchaient pas droit selon la vérité de l’évangile, je dis à Céphas”—M. J. Lagrange, Galates, p. 44. G. D. Kilpatrick (“Gal. II, 14,” in Neutestamentliche Studien für R. Bultmann, Berlin, 1954, pp. 269–274) understands ὀρθοποδέω to mean being on the right path, which leads to the truth; hence “they were not walking straight toward the gospel.” He continues: “First, ὀρθοποδεῖ—ν is a verb of motion used metaphorically. Second, πρὸς has its primary meaning of ‘to, toward.’ Third, ὀρθο- in ὀρθοποδεῖ—ν signifies ‘straight’ or ‘upright’ of position, or direction.” F. Mussner (Der Galaterbrief, Freiberg-Basel-Vienna, 1974, p. 144) translates: “Sie gehen nicht auf dem geraden Weg (geradewegs) auf die Wahrheit des Evangeliums zu,” and notes that this is the interpretation not only of the church fathers and the Latin versions (“recta via incederent,” Ambrosiaster, Pelagius; “rectam viam incedeunt,” d), but also the counterpart of the Hebrew yasar in the piel; cf. Prov 9:15b, 15:21b; 1QH 7.14.

² P.Mil. 24, 2; commented on by C. H. Roberts, “A Note on Galatians II, 14,” in JTS, 1939, pp. 55–56.

³ Published by J. G. Winter, “Another Instance of ὀρθοποδεῖ—ν,” in HTR, 1941, pp. 161–162; republished by H. C. Youtie (“P. Mich. inv. 337,” in ZPE, vol. 22, 1976, pp. 63–68), who translates “For what does go right for me?” and cites for the noun ὀρθοποδία P.Mil.Vogl. 24, 8: γράφεις μοι λέγων “ε—άν δυνηθῆς ἀνάπλευσον” νῆ τὴν σὴν μοι σωτηρίαν καὶ τὴν τοῦ τεκνίου μου καὶ ὀρθοποδίαν. P.Phil. 35, 4 (a letter from Longinus to his brother; end of the second century) is obscure: θαυμάζω πω—ζὀρθοποδοῦτες καὶ πέμπσαντος μου καὶ ε—πιστόλιν διὰ Οὐαλεριανοῦ τοῦ Νεστοποικίτου. No doubt we should read ὀροποδοῦντος. The editor gives up on proposing a likely interpretation: “I am astonished . . . I sent you a letter by the hand of Valerianus, from the hamlet of Nestos.”

⁴ Ὁ ἄπιστος ἔσται πού καὶ διεστραμμένος καὶ κατ’ οὐδένα τρόπον ὀρθοποδεῖ—ν εἰ—δώς—Cyril of Alexandria, commenting on Matt 17:17, in J. Reuss, Matthäus-Kommentare, Berlin, 1957, p. 220.

ὀρθοτομέω

orthotomeo, to handle correctly

orthotomeo, S 3718; TDNT 8.111–112; EDNT 2.531; NIDNTT 3.351–352; MM 456–457; L&N 33.234; BDF §119(1); BAGD 580

Timothy must dispense the word of truth correctly, orthotomounta ton logon tes aletheias (2Tim 2:15). Hodon temnein means to trace or follow a route (Herodotus 4.136; Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.309); “Archelaus opened straight routes” (hodous eutheias eteme, Thucydides 2.100.2); and because “whatever is drawn with a straight ruler is necessarily straight,”¹ the expression “make a path straight” took on a metaphorical sense (Prov 3:6; 11:5; 1QH 12.34). This is especially so in rhetoric, where orthon legein means to express oneself correctly (Aristotle, Gen. Cor. 1.314b13; Iamblichus, Myst. 1.3 = 7.13), with the nuance of the golden mean: “No matter which of us has spoken more correctly (orthoteron eireken); everyone must follow a middle path (meson tina temnein)” (Plato, Leg. 7.793 a); “to advance along the route that our present discussion has started out on” (ten nyn ek ton paronton logon tetmemenen hodon, ibid. 800 e; cf. Xenophon, Oec. 18.2, mesotomon). For the rule in Greek dialectic is orthoepia: expressing oneself with exactness and precision, without error or flaw, respecting the linguistic proprieties.² Thus it is diametrically opposed to distortions and falsifications of the Word of God (2Cor 2:17; 4:2) by bad exegetes who twist texts (2Pet 3:16). The Vulgate translates well: “recte tractantem verbum veritatis.” As opposed to the mythologizing orators and fabulists who adulterate the revealed teaching, Timothy will be faithful to convey its traditional meaning (2Tim 2:2, 8) and express it in adequate terms (cf. 1Cor 2:13).

¹ Philo, Giants 49. According to J. W. D. Skiles (CP, 1943, pp. 204ff.), 2Tim is copying Sophocles, Ant. 1195: ὀρθὸν ἀλήθειᾷ ἀεί.

² Plato, Phdr. 267 c; cf. ὀρθοποδέω (Gal 2:14); cf. the “sharp” sword of the word of God (Heb 4:12) and the French expression “trancher net” (literally “cut clean”), speak frankly, openly, without concealment. Cf. the apology of Quadratus, which demonstrates “apostolic exactitude” (ἀποστολικὴ ὀρθοτομία), and hence orthodoxy (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 4.3.1).

ὀροθεσία

horothesia, the determining of boundaries

horothesia, S 3734; EDNT 2.533; MM 459; L&N 80.5; BDF §119(3); BAGD 582

In his Mars Hill discourse, St. Paul says that God fixed the limits of human dwelling: tas horothesias tes katoikias auton.¹ Derived from horothetes (from horos, “boundary, limit,” and tithemi, “assign, fix”), “marking a limit,”² the substantive horothesia, meaning “the delimiting or determining of boundaries” more than “boundary, limit,” was unknown³ until the discovery in 1903 of a rather mutilated Fayum papyrus (BGU 889, 17: tes ... horothesias tou th . . . ; from AD 151; cf. P.Apoll. 63, 20, from the eighth century, horothesia tou lakou oinou, the limit of a vat of wine?) and in 1906 of I.Priene XLII, 8: dikaian einai ekrinan ten Rhodion krisin te kai horothesian, “they decided that the Rhodians’ decision and demarcation were fair” (after AD 133). H. J. Cadbury adds a Greco-Latin inscription from first-century Romania⁴ that gives a series of decisions by Roman legates concerning the borders of the former Milesian colony of Histria at the mouth of the Danube. These decisions are confirmed by the governor of Mesia, Marius Laberius Maximus, beginning thus: “Horothesia Laberiou Maximou hypatikou. Fines Histrianorum hos esse constitui” (“I establish this as the border of the Histrians”). Horothesia is limitatio, the determining of boundaries.

¹ Acts 12:26. This could mean either habitable land, as opposed to the sea (Gen 1:9-10; Ps 74:17; 104:9; Job 38:8-11; Prov 8:28-29; cf. W. Eltester, “Gott und Natur in der Areopagrede,” in Neutestamentliche Studien für R. Bultmann, Berlin, 1954, pp. 202–227) or for the boundaries between different peoples (Gen 10; Deut 32:8; Job 12:23; Dan 2:21).

² Cf. I.Cret. III, 3, n. 25: Τιβ. Κλαύδιος Και—σαρ Σεβαστὸς Γερμανικὸς τὰς ὁδοὺς καὶ τοὺς ἀνδροβάμονας ἀποκατέστησεν διὰ Κ. Πακωνίου—Αγριππίνου ταμίου τὸ β? καὶ ὀροθέτου (first century AD); a landmark in Thrace between pastures: ὑπὸ Φλαυίου Σκελήτας κρίτου καὶ ὀροθέτου (around 155).

³ The neuter plural ὀροθέσια is found in Galen, Def. Med. 2 (ed. Kühn. vol. 19, 349); cf. Hesychius, ὀροθεσία: τὰ χωρίζοντα τὴν γῆν.

⁴ H. J. Cadbury, The Book of Acts in History, London, 1955, pp. 36ff.; an inscription accessible today in SEG I, 329; republished and commented on by D. M. Pippidi, Epigraphische Beiträge zur Geschichte Histrias, Berlin, 1962, pp. 133–153.

ὄρος

oros, hill, cliff, mountain, necropolis; land bordering the desert, boundary

oros, S 3735; TDNT 5.475–487; EDNT 2.533–534; NIDNTT 3.1009, 1013–1014; MM 459; L&N 78.44; BDF §§48, 126(1*b*); BAGD 582

With the relative exception of Galilee, Palestine is a mountainous region¹—in the most general sense of the term, since oros often means a mere hill (Luke 4:29; P.Ness. 31, 37; cf. Matt 18:12; T. Job 13.1–3) and the mount where Jesus was tempted is described as a “very high mountain” (Matt 4:8). In the papyri and in a geographical sense, to oros means both mountain and desert, as opposed to the valley and inhabited areas.² It can mean a simple escarpment, a more or less steep cliff next to the walls of a city (P.Monac. 13; SB 7800, 7), a high place where an irrigation system stops (P.Oxy. 729, 7 and 9), threatened with silting up.³ To oros comes to mean the area near the desert, a border zone or a band of land more or less distant from the town,⁴ and finally “limit.”⁵

Brigands flee to⁶ or do their marauding in the desert regions: “we fell into a den of thieves at Mount Maro.”⁷ Thus it is not surprising that the devil should appear to tempt Jesus on a mountain or in the desert (Matt 4:1, 8). But it is also on these uninhabited heights that cemeteries are established,⁸ so oros can mean necropolis (P.Ryl. 153, 5); thus the Gerasene demoniac stayed “in the tombs and in the mountains” (Mark 5:5).

Mountains always have religious significance: the throne of God, a cultic center, a place of sanctuary⁹—“Our fathers worshiped on this mountain” (John 4:20). Thus, according to the Hymn to Isis of Isidorus, at the New Moon the royal statue was paraded en orei, i.e., in the desert.¹⁰ According to the NT, not only did Jesus climb a mountain “to be apart” (Matt 17:1; cf. Mark 9:2; Luke 9:28; 2Pet 1:18), “alone in that place” (Matt 14:23; cf. Mark 6:46; Luke 6:12; John 6:15), i.e., to seek solitude for prayer; but it was also there that he taught the Sermon on the Mount (Matt 5:1; cf. 8:1; 15:29; John 6:3), chose his apostles (Mark 3:13), and appeared to them after his resurrection (Matt 28:16). The mountain is the place for communications from God (Gal 4:24–25; Heb 8:5; 12:20) and the symbol of heaven (Heb 12:22; Rev 14:1; 21:10).

Beginning in AD 334 (P.Lond. 1913; the Meletian monastery of Hathor), oros together with the name of a founder or patron signifies a

monastery¹¹—this religious establishment situated at the most distant borders of cultivated land.¹²

¹ Cf. F. M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, Paris, 1933, pp. 59ff., 334ff.

² P.Tebt. 801, 28: desert mountains; Chrest.Mitt., n. 78, 6–7: δι' ἀνύδρων ὄρω—ν; P.Tebt. 383, 61: Κερκεσουχών Όρους = Kerkesucha-in-the-desert; SB 5174, ε—ν τω—ει—ρημένω ὄρει; cf. Acts 7:30: an angel appeared to Moses “in the desert of Mount Sinai”; Heb 11:38, the OT believers wandered “in deserts and mountains.” —Hence the suggestion by numerous commentators that τὸ ὄρος in Mark 3:13 (“He climbed the mountain” north of the lake) should be understood in the sense of the Palestinian Aramaic tura, which means sometimes “mountain,” sometimes “countryside, distant place, isolated region” as opposed to “city”: Jesus went away into the neighboring countryside.

³ P.Tebt. 60, 42; 826, 9; cf. the analyses of H. Cadell, R. Rémondon, “Sens et emplois de τὸ ὄρος dans les documents papyrologiques,” in REG, 1967, pp. 343–349.

⁴ P.Lond. 483, 7, 10, 16, 31, 37: ε—ν τω— ὄρει κόμης Ταναίθεως; P.Flor. 285, 4; P.Cair.Masp. 67001. So the mountain can be inhabited; cf. C.P.Herm. 31, 3: “his mother lives on the mount of Scinopoeus.”

⁵ A stele found at Eleusis: ὄρος οἰ—κίας ὑποκειμένης, “boundary of the mortgaged house (NCIG, n. 25 A 2); cf. 25 C 1: “boundary of the house sold”; 25 F 1: “boundary of the house given in dowry mortgage”; 25 B 1: “ὄρος χωρίου, boundary of the land and of the house”; 25 D 1: “boundary of the lands, the house, and the roof”; E 1. IGLS 1260: “[officially] fixed boundaries of the shops and garden of Adonis”; 1481; 1570 (twice); 1675 (three times); 2002: “limits of asylum”; 2513; 2560; 2984. Cf. B. Schmidlin, “Horoi, pithana und regulae: Zum Einfluß der Rhetorik und Dialektik auf die juristische Regelbildung,” in ANRW, 1976, vol. 15, pp. 101–130.

⁶ P.Mich. 421, 15 (reign of Claudius), the malefactor flees εἰ—ς τὸ ὄρος. The police watch over the desert, P.Achm. 7, 36; P.Tebt. 736, 4. In a positive sense, to flee to the mountains is to seek solitude, 1Macc 9:40; Matt 24:16; Mark 13:14; Luke 21:21; Josephus, War 1.36; Ant. 14.418.

⁷ —Εμπεπτόκαμεν εἰ—ς ληστήριον εἰ—ς τὸ ὄρος Μαρώ, P.Stras. 233, 2; cf. A. Oguse, “Note sur le papyrus de Strasbourg 233,” in ChrEg, 1964, pp. 150–156.

⁸ Cf. the epitaph of the perfumer Casios, SB 4229, 2; P.Oxy. 274, 27; P.Tebt. 967, 7; P.Grenf. II, 77, 22. On the “mount of the dead,” cf. R. Rémondon, “A propos de deux graffiti grecs d’une tombe siwite,” in ChrEg, 1951, pp. 156–161.

⁹ 2Chr 3:1; Ep. Arist. 83; Wis 9:8; 1Macc 4:46; 11:37; Philo, Spec. Laws 3.125, Sinai “the holiest of the mountains that are found in that area”; cf. J. Jeremias, Der Gottesberg, Gütersloh, 1919; idem, Golgotha, Leipzig, 1926; H. Riesenfeld, Jésus transfiguré, Copenhagen, 1947, pp. 90ff., 180, 217–222; L. H. Vincent, “La Notion biblique du haut-lieu,” in RB, 1948, pp. 245–278, 438–445. Bibliographic references in BAGD, on this word, and Foerster, “ὄρος,” in TDNT, vol. 5, pp. 475–487.

¹⁰ E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 175, col. IV, 36 = V. F. Vanderlip, Four Greek Hymns, p. 64. An act of adoration by Pachrates “to Pan of the Mountain, for his own salvation” (A. Bernand, Koptos, n. 150); cf. PSI 1018, 11; 1020, 6; SB 8883, 40; 9506, 6. A. Bataille, Les Memnonia, Cairo, 1952, pp. 60–61, 96.

¹¹ Cf. P.Oxy. 1890, 6; PSI 9333, 2; P.Ross.Georg. III, 48, 1; P.Genova 40, 1–5; P.Lond. 483, 7 (vol. 2, p. 325); IGLS 1217.

¹² H. Cadell and R. Rémondon, REG, 1967, pp. 343–349, distinguish monasteries proper from other religious establishments (P.Lond. 1007; PSI 786) or groupings of these establishments “in the mountains,” thus outside of town (Stud.Pal. X, 219, 8; SB 5174; 5175: ε—ν τω— ει—ρημένω μοναστηρίω).

ὀψώνιον

opsonion, ration, wage, pay, compensation
see also μισθός, μισθόομαι

opsonion, S 3800; TDNT 5.591–592; EDNT 2.555; NIDNTT 3.144–145; MM 471–472; L&N 57.118, 57.166, 89.42; BDF §§111(4), 126(2), 141(8); BAGD 602; ND 2.93

A compound formed from opson, “cooked fish, fish,” hence “food,” and oneomai, “to buy, acquire,” the substantive opsonion occurs quite frequently in Koine, where it is almost synonymous with misthos,¹ which it tends to replace; it is condemned by Phrynichus, who derides Menander for saying “opsoniasmos and opsonion . . . and countless other unlearned, bastardized expressions.”²

In a military context, opsonion is the wage paid in cash³ to which is added a compensation in kind, a certain quantity of grain, i.e., provisions.⁴ According to this definition, “Antiochus opened his treasury and distributed a year’s pay to the soldiers” (1Macc 3:28); Simon, son of Mattathias, “spent much of his own wealth supplying weapons to the men in the army and paying them a wage” (1Macc 14:32). John the Baptist counsels the customs officers, “Do not harrass anyone, do not make false accusations, and be content with your wages.”⁵ These strateuomenoi are not soldiers in the strict sense of the word but auxiliaries to the publicans, hence police officers; and their opsonion perhaps does not have the technical meaning of “pay”; it would rather be the “ration” that they get, even their usual “profit.”

In fact, from its first occurrence, opsonion refers to a purchase of food⁶ and means provisions, the supplying of provisions, or resources, notably in the papyri,⁷ but the commonest meaning is that of remuneration for a given task. In AD 8–10, a worker, setting forth the conditions of his hiring, asks that he be paid either a daily wage or an annual wage (misthos) and that even when there is no work his employer pay thirteen drachmas, two obols for his daily means (dosete moi kat’ opsonion argyriou drachmas dekattris dyo obolous, P.Oxy. 731, 10; cf. P.Cair.Zen. 59176, 71–76, 92–93; PSI 332, 33). Opsonion is used for the pay of the rhabdouchos at the sanctuary of Apollo Koropaios,⁸ the remuneration for the teachers at Pergamum, the pay of officials (I.Priene 121, 33–34; 125, 4), the wages of a secretary (P.Mich. 371, 4), of guardians (P.Mert. 27, 4; P.Princ. 96, 3: ops. paidarion; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XVI, 19, 7, ops. hydrophylakon; VI, 24, 64: ops. bibliophylakon), of a harpist (P.Cair.Zen. 59028), of slaves (ibid. 59027; 59043, 59059: opsonia ta tois somasi), of farmers (P.Mich.Zen. 89), of gardeners (PSI 332, 13), of vine-dressers (ibid. 414, 4 and 10), of a fisherman,⁹ remuneration for services (P.Oxf. 10, 21; P.Oxy. 2474, 42); cf. receipt for wages (P.Ryl. 559: Maron peri tou opsoniou). So when St. Paul says that he has despoiled the Macedonian churches in order to have sufficient resources to carry out his ministry at Corinth in complete freedom, we must not translate labon opsonion pros ten hymon diakonian (2Cor 11:8) as “accepting wages or pay from them” but rather “subsidies”: gifts, food, clothings, money, the cash to provide for his own subsistence.¹⁰

This would also be the sense of 1Cor 9:7, which is usually translated “Who, serving in an army, ever supports himself with his own pay (idiois opsoniois)? Who plants a vineyard and does not eat its fruit? Or who shepherds a flock and does not drink of the milk of the flock?” The soldier does not have to provide for his own subsistence.¹¹ The emphasis is not so much on costs or expenditures as on food and provisions, as suggested by the two other texts and by the Lord’s pronouncement: “The worker is worthy of his upkeep” (axios esti tes trophes autou, Matt 10:10). The gospel worker must be free of all personal cares and any extraneous business to devote himself fully to his apostolic task. As for death as the wages (Latin stipendium) of sin (Rom 6:23), this exceptional metaphorical usage of opsonia contrasts with the free gift (charisma), the donativum, the largess handed out by the emperor or a victorious general. The opsonia of sin are thus not a payment, but rather a wage, or a price, or better a just and necessary reward, even a “compensation” due for the impious work that is hamartia, which cannot go unremunerated.

¹ P.Oxy. 136, 31; 19120, 7; 1911, 81; 1912, 130; 2195, 89; 2243, 81. Cf. ὀψώνιον, “wages,” P.Lille 3, 42: “the compensation due to us,” τὸ καθήκον ἡμῶν ὀψώνιον (third century BC); P.Oxy. 2195, 89; 2243 a 81: τῶν προνοητῶν λόγῳ ὀψωνίου κατὰ τὸ ἔθος; 2244, 1; BGU 1750, 6; P.Oslo 94, 9: ὁμολογῶ— ἔχειν παρά σου ε—γ πλήρους τὰ ὀψώνια τὰ ὀφειλόμενα. P.Mich. 620, 162–167: Σερμῆ ταυρελάτη ὑπὲρ ὀψωνίου; Πωλίῳ ὀνηλάτῃ ὑπὲρ ὀψωνίου; 214, 275: ε—μοὶ —Αλκιμέδοντι ὑπὲρ ὀψωνίου πυροῦ ἀρτάβηα?; J. Day, C. W. Keyes, Tax Documents from Theadelphia, New York, 1956 = P.Col. I, verso 3, line 169, 172, 181, 197, etc. In the accounts of the family of Tiberius Julius Theones, the monthly salary ranges from 24 to 32 to 40 drachmas (P. J. Sijpesteijn, The Family of the Tiberii Julii Theones, Amsterdam, 1976, n. 3, 5; 17, 5; 18, 7; 28, 5; cf. 1, 7; 29, 5); but ὀψώνιον can also be a tax, cf. idem, in P.Coll.Youtie I, p.297.

² Τὸν λέγοντα . . . ὀψωνιασμός καὶ ὀψώνιον . . . καὶ ἄλλα κίβδηλα ἀναρίθμητα ἀμαθῆ, C. A. Lobeck, Phrynichi Eclogae, 2d ed., Hildesheim, 1965, p. 418.

³ Polybius 1.66.5: “The Carthaginians, persuaded that the mercenaries (τοὺς μισθοφόρους) would give up part of their back pay”; 1.66.11: “Certain ones exaggerated their back pay”; 1.69.3–8; 4.60.2: “The Achaeans proved negligent in the payment of their wages to the mercenaries”; 3.25.4; 5.33.3; 5.36.3; a decree of Ptolemy Philadelphus: “The king orders that a supplement be added to the pay” (Ep. Arist. 20, 22; Josephus, Ant. 12.28). Eumenes will pay the soldiers the four months’ wages that he agreed to pay them, a sum that will not be included in the reckoning of future wages (I.Perg. XIII, 7 = Dittenberger, Or. 266; 263 BC; cf. the treaty of alliance between Rhodes and Hierapythna, in the second century, Dittenberger, Syl., 581, 34). The pay of the garrison at Techtho (P.Stras. 103–104), of the soldiers of Ito (P.Würzb. 7, 10–11; second century BC). Apollonius, included in 157 among the epigonoι of Memphis, will receive a monthly wage of 150 drachmas as rations three ἀρτάβαι of wheat (UPZ XIV, 47–49, 71–72). The remuneration of the soldiers accompanying a shipment by water (P.Lille 25, 45–49), etc. When the ὀψώνιον is paid before the work is done, in the guise of provisions or a deposit, it is called πρόδομα (P.Eleph.

28; P.Cair.Zen. 59002,4–5 = SB 6708; P.Tebt. 769; cf. M. Holleaux, Etudes d'épigraphie, vol. 3, p. 138, n. 1). Cf. J. Lesquier, Les Institutions militaires de l'Égypte sous les Lagides, Paris, 1911, pp. 101f.; E. Bickerman, Institutions des Séleucides, p. 95; R. Marichal, "La Solde des armées romaines d'Auguste à Septime-Sévère," in Mélanges Is. Lévy (Annuaire de l'Institut de Philologie et d'histoire orientales et slaves, vol. 13), Brussels, 1955, pp. 399–421.

⁴ The σιτομετρία. Ten Arabs from Philadelphia receive at the same time as the φυλακίται their pay (ὀψώνιον) and rations (σιτομετρία) for twelve months (P.Cair.Zen. 59296, col. I, 7–11; II, 22–24; cf. 59421, 6–7; 59498; 59507; PSI 408, 421, 443; cf. T. Reekmans, La Sitométrie dans les archives de Zénon, Brussels, 1966). Cf. Polybius, 1.68.8–9: τὰ μετρήματα καὶ τὰ ὀψώνια. The people of Smyrna will see to it that the royal treasury pays the mercenaries their wages and their provisions in kind or in costs (τὸ τε μετρήματα καὶ τὰ ὀψώνια τᾶλλα ὅσα εἰ—ῶει, Dittenberger, Or. 229, 107; commented on by M. Launey, Armées hellénistiques, vol. 2, pp. 669ff., 725, 750); cf. the order of Ptolemy II Philadelphus: "if they have received their vouchers for wages, grain rations, and provisions" (P.Amh. II, 29, 8–13); P.Fay. 302; P.Tebt. 723, 4 (137 BC), etc.

⁵ Luke 3:14—καὶ ἀρκεῖ—σθε τοι—ς ὀψωνίοις ὑμῶ—ν (on the ban on extortion, cf. P.Panop.Beatty 2, 230ff. L. Robert, Opera Minora Selecta, vol. 1, pp. 364–372). E. Delebecque comments: "The word ὀψώνιον probably does not mean 'pay' ('la solde') but rather 'stipend' ('prêt') and probably 'independent stipend' ('prêt franc'). The 'stipend' is the sum given by the army for the subsistence and upkeep of a soldier; but the 'independent stipend,' or 'freelance stipend,' is a sum allotted to the soldier himself to provide his own subsistence; and it is easier for a man provisionally separated from his unit to abuse his power in order to supplement a 'stipend' that is not very high" (Évangile de Luc, p. 19).

⁶ Julius Pollux, Onom. 7.38, on the derivatives of ὄψον, cites Thugenides: ἤτησεν εἰ—ς ὀψώνιον τριώβολον. J. Edmonds (The Fragments of Attic Comedy vol. 1, p. 197) translates "begged (me) for three pence for a bit of fish" and dates Thugenides in the middle of the fifth century BC. Text cited by C. C. Caragounis, "—Οψώνιον: A Reconsideration of Its Meaning," in NovT, 1974, pp. 35–57; likewise Aristophanes, Vesp. 1506: "See, I have provisions for food"; Athenaeus 4.141 c: ἔτι δὲ εἰ—ς ὀψωνίαν περὶ δέκα . . . ὀβολούς; Hesychius, ὀψώνιον δαπάνη, κέρδος. The Suda similarly gives to the plural ὀψώνια the meaning κέρδη. For Menander, cf. D. B. Durham, Vocabulary of Menander, p. 83. Cf. J. Kalitsunakis, "ὄψον und ὀψάριον," in Festschrift Kretschmer, Vienna, 1926, pp. 105ff.

⁷ P.Fuad I Univ., p. 98; UPZ 91, 13; BGU 665, col. II, 14; PSI 368, 16: —Αμορται—ς μηνός ὡτ ἕως Μεχεῖρ τριακάς μῆνας ἕξ ὀψωνίου ἔλαβον παρὰ Ἡροδότου κεράμιον οἴνου (250 BC); P.Oxy. 898, 31: χωρὶς δὲ τούτων οὐδὲ ὀψώνιον μοι ε—χορήγησεν ἔτι πρὸ μηνω—ν τριω—ν (AD 123); 531, 21, Cornelius to his father: “Until Anoubas arrives you must pay for the provisions, until I send you something” (second century); 1159, 3, a husband to his wife: “I should not be responsible for the provisions, because I wrote him that I would come the thirtieth”; Dittenberger, Syl. 410, 19; 627, 15; 700, 25.

⁸ Dittenberger, Syl. 1157, 26–28 (after 116 BC); republished and commented on by L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 5, pp. 16–28.

⁹ P.Tebt. 701, 151; cf. P.Mil. 25, col. III, 9; ε—κ τούτου γὰρ ε—λέγχεται ὀψωνίου μὲν ὑπηρετω—ν (second century AD). On the function of the ὑπηρεταί in the distribution of wages, cf. H. Kupiszewski, J. Modrzejewski, “ΥΠΗΡΕΤΑΙ,” in JJP, vol. 11–12, 1958, pp. 155ff. Most of the references are given by M. Launey, Armées hellénistiques, vol. 2, pp. 726ff.

¹⁰ Theodoret: τὴν ἀναγκαίαν τροφήν. J. Héring (La Seconde Epître de saint Paul aux Corinthiens, Neuchâtel-Paris, 1958), translates correctly: “en acceptant d’elles de quoi vivre, pour vous servir” (“accepting from them the wherewithal to live, in order to serve you”). The ὀψώνιον is not only the payment of a functionary (P.Stras. 622, 6); it can also be a recompense, a pension, as it were, left to a victorious athlete in a will (P.Ryl. 153, 25).

¹¹ Cf. P.Enteux. 48, where the Thracian horseman Aristocrates hires a certain Pistos, a Persian by descent, to follow him in the army and serve him. In Herodotus 8.17, “Clinias, son of Alcibiades, went to war at his own expense” (ὅς δαπάνην οἰ—κλήην παρεχόμενος ε—στρατεύετο).

παιδαγωγός, παιδευτής

paidagogos, servant working as a child’s guardian and tutor; paideutes, teacher, instructor

paidagogos, S 3807; TDNT 5.596–625; EDNT 3.2; NIDNTT 1.370, 3.775, 778–779; MM 473; L&N 36.5; BAGD 603 | paideutes, S 3810; TDNT 5.596–625; EDNT 2.3; NIDNTT 3.775–778; MM 474; L&N 33.244, 38.5; BAGD 603

These two terms are not synonymous. The first, unknown in the OT, is used twice by St. Paul and in a pejorative sense: “You may have ten thousand paidagogoi in Christ, but at least you do not have many fathers, for in Christ Jesus, through the gospel, I am the one who fathered you.”¹ “The law was our paidagogos until Christ” (Gal 3:24). In both cases, the paidagogos is in an inferior position, and in the second case a temporary position; for the law, imposing discipline and punishments on the Israelites, played the role of an overseer or guardian until Christ ushered in the age of liberation.²

Etymologically, the paidagogos is one who shows the way to a child, thus one who teaches a child how to behave.³ Until the age of six or seven, the Greek child was cared for almost exclusively by its mother (cf. Plato, Prt. 325 cff.). At that age, it was not allowed to go out alone but was entrusted to a paidagogos who went with it on its walks and took it to school,⁴ keeping it away from possible accidents or dangers,⁵ carrying its bags, watching over its outward bearing and behavior, and seeing that it completed its daily program of lessons, games, and various duties (Plutarch, An virt. doc. 2; Clement of Alexandria, Paed. 1.7.54–55). Usually paidagogoi were slaves, foreigners or invalids incapable of performing other work.⁶ Brutal and often drunk (Clement, Paed.), they were not sparing with blows, and when the children—in whom they inspired fear—became adolescents, they saw their oversight as a form of tyranny.⁷ Such is the classic portrait of the paidagogos.

But in the Hellenistic period, the “accompanying” role of the paidagogos expanded and became nobler; his protection was not exclusively negative. He formed the child’s character and morality⁸ and even became its private tutor, if not its teacher. The Persian kings chose for their children “the wisest, the most just, the most moderate, the most courageous” (Ps.-Plato, Alc. 121 e); some received the title of citizen,⁹ and the Egyptian papyri attest that they not only received honoraria¹⁰ but became objects of respect. Funerary monuments even attest to a certain veneration.¹¹ In the second-third century, a mother, after writing to her son, “see to it that you devote yourself to your paidagogos as it is fitting to do to a teacher,” (melesato soi te kai to paidagogo sou kathekonti kathegete se paraballein) concludes: “Greet your highly esteemed paidagogos Eros” (aspasai ton timiotaton paidogogon sou Eroti, P.Oxy. 930, 18ff.). It is most likely with this nuance of esteem that Paul refers to the tutor-teachers of the Corinthians (1Cor 4:15), who nevertheless could not be on the same level as the father who conceived his child and retains his full rights as its educator.

Thus the paidagogos comes close to being a teacher-instructor (paideutes), in the first instance because in the Bible the paidagogos is seen as an educator who corrects and punishes,¹² and also because the paideutes is an example and a teacher of life and wisdom more than of knowledge.¹³ Finally, like the paidagogos who contributes to the education of the children, the paideutes trains disciples: “you who bear the name of Jew . . . being taught by the law . . . a guide of the blind, a light to those who are in darkness, an educator of the ignorant (paideuten aphronon), the teacher of infants (didaskalon nepion).¹⁴ But it is still the case that the paideutes proper is a teacher (Sir 37:19), an instructor. In 169 BC, Attalus II of Pergam sent the necessary funds “so that his foundation should remain in perpetuity and the regular compensation of the instructors should be guaranteed.”¹⁵

¹ 1Cor 4:15; cf. P. Gutierrez, Paternité spirituelle, pp. 119ff. M. Saillard, “C’est moi qui, par l’Evangile, vous ai enfantés dans le Christ Jésus (I Cor IV, 15),” in RSR, 1968, pp. 5–42.

² The law played the role of a jailer. The emphasis is on the absence of freedom (cf. K. Stendahl, “La Loi, surveillant qui conduit au Christ,” in SEA, vol. 18–19, 1955; cf. RB, 1956, p. 282); it is in this sense that Cain replied to God that he was not his brother’s overseer or guardian (οὐκ εἶναι παιδαγωγὸς καὶ φύλαξ αὐτοῦ, Josephus, Ant. 1.56). Cf. παιδαγωγέω τὰς ἐπιθυμίας—control, discipline one’s desires (Musonius frag. 7, line 27; frag. 12, line 40; ed. C. E. Lutz, pp. 56, 86).

³ Cf. E. Schupe, “Paidagogos,” in PW, vol. 18, 2375–2385; H. I. Marrou, Histoire de l’éducation, pp. 202, 207 = ET, pp. 201, 207; H. M. Gale, The Use of Analogy in the Letters of Paul, Philadelphia, 1964, pp. 46ff.

⁴ Demosthenes, C. Euerg. 47.56. Cf. Plato: “Are you allowed to govern yourself (ἄρχειν σεαυτοῦ) or is this right refused? —How could it be granted? —Then you have someone who governs you? —Yes, the paidagogos whom you see here. —A slave, perhaps? —Of course, our slave. —Strange thing for a free person to obey a slave! And what sort of government does he carry out over you? —He takes me to the house of the schoolmaster” (ἄγων δῆπου εἰς διδασκάλου, Lysis 208 c; cf. Resp. 3.406 aff.). This tutelage ceases when the youth reaches the age of eighteen, cf. Philo, To Gaius 53: “Here is the teacher (διδάσκαλος) of the one who has no more need of learning, the paidagogos of the one who is no longer a child, the admonisher (ὁ νοθετητής) of one who is more sensible than himself”; Epictetus, frag. 97: παι—δας μὲν ὄντας ἡμα—ς οἰ—γονει—ς παιδαγωγῶ— παρέδοσαν, ἐπιβλέποντι πανταχοῦ πρὸς τὸ μὴ βλάπτεσθαι ἄνδρας δὲ γενομένους ὁ θεὸς παραδίδωσι τῇ ἐνφύτῳ συνειδήσει φυλάττειν.

⁵ Cf. Plutarch, Lyc. 17.1: “Old men watch over young men. . . . Far from having only superficial control, they all see themselves as it were as fathers, paidagogoi, and leaders of all the young”; De aud. poet. 14; Quaest. conv. 3, prol.: “Stripping us of all affected attitudes, shielding us from the surveillance of the rules, like children who get away from their paidagogos”; Dio Chrysostom 72.10.

⁶ Josephus, Life 429; Ps.-Plutarch, De lib. ed. 7; Plutarch, Mor. 4 a–b; Plutarch, Fab. 5.5; Ps.-Plato, Alc. 122 b: “Pericles gave you as a paidagogos one of his slaves who was so old as to be utterly useless.”

⁷ Plautus, Bacch. 422ff. Ps.-Plato, Ax. 366 e: the paidagogos is the first of the evils that the child had to undergo at the age of seven; Suetonius, Nero 37: “Paetus Thrasea kept the frowning face of a paidagogos.” Cf. SB 9050, col. IV, 10: ἔγραψα τῷ στρατηγῷ ... ἵνα μὴ παιδαγωγὸν ἔχω ἄνθρωπον φιλαίτιον (first-second century).

⁸ Josephus, Ant. 18.212. Hence the title of Paidagogos given to Christ by Clement of Alexandria, who explains: “The paidagogos is an educator . . . his goal is to improve the soul . . . he leads a person into the virtuous life” (Paed. 1.1); cf. O. Navarre, “Paedagogus,” in DAGR, vol. 4, 1, pp. 273ff.

⁹ Herodotus 8.75; another example of a citizen-paidagogos, at Athens in the third-second century BC, in J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1959, n. 140, who refer to REA 1940, p. 303.

¹⁰ Stud.Pal. XX, 85 r 11 (p. 76); P.Tebt. 112 (p. 473); PSI 809, 7: Μακαρίῳ παιδαγωγῷ ὑπὲρ τιμῆς ἰματίου; SB 9581, 10.

¹¹ Epitaphs for paidagogoi are numerous; since P. Roussel announced the discovery of one at Constantinople (“Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1934, p. 241), many others have been discovered at Athens, Bithynia, etc. Cf. J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1941, p. 260, n. 139; 1971, p. 431, n. 281. A. Oepke cites CIL VI, 1, 2210: “Paidagogo suo καὶ καθηγητῇ item tutori a pupillatu, ob redditam sibi ab eo fidelissime tutelam” (Der Brief des Paulus an die Galater, Leipzig, 1937, p. 67).

¹² Hos 5:2—“I am the one who punishes you” (εγὼ δὲ παιδευτῆς ὑμῶν, Vulgate eruditor); Heb 12:9—“We have our fathers according to the flesh as correctors (εἵχομεν παιδευτὰς) and we incline toward them”; Pss. Sol. 8.29—σὺ παιδευτῆς ἡμῶν εἶ.

¹³ 4Macc 5:34—“O law that instructs us, I shall never betray you”; 9:6—Eleazar, “this old man, our master”; Philo, Good Man Free 143: “The poets are life-teachers in everything”; Dionysius of Halicarnassus 2.59: παιδευτῆς σοφίας.

¹⁴ Rom 2:20. M. J. Lagrange observes that these two latter expressions are almost synonymous; cf. Plutarch, Cam. 10.3.

¹⁵ Dittenberger, Syl. 672, 10: οἱ—μισθοὶ τοῖς παιδευταῖς εὐτακτέωνται; cf. line 20, 35, 42: “let the instructors be paid each year.” In the papyri, παιδευτής appears only once, in the sixth century (SB 5941, 2). In the inscriptions, the παιδευτής is associated rather often with the physician (I.Bulg. 30, 5; J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1938, p. 454, n. 332; 1960, p. 176, n. 261) or the sophist (1955, p. 259, n. 194); cf. 1949, p. 141, n. 167; 1959, p. 183, n. 138 a.

πανήγυρις

panegyris, festal assembly, sacred festival

panegyris, S 3831; TDNT 5.722; EDNT 3.9; MM 476; L&N 51.4; BAGD 607

“You have drawn near to Mount Zion and the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and myriads of angels in festal assembly” (panegyrei, Heb 12:22). A NT hapax, panegyris (a compound formed from pan and ageiro) retains the richness of its usual meaning in secular Greek,¹ which must therefore be outlined.

(a) The emphasis is first of all on the number and universality of the participants at a meeting (megale xynodos, Thucydides 3.104.4). Usually it is an assembly of all the people of a city or a country, even of people of the same race, hence a public meeting (P.Oxy. 41; cf. Theophrastus, Char. 6.7), a general or plenary assembly whose members are quite diverse.² In the panegyris of Heb 12:22, we may thus see a reference to the density of the heavenly population, a reiteration of myriades angelon: the angels make up a varied multitude that is beyond counting, as is also the case in the demography of the heavenly court in Revelation.

(b) The fundamental meaning of panegyris is “festival”: a major gathering of people to celebrate a formal occasion. This is its meaning in its four occurrences in the OT, where panegyris is always associated with heorte (“feast”; Hos 2:11; 9:5; Amos 5:21; Ezek 46:11). In fact, this meaning is so predominant that panegyris is normally synonymous with joy: “The usual sorrow is doubled especially on the occasion of feasts for those who cannot celebrate them, for they miss the delight that a large gathering brings.”³ “Full of gratitude for your gifts, those to whom you have dispensed wealth and great favors for their perpetual possession reserve a tithe for you, celebrating each year on the occasion of your festival.”⁴ Even though these celebrations, which were accompanied by banquets where the wine flowed freely, sometimes degenerated into occasions for license, in themselves they provided rest for the body and joy for the soul;⁵ so much so that the word panegyris was used even for small get-togethers: “You are invited to celebrate the birthday of my son Gennadius (ten panegyria tes genethliou) by dining with us on the sixteenth at seven o’clock.”⁶ Surely this connotation is at the forefront in Heb 12:22—the society of the angels is a joyful assembly, the heavenly Jerusalem a place of beatitude. The message for Christians who are on their way there is that they will find happiness and exultant joy.⁷

(c) Given the abundant, quasi-technical usage of panegyris for the Olympic, Isthmian, Pythian, Nemean, etc., games,⁸ we must include a sports meaning in Heb 12:22. These competitions not only attract the largest crowds, they also celebrate a victory (cf. Strabo 5.2.7), and here a reward.⁹ In effect, Hebrews defines the Christian life as an athletic trial, describes the conditions for training and winning, points to the prizes offered and the crowd of spectators who admire and encourage the athletes of faith (12:1-2). So it is not surprising that the epistle uses a compatible metaphor to evoke the glory and joy that are in store for the victors, namely, the metaphor of the jubilant polis, of a panegyris at which the whole assembly of the elect celebrates and sings the praises of the garlanded competitors.

(d) All of the Greeks’ great national festivals, and especially the Olympic Games, had a religious character.¹⁰ The crowd came together with the priests around a common sanctuary where sacrifice was offered.¹¹ Panegyris or “sacred festival” is constantly associated with thysia.¹² This meaning of liturgical observance is clearly present in Heb 12:22, where the heavenly joy is tinted by religious seriousness and reverence.¹³ On the one hand, the epistle pictures heaven as a place of worship, where the great high priest and leitourgos officiates (8:2); on the other hand the myriads of angels are leitourgika pneumata (1:14), born agents of divine worship, occupying themselves with praising God and proclaiming God as sovereign and universal judge: “and let all the angels of God worship him” (kai proskynesatosan auto pantes angeloι theou, 1:6).

(e) There is one last meaning of the pagan panegyris that may have been assumed by the writer of Hebrews. Before it came to refer to the praise of a personage,¹⁴ panegyris (Latin laudatio) was used for ceremonial orations written or declaimed by sophists, rhetors, or orators at a great festival before a large audience.¹⁵ This rhetorical meaning shows up in the context of Heb 12:22, where the old and new revelation are contrasted. The ones who heard at Sinai asked that they be spoken to no more, so terrified were they at the manifestations of divine power. The beneficiaries of the new covenant can draw near to Zion and come to the panegyris of the angels, for they are united with the mediator Jesus, whose blood speaks better things than that of Abel (verse 24). So they are invited—and this is the point of the image of the heavenly Jerusalem—not to refuse to hear the one who speaks from highest heaven (verse 25). The throne of God is not only an object of worship, an altar to be approached in a liturgical procession (4:16), but is also the source of oracles promulgated on earth, exactly as in Revelation. The panegyris of Hebrews, religious and joyful as it is, is also eloquent. It is no longer the praise of Athens, as uttered by Lysias or Isocrates, but the praise of the glory of God, the expression of his will, the panegyris of the city of the living God, that abides as a perpetual feast.¹⁶

¹ Cf. L. Ziehen, "Panegyris," in PW, vol. 13, 3, pp. 581ff. E. Saglio, on this word, in DAGR, vol. 4, 1, p. 313; C. Spicq, "La Panégyrie de Hébr. XII, 22," in ST, 1952, pp. 30–38.

² "Flaviane Philokrateia has given ten thousand Attic drachmas for anointings with oil, so that with the income from this sum, during the three days of the panegyris, all may have the right to anointings with oil—citizens, foreigners, and slaves" (I. Bulg. 2265, 10–17). Josephus, Ant. 2.45: "It was the custom for these women to join in the general assembly" (εἰς τὴν πανήγυριν). Panegyris refers to the press of the crowd at the theater (Plato, Resp. 10.604 e; P. Oxy. 2127, 4; P. Princ. 61, 15), political meetings (Aeschylus, Ag. 845; Dittenberger, Syl. 1048, 17), athletic meets (P. Oxy. 42, 3; 2476, 12; SB 1416, 2 and 16; 5225, 9; 5424, 16), panhellenic fairs which were attended by people from all over (Dittenberger, Syl. 298, 19); "Acara, Regium Lepidum, Macri Campi, where each year there is a panegyris" (Strabo 5.1.11; cf. 10.5.4: ἢ τε πανήγυρις ε—μπορικόν τι προ—γμα; Pausanias 10.32.9; P. Fay. 93, 11; on the annual livestock fairs, cf. Varro, Rust. 2, pref. 6). It is because of this diversity of participants that Pythagoras compared life to a panegyris (Diogenes Laertius 8.8. Cicero, Tusc. 5.3.9; Epictetus 3.5.10); cf. Wis 15:12—"Life is only a fair (πανηγυρισμός) organized for profit." A. Causse, "La Vision de la nouvelle Jérusalem (Esaïe LX) et la signification sociologique des assemblées de fête et des pèlerinages dans l'Orient sémitique," in Mélanges syriens offerts à M. R. Dussaud, Paris, 1939, pp. 739–750.

³ Philo, Flacc. 118. At panegyreis one sees "people dressed in white, heads garlanded, beaming, radiating good humor by the gaiety of their countenances . . . attractions, diversions . . . pleasures of all sorts and for all the senses" (To Gaius 12; cf. Cherub. 92); Husbandry 91; Aristophanes, Pax 342: "Do not yet allow yourself to celebrate; you are not yet sure of anything. But when we hold her, then rejoice, cry out, laugh; for this will be the time for sailing, living, loving, sleeping, going to panegyreis, feasting, playing the Cottabus, living like Sybarites, singing tra la la"; P. Oxy. 2084, 6; P. Cair. Zen. 59341 a 2 and 11; SB 6760, 2ff. The linking of feast and panegyris is constant (Spec. Laws 2.176; 3.183; Moses 2.159; Xenophon, Cyr. 6.1.10; Athenaeus 6.259 b; Dittenberger, Syl. 867, 52; Or. 56, 33 and 69; 90, 49). Alexander celebrates a feast for nine days in honor of Zeus and the Muses (Diodorus Siculus 17.16.4).

⁴ Hymn to Isis (SEG VIII, 549, 24; with the comments of E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, p. 645; V. F. Vanderlip, Four Greek Hymns, pp. 46ff.). Cf. the panegyris of Pharos, where God is thanked for benefits that are always new (Philo, Moses 2.41), or the solemn panegyris in honor of Ptolemy III Euergetes I and Queen Berenice: “Each year there will be a panegyris at state expense, in all sanctuaries in the whole land ... the day on which the star of Isis rises, which is recognized in the sacred texts as the new year” (Decree of Canopus, in Dittenberger, Or. 56, 34–35). Παναηγυρίζω is synonymous with ε—ορτάζω, cf. Isa 66:10—“Rejoice, O Jerusalem, and exult in her (πανηγυρίσατε), all you who love her”; Philo, Moses 2.211: “Those who were enrolled on the list of citizens . . . had to celebrate a panegyris, spend time celebrating, abstain from work and activities directed toward profit-making . . . ; they had to give themselves some time off and free themselves of all bothersome and tiring cares”; Strabo 11.8.4; 14.1.44; BGU 863, 3; PSI 374, 15; P.Oxy. 705, 35; 2561, 3.

⁵ Cf. the nuance of happiness expressed by “the joy of the eyes” (ὀφθαλμω—ν πανήγυρις, Aelian, VH 3.1). Since participation in sporting festivals entailed a truce between warring parties, the idea of peace is associated with these meetings, cf. Dittenberger, Syl., 483, 7; P.Oxy. 1380, 133; SB 4224 (with the commentary of C. G. Brandis, in Hermes, 1897, pp. 509–522).

⁶ P.Oxy. 1214, 3; likewise PSI 1242, 1 (first century BC); the wedding ceremony is referred to as a panegyris by Heliodorus (Aeth. 4.15.3); cf. the new year’s festival, P.Ross.Georg. II, 18, 31 (with commentary, p. 107).

⁷ We may refer to Heb 3:11-4:11 (κατάπαυσις, σαββατισμός), emphasizing the nuances of rest and inviolable peace, to which panegyris adds the idea of brotherly harmony. As Philo says concerning the sacred Sabbath: “All the festivals of the year are in reality daughters of the sacred Sabbath, which is like a mother. . . . In their ceremonies and in the joy that they stir up, one tastes pleasures unmixed with anxiety and bitterness, filling both body and soul, the former with the pleasures of life, the latter with the teachings of philosophy” (Spec. Laws 2.214).

⁸ Pindar, Isthm. 4.28: “They did not fail to send their curved chariot to the great panegyreis, and they were glad to pay what it cost to send their horses to strive with all the peoples of Hellas”; Plato, Hp. Mi. 363 c: “It is my custom to go to Elis where I live, to Olympia, to the panegyris of the Greeks every time the games take place”; Demosthenes, Corona 91: “Let the Byzantines and Perinthians send delegations to the Greek panegyreis, the Isthmian, Nemean, Olympic, and Pythian games”; Aristotle, Rh. 3.3.1406a22; Strabo 8.3.30; Pausanias 5.4.5; SEG XVI, 55, 8; inscription from Pergamum: πανηγυρικὸν γυμνάσιον (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1962, p. 135, n. 55; cf. 1956, p. 152, n. 213: κατὰ τὴν Ἡερακλήων ἀγώνων πανήγυριν; 1959, pp. 169–170, n. 66; L. Robert, Monnaies antiques en Troade, Geneva-Paris, 1966, pp. 18–46); BGU 1704, 9 (cf. Viereck, in Klio, vol. 8, pp. 49ff.); cf. the πανήγυρις —Αδριανή at Gaza (RB, 1931, p. 29) and the games of Daphne described by E. A. Parsons, The Alexandrian Library, Glory of the Hellenic World, London, 1952, pp. 42ff.

⁹ Cf. Heb 10:35; 11:6, 26. Isocrates, Paneg. 1: “I am often amazed that the founders of panegyreis and the organizers of gymnastic competitions should think physical advantage to be worthy of such great rewards”; Philo, Alleg. Interp. 2.108: “Work to be crowned . . . with a noble and glorious crown that no panegyris among humankind offers”; Husbandry 91, 117; Dio Cassius 53.1, τὴν πανήγυριν τὴν ἐ—πὶ τῇ νίκῃ; Manetho 4.74; Critodemus, in CCAG, VIII, 1, pp. 259, 12; 260, 24; P.Oxy. 1416, 16.

¹⁰ Josephus, War 5.230: The high priests ascended the altar “only on the Sabbath, the new moon, the celebration of a national festival, or a public observance” (ἢ πανήγυρις πάνδημος); SB 8334, 25. Cf. E. N. Gardiner, Olympia: Its History and Remains, Oxford, 1925; idem, Athletics of the Ancient World, Oxford, 1930, A. J. Festugière, “La Grèce: La Religion,” in Histoire générale des religions, Paris, 1944, vol. 1, pp. 66ff. M. P. Nilsson, “Festivals,” in OCD, p. 435; Herodotus 2.59ff.; Strabo 5.2.9; 5.3.5; Dittenberger, Syl. 95; 298; 589; 635; 714; 736; 867; Or. 305 (a number of these inscriptions have been republished in LSCGSup, see the index). P.Hib. 27, 76 and 163; P.Cair.Zen. 59820, 3.

¹¹ Isocrates, Paneg. 43: “It is right to praise those who established the panegyreis, because, thanks to the practice they left behind, after libations and the abolishing of existing hatreds, we come together, and then, pooling our prayers and sacrifices, we recall how we are related to each other.” The liturgical ceremony includes a procession, songs, sacred rites (Dittenberger, Syl. 298; Petosiris, in CCAG VII, 133, 11). M. P. Nilsson, Geschichte der griechischen Religion, vol. 1, p. 778; ET History of Greek Religion.

¹² Amos 5:21—θυσίας ἐ—ν ται—ς πανηγύρεσιν; Herodotus 2.62; Strabo 10.5.2; 14.1.20; Pausanias 10.32.14–16; Philo, Moses 2.159: “Many sacrifices were of necessity celebrated each day, and especially in the panegyreis and festivals, either of private individuals or publicly on behalf of all”; Decalogue 78; Spec. Laws 3.183; Nicolaus of Damascus, frag. 62 (ed. C. Müller, vol. 3, p. 396); SEG 4.664.19: τὰς θυσίας εἰς τὴν πανήγυριν; I.Lind. 419, 6 and 55; LSCG, n. 156 B 31; 159, 5–6.

¹³ Cf. Philo, Spec. Laws 2.160, uniting honor and admiration in the panegyris, θαυμάσαι τε καὶ τιμῆσαι πανηγύρεως ε—κεχειρία. In the cult of Athena: τῆς περὶ τὴν πανήγυριν εὐκοσμίας (LSAM, n. 81, 17). Cf. in the ecclesiastical language of the sixth-seventh century, Menos writing to Theodorus to guard his health in order to be able to celebrate the panegyris (feast) of Holy Epiphany for many long years (P.Oxy. 1857, 5).

¹⁴ —Εγκώμιον, cf. L. Robert, Etudes épigraphiques, pp. 21ff. F. Durrbach, Choix, n. 84, 112. On the praise of a city, cf. L. Robert, “Sur des lettres d’un métropolitain de Phrygie,” in Journal des savants, 1962, pp. 151ff.

¹⁵ Cf. the Olympic Discourse of Gorgias, the Olympic of Lysias, the Panegyric of Isocrates; Aristotle, Rh. 3.1408b15; Philo, Good Man Free 96; Plutarch, Tim. 37.4; Heraclides Ponticus in Iamblichus, VP 58–59; P.Oxy. 2084.

¹⁶ “While the other panegyreis meet at long intervals and break up quickly, our city is for those who sustain a perpetual panegyris” (Isocrates, Paneg. 46; cf. Thucydides 2.38.1; Ps.-Xenophon, Ath. 3.8).

παραγγελία, παραγγέλλω

parangelia, command, order, parangelo, to pass the word along, order, prescribe see also ε—ντολή

parangelia, S 3852; TDNT 5.761–765; EDNT 3.16–17; NIDNTT 1.340–341; MM 480–481; L&N 33.328; BAGD 613 | parangelo, S 3853; TDNT 5.761–765; EDNT 3.16–17; NIDNTT 1.340–342; MM 481; L&N 33.327; BAGD 613

According to its etymology, the first meaning of parangelo is “announce from one to another,” hence, pass the word within the group, give a password, pass along a notice, communicate a message, make known.¹ Thus Claudius Lysias “made known” to Paul’s accusers that they should speak against him (Acts 23:30; cf. Josephus, Ant. 2.311), and Judas “had his orders passed to those who were with him.”² In the papyri, in AD 75/76, a borrower is notified that he must make good his debt (P.Yale 64, 18 and 22); and in the third century, a Roman citizen informs Epimachos of the terms of his will.³

But even more frequently this verb and the corresponding noun⁴ mean “order, prescribe.” The subject is God⁵ or his Word (P.Lond. 1915, 4), Moses or Virtue with their commands (Philo, Heir 13; Prelim. Stud. 63), the prefect,⁶ the strategos (Onasander, Strategikos 25; P.Oslo 84, 15; P.Oxy. 1411, 16), the topoteretes (P.Apoll. 12, 5), an imperial officer (P.Oxy. 2268, 5), the riparius (P.Oxy. 2235, 23), a local VIP (P.Oxy. 1831, 6, meizon), the prostates or president of a club (P.Mich. 243, 4; under Tiberius), the gymnastic teacher vis-à-vis athletes (Philo, Alleg. Interp. 1.98), above all military commanders: “Holophernes gave the order to his whole army . . . to strike camp . . . and join combat” (Jdt 7:1); Antiochus ordered his troops to parade armed (2Macc 5:25; cf. 13:10; 1Macc 5:58).

Consequently, parangelia would normally be an injunction, command, order (Philodemus of Gadara, Rh. I, pp. 78ff.; Pap.Lugd.Bat. VI, 15, 144; P.Lond. 1231, 16; vol. 3, p. 109), even a summons (P.Ness. III, 29, 3). In this sense the high priest and the Sanhedrin formally forbid the apostles to preach (Acts 4:18; 5:28) and the praetors at Philippi order the jailer to guard their prisoners carefully.⁷ But context gives each occurrence of the word a particular nuance that cannot always be specified precisely. When Paniskos writes to his wife Ploutogenia parengeila soi exerchomenos hoti me apelthes eis ten oikian sou (P.Mich. 217, 3; third century, republished SB 7249), it is possible to translate either “I asked you” or “I ordered you, when I am gone, not to go back to your house.” Parangelia can take on the mild sense of exhortation or counsel,⁸ and it is also known to correspond to the litis denuntiatio, the summons to appear in court.⁹

In light of these usages, we can see that Jesus gives instructions to the Twelve (Matt 10:5; Mark 6:8) and strongly advises the cleansed leper not to tell anyone about the miracle.¹⁰ But he sharply forbids the apostles to reveal his messianic identity (Luke 9:21—epitimesas autois parengeilen), and he commands the unclean spirit (8:29), as he orders the Twelve not to leave Jerusalem (Acts 1:4) and to preach to the people (10:42).

St. Paul similarly orders the prophetic spirit of the servant woman (Acts 16:18), but it seems that his parangeliai are ethical prescriptions, rules for Christian living (1Thess 4:2; 2Thess 3:4, 6; 1Cor 11:17), with regard to marriage, for example (1Cor 7:10), or the obligation to work (1Thess 4:11; 2Thess 3:10). The verb is imperative,¹¹ and the commands are repeated;¹² but this is still as much teaching as commanding, giving both doctrine that must be received and rules that must be followed.¹³

In the Pastorals (and the word pastoral here means a mandamus, like a bishop’s letter), St. Paul passes on his instructions to his favorite disciple, who must in turn teach and command:¹⁴ “I asked you to remain faithfully as Ephesus hina parangeiles ” (1Tim 1:3; cf. 6:17). Timothy must act with authority; for him this is a serious obligation: teresai se ten entolen (1Tim 6:13-14). But if the verb parangello retains all the force of a military command addressed to a soldier (1:18; 2Tim 2:3), the substantive parangelia means rather “mandate, obligation, duty”;¹⁵ “This is the mandate that I entrust to you, my child Timothy” (1Tim 1:18); “The goal of this command is love” (1:5), which is the essence of the gospel and of the whole Christian life.

¹ Cf. Diodorus Siculus 17.72.4: they urged each other to form a triumphal procession.

² 2Macc 12.5; cf. 2Chr 36:22—“Cyrus had a proclamation communicated (παρήγγειλε κηρύξαι) throughout his kingdom” (hiphil of the Hebrew ‘abar); 2Esdr 1:1. The LXX uses this verb to translate the Hebrew shama’, “call together” (1Sam 15:4; 23:8; 1Kgs 15:22; Jer 50:29; 51:27), the hiphil of sapaq (1Sam 10:17), of za’aq (Judg 4:10), the niphil of ya’as, “consult, take counsel” (1Kgs 12:6).

³ P.Oxy. 2474, 40; cf. P.Sorb. 33, 26: “and indeed Apollonius informed me” (καὶ γὰρ ε—μοὶ παρήγγειλλεν —Απολλώνιος). In P.Mich. 243, 4, the notices or meetings of a club are mentioned; cf. 624, 29; P.Fouad 30, 23: “We ask that a copy of this hypomnemna be sent to them by the hand of the bailiff, so that having written notification (ἵνα ἔχοντες ἔνγραπτον παραγγελίαν) . . . they may know that they are responsible” (second century); the publication of the edict of the prefect Subatianus Aquila was carried out in each town (P.Yale 61, 12), like the notification by the strategos of the inhabitants of different parts of the city (P.Oxy. 1187, 30); the Blemmyes notified the τοποτηρητής (P.Apoll. 15, 5); P.Ryl. 81, 9; SB 7331, 7.

⁴ Not in the LXX, cf. παράγγελμα (Hebrew mishma’at), 1Sam 22:14.

⁵ Philo, Post. Cain 29; cf. the divine precepts in Cornutus (Theol. Graec. 9), the commands revealed by Zeus (Dittenberger, Syl. 985, 2; Philadelphia, first century). Geminus, Intro. to Astronomy 8.7: “The command given by the laws and by the oracles to offer sacrifices in accord with ancestral customs”; Diodorus Siculus 17.4.9; 17.65.4; 17.107.1.

⁶ P.Princ. 20, 9 and 14; P.Cair.Isid. 66, 21. The prefect Valerius Eudaemon in his edict of AD 138: “I bid them refrain from such treachery” (P.Oxy. 237, col. VIII, 12). The edict of the prefect Tiberius Julius Alexander says: “I enjoin (παραγγέλλω) them not to do . . . anything unless the prefect has passed on the matter. In addition, I order . . . (κελεύω δὲ καὶ κ.τ.λ.)” (Dittenberger, Or. 669, 52; with the commentary of G. Chalon, T. Julius Alexander. Κελεύω is often associated with παραγγέλλω in the papyri, cf. P.Oxy. 1204, 10; Stud.Pal. XX, 283, 7) and in literary Greek (Xenophon, Hell. 2.1.4). A. Pelletier, Josèphe adaptateur, pp. 277–288.

⁷ Acts 16:23-24. The jailer receives the order (παραγγελίαν τοιαύτην λαβών). The authority gives the order: παρ. διδόναι (1Thess 4:2; SB 7835, 12) or παρ. ποιει—ν (Josephus, Ant. 16.241; BGU 1774, 11).

⁸ Commanding goes hand in hand with exhorting (1Thess 4:11; 2Thess 3:12; cf. P.Oxy. 1840, 4). Plutarch's πολιτικά παραγγέλματα (Praecepta gerendae rei publicae) are “political advice” (cf. T. Renoirte, Les “Conseils politiques” de Plutarque, Louvain, 1951); cf. the collection of ethical principles: Δελφικά παραγγέλματα (Dittenberger, Syl. 985, 3).

⁹ SB 4416, 26: παραγγελείαν παραγέρονται ει—ς τὸ ι—ερώτατον βῆμα; P.Tebt. 14, 5; 303. 14; 434 (in 104); P.Grenf. I, 40, 6; P.Oxy. 484, 18; 2343, 7; P.Oslo 2, 19; P.Mich. 526, 21; P.Dura 20, 19; 21, 10; P.Michael. 30, 12; P.Ness. 19, 3; UPZ 71, 17; Philo, Flacc. 141; cf. Chrest.Mitt., 1, pp. 36ff.; A. Boyé, La Denuntiatio introductive d'instance sous le principat, Bourdeaux, 1922; R. Taubenschlag, Law of Greco-Roman Egypt, p. 382.

¹⁰ Luke 5:14 (in Mark 1:44, λέγει); cf. 8:56; Acts 23:22; Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.244: recommend hiding the statues; Diodorus Siculus 17.57.6.

¹¹ 2Thess 3:4—“You are doing and will continue to do the things that we command.” Cf. Acts 15:5, where the Jerusalemites want to compel the converts to observe the law of Moses.

¹² 1Thess 4:11; 2Thess 3:10 (παρηγγέλλομεν, imperfect for customary action); cf. SB 7404, 38: ε—γώ σοι καὶ πρότερον παρήνγειλα καὶ νῦν παραγγέλλω παραλαμβάνιν τὰ βιβλία.

¹³ Cf. 1Tim 4:11—παράγγελλε ταῦτα καὶ δίδασκε.

¹⁴ The supreme authority transmits orders through intermediaries, cf. Dan 3:4 (LXX): “The herald cried . . . ‘You are commanded thus’”; Josephus, Ant. 19.31: I charge you to see to it that each one practices his religion seriously; SB 6097, 4; cf. D. M. Stanley, “Authority in the Church,” in CBQ, 1967, pp. 555–573; H. Maehlum, Die Vollmacht des Timotheus nach den Pastoralbriefen, Basel, 1969.

¹⁵ The Παραγγελίαι of Hippocrates are not a treatise De Praeceptis but De Officio: acting as a physician; cf. Plutarch, Crass. 15.4: παρ. = candidacy for the consulate; Appian, BCiv. 1.21; cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, p. 579.

παραδειγματίζω

paradeigmatizo, to make an example by punishment or public derision; to disgrace, dishonor

paradeigmatizo, S 3856; TDNT 2.32; EDNT 3.17; NIDNTT 2.291, 293; MM 481–482; L&N 25.200; BAGD 614

Unknown in the papyri and rare in literary Greek, this verb means to make an example of a malefactor by punishing him;¹ then make an example of by exposing to derision, to public scorn; and finally to disgrace, to dishonor.² A NT hapax,³ paradeigmatizo in its four OT occurrences always emphasizes the idea of publicness and has connotations of shame (Jer 13:22, Hebrew hamam) and exemplary punishment, as with the hanging of the leaders of Israel (Num 25:4; hiphil of yaqa'; cited by Philo, his only use of the word, Dreams 1.89) or Esther's prayer: "Make an example of the one who took the initiative against us."⁴ These usages correspond to our term "to pillory," meaning to expose a guilty party to public scorn.

So we translate Heb 6:6—"The apostates crucify the Son of God on their own account and ridicule him publicly." Their official repudiation of their sworn faith is an insult to Christ, like an insult hurled at him, a sort of repetition of Calvary in caricature, especially of the scenes described by Matt 26:67-68; 27:38-43. The apostate who professes to be one and proves the claim by his actions tramples the Son of God underfoot with the whole world looking on! But in the case in point, it is he who openly manifests his scorn.

¹ Polybius 2.60.7: "Aristomachus (tyrant of Argos) had to be led across the Peloponnesus to be made an example through his punishment" (μετὰ τιμωρίας παραδειγματιζόμενον); cf. Menander: "If I catch one of them coming near my window and do not make an example of him (παράδειγμα ποιήσω) for the whole region, you may take me for a man like the rest" (Dysk. 484; cf. παράδειγμα φέρω, 863).

² Plutarch, De curios. 10: Archilochus disgraced himself (ε—αυτὸν παραδειγματίζοντος).

³ In Matt 1:19 the correct reading is δειγματίσαι, "expose to public disparagement," rather than παραδ. (a, C).

⁴ Esth 4:17 q; cf. Ezek 28:17—"I exposed you before kings to make a spectacle of you" (Hebrew ra'a^hwâh); cf. Pss. Sol. 2.14—"Before the face of the sun their criminal deeds have been revealed” (seems to have been inspired by Num 25:4).

παραδίδομι

paradidomi, to hand over, give back, become ripe, commend (oneself), transmit, deliver, betray paradidomi, S 3860; TDNT 2.169–172; EDNT 3.18–20; MM 482–483; L&N 13.142, 21.7, 23.110, 23.200, 33.237, 37.12, 37.111, 57.77; BDF §§187(1), 323(1), 390(3), 402(2); BAGD 614–615

Among the very numerous forms of didomi with a prefix,¹ the compound paradidomi is by far the commonest in the NT; its semantics is interesting, as much because of its orthographic variations, especially in the papyri,² as because of its multiple meanings. But given the Koine’s taste for expressivity, this compound is often purely synonymous with didomi.³

I. — The first meaning is “hand over, give something to someone” (tini ti). Thus Jesus “bent his head and gave over [his] spirit” to his father.⁴ Human beings are handed over: a slave to his master⁵ or a child to its mother (Josephus, Ant. 1.217), a young woman to her husband (Tob 7:13; Jos. Asen. 4.10), but also objects: a scepter (Esth 4:17), a sword (2Macc 15:15), the helm of a ship to a pilot (Philo, To Gaius 149), grain (Josephus, Life 73; cf. 69), weapons (War 2.450). Raguel “handed over to Tobit Sarah his wife and half his property: slaves, cattle, and money” (Tob 10:10); Judith “handed over to the servant the head of Holophernes” (Jdt 13:9). God hands over Canaan to Israel (“I swore to give the land to your fathers”),⁶ a city,⁷ a stronghold,⁸ the royal palace (Josephus, War 1.143). The government is given into the hands of the great (War 1.169), the care of the affairs of the land (Life 226, pragmaton epimeleian), the administration of Egypt to Joseph (Ant. 2.89, oikonomian; cf. 6.32), the power (7.30, archen; 7.110, 351; 9.104; 11.321, 334; 14.104; hegemonian, 8.53), the kingdom (7.93, basileian; 7.256; 9.280; 10.48, 82; 16.92), the high priesthood to Aaron (4.18; 5.361), the responsibility of offering sacrifices is given to the priests (11.137). In the papyri, things left by the deceased are given over to the heir (ha kai paredothe, P.Tebt. 406, 9), bundles of reeds to a friend (P.Oxy. 742, 7; second century BC), oil to a factory (P.Tebt. 728, 3; second century BC), cats to a third party (P.Tebt. 764, 32; ta Horou ktene), a she-ass to its buyer (P.Corn. 13, 9), a letter personally delivered (P.Ant. 43, verso 1), ankle bracelets (P.Apoll. 8, 17), the responsibility for sacred vestments,⁹ etc.

II. — The thing given can be simply restitution, a “giving back.” Demetrius asks Jonathan to give hostages back to him.¹⁰ This meaning occurs frequently in the papyri, notably in cases where paradidomi is correlated with paralambano (cf. 1Cor 11:2, 23; 15:3): “At the end of the lease, I will give back to you (paradoso) goats and sheep in equal numbers, adults of good quality, just as I received from you (parelabon)”;¹¹ “After the time I will give back the two arourai free of weeds as when I received it”;¹² “at the expiration of the lease, I will return the lot to you: two arourai just planted in legumes . . . three arourai cleared of stubble” (P.Bour. 17, 4).

III. — In the parable of the Growing Seed, the farmer finally takes the sickle and harvests when the fruit is ready (hotan de paradoi ho karpos, Mark 4:29; cf. Joel 4:13), literally, when it “renders,” that is to say, when it is ripe, when the time has come. We may compare Gen 27:20, where Jacob says, “God gave over (Hebrew qarâh) the game to me,” and Exod 21:13—God provides, brings (Hebrew anâh) the occasion, permits favorable circumstances.¹³

IV. — Paradidomi also means to give oneself over “to the one who judges justly,”¹⁴ and thence “commend.” Paul and Barnabas are commended to the grace of God (Acts 14:26; 15:40), that is, are placed under the Lord’s protection, entrusted to his power, as much for their personal safety as for the success of their mission. This meaning is homogeneous with that of the preceding uses of paradidomi —one delivers or abandons oneself into another’s hands.¹⁵

V. — When one parts with a possession (a material or moral good, an opinion, a word, a writing . . .) to give it to others, one “transmits” it. This meaning of paradidomi, particularly frequent in the NT, especially regarding doctrine that is thus made known, is constant in secular Greek: “The ancients transmitted this tradition to us” (Plato, Phlb. 16 c; Plato, Ep. 12.359d); “The various sciences are preserved and transmitted to posterity forever only by means of letters.”¹⁶ The epitaph of the perfumer Casios: “rewards and numerous crowns which he was the first to wear and which he passed on to his children” (SB 4299, 6); “Andromache passes my letter (ta grammata) on to you.”¹⁷ Likewise in the LXX: “It is possible for you to observe, not so much according to the ancient histories that have been transmitted to us, as in examining what happens under your feet” (Esth 8:12 g); “whatever you deal out (ho ean paradidos), let it be by number and weight” (Sir 42:7). Wis 14:15 has to do with idolatrous religious traditions: a father who had lost his son passed on mysteries and initiations to his subjects (paredoke tois hypocheiriois mysteria kai teletas).¹⁸

Philo uses paradidomi with meanings from “pass on” a calf from the stable to a servant (Abraham 108) and the “transmission” of old fables¹⁹ to the passing down of knowledge, of arts and letters,²⁰ of cultic ceremony (To Gaius 298: threskeia; cf. 237), and of the sacred books, “passed on for the use of those who are worthy of them” (Moses 2.11). Likewise Josephus, who speaks of passing on a password (Ant. 19.31, 188) and of history passing on memories for those who want to learn,²¹ but especially the transmission of facts recorded in the sacred books (Ant. 2.347; 3.89); and of Moses as the one who transmitted the laws.²²

In the NT, it is the first instance the divine revelation that is passed on: “Everything has been passed on to me by my Father (panta moi paradothe hypo tou patros mou), and no one knows the Son but the Father. . . .”²³ What is involved is (1) revelation (apokalypto), (2) the transmission of knowledge (epiginosko) that is (3) total or universal, the sum total of revealed doctrine. According to Luke 1:2, the facts of the gospel have been passed on to us (kathos paredosan hemin) by “those who were from the beginning eyewitnesses and servants of the word.”²⁴ Believers are those who accept this testimony: “You were obedient from the heart to the rule of doctrine that was passed on to you” (hypekousate de ek kardias eis hon paredothete typon didaches).²⁵ “I praise you that in all things . . . you hold to the traditions as I passed them on to you” (kathos paredoka hymin tas paradoseis katechete, 1Cor 11:2); the traditions of the universal church, to which every believer must submit, have to do with doctrinal teaching, ethics, and discipline, and even usages and customs (the deportment of women in liturgical assemblies). Regarding traditions of worship and especially articles of faith—for example, the institution of the Eucharist—the apostle takes care not to claim paternity for himself (through personal revelation), and he emphasizes the origin: “I received (parelabon) from the Lord (apo tou Kyriou) the same thing that I passed on to you (ho kai paredoka hymin).”²⁶ Likewise the most primitive and most essential article of the credo, Christ the Redeemer: “I passed on to you in the first place what I myself received (paredoka hymin en protois ho kai parelabon), that Christ died for our sins . . . and was resurrected.”²⁷ Finally, the whole content of the faith, that is, the whole truth revealed by God, is transmitted to the faithful by an immutable tradition, like a deposit entrusted lest it vary.²⁸

Paradidomi in the NT is also a transmission of power. At the ascension, Jesus proclaims, “All power has been given to me (edothē moi pasa exousia) in heaven and on earth.”²⁹ Again, it is a passing down of property, entrusted with a view to its bearing fruit (Matt 25:14); also of civil and religious laws, institutions and rites which are supposed to be inviolable, and which were passed down by Moses (Acts 6:14, ta ethe); and finally the decrees or decisions of the Jerusalem Council, which Paul and Timothy passed along in the cities that they visited so that they would be observed (Acts 16:4, ta dogmata).

VI. — The predominant sense of paradidomi (Hebrew natan) in the OT is pejorative; God is almost always the subject, and very often the verb is reinforced with a prepositional phrase: God “is delivering into your hand” your adversaries, enemies, oppressors whom the Lord hands over unconditionally to his people.³⁰ It is an exceptional case when paradidomi with this meaning has a favorable sense,³¹ because one is normally “delivered” into subjection, troubles, evils, suffering, and woe—as when Job is given over to the power of Satan (paradidomi soi auton, Job 2:6; T. Job 20.3) or Samson is given over into the hands of the Philistines (Judg 15:12; 16:23-24)—and especially to death;³² but the links between this “delivering” and God and justice show that often punishment is involved, which is why he so often “delivered” the chosen people. “The children of Israel did that which was evil in the eyes of Yahweh and Yahweh delivered them into the hands of Midian for seven years”;³³ “You have handed us over because of our sins” (Isa 64:6; Sir 4:19); “I hand you over for devastation” (Mic 6:16).

The NT inherits this theology: God gives up his people and lets them give themselves to the worship of stars;³⁴ he gives idolaters over to impurity and servitude to dishonorable passions,³⁵ and “he did not spare the angels who sinned, but handed them over to the dark dungeons of Tartarus, where he holds them in reserve for judgment.”³⁶ In the same sense of the word, Paul hands over the incestuous Corinthian man to Satan—who will afflict him with sickness, frustrations, defeats, and ruin—“for the loss of his flesh”;³⁷ or Hymenaeus and Alexander, who had shipwrecked their faith and were consigned to Satan “to learn not to blaspheme any longer.”³⁸ Satan is as it were God’s official agent of punishment, carrying out the sentences of the heavenly Judge, just as the king handed over the merciless debtor to the torturers.³⁹

What is new is that paradidomi is made a technical term for Jesus’ passion.⁴⁰ This verb is used by the Master in his predictions of his passion (“The Son of Man must be delivered into the hands of men”)⁴¹ and by the evangelists;⁴² and St. Paul mentions it: “The Lord, on the night that he was handed over (en te nykti he paredideto) took bread. . . .”⁴³ The term is to be taken first in its legal and judicial sense,⁴⁴ but it conveys moreover a moral or psychological nuance and a theological value. Paradosis was also used for treason (prodosia). Judas Iscariot is always called ho paradidous, “the traitor,”⁴⁵ the one who betrays or betrayed Jesus. The verb rather often also connotes this nuance of criminality: desertion to another camp, breach of sworn faith, betrayal of someone’s trust.⁴⁶ It is certain that the first Christians saw Christ’s crucifixion less as an atrociously painful form of torture than as an ignominy and a result of perfidy.⁴⁷ To say that Jesus was handed over, then, means that he was betrayed.

Moreover, paradidomi is also used for people who give themselves in self-sacrifice for God or neighbor, like Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, who “delivered their bodies rather than serve and worship any other god than their God.”⁴⁸ And it was predicted that the Servant of Yahweh would be handed over to death for redemption from sins (Isa 53:6, 12). This religious meaning is inseparable from paradidomi in the death of Jesus: God gave him over (Rom 4:25; 8:32), or he gave himself over (Gal 2:20), offering himself as a sacrifice of acceptable savor (Eph 5:2, hyper hemon, “for us”). The accent is as much on the love that inspires this offering as on the totality of the gift and its cost: our redemption. Consequently to “deliver oneself” to God or neighbor becomes a major principle of Christian ethics.⁴⁹

VII. — Paradidomi often has the judicial meaning “deliver to court or to prison.” In 248 BC, Pyrrhus wrote to Zeno: “Know that Etearchos delivered me to the praktor on the tenth of Epeiph” (P.Mich. 58, 6; cf. “to the nomophylax, ” P.Oxy. 3190, 3); “If you arrest the slave, hand him over to Semphtheus, who will bring him to me” (P.Hib. 54, 21; 245 BC); “Send us under good guard the woman who gave you the contraband oil in her possession” (P.Hib. 59, 3); “Deliver Pamoun to the police officer whom I have sent.”⁵⁰ Likewise, the princes of the priests and the elders of the people led and delivered Jesus to Pilate (Matt 27:2; Mark 15:1; cf. John 18:30, 35); the scribes and the chief priests appoint men “to deliver him to the power and authority of the governor” (Luke 20:20; cf. 24:20, eis krima thanatou); Paul and certain other prisoners are remanded to the care of a centurion (Acts 27:1); “Pilate gave them the centurion Petronius and some soldiers to guard the tomb” (Gos. Pet. 31). The apostles will be handed over before courts (Matt 10:17, 19, eis synedria; cf. 24:9; Mark 13:9, 11; Luke 21:12), and every debtor is exhorted to be reconciled with his creditor before the latter delivers him to the judge (to krite) and the judge to the officer (to hyperete), lest he be thrown in prison.⁵¹

¹ Cf. ἀντι-, “give in exchange”; ε—ν-, “give over, abandon”; ἀνα-, ἀπο-, δια-, ει—ς-, ε—κ-, κατα-, μετα-, προ-, etc.

² Cf. B. G. Mandilaras, Verb, n. 92, 219, 308, 374, 385, 393, 394, 412, 540 (1), 681, 728, 741, 742.

³ Cf. Matt 25:14-15: παρέδωκε . . . ἔδωκεν. Both verbs are used indifferently by the manuscripts A and B (Judg 1:4; Dan 1:2; 2:38; 7:25; etc.); 1Sam 17:44—Goliath proposes to give David’s flesh to the birds of the sky and the beasts of the field; Hos 8:10; Esth 2:13—they gave Esther everything that she wanted to have with her; Philo, Creation 139; Unchang. God 92; Flight 45; Change of Names 113; Post. Cain 107; Spec. Laws 1.21; Josephus, War 1.46; 3.33; Ant. 7.280, 379; 8.32; P.Ant. 92, 9: “Give him the four solidi ”; P.Lond. 1916, 22: “We gave him what we were able to find.”

⁴ John 19:30—παρέδωκεν τὸ πνεῦμα (cf. Luke 23:46—ει—ς χειράς σου παρατίθεμαι τὸ πνεῦμά μου and the variant from the Syriac mentioned by L. Abramowski and A. E. Goodman, “Luke 23:46 ΠΑΡΑΤΙΕΜΑΙ in a Rare Syriac Rendering,” in NTS, vol. 13, 1967, pp. 290–291); T. Abr. B 12: Sara παρέδωκε τὴν ψυχὴν; Xenophon, An. 4.6.1: “Xenophon gave this man to Cheirisophus to serve him as guide.”

⁵ Deut 23:16; 1Sam 30:15; Prov 30:10; Bel (Theodotion) 29–30; Jdt 10:15; Esth 2:3—the young women who have been assembled are given over to the care of Hegai, the king’s eunuch; 1Macc 11:40—Trypho went to the Arab Imalkue “to urge him to hand over the child”; 2Macc 14:31, 33; Judg 11:21—“Yahweh delivered Sihon and all his people into the hands of Israel, who defeated them”; 11:30, 32; 12:3; Philo, Spec. Laws 3.120; especially troops (1Macc 3:34; Josephus, War 1.183, 249; Ant. 7.233; 12.298; 13.225).

⁶ Deut 1:8, 21 (Hebrew natan); Josh 2:24; Tob (Sinaiticus) 14:7—“the land of Abraham will be given to the sons of Israel.”

⁷ Deut 20:13; Jericho (Josh 6:2, 16); Ai (8:18); Jdt 8:9, 33; Jerusalem (Isa 36:15; 37:10; Jer 21:10; 32:28, 36; 34:2; etc.), Ephron (1Macc 5:50), Ptolemais (12:45); cf. 15:30; 16:18; Josephus, War 5.361, 392, 397, 499; Ant. 10.125; 13.180, 190, 202, 388; 14.58.

⁸ 1Macc 12:34; Josephus, War 1.167; 2.41, 486; 4.518; 7.209.

⁹ P.Achm. 8, 17: “Take care to put the cargo up for sale, and if no one offers more, to send them back”; the weavers make and deliver the ordered vestments (P.Phil. 10, 18; P.Cair.Isid. 54, 8–9; P.Oxy. 2230, 12); wine is delivered (P.Oxy. 3111, 14), or a boat in good condition (P.Warr. 5, 7). Lessees agree, “At the end of the term, we will give over four arourai as fallow forage land” (P.Phil. 14, 22); “I will give back the olive orchard fertilized and with the picking done” (P.Phil. 12, 29; 13, 19); “we have returned 45,700 pounds to the steward of Akanthon” (P.Cair.Isid. 13, 22). In a contract for service: ὁμολογῶ— παραδόσειν σοι τὸν υἱ—όν μου . . . ὥστε ὑπηρετεῖ—ν (BGU 1647, 3; cf. P.Oxy. 2353, 3; 2586, 45); in a marriage contract, Marcellina παραδεδοκέναι ε—αυτὴν ε—κ χηρείας πρὸς γάμου κοινοεῖαν (P.Dura 30, 10). In a metaphorical sense, “Destiny and the Fates delivered me to Hades” (epitaph at Telesion, in E. Bernard, Inscriptions métriques, n. 36, 3).

¹⁰ 1Macc 10:6, 9; Lysander gave back the city to its former citizens (Xenophon, Hell. 2.3.7); “I give you back these two men” (An. 6.6.34); Antiochus was compelled to return Samosata (Josephus, War 1.157, 322).

¹¹ P.Thead. 8, 25; cf. P.Alex. 12, 19 (first-second century); P.Hamb. 20, 14. “Order that each one shall receive back his private property” (P.Oxy. 3288, 6).

¹² Μετὰ τὸν χρόνον παραδώσω τὰς ἀρούρας καθαρὰς ὡς καὶ παρέλαβον, BGU 1018, 24; cf. 1564, 13; 1644, 24; 1645, 18; P.Mich. 184, 18 (121 BC); 185, 24 (122 BC); 310, 12 (AD 26–27); 315, 24 (AD 44–45); 558, 20; 563, 18; 587, 31; 633, 25; P.Mil.Vogl. 269, 26; 286, 34; P.Cair.Isid. 98, 15; 99, 23; 100, 17; 101, 11; P.Soterichos 2, 32 (AD 71); P.Amst. 41, 80 (first century BC); P.Vindob.Bosw. 8, 20; 9 b 6; P.Berl.Zill. 5; P.Fam.Tebt. 45, 11; 47, 25; P.Mert. 10, 20; 123, 4; P.Sorb. 51, 11 (third century BC): “You took from him the land that he has farmed for many years and gave it to others” (ε—τέροις παραδεδωκέναί). Buildings are also given back: παραδότω τὴν οἰ—κίαν (P.Köln 150, 13; cf. BGU 2034, 14; P.Erl. 72, 7; P.Mil. 55, 18; P.Mert. 76, 23; P.Stras. 348, 1), for example a bathing establishment (P.Mich. 312, 30).

¹³ Cf. Herodotus 5.67: the god not permitting (authorizing) what he had planned; 7.18: “act so that with God permitting, nothing may be lacking on your part”; Isocrates, Phil. 5.118: give occasion.

¹⁴ 1Pet 2:23—the innocent person appeals to God, trusting in the purity of his cause. This was not without danger, cf. Str-B (vol. 3, p. 164), who cite (vol. 1, p. 36) the case of Rabbi Eliezer, who is accused of heresy before a Roman judge and tells him, “I stand before the just judge,” meaning God; but the magistrate thought he meant himself and thanked the accused (t. Īul. 2.24). Philo, Virtues 171: the law sets the proud before the judgment seat of God alone.

¹⁵ This meaning “abandon” occurs already in Plato (Euthd. 285 c, ε—μαυτόν), seen clearly in John 19:30 (π. τὸ πνεῦμα); 1Cor 13:8 (τὸ σω—μα; cf. Josephus, War 7.355), is traditional (Philo, Husbandry 132; Migr. Abr. 18; Moses 1.3), notably in metaphorical usages: delivered to desolation (2Chr 30:7), to darkness (Spec. Laws 3.6), to oblivion (λήθη παραδοθῆναι, Spec. Laws 1.28; Josephus, Ant. 17.352); cf. “keep silence” (σιγῇ παραδίδοσαν, Ant. 17.122; 18.168; 19.48, 132), leave in forgetfulness (σιωπῇ π., P.Flor. 309, 5), entrust to memory (Philo, Worse Attacks Better 65); throw, deliver to fire (Philo, Spec. Laws 1.199, 254; 2.215; Philo, To Gaius 356; Josephus, War 2.358).

¹⁶ Diodorus Siculus 12.13.2; Demosthenes, C.Aristocr. 23.65: “Elsewhere there is no Areopagus—a tribunal concerning which many fine stories are transmitted . . . some certified by our own testimony.” History allows an understanding of the character and mores of the hero (πρὸς κατανόησιν ἥθους καὶ τρόπου παραδιδούς, Plutarch, Nic. 1.5). “Through these constructions, Herod transmitted his family and friends to immortality without forgetting his own memory” (Josephus, War 1.419). “Theudion, having received a poison from Antiphilos, passed it on to Pheroras” (1.592).

¹⁷ P.Mich. 213, 8; cf. the documents (τὰ βιβλία) transmitted by their first holder (P.Fam.Tebt. 15, 21, 31, 35, etc; 24, 32); τὰ τῆς τάξεως παραδω—σι βιβλία (PSI 1361, 5).

¹⁸ Cf. Diodorus Siculus 5.48.4: “Jupiter transmitted to him the rites of the mysteries that were celebrated in Samothrace in ancient times”; Strabo 10.3.7: “The authors of accounts of Cretan and Phrygian traditions (οἱ—παραδόντες) and of the sacred rites (τῶν—εργουργίαις) that they involve, which pertain to the celebration of the mysteries (ταῖς—μυστικαῖς)”; the aretology of Isis (I.Cumae, n. 41, 36); P.Lond. 46, 335 (vol. 1, p. 75); Pap.Graec.Mag. 4, 475: παραδοτὰ μυστήρια; Eusebius, Praep. Evang. 2.8.3: τοὺς παραδεδομένους . . . μύθους. On the mystery tradition, cf. A. J. Festugière, Idéal religieux, p. 121, n. 4; D. B. Reydens, “Paradosis,” in Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale, 1933, pp. 155–191; J. Dupont, Gnosis, Louvain, 1949, pp. 59–62.

¹⁹ Sacr. Abel and Cain 76; Plant. 127; cf. Decalogue 55: “the names of the stars have been passed down by the mythographers”; Change of Names 95: envy, jealousy, disputes, and rivalries are “passed down” from parents to children.

²⁰ Flight 168–169, 200; Sacr. Abel and Cain 64, 78: “The ancient tradition of noble deeds that the historians and the whole tribe of poets have transmitted to the memory of contemporaries and of the generations that followed”; Moses 1.23; Creation 78: “men have passed on the art that is most necessary and most useful for life”; ibid., 159; Drunkennes 198; Spec. Laws 4.231.

²¹ Ant. 1.12, 29, 73; 7.269, 454; 9.208; 15.425; 19.298; Ag. Apion 1.15; cf. War 6.105: “fame, passing from age to age and always fresh, transmits his immortal memory to posterity.” Science and astronomy are transmitted (1.167; Ag. Apion 1.181), but also traditional superstitions concerning the deity (Ag. Apion 1.211). The Pharisees pass on to the people commandments that are not in the law of Moses (Ant. 13.297; 18.12).

²² Ant. 3.280; 4.57, 302, 304; Ag. Apion 1.60: “Observing laws and pious practices that have been transmitted to us conformably to these laws, the most necessary work in life”; 2.279: we call time to witness for the virtue of our legislator and the revelation that he transmitted to us from God—time, which puts every undertaking to the test.

²³ Matt 11:27; Luke 10:22 (H. Mertens, L'Hymne de jubilation chez les Synoptiques, Gembloux, 1957, pp. 51ff.; Recueil L. Cerfaux, vol. 3, pp. 139–169). Jesus reproaches the Pharisees for annulling the word of God in favor of tradition (their school's teaching), “the tradition that you have handed down” (τῆ παραδόσει ὑμῶ—ν ἡ— παρεδώκατε, Mark 7:13).

²⁴ The αὐτόπται and the ὑπηρέται, bearers of the tradition, heard the words with their ears and saw the acts of Jesus with their eyes (E. Delebecque, Evangile de Luc, on this text), and they transmitted them orally to a new generation of disciples (ἡμι—ν).

²⁵ Rom 6:17. Τύπος means a body of teaching and moral rules conformable to Christ's teaching, a correct presentation of his doctrine. Cf. A. Fridrichsen, “Exegetisches zum Neuen Testament,” in ConNT, vol. 7, 1942, pp. 6–8 (has in mind a Jewish technical term); J. Kürzinger, “Τύπος διδαχῆς und der Sinn von Rom. VI, 17,” in Bib, 1958, pp. 156–176; F. W. Beare, “On the Interpretation of Romans VI, 17,” in NTS, vol. 5, 1959, pp. 206–210; C. H. Dodd, “The Primitive Catechism and the Sayings of Jesus,” in Studies in Memory of T. W. Manson, Manchester, 1959, pp. 106–118; U. Borse, “‘Abbild der Lehre’ (Rom. VI, 17),” in BZ, 1968, pp. 95–103; C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, p. 584, n. 1).

²⁶ 1Cor 11:23. The apostle received it from the only authorized source, not by direct transmission (παρά), but through the channel of (apostolic) tradition, with its source or origin (ἀπό) in Jesus. He only delivered it, communicated it, entrusted it to the believers. O. G. Evenson, “The Force of ‘Apo’ in 1 Cor. XI, 23,” in Lutheran Quarterly, 1959, pp. 244–246; G. Bornkamm, Studien zu Antike und Urchristentum, Munich, 1959, vol. 2, pp. 116ff. J. Jeremias, Eucharistic Words, pp. 129–131.

²⁷ 1Cor 15:3. Cf. J. Schmitt, “Le ‘Milieu’ littéraire de la ‘tradition’ citée dans I Cor. XV, 3b–5,” in E. Dhanis, Resurrexit, Vatican City, 1974, pp. 169–184.

²⁸ Jude 3: “I had to write you to exhort you to struggle for the faith delivered once for all to the saints” (τῆ ἅπαξ παραδοθείση τοι—ς ἁγίοις πίστει); 2Pet 2:21—“It would have been better for them not to know (ε—πεγνωκέναι) the way of righteousness than having known it (ε—πιγνωόντων) to turn away from the holy commandment that was entrusted to them (ε—κ τῆς παραδοθείσης αὐτοί—ς ἀγίας ε—ντολῆς).” The baptismal entole is faith in Christ and brotherly love, and also instruction in wisdom (Prov 2:1; Eccl 8:5), God's educative pedagogy (Prov 6:23; 19:6), the expression of his will becoming a moral rule (Ps 19:8; 119:98; Rom 7:12), the doctrine of the Revealer (John 16:48-49), and his sovereign authority (1Tim 6:14), to which one submits by faith (2John 6).

²⁹ Matt 28:18 (cf. Dan 7:14—kai edothe auto exousia). In Corp. Herm. 1.32: “You are blessed, Father. The one who is your man wants to lend you aid in the work of sanctification, just as you transmitted all your power to him” (καθὼς παρέδωκας αὐτῷ τὴν πα—σαν ε—ξουσίαν). In Luke 4:6, Satan claims that “all power has been given to me” (ε—μοὶ παραδέδοται).

³⁰ Gen 14:20 (hiphil of Hebrew nagar); Exod 23:31; Lev 26:25; Num 21:2, 34; Deut 1:27; 2:24, 30, 31, 33, 36; 3:2-3; 7:24; 21:10; 23:15; Josh 10:8; Judg 1:4; 4:14, Deborah to Barak: “Arise, for this is the day when the Yahweh has delivered Sisera into your hands”; 8:3; 1Sam 23:4; 24:5; 2Kgs 3:18; Ps 27:12; 51:2; 68:10 (they will be delivered into the hands of the sword); 74:19; 78:48; 119:121; Isa 19:4; 34:2; Dan 11:11. To be “delivered” is to be in someone else’s power. Holofernes orders his servants to “hand over Achior to the sons of Israel” (Jdt 6:10); “Glorious men were delivered into the hands of others” (Sir 11:6).

³¹ Deut 19:12—“The elders of the city shall deliver the murderer into the hands of the blood-avenger”; 1Macc 15:21—the Roman consul Lucius decided that “pestilent people” will be “handed over to the high priest Simon, so that he may execute justice on them in the king’s name.”

³² 1Sam 11:12—“Deliver these men so that they may be put to death”; 2Chr 32:11—“deliver to death (εἰ—ς θάνατον) by hunger and thirst”; Jer 26:24; 38:16; Mic 6:14; Ps 118:18—“God has not delivered me to death (θανάτῳ)”; 2Macc 1:17—“May our God be blessed in all things, he who delivered the ungodly to death”; Philo, Flight 53: “If one man kills another because God put him in his power”; 65, 93; Josephus, War 6.360: a Roman horseman is “delivered to Ardalas to be put to death”; Ant. 6.215, Saul’s intention is to have David judged and put to death” (παραδοὺς ἀποκτείνῃ); 8.390; 20.200—the Sanhedrin accuses James, the brother of Jesus, who is called Christ, of having broken the law and condemns him to stoning; Ag. Apion 2.206: “The law delivers the guilty for stoning”; Life 425: “Vespasian condemned Jonathan to death and handed him over to be killed” (παραδοθεὶς ἀπέθανεν); Philo, Flacc. 96 (βασανισται—ς); Josephus, War 1.655; cf. delivering over to insults (2.246), deliver in chains (1.269; Ant. 5.313: δεδεμένον ἄγειν παρέδοσαν); Philo, Change of Names 173: δεσμωτηρίῳ παραδοῦναι; T. Abr. A 20 (delivered to the grave); Jos. Asen. 4.12 (into slavery).

³³ Judg 6:1; 2:14—“Yahweh’s anger was inflamed against Israel, and he delivered them into the hands of marauders who pillaged them”; 13:1; 1Sam 28:19; 1Kgs 8:46; 14:16; 2Kgs 21:14; 2Chr 6:36; 24:24; 28:5, 9; Isa 65:12; Jer 22:25; Bar 4:6; Ezek 7:21; 11:9; 16:27, 39, etc.; Dan 1:2; Zech

11:6; Sir 23:6—“Do not deliver me to a shameless soul”; Job 16:11—“God delivers me to unrighteous people”; Ps 106:41; Josephus, War 4.370.

³⁴ Acts 7:42—παρέδωκεν αὐτοὺς λατρεύειν τῇ στρατιᾷ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ (cf. Ezek 20:7, 8, 13; Amos 5:25-27); punishment for worshiping the golden calf.

³⁵ Rom 1:24 (εἰς ἀκαθαρσίαν), 26 (εἰς πάθη ἀτιμίας), 28 (εἰς ἀδόκιμον νοῦν); Eph 4:19 (ἀσελγεία). Moral disorder is a consequence of and punishment for religious error.

³⁶ 2Pet 2:4. The dungeons of Tartarus, a prison, the deepest pit for pure spirits (Philo, Rewards 152); cf. C. Spicq, Epîtres de saint Pierre, on this text.

³⁷ 1Cor 5:5. These “temporal” torments have as their end to provoke conversion and assure the salvation of the soul (J. Cambier, “La Chair et l’esprit en 1 Cor. V, 5,” in NTS 15, 1969, pp. 221ff.). J. D. M. Derrett, “Handing over to Satan”: An Explanation of I Cor. V, 1–7,” in RIDA, 1979, pp. 11–30). Cf. C. Bruston, “L’Abandon du pécheur à Satan,” in RTQR, 1912, pp. 450–458.

³⁸ 1Tim 1:20; cf. C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, on this text. T. C. G. Thornton, “Satan—God’s Agent for Punishing,” in ExpT 83, 1972, pp. 151ff.; J. Dauvillier, Les Temps apostoliques, Paris, 1970, pp. 585ff.

³⁹ Matt 18:34—παρέδωκεν αὐτὸν τοῖς βασιανισταῖς; cf. Philo, Spec. Laws 2.93–94; T. Abr. B 10; SEG VIII, 246, 8; BGU 1847, 26; P.Ant. 87, 13–14; C. Spicq, Dieu et l’homme, pp. 54ff.; J. D. M. Derrett, Law in the NT, pp. 32–47; R. Haase, “Körperliche Strafen in den altorientalischen Rechtssammlungen,” in RIDA, 1963, pp. 55–75.

⁴⁰ W. Popkes, Christus Traditus: Eine Untersuchung zum Begriff der Dahingabe im Neuen Testament, Zurich-Stuttgart, 1967; N. Perrin, “The Use of (παρρα)διδόναι in Connection with the Passion of Jesus in the New Testament,” in Der Ruf Jesu und die Antwort der Gemeinde (Festschrift J. Jeremias), Göttingen, 1970, pp. 204–212.

⁴¹ Matt 17:22 (Mark 9:31; Luke 9:44); Matt 20:18-19: “They will hand him over to the Gentiles to mock him” (Mark 10:33; Luke 18:32); Matt 26:2—“The Son of Man must be handed over to be crucified”; 26:45—“will be delivered into the hands of sinners” (Mark 14:41; Luke 24:7).

⁴² Matt 27:26—“Pilate had Jesus whipped and handed him over to be crucified” (παρέδωκεν ἵνα σταυρωθῆ, Mark 15:15; John 19:16); Luke 23:25—“he handed Jesus over to their will.”

⁴³ 1Cor 11:23. The historical fact of the institution of the Eucharist is chronologically determined; this is a mention of the arrest of Jesus and “probably also of his betrayal” by Judas (A. Jaubert, La Date de la Cène, Paris, 1957, pp. 93ff.); but “it does not say ‘the eve of his death’” (Jaubert, “Le Mercredi où Jésus fut livré,” in NTS, vol. 14, 1968, pp. 145–164; G. Schille, “Das Leiden des Herrn,” in ZTK, 1955, p. 181). Cf. Gos. Pet. 5: Herod “delivered [Jesus] to the people on the eve of Unleavened Bread, their feast.”

⁴⁴ Cf. Matt 4:12, John the Baptist had been handed over to Herod Antipas; Mark 1:14; Acts 8:3—Saul dragged off men and women and had them thrown in prison (ει—ς φυλακήν); 12:4 (the incarceration of Peter); 21:11 (Paul will be handed over to Gentiles); 28:17.

⁴⁵ In the list of the apostles, Matt 10:4—“Judas Iscariot, the same one who betrayed him” (ὁ καὶ παραδοὺς αὐτόν) (Mark 3:19); Matt 26:15—“What will you give me, and I will betray him” (παραδώσω αὐτόν, 26:16, 21, 23, 24, 25, 46, 48); 27:3-4: “I sinned in handing over innocent blood”; Mark 14:10, 11, 18, 21, 42, 44; Luke 22:4, 6, 21, 22, 48; John 6:64, 71; 12:4; 13:2, 11, 21; 18:2, 5, 36; 19:11; 21:20.

⁴⁶ Josephus, War 4.523: “Jacob told Simon that he would betray his country to him, on the basis of the promise that he would always continue to enjoy honors”; 6.387–391: a priest hands over objects from the sacred treasury in order to save his life; Ant. 5.131; 6.345. In his edict, Tiberius Julius Alexander denounces certain functionaries who, “on the pretext of state interests, having others’ credits ceded to themselves, have had certain persons incarcerated in the praktoreion (a prison reserved for debtors to the treasury) and in other prisons” (Dittenberger, Or. 669, 15). In the time of the persecutions, people become public accusers or witnesses against members of their own families in order to save their lives: “Brother will hand over brother to death, and a father his children . . .” (Matt 10:21; 24:10; Mark 13:12; Luke 21:16).

⁴⁷ Cf. Matt 27:18—“Pilate knew that they were handing him over because of jealousy”; Mark 15:10; Acts 3:13 (Peter to the Jerusalemites): “Jesus, whom you handed over and whom you denied before Pilate,” the accursed occupier.

⁴⁸ Dan 3:28; Josephus, Ant. 2.137: Joseph’s brothers offer themselves to be punished in order to save Benjamin; 148, 159; 10.230: Jechonias “voluntarily gave himself up (παραδόντι . . . ε—κουσίως αὐτόν) with his wives and his children in order to save his native city (ὑπὲρ τῆς πατρίδος);” cf. 9.75; War 6.433. Objects are given over or consecrated εἰ—ς λειτουργίαν οἴκου θεοῦ (2Esdr 7:19); the Levites set apart the whole burnt offerings “to give them to the children of the people” (2Chr 35:12), and Yahweh “gives over as victims” the cities and peoples of Palestine.

⁴⁹ Acts 15:26—Barnabas and Paul, “men who have given over their lives for the Name of our Lord Jesus Christ,” do not hesitate to risk death in proclaiming the saving divinity of Jesus; 2Cor 4:11—“We who continue to live are delivered to death (εἰ—ς θάνατον παραδιδομένα) because of Jesus” (διὰ indicates the reason); Eph 5:25—“Husbands, love your wives, as Christ loved the church and gave himself for it.” Love made manifest and effective—which is what agape is—is translated in Christ by a total and definitive act of giving that involves forgetfulness of self and limitless devotion to his church (cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 1, pp. 285–294); thus by virtue of his marriage the husband no longer belongs to himself but is at his wife’s service, devoted to her happiness; “no one lives for himself” (Rom 14:7-8); it is like a religious consecration, according to the model of Christ, who was entirely given over to those who are his.

⁵⁰ P.Cair.Isid. 129, 2; P.Berl.Zill. 8, 23: place in the hands of the police. There is also εἰ—ς φυλακὴν παραδιδοῦσαν (SEG 9.5.67); παράδος τοι—ς φυλακίταις (BGU 1912, 3; P.Lille 3, 59; UPZ 124, 19); παραδώσων ε—ν δημοσίῳ τόπῳ (P.Mert. 98, 13; P.Oxy. 2478, 24; 3204, 20; P.Brem. 26, 4; 41, 29).

⁵¹ Matt 5:25; cf. Luke 12:58. J. Vergote, “Le Nouveau Testament et la papyrologie juridique,” in Eos (Symbolae R. Taubenschlag), 1957, vol. 2, pp. 152ff.

παραθήκη

paratheke, deposit

paratheke, S 3866; TDNT 8.162–164; EDNT 3.22; MM 483–484; L&N 35.48; BAGD 616; ND 2.85

In the Pastorals, St. Paul three times uses the expression paratheken phylassein,¹ in a metaphorical sense, in accord with contemporary usage, because not only was money entrusted to the care of a third party,² but so could be a person (P.Oxy. 2600, 7; cf. 1Pet 4:19; Jos. Asen. 13.11–12) or a harvest of grain (P.Oxy. 3049) or of words, i.e., secrets.³ According to Philo, the divine gifts entrusted to humans are like deposits that must be guarded carefully,⁴ especially in carrying out a public (Spec. Laws 4.71) and sacred function: “Not everyone gets to guard the deposit of the divine mysteries” (Sacr. Abel and Cain 60, parakatatheken phylaxai). In this sense the Jews received the oracles of God as a deposit (Rom 3:2).

Ulpian would later define this term contract, the establishment of which required no formality other than the freely expressed consent of the one accepting the deposit: “that which is placed in someone else’s custody” (“quod custodiendum alicui datum”);⁵ the object is deposited for its protection. It remains the property of the depositor;⁶ it does not belong to the depositary, and the depositary cannot dispose of it. Not only must he guard it “like something sacred and divine” (Josephus, Ant. 4.285), but he must immediately return it intact when asked, without delay or discussion.⁷ This is the meaning of the constant repeated appearance in the contracts of the phrase “according to the law of deposits.”⁸ In addition, Ps.-Plato gave this definition: parakatatheke: doma meta pisteos (Def. 415 d). Whether a literal or a metaphorical deposit is intended, the emphasis is always on the good faith and fidelity of the depositary: “The setting up of a deposit is the most sacred thing done in social life, because it depends on the good faith of the depositary.”⁹ Thus the protection of the gods is invoked,¹⁰ and it was common to deposit valuables in the temples, which became savings banks;¹¹ such was the case with, among others, the temple at Jerusalem¹² and the Artemision of Ephesus.¹³ People often left agreements, documents,¹⁴ and especially wills¹⁵ in these places of safety. The word paratheke, not found in other Pauline letters, fits quite well in 1 and 2 Timothy, which are precisely Paul’s last will and testament, instructing his favorite disciple to preserve intact and inviolable the wealth of teaching that he has passed on to him throughout his life.

Sometimes this paratheke has been taken to mean the pastoral office entrusted to the Ephesian pastor; but in the context of these two epistles, it is much more likely that it refers to the preservation of the “wholesome teaching” (hygies didaskalia)¹⁶ which must be kept from the degradations or corruptions of heterodoxy. The disciple can draw on supernatural resources for preserving the gospel¹⁷ and the tradition and sheltering them from adulteration, namely, the Holy Spirit who indwells us (2Tim 1:14) and is supposed to act with particular efficacy in the organs of the ecclesiastical hierarchy.

¹ 1Tim 6:20; 2Tim 1:14 (where the deposit is modified by καλός, i.e., precious or magnificent, because it is God’s deposit; cf. similarly Philo, Worse Attacks Better 65); at 1:12 it is not entirely clear whether the “depositor” is God or Paul (cf. C. Spicq, Épîtres Pastorales, vol. 2, pp.

719ff.). Classical Greek has παρακαταθήκη (cf. Phrynichus, ed. Lobeck, p. 313). The verb παραθεκάζω means “pay a παραθήκη” (G. E. Bean, T. B. Mitford, Cilicia, n. 202, 10). The technical term θέμα was used for the deposit of grain in the public granary (P.Oxy. 501, 517, 518, 1444; P.Mert. 14; P.Stras. 127; P.Lips. 112–117): ε—ν θέματι δημοσίῳ (BGU 2126, 12–14); cf. N. Hohlwein, Termes techniques, pp. 267ff. M. Lewis, “Notationes legentis,” in BASP, vol. 13, 1976, pp. 167ff.

² SB 9291; 10722, 6; BGU 2042; P.Fam.Tebt. 2; P.Tebt. 556 (from AD 33, ed. J. G. Keenan, “Two Papyri from the University of California Collection,” in Proceedings XIII, pp. 207ff.). Δεπόσιτα were cash deposits made by soldiers who received a bonus, cf. Ign. Pol. 6.2. The papyrological attestations are considerable; cf. “St. Paul et la loi des dépôts,” in RB, 1931, pp. 481–502. For example, cf. P.Lond. 298 (vol. 2, p. 206): “The eighth year of Caesar Trajan Hadrian Augustus, the fifth of the month of Gorpiaeus, at Ptolemaïs Euergetis, in the nome of Arsinoïte. Primus Samba, son of Primus, of Persian descent, about fifty-five years old, having a scar on the front of his left leg, declares to Heraclides, son of Treadelphos son of Anoubion, of the deme of Ailanabatis, which is also Althaea, about twenty-five years old, having a scar on his right wrist, that he holds from this latter—he, Primus, the author of the contract—through the bank of Dionysius, which is also Chaeremon, on the street of the Sacred Gate, two thousand silver drachmas, as a surety deposit against all risk and exempt from any charge. As for the two thousand drachmas of the deposit, Primus acknowledges that he must return them to Heraclides whenever Heraclides chooses, without recourse to legal action or judgment or any other delay of any sort or any subterfuges. If he does not turn it over in accord with what is written, he must pay Heraclides double the deposit, in accord with the law of deposits.” Cf. R. Taubenschlag, Law of Greco-Roman Egypt, vol. 1, pp. 264ff. E. Kiessling, “Über den Rechtsbegriff der Parathèkè,” in Proceedings VIII, pp. 71–77; P. Frezza, “ΠΑΡΑΚΑΤΑΘΗΚΗ,” in Eos (Symbolae R. Taubenschlag), 1956, vol. 1, pp. 139–172; A. Ehrhardt, “Parakatatheke,” in Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung, 1958, pp. 32–90; 1959, pp. 480–489; K. Kastner, Die zivilrechtliche Verwahrung des gr.-ägypt. Obligationenrechts, Erlangen, 1962; K. Wegenast, Das Verständnis der Tradition bei Paulus, Neukirchen, 1962, pp. 144ff. H. A. Rupprecht, Studien zur Quittung im Recht der graeco-ägyptischen Papyri, Munich, pp. 51ff. W. Hellebrand, “Parakatheke,” in PW, vol. 18, 2, col. 1186–1202. On the irregular deposit (authorization to use money, collection of interest, etc.), cf. W. Litewski, “Le Dépôt irrégulier,” in RIDA, 1974, pp. 215–262; 1975, pp. 279–315.

³ Philo, Prov. 2.16; Worse Attacks Better 65: “Watching (or guarding) is something that is complete, which consists in committing to memory principles of holy things learned by practice. That is what it means to entrust a noble deposit of learning to a faithful guardian.” Herodotus 9.45.1; Anaxandrides, in Stobaeus (Flor. 41.2; vol. 3, p. 757). Secrets are “word deposits” (Ps.-Isocrates, Demon. 22); Ps.-Plutarch, Cons. ad Apoll. 28: life is a deposit that must be returned when the gods ask for it. Cf. Isocrates 1.22. In the Hermetic literature, the sacred Book or “Monad” or “Eighth Book of Moses,” on the holy Name, holds as a deposit the name of the Lord (Pap.Graec.Mag. 13, 742 = vol. 2, p. 121); cf. A. J. Festugière, Hermès Trismégiste, vol. 1, pp. 344–345.

⁴ Heir 104: “Consider that which has been given you to be a loan or a deposit and return it to the one who entrusted and loaned it to you”; 105–106: “Let the one who made the deposit have no reason for criticizing the manner in which you kept it. For the creator of life has entrusted you with the deposit of a soul, of speech, of sensation. . . . Some people immediately divert these deposits to their own profit through selfishness; others on the contrary hold them back in order to make restitution at the most appropriate time.”

⁵ Dig. 16.3.1 proem.; Diodorus Siculus 17.23.5. Aristotle placed it among the συναλλάγματα ε—κουσία (Eth. Nic. 5.1131a4). Someone leaves a deposit with someone else (I.Thas. 376, 3–4), a receipt is given: ὁμολογῶ—ἔχειν παρὰ σοῦ ε—ν παραθήκη κ.τ.λ. (P.Mich. IX, 571, 7 = SB 9247); P.Brem. 51, 9; P.Hib. 198, 196; P.Mert. 67, 14; BGU 1653, 12; P.IFAO III, n. 1 (AD 100); restored, P.Oxy. 2975.

⁶ The law from Ephesus from 85 BC lists types of debt: maritime loans, unsecured loans, deposits in the form of pledged real estate (παραθήκαι), mortgages, second mortgages, etc. (Dittenberger, Syl. 742, 50ff., with the commentary of R. Bogaert, Banques et banquiers, p. 251; H. Kühnert, Zum Kreditgeschäft in den hellenistischen Papyri Ägyptens, Freiburg, 1965; P. Drewes, “Die Bankdiagraphie in den gräko-ägyptischen Papyri,” in JJP, 1974, pp. 107, 136ff.).

⁷ Almost all the contracts mention the integrity, ἄνευ πάσης ὑπερθέσεως καὶ εὐρησιλογίας; P.Alex. 10, 10 (AD 69–79); P.Mert. 67, 17; Pap.Lugd.Bat. I, 6, 15–19; P.Tebt. 386, 22 (12 BC); 556, 13–16; P.Oxy. 71, 6 (ἀκίνδυνον καὶ ἀνυπόλογον); 1713, 10; 3049, 14; BGU 637, 702, 729, 856; SB 11040, etc. Cf. the precision and the fullness of the attestation, and the restoration of a deposit in the second century, P.Oxy. 2975; cf. N. Lewis, “Notationes legentis,” in BASP, vol. 11, 1974, pp. 59–59.

⁸ Κατὰ τὸν νόμον τῶ—ν παραθηκῶ—ν; P.Lond. 943, 9; P.Ryl. 662, 15; P.Oxy. 1039, 12; 2677, 6; 3134, 9; P.Athen. 28, 24 (October 16, 86);

P.Tebt. 556, 17; Stud.Pal. XX, 45, 9; cf. 2Macc 3:15. J. Modrzejewski, “La Règle de droit dans l’Égypte ptolémaïque,” in Essays in Honor of C. Bradford Welles (American Studies in Papyrology, vol. 1), New Haven, 1966, p. 156; W. D. Roth, Untersuchungen zur Kredit-ΠΑΡΑΗΚΗ im römischen Ägypten, Marburg, 1970; H. C. Youtie, “P. Michig. inv. 829: ΠΑΡΑΗΚΗ,” in ZPE, vol. 24, 1977, pp. 125–127; P.Mich. 671 (gives the bibliography, p. 111).

⁹ Philo, Spec. Laws 4.30; cf. 4.32: “The person who contests the existence of a deposit (that has been entrusted to him) should know that he is committing a major crime in cheating the depositor, in disguising the villainy of his own character with specious words, in camouflaging his disloyalty with a mask of false loyalty, and finally in destroying the agreement that he sealed with his own hand, and along with it the usefulness of oaths; so that he ridicules human and divine law and renegs on two deposits: that of the friend who entrusted his wealth to him, and that of the eminently truthful Witness who sees the actions and hears the words of all”; Unchang. God 101, cf. Plant. 101; Cherub. 14. Hence the scandal of a depositary who takes advantage of the ignorance of a depositor (illiterate and not having understood the text of the contract) and refuses to pay back the deposit, as Aurelius Sotas did to Aurelius Demetrius, who in turn lodged a complaint with the prefect (P.Oxy. 71, 10–11). The association of παραθήκη with πίστις is constant; cf. Epictetus 4.13.13: “You trusted a faithful man”; Dio Chrysostom 31.65. St. Ambrose, the lawyer, comments on 2Tim 1:14—“Fides pignori prima debetur” (on Luke 1:12); the historian Conon, in the first century (in F.Gr.H., vol. 1, p. 204).

¹⁰ Philo, Spec. Laws 4.34. Theogenes invokes Thea and Helios against a woman who stole his savings, which were deposited with her (I.Delos 2531); cf. I.Lind. 419, 2: περί τὰς παρακαταθήκας τα—ς —Αθάνας (AD 22); Lucian, Symp. 22.

¹¹ P.Ross.Georg. II, 18, 65 and 94; I.Lind. II B 43; Dittenberger, Syl. 1005, 1015, 1039; cf. ἀμετάθετα δηνάρια (I.Did. 331, 7); LSAM, p. 38; LSAMSup, n. 90, 2; idem, LSCG, p. 271; cf. T. R. S. Broughton, “New Evidence on Temple-Estates in Asia Minor,” in P. R. Coleman-Norton, Studies . . . in Honor of A. C. Johnson, Princeton, 1951, pp. 236–250; H. Vidal, “Le Dépôt ‘in Aede,’” in RHDFE, 1955, pp. 545–587; C. Préaux, “De la Grèce classique à l’Égypte hellénistique,” in ChrEg, 1958, pp. 243–255; N. G. Hamilton, “Temple Clearing and Temple Bank,” in JBL, 1964, pp. 365–370; R. Bogaert, Les Origines antiques de la banque de dépôt, Leiden, 1966, N. 97, 130, passim.

¹² 2Macc 3:10–15; 4Macc 4:3–7; cf. M. Delcor, “Le Trésor de la maison de Yahweh,” in VT, 1962, pp. 353–377.

¹³ Cf. C. Picard, Ephèse et Claros, Paris, 1922, pp. 82–90; R. Bogaert, Banques et banquiers, pp. 245ff., 263, 331ff.

¹⁴ With respect to the libraries of the Ptolemies, Zosimus writes: “Some of these writings were deposited in each temple, particularly in the Sarapieion” (cited by A. J. Festugière, Hermès Trismégiste, vol. 1, p. 268, 10).

¹⁵ Caesar (Suetonius, Iul. 83), Augustus (idem, Suetonius, Aug. 101; Dio Cassius 56.32), and probably Tiberius and Claudius (Dio Cassius 59.1; 61.1) left their wills at the temple of Vesta. Cf. Ulpian, Dig. 43.5.3; 28.4.4; F. Dumont, “Le Testament d’Antoine,” in Mélanges Lévy-Bruhl, Paris, 1959, pp. 87ff. RIJG, vol. 1, p. 113, vol. 2, pp. 69ff.

¹⁶ 1Tim 1:10; 6:3; Titus 1:9, 13; 2:1, 2, 8; 2Tim 1:13; 4:3. Cf. S. Cipriani, “La dottrina del depositum,” in AnBib 17–18; Rome 1963, vol. 2, pp. 128–140; P. Médebielle, “Dépôt de la foi,” in DBSup, vol. 2, 374–395.

¹⁷ Cf. 1Tim 1:11—“The gospel of the glory of the blessed God that has been entrusted to me”; cf. 2Tim 2:8; 3:10; Col 1:25ff.

παρακοή

parakoe, disobedience

see also εἰ—σακούω, ε—πακούω, ὑπακούω, ὑπακοή

parakoe, S 3876; TDNT 1.223; EDNT 3.29; NIDNTT 2.172, 175; MM 485; L&N 36.27; BAGD 618

Unlike the verb parakouo, which occurs rather commonly, the substantive parakoe is rare. It is unknown in the LXX and in the papyri earlier than the eighth century.¹ The word would hardly be worth discussing except for its theological importance in Rom 5:19. After characterizing Adam’s sin (he hamartia, verse 12) as a transgression (he parabasis, verse 14) and a false step (paraptoma, verses 15–18; cf. Wis 10:1), St. Paul defines it as disobedience (parakoe), the original human transgression, punishable by death:² “Just as through the disobedience of one man (dia tes parakoes) all became sinners, so also through the obedience of one (dia tes hypakoes) will all be justified.”³ This disobedience of Adam, the antithesis of Christ’s obedience,⁴ has as its effect the constituting of humankind as a race of sinners. “The notion of original sin is affirmed again, because kathistemi, ‘institute, constitute, establish,’ indicates more than a juridical assessment.”⁵

While sin or transgression can mean the violation of a law, the failure to observe a commandment, parakoe expresses above all a refusal to listen, turning a deaf ear.⁶ This etymological nuance is retained in Heb 2:2, where because the logos pronounced by the angels was valid (bebaios), i.e., authoritative and obligatory, all corruption, whether commission (parabasis, Rom 2:23; Gal 2:15) or omission (parakoe, the willful and culpable refusal to take the divine word into consideration) was sanctioned by a just penalty.⁷

In 2Cor 10:6, as in Rom 5:19, he parakoe is contrasted with he hypakoe; the apostle will punish all disobedience—those who do not submit to his oral teachings and precepts—once the obedience or submission of the community is complete, i.e., firm and unanimous.⁸

¹ P.Lond. IV, 1345, 36; 1393, 52, cited by Moulton-Milligan, remain the only known occurrences; cf. the new and much improved edition of the latter papyrus in SB 7241; παρακοή is associated with καταφρόνησις, “scorn.”

² Cf. A. M. Dubarle, “Le Péché originel dans saint Paul,” in RSPT, 1956, pp. 213–254; S. Lyonnet, “Le Péché originel et l’exégèse de Rom. V, 12–14,” in RSR, 1956, pp. 63–84.

³ Rom 5:19. οι— πολλοί = πάντες; the multitude means the crowd, the group as a whole; like the “many” at Qumran; cf. CD 14.6; 15.8; R. Marcus, “Mebaqqer and Rabbin in the Manual of Discipline VI, 11–13” in JBL, 1956, pp. 298–302; H. Huppenbauer, “byr, br, Mybr in der Sektenregel (1QS),” in TZ, 1957, pp. 136–137; J. Jeremias, “πολλοί,” in TDNT, vol. 6, pp. 536–545.

⁴ Ὑπακοή, as at Heb 5:8, is acquiescence (cf. the obedience of the faith, Rom 1:5; to the truth, 1Pet 1:22). In submitting to divine revelation (1Pet 1:2, 14), the Gentiles become children of obedience; whereas they were formerly ε—ν τῇ ἀγνοίᾳ.

⁵ M. J. Lagrange, Romains, pp. 111ff.; Cf. F. J. Leenhardt, Romans, p. 147–148.

⁶ Cf. Jer 11:10; 35:17; Acts 7:57 (συνέσχον τὰ ὦτα); Matt 18:17 (παρακούω); C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, p. 592ff.

⁷ Ἐνδικον μισθαποδοσίαν. This compound, unknown in biblical and secular Greek, emphasizes the direct correlation (confirmed by ἔνδικος) between the sin and the punishment; the retribution is deserved and required (Heb 3:17; 8:9; 10:28; Gal 6:7-8).

⁸ J. Héring (La Second Epître de saint Paul aux Corinthiens, Neuchâtel-Paris, 1958, p. 79) gives the aorist πληρωθῆ an inchoative sense, taking it to mean “when the time has come to make your submission effective and complete, then there will be ekdikesis, if there is occasion.”

παραμυθέομαι, παραμυθία, παραμύθιον

paramytheomai, to advise, encourage, console, comfort; paramythia, comfort, encouragement, support; paramythion, comfort, encouragement

paramytheomai, S 3888; TDNT 5.816–823; EDNT 3.32; NIDNTT 1.328–329; MM 488; L&N 25.153; BAGD 620 | paramythia, S 3889; TDNT 5.816–823; EDNT 3.32; NIDNTT 1.328–329; MM 488; L&N 25.154; BAGD 620 | paramythion, S 3890; TDNT 5.816–823; EDNT 3.32; NIDNTT 1.328–329; MM 488; L&N 25.154; BDF §111(4); BAGD 620–621; ND 3.79; 4.14, 166

A compound of the rare denominative verb mytheomai, “speak, retell, converse,”¹ and the prefix para,² the verb paramytheomai belongs especially to cultivated Greek.³ In the Hellenistic period it almost always has affective connotations, with the highly nuanced meanings of “advise, encourage, console, comfort, speak calming words to, appease, soothe.”

I. — A number of these occurrences have no particularized meaning,⁴ but most are found in a context of trials, difficulties, or sorrow.⁵ One goes to the troubled person eis paramythion (SB 10652 B 10; beginning of second century; I.Lind. 441, 9: eis paramythian tou patros), to console or to comfort.⁶ Calm and gentle speech can reassure the heart (P.Ryl. 653, 6), dissipate fear (Plutarch, Alc. 13.6; Sert. 16.2: epeiratoparamytheisthai dia logon — “he tried to console with words”), comfort the afflicted (Lucian, Peregr. 13). Thus many Jews from Jerusalem “had come to Martha and Mary to console them concerning their brother” (hina paramythesontai autas peri tou adelphou, John 11:19, 31). We know that consolation, which was practiced among the rabbis as among the Greeks and Romans, was considered a “work of love”;⁷ but the Johannine use of paramytheomai for consolation is in accord with contemporary usage, since this verb and the nouns derived from it apply especially to consolation and comfort concerning a death.⁸ It is likely that these visitors from Jerusalem gave the sisters at Bethany reasons to hope (cf. John 11:22-27); in any case, hope and consolation go together in a large number of texts.⁹ Finally, we should note that the term psephismata paramythenica

(“decrees of consolation”) is used for decrees that are intended both to honor a deceased person and to console the grieving family.¹⁰

II. — The meaning “comfort, encourage” is even more widespread than the previous meaning;¹¹ it is a properly divine activity¹² and in the Bible has a religious meaning. Judas Maccabeus encourages (paramythoumenos) his companions: “with the help of the Law and the Prophets, by reminding them of the battles that were already behind them, he filled them with renewed zeal.”¹³ In St. Paul’s language, paramytheomai and the related nouns have a technical meaning, paraklesis that teaches, persuades, stimulates. Apostolic “exhortation,” at root doctrinal, is the source of courage: “We exhorted you, encouraged you, adjured you to walk worthy of God.”¹⁴

The emphasis is sometimes intellectual: reasoning in order to persuade or advise.¹⁵ Courtiers persuade the authorities to shed innocent blood (Add Esth 16:5); “philosophy reasons with it gently” (erema paramytheitai).¹⁶ This calm, gentle manner of speaking, which reassures and comforts, is a form of paraklesis, especially effective for smoothing out opposition within a community.¹⁷ In any event, the prophet, by virtue of his charism, has a divine power to persuade that contributes to the solid edification of the Christian church: “speaks to humans for their edification, encouragement, and comfort” (anthropois lalei oikodomen kai paraklesin kai paramythian, 1Cor 14:3).

With respect to Christians who are fearful or timid (oligopsychoi), victims of fears, doubts, or scruples, or who lack strength to deal with daily hardships or with persecution, the brethren must encourage them: paramytheisthe tous oligopsychous (1Thess 5:14).

III. — In these words (paramythion, paramythia, paramytheisthai), there is more than comfort or encouragement, but a real stimulation, strength for overcoming difficulties.¹⁸ The word is used not only for reassurance (Xenophon, Hell. 4.8.1; paremythounto), and for encouraging and prodding to action (a letter to Emperor Hadrian: paramythoumenon kai protreponta, P.Fay. 19, 6); but for supplying a lack (Lucian, Dom. 7: paramytheomai to endeon), bringing help (cf. P.Oxy. 1631, 13: paramythike ergasia; cf. P.Ryl. 653, 6: maintaining the irrigation system). Such, it would seem, is the meaning of paramythion in Phil 2:1—“If there is any exhortation in Christ, if there is any stimulation to love (ei ti paramythion agapes), if there is any fellowship in the Spirit, if there is any tender mercy and compassion, then complete my joy . . .”¹⁹

The meaning “sustenance, support” is attested especially for paramythia. In 332, three people from Theadelphia complain to the prefect about the number of their fellow-citizens who are evading public service, moving to neighboring nomos and abandoning their own town, “and so we beseech your Mightiness, in our poor and neglected condition, to order the epistates of the peace to hand over our townspeople so that we may through this strengthening (dia tautes tes paramythias) live in our town and always give thanks to your glorious Fortune.”²⁰ In the Byzantine period, paramythia referred to the compensation or surety on a mortgage (P.Flor. 382, 65), the security, which was an application of the classical notion of paramythia;²¹ and the word came to mean “salary, compensation,” especially in the bookkeeping formula hyper paramythias.²²

¹ Cf. H. Fournier, Les Verbes “dire,” pp. 49, 215.

² Which allowed the translation alloquor (cf. French “allocution”) as in the Old Latin (at John 11:31); cf. P. Joüon, “Explication de la nuance méliorative des verbes tels que alloquor, παραμυθέομαι,” in RSR, 1938, pp. 311–314; Stählin, on this word, in TDNT, vol. 5, pp. 816–823.

³ The references for classical Greek are given by Stählin, loc. cit., and C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 2, pp. 252–265. Alexander sends one of his friends to comfort the wife and mother of Darius (Diodorus Siculus 17.37.3); “They would have for their consolation in their misfortune the similar fate of their companions” (17.69.6). In desperate straits, Demetrius wanted to kill himself. “Nevertheless his friends surrounded him and tried to comfort him” (παραμυθούμενοι, Plutarch, Demetr. 49.9).

⁴ Cf. Epictetus 4.1.13: “That Caesar is the common master of all should not be a consolation for you (μηδέν σε τοῦτο παραμυθέσθω); you must admit that you are a slave in a large household”; Plutarch, Quaest. conv. 1.1.2: “We would have an excellent way of consoling ourselves for our ignorance” (τῆς ἀμαθίας παραμύθιον); 2.1.2: in telling what they have seen, the travelers find “a compensation for their troubles” (τῶ—ν πόνων παραμύθειαν); Luc. 44.3: leisure, calm, the study of letters are the consolation that is most fitting for an old man; De laude 2 (539 e), De sera 13 (557 f), Alex. 30.10: “Tireos begged him not to take away his greatest consolation in his troubles.” Hence the nuance “provide help” (for the saving of the city, I.Bulg. XIII, 28, προσπαραμυθούμενος); wealth makes up for the deficiencies of old age (Musonius 17, ed. C. E. Lutz, p. 110, 20; cf. 9, p. 68, 1); BGU 1024, col. VIII, 11–21: help from the law for victims, τοῦ βίου παραμυθείαν (fourth-fifth century); cf. R. Taubenschlag, Opera Minora, vol. 2, p. 555; P.Flor. 332, 19: ἵνα ἔχω παραμύθιον τῆς προελεύσεώς μου (second century); P.Oxy. 1298, 2: “To my incomparable master, the consolation of his friends.”

⁵ Job: “The kings came . . . to visit me and comfort me,” T. Job 28.2; cf. 34.2, 5; Symmachus ordinarily translates the Hebrew naham with παραμυθέομαι; cf. H. van Dyke Parunak, “A Semantic Survey of Naham,” in Bib, 1975, pp. 512–532). Lucian, Nav. 14: “I have come to console you in your misfortune”; Plutarch, Per. 15.2: console the discouraged; Amat. 22: παραμυθία τοῦ πάθους; De Is. et Os. 27: Through initiation into his mysteries, Osiris establishes “a lesson in piety and encouragement for men and women who may fall into like adversities”; Dio Chrysostom 30.6; P.Ross.Georg. III, 3, 2 and 19 (third century); IGLAM 114, 7: τῆς ε—π ε—μοὶ λύπης παραμύθιον ε—μ φρεσὶ θέσθε τοῦτον (republished by G. Kaibel, Epigrammata 298).

⁶ Funerary honors are often presented in the inscriptions as expressions of consolation. At Thessalonica, the city honors the young Claudius Rufrius “for the consolation of his father” (εἰ—ς παραμυθίαν τοῦ πατρός, IG X, part II, fasc. 1, n. 173, 15), or wishes to honor and console the father and the grandfather of Baebia Heliodora (τειμῆς καὶ παραμυθίας τῆς περὶ αὐτοῦς χάριν, ibid. 180, 14–16); cf. 207, 13.

⁷ 4 Ezra 10:49—“She was mourning her son, and you went to console her”; MAMA VIII, 408, 11; 409, 4 and 8; 412, a 11, b 15, c 16; cf. Str-B, “Excursus 23: Die altjüdischen Liebeswerke,” vol. 4, pp. 582–607; Ps.-Plutarch, Cons. ad Apoll. 2, 6, 7, 9, 32, 37. Seneca, Marc., Helv., Polyb., etc. K. Buresch, Consolationum a Graecis Romanisque scriptarum historia critica, Leipzig, 1886; R. Kassel, Untersuchungen zur griechischen und römischen Konsolationsliteratur, Munich, 1958.

⁸ Xenophon, Ap. 26: “I have another consolation, the memory of Palamedes, whose death was like mine”; Philo, Abraham 196: “joys that considerably lighten (οὐ μικρὰ παραμύθια) the sorrow connected with the memory of the child who was sacrificed”; Josephus, Ant. 15.61: Herod consoled the grieving women with splendid funerals; 20.94: Helen, deeply grieved by the death of Izates, finds consolation (παραμυθία) in learning that her eldest son will be the heir; War 1.627: “Antipater consoled me in the sorrow I felt for the victims”; 3.194: for the inhabitants of Jotapata, “even if they must die, Josephus will be their highest consolation” (παραμυθία); 6.183: “It was a consolation for the dying soldiers to see the sadness of the one in whose service they had given their lives”; 7.392: “the thought of the evils that they would have to endure at the enemy’s hand [the Roman army] was a consolation (παραμύθιον) to them [the Jews at Masada] for having to kill them [their wives and children]”; Thucydides 2.44.1: “I offer not so much pity as consolation to the parents (of the dead)”; Dio Chrysostom 27.9. Hence the epitaphs, for example that of the silversmith Canopus: “Here stands this spotless monument, thanks to the care of my wife, a consolation from the one who shared my life” (παραμυθία συνζοίης, E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 19, 10); of an anonymous deceased nineteen-year-old from the imperial period, who addresses his father: “As consolation, I address this to you” (τοῦτο δέ σοι πέμπω παραμύθιον, ibid. LXXV, 13); of an Egyptian epebe (πατρὸς καὶ μητρὸς Στρατόλας παραμύθιον εἶναι, G. Kaibel, Epigrammata 951, 4); cf. GVI, n. 811, 7: οὐδὲν δ' ἐ—ξεύροντο κακοῦ παραμύθιον οἴκτου (Cyprian funerary stele from the first century); 1198, 13; 1499, 2: “Child you were a source of consolation for your parents”; SB 4313, 11 (first-second century). According to T. Abr. B 13, Death greeted the patriarch, “consolation of travelers in their pilgrimage.”

⁹ Wis 3:18—“They will have neither hope nor consolation” (παραμύθιον); Philo, Rewards 72: Hope is “a consolation implanted in human nature” (συμφυῆς παραμύθιον); Moses 1.137: “He was deprived of the hope of consolation”; Thucydides 5.103.1: ἐ—λπὶς δὲ . . . παραμύθιον οὔσα; Caesar reassures and offers hope to the Romans who expect to endure countless evils (παρεμυθήσατο τε αὐτοὺς καὶ ἐ—πήλπισεν, Dio Cassius 43, 15, 2). Cf. P.Oxy. 939, 26: Demetrius writes to Flavian that he is comforted by his unceasing expectation that he will come.

¹⁰ L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 3, pp. 14–31; vol. 13, pp. 229, 231 (citing numerous examples); M. Guarducci, Epigrafia greca, vol. 2, p. 39; cf. I.Lind. 441, 9: IGLAM 1604, 1633: παραμυθει—σθαι λυπουμένους περὶ τῆς τω—ν φιλτάτων ἀποβολῆς (republished in MAMA VIII, 408, 409; cf. vol. 3, 8: λύπης τω—ν γονέων παραμύθια); SEG VI, 189; IG Vol., 2, 517; XII, 7, 239, 394, 399; Dittenberger, Syl. 796, 13: παραμυθησομένην τοὺς τε γονεῖ—ς αὐτοῦ καὶ τὸν πάππον; 866; the most fully developed is 889, 20ff.: παραμυθήσασθαι δὲ τὸν πατέρα αὐτοῦ . . . καὶ τὴν μητέρα αὐτοῦ . . . καὶ τὴν σύνβιον αὐτοῦ . . . καὶ τοὺς γλυκυτάτους ἀδελφοὺς αὐτοῦ . . . καὶ τὰς ἀδελφὰς αὐτοῦ . . . καὶ τοὺς θεῖους αὐτοῦ Ἄρ. Ζώσιμον καὶ Ἡρακλείδην καὶ τοὺς γένει προσήκοντας γενναίως φέρειν τὸ συνβάν (third century).

¹¹ Onosander 36.2: when the general had been defeated, he comforted (παραμυθησάμενος) the soldiers who had survived the battle; Xenophon, Cyn. 6.25; Philo, Moses 2.50: to command without encouraging (ἄνευ παραμυθίας) is the deed of a tyrant addressing not free men but slaves.

¹² Josephus, Ant. 6.38: “When the divinity appears to us and comforts us” (παραμυθει—ται); cf. Καλλιόπη παραμυθουμένη (E. Heitsch, Die griechischen Dichterfragmente, 2d ed., Göttingen, 1963, n. XXVI, 9); a Greek translation of the Aeneid: “solabar fatis” = παρεμυθοῦμην μοίραις (P.Ryl. 478, 15).

¹³ 2Macc 15:9. “This is not a mere reading from the Holy Scripture, as at 8:23, but an exhortation fed by the Law and the Prophets” (F. M. Abel, Les Livres des Maccabées, p. 472). This is what Rom 15:4 calls “the paraklesis

of the Scriptures”; cf. Luke 24:31—when Jesus comments on them, the sacred texts cause the heart of the hearers to burn. Cf. the oratorical exercises of the general according to Onasander 1.13: ἡ τοῦ λόγου παρακέλευσις . . . ἡ τοῦ λόγου παρηγορία τὰς ψυχὰς ἀνέρρωσε ... ὥστε παραμυθεῖσθαι τὰς ἐν στρατοπέδοις συμφοράς.

¹⁴ 1Thess 2:12—παρακαλοῦντες ὑμᾶς καὶ παραμυθούμενοι καὶ μαρτυρούμενοι. The linking of παρακαλέω and παραμυθέομαι is found again at 2Macc 15:8–9; 1Thess 5:14; 1Cor 14:3; Phil 2:1.

¹⁵ Plutarch, De Pyth. or. 29: παραμυθούμενοι . . . καὶ πείθοντες; De gen. 20: παραμυθεῖται τοὺς ἀπιστοῦντας; De tu. san. 22: μιὰρὰ παραμυθία = harmful advice; De fac. 17 (an objection’s persuasive force); Praec. ger. rei publ. 13 (together with διδάσκω); Athenaeus 8.363 e 13; 471 e; T. Job 28.1; 34.2, 5.

¹⁶ Plato, Phd. 83 a; cf. Resp. 5.476 e: “Could we not find a way to calm him and persuade him gently, without letting him know that he is not in his right mind?”; Aeschylus, PV 1063: “Give reasons that may convince me”; Lucian, Philops. 27. Pythagoras introduced music to the soul “in order to charm it” (ἐνεκα καὶ παραμυθίας, in Plutarch, De virt. mor. 3).

¹⁷ Plato, Prt. 346 b: “The good cast a veil over them and make themselves praise them; and if they are irritated by some wrong committed by their parents or their country, they calm themselves, they try to be reconciled, they even force themselves to love and praise them”; Plutarch, Them. 22.5: “ostracism is a means of appeasing jealousy.” Paramythion is an appeasing (Plato, Leg. 4.704 d; Plato, Critias 115 b; Sophocles, El. 130; Ps.-Theocritus 23.7; Plutarch, Brut. 6); cf. παραμυθία, Plato, Leg. 1.625 b; Plutarch, Tim. 5.3: “He wanted to go and calm him”; Cic. 37.1: Cicero tried to calm Caesar and Pompey.

¹⁸ Thucydides 5.103.1: ἐλπίς δὲ, κινδύνῳ παραμύθιον οὔσα—hope inspires risk-taking; Aristophanes, Vesp. 115: “Through soft words, he persuaded (παραμυθούμενος) him not to wear the short cloak or go outdoors.”

¹⁹ Cf. Bo Reicke, “Unité chrétienne et Diaconie, Philip. II, 1–11,” in Freundesgabe O. Cullmann, Leiden, 1962, pp. 203–212; C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, pp. 518ff. Paramythion could have the meaning of persuasion or its more traditional sense, consolation-encouragement (J. Gnifka, Der Philipperbrief, Freiburg-Basel, 1968, p. 102, translates “Zuspruch,” exhortation-consolation), but in its place between παράκλησις and κοινωνία this term should refer to love’s power to stir to action (cf. Gal

5:6—πίστις δι ἀγάπης ε—νεργουμένη). Agape is a subjective genitive, corresponding to Christ and the Holy Spirit (same order in 2Cor 13:13). It is from this objective source that the Philippians will draw their “resources” for Christian living and brotherly love.

²⁰ P.Thead. 17, 17; cf. Wis 19:12—“For their relief, quails came up for them out of the sea”; Plutarch, Sert. 10.1: “At at time when the barbarians were in the greatest need of relief.”

²¹ P.Grenf. II, 89, 8; 90, 11; PSI 48, 2–5; P.Michael. 43, 17; C.P.Herm. 64, 4; P.Oxy. 1913, 7 (λόγος παραμυθίας); cf. P. M. Meyer’s note on P.Hamb. 30 (p. 128, n. 1). In monastic Greek, paramythia means “refection, collation,” cf. A. J. Festugière, Etudes d’histoire, p. 187.

²² P.Michael. 43, 15; P.Princ. 96, 6–7; P.Oxy. 136, 28, 31; 2024, 11; 2038, 14; 2195, 123; SB 5285, 35; 10810, 4; P.Lond. 1497, 10 (an ε—γγυτική ὁμολογία); 1452, 12 and 32. The editor of this papyrus, H. I. Bell, comments on paramythia: “The sense would seem to be something like softness, perhaps a (sailor’s) gift upon going on duty”; but J. Maspéro observes: “the word is much more precise; quite probably it is an equivalent for the Latin solatium, which means an official’s ‘compensation’ or a certain portion of this compensation” (in REG, 1912, p. 222; cf. S. Daris, “Frammento di lettera [?] bizantina,” in SPap, 1963, p. 9). In P.Berlin inv. 13916, 4 (fifth century): “I have received . . . for the tax on the annonae . . . twenty gold keratia and for the paramythia one keration”; the editor, E. Wipszycka (“Deux quittances d’impôts du Ve et VIe siècle,” in Festschrift zum 150 jährigen Bestehen des Berliner Ägyptischen Museums, Berlin, 1974, pp. 459ff.), refers to a register of taxes paid by the inhabitants of Aphrodito (P.Flor. 297, 243 and 433; sixth century), but neither this papyrus nor P.Berlin allows us to specify the nature of the fiscal charge called παραμυθία. E. W. proposes two possible interpretations: (a) a supplementary payment (cf. P.Lond. V, 1781; BGU 1020, where the word refers to a supplementary payment, gifts customarily offered to the owner); (b) “a wage, compensation, bonus”; in a receipt, this would be the sum meant for the tax collector.

παραπλήσιον, παραπλησίως

paraplesion, near, similar to, like; paraplesios, similarly, likewise

paraplesion, S 3897; EDNT 3.33; MM 489; L&N 64.9; BDF §184; BAGD 621 | paraplesios, S 3898; EDNT 3.33; MM 489; L&N 64.9; BAGD 621; ND 3.79

The preposition and the adverb, both unknown in the LXX, are NT hapaxes; and the adverb seems to be attested nowhere in the papyri. Both are formed from plesios, “near, close, neighboring,” and etymologically refer to either the closeness of a place¹ or a more or less total resemblance (“almost alike”), at least in classical Greek; but in the Koine the meaning often blurs into “nearly.”

Paraplesion in Phil 2:27 retains the nuance of approximation: Epaphroditus was ill, quite near to or actually on the point of dying; he had a brush with death. In the papyri, it is used to mean “analogous,”² for comparing facts, people, or things that are equivalent or “of the same sort”;³ so the meaning is “similar, like,” like writing the same things to another correspondent.⁴ The similarity can even amount to identity: “It is and will be the same with Pontus, and this is coming about already.”⁵ “It is impossible that after the conflagration the world should become like coal” (= “become coal”—Philo, Etern. World 90).

The same difficulty of evaluating the degree of similarity appears for paraplesios in Heb 2:14, where Christ shares the human conditions after the fashion of his brethren according to flesh and blood. Should we understand this to say “in exactly the same manner” or “in a manner nearly like”—in order to preserve Christ’s sinlessness, his human nature not being corrupt⁶—in which case we would say “in his own way,”⁷ or perhaps in a vague sense “similarly, likewise,” neither including nor excluding some particular difference. This last interpretation is the best attested in the first century: “An equality of the same order is seen in the members of living beings” (Philo, Heir 51); “likewise in all the towns” (Josephus, Life 187); “the people of Asochis, like those of Japha, gave them a noisy reception” (ibid. 233); “to become a good distance runner, one must have robust shoulders and neck, like an athlete who competes in the pentathlon”;⁸ “Orpheus made a vow to the gods of Samothrace, just as he did the first time.”⁹ It would seem that the nuance of Heb 2:14 is that cited by the Greek fathers—“with no difference”¹⁰—a translation that follows the context. Christ assumed a human nature exactly like that of other mortals, even though its principle of existence was the person of the Word of God—but this is a distinction made by later theology. Nevertheless the choice of the word paraplesios seems to hold some nuance—could it be that of the virginal conception?

¹ Cf. John 4:5—“Sychar was near (πλησίον) the field” Jacob gave to Joseph = P.Panop.Beatty 1, 333: “near the theater” (τὸ παραπλήσιον τοῦ θεάτρου); Diodorus Siculus 17.55.5; 17.75.6.

² C.Ord.Ptol. 53, 15 (taxes); 72 (sanctuary); 240 (artisans of analogous condition); PSI 1401, 3; P.Tebt. 703, 268; 788, 11; 790, 14; UPZ 110, 159:

other officials of the same rank; 162, col. III, 22; BGU 1768, 12. The shape of the city of Alexandria is very close to that of a chlamys (Diodorus Siculus 17.52.3), the system as a whole gave the impression of a city (17.52.5).

³ Cf. Ep. Arist. 63: “other fruits of the same sort”; 127: “through these words and others of the same sort”; 138: “as other idiots say, Egyptians and others like them”; the word is a favorite of Strabo, 11.8.4: “The Sacae launched invasions like those of the Cimmerians and the Treres”; 11.8.7: “The funeral customs and the mores of these peoples are analogous”; 11.10.2: “Margiana is similar to Aria”; 11.11.3; 11.13.9. The Romans suffer reverses when they take on the sea, but they are victorious when they attack men, adversaries of like nature to their own (Polybius 1.37.8); Plutarch, Ant. 45.4.

⁴ PSI 491, 13 (third century BC); cf. Onias’ desire to build in Egypt “a temple like the one at Jerusalem” (Josephus, Ant. 13.63); “two candelabra like those in the sanctuary” (War 6.388); the praetorium is built “after the fashion of a small temple” (3.82).

⁵ Polybius 4.40.10; 3.33.17: “we have acted just like those historians who wish to present their lies in a plausible manner.”

⁶ Cf. Rom 8:3; Phil 2:7; Heb 4:15—“just as we are, yet without sin”; A. Vanhoye, Exegesis epistulae ad Hebraeos cap. I–II, Rome, 1968, pp. 194–195.

⁷ Cf. Philo, Abraham 162: “thought, in its own way, is under the influence of a passion.”

⁸ Philostratus, Gym. 32; cf. 25: “the chest must be as prominent as the hips.”

⁹ Diodorus Siculus 4.48; cf. Herodotus 3.104: “In the middle of the day, the sun burns Indians and other people equally (or almost equally?).”

¹⁰ Cf. Plutarch, De curios. 3: “Just as a chicken on a farm, in spite of the feed put in front of it, will often hide in a corner to scratch around where a grain of barley appears amidst the manure, in the same manner (παραπλησίως) . . . the hidden and secret vices of each household will peck about” (following J. Dumortier’s French translation). But Strabo (11.2.2) contrasts the not-well-known origins of the Nile (παραπλησίως) with its course, which is perfectly known (πολὺ τὸ φανερόν); 11.14.12: the sanctuaries of Armenia were destroyed almost as was the temple of Abdera.

παραφέρω

paraphero, to bring, carry off, remove

paraphero, S 3911; EDNT 3.35; MM 491; L&N 15.162, 31.75, 90.97; BAGD 623

This verb presents no other difficulty than its multitude of meanings, which can be sorted out only according to context.

I. — The first meaning, “bring,” appears in Judg 6:5, where the Midianites bring their tents beyond the borders of their kingdom.¹ The sense is that of carrying something, sometimes in a physical sense, like “waterless clouds carried by the wind,”² and sometimes in a mental sense, as when David, pretending to be mad, appears deranged.³ Compare the English expressions “carried away” and “transports of delight.”

II. — The exhortation of Heb 13:9 (didachais poikilais kai xenais me parapheresthe) uses the passive in a figurative sense: “to varied and strange doctrines do not let yourself be led”; or “do not be carried off, away from the right path,” by these teachings. This epistle often uses compound verbs in para- to express a deviation, a turning aside, a marring, a positioning next to the right place: pararreō (2:1), paradeigmatizo (6:6), paraiteomai (12:25), parapikraino (3:8, 15-16), parapipto (6:6).

III. — The second aorist imperative (parenenke . . . ap' emou, Mark 14:36; Luke 22:42; cf. Matt 26:39—parelthato) should be translated “remove (or take back) this cup from me.”⁴

¹ Cf. Xenophon, Cyn. 5.27: the animal’s speed allows it to get out of sight of each object (παραφέρει τὴν ὄψιν) before determining what it is”; Philostratus, Gym. 44: “bringing the cooks and the impish kitchen boys”; Josephus, Ant. 7.168: Amnon asks his sister to have his meal brought (served) in his room. In a marriage contract, the woman brings (παραφερομένην) her belongings with her (P.Dura 30, 12). From this meaning, “cause to appear” (and confront, P.Oxy. 1853, 5), “produce” (a copy of a mortgage, Pap.Lugd.Bat. VI, 40, 16 = SB 7364; cf. G. Rosenberger, Griechische Verwaltungsurkunden von Tebtynis, Giessen, 1939, n. 53, 10 and 14), “keep ready” a bath and some food (P.Amh. 81, 12; P.Oxy. 131, 14). In the papyri, παραφέρω is a technical term in receipts for the delivery of wheat (P.NYU 7, 12; 9, 1, 10; 11, 1, 5), meat (6, 1), grains (5, 8, 15, 26, 34, 39, 45; 8, 3; 10, 1, 5, 10; 11 a, 1; P.Cair.Isid. 16, 28, 37, 42; 46, 4; 47, 9, 23, 28, 32), clothing (P.Oslo 119, 1 and 9), cattle (P.Oxy. 2118, 8). The usual formula for deliveries is παρήνεγκεν—sometimes κατέβαλεν—ὁ δει—να ὑπὲρ κ?ι—νδικτίονος κομητῶ—ν

Καρανίδος; sometimes ἔσχαμεν παρά σου (P.NYU 5, 1–7, 20–25, 50–55; 11 a 162–166; P.Mich. 649, 1, 8, 16, 30); receiving clerks attest the receipts: ὑποδίκται κόμης Καρανίδος; for example: “Valerius, son of Antiourios, delivered to the city gate for the third new indictio, for the account of the comites of Karanis, thirty-two and eleven-twelfths artabai of barley . . .” (P.NYU 5, 8; cf. the note of the editor, N. Lewis, p. 10); cf. the ostraca of Karanis, in P.Mich. VI, 779, 3; 781, 1; 782, 1; 784, 2; 785, 2; 786, 2; VIII, 1008, 1; 1009–1022. Delivery is made to a storeroom (P.Cair.Isid. 56, 1; 57, 13) or to the ὀριοδικτία (P.Mert. 30, 1); cf. SB 7361, 12 (cf. ZPE, vol. 15, 1974, p. 149); 9032, 2; 9070, 9, 23, 28; 10729, 1, 11. In guarantee contracts (ε–γγύη), this formula is used: “I will deliver and transport”; τούτους ἢ τοῦτον παραφέρω καὶ παραδώσω ε–ν δημοσίῳ τόπῳ (P.Mert. 98, 12; cf. P.Oxy. 2203, 3; 2238, 15; 2420, 16; 2478, 23–24; SB 9512, 15), or in the aorist παρήνεγκα καὶ παρέδωκα (P.Gen. 36, 15; BGU, 974, 5).

² Jude 12 (the passive, ὑπὸ ἀνέμων παραφερόμενα; cf. 2Pet 2:17—ε–λαυνόμενα = driven along); cf. Plutarch, Tim. 28.9: “Many were carried off by the river and . . . drowned”; Marcus Aurelius 4.43: “Hardly is something in sight when it is carried off”; 12.4.5: “If the whirlwind carries you off, let it take your body, your breath, all the rest. It will not take your intelligence.” In AD 42, Papaï transported five μετρήται of oil from the oasis of Baharia to Memphis (P.Fuad I Univ. 34, 2; cf. P.Mich. 493, 14). In the sixth-seventh century, Victor asks George to send someone to transport some VIPs from Thmoinepsobthis (P.Oxy. 1853, 6). Cf. Xenophon, Cyr. 2.2.4: “The cook made a third round (περιέφερε τὸ τρίτον) for the rest of the distribution (τῆς περιφορα–ς)”; Ep. Arist. 316: “just when he was going to borrow (παραφέρειν) some passage from the Scripture, he was stricken with cataracts.” A curious metaphorical (?) example from T. Abr. B 6: Sarah says to Abraham, “I add (?) and say that (παραφέρω καὶ λέγω ὅτι) this is one of the three men who were our guests.” and P.Eleph. 11, 5: σὺ δὲ ἕως τοῦ νῦν παρενήνοχας . . . πάνθ ὑπερθέμενος. But in Mark 14:36; Luke 22:42, the meaning is determined by ἀπ ε—μοῦ.

³ 1Sam 21:14, where the LXX uses παραφέρετο well to translate the hithpoel of the Hebrew halal, “lose one’s reason”; cf. Plutarch, Tim. 6.1: “Our judgments . . . are easily shaken up and thrown off (σειόνται καὶ παραφέρονται) by the praise or blame of the first person to come along.”

⁴ F. Field, Notes on the Translation, p. 39), translating the active with a passive, translates, “Turn aside, cause (or suffer) to pass by,” and cites Plutarch, Pel. 9.6: “Phyllidas sought to divert the conversation” (παραφερόντος τὸν λόγον); 10.6: “The first had hardly passed (παραφερομένου) when Fortune raised up a second against them.” Moulton-Milligan adds Aratus, Phaen. 43: τότε μὲν οὖν παρήνεγκε τὸ ῥηθέν

παρεισφέρω

pareisphero, to bring in alongside or in addition pareisphero, S 3923; EDNT 3.37; MM 492; L&N 68.64; BAGD 625

This biblical hapax (2Pet 1:5), “bring in alongside or in addition,” rare in classical Greek, is attested in only one papyrus dating from 113 BC: “A certain Thracian from Kerkesephis, whose name I do not know, fraudulently brought oil (pareisenenochota elaion) into the house where Petesuchos lives.” It means “bring an amendment” in Demosthenes (C. Lept. 20.88) and corresponds to eispherein psephisma in the inscriptions, which means “introduce or propose a decree,”¹ “pay a fine” (MAMA VI, 11). This second verb is used for bringing absolute courage into a just war (Onasander 4.2), and the expression eispherein pasan spouden is used constantly in the sense of putting one’s zeal into something, bringing all one’s good will to bear.²

Everyone agrees that this is clearly the meaning in 2Pet 1:5, where the compound form corresponds to the Koine’s common preference: “So therefore bring all your diligence to bear to add to your faith virtue. . . .” (kai auto touto de spouden pasan pareisenenkantes epichoregesate en te pistei hymon ten areten).³

¹ I.Magn. C b 32; cf. LV, 22; I.Sinur., n. 9, 16 (decree for the building of a sanctuary); Dittenberger, Syl. 1102, 10.

² Josephus, Ant. 11.324: Sanballates brought all his zeal to bear on the building of the Samaritan temple; 20.204: the procurator Albinus brought all his efforts to bear to pacify the region and rid it of sicarii; Polybius 22.12.12; Diodorus Siculus 1.83; I.Magn. 85, 11; a decree from Stratonicea in Caria, at the beginning of the imperial period, in honor of Zeus Panhemerios and Hecate: καλω—ς δὲ ἔχι πα—σαν σπουδὴν ι—σφέρεσθαι ι—ς τὴν πρὸς αὐτοῦς εὐσέβειαν (CIG II, 2715, a 10; cf. J. Chaine, Les Epîtres catholiques, Paris, 1939, p. 15); decree of Abdera (Dittenberger, Syl. 656, 14; cf. L. Robert, Opera Minora Selecta, vol. 1, pp. 320–326; Syl. 694, 16).

³ Compare the honorific decree from the first century BC celebrating Herostratos, “a good man, distinguished by his faithfulness, virtue, justice, piety” (ἄνδρα ἀγαθὸν γενόμενον καὶ διενένκαντα πίστει καὶ ἀρετῇ καὶ δικαιοσύνη καὶ εὐσεβεία . . . τὴν πλείστην εἰ—σενηνεγμένον σπουδῆν, Dittenberger, Or. 438, 6–9); cf. C. Spicq, Agarè, vol. 2, p. 354.

παρεπίδημος parepidemos, foreigner temporarily in a place, sojourner

see also ξενία, ξενίζω, ξενοδοχέω, ξένος

parepidemos, S 3927; TDNT 2.64–65; EDNT 3.38; NIDNTT 1.690; MM 493; L&N 11.77; BAGD 625

Among the foreigners, distinguished from the natives in a city in Egypt or Greece were the katoikountes (cf. the paroikoi, Exod 12:45; Lev 22:10), or residents, who had obtained the right of domicile; and the parepidemoi, or sojourners, foreigners who were only passing through the city, not establishing themselves there;¹ for example, they stayed only long enough to unload cargo or to settle a business matter.² Neither category of people has the right to citizenship, but the second are only passing through; their stay is temporary.³ The verb parepidemeo and the substantive parepidemia occur much more commonly than parepidemos, but they always mean a brief sojourn outside one's customary home. For example: foreigners who find themselves temporarily at Priene (ton parepidemounton xenon, I.Priene, 111, 139; cf. Dittenberger, Or. 268, 9; SB 1568, 4, hoi parepidemountes en to Arsinoite); praise is given “to the delegates Aristodamos, Aristeus, Antanor, because they sojourned (parepedamesan) and reported in a fashion entirely worthy of the city of Magnesia and the people of Epirus” (I.Magn. 32, 40); “Whereas the transients at Philae, strategoï, epistatai . . . compelled us to pay the costs of their presence. . . .”⁴ “The Messenian ephors suffered much on account of the sojourn of Dorimachos.”⁵

In the third century BC, Zeno, a native of Caunus, calls himself or is labeled a parepidemos in Egypt.⁶ In a will from the same period, a certain Philo leaves to his heirs (his wife and his daughter) a debt of 150 silver drachmas owed him by the Syrian parepidemos Apollonios, also called in Syriac Jonathas.⁷ The LXX gives this term a religious meaning, since in prayer the Israelites present themselves as nomads, without hearth or home, whose only security and support is in Yahweh,⁸ and also since Abraham says at Hebron “I am a resident alien and a sojourner in your midst”;⁹ a saying that is evoked at Heb 11:13, where the patriarchs are supposed to have confessed that they were “strangers and exiles on the earth” (xenoi kai parepidemoi eisin epi tes ges).

This profession of faith and of hope was influenced by Philo, who said that “every wise soul has received heaven as its country, the earth as a foreign (xenen) land; it considers the corporeal dwelling as someone else's property in which it must sojourn (parepidemein)."¹⁰ When St. Peter addresses "the elect, strangers in the Diaspora" (1Pet 1:1), he means that the recipients of his letter are not natives and citizens of an earthly country, where they are making only a provisional, relatively brief sojourn; their abode is elsewhere: in heaven (cf. Phil 3:20). This exile is strongly emphasized by repetition: "Dear friends, I urge you as aliens and strangers (hos paroikous kai parepidemous) to abstain from carnal desires."¹¹ This is not a chance metaphor but an adequate summary of the supernatural condition of Christians (hos = "as, being"). For them, life is a pilgrimage (Gen 47:9; 2Cor 5:6-8); they are only "passing through" on earth, so they have the mindset of travelers who do not adopt the thoughts or customs or mores of the country that they traverse;¹² they have a different set of values than the natives that they rub shoulders with. The citizens of heaven keep themselves from all that could sully their holiness (1Pet 1:13-15).

¹ Cf. Plutarch, Tim. 38.2: "they led the foreign travelers into his house" (τω—ν ξένων τοὺς παρεπιδημοῦντας ἄγοντες εἰ—ς τὴν οἰ—κίαν); Polybius 30.4.10; Diodorus Siculus 1.83. Cf. P. Jouguet, Vie municipale, pp. 55–59, 92–97; N. Hohlwein, Termes techniques, pp. 335, 351; Chrest. Wilck., I, 1, 1, pp. 40–55.

² For example, peasants passing through Alexandria stay too long and neglect their farm work; "the king forbade sojourning in the city (περεπιδημει—ν) for more than twenty days" (Ep. Arist. 110); cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 714, 30; P.Tor. 8 = UPZ 196, 13: τω—ν παρεπιδημοῦντων καὶ κατοικούντων ε—ν ταύταις ξένων; J. and L. Robert, "Bulletin épigraphique," in REG, 1955, p. 268, n. 216: honors given by τοὶ κατοικεῦντες καὶ γεωργεῦντες καὶ ναυκλαρεῦντες καὶ παρεπιδαμῶντες ε—ν Φύσκῳ. Cf. R. Taubenschlag, Law of Greco-Roman Egypt, vol. 2, p. 23; idem, Opera Minora, vol. 1, p. 190; vol. 2, pp. 216ff. P. Gautier, Symbola, pp. 117ff., 375.

³ Cf. SB 1568, 4: traveling functionaries (cf. Polybius 27.7.3); 9228, 16, βουλόμενος περεπιδημει—ν πρὸς καιρὸν τῇ Σοήνῃ ε—τω—ν; P.Oxy. 473, 2; P.Petr. II, 13, 19: ὅπως τοῦτόν γε τὸν χρόνον παρεπιδημῆς (republished S. Witkowski, Epistulae Privatae Graecae 8, 12). Aristophanes of Byzantium (c. 257–180 BC): "A metic is someone from a foreign city who lives in the city, paying a tax according to certain established needs of the city. For a certain number of days, such a person is called a transient foreigner (παρεπίδημος) and is not taxed (ἀτελής); if he exceeds the fixed period, he then becomes a metic and is taxed" (frag. 38; in A. Nauck, Aristophanis Byzantini Grammatici Alexandrini Fragmenta, 1848). In Gen 14:13, Abraham is called an 'ibri, which is translated περάτης (biblical hapax) by the LXX and commented on thus by St. Jerome: “Hebrew, i.e., transient” (Epist. 71.2; 78.33; Quaest. hebr. in Gen. 14.13; in Ezek. 7.6; in Jonah 1.9; in Jer. 1.14—“Hebraeus, id est περάτης et peregrinus transitorque”). Is Habiru an ethnic term designating a nomadic, wandering people, to be compared to the ‘Ibrîm (R. de Vaux, in RB, 1956, pp. 261–277, n. 4; 288, n. 2), or a name meaning “refugees, uprooted people,” always foreigners in the places where they are so called (sic, J. Botéro; cf. G. Cardascia, “Le Statut de l’étranger dans la Mésopotamie ancienne,” in L’Etranger, Recueils de la société J. Bodin IX, 1; Brussels, 1958, pp. 112ff.)? In any event, the habiru and the ‘Ibrîm are both transient and temporary, even if not foreign (H. Cazelles, “Hébreux, Ubru, Habiru,” in Syria, 1958, pp. 198–217; cf. M. L. Ramlot, in RevThom, 1961, p. 435).

⁴ —Επεὶ οἱ— παρεπιδημοῦντες εἰς τὰς Φίλας στρατηγοί (C.Ord.Ptol. 52, 22 = SB 8396; Dittenberger, Or. 139; A. Bernand, Philae, I, n. 19); cf. C.P.Herm. 6, 13: “I find out about foreigners who come from somewhere else on some occasion to establish themselves here”; P.Oxy. 1023, 4; P.Fouad 79, 4: “transient in the nome of Oxyrhynchus”; P.Brem. 20, 7: Πλουτίωνα παρεπιδημοῦντα οὐχ εὐ—ρον; BGU 1762, 5 (first century BC); P.Oslo 111, 27 and 88; SB 7746, 35; etc. Diodorus Siculus XIX, 61, 1: “Antigonus convened a general assembly composed of soldiers and sojourners” (τῶ—ν τε στρατιωτῶ—ν καὶ τῶ—ν παρεπιδημούντων), French trans. by F. Bizière (Diodore de Sicile: Bibliothèque historique, Livre XIX, Paris, 1975, p. 85) who comments (p. 162): “That is to say, those who came with Alexander . . . the translation that seems best to fit the sense of παρεπιδημει—ν, since this verb is used in the inscriptions to refer to transients, especially foreigners sojourning briefly in a city, cf. Dittenberger, Syl. n. 640, 5 and 714, 30.”

⁵ Polybius 4.4.2 (τῇ παρεπιδημίᾳ); a decree of Delphi in honor of Lykinos of Thebes, “who came to sojourn in our city and acted during his stay (παρεπιδαμίαν, l. ε—πιδαμίαν, Dittenberger, Syl. 738) in a manner worthy of his own people and our city” (NCIG, n. X, 20); Dittenberger, Syl. 772, 2 (25 BC); 734, 10 (AD 94).

⁶ P.Col.Zen. 72, 1; PSI 389, 3; P.Mich. 66, 6, 14, 26; Dittenberger, Or. 383, 150; cf. PSI 385, 4.

⁷ P.Petr. III, 7, 15; republished in C.Pap.Jud. 126, corrected and commented on by J. Modrzejewski, “Servitude pour dettes ou legs de créance?” in RechPap, vol. 2, Paris, 1962, pp. 75–98.

⁸ Ps 39:13—“Hear my prayer, for I am a resident alien with you, a sojourner like my forebears” (ὅτι πάροικος ε—γώ ει—μι παρὰ σοὶ καὶ παρεπίδημος); Hebrew tôshab.

⁹ Gen 23:4—πάροικος καὶ περεπίδημος ε—γώ ει—μι μεθ ὑμῶ—ν. P. Dhorme comments: “ger w^{etôshab}, a foreigner who has been received as a resident in a neighboring country but does not have the rights of a native.”

¹⁰ Philo, Husbandry 65; cf. Heir 267; since the fall, man is a fugitive and an exile (Cherub. 1ff.; Rewards 16–20; cf. Heb 6:18—οἱ—καταφυγόντες; Pss. Sol. 17.19). For the vocabulary, cf. Conf. Tongues 76ff.: “They have not sojourned as in a foreign land (οὐχὼς ε—πὶ ξένης παρω—κησαν). . . . If they had come only for a short stay (παρεπιδημήσαντες), they would have withdrawn again, whereas by establishing themselves solidly, they oblige themselves to stay put indefinitely.” For the theology, cf. C. Spicq, Hébreux, vol. 1, pp. 83, 123, 269ff.

¹¹ 1Pet 2:11; cf. J. B. SouÛek, “Pilgrims and Sojourners,” in Communio Viatorum, Prague, 1958, pp. 3–17; H. v. Campenhausen, “S’expatrier ‘à cause de la foi,’” in ÔSpir, 459; 1959, pp. 162–181; J. F. Fontecha, “La vida cristiana como pregrinación según la Ep. a los Hebreos,” in Studium Legionense, Léon, 1961, vol. 2, pp. 251–306; M. Adinolfi, “Temi dell’Esodo nella I Pt,” in Studii Biblici Franciscani, Jerusalem, 1966, pp. 299–317; idem, “Stato civile de cristiani ‘forestieri e pellegrini’ (Q Petr. II, 11),” in Anton, 1967, pp. 420–434; C. Spicq, Vie chrétienne.

¹² Cicero defined the attitude of a foreigner toward the country in which he resides: remaining indifferent to and uncurious about what happens (Cicero, Off. 1.34.125).

παρθενία, παρθένος

parthenia, virginity; parthenos, unmarried young woman, virgin

parthenia, S 3932; EDNT 3.39; NIDNTT 1.1072; MM 494; L&N 23.64; BAGD 626–627 | parthenos, S 3933; TDNT 5.826–837; EDNT 3.39; NIDNTT 3.1071–1072; MM 494; L&N 15.86, 85.25; BAGD 627; ND 4.222–226

There is no known etymology for parthenos,¹ which usually refers to a “young woman” who is not yet married or a “virgin,”² as distinct from “woman” (gyne): “leaving behind the name of virgin, a young woman is called a woman (or wife).”³ So this term is usually linked with the idea of youth (parthenou koras = the young virgin),⁴ of beauty, and even of nobility.⁵ It can then be meant in the strict sense of purity and literal virginity: “My soul is virgin” (parthenon psychen echon, Euripides, Hipp. 1006); “water that flows from a pure spring” (parthenou peges, Aeschylus, Pers. 613); in the Argolid a fountain was shown in which Juno recovered her virginity each year by bathing (Pausanias 2.38.2–3). In AD 37, the inhabitants of Assos took an oath “by our pure and virgin” (hagnen parthenon) city-guardian goddess.⁶ In the classical and Hellenistic periods, not only is this esteem for virginity affirmed—as with Atalanta, who when she “came to the age of puberty wished to remain a virgin”⁷—along with an association between youth and innocent living, but also virginity takes on religious meaning. Virgin goddesses like Artemis,⁸ and better, the warrior Athena,⁹ are honored. The pagan cults attest to the consecrated virginity of their priestesses and their prophetesses, which presupposes that their innocence is valued by the gods, so that their intervention is especially efficacious. The case of the Vestals is only one example,¹⁰ but there are also the Pythia, who drew near to the god “with a virgin soul” (Plutarch, De Pyth. or. 22), and many others: “She claims that she will remain a virgin all her life; she is consecrated to the cult of Artemis. . . . She exalts virginity and does not fall far short of divinizing it. She calls it pure, unpolluted, immaculate.”¹¹

The papyri and especially the inscriptions confirm these meanings: parthenoi are “girls.”¹² Epitaphs, especially Jewish ones, use the word to point to the youthfulness of the deceased,¹³ who had “reached the flower of age” (CII 1508), or was of marriageable age.¹⁴ The term takes on areligious coloring in the fourth century BC at Cyrene, where “young women” have to be purified, and are associated with young brides (nympha) before the consummation of their marriage, and with women (gyna).¹⁵ Cult regulations associate them with children in taking part in cultic ceremonies; they sing hymns in processions.¹⁶ With the decree of Canopus in the third century, “sacred virgins” appear at festal assemblies in honor of the gods;¹⁷ in a regulation for the Andanian mysteries, one of the “virgins” is identified as the priestess of Apollo Karneios (hai parthenoi hai hierai).¹⁸ This has nothing to do with physical integrity or with virtue; it is a functional title.

The LXX uses parthenos (Hebrew betûlâh) for an adolescent girl who has not been engaged (Exod 22:15-16), “who has not belonged to a man” (Lev 21:3), sometimes emphasizing youthfulness,¹⁹ sometimes physiological virginity: “young virgins who had not had relations with a male” (Judg 21:12). This point is as novel as it is constant (“Here is my daughter, who is a virgin”),²⁰ but it implies nothing about the virtue or the personal feelings of the one so described: she is a virgin, since she is not married and everyone thinks she is one.²¹ This is what confirms the meaning of partheneia (Hebrew betûlîm): physical integrity, the distinctive index of virginity.²² Only two texts translate the Hebrew ‘almâh as parthenos. The first concerns Rebekah (Gen 24:43); the second speaks of the miraculous sign of salvation given to Ahaz: “The adolescent (he parthenos) will become pregnant and will bear a son; you shall call his name Immanuel” (Isa 7:14). Matt 1:23 attests its literal messianic meaning.²³ It has been consecrated by the Christian tradition, which refers it to the virgin birth of Jesus.

Philo seems to be the first to have understood parthenia as an actual virtue²⁴ and gives it its distinguishing traits,²⁵ always including nobility and beauty.²⁶ This has to do not only with physical integrity, nor even with simple purity, but with an interior and very spiritual orientation that allows one to enter into relationship with God. God communes “with the nature that is undefiled, pure, in all truth virgin. . . . When God begins to have commerce with the soul, he makes a virgin again of what has become a woman.”²⁷ His model would be the female Therapeutae, contemplatives who serve and honor God, for the most part “aged virgins (gerai ai parthenoi) who have not observed chastity (hagneian) by constraint—like some Greek priestesses—but on their free resolve, from a passionate desire for wisdom: seeking to imbue their lives with it, they have renounced bodily pleasures.”²⁸

Luke 2:36 is faithful to the language of the LXX when it specifies that the prophetess Anna had lived “with her husband seven years apo tes parthenias.” On the other hand, St. Matthew no longer understands parthenos to mean “young woman” (Hebrew ‘almâh) but literally “virgin,” since the point is that Joseph is being reassured concerning his fiancée’s virtue (Matt 1:23). The meaning of the term in Luke 1:27 is much disputed: Gabriel is sent from God “to a virgin engaged to a man named Joseph . . . the virgin’s name was Mary” (pros parthenon emnesteumenen andri . . . to onoma tes parthenou Mariam).²⁹ This text is not to be taken in isolation; it plays an important role in the design of Luke 1–2;³⁰ the strict meaning “virgin” was retained by the whole tradition, in which the religious meaning has great weight,³¹ the ideal of virginity not being unknown among contemporaries (Epictetus 3.22.26–27), notably the Essenes.³² Not only does Luke write parthenos first, before the name of the young woman, but he repeats it and wants to emphasize its weight; it is the title par excellence of the person whom the angel addresses with such great respect, the one whom Christian tradition calls “the Blessed Virgin Mary.”

On the other hand, once more, the title of the “parable of the Ten Virgins” (deka parthenois, Matt 25:1, 7, 11) is wrong. M. J. Lagrange noted: “The ten virgins are young women, friends of the fiancée, and the fact of their virginity has no bearing on the parable” (on this text). We might even say that the question of their virginity does not arise; here parthenos retains its secular and OT sense, “young women”; they are the bride’s young companions and friends, and they participate in the joyful procession planned for the marriage ceremony; they surround the bride when she goes to meet her fiancé, who is escorted by young men who are his friends.³³ Five of them are foolish (morai), scatterbrained, idiots who bring lamps with no oil; and five are sensible (phronimoi)—their lamps are filled. Acts 21:9 is more difficult to interpret. At Caesarea, the evangelist Philip “had four virgin daughters who prophesied” (thygateres . . . parthenoi propheteuousai). The clearest point to be made is that there is a certain connection between virginity and prophecy;³⁴ but parthenos could also be interpreted simply as meaning unmarried young women, thus noting a fact but allowing no conclusion that these parthenoi intended never to marry and had a vow of virginity. Otherwise, in pointing out that these young women were virgins, Luke may have intended to point out their singular circumstance: they were really virgins and even had that virtue.

The definite text on virginity in the NT is 1Cor 7:25-34 (“And concerning virgins,” peri de ton parthenon), which means men as well as women (Jos. Asen. 4.9; 8.1); the Lord had given no precept on this matter. The apostle gives his reasoned opinion: virginity is better than marriage for both sexes, first because marriage is inopportune given the dramatic eschatological circumstances, but especially on the spiritual level because the person who is agamos has no concern other than the Lord and ways of pleasing him. What is more, the virgin remains holy in both body and spirit.³⁵ Virginity means freedom for consecration to the Lord; it means not only bodily purity, but essentially the will of the heart to belong more completely to Christ and to be available for his service.³⁶ The case of the father who hesitates to let his hyperakmos (7:36, about to pass the flower of age) daughter (parthenos) marry resembles that of Phokos, who “kept on moving back the time for his daughter’s marriage” (Ps.-Plutarch, Amat. nar. 4.774 e). All things considered, such a father does well if he lets his daughter marry (kalos poiei, 7:36), but he does better (kreisson poiese) if he does not give her in marriage.³⁷

Since the OT had portrayed Yahweh as the husband of the nation of Israel, and in Eph 5:22-32 Christ is the husband of the church, St. Paul presents himself as best man in the uniting of the Corinthian community with the Lord, or “as a father gives his daughter to the chosen husband” (E. B. Allo): “I betrothed you to one man (heni andri) as a pure virgin (parthenon hagnen) to be presented to Christ.”³⁸ The metaphor refers to all souls that are purified from their sins. The same interpretation has been made with the 144,000 virgins before the Beast and its worshipers:³⁹ they have been redeemed from the earth; they sing a new song in honor of the Lamb, whom they follow wherever he goes; “these are the ones who have not defiled themselves with women, because they are virgins (parthenoi gar eisin) . . . they are immaculate (amomoi eisin).” “Virgins” is to be taken literally, but it is impossible to apply it to all Christians, notably those who are married and could not have been defiled (emolynthesan) by virtue of their marital relations. This must have to do with an elite among the redeemed, a definite category of ascetic Christians, separated from other people, the “firstfruits” taken from the whole of the Christian assembly and consecrated exclusively for the service of God and the Lamb, for whom they constitute a sort of bodyguard.⁴⁰ They would have been “defiled” if they had defaulted on their resolve (cf. 1Tim 5:12—ten proten pistin athetesan, “they annulled their first commitment”). As things stand, however, they are beyond reproach. We may think of the “eunuchs who make themselves such for the sake of the kingdom of heaven.”⁴¹ There is no more energetic way of expressing the will to definitive self-renunciation with regard to sexual satisfactions for the love of God; which is the very definition of Christian virginity.

¹ P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique, on this word. Cf. G. Delling, “παρθένος,” in TDNT, vol. 5, pp. 826–837. — The feminine ἡ παρθένη is exceptional, cf. UPZ 101, 21 (AD 156).

² Homer, Il. 22.127: “young man and young woman whisper softly together”; Plato, Leg. 794 c: “for boys and girls (παρθένοι) above six years, separation of the sexes is enforced”; 8.834 d: “little girls or young women” (παι—δας ἢ παρθένους); Aristophanes, Nub. 530: “since I was still a girl, I was not permitted to give birth.” Marciana, Sirica, Procla, Castar, Asther, and Domna are young women who died at the ages of 15, 18, 19, 14, and 22 years (CII, n. 45, 168, 386, 588, 733, 381, 1169); unmarried, without any definite indication as to literal virginity (cf. Plutarch, Mulier. virt. 20; Con. praec. 2), since παρθένιος means “born of a young woman” (Homer, Il. 16.180) who has behaved badly (Pausanias 3.7.7); cf. young married women (Aristophanes, Eq. 1302: ὦ παρθένοι = “O young women”; J. Taillardat, Images d’Aristophane, n. 647, 767). Cf. A. Brelich, Paidēs e parthenoi, Rome, 1969, vol. 1, pp. 303ff. [In accord with contemporary English usage, “young woman” is used in this English translation where the original French, not only in this article but throughout the work, uses “jeune fille.” It seems from the examples given that the term is meant to refer to unmarried females from the teen years into the twenties. It should also be noted that English uses two words (“wife” and “woman”) where both French (“femme”) and Greek (γυνή) use one. —Tr.]

³ Sophocles, Trach. 148: ἀντὶ παρθένου γυνή; Ps.-Theocritus 27.65: “I came here a virgin, and I return home a woman”; Philo, Cherub. 49: “Union for the sake of procreation makes virgins women”; Diodorus Siculus 5.73. Hesiod, Th. 514. In I.Did. 496 A 5, the gods appear to worshipers of the goddess Demeter Thesmophoros (διὰ παρθένων καὶ γυναικῶν—ν)—whose worship is reserved for women—then to men (literally, to males) and

underage children (δ ἄρρένων καὶ νηπίων). L. Robert (Hellenica, vol. 12, Paris, 1960, pp. 544ff.) reckons that the gods appear in different human forms. Cf. P. Lambrechts, “L’importance de l’enfant dans les religions à mystères,” in Hommage à W. Déonna, pp. 322–333.

⁴ Euripides, Phoen. 1730; Aristophanes, Ran. 950: “young woman and old woman” (παρθένος χῆ γραιῦς); Hippocrates, Genit. 2.3: “Girls, while they are young, do not menstruate”; Nat. Puer. 20.2; Menander, Dysk. 4: “Sostratus, smitten with the young woman” (τῆς παρθένου); 34: “the young woman behaves as she was trained”; 290; Mis. 306, 465 (P.Oxy. 2656).

⁵ Il. 2.513: “the noble virgin”; Plato, Hp. Ma. 287 e: “what is noble, in all truth, is a beautiful virgin”; Aristotle, frag. 675 (ed. Rose, 2d ed.): Arete, the beautiful virgin goddess; Menander, Dysk. 682: “I let the rope slip three times while looking at the young woman”; 968: “the noble virgin Nike”; Heliodorus, Aeth. 4.10.3: “the noble name of virgin”; Philo, Rewards 53; Prelim. Stud. 124; Josephus, Ant. 7.162, 343–344; 11.196–197.

⁶ Dittenberger, Syl. 797, 21; cf. Dio Cassius 7.8.11: the Vestal Virgins, παρθενεύειν διὰ βίου; “Heracleia died still pure” (ἀγνεύουσιν, GVI, n. 1697); Menander, Sik.: “Your daughter (τὸ θυγάτριον) still lives and in excellent circumstances.’ ‘Is she still preserved in herself (αὐτὸ τοῦτο)?’ ‘Yes, she is still a virgin and knows no man (παρθένος γ’ ἔτι. ἄπειρος ἀνδρός)’” (A. Blanchard, A. Bataille, “Fragments sur papyrus du ΣΙΚΥΩΝΙΟΣ de Ménandre,” in RechPap, vol. 3, 1964, pp. 148–149).

⁷ Apollodorus, Bibl. 2.9.2: παρθένον ε—αυτὴν ε—φύλαττε; cf. 8.2: ὤμοσεν μαι—ναι παρθένος. Παρθένοι are young women who sacrifice their lives for their country (σώτειραι); Plutarch, An seni 24; Ps.-Plutarch, Reg. et imp. apoph. 184, 1; DKP, vol. 4, 531. Texts relating to this aspiration to purity in C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, pp. 818ff.

⁸ Artemis remains a virgin: παρθένος ἔμεινεν (Apollodorus, Bibl. 1.4.1); her name comes from her integrity (τὸ ἀρτεμέης), “because of her love of virginity” (Plato, Cra. 406 b). Cf. L. Séchan, P. Lévêque, Les Grandes Divinités de la Grèce, Paris, 1966, pp. 353ff. K. Warnicke, “Artémis,” in PW, vol. 2, 1, col. 1375–1396.

⁹ Artemidorus Daldianus, Onir. 2.35: “She is bad for courtesans and adulterous women, and also for those who wish to marry, because the goddess is a virgin” (παρθένος γὰρ ἡ θεός); Plutarch, Demetr. 26.5.

¹⁰ “Numa also had watch over the sacred virgins, called Vestals. . . . The pure and incorruptible substance of fire had to be entrusted to pure, spotless beings” (Plutarch, Num. 9.9–10; cf. 10.3–4; Publ. 8.8; Aulus Gellius, NA 1.2). T. Worsfold, The History of the Vestal Virgins of Rome, London, 1932; P. Grimal, Histoire mondiale de la femme, Paris, 1965, vol. 1, pp. 406ff. On the name virgo Vestalis, cf. G. Radke, “Die dei penates und Vesta in Rom,” in ANRW, vol. 17, 1, pp. 369ff.

¹¹ Heliodorus, Aeth. 2.33.4–5. Cf. ἰ—εῤῥὰ παρθένος (P.Mert. 73, 1). Virgin priestess of Apollo at Epirus (Aelian, NA 11.2); of Poseidon, on the island of Calaurea (Pausanias 2.33.2); of Aphrodite, in Sicyonia (Pausanias 2.10.4–5); of Heracles, at Thespieae (Pausanias 9.27.6); of Cybele, at Cyzicus and in Caria; of Anaitis at Ecbatana (Plutarch, Art. 27). On the isle of Sein, there were priestesses—perpetua virginitate sancta—called Gallizenae (Pomponius Mela 3.48). The ordeal for proof of virginity is located in the cave of Ephesus (Achilles Tatius 6.13ff.). Cf. IGLS 2928; E. Fehrle, Die kultische Keuschheit im Altertum, Giessen, 1910; J. T. Milik, Dédicaces faites par des dieux, Paris, 1972, pp. 374–375.

¹² P.Ryl. 125, 28 (AD 28–29); cf. P.Lond. 983, 4 (vol. 3, p. 229); P.Apoll. 41, 6; SB 8545 B 16 a. This is an identity for “girls” who work on a farm (P.Fay. 102, 30; BGU 894, 6; Philo, Moses 1.57). Cf. the proper name Parthenos (CII 168 a).

¹³ CII 45: “Marciana, a young woman of 15 years, rests here”; 106, 168, 320, 381, 385 (at Rome), 588 (at Venice); IGUR, n. 927; SEG II, 874, 6 (in Libya); SB 6167, 2; 6701, 6; 6839; 8366, 2; CIRB 130, 4 and 11; 139.

¹⁴ Stud.Pal. XX, 15, 6. This “virginity” is temporary, since certain “girls” are married while still young (P.Amst. 40, 7).

¹⁵ F. Sokolowski, LSCGSup, n. 115 A, 75–76.

¹⁶ A decree relating to the cult of Zeus Sosipolis in 197–196 (I.Magn. 98 = Dittenberger, Syl. 589; LSAM, n. 32, 20), on the occasion of the installation of the statue of Artemis Leukophryene (first half of second century); χοροὺς παρθένων αἰ—δουσω—ν ὕμνους εἰ—ς Ἄρτεμιν (I.Magn. 100 = Diodorus Siculus 695 = LSAM, n. 33, A 29); at Athens, in the cult of Apollo in 129–128: αἰ— δὲ παρθένοι φερέτωσαν τὸ ἰ—εῤῥόν (F. Sokolowski, LSCGSup, n. 14, 46). Cf. L. Robert, “Les Inscriptions,” in J. des Gagniers, Laodicée, pp. 299ff.

¹⁷ Cf. SB 8858 = Dittenberger, Or. 56, 65: τὰς παρθένους τῶ—ν ἰ—εῤῥέων; 68: ἀναφέρειν τὰς ἰ—εῤῥὰς παρθένους; P.Mert. 73, 1: a declaration for “Taophryonis, sacred virgin”; P.Oxy. 3177, 2–3: Aurelia Tanentiris declares that her mother was a sacred virgin and that her daughter has become one as well.

¹⁸ LSCG, n. 65, 29, 32, 96 = Dittenberger, Syl. 736 (92 BC).

¹⁹ Gen 24:14, 16, 43, 55 (Hebrew na'ar); 34:3; Deut 22:23—παῖς παρθένος; 22:28; 33:25—νεανίσκος σὺν παρθένω; 2Chr 36:17—Nebuchadnezzar “spared neither young man nor virgin, neither old man nor gray head”; Isa 23:4; Jer 51:22; Lam 1:18; 2:21; Ezek 9:6; Esth 2:17; Job 31:1; Ps 45:11; 78:63; 148:12; Sir 9:5; 1Macc 1:26—“maidens and youths.” With Rebekah (“the young woman was beautiful and was a virgin,” Gen 24:16) and in Amos 8:13 (“beautiful virgins”) an aesthetic quality is noted: “All young virgins (κοράσια παρθενικὰ) and beautiful to behold” (Esth 2:3). Aseneth: “Eighteen years old, a virgin, gracious, surpassing in beauty all the virgins of the land” (Jos.Asen. 1.6; cf. 2.11; 15.8).

²⁰ Judg 19:24; Lev 21:13-14: the high priest shall marry a woman who is still a virgin (cf. Ezek 44:22); 1Kgs 1:2—David seeks “a young virgin” (παρθ. νεάνιδα); Lam 5:11—“They have violated the women (γυναῖ—κας) of Zion, the virgins (παρθένας) of the cities of Judah”; 2Macc 3:19. Cf. G. J. Wenham, “Betulah, a Girl of Marriageable Age,” in VT, 1972, pp. 326–348.

²¹ Deut 22:19. The virgin daughter of Zion is sometimes Jerusalem (2Kgs 19:21), sometimes the nation (Isa 37:22; Jer 18:13; 31:4, 21; Lam 1:15; 2:13). Since Israel has had lovers, this metaphor is taken as a title of nobility that erases the past but commits the future.

²² Deut 22:14, 15, 17, 20: “I took a woman and drew near to her, but I did not find virginity in her”; Judg 11:37-38: Jephthah’s daughter, whose womanhood would be wasted. Cf. Antoninus Liberalis, Met. 11.1: “With violence Chelidonis was robbed of her virginity”; 13.7; Achilles Tatius 5.21.1: Clitophon “said to be a virgin, if at any rate there is a male virginity” (εἴ τις ἐ—στι ἐ—ν ἀνδράσι παρθενία); CIG IV, 8784 b; Jos. Asen. 4.9—“Joseph is a pious man, chaste and virgin” (ἀνὴρ θεοσεβῆς καὶ σώφρων καὶ παρθένος); 8.1; Rev 14:3. — παρθενία (-εία) always translates the Hebrew ne'ûrîm, “youth,” whence γυνὴ παρθενίας, “wife of youth,” that is, the fiancée when she receives her husband (Jer 3:4; Sir 15:2; 42:10); cf. Prov 5:18; Joel 1:8—“the husband of her youth” (ἐ—πὶ τὸν ἄνδρα αὐτῆς τὸν παρθενικόν); CII 319—Eirena, the παρθενικὴ σύμβιος of Claudius; cf. 81; H. J. Leon, The Jews of Ancient Rome, Philadelphia, 1960, p. 130). Cf. PSI 41, 5: ἀνδρὶ Παγένει ᾧ συνήφθην ἐ—κ παρθενίας; SB 11221, 4: ἐ—κ παρθενίας ἀνδρὶ ἐ—γαμήθη Πανίσκω; P.Lond. 1711, 18; Dittenberger, Syl. 983, 18: ἀπὸ παρθενίας. Cf. Panopolis papyrus 28, 4: ἐ—κ παρθενίας ἀνδρὶ ἐ—γαμήθη Πανίσκω, in ZPE, vol. 10, 1973, p. 131;

reprinted in P.Panop. On the Roman inscriptions a or ab virginitate, cf. M. Humbert, Le Remariage à Rome, Milan, 1972, pp. 64ff., 346ff.

²³ This text has been the object of countless studies (cf. L. Dennefeld, “Le ‘Signe’ de la prophétie d’Emmanuel,” in RSR, 1927, pp. 69–86), notably concerning the meaning of ‘almâh, an unmarried young woman. J. Coppens (“La Prophétie de la ‘Almah, Isa 7:14-17,” in ETL 1952, pp. 648–678). Add J. Massingberd Ford, “The Meaning of ‘Virgin,’” in NTS, vol. 12, 1966, pp. 293–299; M. Rehm, “Das Wort ‘almah in Isa VII, 14,” in BZ, 1964, pp. 89–100.

²⁴ Cherub. 52: God “spreads like seed the ideas of the immortal and virgin virtues of virginity. . . . You should live as a virgin (παρθενεύεσθαι) in the house of God.”

²⁵ Prelim. Stud. 124: “beauty that is undefiled, without stain, truly virginal” (παρθένιος); Spec. Laws 3.74.

²⁶ Philo, Husbandry 158: “The intelligent man hopes to marry a virgin of good birth and pure”; Joseph 43; Spec. Laws 1.101. Not only is grace virginal (Change of Names 53; Post. Cain 32; Migr. Abr. 31; Flight 141; Moses 2.7), but also there is “a virgin soul” (παρθένον ψυχήν, Cherub. 51; Migr. Abr. 224; Virtues 37; cf. Euripides, Hipp. 1006); “all the virtues are those of virgins” (Rewards 53; Change of Names 196); there are pure and virgin thoughts (Dreams 2.185; Spec. Laws 2.30), “hands that are pure, and, if one may dare to use a term that entails some imagery, virginal” (Virtues 57) and the “virgin number seven” (Decalogue 102; Spec. Laws 2.56; Rewards 153). Cf. Apollonius Rhodius, Argon. 3.682: αἰ—δῶς παρθενίη = virginal modesty.

²⁷ Cherub. 50; Post. Cain 134; Migr. Abr. 225; Quest. Exod. 2.3.

²⁸ Contemp. Life 68; cf. 1QM 7.3–4: “No child, minor, or woman shall come into their camps (of warriors)” at the time of the messianic liberation, because the sons of light, associated with the heavenly host, “consequently find themselves near to God and obliged to lead an angelic life” (G. Vermès, “Quelques traditions de Qumrân,” in Cahiers Sioniens, vol. 9, 1955, p. 42), sheltered from any risk of impurity.

²⁹ E. Delebecque (Evangile de Luc) notes: “Engaged: the Greek verb (ε—μνηστευμένην) can also mean ‘married.’ The choice between the two matters little because the Jewish betrothal ceremony gave the fiancé full rights over the fiancée. The word that is set in relief and repeated is ‘virgin.’ Luke underlines the unprecedented paradox of a woman who is engaged—or married—yet is still a virgin.” Perhaps the evangelist was thinking of Lev 21:13-14: the high priest shall marry a woman who is still a virgin.

³⁰ R. Laurentin, Structure et théologie de Luc I-II, Paris, 1957, pp. 176ff. (gives the bibliography, pp. 191ff.). Cf. M. J. Lagrange, “La Conception surnaturelle du Christ d’après saint Luc,” in RB, 1914, pp. 60–71; 188–208; R. P. Lavaud, “La Virginité dans le Nouveau Testament,” in ÔSpir, 1941, pp. 180–190; Sr. Jeanne d’Arc, “La Chasteté et la virginité dans l’Ancien et le Nouveau Testament,” in La Chasteté, Paris, 1953, pp. 11–36; L. Legrand, La Virginité dans la Bible, Paris, 1964.

³¹ Prot. Jas. 9.1—παρθένον κυρίου; 19.3; Odes Sol. 19.6, etc. Cf. G. Graystone, Virgin of All Virgins: The Interpretation of Luke I, 34, Rome, 1968; F. Dreyfus, “L’Actualisation de l’Ecriture, III: La Place de la tradition,” in RB, 1979, pp. 326ff., 337ff. Cf. J. McHugh, La Mère de Jésus dans le Nouveau Testament, Paris, 1977, pp. 217–390; J. Winandy, “La Conception virginale dans le Nouveau Testament,” in NRT, 1978, pp. 706–719; R. E. Brown, K. P. Donfried, J. A. Fitzmyer, J. Reumann, Mary in the New Testament, Philadelphia-New York, 1978; B. M. Nolan, The Royal Son of God, Fribourg-Göttingen, 1979, pp. 63ff.

³² A. Guillaumont, “A propos du célibat des Esséniens,” in Hommages à A. Dupont-Sommer, Paris, 1971, pp. 395–404; cf. J. Blinzler, “Zur Auslegung von Mt. XIX, 12,” in ZNW, 1957, pp. 254–270; J. Dupont, Mariage et divorce dans l’Evangile, Desclée De Brouwer, 1959, pp. 162ff., 200ff.; C. Daniel, “Esséniens et eunuques (Mt. XIX, 10–12),” in RevQ, vol. 23, 1968, pp. 353–390; H. Hübner, “Zölibat in Qumran?” in NTS, vol. 17, 1971, pp. 153–167; J. Coppens, “Le Célibat essénien,” in M. Delcor, Qumrân: Sa piété, sa théologie et son milieu, Paris-Gembloux-Louvain, 1978, pp. 295–305; cf. 379.

³³ Cf. D. Buzy, Les Paraboles, Paris, 1932, pp. 475ff.; G. Schwarz (“Zum Vokabular von Matthäus XXV, 1–12,” in NTS, vol. 27, 1981, pp. 270–276) reckons that parthenos must correspond to the Aramaic shôshbîntâ’ = maid of honor.

³⁴ “As virgins, they were better suited to carry out their function as prophetesses” (E. Jacquier, on this text), cf. Joel 2:28-29; Acts 2:17; 1Cor 11:5.

³⁵ E. Alzas, “L’Apôtre Paul et le célibat: Etude exégétique sur I Cor. VII, 24,” in RTP, 1950, pp. 226–232; M. Thurian, Mariage et célibat, Neuchâtel-Paris, 1955; J. J. O’Rourke, “Hypotheses Regarding I Corinthians VII, 26–36,” in CBQ, 1958, pp. 292–298; X. Léon-Dufour, “Mariage et continence selon saint Paul,” in A la rencontre de Dieu: Mémorial A. Gelin, Le Puy–Lyons–Paris, 1961, pp. 319–329; J. Massingberd Ford, “St Paul, the Philogamist (I Cor. VII in Early Patristic Exegesis),” in NTS, vol. 11, 1965, pp. 326–348; C. Spicq, Théologie morale, Paris, 1965, vol. 1, pp. 562–566; 816–827; D. Daube, “Pauline Contribution to a Pluralistic Culture,” in Jesus and Man’s Hope, Pittsburgh, 1971, pp. 231ff. J. K. Elliott, “Paul’s Teaching on Marriage in I Corinthians,” in NTS, vol. 19, 1973, pp. 219–225; P. Menoud, “Mariage et célibat selon saint Paul,” in Jésus-Christ et la foi, Neuchâtel–Paris, 1975, pp. 13–22; T. Matura, “Le Célibat dans le Nouveau Testament d’après l’exégèse récente,” in NRT, 1975, pp. 481–500, 593–604; R. Penna, “San Paolo (I Cor. VII, 29b–31a) e Diogene il Cinico,” in Bib, 1977, pp. 237–245.

³⁶ This status of virginity is absolutely new; but we should note that Paul is careful to explain the superiority of virginity to recent converts from paganism in secular terms: “beauty/nobility,” a Greek word connoting honorableness, excellence, and moral good (τοῦτο καλόν, 1Cor 7:26; καλω—ς ποιει—, 7:37–38).

³⁷ 1Cor 7:36–38. Cf. L. A. Richard, “Sur I Corinthiens (VII, 36–38): Cas de conscience d’un père chrétien ou ‘mariage ascétique’?” in Mémorial J. Chaine, Lyon, 1950, pp. 309–320; cf. R. Castellino, “I Cor. VII, 36–38 nel diritto orientale,” in Mélanges Tisserant, vol. 1, pp. 31–42; W. G. Kümmel, “Verlobung und Heirat bei Paulus (I Kor. VII, 36–38),” in Neutestamentliche Studien für R. Bultmann, 1974, pp. 275–295.

³⁸ 2Cor 11:2 (P. Andriessen, “La Nouvelle Eve, corps de nouvel Adam,” in Aux origines de l’Eglise [Recherches bibliques 7], Desclée De Brouwer, 1965, pp. 95ff.). Ἄγνός, which literally means “undefiled, pure, consecrated,” suggests Philonian “virginity of soul.” The emphasis is on “the freshness of a virginal purity” (E. B. Allo). The expression παρθένος ἄγνή is common; cf. Philo, Rewards 159; Philo, Cherub. 50; Joseph 43; 4Macc 18:7–8; Jos. Asen. 15.1, 8; 19.2; IGUR, n. 768; GVI, n. 1184, 1997.

³⁹ Rev 14:4. These virgins would be all those who have not let themselves be seduced by the great prostitute Babylon (M. E. Boismard, “Notes sur l’Apocalypse,” in RB, 1952, pp. 161–181). Cf. K. Rückert, “Die Begriffe παρθένος und ἀπαρχή in Apk. XIV, 4–5,” in TQ, 1886, pp. 391–448; 1887, pp. 105–132; R. Devine, “The Virgin Followers of the Lamb (Apoc. XIV, 4),” in Scripture, vol. 16, 1964, pp. 1–5; J. M. Ford, “The Meaning of ‘Virgin,’” in NTS, vol. 12, 1966, pp. 293–299; C. H. Lindijer, “Die Jungfrauen in der Offenbarung des Johannes XIV, 4,” in Studies in John (Festgabe J. N. Sevenster), Leiden, 1970, pp. 124–142.

⁴⁰ The exegesis of E. B. Allo (on this text), of E. Stauffer, “γαμέω,” in TDNT, vol. 1, pp. 652–653; C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, p. 557, n. 2.

⁴¹ Matt 19:12. Cf. Q. Quesnell, “Made Themselves Eunuchs for the Kingdom of Heaven,” in CBQ, 1968, pp. 335–358; F. J. Moloney, “Matthew XIX, 3–12 and Celibacy,” in Journal for the Study of the New Testament, 1979, vol. 2, pp. 42–60.

παρουσία

parousia, presence, arrival, visit, manifestation parousia, S 3952; TDNT 5.858–871; EDNT 3.43–44; NIDNTT 2.887, 898–903, 907, 932–934; MM 497; L&N 25.158, 28.29; BAGD 629–630; ND 4.167–168

Just as the verb pareimi has the two meanings “be present” and “become present (arrive),” the substantive parousia means sometimes the presence of persons¹ or things;² sometimes arrival, coming, visit.³ In the Hellenistic period, it refers (except in commonplace uses) either to a divine manifestation⁴—often very close to epiphaneia (1Tim 6:14; Titus 2:13; 2Tim 4:1, 8) and phanerosis, and even *apokalypsis*⁵—or the formal visit of a sovereign, his “joyous entry” into a city⁶ that honors him as a god (Dittenberger, Syl. 814, 36: “the gods always present at his side to protect and preserve him”). Receiving Demetrius Poliorcetes, the Athenians compare him to Demeter because of the similarity of their names and sing “Like the greatest and best loved gods, they now present themselves to our city (ge polei pareisin); for this auspicious occasion has brought us Demeter and Demetrius together.”⁷ The days of the prince’s sojourn are considered “holy days” (hiera hemera tes epidemias tou Autokratoros Traianou Adrianou kaisaros, I.Did. 254, 10; cf. P.Tebt. 116, 57: en tois [chronois] basileos parousias) and sometimes as marking the beginning of a new age. An inscription from Tegea is dated “the sixty-ninth year of the first parousia of the god Hadrian in Greece” (in BCH, vol. 25, 1901, p. 275). Beginning with the third century BC, there is the parousia of a Ptolemy (P.Petr. II, 39, e 18), then of Ptolemy Philometor and Cleopatra (UPZ 42, 18; cf. 109, 12), of Ptolemy II Soter (P.Tebt. 48, 13), of Ptolemy Philopator (3Macc 3:17), of Germanicus (SB 3924, 34 = Chrest.Wilck., n. 413), and those of Hadrian.⁸

In line with these usages, the NT uses Parousia for the glorious coming of the Lord Jesus at the end of time, his Second Coming.⁹ This return of Christ must somehow be filled out with the pomp and magnificence that characterized royal and imperial “visits.” There were great feasts, panegyreis, including speeches of praise, gifts, games, sacrifices, dedications; statutes and buildings were erected, coins and medallions were struck, sentences were commuted,¹⁰ gold crowns were given (Dittenberger, Or. 332, 26–39), honors were multiplied. Glory and joy on the part of the people were in response to the prince’s active and beneficent presence.¹¹ All of this pales in comparison to the coming of the Pantokrator, but it explains why the NT uses the term parousia.

¹ Jdt 10:18—“the noise of Judith’s presence spread throughout the tents”; 2Macc 15:21—“Maccabeus, considering the presence of these crowds”; 1Cor 16:17—“I rejoice at the presence of Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus”; 2Cor 10:10; Phil 2:12, the contrast ε—ν τῇ παρουσίᾳ ε—ν τῇ ἀπουσίᾳ. Cf. P.Oxy. 903, 15: καὶ ὄμοσεν ε—πὶ παρουσίᾳ τω—ν ε—πισκόπων; 3112, 4: “It is necessary for Pasion to be present”; P.Apoll. 46, 5; 60, 5; BGU 1643, 17; C.P.Herm. 45, 2; P.Mich. 322, 31, 42 (from AD 46); P.Gen. 68, 11, the concluding of a contract ε—πὶ παρουσίᾳ Διδύμου καὶ Παύλου πρεσβυτέρου τῆς αὐτῆς κώμης; P.Mich. 427, 31: “without calling for the presence of the contracting parties”; P.Oxy. 2134, 26; P.Ross.Georg. V, 28, 4; CPR I, 19, 7–8; P.Flor. 332, 5, μὴ ε—κδεχόμενόν σου τὴν παρουσίαν; SB 10311, 3: ἔσχομεν ὑπὲρ παρουσίας κριθῆς (AD 15; cf. 9905, 12; 10200, 26); P.Petaus 46, 3; 47, 3. Cf. Nero ordering the Greeks to meet (literally, be present) at Corinth on November 28, AD 67, παρι—ναι ι—ς Κόρινθον (Dittenberger, Syl. 814, 5).

² Cf. B. Rigaux, Saint Paul: Les Epîtres aux Thessaloniens, Paris-Gembloux, 1956, pp. 197ff. A. Oepke, “παρουσία,” in TDNT, vol. 5, pp. 858–871.

³ 2Macc 8:12—the approach of the army; 2Cor 7:6-7: “God gave us relief through the coming of Titus”; Phil 1:26, Paul’s return; Josephus, Life 90: “having dispatched a courier to let the people of Tiberias know that I was coming”; War 4.345: “the Idumeans began to regret that they had come”; P.Fouad 87, 35: “I kept the messenger here in my service until the arrival of the noble count”; P.Lond. 1913, 8, 12; P.Petaus 47, 3. Numerous papyrological references in N. Lewis, Inventory of Compulsory Services in Ptolemaic and Roman Egypt, New Haven–Toronto, 1968–1975, under this word. P.Oxy. 486, 15: my adversary is absent—my presence is required; 1668, 25: we await your coming; Dittenberger, Syl. 730, 15; Iamblichus, Myst. 2.8: the coming of the angels; Diodorus Siculus 17.8.14; 17.9.1; 17.10.4; 17.48.2; 18.53.1; 17.77.2; etc.

⁴ Inscriptions from Epidaurus: τὰν τε παρουσίαν τὰν αὐτοῦ παρενεφάνιζε ὁ —Ἀσκληπιός (“Asclepius manifested his coming,” third century BC; Dittenberger, Syl. 1169, 34). Diodorus Siculus 4.3.3 mentions the triennial parousia of Dionysos in the Theban mystery cults; Aelius Aristides, Orac. 2.30–32, the parousia of Asclepius Soter. According to Corp. Herm. 1.22; 1.26 A, divinized souls have their parousia as new gods in their divine sphere.

⁵ Cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 3, pp. 15–44.

⁶ A. Deissmann, Light, pp. 368–373; L. Cerfaux, J. Tondriau, Culte des souverains, pp. 422, 448.

⁷ Duris of Samos (Hist. 22, according to Athenaeus 6.62–63; cf. V. Ehrenberg, “Athenischer Hymnus auf Demetrios Poliorketes,” Antike, vol. 7, 1931, pp. 279–297; L. Cerfaux, J. Tondriau, Culte des souverains, p. 182); cf. Iamblichus, Myst. 3.11: “the presence of god shining from on high”; 5.21; Josephus, Ant. 3.80, 203: the storm on Sinai signals the presence of God; 9.55; hymns to Isis, intervening to bring help, cf. SEG VIII, 548, 34; 550, 28. On the helpful presence of the deities, cf. L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 13, pp. 129–131.

⁸ SB 9617; cf. B. A. Van Groningen, “Preparatives to Hadrian’s Visit to Egypt,” in Studi in onore de Calderini, Milan, 1956, vol. 2, pp. 253–256; Chrest. Wilck., n. 412.

⁹ Matt 24:23, 27; 1Thess 2:19; 3:13; 4:15; 5:23; 2Thess 2:1, 8–9; 1Cor 15:23; Jas 5:7–8; 2Pet 1:16; 3:4, 12; 1John 2:28; cf. J. Dupont, L’Union avec le Christ, pp. 49ff. A.L. Moore, The Parousia in the New Testament, Leiden, 1966; K. H. Schelkle, Theologie des Neuen Testaments, Düsseldorf, 1974, pp. 61–78; A. Feuillet, “Parousie,” in DBSup, vol. 6, pp. 1331–1419.

¹⁰ Cf. SB 9316; L. Koenen, Eine ptolemäische Königsurkunde, Wiesbaden, 1957.

¹¹ The documents also attest that these festivities were very expensive. For example, this edict of Germanicus in AD 19: “Having learned that in view of my coming (εἰς τὴν ἐμὴν παρουσίαν) there were requisitions of boats and animals, and that dwellings were taken by force for our lodging, and that private citizens were ill-treated . . .” (Sel.Pap. II, 211); cf. λόγος παρουσίας τῆς βασιλίσσης εἰς τράπεζα (sic) τῆς πόλεως (O.Wilck. II, 1481); Dittenberger, Or. 139, 9 (= SB 8396 = A. Bernand, Philae, n. 19); Syl. 495, 85; P.Tebt. 33; 48, 9: καὶ προσεδρευόντων διὰ τε νυκτὸς καὶ ἡμέρας μέχρι τοῦ τὸ προκείμενον ἐκπληρωσαὶ καὶ τὴν ἐπιγεγραμμένην πρὸς τὴν τοῦ βασιλέως παρουσίαν ἀγοράν; P.Oxy. 1764; O.Bodl. 254, 972, 1504, 1540; SB 6276; 6724; 6992.

παρρησία

parresia, freedom of speech, candor, boldness, public speech, categorical affirmation

parresia, S 3954; TDNT 5.871–886; EDNT 3.45–47; NIDNTT 2.734–737; MM 497; L&N 25.158, 28.29; BDF §§11(1), 198(4), 264(3); BAGD 630–631

This word, a compound of pan and rhema, is specifically Greek; there is no corresponding Hebrew word.¹ It belongs to the literary language and is rather rare in the papyri and the inscriptions.

I. — In Greek literature, the first meaning of parrhesia is political: the right to make one's thoughts known, to say what one will.² It is a citizen's privilege, the sign of his political liberty, characterizing the democratic regime of the polis. The citizen has the right to express his opinions freely in the marketplace.³

This freedom of speech implies the truth of what is said,⁴ so that parrhesia means "candor, straightforwardness"; Demosthenes, 1 Philip. 4.51: "I have laid my thoughts before you without hiding anything, in all candor"; 2 Philip. 6.31: "I am going to speak to you openly (meta parrhesias); I will not conceal anything"; 4 Philip. 10.53–54: "If I must speak the whole truth candidly";⁵ Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 12: "Moses said frankly that he did not speak easily"; 35: "I will hide nothing from you but say to you frankly";⁶ Diogenes: "I am the liberator of men and the physician of their passions. In short, I want to be the prophet of truth and of candor" (aletheias kai parrhesias prophetes einai boulomai, Lucian, Vit. Auct. 8; cf. Dial. Mort. 11.3). Porphyry: "If it is necessary to speak without reticence and with all candor" (ei gar dei meden hyposteilamenon meta parrhesias, Abst. 1.57.1).

To speak candidly, proclaim the truth, and eschew evasions and lies exposes a person to danger (Josephus, Ant. 16.377) and presupposes the overcoming of obstacles; hence the third nuance of parrhesia: "hardiness, courage, audacity, confidence." According to Wis 5:1, "The righteous person stands boldly (en parrhesia) before those who have tormented him";⁷ Philo, Joseph 73: "I will give opinions that are conducive to the common good, even if they are not of such a nature as to please. . . . I leave flattering words to others. In my speeches I will pursue the salutary and the useful. I will distribute praise, warning, or blame without flaunting foolish and misplaced arrogance, but showing, to the contrary, a sober candor" (nephousan parrhesian).

This freedom of language, synonymous with candor (Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 4.3) is sometimes contrasted with timidity or self-consciousness, sometimes with flattery (Dio Chrysostom 32.26–27). It is practiced between friends who are not afraid to blame each other⁸ as well as toward superiors, even tyrants, with whom one must guard one's freedom of speech: "Boldness (eutolmia) and freedom of speech (parrhesia) are admirable virtues when they are addressed opportunely to superiors" (Philo, Heir 5, who cites Menander's Paidion; cf. Stobaeus, Flor. 62.19.19; vol. 4, p. 425). Even the servant, if he knows that he has committed no offense, retains this freedom of speech toward his master (Heir 6); "Famous people grant the humble free speech" (Spec. Laws 4.74); "The man who does not allow anyone in his household to speak freely is a petty tyrant" (Spec. Laws 3.138). Parrhesia does not fear the widest publicity; it proclaims its convictions: "Wisdom raises her voice publicly in the streets" (Prov 1:20); "Let those whose actions benefit all use full freedom of expression; let them go out in public and converse with large crowds" (Philo, Spec. Laws 1.321; Plutarch, De exil. 16).

This parrhesia, which is not confined to speech but includes conduct, does not depend on prejudices and what people will say (Philo, Flacc. 4). It is exalted by the philosophers, especially the Cynics, notably Diogenes, who considers it the best thing that can be found in people (erotetheis ti kalliston en anthropois, epe parrhesia, Diogenes Laertius, 6.2.69; cf. Aelius Aristides 2.401 and the collection of sayings "concerning parrhesia" in Stobaeus, Flor. 3.13; vol. 3, pp. 543ff.); "parrhesia is a completely indispensable good" (Philo, Heir 14); "The freedom of speech of the good man is so great that he dares not only to speak and cry out, but actually to shout out from real conviction and true emotion" (Heir 19). The soul addresses God: "You, master, are my country, my family, my ancestral home; you are my right, my freedom of speech, my abundant wealth" (Heir 27); the soul, "because there is something of divine inspiration in it, expresses itself freely" (Philo, Change of Names 136); an inscription from Pergamum: "He adorned his life with the noblest freedom of speech" (kekosmeke ton autou bion te kalliste parresia, Dittenberger, Or. 323, 10). But we know of the excesses of Diogenes and his disciples, who think that everything is permitted and breach conventions, the proprieties, and even good sense. Parrhesia degenerates into insolence or impudence toward humans and blasphemy toward the gods.⁹ In addition, Philo, who makes a virtue of candor, denounces excess and requires moderation in free speech: this freedom must not be used without respect for neighbor (Heir 29; Dreams 2.83ff.). Joseph addressed the king "with freedom of speech tempered by modesty" (parrhesia syn aidoi, Joseph 107), a candor without impudence (parrhesian ten aneu anaischyntias, Joseph 222); noble souls meet arrogant boasting with candor (Philo, Good Man Free 126). The right measure is hard to determine; on the one hand, one must not speak except with a pure conscience (Spec. Laws 1.203; Josephus, Ant. 2.52, 131) and according to the ties that bind you to your interlocutor;¹⁰ and on the other hand, virtuous parrhesia excludes verbiage with clarity and sobriety.¹¹ The example of Burrus, “who employed great freedom of speech,” is instructive. When Nero asked him a second time about a matter that he had already explained, Burrus replied, “When I have once stated my mind, do not ask me again” (Dio Cassius 62.13). It is this form of parrhesia —categorical affirmation (cf. parrhesiazomai, Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 66)—that the Lord commanded: “Let your speech be yes [if it is yes], no [if it is no]. Anything in addition comes of evil” (Matt 5:37; cf. Jas 5:12).

II. — In the Gospels, parrhesia, always occurring as an adverbial dative (παρρησίᾳ) or in the locution en parrhesia, is used exclusively (except for John 7:13) regarding Jesus, and almost always with the verbs “say, speak”; it has the quite traditional sense of publicness and clarity. Jesus announces his passion “openly” to his disciples (Mark 8:32); “He said to them clearly (without ambiguity)” (John 11:14); “If you are the Christ, tell us frankly” (John 10:24); “The hour is coming when I will not speak to you in parables, but I will speak to you of the father in full clarity” (John 16:25, 29). The nuances of “publicness, freedom,” and even “boldness” are clear: “See, he speaks freely and no one says anything to him” (John 7:26; cf. 7:13); they apply not only to his words but also to his attitude and conduct: “No one does things in secret (en krypto) if he wants to become a public figure” (en parrhesia, out in the open, publicly; John 7:4); “Jesus did not show himself in public among the Jews” (John 11:43). This multiplicity of Johannine usages result neither from chance nor from purely literary considerations; it has a theological intention: the divine revelation is clear and is spread as widely as possible (Isa 45:19; 48:16; Prov 1:20). The Word made flesh announces the word of God with full assurance, is fully in control of its spread despite the opposition and schemes of his opponents, and thus announces it boldly, as a light shines in darkness. Summing up his ministry, he testifies to his divine authenticity on the basis of the fact that his testimony has been fulfilled with parrhesia: “I have spoken to the world publicly (παρρησίᾳ, openly). I always taught in the synagogue and in the temple, where the Jews meet; I have said nothing in secret (en krypto)” (John 18:20).

This courageous freedom of speech, this liberty of language, is still clearer in the Acts of the Apostles, where it becomes an apostolic virtue, with the emphasis being on the frankness of the preacher and thus on the truth of his message. Peter says, “Let me tell you with full assurance . . .” (Acts 2:29). The members of the Sanhedrin are amazed at the boldness of Peter and John, men with no education and no culture (4:13); the church prays the Lord to grant that his servants may speak his word with boldness, despite threats and hostility (4:29, 31). This is what Paul does at Damascus (9:27-28, parrhesiazomenos), at Pisidian Antioch with Barnabas (13:46), at Iconium (14:3), at Ephesus (19:8), and before King Agrippa in person (26:26); likewise Apollos (18:26). The church spreads, thanks to this free proclamation—full of assurance—of the word of truth. Hence the conclusion of Acts: for two years at Rome, Paul taught “with full freedom and without obstacle” (meta pases parrhesias akolytos, 28:31). We could cite Plutarch: “You have hearers . . . who ask only to seek and know the truth, banishing any spirit of dispute and polemic, and granting you to say everything with complete freedom” (syngnomes de panti logo kai parrhesias, De def. or. 38.431 d).

III. — St. Luke’s theology is largely dependent upon that of St. Paul. The latter, from his first epistle, saw his preaching as the expression of a freedom of speech guaranteed by the missionary’s audacious assurance in the midst of direst danger.¹² Alluding to the events of Acts 16:11-40, he writes, “In spite of the sufferings and insults that we had just endured at Philippi, our God gave us the boldness to proclaim the gospel of God to you (eparresiasametha en to theo hemon lalesai pros hymas) amid strong opposition” (1Thess 2:2). The insistence on difficulties, obstacles, and persecutions shows that the point is not simply assurance, but exceptional courage that is not limited to the proclamation of the word but encompasses all of the apostle’s conduct. If he has to summon all his human resources, he is especially strengthened by God’s help; which explains why he was not vulnerable to fear or shame, but on the contrary was full of pride (cf. 2Cor 7:4, kauchesis; cf. Heb 3:6, kauchema). He did not give in to the temptation to falsify his message but was resolved to keep putting out the word no matter what it cost: “Nothing will confound me; to the contrary, I will remain fully assured” (Phil 1:20). This is expressed clearly in 2Cor 3:12—“Having such a hope, we exercise great boldness (polle parresia chrometha), not like Moses, who used to veil his face,” which is glossed by 4:2—“We have set aside all shameful pretense; we do not walk in deception, nor do we distort the word of God. Rather, by the manifestation of the truth we commend ourselves to every human conscience in God’s sight.” God is the giver of this parrhesia, which does not weaken (Eph 3:12) and grants it in answer to prayer (Eph 6:19). Sometimes it is a matter of the candor that one uses with a friend (Phlm 8) or of the broadest possible publicness: “Having despoiled the principalities and powers, Christ put them on display in public (en parrhesia, conspicuously), leading them in his triumphal procession” (Col 2:15). If deacons who carry out their function well “gain much assurance in the faith that is in Christ Jesus” (1Tim 3:13), we can understand that this subordinate office can be exercised with the pride of serving, or with frankness in action, a sort of tranquil audacity that allows bold, unswerving expression of convictions, after the fashion of St. Stephen. It allows one to approach one’s neighbor without any hesitation, not letting oneself be at all discouraged by criticism, taking initiative freely.

IV. — In the Epistle to the Hebrews, parrhesia has become the virtue of every Christian, linked with hope (Heb 3:6), as at 2Cor 3:12, and oriented no longer toward people but toward God, as at Job 27:10—the evildoer cannot address God with assurance (me echei tina parrhesian [Hebrew shadday] enanti autou); but Joshua addresses the Lord boldly.¹³ This is reasoned confidence,¹⁴ a free and easy attitude: purified from sin, Christians can approach the throne of grace in security¹⁵ to receive mercy (Heb 4:16); they are sure to gain entry into the heavenly sanctuary, thanks to the blood of Jesus (10:19). There is no longer any obstacle; this is a right that eliminates hesitation and doubt and justifies boldness. It extends to allowing them to count on a reward: “Do not lose your assurance, which has a great and just reward” (10:35; cf. Dio Chrysostom 34.19—“I fear lest in the end you will abandon your confidence,” dedoika me teleos apobalete ten parrhesian). This certitude of salvation is obviously the product of the theological virtues.

This eschatological parrhesia is that of 1 John: “Abide in him (Christ), so that when he appears we may have assurance (schomen parrhesian) and may not be confounded by him (me aischythomen, dishonored, put to shame; cf. Phil 1:20) at the Parousia” (1John 2:28). “If our heart does not accuse us, we have assurance toward God” (parrhesian echomen pros ton theon, 3:21); “Love is perfected in this, that we have assurance on the day of judgment” (hina parrhesian echomen, 4:7). There is no better guarantee of salvation than a soul filled with love.¹⁶ Agape gives audacious confidence in the most fearful of all situations: the day of judgment, when no one is beyond reproach, and condemnations are without appeal. Love excludes worry and apprehension; it reassures. Johannine parrhesia, then, is always a boldness, consisting of freedom and confidence, that allows one to present oneself before a superior without fear, and also before persecutors or any interlocutor who may contradict or accuse. This same filial confidence is expressed in prayer: “See what assurance we have with him: if we ask anything according to his will, he hears us” (5:14).

¹ In Lev 26:13, “I made you walk with head held high” (ἡγαγον ὑμας μετὰ παρρησίας), the LXX uses this word to translate the Hebrew qômmiyyût, which is a good equivalent but not a translation. To the bibliography on παρρησία given under ε—λίς (above, vol. 1, p. 490, n. 38), add M. Radin, “Freedom of Speech in Ancient Athens,” in AJP, vol. 48, 1927, pp. 215–220; E. Peterson, “Zur Bedeutungsgeschichte von παρρησία,” in Reinhold Seeberg Festschrift, Leipzig, 1929, vol. 1, pp. 283–297; H. Jaeger, “Παρρησία et fiducia: Etude spirituelle des mots,” in SP, vol. 1, Berlin, 1957, pp. 221–239; G. Scarpat, Parrhesia: Storia del termine e delle sue traduzioni in Latino, Brescia, 1964; W. C. van Unnik, Sparsa Collecta, vol. 1, Leiden 1973, pp. 200ff., vol. 2, pp. 269–305; H. Schlier, “παρρησία,” in TDNT, vol. 5, pp. 871–886.

² Isocrates, Ad Nic. 2.28: “Give freedom of speech (δίδου παρρησίαν) to sensible people in order to have counselors for embarrassing matters. Distinguish flatterers from devoted servants”; De Pace 8.14; Euripides, Hipp. 421: “May the sons whom I have brought into the world have a free man’s free speech” (ε—λεύθεροι παρρησία).

³ Demosthenes, 3 Philip. 9.3: “If I tell you several truths frankly, I do not see that you have any reason to be angry about it. You want free speech on every other topic to be the law for everyone in our city”; Plato, Grg. 461 d–e: “Do I not have the right to talk as much as I please? Athens is the place in Greece where speech is freest”; Resp. 8.557 b, in a democratic state, “one is free in such a state, freedom (ε—λευθερία) reigns everywhere, with free speech (παρρησία), the ability to say what one pleases”; Leg. 3.694 b; Aristophanes, Thesm. 541: “Making use of the freedom with which all the women here present may speak”; Polybius 2.38.6: “It would not be possible to find a regime and an ideal of equality, of freedom (παρρησίας)—in a word, of democracy—more perfect than with the Achaeans”; 2.42.3; Epictetus 3.22.96; Musonius 9.

⁴ Stobaeus, Ecl. 4.13 (vol. 3, p. 466, 8): Παρρησίη ἀπὸ γνώμης ε—λευθέρης καὶ ἀληθείην ἀσπαζομένης προέρχεται.

⁵ Demosthenes, C. Aristocr. 23.204: εἰ—δει—μετὰ παρρησίας εἰ—πει—ν τᾶληθῆ; C. Pant. 37.55: “I am going to tell you candidly”; Plato, Chrm. 156 a; PSI 1335, 11, ἵνα μετὰ παρρησίας εἶπω; Prov 10:10—“The one who criticizes candidly gains peace”; Ep. Arist. 125: “friends ready to give useful advice with complete candor”; Josephus, Ant. 15.37: Alexander expresses his indignation frankly; T. Reub. 4.2; Diodorus Siculus 12.63.2: the ambassadors expressed themselves frankly.

⁶ Cf. Plant. 8; Drunkenness 149; Conf. Tongues 165; Prelim. Stud. 151; Good Man Free 95, 125, 152. In a marriage contract, the spouse commits himself freely and faithfully, with parrhesia, cf. R. Taubenschlag, Opera Minora, vol. 1, p. 300.

⁷ 4Macc 10:5—“Terrified by the audacity of these potent words, they cut off his hands and feet” (martyrdom of the third brother); Prov 20:9—“Who would be so bold as to say, ‘I am pure of sin?’”; Philo, Husbandry 64: one must respond bravely”; Good Man Free 150; parrhesia and certitude are linked (Xenophon, Cyr. 5.3.8); prediction through astrology: “Their arrogance will disappear and their property will be confiscated” (ἡ παρρησία αὐτῶ—ν ἀναίρεθήσεται, P.Oxy. 2554, col. II, 5; third century AD).

⁸ Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 9.2.1165a29: “We must grant friends and brothers the right to say everything to us frankly”; Plato, Grg. 487 a–b: “To find out if a soul sees well or ill, there must be three qualities: knowledge, goodwill, and candor. . . . An unfortunate timidity inhibits frank speech”; Lach. 188 e: “I have found Socrates deserving of the most complete freedom of speech.” Sir 6:11—“With those of your household, a friend speaks freely”; Philo, Heir 21: “Parrhesia is from the same family as friendship: to whom will a person speak frankly if not to a friend? . . . Assurance is the distinctive of a friend.” Macro addressed to Gaius “reprimands without dissimulation and in clear terms” (To Gaius 41).

⁹ Isocrates, Bus. 11.40: it is impious to invent legends and believe in them: “We will not say just anything about the gods” (ει—ς τοὺς θεοὺς παρρησίας ὀλιγορήσομεν); Plato, Phdr. 240 e: “unruly impudence of language”; Symp. 222 c: “These words of Alcibiades caused laughter because of their frankness”; Aristotle, Ath. Pol. 16.6: Pisistratus’ amusement at the farmer’s candor. If 1Macc 4:18 allows seizing the plunder boldly, Sir 25:25 commands, “Allow a wicked wife no freedom of speech”; cf. the leprous Uzziah, no longer having the right to speak freely to whomever he wished (Josephus, Ant. 9.226).

¹⁰ Marcus Silanus “had important qualifications for his freedom of speech (to his son-in-law): lofty nobility and relation by marriage” (Philo, To Gaius 63).

¹¹ Contrary to what Plutarch seems to say: “The freedom of speech (ἡ παρρησία) that belongs to a plea for justice gives free rein to pomposity (τὴν μεγαληγορίαν)” (De laude 6.541 d–e).

¹² Cf. A. M. Denis, “L’Apôtre Paul, prophète ‘messianique’ des Gentils,” in ETL, 1957, pp. 249–259.

¹³ Josephus, Ant. 5.38 (Josh 7:7); 2.52—the faithful union of a woman and her husband brings joy, perfect confidence before God and before people (πρὸς τὸν θεὸν παρρησίαν καὶ πρὸς ἀνθρώπους); Job 22:26—“You shall lift up your face toward Eloah” (παρρησιασθήσῃ, hithpael of Hebrew ‘anag).

¹⁴ Παρρησία = confidence, P.Mich. 502, 9 and 12 (the mutual confidence of two brothers, second century AD). Cf. L. Engels, “Fiducia dans la Vulgate: Le Problème de la traduction παρρησία-fiducia,” in Graecitas et Latinitas Christianorum Primaeva: Supplementa, vol. 1, Nijmegen, 1964, pp. 99–141.

¹⁵ Cf. in the sixth century P.Fouad 86, 9 and 16: “If the said person finds an audience (εὔρη παρρησίαν) with the most eminent general and consul.”

¹⁶ Cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 3, pp. 292ff. P. Althaus, “Liebe und Heilsgewißheit bei Martin Luther: I Joh. IV, 7 a in der Auslegung Luthers,” in Festgabe J. Lortz, Baden-Baden, 1958, vol. 1, pp. 69–84. We may recall that parrhesia is set in relation with the Holy Spirit (Acts 4:8, 13, 31; cf. 2:4, 29; 18:25-26; 1John 3:21, 24), who guarantees the truth of the apostles’ witness.

πειθαρχέω

peitharchoo, to obey, be persuaded, comply willingly

see also εἰ—σακούω, ε—πακούω, ὑπακούω, ὑπακοή; πείθω, πείθομαι, πειθός, πεισμονή, πεποίθησις

peitharchoo, S 3980; TDNT 6.9–10; EDNT 3.62; NIDNTT 3.588–589; MM 500; L&N 36.12; BDF §187(6); BAGD 638–639

Normally construed with the dative case, but in Hellenistic Greek sometimes with the genitive,¹ this verb is ordinarily translated “obey,” and it is indeed true that in the literature, the papyri, and the inscriptions it often refers to strict obedience: of rulers to God,² servants to their masters,³ princes to their fathers (Josephus, War 1.454: to patri panta peitharchein), women to their husbands,⁴ private citizens or officials to their superiors,⁵ peoples to their conqueror.⁶ But on the one hand, there are different nuances with these different instances of submission; and on the other hand the proper verb for obedience in the NT is hypakouo, and the peculiar nuance of peitharchoo, which is not strictly synonymous with it, must be maintained. When during the storm St. Paul says, “You should have listened to me (peitharchesantas moi) and not left Crete” (Acts 27:21), he does not mean strict submission but voluntary consent. Similarly, when God gives the Holy Spirit “to those who are obedient to him” (tois peitharchousin auto, Acts 5:32), this expression means not so much those who remain flawlessly faithful as those who accept his word, submit gladly to his will and his inspiration, and conform to his providential arrangements. This meaning of peitharchoo—let oneself be persuaded, willingly comply with a rule—is well attested in literary texts and inscriptions: “It is necessary for the learner to be submissive to the orders of virtue” (tois parangelmasin aretes peitharchein, Philo, Prelim. Stud. 63); “to give complete obedience to things that are ordered for the common good” (peitharchein de pantos tois hyper tou koine sympherontos epitattomenois, I.Magn. 114, 8; cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 22, 7).

This consent or willingness to fall in with a given arrangement, to adapt to the requirements of an institution, given the nuance of St. Peter's famous principle: peitharchein dei theo mallon e anthropois (Acts 5:29), is ordinarily translated "It is necessary to obey God rather than men" (cf. Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.293: "What is more just than obeying the laws," peitharchein tois nomois; Marcus Aurelius 5.9: "You submit to reason"). But Peter and John had said (Acts 4:19), "Whether it is just before God to listen to you (akouein) rather than God, judge for yourselves." Thus it is less a matter of material obedience than of recognizing authority, of submitting clearly and willingly to this or that hierarchy.

It seems that in Titus 3:1 peitharcho retains the sense of strict, concrete obedience—"Remind them to be in submission to the constituted powers and authorities, to obey, to be ready for every good work"—but the linking of hypotassomai and peitharcho enriches the latter verb with the meaning of the former: Christians, in submitting to the authorities, accept their subordinate position, consent to a social and political order, observe the norms of a public institution. Their obedience is not only faithfulness to the laws, but respect and a sort of loyalty toward a power that they are persuaded is legitimate.⁷ In this sense of the word, the attitude of the wise person toward Nature will be "a feeling of submission (peitharchon) and goodwill" (Marcus Aurelius 10.14).

¹ Cf. E. Nachmanson, "Die Konstruktionen von πειθαρχει—ν in der κοινή," in Eranos, 1910, pp. 201–203.

² Dan 7:27—"All dominions will be in submission to him and will obey him" (ὑποταγήσονται καὶ πειθαρχήσουσιν αὐτῷ— in the LXX, but in Theodotion δουλεύσουσιν καὶ ὑπακούσονται).

³ Sir 33:29; cf. Menander, Dysk. 370: ἔτοιμος πάντα πειθαρχει—ν, "I am ready to obey in everything."

⁴ In marriage contracts: δει— πειθαρχει—ν γαμετήν γυναι—κα ἀνδρός (P.Oxy. 265, 13, first century AD); "Apollonia will live with Philiscos and be obedient to him as wife to husband" (P.Tebt. 104, 14; first century BC); πειθαρχοῦσα αὐτῷ— ὡς προσήκει (P.Tebt. 974, 2; second century BC; Philo, Creation 167). In Philo, the verb πειθαρχέω is sometimes used for obedience in the strict sense of the word: of cows to the cowherd (Dreams 2.152; Moses 2.61), of members of the body (Spec. Laws 3.177), of humans to the laws of nature (Spec. Laws 1.306), to the commandments of the law (ibid. 1.153; 3.38; 4.150; Virtues 94), to kings and rulers (Abraham 226; Spec. Laws 2.234; 3.163; To Gaius 69), to a father's orders (Drunkenness 35; Joseph 12), to God (Flight 99; Virtues 63). But the idea is less obedience under compulsion than voluntary submission, acceptance, and docility: “to hear’ is the most precise term for acquiescence, obedience” (Prelim. Stud. 68), as with Agrippa following his master’s advice (Flacc. 26; cf. Good Man Free 54), or the great voluntarily submitting to custom (Change of Names 104). In this sense, one must “submissively obey the directives of reasonable good sense and of education” (ibid. 206), defer to the commands of reason (Moses 1.26; Good Man Free 47), and above all submit to the requirements of virtue (Drunkenness 16; Prelim. Stud. 2, 63, 64, 176; Spec. Laws 4.95–96; Moses 1.329). Being submissive and obedient is the opposite of being stubborn (Change of Names 115).

⁵ Philo, Moses 1.164, 329. Athens in the third century BC, honors the taxiarchoi who “under all circumstances never failed to obey the orders of the *stratego*i, conforming to the laws” (SEG XIV, 17); a century later, the founding regulation of Eumenes II of Pergamum provides that “when the leaders shall have designated the people who are of age to run, if one of them does not wish to obey although he has the strength to do so, he shall be liable to a fine” (Fouilles de Delphes III, 3; 238, 17); in the same period, a regulation concerning the functions and duties of the astynomoi of Pergamum: “if the private citizens do not obey, the astynomoi shall put the works in litigation” (Dittenberger, Or. 483, 70 = SEG XIII, 521, 82); P.Panop.Beatty 1, 211: π.τοι—ς κελευσθι—σι; P.Oxy. 2476, 12: οι—ἀγωνοθέται πιθαρχήσουσιν (third century AD).

⁶ Polybius 3.4.3: “All recognize the necessity henceforth of obeying the Romans and submitting to their will” (Ῥωμαίων ἀκούειν καὶ τούτοιθ πιταρχει—ν ὑπὲρ τω—ν παραγγελλομένων).

⁷ Cf. King Antiochus III: “If he bids (παρακαλῆ) someone carry out some action regarding his office, let those who belong to the sanctuaries and the others who owe him obedience (καὶ τοὺς ἄλλους οὓς καθήκει πιθαρχει—ν αὐτοῦ) assist him. Certify that we order people to conform (ὑπακούειν) to all that he shall prescribe or order” (IGLS 992, 38).

πεῖθω, πείθομαι, πειθός, πεισμονή, πεποίθησις peitho, to (try to) persuade; peithomai, to be persuaded; peithos, persuasive; peismone, persuasion, influence; pepoithesis, confidence, assurance, boldness see also πειθαρχέω

peitho, S 3982; TDNT 6.1–9; EDNT 3.63; NIDNTT 1.588–593; MM 500–501; L&N 25.166, 31.82, 33.301; BDF §§101, 159(1), 187(6), 322, 341,

392(1e), 397(2); BAGD 639 | peithomai, TDNT 6.1–9; EDNT 3.63–64; NIDNTT 1.587–593; L&N 31.46, 36.12, 36.34; BAGD 639–640 | peithos, S 3981; TDNT 6.8–9; EDNT 3.63; NIDNTT 1.588, 592; MM 500; L&N 33.304; BDF §§47(4), 112, 474(4); BAGD 639 | peismone, S 3988; TDNT 6.9; EDNT 3.67; NIDNTT 1.588, 591–592; MM 502; L&N 33.303; BDF §§ 109(6), 488(1b); BAGD 641 | pepoithesis, S 4006; TDNT 6.7–8; EDNT 3.70; MM 503; L&N 31.82; BDF § 68; BAGD 643

The basic meaning of the verb peitho (conative), peithomai is “persuade, be persuaded,”¹ in whatever fashion: better if by reasoning and entreaty,² worse if by money or violence. It runs the whole gamut of nuances, from “convince, accept, believe,” to “conform, submit, give in, obey.”

All these meanings are found already in Homer, where peitho in the active and transitive sometimes means “persuade”: “Priam was not able to persuade the soul of Hector” (Homer, Il. 22.78); “I will persuade him to fight you face to face.”³ Sometimes it is in the middle: “admit, trust”; “without admitting yet (epeitheto) that it was indeed his father” (Od. 16.192); Athena to Ulysses: “humans place their confidence in weak friends” (20.45); “I am still too young to count on my arm.”⁴ The perfect expresses persistence in a state of confidence: “The young have confidence in their own strength” (Il. 4.325). Hence “hear and believe”: oude me peiseis = “I will not listen to you” (Il. 1.132; 6.360; 9.345); Zeus to Thetis: “so you will believe me” (pepoithes, 1.524); Athena to Ulysses: “Perhaps you will believe me” (Od. 13.344); “Thus spoke Athena, and the poor fool believed her” (peithen, Il. 4.104). To be convinced and believe is finally to obey: “How can an Achaean readily obey your orders?” (peithetai, Il. 1.150; cf. 79); “Son of Atreus, the Argive army will obey your voice above all others.”⁵

According to varying contexts, peitho can mean to convince others (Od. 14.123), to change someone’s mind (1.43; cf. Xenophon, An. 3.1.26), and notably to appease: “Let us think how to calm him, to convince him with friendly gifts, with soothing words” (pepithomen, Il. 9.112; Od. 3.146: he flattered himself that he appeased the goddess). The verb can mean “accept an invitation” (Od. 17.177) as well as “submit” (Il. 23.645) and “dupe” (Od. 2.106), but it also suggests the idea of stimulating, setting in motion: “persuading the storm-winds with the help of the north wind” (pepithousa thyellas, Il. 15.26).

In the classical period, the meanings of certitude and belief are well established, especially with the perfect.⁶ “I am sure (pepeismai) that Protagoras will have no trouble elucidating” the difficulty (Plato, Prt. 328 e); “I am sure (pepoitha) that for him the lightning will come, bringing fire.”⁷ Of course, “persuade, convince” remains the basic meaning.⁸ “Sostratus sought to persuade the brother” (Menander, Dysk. hyp. 6); “The law defends him against compulsion (to biasasthai); his character defends him against persuasion (to peisai)” (Dysk. 254); “you who think of persuading a free young woman to sin” (Dysk. 290). So also the meaning “obey.” “They thought that the other Milesians would obey” (Herodotus 5.29; cf. 33); “for seven days they obeyed and did as ordered” (6.12); “we should obey him.”⁹ But our verb is not synonymous with hypakouo, first of all because it denotes following advice, giving in to reasons, taking an opinion into account,¹⁰ giving a favorable hearing; one draws inspiration¹¹ and conforms to it (Xenophon, An. 7.3.39), gives one’s approval (An. 5.6.29) or does as asked (Pindar, Pyth. 1.59; Hesiod, Th. 474). Finally, having been won over by persuasion (pepeismenos, Xenophon, An. 7.2.12), one decides,¹² and—this is the second point—it is a voluntary commitment to action, like a stimulus to participate in an undertaking.

Given the importance of personal conviction in the person from whom one wishes to obtain something, we can understand that Aristotle should have posed the question, “Must one obey one’s father in everything?” (Eth. Nic. 9.2.1164b22–23). He replies that one need not grant one’s father everything any more than one sacrifices everything to Zeus.¹³ Musonius also asks himself whether to obey in everything (panta peithesthai, frag. 16) and answers that one cannot submit to unjust or shameful commands: “He is obedient who listens to the voice of obligation and follows it assiduously.” One must obey Zeus, whose law ordains that people should be virtuous; so one must discern whether paternal orders are good, honest, and beneficent.

In the inscriptions, the meaning “persuade” is predominant from the fourth century BC on. The constitutive decree of the second Athenian confederation (377 BC) prescribes: “The people shall immediately appoint three delegates who shall go to Thebes to persuade (peisousi) the Thebans to act for the best.”¹⁴ But there is also the meaning “accord, consent” in the lease of a garden by the coreligionists (orgeones) of the physician Hero: “if a cordial understanding (peithei) comes about with Charops and the orgeones.”¹⁵ Then there is “convince” in the honorific decree of Istrus for Agathocles around 200 BC: “He convinced (epeise) the barbarians to do our city no harm”; “For six hundred chrysoi, he convinced Zoltes and the Thracians not to invade the territory”; “He convinced King Rhemaxus to give us five hundred horsemen for our defense.”¹⁶ Finally, there is “drag along, lead”: “as far as possible, without letting himself be dragged along by the one who has just breached (the texts written on the stele).”¹⁷

The papyri add hardly any new shades of meaning,¹⁸ but the frequency of the occurrences confirms the classical meanings while nuancing them, notably in Zeno’s correspondence: pepeismai = “I am persuaded.”¹⁹ To be persuaded is to be convinced and have confidence:²⁰ pithontos soi = having confidence in you (SB 7354, 5; cf. line 8: “look, do not trust,” blepe, me pisthes), rely on (P.Fouad 26, 41) and believe (SB 4630, 6), and finally being in accord (P.Oxy. 2562, 11: episthemen pros heautous), “agree, give one’s consent.” This is how the verb is often used in contracts where one subscribes to what is written or to what has been read: “with this agreement, with whom they also consent after reading it” (te homologia taute, hois kai ex anagnoseos pepismenoi eisin, P.Mich. 322 a 37; a division of property in AD 46; cf. lines 39, 43–47); “because I consent to it as it stands” (dia to pepeisthai me kathos prokitai).²¹ Not only does one attest to one’s good faith (“confidently without any guile,” pepeismenos pantos dolou choris, BGU 2203, 13; “willing and in agreement, without force or deception,” hekon kai pepeismenos aneu bias kai apates, P.Köln 157, 11); but this freely given consent is elaborated upon (“willing and in agreement, out of a self-chosen decision,” SB 8988, 49; 9586, 9; 9763, 25; “we think it good and we agree,” eudokoumen kai peithometha),²² with full knowledge of the facts (“we know and agree,” oidamen kai pepismetha, P.Oxy. 1868, 2). The meaning thus confirmed is a guarantee (“I will confirm and I agree to everything as it is set down,” bebaioso kai pithomai pasi hos prokeitai, PSI 1239, 23). Hence the meaning to obey, submit, be ready to carry out a certain decision or conform to given instructions.²³ In Apokrimata 56 (p. 7), we may translate the imperative peithou either “obey” or “execute” (cf. 12; SB 9526, 12 and 56).

For their part, the prefects or *epistratego*i use the euphemism pepeismai to express (in the repression of an abuse) their confidence in their subjects’ obedience to their decrees. For example, Tiberius Julius Alexander: “I am persuaded that in the future no one will any longer recruit farmers or tenants by force.”²⁴

With the LXX, the verb peitho takes on an entirely different tone. The meaning “persuade” is rare and late,²⁵ and “believe” is exceptional: “I believe (pepeismai) all that the prophet Jeremiah says.”²⁶ Rather, this verb almost always corresponds to the Hebrew batah or one of its derivatives and thus expresses confidence (Deut 28:52; Judg 9:26; 18:10, 27). But one can put one’s trust either in false supports or in the true God:²⁷ “What is the meaning of this confidence in which you trust?”²⁸ The faith of Israel is to put its trust in Yahweh,²⁹ which means relying on him (2Chr 14:10, niphal of the Hebrew sha’an; 16:7-8; Isa 10:20; 17:7) or taking shelter under his wings.³⁰ To have this confidence is to feel secure; also, the Hebrew labetah, Greek pepoithos, means that one dwells, lives, or walks in security;³¹ that is, one rests in quiet tranquility.³²

The Letter of Aristeas asks, “What is the end of eloquence?” and answers, “to persuade the adversary (to peisai ton antilegonta) . . . persuasion comes about by the power of God.”³³ Philo often gives the verb the meaning “persuade”³⁴ or “be convinced,” for example, of the existence of the Most High God,³⁵ but he is far from being the writer who uses it most often in the sense “obey”: Cherub. 9: “to obey virtue is fine”; Alleg. Interp. 1.95: “the man obeyed God’s counsels” (Abraham 252, 256); Drunkenness

33: “submit as a child does to its parents”; Dreams 2.24, 108: “a servant, I learned to obey them as masters.”³⁶

In the whole literature, it is the writings of Josephus that use this word most abundantly (nearly five hundred occurrences), obviously in rather varied meanings. “Persuade” and “convince” are predominant,³⁷ but with multiple nuances, because if no one consents and surrenders easily (War 1.32, 144, 254; Life 149; Ag. Apion 2.117, 153), others refuse their consent³⁸ and ingenious ways must be devised to gain it (Ant. 4.251; 7.172; Ag. Apion 2.200–201), being confident of success: “I will persuade Caesar” (War 2.201) and bringing proofs (Ant. 8.48). It is with words, speeches, and arguments that one succeeds in convincing.³⁹ Sometimes it is a matter of mere opinion,⁴⁰ sometimes advice,⁴¹ or requests (Ant. 20.121, 135, 142, 145, 161), even attempts to entice (War 1.274; Ant. 2.41, 50) or finally incite to action (Life 190) and hence “convince”;⁴² from there, one may urge, charge, or order.⁴³

The shades of variation with the meanings “accept” or “submit” are just as varied: one may be influenced (Ant. 5.243, 269, 315), respond to an invitation (5.168), give in to opinions or requests,⁴⁴ consent,⁴⁵ give one’s accord (Ant. 5.172; 20.32; Life 151), follow advice that is given.⁴⁶ Often, however, it is obedience in the strict sense and submission that is intended: the young must obey their elders (Ant. 3.47); one obeys God, the law and lawmakers (1.41, 190; 2.287; 5.152; 6.131, 136; Ag. Apion 2.162), the words of prophets (Ant. 9.51, 59, 267; 10.105), priests (Ag. Apion 2.194), officials (Ant. 14.232), justice (17.316), an edict (19.314), orders.⁴⁷

Finally, peitho has the meaning “put one’s confidence in, trust” (War 5.369; 6.348) promises, wealth or arms, numbers, persons.⁴⁸ One is “proud (pepoithos) of one’s tall and handsome figure” (War 2.57) or the influence of one’s father-in-law (1.447); but above all one must count on God’s help.⁴⁹ The NT, especially St. Paul, retained all this richness of meaning.

When transitive (in the present, the imperfect, and the aorist), conative peitho means “want or try to persuade.” At Caesarea, King Agrippa says to Paul, “You want to persuade me to become a Christian.”⁵⁰ Defining his ministry, the apostle declares, “Knowing (eidotes) what the fear of the Lord is, we try to persuade people”;⁵¹ but in the language of St. Luke, the verb has a technical meaning: “try to convince”⁵² an audience to act, to adopt a certain way of life, to “persevere in God’s grace.”⁵³ At Ephesus, the silversmith Demetrius noted that in almost all of Asia, the apostle had convinced and won over (peisas) a considerable crowd everywhere he preached (Acts 19:26). With regard to individuals, where the giving of opinions and advice is concerned, persuasion brings appeasement. The princes of the priests say to the guards at Jesus’ tomb: “If the matter reaches the ears of the procurator, we ourselves will appease him.”⁵⁴ Thanks to love shown in action, “we know that we are of the truth, and before him we will set our hearts at rest (peisomen),”⁵⁵ we will convince it even while it is making accusations against us.

In the perfect and the pluperfect (with epi, eis, en plus the dative), peitho has the meaning, so common in the LXX and in Philo, of “have confidence, trust.”⁵⁶ In the parable about the expulsion of demons, the stronger one takes away from the vanquished the panoply in which he had placed his confidence.⁵⁷ It is assurance, like that of those who are sure that they are righteous (tous pepoithotas hoti, perfect participle) and scorn others (Luke 18:9), whereas they ought to place their confidence in God and God’s mercy.⁵⁸ This confidence, then, is certitude: “I give thanks, being sure of this (pepoithos auto touto): the one who has begun this excellent work in you will carry it through to completion on the day of Christ Jesus” (Phil 1:6); “To remain in the flesh is more necessary for your sake. In this certitude I know that I am going to remain with you all” (1:25; cf. 2:24). If the apostle’s confidence is so strong, it is because it is founded on the Lord,⁵⁹ but he also uses the perfect pepoitha as the papyri do, where a superior (diplomatically or pedagogically) expresses his conviction or desire that those subject to him will be obedient: “I am persuaded in the Lord that you will not think otherwise.”⁶⁰ The nuances of the middle and passive voices are varied; sometimes falling into line with an opinion,⁶¹ following a suggestion,⁶² expressing a more or less strongly held opinion;⁶³ sometimes, in fact usually, expressing an absolute conviction, faith in the literal sense: the brothers of the wicked rich man would not be persuaded even if they saw a dead person resurrected;⁶⁴ the people were convinced that John the Baptist was a prophet (20:6—pepeismenos estin, perfect passive participle). After St. Paul’s sermons at Thessalonica and at Rome, Luke notes that some were persuaded (= believed) and others did not believe.⁶⁵ Here again the apostle uses the perfect to express pedagogical optimism that is respectful and stimulating for his superiors: “I am persuaded (pepeismai) regarding you, brothers, that you are yourselves full of goodwill, having all knowledge, capable of admonishing each other.”⁶⁶ But when he speaks of his conviction in his faith, Paul’s certitude is as complete as it is well-founded: “I am sure (pepeismai) that neither death nor life . . . will be able to separate us from the love of God.”⁶⁷

Finally, the meaning “obey” is evident in Heb 13:17—“obey your leaders and be in submission” (present middle imperative, peithesthe tois hegoumenois hymon)—and in Jas 3:3—“We put bits in horses’ mouths so that they will obey us.” One obeys the truth (Gal 5:7) or unrighteousness (Rom 2:8); that is to say, one conforms to certain moral principles, submits to and remains faithful to their requirements, just as one joins with, is won over by certain persons (Acts 4:36-37, epeithonto, imperfect middle).

Peithos. — This adjective, corresponding to the classical pithanos, “persuasive,” is not only a biblical hapax, but is not attested elsewhere in Greek: “My speech and my preaching (have) not (consisted) of persuasive words of wisdom, but in demonstration of Spirit and of power.”⁶⁸ We must interpret this as meaning that faith is based not on the philosophy, rhetoric, logic, or wisdom of preachers who are able to entice minds, but on the public and incontestable (apodictic) testimony of the Hebrew, who manifests himself (pneumatōs, genitive of cause) in the assurance and the power inspired in preacher and hearers alike. It is the contrast between human discourse, demonstrative reason on the one hand, and on the other omnipotent outpourings or exhibitions of the Holy Spirit reaching the heart.

Peismone. — This noun does not appear in Greek before the biblical hapax in Gal 5:8. Before saying, “I am persuaded (pepoitha) regarding you...” (5:10) and after having asked, “Who has hindered you from obeying (peithesthai) the truth?” the apostle goes on, “This peismone is not from the one who calls you.” We can take the noun in a passive sense as referring to a new conviction of the Galatians, of which they have recently been persuaded; but more likely it has the active sense of a suggestion that cannot come from God, referring to the Judaizing preachers who must have inclined the Galatians to abandon Paul’s gospel. Thus peismone would have a pejorative meaning: a bad influence. This can still be detected in Ignatius of Antioch: “Christianity is not a work of persuasion but a work of power” (Ign. Rom. 3.3; quoted in the sixth century, P.Lond. 1674, 36).

Pepoithesis. — A late coinage from the perfect pepoitha, and unknown in the papyri, this substantive is a hapax in the LXX: “What is the meaning of this confidence (Hebrew bittahôn; cf. Isa 36:4; Eccl 9:4) in which you trust” (2Kgs 18:19); and in Philo: “Counting on the virtues of their ancestors” (Philo, Virtues 226); but Josephus uses it six times in the sense of assurance or boldness (regarding a quarrel, Ant. 11.299); of confidence in oneself (19.317), in one’s strength (1.73), in arms or money (3.45); it can be inspired by someone else’s attitude (5.74) or by God (apo tou theou, 10.16). One depends or relies on a dynamis. St. Paul is the only NT author to use this term (four times in 2Cor, out of a total of six)—which is very close to parrhesia. Usually it refers to his own personal confidence.

(a) Confidence in people. The apostle, henceforth certain of the Corinthians’ respect for him and the good welcome that they will give him, decided in this assurance (taute te pepoithesei) to go to see them (2Cor 1:15). In the meanwhile, he sends a brother to them to gather the collection; and this brother is all the more zealous because he has great confidence in them (pepoithesei polle te eis hymas), confidence gained either on his own visits to Corinth or from Titus’s accounts (2Cor 8:22). One can also depend on human advantages, Israelite privileges: a Hebrew, son of a Hebrew, Paul would have reason to put his confidence in the flesh (Phil 3:4—kaiper ego echon pepoithesin kai in sarki).

(b) One can also depend on God: Jesus Christ, “in whom we have boldness and access with confidence through faith in him” (en ho echomen ten parrhesian kai prosagogen en pepoithesei dia tes pisteos autou, Eph 3:12). Assurance and confidence bring access to God; they come from faith in the power and love of God, which make it possible to draw near to him. One is sure of being welcomed.

(c) This assurance is a personal feeling produced in the heart by Christ: “We have such assurance (pepoithesin toiouten echomen) through Christ before God” (2Cor 3:4). Paul’s confidence in the efficacy of his ministry is not an illusion, not vainglory, not presumption; it is based solidly on the certitude that a tree is recognized by its fruits. What is more, this certitude is produced in him by Christ in person. Much more than that, it is true and authentic in God’s presence, which means that it is valid and in line with God’s own judgment. Hence the apostolic authority and even boldness which Paul does not hesitate to put into play against his detractors (2Cor 10:2).

¹ S. Schulz, Die Wurzel πειθ- (πιθ-), Fribourg, 1952: “The transitive active is perhaps secondary” (P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique, p. 868); cf. F. M. Abel, Grammaire, 18, n, p; B. Mandilaras, Verb, 209, 802.

² Sophocles, OC 520: “Grant it (πειθου), for I myself granted your entreaty.” Πειθώ is the goddess Persuasion. “August Persuasion” (Hesiod, Op. 73; Th. 349); “The Athenians accompanied by two great deities, Persuasion and Compulsion” (Πειθώ τε καὶ —Αναγκαίην, Herodotus 8.11); “to help their mother, behold Desire (Πόθος) and the enchantress Persuasion (Πειθοι—), who has never been refused” (Aeschylus, Suppl. 1040; cf. Ag. 385); Alcman in Plutarch, De fort. Rom. 4.318 b; Menander, Epit. 338; Philo, Post. Cain 45; Nonnus, Dion. 3.95; O. Guéraud, P. Jouguet, Un Livre d’écolier du IIIe s. av. J.-C., Cairo, 1938, p. 34, line 212; a dedication to Πειθοι— at Paros (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1938, p. 450, n. 289), at Cnidos (ibid., 1954, p. 165, n. 228), at Cos (ibid., 1967, p. 522, n. 434).

³ Homer, Il. 22.223; 9.587: “He did not persuade his heart in his chest”; 9.184: “that they may without too much difficulty persuade the proud soul of Aeacides.”

⁴ Od. 16.71 (perfect πέποιθα); 21.132; cf. Pindar, Pyth. 10.100: “I put my trust in the kind hospitality of Thorax”; Homer, Od. 16.98: “the support that one expected from a brother” (πέποιθε); Il. 13.96: “Young warriors of Argos, I have confidence in you”; Aeschylus, Cho. 237: “Trust in your valor (πεποιθῶς); you shall recover your father’s palace.”

⁵ Il. 23.157; 16.171: rowers must obey their commanders; “Let us obey the black night and prepare our evening meal” (πειθόμεθα, 8.502; 9.65); “I think I know someone who will not obey” (οὐ πείσεσθαι, 1.289). Ulysses: “Do you think that I am of such an age as to remain in the huts, obeying a superior’s orders in everything?” (πιθέσθαι, Od. 17.21).

⁶ Herodotus 9.88: “They were persuaded (ε—πεποίθησαν) that with money they would pull through”; Sophocles, Aj. 769: “I am quite sure (πέποιθα) of winning the glory”; Aeschylus, Eum. 826, Athena: “I rely on Zeus” (κἀγὼ πέποιθα Ζηνί).

⁷ Aeschylus, Sept. 444; Euripides, Hipp. 1251: “I will never be able to believe that your son is wicked”; Andr. 870: πεισθεῖς λόγοις = trusting the words; Plato, Ap. 25e: “You will not get me to believe it, or anyone else in the world”; Prt. 338 a; Herodotus 1.8, 126; Xenophon, Oec. 20.15.

⁸ Plato, Resp. 1.327 c: “Would you be able to convince people who do not want to hear?”; 2.364 b; Phdr. 271 c; Grg. 453 a: “Rhetoric is a worker of persuasion”; Aeschylus, Eum. 724: Apollo persuaded the Parci to make humans immortal; Xenophon, An. 7.6.9: “After persuading us, they brought us here with our consent”; Cyr. 6.1.34: Araspas asks whether Cyrus “is capable of persuading such a woman”; Hier. 1.16, Simonides to Hiero, “a thing of which you could not persuade anyone”; Sophocles, Phil. 624: “I will allow myself to be persuaded after I am dead”; Thucydides 3.70.1: they knew how to persuade them to bring over Corcyra to Corinth; 3.75.1: “Nicostratus persuaded the Corcyreans to come to an agreement”; 3.31.1: “These words could not convince Alcibiades” (οὐκ ἔπειθε).

⁹ Plato, Leg. 4.714 b, πείθεσθαι; Ap. 29 d: “I will obey the god rather than you” (πείσομαι δὲ μα—λλον τω— θεω— ἢ ὑμι—ν); Menex. 248 a: “He will obey the proverb fully”; Sophocles, Ant. 67, Ismene: “I intend to obey the powers that be”; Phil. 1252: “Even if you use force, I do not intend to obey”; Pindar, Nem. 8.10; Ol. 13.79; Aeschylus, Cho. 297: “One cannot disobey such oracles” (χρησμοί—ς πεποιθέναι); Xenophon, Cyr. 1.2.8: “Children are taught to obey their officials . . . whom the elders obey blindly.” Diodorus Siculus 4.31.5: “Hercules, forced to obey the oracle.”

¹⁰ Herodotus 6.100: “The Athenians followed (πείθονται) the advice of Aeschines”; 7.144: “On the advice of the god (τω— θεω— πειθομένου), the Athenians resolved to stand up to the barbarian”; Aeschylus, PV 1014: “If my reasons cannot convince you” (πεισθῆς λόγοις); 1063: “Give opinions that can convince me”; Cho. 781: “I will go and I will follow your advice” (πείσομαι λόγοις); Sophocles, OC 1442, Antigone to Polynices: “Give in to me (ε—μοὶ πιθοῦ)—do not urge me to do what must not be done (μὴ πει—θ ἄ μὴ δεῖ—)”; Xenophon, Hell. 6.5.16: people urge (ἔπειθον) Agesilaus to attack separately. Menander, Dysk. 712: “None of you can make me change my mind about it” (μεταπει—σαι).

¹¹ Thucydides 2.2.4: “Rather than listening to those who had called them in (οὐκ ε—πειθόντο) . . . they decided . . .”; 6.33.1: “Not only do they not listen (οὐ πείθουσιν), but one is thought to be mad”; Menander, Dysk. 38: “The young woman inspired in us (πέπεικεν) a certain kind regard for herself.”

¹² Herodotus 1.163: “The Phocaeans did not let themselves be persuaded” (οὐκ ἔπειθε); 8.134: Mys convinced a man of Lebadeia whom he paid to go down into the cave of Trophonius (μισθω— πείσας); Lysias 21.10: “giving him the price, I hired Phantias as pilot”; Plato, Euthd. 272 c, Socrates to Crito: “I had already persuaded (πέπεικα) others to become my fellow disciples, and I will try to persuade even more to follow me here”; Euripides, Med. 982: “The veil’s charm and heavenly beauty will persuade her to put it on”; Sophocles, Phil. 901; Xenophon, An. 1.3.19: “Either he must persuade us to follow or we must convince him to send us back on friendly terms”; 5.1.14; Polybius 4.64.2.

¹³ P.Hercul. 176. In this same papyrus, a letter of Epicurus to an orphaned child says, “It is good for you to obey your grandfather and grandmother in everything (πάντα πείθη). . . . They all love you because you obey them in everything (ὅτι τούτοις πείθη πάντα,” lines 10 and 14; republished by G. Milligan, Selections from the Greek Papyri, Cambridge, 1927, p. 6). Cf. P.Ryl. 77, 34: πειθόμενος τῇ ε—μαυτοῦ πατρίδι.

¹⁴ J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. 27, 74. Cf. 33, 4, regarding the sale of citizenship in the third century: since the administrative assembly of the city has to vote according to the reasons explained for the admission of new citizens, it is provided that these will “enter into the patre (a tribe of the Thasians) that they persuade.” At Daphne, “We have appointed him high priest of these sanctuaries, being persuaded (πεπεισμένοι) that their administration will be seen to in a full and satisfactory fashion” (Dittenberger, Or. 244, 29 = IGLS, n. 992). In the hymn to Isis from the first century BC: “You persuade the Nile, which rolls gold along, and you bring it back to the Egyptian soil each season” (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 175, col. II, 17 = SB 8139, 17). The epitaph of the euergetes (“benefactor”) Apollonius in the second century BC: “believe me” (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques 6, 22 = SEG VII, 768 = SB 8230).

¹⁵ NCIG, n. 27, 22 (fourth century BC). In the dedication of the Moschion to Osiris: σαφω—ς ε—ρει—ς πεισθεῖς ε—μοῖς (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 108, 40 = SB 8026), we may interpret “surely you will say with me,” i.e., in accord with my voice.

¹⁶ NCIG, n. VI, 19, 31, 50, 55.

¹⁷ Dittenberger, Syl. 142, 24: a pact between Athens and Chios (fourth century BC).

¹⁸ Moulton-Milligan notes the parallels of peitho as a conative present, “Apply persuasion,” “seek to persuade,” as in Acts 26:28, the corresponding aorist ἔπεισα in P.Tor. 1, col. VIII, 36 = UPZ 162; BGU 164, 26; P.Oxy. 294, 22. For the second perfect πέποιθα with the dative, BGU 1141, 17 (cf. 2Cor 10:7; Phil 1:14; Phlm 21); the intransitive is construed with the genitive in PSI 538, 7. As for the middle or passive “I am persuaded,” we may cite P.Petr. II, 11 (1), 4 (S. Witkowski, Epistulae Privatae Graecae 3 = G. Milligan, Selections from the Greek Papyri, Cambridge, 1927, n. 3), a letter of Polycrates to his father: “If you come, I am sure (πέπεισμα) that I will easily be able to introduce you to the king”; BGU 1118, 40; P.Oxy. 268, 7: “the sum that they have each agreed to accept” (AD 58); 1293, 13; P.Ryl. 176, 3; P.Fay. 133, 12.

¹⁹ SB 9220 a 7; b recto 6; P.Mich. 29, 9: “If you examine the matter, you will be persuaded that we are useful to you”; cf. P.Tebt. 762, 4: “I am persuaded that, if God wills, he will be secure” (third century BC); P.Mil.Vogl. 24, 22: ε—γὼ πεπεισμένος μου τῇ διανοίᾳ (second century AD); P.Oxy. 2190, 23: He persuaded (ἔπειθεν) the sons of Apollonius to go to Didyma (first century); P.Mich. 502, 14: πείσης τὴν μητέρα = persuade our mother; P.Hib. 204, 6: “I will persuade my employers”; P.Genova 11, 3 (=SB 10730); 23, 2; UPZ 218, col. I, 17: “with effort, I have now convinced him”; P.Princ. 68, 8: γράφε μοι πεπεισμένος ὅτι . . . ; P.Lond. 1916, 27: “Write me so that we may have certitude”; P.Tebt. 768, 16; SB 10803, 7.

²⁰ PSI 1309, col. II, 7; 1413, 8; P.Yale 41, 10: “Apollonius will explain to you and convince you”; P.Oxy. 2980, 8: “You have no need to be persuaded of this”; 3106, 9; P.Hamb. 87, 16; C.P.Herm. 8, 14; 9, 22; P.Mert. 12, 9, a letter to a physician, in AD 58: “I have confidence that (πείθομαι ὅτι) I can retain a certain degree of serenity and be able . . .”; P.Lond. 1929, 10; P.Mich. 87, 6 (letter to Zeno): ε—πὶ σοὶ πεποιθώς = having confidence in your support; 485, 11: “Urge Valerius to write to Pius, having confidence (πειθόμενον) in my good faith”; SB 9450, 8.

²¹ P.Mich. 351, 31 (AD 44); 659, 291: πίθωμαι πα—σι ὡς πρόκειται; line 300; PSI 11246, 5: ε—ν πα—σι πέπεισμα; SB 8986, 27; 6266, 9: ὁμολογοῦμεν . . . καὶ πεπεισμένοι; 6704, 9; 7033, 77; 7668, 3; 11042, 24 (=

P.Col. VII, 188); 12215, 4; P.Ross.Georg. III, 33, 8; BGU 1865, 2; 2168, 21; 2185, 18; P.Lips. 28, 28.

²² PSI 1239, 21; P.Mich. 659, 287 and 296; SB 9763, 54, 56; 9889, 6; 10784, 11; P.Oslo 129, 8.

²³ —Επιτρόπῳ, πεισθει—ς τοι—ς γραφι—σι, P.Panop.Beatty 1, 85; 2, 86: τοι—ς προσταχθει—σιν πεισθείς; P.Alex. 25, 26: ε—ν τούτῳ ε—αυτοῦς πείσωμεν; P.Fam.Tebt. 19, 9: ὅπως πείθονται τοι—ς κεκριμένοις (= SB 9252, 9; cf. 9225, 6). It seems that πείθομαι means to be ready to stand as a candidate, to take on an office (in the second-third century), cf. P.Oxy. 1252, verso col. II, 28; Stud.Pal. XX, 58, col. I, 10; P.Ryl. 77, 34; P.Ross.Georg. II, 40, 16, 17, 19.

²⁴ BGU 1563, 37 (= Dittenberger, Or. 669 = SB 8444); P.Brem. 2, 10; P.Oxy. 3025, 12; cf. P.Oxy.Hels. 47 b 21: “I am sure that you will do everything on your own.”

²⁵ Jdt 12:11; Wis 16:8; 2Macc 7:26; 9:27: letter from King Antiochus: “I am persuaded (πέπεισμαι) that my son will follow my intentions scrupulously”; 4 Macc 2:6; 9:18; 16:24; cf. win someone to one’s cause (4:45; 11:14) with money (10:20); convince him (4:34; 4Macc 8:12).

²⁶ Tob 14:4; cf. assurance (πεποιθώς), Prov 14:16; Jdt 2:5—“You shall take men who are sure of their strength”; 4Macc 5:16; “obey” (6:4; 8:17, 26; 10:13; 12:4–5; 15:10; 18:1).

²⁷ Isa 30:3; 31:1; 42:17; Jer 7:14; 48:7, 13; 49:11; Bar 3:17; 1Macc 10:71, 77; 2Macc 10:34; 12:14; Jdt 7:10; Zeph 3:2; Job 31:24; Prov 28:25; 29:25; Wis 13:7; 14:29; 16:24; Sir 32:24.

²⁸ 2Kgs 18:19-22; 2Chr 32:10, 15; Isa 30:12; 36:4-9; 50:10; 59:4; Jer 7:4, 8; 9:3; 46:25; 49:4; Ezek 33:13; Job 6:20; 39:11; Po 49:6; 135:18; 146:3; Prov 11:28; 2Macc 8:18.

²⁹ 2Kgs 19:20; Isa 12:2; 33:2; 37:10; Jer 17:7; 39:18; Sus 35; Po 25:2; 125:1; Prov 3:5; 16:20; 21:22; Wis 3:9; 2Macc 7:40; 15:7.

³⁰ Ruth 2:12 (πεποιθέναι, Hebrew hasâh); 2Sam 22:3 (cf. Isa 8:17, piel of the Hebrew qawâh); Po 2:12; 11:1; 57:1; 118:8; cf. Isa 22:24; hang (Hebrew talâh).

³¹ Lev 25:18-19; Deut 33:12, 28; Judg 8:11; 1Sam 12:11; Amos 6:1; Jer 12:5; 23:6; 32:37; Job 11:18; Prov 10:9; Sir 4:15.

³² Isa 14:7 (Hebrew shaqat); 30:15; 32:17-19; 47:8; 58:14; Jer 28:15; 48:11; 1Macc 9:58.

³³ Ep. Arist. 266; cf. 252: “How can one be free of error? By doing everything with deliberation and reflection, without allowing oneself to be imposed upon (πειθόμενος, convince or seduce, bend) by unfavorable talk”; 5: “I am convinced (πέπεισμαι) that you will willingly learn what I want to recount”; one puts one’s confidence in might (147–148, 193).

³⁴ Alleg. Interp. 3.80: “royal intelligence imposes less than it persuades”; Post. Cain 55; Prelim. Stud. 107; Dreams 1.77; Joseph 189, 269; Moses 1.85; 2.257; Spec. Laws 1.79; Good Man Free 96.

³⁵ Sacr. Abel and Cain 60; Worse Attacks Better 131; Husbandry 56; Decalogue 87; Virtues 120; Good Man Free 95; To Gaius 3, 37, 198, 233, 240. Cf. Husbandry 63: “those who are convinced (οι—πεπεισμένοι) that they can master unreasonable forces”; Spec. Laws 1.45; Flacc. 174; “decide” (Joseph 225); “trust in, put one’s confidence in” (Spec. Laws 2.197; 1.62; 4.1, 174; Abraham 232).

³⁶ Philo, Unchang. God 50: reflection is like “an incorruptible judge who obeys the suggestions of right reason”; 183; Husbandry 40; Sobr. 33: “obeying the suggestions of right reason”; Conf. Tongues 59; Abraham 85: “the good man obeys an oracle”; 88, 192; Spec. Laws 2.230: “an army in submission to its leader’s orders.”

³⁷ Josephus, War 1.76, 365, 483; 2.340; 4.218, 230, 518; 5.528; 7.253, 410; Ant. 1.113, 276; 7.261; 8.308, 350; 10.9, 161; 12.164, 292, 300, 341; 20.97, 167; Ag. Apion 2.169. In the perfect passive, πέπεισμαι, “I am certain,” War 5.544; Ant. 5.90; 6.291, 317; 8.108, 11.3, 176, 315; 12.150; 13.246, 294; 14.308; 15.265; 16.304. The Essenes “were convinced that not one woman keeps faith with just one man” (War 2.121, πεπεισμένοι; cf. 1.107, 622, 643; Ant. 1.9); “these men who are now certain of holding on to victory” (2.437).

³⁸ Ant. 6.259; 10.115; Life 19: “I did not convince them”; 73; so one tries to change their minds, to win them over to our ideas (17, 56, 123, 193) and ends up persuading them (60, 77, 87, 103); they accept (63), but sometimes at a great cost (War 1.655; 4.104). Peitho is sometimes synonymous with “believe”: “to be convinced that God extends his watch and his authority over all and everywhere” (Ag. Apion 2.294), cf. Ant. 6.237: refusing to believe; 10.35; 16.79; War 1.482.

³⁹ War 1.613; 2.405; 3.201, 315, 345, 389; 4.185, 237, 321, 353, 504, 507, 639; 6.375, 502; 7.426; Ant. 1.167; 2.113, 271; 7.213; 8.245; 9.134; 13.79, 115, 217; 14.168, 184; 15.126; 16.108; 17.87; 18.3; 20.42; Life 113: “my arguments persuaded the crowd”; 308: “These words convinced them.”

⁴⁰ War 1.215: “Herod let himself be persuaded by these opinions”; 1.224; 6.134, 287; 7.415, 423; cf. Life 417: “Titus Caesar invited me (ἔπειθέν με) a number of times to take what I wanted for myself from the ruins of my country.”

⁴¹ War 1.114: Aristobulus “advised his mother to spare the lives” of threatened persons, 124, 360; Ant. 1.278; 6.208: “David, persuaded by this excellent advice”; 7.214, 235, 10.51; 11.197; Ag. Apion 1.100.

⁴² War 1.61: “Hyrcanus convinced Antiochus with three hundred talents to lift the siege,” 126, 290, 575, 603, 642; Ant. 2.139; 8.5; 9.143, 200, 232; 11.223; 12.387; 14.164; 17.55, 63; 18.42, 329; 20.70, 163, 236; Life 29, 42, 55, 65, 132, 271, 273, 391. Thus members of garrisons are “persuaded” (War 1.175, 187, 190, 248; 2.590; 3.357).

⁴³ Ant. 1.74, 109, 216; 2.291; 5.151, 321; 7.15, 17; 18.82; 20.62, 69, 120, 216, 220; Life 185.

⁴⁴ War 1.135, 267, 506, 538; 2.238; 5.128; Ant. 2.30; 18.268.

⁴⁵ War 1.159, 318; Ant. 5.282; 12.237; 16.322; 18.48; 20.78, 178.

⁴⁶ War 1.391, 434, 576; Ant. 6.249; 8.277; 9.148; 11.146; 12.283; 14.14. That is why πείθω is sometimes completely synonymous with “appease”: “Antipater appeased Murcus” (War 1.224, 227; Ant. 1.201); to persuade a crowd it to appease it (Life 388, cf. 140); “being agreeable to these orders, the soldiers remained calm” (War 2.621; Ant. 7.127).

⁴⁷ Ant. 11.218; 14.52, 88, 409; 18.89, 159; Ag. Apion 2.226: “obedience to the laws is a proof of virtue.”

⁴⁸ War 1.55, 202, 373, 374; 2.21, 41, 209, 361, 364, 378, 583; 3.463; 4.10; 6.24, 330, 372; Ant. 11.114; 13.298, 17.119; Life 116, 373.

⁴⁹ War 2.394; 3.484; Ant. 7.122; 8.256; 18.266.

⁵⁰ Acts 26:28 (present indicative, με πείθεις). The king adds ε—ν ὀλίγω, which commentators explain with χρόνῳ (“in a short time”) or πόνῳ (“with little effort”), or λόγῳ (“with few words”), or even “at little cost”; it would be best to interpret “almost, yet a little” (cf. Josephus, Life 151).

⁵¹ 2Cor 5:11 (present indicative, πείθομεν). Paul is faithful in his ministry to the mission he received from God, the Lord to whom he belongs and whom he reveres. One can also understand from the context that he wants to conciliate minds and defend himself against suspicion, and so make people favorably disposed, win themselves over to him. Cf. Gal 1:10—“Is it the favor of humans that I want to win (πείθω) or that of God?” Cf. A. Feuillet, “Chercher à persuader Dieu’ (Gal I, 10 a),” in NovT, 1970, pp. 350–360.

⁵² At Corinth, Paul “tried to convince (conative imperfect ἔπειθεν) Jews and Greeks” (Acts 18:4) that Jesus is the Christ; at Ephesus, he argues and tries to convince the Jews concerning the kingdom of God (διαλεγόμενος καὶ πείθων, present participle, Acts 19:8), as every orator does with his audience (cf. Josephus). At Rome, Paul, giving testimony to the kingdom of God, tried to convince his hearers (πείθων) regarding Jesus by a demonstration relying on the Law and the Prophets (Acts 28:23).

⁵³ Acts 13:43 (imperfect ἔπειθον). It is not necessary for a crowd to be persuaded or convinced to mobilize; it can be convinced by any means or pressure whatsoever: “the princes of the priests and the elders convinced the crowds (ἔπεισεν, aorist indicative) to ask for Barabbas’ freedom and Jesus’ death” (Matt 27:20). At Lystra, the Jews of Antioch and Iconium convince the crowd (aorist participle, πείσαντες) and stone Paul (Acts 14:19). Tyrians and Sidonians request, win over to their view, and convince (πείσαντες) Blastus, Agrippa’s chamberlain, to support their request to the king (Acts 12:20).

⁵⁴ Matt 28:14, ἡμεῖς—ς πείσομεν (future indicative). On tomb violations and fraudulent transfers of corpses, cf. J. Schmitt, “Nazareth, (Inscription dite de),” in DBSup, vol. 6, col. 356.

⁵⁵ 1John 3:19 (Homer, Il. 9.112; Xenophon, An. 3.1.26). On the debate that takes place in the conscience, cf. Philo, Quest. Gen. 4.26; on the accusation of the heart, Prov 18:17; Augustine, Perf. Just. 28. Cf. A. Champdor, Le Livre des morts, Paris, 1963, p.84.

⁵⁶ Matt 27:43—“He trusted in God” (perfect indicative, πέποιθεν ἐ—πί) is a quotation of Ps 22:9. Heb 2:13—“I will put my trust in him” (πεποιθῶς ἔσομαι ἐ—πᾶν—) is a quotation of Isa 8:17.

⁵⁷ Luke 11:22 (pluperfect, ἐ—ῶ η— ε—πεποίθει); cf. Ps 48:7; Prov 11:28. S. Légasse, “L’‘homme fort’ de Luc XI, 21–22,” in NovT, 1962, pp. 5–9.

⁵⁸ Rom 2:19—the Jew is confident that he is a guide of the blind (perfect participle, πέποιθας), whereas God and his law are light, and not the person himself (σεαυτόν); 2Cor 1:9—“We have carried our death sentence in ourselves, so that we may not remain confident in ourselves (perfect participle, μὴ πεποιθότες), but in God who raises the dead”; 10:7—“if someone is persuaded that he is Christ’s” (with connotations of presumption); Phil 3:3—“We are the circumcision . . . we place no confidence in the flesh.”

⁵⁹ 2Thess 3:4—“We have placed our confidence in the Lord regarding you” (perfect indicative, πεποιθήσαμεν); cf. Phil 1:14.

⁶⁰ Gal 5:10; cf. 2Cor 2:3—“I had this confidence in all of you (πεποιθώς, perfect participle), that my joy is your joy,” because the solidarity of brotherly love requires sharing the same feelings: rejoicing with those who rejoice. Phlm 21: “I write with full confidence in your obedience.”

⁶¹ Acts 5:39, Gamaliel: if the work comes from God, it cannot be defeated; 27:21, in the storm, the centurion pays more attention to the opinions of the pilot and the shipowner than to Paul’s words.

⁶² Acts 23:21—Paul’s nephew denounces the plot against Paul to the tribune: “Do not believe them” (μὴ πεισθῆς, aorist passive subjunctive), do not trust them.

⁶³ Acts 26:26—“I do not believe (οὐ πείθομαι, present middle indicative) that he (King Agrippa) knows nothing of these matters”; 2Tim 1:5—“I am persuaded that the faith of your grandmother Lois and your mother Eunice is also in you”; Heb 13:18—“we believe that we have a clear conscience.”

⁶⁴ Luke 16:31. C. F. Evans, “Uncomfortable Words,” in ExpT 81, 1970, pp. 228–231.

⁶⁵ Acts 17:4; 28:24; cf. 21:14—during the farewells at Caesarea, Paul says that he is ready to be imprisoned and to die for Jesus; “as he would not be persuaded (μὴ πειθομένου, present middle participle), we remained quiet (ἤσυχάσαμεν).”

⁶⁶ Rom 15:14—the apostle includes all the Roman Christians without noting a single exception; Heb 6:9—“Even though we speak like this, dear friends, we are persuaded (πεπεισμεθα) that you are in a better situation, favorable for your salvation.”

⁶⁷ Rom 8:38—confidence based on the faithfulness of God’s love and on experience gained in daily trials; 2Tim 1:12—“I am sure (πέπεισμαι) that the one in whom I have placed my trust has the power to keep my deposit until that Day”; Paul is sure of his Lord and Savior; he affirms his full and complete conviction that the Almighty will without fail accomplish his promises; Rom 14:4—“I know and I am absolutely certain in the Lord (οἶδα καὶ πέπεισμαι) that there is nothing impure in you,” a total conviction because it rests on the teaching of Jesus, who rejected the distinction between clean and unclean foods.

⁶⁸ 1Cor 2:4—οὐκ ἐ—ν πειθοι—ς σοφίας λόγοις, ἀλλ ἐ—ν ἀποδείξει πνεύματος καὶ δυνάμεως. Such is the text in a, B, D, E, F. Vulg. “in persuasibilibus sapientiae verbis”; Origen, Cels. 6.2 (cf. RB, 1957, p. 478); but the variants are numerous (cf. H. Lietzmann, An die Korinther I–II2, Tübingen, 1923, p. 11). The oldest manuscript, P46, omits λόγοις (P. Benoit, “Le Codex paulinien Chester Beatty,” in RB, 1937, p. 73); g 18 (Tischendorf) Sah. Arm. Ambrosiaster read the dative of the noun πειθώ: “in the persuasion (ἐ—ν πειθοι—) of the speech of human wisdom”; this reading preferred by J. Huby, in Science religieuse: Travaux et recherches, Paris, 1944, pp. 245–247; J. Héring, La Première Epître de saint Paul aux Corinthiens, Neuchâtel-Paris, 1949 ET The First Epistle of Saint Paul to the Corinthians, trans. A. W. Heathcote and P. J. Allcock, London, 1962, p. 15; and G. Zuntz, The Text of the Epistles, London, 1953, pp. 23ff., who thinks that there never was an adjective πειθός; and yet it is never explained by the Fathers of the church, who thus seem to suppose that its meaning is well known to their audiences. For the rest, there is no difference of meaning between the two readings. Cf. Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.223: Plato “surpassed all the other philosophers by the power of his talent and his persuasive eloquence”; 2.116. The substantive πειθώ means the faculty or talent of persuasion (Aeschylus, PV 172; Plato, Leg. 4.722 b), speech more fit for persuasion, eloquence (Euripides, IA 104; Aristophanes, Nub. 1398), the temptation that one has in mind (Aeschylus, Ag. 385, βια—ται δ ἅ τάλαινα πειθώ), obedience (Xenophon, Cyr. 2.3.19; 3.3.8); contrasted with constraint (Josephus, War 2.8, 562; cf. Ant. 17.209).

πει—ρα, πειράζω, πειρασμός, ἀπείραστος

peira, attempt, trial, testing, experience, proof; peirazo, to try, tempt; peirasmos, temptation, trial, testing; apeirastos, inexperienced, not susceptible to temptation

peira, S 3984; TDNT 6.23–36; EDNT 3.64; NIDNTT 3.798–799; MM 501; L&N 68.58; BAGD 640 | peirazo, S 3985; TDNT 6.23–36; EDNT 3.64–7; NIDNTT 3.798–799, 801–802, 808–810; MM 501; L&N 12.36, 27.31,

27.46, 68.58, 88.308; BDF §§101, 171(2), 310(1), 392(1a); BAGD 640 | peirasmos, S 3986; TDNT 6.23–36; EDNT 3.64–67; NIDNTT 3.798–800, 802; MM 501; L&N 27.46, 88.308; BAGD 640–641 | apeirastos, S 551; TDNT 6.23–26; EDNT 1.119; NIDNTT 3.798–799, 802, 809; MM 56; L&N 88.309; BAGD 83

In classical Greek, peira means “attempt, trial, experience” and sometimes “a putting to the test”;¹ and these meanings are retained in the Koine. Zeno knows from experience whether or not the potter Pettukamis is capable (P.Cair.Zen. 59500, 1; cf. P.Princ. 169, 3); Ammonius asks his brother, “Try to do this for me.”² But the meaning “proof” is asserted: “He found a man to supply the proof” (Menander, Dysk. 722); “You have given me sufficient proof of your character” (Dysk. 770); Moschion “gave proof of a gifted mind”;³ hence an athletic “trial.”⁴ The LXX uses this word to translate the Hebrew massâh (Deut 33:8), and elsewhere uses it for an experience;⁵ likewise Philo: “Every day we have experience of it” (Worse Attacks Better 131); “I have had the experience for a long time”;⁶ but it is emphasized that these experimentations are sources or means of knowledge.⁷ Philo does not use peirasmos, nor does Josephus, who gives preference to peira meaning “proof,”⁸ “test” (Ant. 20.28), “trial” and “test”⁹ or “attempt,”¹⁰ but also “means, occasion, expedient.”¹¹

The expression peiran lambano, “to make an attempt, to experiment,” is traditional.¹² Deut 28:56 uses it for the woman “who will not venture to put the sole of her foot on the ground” (piel of the Hebrew nasâh); Heb 11:29, 36 for the Egyptians who tried to cross the Red Sea, and for martyrs who experienced derision and floggings.

In preference to the denominative peiraomai, the Koine uses peirazo,¹³ which is rare in secular Greek, but to which biblical language gives an altogether singular density,¹⁴ with the basic meaning “trial”¹⁵ and always translating the piel of the Hebrew nasâh. Its secular meanings are rather rare,¹⁶ but always it is a question of trial and exploration. Hence the religious and moral meaning, “temptation,” which is a trial of virtue by means of affliction or adversity, or even by Satan’s intervention.¹⁷ In the faith of Israel, God is always its author; it is a basic element of his pedagogy: per molestias eruditio. The two most significant instances are those of Abraham, whom God tested by asking him to sacrifice Isaac (Gen 22:1), and of the wandering of the chosen people in the wilderness (Exod 15:25). These trials are a sounding or a test that allows Yahweh to assess the quality of his servants; this purpose is mentioned endlessly.¹⁸ But the “temptation” reveals not only what is hidden, demonstrates not only the sincerity and the moral resources of the believer, but is also for the believer a means to perfection, because he has to suffer in order to remain faithful to his resolves and his decision for God; he emerges from the trial purified and more convinced than ever to serve his Lord, whose sovereignty over him he thus confesses to be total.¹⁹ This is why Jdt 8:25 paradoxically urges giving thanks to “the Lord our God, who puts us to the test like our fathers”; and this is why David, who is so religious, asks, “Search me, Yahweh, test me, examine my heart and my mind” (Ps 26:2), because he knows that those whom “God has put to the test, he has found worthy of himself” (Wis 3:5). The wisdom writings insist on the benefits of this painful pedagogy by attributing it to the divine wisdom: “Wisdom tries her sons by her precepts” (Sir 4:17) and takes them on difficult paths. Her disciples are called to experience for themselves what is good or bad for their souls (Sir 37:27; 39:4). If they have thought they could find happiness in the joys of this world, they recognize that these pleasures are empty (Eccl 2:1), and that is the confession of their wisdom (7:23; cf. Wis 2:17; 19:5). Finally, on the psychological level, “The one who has not been tried knows little.”²⁰

People are thought to “tempt God”²¹ when they seek to obtain signs or proofs of his goodness or power, or when they make untimely demands; they irritate God because of their lack of faith and undue demands, which amount to a kind of defiance, which is monstrous on the part of a creature.

The substantive peirasmos did not appear in secular Greek before the first century,²² but it remained unknown in the papyri. The LXX gave it the meaning “temptation”:²³ “They called the place Massah (Peirasmos) because there they tempted God” (Exod 17:7; cf. Deut 6:16; 9:22; 29:2; Ps 95:8), and it is repeated that “in temptation Abraham was found faithful” (Sir 44:20; 1Macc 2:52), because “To the one who fears the Lord no evil will come; but if he is in trial, he will again be delivered” (Sir 33:1). The whole moral life of the wise person depends on his clear-headedness and victory in testing: “The furnace proves the potter’s vases. The testing of a person is in his reasoning” (Sir 27:5), which discerns the just and the unjust, the good and the evil, and makes good choices that are in accord with God’s will. Hence the universal maxim: “Child, if you wish to serve the Lord, prepare your soul for testing” (eis peirasmon, 2:1).

NT theology and language inherit these conceptions of peirasmos,²⁴ but the major “temptation” was that of Christ, which is reported by the three Synoptics²⁵ and which puts down “temptation” as an essential element in the life of disciples, like a wandering in the wilderness. The Devil submitted the Savior to an “examination” to find out about his identity, and he especially tempted him to substitute a political and earthly messianism for redemption by the cross, and finally to “tempt God” by performing wonders having no other point than to signal the vainglory of their author. Christ emerged victorious from these peirasmoi by quoting Scripture, that is, by conforming strictly to the will of God. In the course of his ministry, he underwent many other trials or temptations, all the difficulties of his existence, the traps set by his enemies, the reproofs of the religious leaders—which affected him deeply²⁶—and he says to the Twelve, “You are the ones who have stayed with me in my trials” (Luke 22:28—en tois peirasmois). The trials of the agony at Gethsemane,²⁷ when he still had the chance to escape death and the tortures of Calvary, were certainly the most painful. The Epistle to the Hebrews gives them a major place in its Christology: the experience of suffering that Jesus underwent because of the likeness of his human nature to ours first taught him compassion for our weaknesses,²⁸ then gave him the power to “come to the aid of those who are being tried (or tempted),”²⁹ like a conqueror coming to the aid to those who are still embroiled in battle.

God is the one who tests, and the Christian, aware of his weakness, asks the favor of exemption from this examination: “Lead us not into temptation” (me eisenenkes hemas eis peirasmon).³⁰ Eisphero (here in the aorist subjunctive) means “lead, transport, bring, introduce,” and followed by eis, “cause to enter into” the peirasmos, which is not an incitation to evil, a wicked solicitation—which is what “temptation” suggests in modern English—but a difficult or painful trial. This test permits an assessment of the strength, the faithfulness, the love of the believer (which is a good thing), but it is dangerous, and that explains the humble request to be excused from it.

Pagans, Jews, and sinners often used the excuse that some deity had forced them to do evil,³¹ but Sir 15:11–15 protests that God can not urge evil, and Philo says that God is only the cause of good (Decalogue 176). Jas 1:13–14 takes up this teaching: “Let no one when he is tempted say, ‘I am being tempted by God.’ For God cannot be touched by temptations to evil³² and neither does he tempt anyone. In reality, each one is tempted when drawn away and enticed by his own covetousness.” The immediate cause of the temptation is internal: epithymia, that evil and imperious desire that each person has, which draws the heard and sets a snare³³—which takes account of the warfare described by St. Paul (Rom 7:14–24).

In this latter text, peirazo is clearly pejorative, as it is also in all the instances where the temptation is attributed to the devil. Just as Jesus was tempted by the devil—for no wicked inclination could come from his immaculate human nature (Matt 4:1)—it is Satan who intervenes to snatch away the word from human hearts in order to keep them from being saved (Luke 8:12). Christian spouses are not to deprive each other “lest Satan tempt you because of your trouble in remaining continent” (1Cor 7:5); he can even ruin the fruits of the apostolic ministry (1Thess 3:5). The source of the tribulations of the faithful sifts them, hoping that they will fail.³⁴ His sinister interventions are so universal and unrelenting that Jesus calls him ho peirazon, “the Tempter.”³⁵

All of NT pastoral theology emphasizes, after the fashion of the OT, the preponderant role of peirasmos in the life of believers. It occurs in various periods with greater or lesser intensity (en kairo peirasmou, Luke 8:13) and in varied forms, the most pronounced form being “tribulation,” painful and dangerous personal or social conditions that put everyone's faithfulness to the test: "Dear friends, do not consider the fiery trial you are suffering something strange."³⁶ In fact, this peirasmos is providential, is a test of Christian authenticity, for the participants in Christ's sufferings (1Pet 4:13); it is a purification, like that of metal in a furnace.³⁷ This marvelous fruitfulness makes it possible to understand that for a believer under the new covenant the most dangerous and painful peirasmos can be a source of joy and even gladness. Jesus had commanded believers to bear fruit by persevering;³⁸ Jas 1:2 explains, "Always reckon it as joy, brethren, to be exposed to trials of all sorts (peirasmois poikilois), knowing that the trial of your faith produces patience."³⁹ "Happy is the person who endures trial, for after being proved he will receive the crown of life that [God] has promised to those who love him" (Jas 1:12). This is the blessedness of hope. 1Pet 1:6 goes one better: "This is what fills you with joy, even while at present you are afflicted—since it is necessary for a little while—by various trials."⁴⁰

On the other hand, there is a danger of succumbing when a Christian has committed an offense (en tini paraptomati) and someone who is "spiritual" attempts to restore him; the latter must act with gentleness (en pneumaty prytetos), "for you also are capable of being tempted" (Gal 6:1). No one is indefectible.⁴¹ This propensity to sin is particularly frequent with those who want to get rich (hoi boulomenoi ploutein); "they fall into temptation (empiptousin eis peirasmon) and snares and many foolish and harmful desires that plunge people into ruin and perdition."⁴² So missionaries who are false apostles are to be tested, like the Nicolaitans who disturb the community at Ephesus; as a result of this discernment they are recognized as liars.⁴³ Finally, Christians must also "test" themselves; the peirasmos that makes one turn in upon oneself is an examination of conscience.⁴⁴

Although peirasmos is painful and dangerous, God matches it to our strength, so that no one can ever say that it is insurmountable: "No temptation has come upon you that is not of human proportions, but God is faithful, who will not let you be tempted beyond your strength, but with this temptation will also produce this outcome (ekbasin, result) that you may bear it."⁴⁵ Jesus had taught that prayer is the secret of victory: "Watch and pray, that you may not come into temptation" (Matt 26:41 = Mark 14:38 = Luke 22:40, 46; cf. 1Pet 5:8ff.). He himself had prayed for Peter, that he should not fail (Luke 22:32). It is the faith of the church that "the Lord knows how to deliver the godly from testing" (2Pet 2:9), that is, those who seek divine help. To the church at Philadelphia, which imitated Christ's patience, Christ prophesied: "Because you have kept the word of my patience, I also will keep you in the hour of temptation that is ready to come upon the whole inhabited world to test those who dwell upon the earth."⁴⁶ We may add with 2Pet 5:7-8 that faith makes it possible to resist the devil's most violent assaults.

¹ Sophocles, El. 470: “the adventure that I am going to try may cost me dearly someday”; cf. P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique, on this word, who also points out the meaning “an attempt to seduce a woman,” and the compounds ε—μπειρία, “experience”; ε—μπειρικός, “experienced”; ε—μπειράομαι, “make trial of”; cf. ἄπειρος, “without experience, inexperienced” (Heb 5:13; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XX, suppl. C 7), ἀπείραστος, “having no experience” (Demosthenes, Corona 18.249); cf. below.

² P.Oxy. 3057, 18 (first-second century); cf. 1415, 29; PSI 377, 10; BGU 1027, 11: οἴου ὀλέθρου πίρας ε—ποιει—τε . . . ἢ πι—ρα πραγμάτων ε—πειδείξει; Dittenberger, Syl. 1239, 18: πα—σι τοι—ς κακοι—ς πει—ραν δώσει.

³ SB 8026, 10 (ἔδωκε πει—ραν = SEG VIII, 464; E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 108, 10); P.Princ. 119, 57 (= SB 10989; A. E. Hanson, “Memorandum and Speech of an Advocate,” in ZPE, vol. 8, 1971, pp. 15–27).

⁴ Preliminary trial (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1968, p. 439, n. 147); Philostratus, Gym. 11: “wrestling supplies a double proof, of what it knows and what it can do.”

⁵ Wis 18:20—πει—ρα θανάτου (cf. 2:24; S. Lyonnet, “Le Sense de πειράζειν in Sap. II, 24 et la doctrine du péché originel,” in Bib, 1958, pp. 27–36); 18:25, the experience of divine wrath; 2Macc 8:9—the general Gorgias was accustomed to the things of war, he had experience of them; cf. 4Macc 8:1—“the tyrant, conquered in his first attempt. . . .”

⁶ Philo, Abraham 251; Spec. Laws 1.106: “the woman who has had the experience of another marriage” (= Virtues 114); Spec. Laws 2.103; cf. the meaning “proof” (Joseph 37; Moses 1.306), “trial” (Good Man Free 103), “undertaking” (Flacc. 43, 53); “means, combination” (Virtues 34). Πει—ρα is close to δοκιμασία (Flight 149; Spec. Laws 4.153; cf. Josephus, War 2.161; Plutarch, Mor. 15.230 a ; Ps 95:9; 2Cor 13:5; Heb 3:9; Jas 1:2-3; 1Pet 1:6-7).

⁷ Philo, Abraham 209; To Gaius 216: “He knew not only by hearsay, but by experience”; 255: “before long you will know from experience.”

⁸ The Essene candidate must offer proof of his temperance (War 2.138; Ant. 5.184); give proof of one’s aptitude (Ant. 1.300); the proof that Elijah is a true prophet (9.23), proof of courage (12.339), of loyalty (15.193; 16.48; Life 160), of strength (Ant. 3.19; 13.152).

⁹ War 5.516: “they tested the points of their swords”; 7.51, 81, 193; Ant. 2.293; 3.11; 5.107, 110: trial of facts; 8.166: convinced by experience, not by mere hearsay; 8.168, 219, 300; 15.316; 18.303.

¹⁰ Ant. 3.315; 5.40; 10.142; Life 219; Ag. Apion 2.183; attempted rape, 2.215; Ant. 2.55. The only religious meaning is “tempt God” (Ant. 4.107).

¹¹ War 2.200: the Jews did not give in before any of these means, 355; 3.218; Ant. 2.161; 5.325; 10.192; 14.473. Cf. verify a usage, experiment with a medicine (Dioscorides, Mat. Med., pref. 15), controlled observation, scientific experimentation (Philodemus of Gadara, Inf. 7.34, 37; 15.20; 16.36).

¹² F. Field, Notes on the Translation, pp. 232f., quotes Diodorus Siculus 12.24; 13.52; 15.48; Plutarch, Pomp. 73.1: “Pompey experienced defeat and flight”; Chariton, Chaer. 8.4.5: “Do not try to give him a mother-in-law”; Pausanias, 2.33.3; Achilles Tatius 6.20.3; Aesop, Fab. (ed. de Fur.). We may add Plato, Grg. 448 a; Xenophon, Cyr. 6.1.54: “he tried to have them pulled” (ε—λάμβανε τοῦ ἀγωγίου πει—ραν); Philo, Abraham 251; Spec. Laws 1.106; Good Man Free 103; Josephus, War 2.340, 581: “I will put your military discipline to the test before combat”; Ant. 2.60; 4.1, 191; 8.217; Life 125; Polybius 2.36.9: “tempt fortune”; SEG VIII, 574, 21; UPZ 110, 129: “If you do not want to experience sanctions”; P.Oxy. 1681, 10; 2704, 14; P.Cair.Zen. 59495, 4; P.Tebt. 712, 14; SB 7452, 21.

¹³ Πειράζω means “put to the test”; hence “try to make, seek to seduce” (a woman), in a favorable or an unfavorable sense: “mistreat, attack.” Cf. the Latin periculum, “danger, peril,” and peritus, “experienced.” Cf. Homer, Od. 9.281, Polyphemes to Ulysses: “He wanted to try me”; Plato, Prt. 342 a: “I want to try to expose you . . .”; Epictetus 1.9.29: “to test me, Rufus was accustomed to speak to me”; Plutarch, Cleom. 7.4: “troubled at the thought that they wanted to test him because they suspected him”; Polybius 2.6.9: try to get revenge; Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Comp. 6.7.1: “Now I will try to speak (πειράσομαι λέγειν), to the extent that I understand.” In a monologue of Hercules, it has to do with an athletic trial (P.Oxy. 2454, 20); cf. P.Yale 32, 9: let him try to pour the olives without crushing them (257 BC); P.Oxy. 2410, 10: he tried to get rid of two arourai of our royal land; 2982, 12: “I will try to get there quickly”; P.Oxy.Hels. 49, 3: “try to send the letters as quickly as possible”; PSI 927, 25; P.Alex. 28, 23; P.Lond. 1917, 12: “captivated, I remained in the kitchen garden.”

¹⁴ It is worth noting that Philo uses this verb only four times, always in OT quotations (Alleg. Interp. 3.162, 167; Prelim. Stud. 163; Dreams 1.195). Its use is also rare with Josephus, but more personal: “Under the pretext of serving the law, these men were attempting something more profound” (War 1.654); “this wonder had already been experienced (noted) when the city was taken” (5.411); “have experience of widowhood” (Ant. 6.210); ὁ πειρασθείς = the one who experienced such an outrage (sodomy), Ag. Apion 2.215.

¹⁵ Cf. A. Sommer, Der Begriff der Versuchung im Alten Testament und Judentum, Breslau, 1935; J. H. Korn, Πειρασμός: Die Versuchung des Gläubigen in der griechischen Bibel, Stuttgart, 1937; M. E. Andrews, “Peirasmos: A Study in Form-Criticism,” in ATR, 1942, pp. 229–244; C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, pp. 222–266; H. B. Oikonomos, Πειρασμοὶ ἐν τῇ Παλαιᾷ Διαθήκῃ, Athens, 1965.

¹⁶ Judg 6:39—Gideon wants to repeat the “trial of the fleece”; 1Sam 17:39—David tries to walk in armor, “because he had never tried it”; 1Kgs 10:1, the Queen of Sheba comes to see Solomon “to test him with riddles” (1Chr 9:1); Sir 13:11—the powerful man learns and puts you to the test with his long speeches; Dan 1:12, 14: “prove your servants for ten days”; 1Macc 12:10—“We tried to send someone to renew our brotherhood.” The author of 2Macc tries to sum up the five books of Jason of Cyrene (2:23); Macron tries to administer the affairs of the Jews peacefully (10:12), Lysias tries to cooperate for their good (11:19). Cf. 4Macc 9:7—“Try then, tyrant” to compel us; 12:3, he seeks to persuade the youngest of the Maccabees; 15:16—their mother is tried by cruel suffering.

¹⁷ Job 1:9ff. Cf. J. Lévêque, Job et son Dieu, Paris, 1970, vol. 1, pp. 179ff. A. M. Durable, “La Tentation diabolique dans le livre de la Sagesse II, 24,” in Mélanges Tisserant, pp. 187–195.

¹⁸ Exod 16:4—“I test the people to find out if they will walk according to my law or not”; Deut 8:2—“to know what you have in your heart, if you will keep his commandments or not”; 13:3—“to know if you love Yahweh your God with all your heart and with all your soul”; Judg 2:22—“to know whether or not they will keep Yahweh’s ways, walking according to them, as their fathers kept them”; 3:4; 2Chr 32:31.

¹⁹ Exod 20:20—“Fear not, for it is in order to test you that Elohim has come, and so that the fear of him may be before your face so that you will not sin any more”; Dan 12:10—“Many will be purified, made spotless, and proved [by fire]. The impious will continue to act with impiety”; Wis 11:9.

²⁰ Sir 34:10. The Vulgate of 34:11 is more absolute: “Qui tentatus non est, qualis sit? He knows nothing; he does not know himself. He does not know his weakness or his great need of God’s help; he has not gained the power to triumph in life’s difficulties” (Job 7:1ff.). The Christian tradition takes up the axiom: stagnant water becomes foul and miry, but the waters of a river are more beautiful, clear, transparent, and the stones are what makes the brook sing; or again: just as the stars shine in the night and hide from us in the daytime, so true virtue cannot be seen at all in prosperity but shines forth splendidly in adversity.—This is what the Greeks meant by the formula πάθει μάθος (adversity makes wise, suffering brings understanding) taken up in Heb 5:8, cf. Herodotus 1.207; Aeschylus, Ag. 177, the comic poet Sotades (J. U. Powell, Collectanea Alexandrina, Oxford, 1925, p. 244, n. 23 = J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 2, p. 556), Memnon (F.Gr.H., p. 356, 13). Philo, Moses 2.55, 280; Migr. Abr. 34; Prelim. Stud. 162; Heir 73; Flight 138; Dreams 2.107; cf. J. Coste, “Notion grecque et notion biblique de la ‘souffrance éducatrice’ (A propos d’Hébr. V, 8),” in RSR, 1955, pp. 481–523; H. Dörrie, Leid und Erfahrung: Die Wort- und Sinn-Verbindung παθει—ν-μαθει—ν im griechischen Denken, Mainz, 1956; K. Clinton, “The ‘Hymn to Zeus’ ΠΑΕΙ ΜΑΟΣ and the End of the Parodos of Agamemnon,” in Tradition, 1979, pp. 1–19.

²¹ Num 14:22—“These people who have tempted me ten times and who have not heard my voice”; Jdt 8:12; Ps 78:41, 56; 95:9; 106:14; Wis 1:2; Sir 18:23; cf. Isa 7:12.

²² Dioscorides, Mat. Med. preface: τοὺς ἐ—πὶ τῷ—ν παθῶ—ν πειρασμούς. Philaenis, Περὶ ἀφροδισίων, in P.Oxy. 2891, frag. 1, col. 2: Περὶ πειρασμῶ—ν (a seducer’s attempts), cf. K. Tsantsanoglou, “The Memoirs of a Lady from Samos,” in ZPE, vol. 12, 1973, pp. 183–195.

²³ In the sense of a difficult trial, Deut 4:34; 7:19. Sir 6:7 recommends not having too much confidence in a new friend; the guarantee of a trial is needed (cf. 27:7). Eccl 3:10; 4:8; 5:2, 13; 8:16 use πειρασμός to translate the Hebrew inyan, “occupation, task, event.”

²⁴ In the secular sense, St. Paul, a new convert, makes many attempts to join the disciples at Jerusalem, who doubt his sincerity (Acts 9:26; imperfect tense for continued action, ἐ—πείραζεν); the missionaries “tried to enter Bithynia” (16:7); the Jews, “having taken Paul in the temple, tried to kill him” (26:1—imperfect middle ἐ—πειρῶ—ντο = repeated attempts); the meaning “painful trials” in 20:19. — Both of the great OT testings are reprised: Abraham (Heb 11:17; cf. Gen 22:1; Philo, Abraham 167–207; Josephus, Ant. 1.222–236; cf. T. Reik, The Temptation, New York, 1961) and the generation of the wilderness (Heb 3:8-9; cf. Ps 95:7-11); but we have to eliminate ε—πειράσθησαν at Heb 11:37, which is a dittographic corruption of ε—πρίσθησαν (C. Spicq, Hébreux, vol. 1, p. 429; G. Zuntz, The Text of the Epistles, p. 47; R. V. G. Tasker, “The Text of the ‘Corpus Paulinum,’” in NTS, vol. 1, 1955, p. 184). — Finally, the “temptation of God” by Israel in the wilderness is recalled at 1Cor 10:19; this is what Ananias and Sapphira did to see whether the Holy Spirit would illuminate Peter concerning their fraud (Acts 5:9); this is what the apostles and presbyters at Jerusalem would have been doing if they had not seen in the conversion of Cornelius a sufficiently clear sign of the divine will and had called for a more obvious miracle (Acts 15:10).

²⁵ Matt 4:1; Mark 1:13; Luke 4:2. The bibliography is considerable, cf. P. Ketter, Die Versuchung Jesu nach dem Berichte der Synoptiker, Münster, 1918; P. Samain, “L’Accusation de magie contre le Christ dans les Evangiles,” in ETL, 1938, pp. 484–490; R. Schnackenburg, “Der Sinn der Versuchung Jesu bei den Synoptikern,” in TQ, 1952, pp. 297–326; A. Feuillet, “Le Récit lucanien de la Tentation (Lc. IV, 1–13),” in Bib, 1959, pp. 613–621; Feuillet, “L’Episode de la Tentation d’après l’Evangile selon saint Marc (I, 12–13),” in EstBib, 1960, pp. 49–73; M. Steiner, La Tentation de Jésus dans l’interprétation patristique de saint Justin à Origène, Paris, 1962; H. Riesenfeld, “Le Caractère messianique de la Tentation au désert,” in La Venue du Messie (Recherches bibliques, vol. 6), Bruges, 1962, pp. 51–63; and especially J. Dupont, Les Tentations de Jésus au désert, Bruges, 1968 (gives the complete bibliography).

²⁶ Matt 16:33; Mark 8:33 (Peter’s wanting to turn Jesus away from the cross); Matt 12:38; 16:1; Mark 8:11; Luke 11:16 (the Pharisees ask for a sign); Matt 19:3; Mark 10:2 (the question about divorce, intended to test him); Matt 22:18; Mark 12:15 (tribute to Caesar); Matt 22:35 (the greatest commandment); Matt 27:40 (“Come down from the cross!”). Cf. Gos. Truth 19.18–30: “The wise [who are so] in their heart came testing (πειράζειν) the Master, but he confounded them, showing that they were empty.”

²⁷ Jesus’ soul was troubled (τετάρρακται, John 12:27) in this conflict (agony) between the horror of an undeserved death and submission to the Father’s will; Heb 5:7–8. Cf. T. Boman, “Der Gebetskampf Jesu,” in NTS, vol. 10, 1964, pp. 266–267; E. Best, The Temptation and the Passion, Cambridge, 1965; A. Feuillet, L’Agonie de Gethsémani, Paris, 1977.

²⁸ Heb 4:5. Christ, having sensitivities like our own, has the same reactions that we have in the face of pain and death; so he feels our troubles, participates in them, suffers with us (συμπαθει—ν). Cf. K. Bornhäuser, “Die Versuchungen Jesu nach dem Hebräerbrief,” in Theologische Studien M. Kähler dargebracht, Leipzig, 1905, pp. 69–86; C. Spicq, Hébreux, vol. 1, pp. 94ff. B. Gerhardsson, The Testing of God's Son, Lund, 1966; P. Pokorný, "The Temptation Stories and their Intention," in NTS, vol. 20, 1974, pp. 115–127.

²⁹ Heb 2:18. Since compassion was indispensable for the high priest of the new covenant, the Son of God had to take on human nature in order to acquire it, because participation in the same sufferings makes companions in misfortune compassionate and devoted. In addition, Christ henceforth lends his aid to humans. He is their βοηθός (Latin adjutor). Boetheia is a word used especially for medical care. A decree of Cos honors the physician Xenotimos, who "always brought help to those who needed it" (Dittenberger, Syl. 943, 12; third century BC; cf. IG, XI, 4, 633 and 693); Diodorus Siculus 14.71: "the help (or care, βοήθεια) of physicians became ineffective because of the seriousness of the illness. . . ." The βοήθημα is the "remedy"; cf. N. van Brock, Vocabulaire médical, Paris, 1961, pp. 244ff. — According to Luke 10:18; 11:21–22, Jesus is the "strong man" who expels Satan from sinful men whom he had possessed. The expulsions of minor demons were signs of the devil's defeat.

³⁰ Matt 6:13. A formula without OT parallel (cf. David: "Test me, try me," Ps 139, 23), but with equivalents in Rabbinic Judaism (cf. Str-B, vol. 1, p. 422). The best commentaries are those of J. Carmignac, "Fais que nous n'entrons pas dans la tentation," in RB, 1965, pp. 218–226; Recherches sur le "Notre Père," Paris, 1969, pp. 236–304; cf. T. van Bavel, "Inferas—Inducas: A propos de Mtth. VI, 13 dans les œuvres de saint Augustin," in Revue Bénédictine, 1959, pp. 348–351.

³¹ Homer, Il. 19.86–87; Od. 1.32, 34; Euripides, Or. 285; Phoen. 1612ff.; Plautus, Aul. 4.10.7; Prov 19:3; Philo, Alleg. Interp. 2.19; Decalogue 176; Flight 15; Worse Attacks Better 32, 122; Josephus, War 2.164.

³² Ὁ γὰρ θεὸς ἀπειραστός ἐ—στιν κακῶ—ν could be interpreted three ways: (1) God cannot be tempted to evil; (2) God has no experience of evils; (3) God cannot be tested by wicked humans (P. H. Davids, "The Meaning of ἀπειραστος in James 1:13," in NTS, vol. 24, 1978, pp. 386–392). The verbal adjective ἀπειραστος (biblical hapax), capable of bearing many nuances (the manuscripts write also ἀπείρατος, cf. Josephus, War 3.307: escape a calamity; 5.364: it was not a new experience for them; 7.262: the Sicarii did not fail to implement any plan that aimed at the ruining of their victims). It is used especially in Christian literature: Const. App. 2.8.2: ἀνὴρ ἀδόκιμος ἀπειραστος; Acts John 57, the presbyter to the apostle John, "To tempt you would be to tempt someone who cannot be tempted"; 90; Ps.-Ignatius, Ad Philip. 11: "how to tempt the untemptable?" (other references in J. B. Mayor, The Epistle of St. James, 3d ed., London, 1910, pp. 51–53). In Jas 1:13, ἀπειράστος is taken in an active sense, intensor malorum, by the versions (Vulgate Sah. Boh. Ethiop.): God does not push anyone into sin; but for one thing, this interpretation makes the following proposition a tautology (πειράζει δὲ αὐτὸς οὐδένα), and for another, this adversative δέ supposes precisely another meaning in the preceding proposition. In addition, almost all moderns adopt the passive sense (cf. ἀνήκεστος = uncurable; ἀβίωτος = intolerable; ἀματάβλητος = unchangeable) and understand it to mean that God cannot be tempted by any evil; “untemptable” means that he has no experience of evil and no evil can seduce him.

³³ Cf. K. G. Kuhn, “Πειρασμός, ἁμαρτία, σάρξ im N.T. und die damit zusammenhängenden Vorstellungen,” in ZTK, 1952, pp. 200–222. The equivalent of the rabbinic “evil inclination” (yesser hara’). Cf. J. Bonsirven, Judaïsme palestinien, vol. 2, pp. 18ff. W.D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism, 2d ed., London, 1955, pp. 20–35; R. E. Murphy, “Yéser in the Qumran Literature,” in Bib, 1958, pp. 334–344; J. Cantinat, Les Épîtres de saint Jacques et de saint Jude, Paris, 1973, on this verse.

³⁴ Rev 2:10, to the church at Smyrna: “Do not fear what you are about to suffer. See, the devil is at hand to throw some of you in prison, so that you will be tempted” (ἵνα πειρασθῆτε). St. Augustine explains: “Deus tentat, ut doceat; diabolus tentat, ut decipiat” (“God tempts in order to teach; the devil tempts in order to ensnare,” Serm. 2.3; 57.9; 71.10; En. in Ps. 55.2, 9, 11).

³⁵ Matt 4:3 (Luke 4:13), repeated in 1Thess 3:5 (cf. 1Chr 21:1; Zech 3:1-2). At Qumran, an analogous attribution of temptation to Belial: “He acts in their heart” (1QH 6.21–22); “shares in the manifestation of their wicked nature” (7.3–4); CD 4.13–18 (the three snares of Belial), 5.18–19: “Belial stirred up Jannes and his brother in his malignity, when Israel was saved for the first time”; 4QFlor, frag. 1–2, 1.8–9 (T. Benj. 6.7 = 7.2; for Jub. 17.16, it is Mastema who tempts Abraham). Cf. E. Fascher, Jesus und Satan, Halle, 1949; H. A. Kelly, “The Devil in the Desert,” in CBQ, 1964, pp. 190–220.

³⁶ 1Pet 4:12. Christians are scandalized at being unpopular and ostracized; but the Lord predicted that they would be handed over before tribunals, hated, and beaten (Mark 3:9-13; John 15:18-20; 16:33). The image of the furnace suggests anguish and dire danger. — According to Gal 4:14, St. Paul’s malady, his “thorn in the flesh,” was a “trial” for the faith of the Galatians: how could God’s envoy be so infirm and so unprovided for? How to resist the temptation to scorn or disdain him? To the contrary, the apostle says, the believers received the apostle “as an angel from God!”

³⁷ Cf. Ps 17:3; 66:10; Prov 27:21 (C. Spicq, “La Persécution, loi de la vie chrétienne,” in Hommage aux Catholiques suisses, Fribourg, 1954, pp. 87–99; B. Dehandschutter, “La Persécution des Chrétiens dans les Actes des Apôtres,” in J. Kremer, Les Actes des Apôtres, Gembloux-Louvain, 1979, pp. 541–546). Tertullian quotes a logion agraphon: “Neminem in temptatum regna coelestia consecuturum” (“No one can get into the kingdom of heaven without passing through temptation,” Bapt. 20); cf. J. Jeremias, Unknown Sayings, trans. R. H. Fuller, London, 1957, pp. 56–59.

³⁸ Luke 8:15. Cf. Recueil L. Cerfaux, 1962, vol. 3, pp. 111–122.

³⁹ Cf. J. Marty, Epître de Jacques, p. 28; 2Apoc. Bar. 52.6—“Enjoy yourselves in the sufferings that you now endure.”

⁴⁰ Joy dominates in all forms of trials and temptations (cf. W. Nauck, “Freude im Leiden,” in ZNW, 1955, pp. 66–80), because these are considered providential and therefore beneficent. The Christian accepts them as coming from God himself—whatever secondary causes there may be—“it is necessary” (Mark 13:7; E. Fascher, “Theologische Beobachtungen zu δει—,” in Neutestamentliche Studien für R. Bultmann, Berlin, 1954, pp. 228–254); cf. “the blessed passion.”

⁴¹ Rom 5:12—πάντες ἥμαρτον. Cf. H. Clavier, “Tentation et anamartésie dans le N.T.,” in RHPR, 1967, pp. 150–161.

⁴² 1Tim 6:9. Cupidity has grim consequences; this is a traditional theme (Sir 31:5—“the one who loves money will not be justified”; 8:2; 14:3ff.; 21:4; Prov 15:27; 23:4; 28:20; Matt 6:24; Mark 4:19; Luke 12:13ff.; Jas 5:1). St. Paul distinguishes riches (1Tim 6:17ff.) and those who want to get rich (Sir 27:1—ὁ ζητῶ—ν πληθύναι; Juvenal, Sat. 14.176: “dives qui fieri vult”; Anth. Pal. 11.2: ἤθελον ἄν πλουτεῖ—ν). These inevitably find occasion of sin in their path, and they fall (ε—μπίπτειν, iterative present): injustices, lies, exactions, frauds, swindles, thefts of all kinds, which are like so many baited snares that the greedy cannot resist; once caught, they cannot get free. Cf. Plutarch, De cupid. divit. (a sickness of the soul, a passion that is never satisfied); Crass. 1.4–5; 2.1; 3.1; 6.6; 14.5; Lucian, Nav. 27; at Qumran, 1QH 4.12; 3.26; CD 4.15–19. H. Kosmala, “The Three Nets of Belial,” in ASTI, Leiden, 1965, pp. 1–113.

⁴³ Rev 2:2. The apostles have ceaselessly warned the faithful against false apostles who seek to abuse them (Matt 24:1, 11, 24; 1Cor 6:9; 15:33; Gal

6:7) and exhort them to exercise spiritual judgment (Acts 20:29; 1Thess 5:21; 2Cor 11:13-15; Eph 4:14; 1John 3:7; 4:1—“Do not believe every spirit, but test the spirits to discern whether they are of God”); at Qumran, preachers of lies, “teachers of Ephraim,” 4QpNah 2.8 (A. M. Denis, Les Thèmes de connaissance dans le Document de Damas, Louvain, 1967, p. 106). Cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, pp. 278ff. E. Cothenet, “Les Prophètes chrétiens,” in M. Didier, L’Evangile selon Matthieu, Gembloux, 1972, pp. 299ff.; W. C. van Unnik, Sparsa Collecta, vol. 1, pp. 402–409; F. L. Hossfeld, I. Meyer, Prophet gegen Prophet, Fribourg, 1973; D. Hill, “False Prophets and Charismatics,” in Bib, 1976, pp. 327–348; M. Krämer, “Hütet euch vor den falschen Propheten,” Bib, 1976, pp. 349–377.

⁴⁴ 2Cor 13:5—“Test yourselves (πειράζετε) [to see_ whether you are in the faith; prove yourselves (δοκιμάζετε).” Cf. G. Therrien, Le Discernement dans les Ecrits pauliniens, Paris, 1973, pp. 46ff., 113.

⁴⁵ 1Cor 10:13. Cf. the opening of the Orestes of Euripides, quoted by Cicero: “There is no word so formidable, no bad fate, no evil that has come from the wrath of the heavenly beings, that human nature is not capable of bearing it” (Tusc. 4.9.63). Cf. the prayer of the Essene psalm (11QPsa 155.11 = 5ApocSyrPs 3.11): “Do not put me through a trial that is too difficult for me” (M. Philonenko, “L’Origine essénienne des cinq psaumes syriaques de David,” in Sem, vol. 9, 1959, p. 42).

⁴⁶ Rev 3:10. We can hardly be precise about whether this has to do with the persecutions of the first-second century or those of an Antichrist, a Nero redivivus in the course of history, or finally the troubles preceding the Parousia (cf. S. Brown, “The ‘Hour of Trial,’ Rev. II, 10,” in JBL, 1966, pp. 308–311). What is certain is that the Lord will keep his own from falling; their victory is secured in advance (John 16:33).

περιαίρέω

periaireo, to remove (from around) see also ε—ξαιρέω

periaireo, S 4014; EDNT 3.73; MM 504; L&N 13.38, 15.204, 54.24, 68.43; BAGD 645

Common in the LXX, where it most often translates the hiphil of the Hebrew sûr, “take away, remove,” this verb means literally “remove from around,” i.e., take off something that one is wearing, especially a garment¹ or a veil (Gen 38:19), like Moses when he spoke with God.² Next comes the meaning “to detach,” for example the anchors from a ship;³ and finally “remove” means “move away, cause to disappear,”⁴ as when hope of being saved from the storm fades to the point of disappearing altogether (imperfect passive, perieraito, Acts 27:20).

The sole theological usage of periaireo in the NT is in Heb 10:11, where the priests of the old covenant busy themselves with the offering of daily sacrifices, which, however, “can never take away sins.” The verb, like aphaireo (10:4) expresses first of all the idea of removing something that one has in oneself,⁵ the extraction of which is thought to be difficult (cf. Thucydides 1.108.3: rase fortifications). The idea is not that of a diverting or of an ordinary relinquishing but of a complete suppression. This nuance of abolition is well attested: the husband abrogates or annuls his wife’s vows (Num 30:13, 14, 16; hiphil of parar); the royal quality of the house of Saul is abolished;⁶ a dispute that is settled is said to be abolished (P.Got. 13, 11); the *stratego*i take away from the tax collectors any pretext or occasion for extortion (P.Panop.Beatty 2, 237; cf. Pap.Lugd.Bat. I, 21, 23). In the religious sphere, God totally removes sins (1Chr 21:8), removes injustices (Zeph 3:15), takes away infirmities (Deut 7:15) and death.⁷ But sin is so deeply embedded in humans that the OT economy was powerless to root it out.⁸ Only the sacrifice of Jesus Christ succeeded in removing it.

¹ Gen 38:14; Deut 21:13; Jdt 10:3; Jonah 3:6; UPZ 122, 13 (with violence = despoil, snatch). One removes a ring from one’s finger (Gen 41:42; Esth 3:10; Josephus, Ant. 19.185), an adornment or jewelry (Exod 32:2-3, 24; 33:6); Pss. Sol. 2.22, a cloak (Philo, Dreams 1.100); a woman “with bare head, stripped of the symbol of modesty” (Spec. Laws 3.56); Moses “took off his body, which enveloped him like a shell” (Virtues 76; cf. 111; trim one’s nails); “when the rest had been suppressed” (Rewards 172).

² Exod 34:34; a text used at 2Cor 3:16; cf. J. Goettsberger, “Die Hülle des Moses nach Ex. XXXIV und II. Kor. III,” in BZ, 1924, pp. 1–17.

³ Acts 27:40 (cf. R. Ricard, “Les Navigations de saint Paul: La Tempête de quatorze jours en Méditerranée,” in Études, 1927, pp. 458ff.); cf. “cut off”: “Cyrus removed archery from the military exercises” (Xenophon, Cyr. 2.1.21); in peace offerings, one removes the fat, the lobe of the liver with the kidneys (Lev 3:4, 9-10, 15; 4:8-9, 31, 35; 7:4). On administrative, financial, or judicial lists, one strikes the names of the deceased (P.Tebt. 300, 11; Stud.Pal. XX, 36, 8), or former owners (P.Oslo 105, 8; SB 6800, 7; 7360, 11; 10249, 12; from AD 59); a figure is crossed out (P.Cair.Zen. 59147, 3).

⁴ To remove foreign gods or mediums is to get them out of Israel (Josh 24:14, 23; 1Sam 7:3, 4; 28:3; 2Chr 32:12; 33:15; 34:33; Jer 4:1); cf. Prov

27:22—“his folly will not depart”; Bar 4:34—“I will take away the joy of his numerous population”; Josephus, War 1.179: “Crassus carried off two thousand gold talents” from the temple at Jerusalem; Ant. 20.212: “Herod plundered the Holy Land’s artistic treasures to decorate Berytus.” Cf. P.Cair.Zen. 59659, 7: thieves stole two asses belonging to Zeno.

⁵ Eli says to Hannah, “Rid yourself of your wine” (1Sam 1:14); cf. Ps 119:43—“Do not remove the word of truth from my mouth” (hiphil of the Hebrew nasal); cf. Exod 8:4, 7: “Take away the frogs from me and my people.”

⁶ 2Sam 3:10 (hiphil of abar); Zech 10:11; cf. 2Macc 4:38.

⁷ Exod 10:17; cf. Num 17:20 (hiphil of shajaj, cause to cease); Ps 119:22: “Remove insults and scorn far from me” (Hebrew galal); Jer 4:4—“Get rid of the hardness of your heart”; Prov 4:24; Philo: remove, cut off sin or impurity (Plant. 99, 103, 109; Alleg. Interp. 2.63; 3.21, 127); Marcus Aurelius 12.2.2: “If you grow used to doing likewise, you will deliver yourself from the thousand things that trouble you.”

⁸ With regard to a scheming monk in the sixth century: “I pray your fatherly Holiness . . . to be zealous in rooting out impiety from our monasteries” (P.Fouad 86, 18); T. Job 43.4—“Our sins are taken away, our iniquity is buried.”

περικάρμα, περίψημα

perikatharma, peripsema, wash-water, offscouring, filth; ransom

perikatharma, S 4027; TDNT 3.430–431; EDNT 3.74; NIDNTT 1.479–480, 3.102; MM 506; L&N 49.53; BAGD 647 | peripsema, TDNT 6.84–93; EDNT 3.80; NIDNTT 1.479–480; MM 510; L&N 79.53; BAGD 653

1Cor 4:13—“We have become as the filth of the earth, the refuse of all, up to the present” (hos perikatharmata tou kosmou egenethemen, panton peripsema heos arti). These two terms, which are quite vulgar and very close in meaning (cf. Hesychius, peripsema: perikatamagma), are used for the wash-water and scrapings from dirty dishes, which is thrown out after washing or purification,¹ thus any kind of uncleanness or filth.² Finally, they are terms of abuse and base insult when applied to humans.³ No doubt this nuance of lowliness is to be retained in 1Cor 4:13. It is even probable that the apostle was treated as “filth” by the people in the course of some disturbance at Ephesus, Corinth, or elsewhere.

In Prov 21:18 (perikatharma, translating the Hebrew koper) and Tob 5:19 (peripsema), the two nouns have the sense of ransom.⁴ The second noun has a religious meaning in Dionysius of Alexandria: Christians “after caring for their brother (who had the plague) died themselves, having transferred to themselves the death of others . . . departing as the offscouring of their brothers” (apiontes auton peripsema, in Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 7.22.7). The purifying agent, in effect, is thought to absorb the impurity of the purified object (cf. P. Tebt. 550: perikath [?]) and thus cleanse it; and since St. Paul adds a complement to each term (“of the world” . . . “of all”), his words recall the formula peripsema hemon genou (“become our offscouring”) pronounced at Athens, according to Photius (Lex., p.425, 3) and the Suda, when criminals were thrown into the sea as expiatory victims for warding off public calamity.⁵ On the sixth and seventh of the month Thargelion, the city was purified (polin kathairein) by the cathartic ritual of the pharmakoi, which could be compared to the scapegoat of Lev 26:21-22: Two men who were driven through the city were supposed to take on its impurities. Then they were chased from the city to get rid of the uncleanness with which they were laden. Thanks to these “human cures,”⁶ the evil is abolished. We cannot exclude from 1Cor 4:13 this sense of sacrifice through which the guilt-bearer expiates and purifies those who offer him. Thus the meaning would be that St. Paul, scorned and rejected by people, sacrifices himself for them (2Cor 4:10ff.; 6:9; Phil 2:17); he is willing to become an expiatory victim, and by so doing he assimilates his apostolic function to that of the crucified Redeemer, Christ (Gal 6:17; Col 1:24-25).

¹ Ammonius, p. 143: καθάρματα τὰ μετὰ τὸ καθαρθῆναι ἀπορριπτούμενα; cf. Moulton-Milligan, on the word περικάθαρμα (intensive of κάθαρμα; cf. Hauck, on this word, in TDNT, vol. 3, pp. 430–431).

² Julius Pollux, Onom. 5.163: τῶ—ν ε—ν ται—ς τριόδοις καθαρμάτων ε—κβλητότερος, κοπρίων ε—κβλητότερος; synonyms: βδέλυγμα, σκύβαλα, κοπρός—κοπρία (cf. L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 1, pp. 73–74; idem, Documents de l’Asie mineure, pp. 72–73).

³ Demosthenes, C. Mid. 103: “The despicable Euctenon, that scum”; Corona 128: “What have you done, you slime, with virtue—you and yours”; Aristophanes, Plut. 454; Apollonius Rhodius: “Callimachus, the outcast (τὸ κάθαρμα), the butt, the hardhead” (Anth. Pal. 11.275); Philo, Moses 1.30; Virtues 174: “He considers the others as refuse, as nothing” (καθάρματα, τὸ μηδέν); Josephus, War 4.241: “The scum and offscouring of the whole country, these wretches . . . invaded the holy city”; Epictetus 3.22.78:

“Priam sired fifty no-goods” (περικαθάρματα); Lucian, Hermot. 81, ἀνδράποδα καὶ καθάρματα (cf. H. D. Betz, Lukian von Samosata und das Neue Testament, p. 67; numerous references in Wettstein). But περίψημα is also used as a formula for unworthiness and humility, as in this epitaph from Carthage, where a widow has incised concerning her husband: εὐψύχει, Κύριέ μου Μάξιμε, ε—γὼ σου περίψημα τῆς καλῆς ψυχῆς (CIL VIII, 1, 12924); cf. Barn. 4.9; 6.5.

⁴ This meaning of περίψημα—the price of liberation from a fault—is confirmed by Hesychius, who gives as equivalents ἀντίλυτρα, ἀντίψυχα; by P.Mich. 473, 18 (beginning of the second century): “Since you caused me to lose 1,200 drachmas, consider that amount a ransom (reparation) for my son” (ὡς ἔβλαψές με χιλίας διακοσίας δραχμάς, περίψημά μου τοῦ υἱ—οὔ ἀπέλθωσιν, meaning so that the son of Tabatheus, who was guilty of killing Menas, might escape criminal prosecution); cf. J. Modrzejewski, “Quelques remarques à propos de l’homicide et la rançon dans le droit d’Egypte romaine,” in Iura, 1957, pp. 93–101). Less clear is the letter of Didumaris to Paniskos: ὅτι ε—σώθητε μετὰ τῶ—ν τέκνων ὑμῶ—ν καὶ περίψημα ὑμῶ—ν τὰ παρελ. οτα (P.Petaus 29, 5), which the editors translate, “Ich habe mich sehr gefreut zu hören, daß ihr mit euren Kindern gerettet seid und die vergangenen Ereignisse euch zum Heil gerieten (?)” (“I was very pleased to hear that you, together with your children, have been rescued and the things that happened have turned to your salvation”). They adopt the restoration παρελ. οτα = παρελθόντα and comment “Mit περίψημα in der Bedeutung ‘Sühnopfer, Sündenbock’ ergibt das als Sinn ‘Das, was geschehen ist, hat euch rein, frei gemacht.’ Faßt man περίψημα als ‘verachtenswerten Gegenstand, Diener’ usw., könnte man etwa ‘ihr seid Herr der Situation’ interpretieren. Beides ist nicht recht befriedigend.” (“With περίψημα understood to mean ‘atonement, scapegoat,’ the meaning is ‘what happened has cleansed you, freed you.’ If we understand περίψημα as referring to something to be scorned, a slave, and so on, then we could almost translate, ‘You are master of the situation.’ Neither is fully satisfactory.”) Cf. περικάθαρμα, P.Oxy. 2331, 10.

⁵ Cf. Ign. Eph. 8.1: περίψημα ὑμῶ—ν = “I am your expiatory victim”; 18.1: “my spirit is the victim of the cross.”

⁶ These φαρμακοί are attested at Ephesus, from the sixth century BC (Hipponax, frags. 4 and 37; ed. Bergk; cf. O. Masson, “Sur un papyrus contenant des fragments d’Hipponax: P. Oxy. 2176,” in REG, 1949, pp. 302, 311ff.), at Athens (the Thargeloi), Abdera (Ovid, Ib. 465–469), Apollonia (Dittenberger, Syl. 707), Cyprus (Strabo 14.8.3), Marseille (Servius, on Aen. 3.57; cf. PW, vol. 14, col. 2143), etc. Cf. L. Moulinier, Le Pur et l’impur dans la pensée des Grecs, Paris, 1952, pp. 95–100; E. des Places, La Religion grecque, Paris, 1969, pp. 92ff. Stählin, “περίψημα,” in TDNT, vol. 6, pp. 84–93.

περιλείπομαι

perileipomai, to remain (after someone or something has been removed)

perileipomai, S 4035; EDNT 3.74; NIDNTT 3.247; MM 506; L&N 85.66; BAGD 648

This passive verb refers to the result of a subtraction, that which remains. According to 2Macc 1:31, after the liquid was poured on the wood and the sacrifice was consumed by fire, “Nehemiah ordered them to pour the remaining liquid on the large stones”;¹ in 8:14, it refers to the Israelites’ remaining property after the high priests have taken what they want.² It is used for ships that succeed in making it through (Polybius 1.37.2), fields that remain uncultivated (UPZ 110, 168), a remaining portion (BGU 1132, 12; from 13 BC), animals reserved for sacrifice (PSI 409, 12).

But this verb is also used for human survivors (P. Giss. 82, 23: pros to hemas tous eti perileipomenous), “the remnant of Israel and of Judah” (2Chr 34:21), old men who would have seen Solomon’s temple in its original glory (Hag 2:3), the survivors of a batallion received by Agesilaus (Plutarch, Ages. 22.8). It is in this sense that 1Thess 4:15, 17 contrasts the dead (literally, “those who have fallen asleep,” tous koimethentas), and “we who are (still) alive, those left” (hemeis hoi zontes, hoi perileipomenoi). The present passive participle perileipomenoi was current with this meaning in the first century: “Those of the priests who survive (hoi perileipomenoi ton hiereon) reconstitute the genealogies, extracts from the archives” (Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.35); “Every time one of the brothers was led away, those who remained (hoi perileipomenoi) said, ‘Do not dishonor us, brother’” (4Macc 13:18); at the martyrdom of the seventh brother, the tyrant thought that the mother, “already having lost so many sons . . . would urge the one who remained to obey and save himself” (12:6; cf. Herodian, Hist. 2.1.7).

¹ Τὸ περιλειπόμενον ὕδωρ. C. Mugler comments on περιλείπειν, leave as a remainder: “a verbal expression indicating that a subtraction involving two geometric elements, lines, areas, or volumes leaves a remainder” (Terminologie géométrique, p.343).

² Τὰ περιλελειμμένα. Cf. PSI 571, 14: “I have nothing left”; Dittenberger, Syl. 852, 46: ἔτι πλείστη περιλείπετο ὕλη. —πειρλειπη in SB 8979, 12 is a false reading; cf. H. C. Youtie, Scriptiunculae, vol. 2, pp. 956ff.

περιπίπτω

peripipto, to fall around or beside, turn over, to befall, to happen upon see also ε—μπίπτω; πίπτω

peripipto, S 4045; TDNT 6.173; EDNT 3.76; NIDNTT 1.608; MM 507; L&N 15.85, 37.11, 90.71; BDF § 202; BAGD 649

The primary sense of this word (“fall around, beside; turn over”) and the secondary sense (“collide,” Plutarch, Them. 15.4) are both found in 2Macc 9:7, where after Antiochus has suddenly tipped out of his chariot “all the limbs of his body were tortured because of the violence of his fall” (dyscherei ptomati peripesonta).¹

Things that happen to us are said to “befall” us (Epictetus 3.2.1; SB 8858, 15; 10654, 6; C.Ord.Ptol. 83, 30), or else we “fall into” them (2Macc 6:13; Josephus, Ant. 20.48); and when we meet people unexpectedly we “fall upon” them (Josephus, War 3.499; P.Oxy. 1639, 20). Usually the circumstance is unpredictable or unforeseen. This element of chance, whether lucky or unlucky, is expressed by the phrase peripiptein periptomati. Thus it was Ruth’s luck to happen upon a parcel of land belonging to Boaz (Ruth 2:3), and the messenger bringing news of Saul’s death happened to be on Mount Gilboa (2Sam 1:6; cf. BGU 1881, 8). The circumstantial character of the situation, event, or meeting is seen partly from the use of the verb predominantly with ean (T. Dan 4.5; P.Mert. 43, 5), ei (PSI 1265, 11; P.Tebt. 704, 20), mepote (UPZ 108, 34; 144, 33); cf. Menander, Dysk. 244: “If something should happen to her, the blame will touch me as well.”

All these examples are of untoward events or sad situations: to be suddenly stricken with a punishment (2Macc 6:13; cf. Josephus, Ant. 20.48); touched by misery and need (PSI 767, 42; SB 9401, 7), danger (Josephus, Life 83), captivity and servitude (Ant. 8.229; T. Jos. 10.3), serpents and scorpions (Philo, Alleg. Interp. 2.84, 86), shipwreck (T. Abr. A 19), all sorts of misfortunes (Josephus, War 7.219) and evils (2Macc 10.4; Marcus Aurelius 2.11; Dittenberger, Syl. 495, 58), notably sickness,² all “that a person tries to avoid” (Epictetus 3.2.1; cf. Philo, Spec. Laws 1.224). It is with these connotations in mind that we read of the misadventure of the man who was traveling from Jerusalem to Jericho when “he suddenly fell into the hands of brigands” (lestais periepesen).³ Cf. the Pythagorean Hipparchus: “for this reason being about to fall into the hands of either brigands or a tyrant” (e lestais dia touto mellontes peripiptein e tyranno, in Stobaeus, Flor. 108.81; vol. 4, p. 982; cf. Diogenes Laertius 4.50: pleon . . . lestais periepese; Artemidorus Daldianus, Onir. 3.65). In a context that is just as catastrophic, the ship taking Paul to Rome washes up on the island of Malta where it strikes “a place between two seas.”⁴

Jas 1:2 uses the verb in a figurative and pejorative sense—as do Prov 11:5 (periptei adikia), P.Tebt. 278, 32 (thymou peripesite, beginning of the first century), and Philo (Unchang. God 73)—with respect to the various temptations to which Christians may be exposed (hotan peirasmois peripesete poikilois). There is no reason to limit these temptations to trials that come from without, but the choice of this verb—rather than eisphero (Matt 6:19), eiserchomai (26:41; Mark 14:38; Luke 22:40, 46), lambano (1Cor 10:13), empipto (1Tim 6:9), hypomeno (Jas 1:12)—emphasizes that they are unexpected, unlooked for;⁵ they are abrupt encounters, and one bumps into them as into obstacles. On the other hand, the encounter brings grief and regret; it tends to disturb the Christian’s peace. One is disoriented by this “putting to the test” of one’s faithfulness. Cf. 1Pet 1:6—“suffering grief in various trials” (lypethentes en poikilois peirasmois). This is why St. James urges the opposite response—“count it a complete joy”—because it is the occasion for a greater good.

¹ Diodorus Siculus 17.12.5: “The Theban horsemen fell down on their own weapons.”

² 2Macc 9:21; Josephus, Ant. 10.25; Ag. Apion 1.305, 313. Περιπίπτω is part of the medical vocabulary, cf. Hippocrates, Dioscorides, Galen (in W. K. Hobart, Medical Language, pp. 129ff.). In the course of a civil war at Gortyn in the third century BC, the physician Hermias of Cos “saved a good number of citizens smitten by wounds and by evils that were not benign diseases” (decree of Cnossos; Dittenberger, Syl. 528, 10). In the fourth century AD, the public physician Aurelius Eulogius, after examining the body of the εἰ—ρήναρχος of Teis, sends his medical certificate to the λογιστής of Oxyrhynchus: “lifeless corpse, no trace of wound or contusion, succumbed to an acute illness” (ὄξειῳ νοσήματι περιπεσῶ—ν, P.Rein. 92, 12).

³ Luke 10:30; cf. F. Field, Notes on the Translation, p. 61.

⁴ Acts 27:41, περιπεσόντες δὲ εἰ—ς τόπον διθάλασσον (the Vulgate transliterates, “in locum dithalassum”). It is not possible to identify this τόπος with certainty. Διθάλασσος (bimaris, Horace) was a term for Corinth, which is built on the isthmus that separated the Aegean Sea from the Ionian Sea; its two ports (Cenchraea and Lechaion) open onto these “two seas” respectively. Strabo explains that “the Euxine Sea is a sort of double sea” where two promontories (to the east and the west) narrow the intermediary channel and form two large basins (2.5.22); he judges that “it is not likely that the Atlantic Ocean is divided into two seas (διθάλαττον) separated by isthmuses narrow enough to block a complete circuit” (1.1.8). At Malta, some have suggested a channel separating Malta and the isle of Salmonetta, where there is a promontory jutting out that is battered by waves on two sides. More likely, reference is made to a sand bank, a shoal where the water breaks. Dio Chrysostom, Or. 5.9 is cited: Syrta is famous because of its shoals (βραχέα καὶ διθάλασσα) and its long sand banks (καὶ ταινία μακρά); cf. J. Renié, Actes des Apôtres, Paris, 1949, p. 344; E. Haenchen, Acts, pp. 708ff.

⁵ Cf. Josephus, Ant. 4.293: καὶ μὴ τότε ἂ δει— ποιει—ν ε—πιζητοῦντες ἀπαρασκεύαστοι τοι—ς καιροί—ς περιπέσητε.

περιποιέομαι, περιποίησις

peripoieomai, to preserve, reserve, keep for oneself, acquire; to bring about, to effect for oneself; peripoiesis, an acquiring or preserving

peripoieomai, S 4046; EDNT 3.76; NIDNTT 2.838–839; MM 507; L&N 21.24; BAGD 650 | peripoiesis, S 4047; EDNT 3.76; NIDNTT 2.838–839; MM 508; L&N 57.62, 90.74; BAGD 650

In the middle voice, the verb peripoieo means “preserve, reserve, keep for oneself.” “The one who seeks to preserve his life (ten psychen autou peripoiesasthai) will lose it (apolesei auten), and the one who loses it will save it (zoogonesei auten)” (Luke 17:33). This meaning of “saving a life” occurs repeatedly in secular Greek¹ as well as in the LXX,² where it often contrasts with apothnesko (Ezek 13:19; cf. Ps 79:11) and apollyo (“the profit that they had gained is lost,” Jer 31:36; cf. Prov 6:32; Heb 10:39).

The meaning “acquire for oneself” predominates, whether with respect to goods (Gen 31:18; 36:6; Hebrew rajash), a reputation (1Macc 6:44, with the reflexive pronoun, which is pleonastic: peripoesai heauto onoma aionion; cf. Xenophon, An. 5.6.17; Ep. Arist. 121; P.Ryl. 712, 4; PSI 1075, 7), power (Thucydides 1.9.2), the crown (Josephus, Ant. 14.386), the goodwill of another (Polybius 3.6.13), a friend.³ Thus God has acquired a people (Isa 43:21), the church.⁴ He has become its acquirer and owner;⁵ he has exclusive rights to the redeemed; they are his personal property, the people whom he has acquired (laos eis peripoiesin, 1Pet 2:9; cf. Exod 19:5). The emphasis is on the original acquisition and the strictly guarded ownership of the “holy nation,” over which God retains permanent mastery (cf. Sir Prologue 11), but there is an affective value; the se^oulâh (Hebrew) is a treasure that one possesses as one’s own.⁶

Peripoieomai also means “to bring about, to effect for oneself,” as when deacons “who serve well gain a good standing for themselves.”⁷ The meaning can be close to the active “procure” (cf. Prov 22:9; 2Macc 15:21), common in the inscriptions for “supply resources” for a people or a city. A decree from Samos in the third century BC, in honor of Boulagoras: “He procured many advantages and much profit for the city through his judgments” (SEG I, 366, 22); a century later, a decree of the Athenian klerouchoi for Euboulos of Marathon: “through his sustained efforts, he often secured the interests of the Athenians of Delos” (I. Delos I, 1498, 16); a decree of Hanisa in Cappadocia in favor of Apollonius, “bringing his zeal and ardor to bear, through a legal proceeding he procured for the people the inheritance (claimed by others).”⁸

The substantive peripoiesis, a technical term in business language, rare in the LXX and the papyri,⁹ is used three times in the NT in an eschatological sense, and in a formula that appears to be stereotyped: Christians are predestined eis peripoiesin soterias, i.e., for the possessing of salvation,¹⁰ or eis peripoiesin doxes (for the possessing of glory, 2Thess 2:14). In Heb 10:39—“We are not people for shrinking back and being destroyed (eis apoleian), but people of faith for the possessing of life (eis peripoiesin psyches; the nomen actionis for the act of possessing).” The saving of the soul, as opposed to perdition, is the definition of the spiritual salvation of a person, called soteria psychon in 1Pet 1:9.¹¹

¹ Xenophon, Cyr. 4.4.10, Cyrus says to the Assyrian prisoners: “Today by obeying me you save your lives” (τὰς ψυχὰς περιποιήσασθε); meaning to economize (Xenophon, Oec. 2.10; 11.10); cf. to spare (Isa 31:5; Hebrew pasah), to keep (1Sam 25:39, Hebrew hasaj; 2Sam 12:3; Jdt 11:9; Job 27:17).

² Ezek 13:18—“The lives of my people are ensnared, and they save their (own) lives” (καὶ ψυχὰς περιποιούντο, piel of the Hebrew hayâh); 2Macc 3:35, Heliodorus offers a thanksgiving sacrifice to God, who has preserved his life (τω— τὸ ζῆν περιποιήσαντι). Usually περιποιει—ν, “leave,” has no object and means “leave alive” (Gen 12:12; Exod 1:16; 22:17; Num 22:33; Josh 6:17; 9:20; Judg 21:11; 1Sam 15:3, 9, 15; 1Kgs 18:5). Cf. 2Chr 14:12—“So many Ethiopians fell that not one of them was left alive,” ὥστε μὴ εἶναι ε—ν αὐτοί—ς περιποίησιν (Hebrew mihyâh, literally surviving).

³ Menander, Dysk. 815: “You want to make a friend (βούλει περιποιήσασθαί τινα φίλον). Try—and good luck.”

⁴ Eph 1:14—ει—ς ἀπολύτρωσιν τῆς περιποίησεως (Inbesitznahme, H. Schlier, Der Brief an die Epheser, Düsseldorf, 1957, p. 71; “The down payment on our inheritance, in consideration of the redemption that will be

its acquisition”; N. Hugedé, Ephésiens, p. 44, who gives peripoiesis an active sense: “the fact of possessing.” M. Barth, Ephesians, vol. 1, p. 97, distinguishes between the act of saving or preserving life, acquiring a piece of property, the state of ownership; cf. 1Pet 2:9; Acts 20:28—τὴν ἐκκλησίαν τοῦ θεοῦ, ἣν περιεποιήσατο. For the textual criticism of this verse, cf. E. Jacquier, Actes, pp. 615. For the theology, cf. J. Dupont, Discours de Milet, pp. 168ff.

⁵ The most common meaning of περιποιέω in the papyri is “acquire, obtain”; cf. P.Oxy. 2349, 38: τῷ περιποιηθησομένῳ (AD 70); P.Brem. 22, 4; P.Lond. 1915, 26; P.Mich. 87, 7; the sheep that I have bought for you (third century BC); SB 7246, 11; 8444, 63—“they often got nothing more.”

⁶ On the se^oulâh, cf. Deut 7:6; 14:2; 1Chr 29:3; Mal 3:17 (F. Dreyfus, “Le thème de l’héritage dans l’Ancien Testament,” in RSPT, 1958, pp. 15ff., 27, 38; H. Wildberger, Jahwes Eigentumsvolk, Zurich, 1960); cf. P.Oxy. 1892, 34 (sixth century).

⁷ 1Tim 3:13. Βαθμός is a degree or rank. To the references given by C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, vol. 1, p. 416ff., add for this idea P.Tebt. 703, 276: “If you are irreproachable in your conduct, you will be considered worthy of advancement” (third century BC); inscriptions from Sardis and Side: κόμης πρώτου βαθμοῦ = “comes primi ordinis” (cf. J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1968, p. 518, n. 478).

⁸ C. Michel, Recueil, n. 546, 18 (commented on by L. Robert, Noms indigènes, pp. 457ff.); cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 495, 135: οὐκ ὀλίγα χρήματα περιεποίησε τῇ πόλει (decree of Olbia for Protogenes); decree of Araxa in Lycia for Orthagoras: “He served all the interests of the city” (in J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. IV, 68). In the papyri: “I will secure two loads for you” (ἵνα σοι ἐν Μεμνονεῖοις περιποιήσω ἀγῶγια δύο, SB 6096,4 = O.Bodl. 1999); bring about a marriage (ibid. 8003, 4); P.Oxy. 2148, 17 (in AD 27); fulfill one’s military service (UPZ 14, 12).

⁹ 2Chr 14:12; Mal 3:17 (Hebrew se^oulâh); Hag 2:9—“In this place, I will give . . . peace of soul for the obtaining (of salvation) to whoever contributes to the building of this temple” (added to the Hebrew). In the three occurrences in the papyri, two mean property: P.Tebt. 317, 26, κατὰ τὸ τῆς περιποιήσεως δίκαιον (second century AD); SB 10537, 34: καὶ περιποιήσιν ἀποδείξαντες ἐμοῦ (third century); cf. P.Rein. 52, 2: “You have already been instructed in writing to give an accounting for the preserving (or acquiring, or keeping?) and shipping of the grain” (third-fourth century); T. Zeb. 2.8—ἵνα γένηται περιποίησις τῷ —Ἰωσήφ.

¹⁰ 1Thess 5:9 (cf. B. Rigaux, Thessaloniens, pp. 570ff.); Ps.-Plato, Def. 415 c: Σωτηρία: περιποίησης ἀβλαβῆς (“salvation: the act of preserving safe and sound”); Isa 31:5—περιποιήσεται καὶ σώσει; 1Macc 6:44—σω—σαι τὸν λαὸν αὐτοῦ καὶ περιποιῆσαι.

¹¹ That toward which faith is directed, its goal, is the salvation of the soul (cf. Jas 1:21), which will only be completed in the future (Jas 5:21). Cf. Enoch 48.8: “In the day of their trouble and their affliction, they will not save their souls”; Book of Mysteries: “They do not know what will happen to them, nor how to save their souls from the mystery to come” (1Q27 1.4); texts cited by G. Dautzenberg, “Σωτηρία ψυχῶ—ν (I Petr. I, 9),” in BZ, 1964, pp. 269–276; idem, Sein Leben bewahren, Munich, 1966; cf. P. Tebt. 56, 11: σω—σαι ψυχὰς πολλὰς (with respect to a famine; second century BC). In secular Greek, περιποιέω often means to save a city or a country (Thucydides 2.25.2; Josephus, War 1.180); in Philo, it usually means “procure for oneself, secure” wealth (Conf. Tongues 112; Flacc. 130), glory and liberty (Good Man Free 94, 138), joy (Prelim. Stud. 161), stability (Heir 125; Good Man Free 96), but above all “appropriate, acquire, enter into possession of” virtue (Rewards 27, 31, 51; Dreams 1.162; Spec. Laws 1.149; Cherub. 12, 13; Worse Attacks Better 64, 120), which allows a person to secure a perfect existence (Philo, Husbandry 157; Drunkenness 58; Flacc. 138; Flight 17); resting in God and the contemplative life especially gain peace and joy (Flight 174, 176); God himself supplies the victory (Moses 1.216) and the Powers that give quality to that which is without quality (Spec. Laws 1.47). It is God who grants that we may procure the Beautiful (Alleg. Interp. 3.136) and “enter into possession of that which was not ours before” (Unchang. God 86).

περιφρονέω

periphroneo, to be reflective, circumspect; to scorn, despise see also καταφρονέω

periphroneo, S 4065; TDNT 3.633; EDNT 3.80; NIDNTT 1.461–462; MM 510; L&N 76.25; BAGD 653

This biblical hapax has positive and pejorative meanings. The positive sense is “to be reflective, circumspect.”¹ The pejorative sense is “to scorn, despise,” which is the meaning in Titus 2:15—“Let no one despise you” (medeis sou periphroneito). So it seems that this verb is synonymous with kataphroneo, since Paul wrote to Timothy “Let no one despise your youth” (medeis . . . kataphroneito, 1Tim 4:12). There is nevertheless a shade of difference; the latter verb means “turn up one’s nose at, have no respect for, take no account of, pay no heed to.”² Again and again in the papyri of P. Enteux. complainants consider that this or that official pays no attention to them (44, 4; 68, 11) because they are orphans (9, 6), or aged (25, 8; 26, 9; 48, 7), or foreign (29, 11), or widowed (13, 6). In the case of Timothy, at the head of the church at Ephesus, his youth was a handicap because it inclined the believers to despise or simply ignore his authority.

Titus, on the other hand, had an energetic temperament. He gave firm instruction and corrected sinners. He ran the risk of running afoul of the weak points and the temper of the Cretans, who might stand up to him or at least react disdainfully. Thus the inhabitants of Corcyra, priding themselves on their superiority, treated the Corinthians disdainfully (periphronountes, Thucydides 1.25.4), and Pericles “out of a presumptuous confidence, for the pleasure of winning and to show off his strength, faced the Lacedaemonians.”³ Thus there is an element of insolence in periphronesis, as in the case of children who rebel against their parents’ authority and fail to show them the respect (ten timen) that is due them.⁴

Nevertheless, periphrono and kataphrono are often synonymous. Audacious and arrogant false teachers “despise authority” (kataphronountas, 2Pet 2:10); this is rejection and rebellion. For their part, Eleazar and the Maccabeus brother despise pain (4Macc 6:9; 14:1, periphrono); cf. Christ, who despised the shame of the cross (kataphrono, Heb 12:2), and in the papyri of the seventh-eighth century, where more than mere negligence or abstention is involved: “I had to abandon my humble occupation.”⁵

¹ Cf. περίφρων, describing Artemidora in her epitaph (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 58, 3), but 4Macc 8:28—the Maccabean brothers “were disdainful of passion”; cf. Plutarch, Cam. 6.3: “starting from such weak and despised origins.”

² The slave of two masters holds to one and pays no attention to the other (Matt 6:24); taking no account of little children (Matt 18:10), of the infinite goodness of God (Rom 2:4; cf. 2Cor 11:22); Christian slaves show inadequate respect for their Christian owners (1Tim 6:2).

³ Plutarch, Per. 31.1 (περιφρονήσαι); cf. Thes. 1.5: “when the fable boldly flaunts (αὐθαδῶς περιφρονῆ) credibility and is completely out of line with verisimilitude.”

⁴ Ὅσοι δ’ ἂν τῶν νέων περιφρονῶσι τοὺς γονεῖς, Josephus, Ant. 4.260 (cf. Deut 21:18); cf. 5.200—“their troubles were due to their contempt for the laws.”

⁵ P.Apoll. 27, 5: καὶ ἠναγκάσθην περιφρονῆσαι τοῦ ε—λαχίστου μου πράγματος; cf. P.Ross.Georg. III, 51, 22; SB 4774, 9.

πίπτω

pipto, to fall, fail

see also ε—μπίπτω; περιπίπτω

pipto, S 4098; TDNT 6.161–166; EDNT 3.90–91; NIDNTT 1.608, 610–611; MM 514; L&N 13.59, 13.97, 13.122, 15.118, 15.119, 17.22, 20.60, 23.105, 24.40, 24.93, 30.107, 56.32, 68.49, 75.7, 87.56, 90.71; BDF §§77, 80, 81(3); BAGD 659–660

In the Bible, sparrows and grain fall to the earth.¹ When the subject is a human, sometimes the word refers to a fall,² sometimes to the act of throwing oneself on someone's neck.³ Usually one falls on one's face to venerate someone;⁴ directed toward God, this prostration is an act of adoration. Metaphorically, those who fall, as opposed to those who remain standing, are those who fail, sinners,⁵ with a connotation of degeneration: "Remember whence you have fallen" (Rev 2:5; cf. Luke 10:18).

But there are different sorts of falls. If the paidotribes teaches the ephebes "how to overcome enemies without falling on the ground" (SEG XX, 662, 10), it is nevertheless possible to stumble and fall but rise again (Rom 11:11—"Did they stumble so as to fall?"—me eptaisan hina pesosin), which is the situation of the just and of the Jews, and which gives grounds for hope.⁶

The interpretation of 1Cor 13:8 is more delicate: he agape oudepote piptei,⁷ which has sometimes been understood to mean "Love never falls (from its rank)" (E. B. Allo) or "never loses its prerogatives."⁸ The apostle contrasts agape with the passing charisms that will disappear (katargeomai) and cease (pauomai), bringing together the present (the present indicative, piptei) and the future (oudepote, "never at any time") and making ou . . . pipto synonymous with meno ("abide").⁹ Clearly excellence is implied,¹⁰ and the context shows that staying power is involved. But is the point that love is long-lived or that it is permanent? In the latter case, the text would mean that love holds fast, does not yield, does not let itself be defeated;¹¹ consequently it does not cease to act and to inspire virtuous activity. But on the one hand, it must grow cold in the last days (Matt 24:12); and on the other hand pipto is predominantly used in the sense of "succumb, fall dead, perish"¹² or—when the subject is a house, a wall, a city—"collapse, be annihilated."¹³ While this meaning does not necessarily exclude the one discussed before, the text would mean that love is never abolished, never ceases to exist, even in heaven.¹⁴ It is indestructible, en aphtharsia (Eph 6:24), whereas faith and hope are limited with respect to time.

¹ Matt 10:29; 13:4-5; Mark 4:4-8; Luke 8:5-14; John 12:24; cf. the mountains (Hos 10:8; Luke 23:30); hail (Exod 9:19), the sun (Rev 7:16), a hair (1Sam 14:45; 1Kgs 1:52), a cloak (2Kgs 2:14), a sword (2Sam 20:8; 2Kgs 6:6); someone falls from the roof (Deut 22:8); an animal falls into a clay pot (Lev 11:33). Cf. Josephus, Ant. 4.275; 19.87; Strabo 2.5.8; Archimedes, Spir. 15.14—“one of the lines falls at the end of the spiral”; Eusebius, Praep. Evang. 1.9.21: “the period falls before the Trojan War.”

² Mark 9:20; into fire or water (Matt 17:15), into a pit (15:14; cf. Menander, Dysk. 628: “He was going down when he slipped and fell”—καὶ πέτωκεν—to the bottom of a well), in the desert (Num 14:32; Heb 3:17); cf. Gos. Pet. 18: because of the deep darkness at Golgotha, “many went about with lamps, thinking that it was night, and they fell” (ε—πέσαντο [sic]).

³ Tob 11:9, 13. One throws oneself onto one’s bed (1Macc 6:8; Jos. Asen. 9.1); one falls into a trap (Tob 14:10; Ps 35:8; 141:10; Sir 28:26; Amos 3:5), into misfortune (2Macc 10:4; cf. Iamblichus, Myst. 2.10 = 93.8: τω—κακω—περιπίπτειν, fall into evil), under the blow of trouble or judgment (2Macc 3:6; Jas 5:12; BGU 1761, 14; 1812, 7), into disobedience (Heb 4:11).

⁴ Gen 17:3 (Hebrew napal); Num 14:5; 16:4; Matt 2:11; 4:9; 17:6; 18:26, 29; 26:39; Mark 5:22; Luke 5:12; 8:41; 17:16; John 11:32; Acts 10:25; 1Cor 14:25; Rev 1:17; 11:16; 19:10; 22:28. πίπτειν ει—ς, ε—πί, πρός, παρά, ἔμπροσθεν; cf. Josephus, War 1.621; Ant. 3.310.

⁵ Rom 11:22; 14:4; 1Cor 10:12 (cf. H. A. Brongers, “Darum, wer fest zu stehen meint, der sehe zu, daß er nicht falle, I Kor. X, 12,” in Symbolae Biblicae et Mesopotamicae Fr. M. Th. De Liagre Böhl Dedicatae, Leiden, 1973, pp. 56–70); this meaning is constant in Philo, Abraham 269; Change of Names 54–56; 154–156; Alleg. Interp. 2.100ff., cf. Husbandry 94, 122; Pss. Sol. 1.5; Josephus, Ant. 18.280; 19.294.

⁶ The turn of phrase is tradition: “They stumble and fall” (Ps 27:2); “if he falls he is not floored” (37:24); “seven times the just person falls and rises again” (Prov 24:16; cf. 25:26); “if I fall I rise again” (Mic 7:8); “many will stumble, and they will fall and be broken” (Isa 8:15); “she falls to rise no more” (24:20; cf. 28:13); “Does one fall and not rise again?” (Jer 8:4; cf. 6:15; 46:6, 12). A guard forces one of the Maccabeus brothers to get up again every time he falls (4Macc 6:7–8; cf. 2.14). “The just person has stumbled . . . and fallen” (Pss. Sol. 3.5); “those who take a slippery path stumble and fall” (Philo, Abraham 269). Cf. Stobaeus, Ecl. 7.63 (vol. 3, p. 329, 12): βάλλομεν, οὐ πίπτουσι.

⁷ Certainly we must read πίπτει with a, A, B, C, Clement of Alexandria (Quis dives), K. Aland–M. Black; against ε–κρίπτει, read by D, G, K, L, Tertullian.

⁸ J. Héring (La Première Epître de saint Paul aux Corinthiens, Neuchâtel–Paris, 1949, p. 120 ET = pp. 141–142); cf. M. F. Lacan, “La Charité jamais ne succombe” (“Les Trois qui demeurent, I Cor. XIII, 13,” in RSR, 1958, p. 325). On this verse, cf. W. Michaelis, “ἡ ἀγάπη οὐδέποτε πίπτει,” in Paulus—Hellas—Oikumene, Athens, 1951, pp. 135–140.

⁹ 1Cor 13:13; cf. W. Michaelis, “πίπτω,” in TDNT, vol. 6, p. 165; H. Conzelmann, First Corinthians, p. 255; C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 2, pp. 93ff.; idem, Théologie morale, vol. 2, p. 499. F. Dreyfus, “Maintenant la foi, l’espérance et la charité demeurent toutes les trois (1Cor 13:13),” in AnBib 17–18, 1961, pp. 403–412.

¹⁰ Cf. the fallen house of David (Acts 15:16; Amos 9:11); “she is fallen, Babylon the Great” (Rev 14:8; 18:2; Isa 21:9); Rev 17:10 (Hos 7:7; Amos 9:11); Sir 1:30—“Do not rise lest you fall”; cf. 2:7; 13:21; 19:1. None of Yahweh’s words fall to the earth (1Sam 3:19; 2Kgs 10:10) or fail to have an effect (Josh 23:14). Philo, Rewards 6: “Whole lives founder, and once ruined are difficult to restore”; Philostratus (Gym. 43): the athletes proved not to be inferior in these sorts of combat (οὐδὲ ε–κει–πίπτοντες) but worthy of the prize for valor and trophies.

¹¹ In this sense, cf. Exod 23:5—the ass gives out under its burden; Deut 22:4; Jdt 7:22—“women and young men, exhausted by thirst, fell in the streets of the city and in the roads leading to the gates and had no more energy”; Dan 10:9—“I fell exhausted”; Luke 16:17—“It is easier for heaven and earth to pass away than for one word of the law to fall (disappear).” Cf. Plutarch, Per. 8.5: “When I leveled him in battle, he maintains that he did not fall.”

¹² Exod 19:21; 32:28; Lev 26:7–8; Num 14:3; Judg 5:27; Job 14:10; 1Macc 5:12; 6:42; 9:1, 18; 10:50; 11:74; etc. Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.212; Life 24; War 1.102, 172; I.Thas. 332, 11; SEG XX, 661, 11: “Vanquished, he fell like a tree in a squall” (epitaph of a paidotribes, second-third century); Jos. Asen. 16.16: “The bees fell to the earth dead”; P.Oxy. 475, 25: “He fell and killed himself.” Philo, Etern. World 128: to fall, breathing one’s last; cf.

Xenophon, Cyn. 9.20: “the deer fall, winded”; Anth. Pal. 6.48: “Evening star, how have you disappeared?” (πω—ς ἔπεσε).

¹³ Josh 6:20; Judg 16:30; Ezek 13:11, 14; 38:20; Sir 49:13; 1Macc 12:37; Matt 7:25, 27: οι—κία οὐκ ἔπεσεν; Heb 11:30; Rev 11:13; 16:19; Josephus, War 3.254; Ag. Apion 1.192; Ant. 15.122; 16.18.

¹⁴ The papyri are no help. They use πέπτωκεν for what has been “paid,” recorded in a bank. P.Mich. 235, 3: “Paid at the bank of the nomarchia” (AD 41); P.Tebt. 279, 1 (third century BC); 350, 3 (AD 70); 580; P.Hamb. 169, 3; 182, 16; P.Oslo 140, 9: πέπτωκεν ει—ς ἀναγραφὴν διὰ Πτολεμαίου (a paramone contract, second century BC); SB 9297, 1 (the recording of a marriage contract; 86 BC), cf. 6942; 8965, 3; 8966, 3; 8967, 1; P.Stras. 336, a 15; b 16; cf. P.Mich. 32, 13: Since I arrived, nothing has been paid; πίπτειν = pay a tax (P.Hib. 66, 2; cf. a decree of the Acarnanian league, IG IX, 12, 5), use revenues (Dittenberger, Syl. 976, 87; 1116, 8; I.Lind. 419, 28, 37, 48. C.Ord.Ptol. 47, 18 = P.Tebt. 6, 29).

πιστικός

pistikos, trustworthy, authentic

pistikos, S 4101; EDNT 3.91; MM 514; L&N 79.97; BDF §113(2); BAGD 662

This adjective, used to describe the costly nard that Mary of Bethany poured over Jesus (Mark 14:3, Vulgate spicatus; John 12:3, Vulgate pisticus), does not occur in the LXX. It is most likely derived from pistos, “worthy of confidence, faithful,”¹ and it is usually used to describe humans² as “trustworthy persons,” especially with respect to the handling of money (P.Apoll. 83, 9; 87, 1 and 9; 97, col. II, 20). Since this meaning cannot apply to the perfume in the Gospel account, other explanations have been sought.³

But pistikos is in fact used to describe things, in particular oil,⁴ and there is nothing wrong with the translation “a perfume of true nard.”⁵ This is how Theophylact understood the text: “it means either a species of nard that is called ‘pistike’ or else genuine nard” (pistiken de nardo noei, etoi eidos nardou, houto legomenon pistike, e ten adolon nardon, on Mark, PG, vol. 123, 645 b). These perfumes were quite expensive and were often counterfeited.⁶ “Nard is counterfeited with pseudonard. . . . Pure (sincerum) nard is distinguished by its lightness, its reddish-brown color, the sweetness of its fragrance, its pleasant flavor” (Pliny, HN 12.26.12; cf. 13.1.16: “so many ways of counterfeiting”). Thus the perfume of Mary of Bethany was extremely expensive pure, “authentic”⁷ nard.

¹ Plato, Grg. 455 a: a believable opinion; Artemidorus Daldianus, Onir. 2.32: γυνή πιστικὸς καὶ οἰ—κουρός. The reading πιστικω—ς in Plutarch, Pel. 8.2 is erroneous (read πιστω—ς).

² P.Ryl. 692, 20: οἶδα γὰρ ε—γὼ τὸ ἀσφαλές σου καὶ γοργὸν καὶ πιστικόν (third century); SB 9608, 3: ἀπέστιλα εἰ—ς τὴν πόλιν διὰ πιστικοῦ ἀνθρώπου; 7241, 26 (= P.Lond. 1393); P.Got. 29, 5: ε—κέλευσεν ὁ πιστικός, ἵνα ἀπολύσουσιν ὅλα τὰ γαιδάρια (sixth-seventh century). At Daphne: “Here lies Callopios . . . having a most faithful soul” (ἔχων πιστικωτάτην ψυχὴν, IGLS, 1030, 2). —In P.Cair.Isid. 11, 39, 41, 43–46; 40, 2; 48, 2, 4; 49, 2–5, πιστίκιον is the winnowed spelt (Latin spelta munda) that the sitologoi hand over to the ἀποδέκται πιστικίου; cf. J. Bingen, “L’Edit du Maximum et les papyrus,” in Proceedings XI, p. 373.

³ A derivative of πίνω, hence “liquid,” or of πιέζω, hence “distilled,” a corruption of τῆς στακτῆς (a name for myrrh in small quantities, a very fragrant perfume, according to Polybius 26.10); cf. P. L. Couchoud, “Notes de critique verbale sur St. Marc et St. Matthieu,” in JTS, 1933, p. 128; cf. J. E. Bruns, “A Note on John XII, 3,” in CBQ, 1966, pp. 219–222), a scribal error for σπικάτον (Wettstein, cf. the Vulgate in Mark, “nardi spicati”). Galen 12.604 k is cited: τὰ πολυτελεῖ μύρατων πλουσίων γυναικω—ν ἅ καλοῦσιν αὐταὶ σπικάτα. Referring to the Sinaitic Syriac reading swqfsp, this would be nard with pistachio (M. Black, Aramaic Approach, pp. 223–225) or Indian picita, the name of the plant being Nardostachus jatamansi (R. Köbert, “NardosPistike—Kostnarde,” in Bib, 1948, pp. 279–281); C. K. Barrett, St. John, p. 343; cf. Pliny, HN 12.42–46; μαρδόσταχυς, in E. M. Husselman, “Lists,” in P.Coll.Youtie II, p. 560.

⁴ In a record of a payment of oil (λόγος ε—λαίου), P.Got. 18, 2: ὑπὲρ πιστικοῦ τῶν αὐτοῦ διαφόρων ε—λαίου (seventh century); a service contract, P.Mil. 48, 5 (= SB 9011): πιστικω—ν ἀποπληρω—σαι δίχα τῆς χρίας τοῦ μυροπολίου; cf. the mosaic of pistikon in the antechamber to the baptistry at Antioch (IGLS 778, 2). Eusebius, Dem. Evang. 9.8.9: τοῦ πιστικοῦ τῆς καινῆς διαθήκης κράματος.

⁵ “Un parfum de nard vrai,” the translation of P. Joüon, L’Evangile de Notre-Seigneur Jésus-Christ, Paris, 1930, pp. 260, 534.

⁶ Cf. E. Nestle, “Die unverfälschte köstliche Narde,” in ZNW, 1902, pp. 169–171.

⁷ The translation of M. J. Lagrange, Marc, p. 367; Jean, p. 321. Cf. R. Schnackenburg, John, vol. 2, pp. 367, 522.

πίστις

pistis, faith, confidence, fidelity, guarantee, loyalty
see also ὑπόστασις

pistis, S 4102; TDNT 6.174–228; EDNT 3.91–97; NIDNTT 1.593–595, 597–606, 3.1211–1213; MM 515; L&N 31.43, 31.85, 31.88, 31.102, 31.104, 33.289; BDF §§163, 206(2), 233(2), 400(2); BAGD 662–664; ND 2.94

No secular text can offer a parallel to NT or OT “faith,”¹ but pistis, which derives from peithomai (“be persuaded, have confidence, obey”), connotes persuasion, conviction, and commitment, and always implies confidence, which is expressed in human relationships as fidelity, trust, assurance, oath, proof, guarantee.² Only this richness of meaning can account for the faith (pistei, kata pistin, dia piteos) that inspired the conduct of the great Israelite ancestors of Hebrews 11.³

The usage of pistis in the papyri is usually legal, and its predominant meaning is “guarantee, security.” Pursuant to a loan granted him by Zeno, Philo reckons that his creditor is claiming more than his due. The judges ask for a statement of credits and debts that both parties agree is correct, and they decide—with respect to the contested sums—that the adversaries must exchange guarantees (pisteis) in the Serapeum of Parmeniscos.⁴ In 108 BC, 150 artabai of borrowed grain are guaranteed by a mortgage on the cultivated lands owned by the borrowers; these ask the epistates of Akoris to require written guarantees from their lender.⁵ Pisti Didymou means “with Didymos’s guarantee” (P.Warr. 5, 15) or “Didymos stood surety” (P.Princ. 26, 5). Pistis must be given this meaning of “guarantee” in Acts 17:31—God has given a “guarantee” through a man that he will resurrect the dead; and that is the meaning of hypostasis in Heb 11:1—“Faith is the guarantee of things hoped for,”⁶ well translated in the Peshitta by pyso. The substantive hypostasis, literally “that which is placed beneath,” hence “support, base, foundation,” has already been used (Heb 1:3) in its philosophical meaning, “substance” as opposed to accidents, “reality” as opposed to appearances. Hence its psychological and moral meaning: “that which is at the bottom of one’s soul, firmness, confidence, courage”; but in the papyri, it also refers to a right of possession, the entirety of an inheritance (P.Oxy. 138, 26; 488, 17; 1274, 15; P.Harr. 90, 2), its guarantee (P.Eleph. 15, 3), or better, the collection of documents stored in the archives as surety and constituting the evidence for a property right (P.Oxy. 237, col. IV, 39; VIII, 26, 34, 42; UPZ 222). Thus faith is the true title attesting to one's ownership of the heavenly property that one hopes for, and thus the guarantee that one will obtain them in the future.⁷

Faith is also "plighted faith," respect for a commitment, the carrying out of obligations (P.Mert. 32, 2), as with the young widows who "have rejected their first faith."⁸ This pistis, which encompasses good faith, loyalty, and fidelity, is described as "ingens vinculum fidei" ("the great bond of faith," Livy 8.28) and is the basis of all contracts.⁹ This is probably the sense of 2Tim 4:7—"I have kept the faith."¹⁰ This refers not to the conservation of the (theological) faith, but to fidelity (cf. Josephus, War 6.345: pisteis eteresa = "I kept my word"; Ant. 15.134), and more exactly to the fidelity shown by those who serve a superior, such as mercenaries, royal and imperial officials, those who have a duty.¹¹ Paul testifies to his painstaking faithfulness to his duty as apostle in the service of Jesus Christ.¹²

Pistis, then, implies complete loyalty (1Tim 1:5, pisteos anypokritou; P.Abinn. 59, 17: "I, Plas, will restore to you completely, in all loyalty"; P.Mert. 90, 12: pisteos kai epieikias charin). Heb 10:22 links fullness of faith and a true heart (alethinos), in other words, sincerity and fidelity, just as the papyri link pistis and aletheia; P.Oxy. 70, 4: "every valid written contract has pistis and aletheia " (pasa kyria engraphos synallage pistin kai aletheian echei); P.Flor. 32 b 14: "I swear . . . that I have made the copy truly and faithfully" (exomnymi . . . ex aletheias kai pisteos ten apographen pepoiesthai); P.Stras. 152, 14: "that I have made the copy truly and faithfully" (ex aletheias kai peisteos ten apographen pepoiesthai); BGU 1151, 17. Cf. 1Thess 2:13; 1Tim 2:7; Titus 1:1. The pistos aner is a man worthy of confidence (1Tim 1:12), loyal citizen, faithful friend, someone who is trusted: "if you find someone who is completely trustworthy among those who are with you" (ean tina heures kata parontas echonta peisten pollen, P.Fay. 122, 22); "being well-disposed and showing complete fidelity toward me" (eunoouse moi kai pasan pistin moi endeiknymene, P.Oxy. 494, 9); "thanks to his kindness, his faithfulness, and his family ties" (eunoia kai pisti kai te tou genous oikeoteti, P.Tebt. 326, 10); BGU 326, col. I, 15; P.Lips. 28, 31: "to watch over . . . with noble fidelity" (phylaxai . . . meta kales pisteos, an act of adoption). Testators often appeal to the fidelity of their executors or their heirs in carrying out their final wishes (P.Oxy. 1901, 48; 2474, 6, 22; P.Stras. 277, 7); but numerous complainants who had thought that their adversaries would show fidelity toward them declare that they have been deceived (P.Cair.Isid. 74, 11; P.Mert. 91, 12; P.Oxy. 71, col. II, 11). Normally a complainant expresses confidence in the judge (P.Stras. 296 r 16). Pistis eunoias is confidence inspired by the beneficence of the statesman (Plutarch, Praec. ger. rei publ. 28.821 b; Ti.Gracch. 33.7); cf. pistin echein: "have confidence in" (idem, Plutarch, Mor. 1101 c) or, more frequently, "merit or have the confidence of" (ibid. 91a; 146 b; 699 d; 984 f; Praec. ger. rei publ. 14.809 f; 15.812 f; 31.822 f).

In Luke 17:5, prosthes hemin pistin, the only instance in the Third Gospel where pistis is not preceded by the definite article, we must translate “Have faith in us.”¹³

It is often impossible to distinguish between practical fidelity and good faith.¹⁴ For example: “knowing the faithfulness (sincerity) of my goodwill” (epi tosouton pistin eunoias mathousa, P.Mil.Vogl. 73, 11); “trusting in my good faith and my assurance” (peithomenon te eme pistei kai dexia, P.Mich. 485, 12). In a stipulation of a contract (a deposit, a divorce, etc.),¹⁵ the signatory sometimes completes this common formula to emphasize his fidelity: “In good faith the buyer has asked and in good faith the seller has confessed” (pistei eperotesen ho egorakos kai pistei homologesen . . . ho peprakos, P.Dura 26, 28; 31, 32); “making good and urging in his own good faith, Hermeias Hephaistas” (bebeiountos kai te idia pistei keleuontos Hermeiou Hephaista, BGU 887, 4; SB 9219, 4, 24; PSI 1254, 8); “speak as an ambassador and a person worthy of trust” (hos presbyteres kai pisteos axios eipe, P.Lips. 32, 2); “from Deios, who professes his good faith” (para tou Deiou exomologoumenou ten pistin, P.Mil.Vogl. 25, col. III, 32; P.Flor. 86, 11). This good faith and goodwill are often called kale pistis (P.Tebt. 418, 15; P.Oxy. 2187, 29; P.Cair.Isid. 94, 11; BGU 1574, 18; SB 7523, 2; 7996, 7; 9174, 11; 9193, 7), but fidelity also enters in: “We will pay faithfully” (meta kales pisteos, P.Oxy. 913, 14; 3089, 16). This same idea is expressed by he agathe pistis (P.Oxy. 140, 16; BGU 314, 19; P.Mil. 48, 13 = SB 9011). This honesty of intent and action is often highlighted with the words hygies-hygiaino ([be_ sound, healthy), cf. P.Oxy. 1031, 18; 2120, 8: “carrying through soundly and with all fidelity” (hygios kai meta pases pisteos diapraxamenos); SB 8029, 13: “with sound fidelity, not negligently” (meth’ hygiou tes pisteos akataphronetos); Pap.Lugd.Bat. XI, n. 2, col. I, 10: carrying out a public service “soundly and faithfully, flawlessly” (hygios kai pistos amemptos); P.Hamb. 19, 17; PSI 86, 13; Stud.Pal. XX, 34; P.Flor. 2, 10, 45, 143; P.Stras. 177, 20; 532, 9–10. We may compare soundness in the faith (hina hygiainosin en te pistei, Titus 1:13; cf. 2:2).

In the NT, pistis is often linked with agape (1Tim 1:14; 2:15; 4:12; 6:11; 2Tim 2:22; Phlm 5) and once with phileo (Titus 3:15). In the first case, the ideas are specifically religious, but Greek and Roman ears were accustomed to hearing fides and amicitia together.¹⁶ Thus the inhabitants of Oxyrhynchus showed their goodwill, faithfulness, and friendship toward the Romans (he pros Rhomaious eunoia te kai pistis kai philia hen enedeixanto, P.Oxy. 705, 32 = C.Pap.Jud. 450), just as the Alexandrian Jews commend their request to Claudius on the basis of their fidelity and friendship (dia ten pros Rhomaious pistin kai philian, Josephus, Ant. 19.289; cf. Polybius 2.11.5; 2.12.2; 20.9.12; 20.10.2).

¹ Obviously, the Christian papyri retain this theological meaning, C.P.Herm. 9, 20: ε—ν πίστει ἔχε; P.Lond. 1915, 15: “those who are weak in the faith” (quoting Rom 14:1); 1919, 19. On πίστις in the papyri, cf. Gerhard-Gradenwitz, “ΩΝΗ ΕΝ ΠΙΣΤΕΙ,” in Philologus, vol. 63, 1904, pp. 499–563; D. Schäfer, “Zu dem ptolemäischen ΠΙΣΤΕΙΣ,” Philologus, vol. 88, 1933, pp. 296–301; W. Schmitz, Η Πίστις in den Papyri, Cologne, 1964; A. J. Festugière, Etudes d’histoire, pp. 136ff. Διὰ τῆς σῆς πίστεως can be translated “responsibility,” cf. P.Vindob.Tandem, n. 4, 25.

² Cf. Demosthenes, C. Lept. 20.164: “Our city will show loyalty (πιστή), justice (δικαία), and fidelity (ἀψευδής) in all its obligations. . . . (Otherwise) it will be accused of disloyalty (ἄπιστος), envy, dishonesty”; Demosthenes, C. Zenoth. 32.16: “If you gave him the funds on his word (ει—ς πίστιν ἔδωκας), then why did you take security (τὰ βέβαλι ε—ποιοῦ) before the crime? If you did not trust him (ει— δ ἄπιστω—ν ε—τύγχανες) . . .”; Herodotus 9.92: the Samians take an oath to support the Greeks, πίστιν τε καὶ ὄρκια ε—ποιεῦντο; 9.106: the Samians and other islanders swear to remain faithful to the alliance, πίστι τε καταλαμβάντες καὶ ὄρκιοισι ε—μμενέειν τε καὶ μὴ ἀποστήσεσθαι; Xenophon, Hell. 1.3.4: πίστεις πεποιημένος, “having made an agreement”; Thucydides 4.86.2–3: “I offer quite substantial guarantees (πίστεις διδούς) . . .; they may have the greatest confidence”; 5.45: “Alcibiades persuaded the Lacedaemonians by a solemn assurance” (πείθει πίστιν αὐτοί—ς δούς); Menander, Dysk. 308: πίστιν ε—πιθείς διατελει—ν στέργων, “solemnly undertaking to love her always.” Cf. E. Fraenkel, “Zur Geschichte des Wortes fides,” in RhMus, vol. 71, 1916, pp. 187–199; R. Heinze, “Fides,” in Hermes, vol. 64, 1929, pp. 140–166; L. Lombardi, Dalla “Fides” alla “Bona Fides,” Milan, 1961; A. Piganiol, “Venire in Fidem,” in RIDA, vol. 5, 1950, pp. 339–347; W. Waldstein, “Entscheidungsgrundlagen der klassischen römischen Juristen,” in ANRW, vol. 15, 1976, pp. 68ff.

³ Heb 11 shows the influence of Philo’s kind of faith: confidence in God’s word, reliance on the divine guarantee, steadfast hope in what must come to pass, confident obedience, essential moral force (cf. C. Spicq, Hébreux, vol. 1, pp. 76ff. A. Beckaert, De Praemiis et Poenis, Paris, 1961, pp. 21ff. E. Starobinski-Safran, De Fuga, Paris, 1970, p. 214, n. 2). Faith, “the proof of invisible realities” (Heb 11:1), can be compared to Philonian ἔλεγχος—“conviction” (Flight 118, 131, 203), argument, exhibit, means of proof (Joseph 107; Virtues 34, 46, 55; cf. V. Nikiprowetzki, “La Doctrine de l’elenchos chez Philon,” in Philon d’Alexandrie, Colloques du CNRS, Paris, 1967, pp. 255ff.)—but can also mean any sort of testimony (tablets, hearsay, a witness; cf. LTGR, p. 101), and derives in the first instance from Aristotle’s definition of rhetoric: “Among the modes of persuasion (τω—ν δὲ πίστεων), some are extrinsic to the art of persuasion (e.g., testimony, confessions, documents), others technical (e.g., the character of the orator, putting the audience in a certain frame of mind, and the proof provided by the speech itself)” (Aristotle, Rh. 1.2.1355b35).

⁴ P.Cair.Zen. 59355, 102 and 127 (cf. A. Würstle, “Untersuchungen zu Cair. Zén. III, 59355,” in JJP, vol. 5, 1951, pp. 9–103); P.Ryl. 28, 187: πούς ἀριστερός ε—άν ἄλληται, σημαίνει αὐτὸν ε—πὶ λόγῳ καὶ πίστι πλανηθῆναι; J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. 27, 30: “to those who have concluded the treaty with Athens and its allies . . . the people shall give guarantees.” This pistis is sometimes a formal obligation, an oath (ibid. 35, 24 and 34), which is a means of proof.

⁵ P.Rein. 18, 10 and 31; cf. BGU 1639, 16; 1662, 16; 1810, 3: δέδονθ ὑμι—ν πίστεις ἀπὸ ὑποκειμένης; P.Tebt. 14, 10; 41, 22: “the guarantees that we have obtained from Lysanias, cousin to the king and strategos ” (second century BC); P.Oxy. 94, 18; 486, 7; 506, 15; 1644, 20: P.Mich. 188, 18; 189, 21; 605, 16 and 24; P.Ant. 42, 5; P.Oslo 40, 33: “You have a guarantee for all that I cannot show a written receipt for”; P.Harr. 85, 13: “I will pay monthly interest with a guarantee on myself” (second century AD); SB 7636, 4: ἔχετε τὰς πίστεις, ε—ῶ ᾧ παραγενόμενοι ε—ργασθήσεσθε ε—ν τῇ κώμῃ (first century BC). The document embodying a pledge is itself a pistis (UPZ 119, 33; 124, 30; cf. P.Oxy. 2110, 38: ἡ πίστις τῶ—ν ὑπομνημάτων; P.Lips. 41, 6: κατὰ τὴν πίστιν τοῦ γραμματείου; Chrest.Mitt. 33, 6); and the term refers to a safe-conduct, P.Tebt. 741, 10–13: “Let safe-conducts be given to the persons mentioned so that they may apply themselves to the mission that they have undertaken until I arrive on site and examine their assertions with the requisite care” (second century BC); 895, 38, 117; P.Yale 60, 15: “all the safe-conducts that I have granted hitherto shall be invalid” (ἀκύρων οὐσω—ν καὶ ᾧν ε—άν ε—πενέγκω πίστεων); BGU 1811, 8; 1812, 4: “(the farmers) who have obtained safe-conducts from us shall not be arrested until they have finished the harvest” (49/48 BC); 1156: “until they are entirely cleared, let them not be allowed to answer us with safe-conducts, to take refuge at a sacred altar or in a place of asylum . . . to benefit from any protection” (cf. F. von Woess, Das Asylwesen Ägyptens in der Ptolemäerzeit und die spätere Entwicklung, Munich, 1923, pp. 184–192); P.Berlin inv. 11837: “Nicholas to Pnepheros, Necthanoubis, and their father Petesouchos. Here are safe-conducts, on the condition that you work in person in your town, and no one will arrest you. . . . But you should not have left in this way without reason. Who could have forced you to go? Or what wrong did you suffer?” (cited by C. Préaux, Economie royale, p. 544). Thus pisteis are letters of protection for a given person (someone pursued by creditors or sought by officials) allowing him to keep at his work or take on the responsibilities of his post.

⁶ Ἔστιν δὲ πίστις ἐ—λιζομένων ὑπόστασις. Cf. C. Spicq, Hébreux, vol. 2, p. 337; H. Dörrie, “Zu Hebr XI, 1,” in ZNW, 1955, pp. 196–202.

⁷ Faith in Hebrews already contains the germ of its final τελείωσις, because “it is impossible for God to lie” (Heb 6:18); not only does it persuade us of the existence of invisible realities, it confers a right to possess them; thus it is the guarantee of a hope that cannot be thwarted. We may note the frequent connection between faith and inheritance, Acts 26:18; Rom 4:16; Gal 3:14; Heb 6:12; 1Tim 3:13: “deacons have great assurance in (the guarantee of) faith, which is (based) on Jesus Christ.” Cf. Philo, Abraham 268: πίστις κληῖρος εὐδαιμονίας, “faith, the heritage of happiness.”

⁸ Τὴν πρώτην πίστιν ἠθέτησαν, 1Tim 5:12. Moulton-Milligan cite Corpus Inscriptionum Atticarum, App., ὑποκατέχετε ὑμεῖς αὐτὴν ταῖς ἐ—σχάταις τιμωρίαις ὅτι πρώτη ἠθέτησεν τὴν πίστιν πρὸς Φήλικα τὸν ἐ—αυτῆς ἄνδρα. We may compare Rev 2:13—οὐκ ἠρνήσω τὴν πίστιν μου; but ἀθετέω here has its legal meaning, annulling an obligation or agreement (Gal 3:15; Heb 10:28; cf. 2Macc 13:25; 14:28), an oath (1Macc 6:22). ἀθετέω πίστιν = “fidem irritam facere” (Polybius 8.36.5; 22.16.1; 23.8.7). The Essenes were persuaded that no woman kept faith with one man, τηρεῖ—ν τὴν πρὸς ἕνα πίστιν (Josephus, War 2.121). To revoke an agreement (1Macc 15:27) is perjury and treason against God (Isa 1:2; Jer 3:20; 5:11). “Numa was the first to raise a temple to Πίστις. . . . He made swearing by Faith the most important oath for the Romans, and it is still used today” (Plutarch, Num. 16.1; cf. Dionysius of Halicarnassus 2.75). I.Thas. 174, 7. At Delos, in 98–97, nine people, apparently slaves, dedicate a statue of Good Faith (Πίστις) to the gods, I.Delos, 1761; Dittenberger, Syl. 727, 19; P. Bruneau, Recherches sur les cultes de Délos, Paris, 1970, p. 617. Plighted faith is like divinized Fides, an expression of confidence based on the religion of good faith and fidelity.

⁹ Cicero, Off. 1.23; Polybius 7.12, Aratus to Philip V of Macedonia: “See whether it is not better to take your soldiers away and leave no other garrison than respect for your obligations”; 10.37.3; cf. J. Imber, “Fides et nexum,” in Studi in onore V.Arangio-Ruiz, Naples, 1953, vol. 1, pp. 339–363; P. Boyancé, “Fides et le serment,” in M. Renard, Hommages à A. Grenier, Brussels, 1962, vol. 1, pp. 329–341; idem, “Les Romains peuple de la fides,” in BAGB, 1964, pp. 419–435; J. Vogt, “De fide servorum,” in Mélanges A. Piganiol, Paris, 1966, vol. 3, pp. 1499–1514; S. Calderone, Πίστις-Fides, Messina, 1964.

¹⁰ Τὴν πίστιν τετήρηκα. Cf. J. M. T. Barton, “Bonum certamen certavi . . . fidem servavi,” in Bib, 1959, pp. 878–884. Moulton-Milligan and A.

Deissmann (Light, p. 309) cite an inscription from the theater of Ephesus, where Marcus Aurelius Agathopus thanks Artemis ὅτι τὴν πίστιν ἐ—τήρησα, and Dittenberger, Or. 339, 47: προχειρισαμένου τοῦς τὴν πίστιν εὖσεβω—ς τε καὶ δικαίως τηρήσοντας (GIBM, Part III, n. 587 b 5). The formula τὴν πίστιν τηρεῖ—ν is well attested in the epigraphy of Asia Minor in the sense of faithfulness to a commitment.

¹¹ Πίστις refers to the powers that derive from the possession of the king's confidence (L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 11–12, 1960, pp. 105–106, cites Polybius 5.41.2; 6.35.8; 16.22.2; C. B. Welles, Royal Correspondence, n. 44, 1; 66, 11; 67, 13). Cf. the epitaph of the mercenary Diazelmis: "I gave the princes of Egypt my zeal and my fidelity" (E. Bernard, Inscriptions métriques, n. 10, 8 = SEG VIII, 497); the epitaph of the officer Apollonius: γλυκερὰν τηρω—ν ἄμα πίστιν, "I was a devoted man, I respected sweet fidelity" (ibid. 5, 13); another: χρηστὸς, εὐγενής, ἀπλοῦς, φιλοβασιλεύς, ἀνδρεῖ—ος, ἐ—μ πιστεῖ μέγας (in C. Austin, Comitorum Graecorum Fragmenta, n. 300, col. I, 3); a physician of Heraclea: ζω—ντα καλω—ς καὶ ἐ—πεικω—ς καὶ φιλανθρώπως . . . πιστεῖ καὶ σωφροσύνη καὶ δικαιοσύνη (MAMA VI, 114 B 9); "It is necessary to choose an overseer who in all fidelity and to the profit of the most sacred treasury will carry out the oversight of the ships" (P.Panop.Beatty 1, 50; cf. 169, 181, 186; P.Oxy. 727, 21). A Jewish epitaph for a certain Samuel links faithfulness and thankfulness: γνω—ναὶ δύνασαι πόσση πίστις ἠδὲ χάρις (CII 1451).

¹² Cf. P.Stras. 40, 18: "all my faithfulness toward his person"; PSI 1265, 4. We may compare the Gnomon of the Idios Logos 18 (= BGU 1210): "Inheritances left in trust (τὰς κατὰ πίστιν γεινομένας κληρονομίας) by Greeks for Romans or by Romans for Greeks are confiscated by the decision of the divine Vespasian. Those who declared the trust, however (οἱ— μέντοι τὰς πίστει ε—ξωμολογησάμενοι), received half of the inheritance." The testator places on the putative heir, a trustee, the obligation to restore the inheritance to a third party who could not legally be named as heir; cf. BGU 326, 15; P.Oxy. 907, 7; 2348, 7; SB 7630, 11. M. Taylor, "The Function of ΠΙΣΤΟΣ ΧΡΙΣΤΟΥ in Galatians," in JBL, vol. 85, 1966, pp. 58–76. C. Panagopoulos (Vocabulaire, pp. 225ff.) mentions that good faith is especially emphasized in financial operations, justice, and general administration. At Odessos, an agoranomos fulfilled his functions πιστω—ς (I.Bulg. 230 bis) and an upright official faithfully pleaded the cause of his fellow citizens (ibid. 63 bis). At Olbia, it is the virtue of a strategos (B. Latyshev, Inscriptiones Antiquae, vol. 1, n. 42, 13). According to Plutarch, fidelity is a prerequisite for a glorious public career; for example, in pleading against a powerful adversary for a weaker party (Praec. ger. rei publ. 805 B). One of the qualities of the man of politics is to know how to "find trustworthy and talented people" (ibid. 812 C).

¹³ E. Delebecque, Etudes grecques, p. 103.

¹⁴ In the power of attorney issued by Thaesis to her husband to allow him to collect funds due to her, “she gives her consent to all actions taken by her husband Ptollion conformably to the power of attorney, provided that he restores all to Thaesis by virtue of the good faith obligations that are incumbent upon him” (τῆς πίστεως περὶ αὐτὸν οὔσης, P.Fouad 35, 11; cf. BGU, 1662, 16; P.Oxy. 506, 15). The person acting as proxy has obligations of loyalty to the principal; he must satisfy his obligations; he has a personal responsibility (τῆ ἰ—δίᾳ πίστει πράττει, BGU 388, col. II, 13; cf. P.Fam.Tebt. 27, 16; P.Oxy. 1634, 13; SB 8987, 9). We might compare ὑπακοὴ πίστεως (Acts 6:7; Rom 1:5; 16:26) and ἀξίως ἀνεστρέψαν αὐτῶ—ν τε καὶ τὰς ε—νχειρισθείσας αὐτοί—ς πίστεως (Dittenberger, Syl. 932, 7). In a decree of Delphi in 125 BC, Athens has taught the Greeks that “the greatest good for humans consists in relations of mutual good faith” (G. Daux, Delphes au Ile et au le siècle, Paris, 1936, p. 369). Cf. P.Mich. inv. 257, 18: πίστι ε—περώτησεν . . . πίστι ὠμολόγησεν (published by F. T. Gignac, in BASP, vol. 13, 1976, p. 95).

¹⁵ On good faith in contracts (ἡ πίστις τῶ—ν συναλλαγμάτων), cf. PSI 76, 3; J. G. Keenan, “The Case of Flavia Christodote,” in ZPE, vol. 29, 1978, p. 193.

¹⁶ Dittenberger, Syl. 675, 20; Or. 557, 16; cf. M. Lemosse, Le Régime des relations internationales dans le haut Empire romain, Paris, 1967, pp. 70, 77. Plutarch, Cleom. 21.5: “fill the city with friends and faithful and sure allies” (φίλων καὶ συμμάχων πιστῶ—ν καὶ βεβαίων); Plutarch, Ti. Gracch. 12.6: a faithful servant; C. Gracch. 16.6: his most faithful friends; etc.

πλεονεξία

pleonexia, consuming ambition, greed

pleonexia, S 4124; TDNT 6.266–274; EDNT 3.102–103; NIDNTT 1.137–139, 2.845–846; MM 518; L&N 25.22, 88.144; BAGD 667

This substantive, which etymologically (pleon-echo) means “have more, want more,” can be used in a favorable sense for gain or profit;¹ but in practice it means either “consuming ambition” (Xenophon, Hell. 3.5.15; Cyn. 18.10; Diodorus Siculus 19.1.3) that aims at supremacy and is linked with arrogance (Philo, Moses 1.56; T. Jud. 21.8—“exalted [hypsoumenoi] in pleonexia”; cf. T. Naph. 3.1; T. Gad 2.4; 5.1; T. Asher 5.1; T. Benj. 5.1; Musonius, frag. 3; ed C. E. Lutz, p. 40, line 28) and is thus a social vice, since equality rules out superiority (Philo, Spec. Laws 4.54—to ison pleonexias allotrion; cf. Change of Names 103; Contemp. Life 70); or more often “greed” for wealth, covetousness gone amuck, various forms of epithymia (Josephus, Ant. 17.253; Musonius, frag. 17, p. 108, line 13), the desire to have what is forbidden, more than one’s due²—for example, in a sharing out (Philo, Moses 1.324). Not only is pleonexia insatiable (Sir 14:9) and excessive (Philo, Rewards 121), it is also aggressive and does not hesitate to wrong a neighbor or gain his property through extortion. Thus it is synonymous with hardness and rapacity (Josephus, War 7.256), reducing a human to the level of the wild beasts, which were “born to live through violence” (apo bias kai pleonexias, Musonius, frag. 14; p. 92, line 22; Dio Chrysostom 38.31). It is a vice of rulers and officials.³ It should be compared on the one hand to the disinterestedness of St. Paul, who was never moved by flattery or greed;⁴ and on the other hand to the greed of the false teachers, who not only approach their ministry like business persons with an eye on the bottom line but even derive dishonest gain by exploiting those who are taken in by false exegesis, myths, and syrupy speech.⁵

The parable of the Foolish Rich Man, who values life in terms of material wealth, is a commentary on the warning “Guard against all pleonexia” (Luke 12:15; cf. Musonius 4, p. 48, line 9; frag. 6, p. 52, line 18; frag. 8, p. 62, line 17; Dio Chrysostom 13.32; 17.22), which is included in the sin lists of Mark 7:22 and Rom 1:29 (cf. Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 32), presented in the former as one of twelve evil things that come out of a man’s heart and defile him, in the second as the fruit of a perverted mind.⁶ In Mark, greed is associated especially with carnal disorders, as in Eph 4:19; 5:3; Col 3:5; Philo, Spec. Laws 1.173 (cf. 1Cor 5:10-11); in Romans, it is linked mainly with injustice and wickedness.⁷

The secular literature denounces greed as a very great vice: “Greed is a very great evil for humans; for those who wish to have their neighbors’ goods often fail and are vanquished.”⁸ St. Paul portrays it as the object of God’s wrath (Col 3:5) and excludes the greedy from a share in the kingdom of God (1Cor 6:10; Eph 5:5), and 2Pet 2:3, 14 calls them “accursed.”

¹ Judg 5:19—“They did not take a monetary profit”; Epictetus 2.10.9: “to acquire goodness of soul for the price of a head of lettuce, perhaps, or of a chair; what profit?” (ὄση ἢ πλεονεξία); cf. Philo, Post. Cain 162: “all that the body seeks to amass” (πλεονεκτεῖ—ν); Xenophon, Cyr. 1.6.28, in a fight against wild animals, “you tried always to be in a better position than them (μετὰ πλεονεξίας) to fight them.” In scientific jargon, πλεονάζω means “to have a surplus,” cf. Geminus, Intro. to Astronomy 8.40, 44, 45, 49, 58, 59; 13.24: one quantity, duration, or number exceeds another.

² Hab 2:9—“Woe to the one who gains a dishonest profit (Hebrew besa’) for his house”; Jer 22:17; Ps 119:36; Xenophon, Cyr. 1.6.29; Thucydides 2.84, 1; Diodorus Siculus 17.70.5: “The Macedonians in their plundering were excessively greedy.”

³ Ezek 22:27—“The leaders are like wolves . . . shedding blood, killing people to extract a profit”; Wis 10:11; Philo, Decalogue 155: “oligarchy and mob rule, those pernicious systems, give rise to anarchy and usurpation”; cf. Philo, Spec. Laws 2.43: αἱ— πλεονεξίαι καὶ ἀντεπιθέσεις; Josephus, Ant. 6.86; Plutarch, Pomp. 39.6: “Those who had to deal with him found him quite willing to put up with their greed and harshness”; Ages. 20.6: “He presented as evidence their mediocrity or greed in the performance of their duties”; Thucydides 3.82.8: “The cause of all these evils was the seeking of power out of greed and ambition”; cf. 1.40.1: “they are full of violence and greed” (βίαι καὶ πλεονέκται); UPZ 110, 68 and 136; P.Panop.Beatty 2, 135, 240; P.Princ. 20, 11: παραγγέλλω οὖν αὐτοί—ς παύσασθαι τῆς τοιαύτης πλεονεξίας (= SB 8072). Cf. R. C. Trench, Synonyms, pp. 81–84; C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, p. 186; S. Lyonnet, L. Sabourin, Sin, Redemption, and Sacrifice, pp. 50ff.

⁴ 1Thess 2:5. St. Paul sends the brethren to Corinth to organize the collection, so that it may be the expression of true generosity, not an act of plundering or extortion (καὶ μὴ ὡς πλεονεξίαν, 2Cor 9:5); cf. E. Klaar, “Πλεονεξία, -έκτης, -εκτει—ν” in TZ, 1954, pp. 395–397.

⁵ 2Pet 2:3 (ε—μπορεύεσθαι); 2:14; cf. “insidious greed” (Philo, Good Man Free 79); T. Moses 7.6—“Devouring the substance of the poor and claiming to do so in the name of justice” (E. M. Laperrousaz, “Le Plus Ancien Témoin de l’existence du Testament de Moïse,” in Sem, vol. 19, 1970, p. 64). P.Oxy. 1828, 4: ὁ ψεύστης καὶ ὁ πλεονέκτης is from Herm. Sim. 6.5.5 (cf. S. G. Mercati, “Passo del Pastore di Erma riconosciuto nel Pap. Oxy. 1828,” in Bib, 1925, pp. 336–338).

⁶ Cf. Eph 4:19—“dulled moral sensibility”; Philo, Spec. Laws 4.5: “greed, a baneful passion and difficult to cure”; Moses 2.186—“our enemy and the source of our misery,” healed by the Therapeutai (Contemp. Life 2; cf. Good Man Free 78). In medicine, pleonexia is a state of excess that disrupts the balance of the humors and has harmful effects on the health (as does ἔνδεια, in the opposite direction, cf. Plato, Tim. 82 a); cf. Philistion of Locri (W. H. S. Jones, The Medical Writings of Anonymus Londinensis, Cambridge, 1947, xx, 35–36); Hippocrates, Aff. I, c. 20; Hippocrates, Vict. c. 71 and 77; Loc. Hom. c. 9; J. Jouanna, Hippocrate: La Nature de l’homme, Berlin, 1975, p. 256.

⁷ Cf. the linking of πλεονεξία and ἀδικία (Ep. Arist. 277; Philo, Rewards 15; Contemp. Life 70; Sacr. Abel and Cain 32; Josephus, Ant. 6.86; Strabo 7.4.6; PSI 446, 9; Musonius, frag. 20, p. 126, line 18) or κακία (Philo, Spec. Laws 1.278; 2.52; Contemp. Life 2) and opposition to justice (Good Man Free 159; Josephus, Ant. 3.67). Usurpation is often associated with pillaging and banditry (cf. ἄρπαξ, 1Cor 5:10-11; 6:10), T. Dan 5.7—the sons of Judah ἔσονται ε—ν πλεονεξία ἄρπάζοντες; Philo, Husbandry 83; P.Abinn. 50, 3 (= SB 9690). It is not surprising that in petitions and lawsuits the greed and injustice of the adversary are denounced; P.Tebt. 735, 8; P.Fay. 124, 24; PSI 1052, 4; P.Cair.Isid. 62, 5 (= SB 9167; cf. 10564, 16). Cf. A. Vögtle, Tugend- und Lasterkataloge; S. Wibbing, Die Tugend- und Lasterkataloge im N. T., Berlin, 1959.

⁸ Πλεονεξία μέγιστον ἀνθρώποις κακόν· οἱ— γὰρ θέλοντες προσλαβεῖν τὰ τω—ν πέλας ἀποτυγχάνουσι πολλάκις νικώμενοι—Menander, in Stobaeus, Flor. 10.3 (vol. 3, p. 408). Plutarch, the greed of the rich and of the Macedonians (Cleom. 3.1; 16.1) links this vice with debauchery, soft living, and luxury (Plutarch, Agis 3.1; 10.5), injustice (Ti. Gracch. 9.2; cf. C. Gracch. 20.8). It motivates the lowest sort of compromises (Agis 5.4: πλεονεξίας ἔνεκα; cf. Ti. Gracch. 9.3). Cf. the description of insatiability (ἀπληστία) in Galen (Anim. Pass. 1.38) and of φιλαργυρία in 1Tim 6:10, with similar attestations in C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, vol. 1, p. 564; add to this Sib. Or. 2.115; 3.235; Anth. Pal. 9.394, and especially Plutarch, De cupid. divit. (Mor. 523cff.).

πληροφορέω, πληροφορία

plerophoreo, to convince fully, accomplish fully, fully discharge (a debt or obligation); plerophoria, fullness, richness

plerophoreo, S 4135; TDNT 6.309–310; EDNT 3.107–108; NIDNTT 1.733, 735, 737; MM 519; L&N 13.106, 33.199, 68.32; BDF §119(1); BAGD 670 | plerophoria, S 4136; TDNT 6.310–311; EDNT 3.107–108; NIDNTT 1.733, 735; MM 519–520; L&N 31.45; BAGD 670

The noun, unknown in the LXX, is attested in the papyri by only one text that is so badly mutilated that it is not possible to determine in what sense it is used.¹ In three of the four NT occurrences, it means “fullness”: fullness of understanding (of the mystery of God),² of hope (meaning its definitive realization; Heb 6:11—pros ten plerophorian tes elpidos achri telous), of faith (meaning absolute certitude, without doubt or hesitation; Heb 10:22—en plerophoria pisteos; cf. 1Clem. 14.1: tis peplerophoremnos agapes). In 1Thess 1:5, St. Paul declares that he has preached the gospel not only in words, but “with power (en dynamei) and in the Holy Spirit and with much plerophoria. ” Given the absence of the preposition en before plerophoria, we could translate “complete assurance,” but if St. Paul had meant that, he would have written en pase parresia (Phil 1:20; cf. 2Cor 3:12; 7:4; 1Tim 3:13; meta pases parresias, Acts 28:31); and at any rate it would be odd for the apostle to emphasize his personal conviction. So it is better to translate “with power, with the Holy Spirit and every kind of richness.”³

The verb plerophoreo plainly has the meaning of full and complete conviction⁴ in the case of Abraham, who is convinced (plerophoretheis, aorist participle) that God has the power to make good on his promise (Rom 4:21); in the case of Christians who are unsure about what practical stance to take but who are to act only with a conviction that is thought out, mature, justified in their conscience (Rom 14:5—“let each one be fully convinced in his own mind,” hekastos en to idio noi plerophoreistho, present passive imperative); in the words of Epaphras, who prays for the Colossians “that you may stand perfect, fully assured in all the will of God.”⁵ This perfect passive participle peplerophoremnoi can also be translated “accomplished, well established,” but the important thing is that it is practically synonymous with teleioi, “perfect, complete,” and that it has to do with being confirmed, strengthened, stabilized; which is close to the sole use of plerophoreomai in the OT, “the heart of the sons of men is filled (eplerophorethe en autois) with [the desire_ to do evil.”⁶

But in 2Tim 4:5 (“Do the work of an evangelist, completely fulfill your ministry”—ten diakonian sou plerophoreson) and 4:17 (“The Lord helped me and strengthened me so that through me the proclamation might be carried out”—to kerygma plerophorethe —“and all the Gentiles might hear”), the verb clearly means “accomplish perfectly,” “carry out the best one can.” This meaning is found in the papyri with respect to carrying out a promise or an agreement: “Insofar as on each occasion I give you written confirmation with respect to the matters in this document, I will not be guilty of neglect” (hoti hoson hekastote dia grammaton se plerophoro peri ton onton en tois enthade grammasin, ego ouk esomai aitios ameleias, PSI 1335, 27; third century; cf. 1345; sixth-seventh century); “having been fully satisfied by the power that was exhibited” (plerophoretheis malista ek tes dynameos tes emphaneistheises, SB 8988, 38; eighth century). Sometimes the papyri give this verb the sense of completing a piece of business, of finishing with a subject.⁷ This usage confirms the nuance of 2Tim 4:17—the apostle is aware that he is crowning or putting the final touches on his calling as a keryx (1:11) by finishing off his ministry with this last proclamation at Rome. But in the papyri the commonest use of plerophoreo is “pay off a debt,” meaning either a financial or a moral obligation⁸—which emphasizes the force of the command in 2Tim 4:5, “Fulfill your ministry completely.” This diakonia is a sacred assignment from God (Acts 12:25; Col 4:17; cf. 2Cor 4:1; 5:18; 1Tim 1:12). It is an obligation that cannot be shirked, a function that must be carried out perfectly and to the last.

Hence the narration peri ton peplerophorememon en hemin pragmaton (Luke 1:1) must be translated as in the versions (Old Latin, Vulgate, Palestinian Syriac, Sahidic and Bohairic Coptic), “an account of the deeds accomplished among us,”⁹ despite the fact that the Peshitta and Eusebius took this perfect passive participle to mean total conviction.¹⁰ The decisive events of salvation were brought to completion, perfected by Christ. There is perhaps a reference to the perfect fulfilling of the Scriptures,¹¹ the fullness of the accomplishment, and also completion.

¹ P.Giss. 87, 25 (cf. A. Deissmann, Light, pp. 86–87). Hesychius says πληροφορία: βεβαιότης = certitude.

² Col 2:2—ει—ς πα—ν πλοῦτος τῆς πληροφορίας τῆς συνέσεως; we could take it to mean “with full conviction,” but with “wealth” the sense is rather quantitative, and the redundancy—or pleonasm—functions as a superlative; cf. N. Hugedé, Colossiens, p. 102.

³ “En puissance, en Esprit Saint et abondance de toute sorte,” trans. B. Rigaux, Thessaloniens, pp. 77ff.

⁴ A meaning well attested by 1Clem. 42.3: “So they received instructions and, full of certitude (καὶ πληροφορηθέντες) by the resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ,... they went out to announce the good news.” Ign. Magn. 8.2: “The prophets were inspired by grace, so that the unbelievers might be fully persuaded that there is only one God” (ει—ς τὸ πληροφορηθῆναι τοὺς ἀπειθοῦντας); Hegesippus: πολλῶ—ν πληροφορηθέντων, “many were completely convinced” (in Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 2.23.14); Martyrdom of Pionius 4.17: “the judgment of the world is imminent; we are completely convinced of it for many reasons” (κρίσις γὰρ τῷ—κόσμῳ ε—πίκειται, περὶ η—ς πεπληροφορήμεθα διὰ πολλῶ—ν, in H. Musurillo, Christian Martyrs, p. 140, 26).

⁵ Col 4:12—ἵνα σταθῆτε τέλειοι καὶ πεπληροφορημένοι ε—ν παντὶ θελήματι τοῦ θεοῦ. Cf. the epitaph from a sarcophagus of Ravenna (cf. F. Cumont, Symbolisme funéraire, p. 299), which should be read thus: “χαι—ρε καλλιφενῆς,” εἶποι σοι, “πληροφοροῦ ψυχῆ”—“May she (the goddess Isis) say to you, ‘Hail, O shining one; be fully assured, O soul’” (A. J. Festugière, “Initiée par l’époux,” in Monuments Piot, Paris, 1963, pp. 135–146). The husband assures his wife that through her initiation she can be sure that Isis will know her and welcome her.

⁶ Eccl 8:11 (Hebrew mala'). Cf. T. Gad 2.4—ε—πληροφορήθημεν τῆς ἀναιρέσεως αὐτοῦ, “we were resolved (literally, completely full of the intention) to kill him.” With this emotional flavor, cf. this letter from the sixth century: ε—πειδὴ πεπληροφόρημαι, ὅτι φιλεῖ—τε ε—μὲ ὀλοψύχως καὶ ε—γὼ καταρ [. . .] ἀγαπῶ— ὑμᾶς—ς (SB 7655, 6; cf. line 20: ε—πειδὴ χρεωστῶ— ὑμᾶς πληροφορηῆσαι, πίστευσον); or this magical papyrus from the third century: “let her give me complete satisfaction, let her love me, let her cherish me” (πληροφοροῦσα, ἀγαπῶ—σα, στέργουσα ε—μέ, P.Lond. 121, 910, vol. 1, p. 113; republished Pap.Graec.Mag. 7, 910); cf. in the sixth-seventh century: καὶ πληροφορήσῃ ὁ θεὸς τὴν ὑμετέραν λαμπρότητα (P.Erl. 120, 5); ὅτι πληροφορεῖ— αὐτὸν ὁ θεός (P.Berl.Zill. 14, 6).

⁷ P.Amh. 66, 42 (second century AD): the strategos invites the complainant to produce witnesses ἵνα δὲ καὶ νῦν πληροφορήσω, “so that I may make an end of the matter”; cf. BGU 747, col. I, 11).

⁸ P.Oxy. 509, 10 (second century): πεπληροφορημένος τοι—ς ὀφειλομένοις μοι = I have received full satisfaction from my debtors; BGU 665, col. II, 2 (first century); P.Lond. 1164, g 11 (vol. 3, p. 163); P.Fouad 26, 43 (a complaint to the prefect, second century): “although he received the full interest at the rate of one stater”; PSI 737, 14 (second-third century): τοὺς ε—φετεῖους φόρους πληροφορεῖ—σθαι; 1411, 6: πεπληροφορηκέναι ἀποδοῦσαν πάντα τὰ αὐτῇ ε—πιβάλλοντα. According to S. Eitrem (Symbolae Osloenses, vol. 10, 1932, p. 153, n. 63; cf. Berichtigungsliste, vol. 3, p. 179, n. 6944), the edict of Hadrian from 136 should be completed as follows: λέγει [καίπερ πληροφορηθεῖς] ἀντ[ὶ τοῦ] ε—π[ι]δεέστερ[ον] ἀναβῆναι (P.Osl. 78, 4–5); P.Apoll. 28, 13; 63, 9; 91, 13: “He has paid us that kensistikos of which we informed him” (payment receipt from the eighth century).

⁹ Cf. M. J. Lagrange, “Le Sens de Luc I, 1 d’après les papyrus,” in Bulletin d’ancienne littérature et d’archéologie chrétienne, vol. 2, 1912, pp. 96–100; H. Pernot, Les Deux Premier Chapitres de Matthieu et de Luc, Paris, 1948, pp. 124ff.; H. Schürmann, Lukasevangelium, vol. 1, p. 5. E. Delebecque, who sees in πληροφορέω the twofold idea of a complete fulfillment and a fulfillment of authentic acts, translates: “an account relative to the acts perfected (French “parachevés”) among us” and comments: “Luke uses a verb that is more expressive and richer in substance than the verbs close in meaning in the rest of his Gospel: πληρόω and its compounds . . . τελέω and the words of that family. . . . The verb πληροφορέω does quite well for expressing the ‘perfecting’ of acts that are out of the ordinary while at the same time guaranteeing their authenticity” (Evangelie de Luc, p. 2; idem, Etudes grecques, p.3).

¹⁰ Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 3.24.15: “the account of things that he himself knew with complete certitude” (ὅν αὐτὸς πεπληροφόρητο λόγων).

¹¹ Cf. πληρόω, Luke 4:21; 9:31; 24:44; Acts 1:16; 3:18; 13:27; and πληροφορέω, Rom 4:21. Cf. E. Trocmé, Le “Livre des Actes” et l’histoire, Paris, 1957, p. 46.

πολιτεία, πολίτευμα, πολιτεύομαι, πολίτης

politeia, constitution, system of government, (right of) citizenship; politeuma, (place of) citizenship, act of administration, association, resident community of foreign nationals; politeuomai, to live (as a citizen); polites, citizen

politeia, S 4174; TDNT 6.516–535; EDNT 3.130; NIDNTT 2.801–804; MM 525; L&N 11.67, 11.70; BAGD 686 | politeuma, S 4175; TDNT 6.516–535; EDNT 3.130; NIDNTT 2.801–805; MM 525–526; L&N 11.71; BAGD 686 | politeuomai, S 4176; TDNT 6.516–535; EDNT 3.130; NIDNTT 2.801–804; MM 526; L&N 41.34; BAGD 686 | polites, S 4177; TDNT 6.516–535; EDNT 3.130; NIDNTT 2.801–804; MM 526; L&N 11.68; BAGD 686

The “urban” or “civic” metaphors for the Christian life in the NT, and especially in St. Paul, are quite coherent. Heaven is like a city (polis); Christ is its sovereign (Kyrios), and it has its own laws and constitution (politeia), namely, the gospel. Christians are its citizens (politai; cf. this Christian letter from the fourth century: “for we believe that your citizenship is in heaven”—pisteuomen gar ten politian sou en ourano, SB 2265, 5) and are not treated as foreigners or sojourners there; they have the rights of citizenship (politeuma) and are fellow-citizens of the saints (sympolitai). Such a citizenship carries with it rights and privileges but also obligations and responsibilities. Each one is then required to “live as a citizen” (politeuomai), i.e., according to the laws and the spirit of this city, conformably to its statutes.

I. — The heavenly Jerusalem is the “city of the living God,”¹ the perfect and eternal city,² where the elect will be gathered together and to which they are constantly drawing nearer (proselelythate, Heb 12:22) during their pilgrimage on this earth. In other words, the city is first of all seen as a dwelling place, the center for a group or a populace.³ The citizen (polites) is one who—living in community with his compatriots⁴—is a legal subject and participates in the political life of the city (cf. Plutarch, Cim. 17.3). St. Paul was more than a little proud of his home city: “a citizen of Tarsus in Cilicia, no obscure city” (Acts 21:39); to which we may compare this third-century Roman inscription: “Tarsus, the first and greatest and most noble metropolis.”⁵

II. — The defining characteristic of a polites is possessing politeia, the right of citizenship.⁶ Rome and the Greek cities used to grant this honor⁷ to their benefactors, to particularly deserving persons, veterans and military leaders, politicians, men of letters, officials, physicians whose merits they wished to honor or reward or whose services they wanted to gain.⁸ Thus citizenship was a title of nobility (eugeneia) that placed its beneficiary in the ranks of the aristocracy.⁹ But this “decoration” could also be bought, not only in Greek cities that by this means bolstered their impoverished treasuries¹⁰ but also at Rome (at first only with difficulty—the price varied between 200 and 1,000 drachmas). Antony was generous in this respect (Cicero, Phil. 5.4.11); Claudius gave citizenship without restraint¹¹ and it became a veritable commodity, like merchandise with fluctuating prices.¹² In fact, the number of cives, one million in 70/69 BC, increased by a factor of four by 28 BC, of five by AD 14, nearly six by AD 47;¹³ and the prestige of the title was correspondingly diminished.

This information greatly enhances our understanding of the clash between the chiliarch Claudius Lysias, who boasted that he had purchased citizenship at a high cost (ego pollou kephalaiou ten politeian tauten ektesamen) and Paul, who answered “But it was mine by birth” (Acts 22:28-29). Inheriting the title greatly increased its value.¹⁴ Apart from the honor involved, citizenship conferred many practical advantages.¹⁵ Especially with respect to legal proceedings, the civis was free to choose his court in his own country and to be judged according to its laws or to appear before Roman magistrates.¹⁶ St. Paul used this right to appeal to the supreme jurisdiction of the emperor,¹⁷ just as he referred to the lex Valeria (c. 300 BC) and the lex Porcia (c. 198 BC) that prohibited the scourging of Roman citizens.¹⁸

Politeia also refers to the organization or system of government of the state, its constitution, its ancestral institutions,¹⁹ and finally “the commonwealth of free men,” the life of the citizen within his city, his political activity, all the forms of interaction with the life of the state.²⁰ Hence pagans—outsiders, “cut off from the commonwealth of Israel and foreigners to the covenants” (apellotriomenoi tes politeias tou Israel kai xenoi ton diathekon, Eph 2:12)—were not only incapable of being incorporated in the Israelite theocracy, but they were as alien as they could be to the covenants, “without Christ,” having no hope of salvation (Acts 26:6-7), without God’s providence and help. Only citizens benefited from the protection of the polis and its worship.²¹ But through baptism, the Gentiles became sympolitai ton hagion, “fellow citizens with the saints and members of the family of God”;²² their names are written in the rolls of the heavenly Jerusalem (Luke 10:20), and they possess full rights of citizenship and the attendant privileges, in particular equality with the “natives,” i.e., the Jews (cf. Eph 2:14-16) or the angels, those great elder denizens of the celestial city (Heb 12:23), and even brotherhood with them, since they are henceforth members of the same family (oikeioi, Gal 6:10; 1Tim 5:8). They are no longer outsiders (allogeneioi).

III. —Politeuma, which is sometimes synonymous with politeia (Dittenberger, Syl. 543, 6), appears in the fourth century BC²³ and can refer to an act of administration, government, legislation (Josephus, Ant. 1.5; 11.157; Ag. Apion 2.145), the party in power (cf. the constitution of Carthage, Polybius 3.8.2), but more formally an association (SB 8929, 18: “for the provisions of the association”—epi ton tou politeumatou euochion); 9812, 3–6: an association of soldiers in Alexandria (politeuma ton en Alexandria pheromenon stratioton = SEG XX, 499), or a community, a civic body, a political entity.²⁴ Ton Ioppiton politeuma is the citizenry of Joppa (2Macc 12:7). The women of Panamara are invited as a group to the feasts of Hera and are distinguished as such from the men.²⁵ In the strict sense of the word, a politeuma is an organization of citizens from the same place, with the same rights (isonomoi) in the midst of a foreign state.²⁶ We have particularly full information for the Jewish communities at Berenice in Cyrenaica,²⁷ at Antioch (Josephus, Ant. 12.28–33; War 7.44ff.), and especially at Alexandria,²⁸ colonies of immigrants living in the midst of a populace of a different race, but having a religious character, professing the worship of the true God.²⁹

So we see how St. Paul could write “For our part, we are citizens of heaven,”³⁰ especially since the “community” at Philippi, largely made up of Antony’s veterans, and then Augustus’s (Strabo 8.331; Appian, BCiv. 5.3.11 and 13; Dio Cassius 51.4.6) enjoyed the municipal rights of the jus italicum. Not depending on a governor but reporting directly to the imperial capital, represented by a proconsular praetor, its inhabitants were proud of their “country” and their autonomy.³¹ The Pauline politeuma of Philippians, then, is not so much a reference to their citizenship, nor even their status as a “colony”; it should be understood in terms of their metropolis or capital city, which lists its members among its citizens.³² It is a community of foreign nationals (foreigners to paganism) with a threefold meaning: (a) local (the polites has ties to a place, a city)—our politeuma is in heaven; (b) political—like every analogous civitas, conferring liberty and equality on all its members, full rights; (c) constitutional and legal—exclusive dependency on the supreme authority of the Kyrios, Jesus.³³

IV. — Such a status brings with it a certain spirit and a certain way of life corresponding to the polis that one is a part of and the politeuma that one is under.³⁴ The Israelites had a particularly vivid awareness of their place in their people’s tradition and law, of what they called politeuesthai, “living as a citizen”;³⁵ which leads to personal behavior that is conformed to the common law, a nuance of public life. In this sense, St. Paul proclaims before the Sanhedrin: “I have lived before God with a clear conscience,”³⁶ observing the laws of the divine politeia. According to Xenophon (Cyr. 1.1.1), this verb means subscribe to a rule, submit to a discipline (Ep. Arist.

31; Dittenberger, Syl. 618, 12; the oath of Itanos: “I will live . . . according to the laws”—politeosomai . . . kata tous nomous, I.Cret. 4.8.28 = Syl. 526); it becomes synonymous with peripateo, anastrepho, poreuomai, diexago, prasso, but is always opposed to idioteuo, “to live as a private individual.”³⁷ It is with civic connotation that the apostle instructs Christians, “Live as a citizen worthy of the gospel of Christ,”³⁸ conforming as such to the laws of the celestial city. To live out one’s citizenship is to conduct oneself according to the demands of the politeia, which means first of all being willing to take on a public function, to consider oneself in all of one’s actions as a member of a social body,³⁹ and accordingly to say nothing and do nothing that is not appropriate for a citizen of heaven (cf. UPZ 110, 78 = P.Paris 63). But it is also a call to honor, to preserve one’s country’s spirit or mindset—noblesse oblige—and this nuance of praise is in literary terms in agreement with the usage of the inscriptions⁴⁰ and the papyri: “the rest of the citizens who choose to act more nobly.”⁴¹

¹ Πόλει θεοῦ ζῶ—ντος, Heb 12:22; cf. 11:10, 16; 13:14; Gal 4:26; Phil 3:20; Rev 3:12; cf. R. Knopf, “Die Himmelsstadt,” in Neutestamentliche Studien: Festschrift G. Heinrici, Leipzig, 1914, pp. 213–219; K. L. Schmidt, Die Polis in Kirche und Welt, Basel, 1939; W. Bieder, Ekklesia und Polis im Neuen Testament und in der alten Kirche, Zurich, 1941; V. Ehrenberg, The Greek State, Andover, 1974; bibliography in O. Böcher, “Die heilige Stadt im Völkerkrieg,” in Josephus-Studien (dedicated to O. Michel), Göttingen, 1974, pp. 55–76.

² On the Greek polis, cf. Fustel de Coulanges, La Cité antique, 28th ed., Paris, 1924, p. 151; G. Glotz, La Cité grecque, 2d ed., Paris, 1953; C. B. Welles, “The Greek City,” in Studi in onore di A. Calderini, Milan, 1956, pp. 81–99; A. Aymard, “Les Etrangers dans les cités grecques,” in L’Etranger (Recueils de la société J. Bodin, IX, 1), Brussels, 1958, pp. 124ff. —On its government, cf. H. Francotte, Mélanges de droit public grec, 2d ed., Rome, 1964, pp. 225ff. D. Nörr, Imperium und Polis in der hohen Prinzipatszeit, Munich, 1966.

³ “The city” stands for its inhabitants, Matt 12:25; Luke 4:43; Acts 14:21; 16:20; cf. πα—σα ἡ πόλις, Matt 8:34; 21:10; Mark 1:33; Acts 13:44; 21:30; Strathmann, “πόλις,” in TDNT, vol. 6, p. 522–523. In the biblical vocabulary, “city” (Hebrew ir, qiryâh) can mean a mere town (cf. Sychar, John 4:5; Nazareth, Matt 2:23), a built-up area of any size.

⁴ Οι— δὲ πολι—ται κοινωνοὶ τῆς μι—ς πόλεως, Aristotle, Pol. 2.1–2.1261a; cf. 1.1.1252a1 and 8; 3.6.1278b19 (cf. M. Defourny, Aristote: Etudes sur la “Politique,” Paris, 1932; A. E. R. Boak, “Politai as Landholders at Karanis,” in JEA, 1954, pp. 11–14); cf. C. C. Richardson,

“The Meaning of πολιτευταί in Justin, I Apol. 65, 1,” in HTR, 1936, pp. 89–91. In the Bible, the πολίτης is the neighbor or companion (Hebrew raʿ; Jer 29:23; 31:34; Prov 11:9, 12; 24:43), the compatriot or kinsman (Gen 23:11; Zech 13:7; 2Macc 5:6, 8, 23; Luke 19:14; Heb 8:11 = Vulgate proximum; T. Job 29.1; cf. I GLS 4015, 7: τὸν ε—αυτω—ν πολίτην), the inhabitant (Luke 15:15) or citizen in the strict sense of the word (2Macc 4:5, 20; 9:19; 14:8; 15:30). Israelite citizenship depended on blood ties and was established by genealogical lists, cf. J. Jeremias, Jerusalem, pp. 275ff., 284ff., 297ff. On the semantics of πολίτης, cf. G. Redard, Noms grecs en -THΣ, -TIS, pp. 20–31.

⁵ Τάρσος ἡ πρώτη καὶ μεγίστη καὶ καλλίστη μητρόπολις, I GLAM, n. 1480 = Dittenberger, Or. 578 = I GUR, n. 80. Other glorious titles of Tarsus in Ruge, “Τάρσος,” in PWSup IV, A 2, col. 2424ff.

⁶ Josephus, Ant. 19.281: “The Jews of Alexandria possessed ἴσην πολιτείαν with the other inhabitants”; Ag. Apion 2.39: “The people of our race who live at Antioch are called Antiochenes, because they were given citizenship (τὴν πολιτείαν) by the city’s founder, Seleucus” (cf. the excellent commentary of M. Stern, Greek and Latin Authors on Jews and Judaism, Jerusalem, 1974, vol. 1, pp. 398–402). 4Macc 3:20—Seleucus IV Philopator recognized the Jews’ citizenship (τὴν πολιτείαν αὐτω—ν ἀποδέχεσθαι); Diodorus Siculus 19.2.8: “Timaeon of Corinth gave Syracusan citizenship to all who desired it.”

⁷ Τιμῆ; cf. SEG IX, 40, 58; Dio Cassius 41.24.1: “Caesar granted honors to many . . . he gave all the inhabitants of Cadix Roman citizenship. . . . He granted them this privilege. . . .”

⁸ In 46, Caesar awarded citizenship to any freeborn foreigner who would come to Rome to practice medicine or teach the liberal arts, hoping thus to establish them in the city (Suetonius, Iul. 42). In 40, Octavian granted citizenship to a nauarchos from Rhosos in Syria, “whereas Seleucus . . . campaigned with us . . . he often suffered and took great risks for us, never shrinking from enduring ills; he manifested his attachment and loyalty to the republic; he linked his own fortune with our preservation; he made all sacrifices for the Roman Republic; in our presence as in our absence he rendered service. . . . In recompense, he has received immunity and citizenship” (I GLS 718, 12–18, 91). The first important “Westerner” to receive Athenian citizenship was T. Trebellius Rufus of Toulouse, an eques, who was high priest in Gaul; he received a priestly appointment at Rome and was willing to be an archon and even a citizen at Athens under Domitian. The second person was the emperor Hadrian (cf. J. H. Olivier, “The Athens of Hadrian,” in Les Empereurs romains d’Espagne, Paris, 1965, p. 125); cf. H. Francotte, Mélanges de droit public grec, p. 306; A. Aymard, “Les Etrangers dans les cités grecques,” pp. 131ff. J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1964, p. 237, n. 533.

⁹ Cf. the honestas, dignitas, honor that Antoninus Pius accorded Tymandenos in giving him citizenship (MAMA IV, 236). Cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 796; C. B. Welles, Royal Correspondence, n. 45 (commentary by M. Holleaux, Etudes d'épigraphie, vol. 3, pp. 199–254); G. Humbert, “Civitas,” in DAGR, vol. 1, 1217–1220.

¹⁰ Musicians, athletes, lower-ranking officers, and sophists paid dearly (μεγάλοις τιμήμασιν, Nicolaus of Damascus, ed. Müller, p. 354) to become citizens of Athens or Rhodes (L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 1, pp. 37–42; idem, Opera Minora Selecta, vol. 1, pp. 617ff. J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. 33; R. Bogaert, Banques et banquiers, pp. 247, 358). Augustus forbade Athens to sell citizenship to anyone (Dio Cassius 54.7); Hadrian restored the right to do so; L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 1, pp. 39–42.

¹¹ Dio Cassius 60.17: “sometimes individually, sometimes en masse.” Cf. the two great Alexandrian bankers, Tiberius Claudius Demetrius and Tiberius Claudius Isidorus, who were Roman citizens in the year 50 (P.Oxy. 2471, 3).

¹² By giving jars of wine to imperial freedmen, anyone could become a Roman citizen (G. Boulvert, Les Esclaves et les affranchis impériaux sous le haut-empire romain, Aix-en-Provence, 1964, vol. 1, p. 363).

¹³ Cf. Res Gest. Divi Aug. 8.1; Tacitus, Ann. 11.25. Whereas Roman citizenship was highly prized in Egypt in the first century, it no longer was in the second century (cf. I. Biezunska-Malawist, “L’Extension du droit de cité romaine en Egypte,” in Proceedings IX, pp. 277–285). By his edict of 212/213, Caracalla granted Roman citizenship to all inhabitants of the Roman world (Dig. 1.5.17; P.Giss. 40, 1).

¹⁴ Cf. in AD 92, this legionary declaring under oath “se civem Romanum esse” (V. Arangio-Ruiz, “Minima de Negotiis,” in Studi in onore di U. E. Paoli, Florence, 1956, pp. 2ff.). Paul obtained his citizenship in the best possible way, by legal filiation (R. Monier, G. Cardascia, J. Imbert, Histoire des institutions et des faits sociaux, Paris, 1956, pp. 415ff.), but we have no idea when or under what circumstances his ancestors gained this right (cf. J. Schwartz, “A propos du statut personnel de l’apôtre Paul,” in RHPR, 1957, pp. 91–96; P. Miguens, “Pablo prisionero,” in Studii Biblici Franciscani, vol. 8, 1958, pp. 74ff. W. Seston, “Tertullien et les origines de la citoyenneté romaine de S. Paul,” in Freundesgabe O. Cullmann, Leiden, 1962, pp. 305–312, who suggests that Paul’s mother was Roman). The cognomen “Paulus” would not be a reference to a Roman patron; it would have been chosen because it sounds like “Saul” (Acts 13:9; cf. A. N. Sherwin-White, Roman Society, pp. 151ff.).

¹⁵ Equality before the law, immunity, exemption from customs taxes and tribute, from public levies and burdensome duties. Inheritance rights and property rights were greatly enhanced (cf. PSI 1183, first century AD). Hence the praise of Aelius Aristides: “Of all the things that can be said in praise of the Romans, one thing is by far most worthy of attention: the magnanimity they have demonstrated in the matter of citizenship and even their very way of thinking of this right. Indeed, the world has never seen the like” (Orat. Rom. 59); cf. E. Volterra, “Manomissione e cittadinanza,” in Studi in onore di U. E. Paoli, pp. 695–715). Nevertheless, the Greek cities were even more generous, granting along with politeia inviolability of person and property (ἀσυλία, ἀσφάλεια), exemption from the taxes and levies payable by foreigners (ἀτέλεια), the right to acquire real property (ἔγκτησις), and προξενία, which made the foreigner a guest who received help and assistance from the city (I.Bulg. 41, 13; 42, 1–2; 307, 6–8; 309, 4–6; 312, 8–9; I.Thas. 179, 6; I.Car. 166, 30; P.Lond. 1912, 55, etc.). The Sicyonios was “a story of citizenship” (A. Blanchard, A. Bataille, “Fragments sur papyrus du ΣΙΚΥΩΝΙΟΣ de Ménandre,” in RechPap, vol. 3, 1964, p. 111; cf. pp. 130–131, 135).

¹⁶ Cf. the privileges granted to Seleucus of Rhosos in 36–34, P. Roussel, “Un Syrien au service de Rome et d’Octave,” in Syria, 1934, pp. 33–74; J. Lesquier, L’Armée romaine en Egypte, Cairo, 1918, pp. 312ff., 333. H. Braunert, “Griechische und römische Komponenten im Stadtrecht von Antinoopolis,” in JJP, 1962, pp. 73–88; A. Stenico, “Civiltà romana e civiltà meroitica nella Bassa Nubia,” in Atti del convegno di studi su la Lombardia e l’Oriente, Milan, 1963, pp. 276–300.

¹⁷ Acts 25:11–12. Cf. A. H. M. Jones, “I Appeal unto Caesar,” in Studies Presented to D. M. Robinson, St. Louis, 1953, vol. 2, pp. 918–920.

¹⁸ Acts 16:37–38; cf. Cicero, Verr. 2.5.170: “If a Roman citizen is bound, it is an infraction; if he is struck, it is a crime; if he is killed, it is almost a parricide.” A. N. Sherwin-White, The Roman Citizenship, Oxford, 1939; F. de Visscher, “Le Droit de cité romaine,” in Acta Congressus Madvigiani, Copenhagen, 1958, vol. 1, pp. 281–291). The context in Acts shows that politeia is a “virtual” privilege that the possessor can make actual at will, cf. J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1958, p. 180, n.16).

¹⁹ 2Macc 4:11; 8:17; 13:14; 4Macc 8:7; 17:9; Aristotle, Ath. Pol.; Pol. 2.6.1265a15; Philo, Abraham 242: “democracy is the best form of government”; Decalogue 155; Josephus, Ant. 13.245; Strabo 4.1.12: “The Cavari adopted the political system of the Romans”; P.Oxy. 1119, 21; cf. K. von Fritz, The Theory of Mixed Constitution in Antiquity, New York, 1954; A. Aalders, Die Theorie der gemischten Verfassung im Altertum, Amsterdam, 1968. Politeia und Republica (Palingenesia IV), Wiesbaden, 1969.

²⁰ Philo, Spec. Laws 3.3; Dittenberger, Syl. 496, 173 (cf. C. Mossé, Les Institutions grecques, Paris, 1967, pp. 12, 196, 204, 208; M. A. H. El-Abadi, “The Alexandrian Citizenship,” in JEA, 1962, pp. 106–123; E. Pólay, “Der status civitatis,” in JJP, vol. 16–17, 1971, pp. 71–83). Strathmann (“πόλις,” in TDNT, vol. 6, p. 519) cites the meanings distinguished by Plutarch, De unius in rep. dom. 2: (a) μετάληψις τῶν ἐν πόλει δικαίων (the rights of citizenship; cf. Gnomon of the Idios Logos 47; P.Oxy. 65, 4); (b) βίος ἀνδρὸς πολιτικοῦ καὶ τὰ κοινὰ πράττοντος (the life of a man who participates in public affairs); cf. Hermes Trismegistus, frag. 23.54: “the savage conduct of men”); (c) μία πράξις εὐστοχος εἰς τὰ κοινὰ (a public enactment or a governmental measure); (d) τάξις καὶ κατάστασις πόλεως διοικοῦσα τὰς πράξεις (the constitution of a state, form of government). We must add municipal territory as an administrative unit (I.Bulg. 2235, 125; SEG XII, 349: ἡ βουλὴ καὶ ἡ πόλις καὶ ἡ πολιτεία, with the commentary of F. Papazoglou, “Une signification tardive du mot ΠΟΛΙΤΕΙΑ,” in REG, 1959, pp. 100–105; cf. regio in the sense of “city territory,” IGLS 2550, 8; with the commentary of the editors, V, p. 238).

²¹ Cf. R. Taubenschlag, Law of Greco-Roman Egypt, vol. 2, pp. 18ff. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, pp. 422ff. E. A. Judge, The Social Pattern of Christian Groups in the First Century, London, 1960, pp. 18–29. Around AD 15, the Ionians ask Marcus Agrippa to exclude, if not to force, the Jews from citizenship: “if they wish to be considered like their compatriots (συγγενεῖς), they must worship the same gods” (Josephus, Ant. 12.125–126; cf. Acts 19:34).

²² Eph 2:19. In Josephus, Ant. 19.175, sympolitai comprise a group larger than family and friends. The inscriptions and the papyri mention the affection and benevolence of which they were the object: “Having heard of the benevolence that you show toward all your fellow citizens” (P.Col.Zen. 11, 2); “Salus Antonis Priskos my fellow citizen” (SB 9017; XXIII, 7); “our compatriots join us in presenting this petition” (P.Oxy. 1119, 19). An honorific decree is voted for Theodorus, συνπολιτευομένων εὐεργεσίας ἔνεκεν (SB 9977, 5 = SEG XIII, 579, = Dittenberger, Or. 145; cf. 143, 6; Syl. 504, 6). The verb συμπολιτεύομαι = live as a fellow citizen (Josephus, Ant. 19.306); “Do you not think that your fellow citizens (οἱ συμπολιτευόμενοι) will pursue you?” (Epictetus 3.22.99); οἱ—διάδοχοι καὶ εἰ—σαγγελεῖ—ς καὶ οἱ—ε—πισυνηγμένοι ε—ν Βοιωτοῖ καὶ οἱ—συμπολιτευόμενοι, ὧν τὰ ὀνόματα ε—ν τῇ στήλῃ ἀναγράφεται (SB 6664, 12; second century BC); ξένοι —Ἀπολλωνια—ται καὶ οἱ—συνπολιτευόμενοι κτίσται, ὧν τὰ ὀνόματα ὑπόκειται (ibid. 8066, 3; first century BC). In 7–4 BC, at Attaleia in Pamphylia, ὁ δῆμος καὶ οἱ—συνπολιτευόμενοι Ῥωμαῖ—οι honor M. Plautius Silvanus (SEG VI, 646). The συμπολιτεία is a confederation or community composed of citizens and incorporated members; it unites two or more cities, Strabo 14.636; IGLAM 394, 1290; cf. J. Pouilloux, Choix IV, 57–62 (honorific decree for Orthagoras of Araxa, second century BC), especially L. Robert, Villes d’Asie Mineure, pp. 54–64; H. Volkmann, “Sympoliteia,” in DKP, vol. 5, col. 447–449.

²³ Isocrates, Areop. 7.78; Plato, Leg. 12.945 d; diagramma of Ptolemy I Soter: πολίτευμα δ ἔστω οἱ—μύριοι (SEG IX, 1 = SB 10075, 5–6; bibliography in C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, p. 426, n. 6); cf. W. Ruppel, “Politeuma,” in Philologus, 1927, pp. 268–312, 433–454 (clarification by M. Launey, Armées hellénistiques, vol. 2, pp. 1064–1085); summary by Strathmann, TDNT, vol. 6, p. 519–520.

²⁴ Strabo 3.4.8. Decree of Hanisa in Cappadocia: “Apollonius is without fail an excellent man vis-à-vis our community” (first century BC, C. Michel, Recueil, 546, 7; with the commentary of L. Robert, Noms indigènes, pp. 476ff., who cites numerous epigraphic texts). ISE, n. 87, 20).

²⁵ Τὸ πολίτευμα τω—ν γυναικω—ν (W. Ruppel, “Politeuma,” pp. 449–452); cf. Philo, Husbandry 81, the best women, “enrolled in the community of virtue (τω— τῆς ἀρετῆς ε—γγεγραμμένα πολιτεύματι) under Miriam’s leadership.”

²⁶ Cf. the Idumeans at Memphis (Dittenberger, Or. 737, 2), the Phrygians domiciled in 3 BC in a city of Egypt (ibid. 658, 3), Caunians at Sidon (ibid. 592, 1; cf. L. Perdrizet, “Le πολίτευμα des Cauniens à Sidon,” in RArch, 1899, pp. 42–48), the Cretans in the Arsinoite nome (P.Tebt. 32, 17; second century BC), the Lycians at Alexandria (SB 6025, 4; 8757), the Boeotians from the Xoite nome (ibid. 6664, 9), the Cilicians from the Fayum (ibid. 7270, 5). On the known politeumata cf. J. Modrzejewski, “La Règle de droit dans l’Egypte ptolémaïque,” in Essays in Honor of C. B. Welles, New Haven, 1966, pp. 145ff. R. Taubenschlag, Opera Minora, vol. 1, pp. 573ff.

²⁷ In 8–6 BC, its politeuma honors Decimius Valerius Dionysius (CIG 5362, 25–26; cf. J. and G. Roux, “Un décret du politeuma des Juifs de Bérénikè en Cyrénaïque,” in REG, 1949, pp. 281–296). In AD 25, it honors Marcus Tittius (R. Cagnat, IG, Paris, 1911, vol. 1, 1024; E. Gabba, Iscrizioni greche e latine per lo studio della Bibbia, Turin, 1958, n. 19; M. Engers, “πολίτευμα,” in Mnemosyne, 1936, pp. 154–161; cf. Josephus, Ant. 14.115).

²⁸ Ep. Arist. 310: “The elders of the group of translators and the delegates of the politeuma (of Alexandrian Jews) as well as the leaders of the people made this declaration . . .” (cf. the exegesis of V. A. Tcherikover, Corpus Papyrorum Judaicarum, p. 9; cf. pp. 6, 32); Josephus, Ant. 12.108; 19.281; Ag. Apion 2.32ff.; War 2.487; Philo, Flacc. 74–80; To Gaius 194 (cf. J. Schwartz, “L’Egypte de Philon,” in Philon d’Alexandrie, Paris, 1967, pp. 38ff.); PSI 1160, 5 = SB 7448; P.Tebt. 700, 38 = C.Ord.Ptol. 50; cf. H. I. Bell, Jews and Christians in Egypt, pp. 10–21.

²⁹ Cf. SB 6664, 9: ι—ερεὺς τοῦ πολιτεύματος; 7875, 3: ι—ερατεύσας τοῦ πολιτεύματος τω—ν Φρυγῶ—ν.

³⁰ Phil 3:20—ἡμῶ—ν τὸ πολίτευμα ε—ν οὐρανοί—ς ὑπάρχει (cf. A. Rolla, “La cittadinanza greco-romana e la cittadinanza celeste de Filippesi III, 20,” in AnBib 18, Rome, 1963, pp. 75–80; J. Lévie, “Le Chrétien, citoyen du ciel,” ibid., pp. 81–88). The Vulgate translated “conversatio nostra”; cf. H. Hoppenbrouwers, “Conversatio,” in Graecitas et Latinitas Christianorum, Supplementa I (Mélanges C. Mohrmann), Nijmegen, 1964, pp. 51ff.

³¹ P. Collart, Philippes, ville de Macédoine, Paris, 1937, pp. 223ff. P. Lemerle, Philippes et la Macédoine orientale, Paris, 1945, pp. 13ff. Military politeumata occur frequently—SEG XX, 499, 3: τὸ πολίτευμα τω—ν ε—ν —Αλεξανδρία . . . στρατιωτω—ν = SB 9812; G. Humbert, “Colonia,” in DAGR, vol. 1, p. 1311ff. E. Kornemann, in PW, vol. 4, 7, 511–588.

³² Cf. E. Stauffer, Die Theologie des Neuen Testaments, Gütersloh, 1948, p. 275 ET = New Testament Theology, trans. John Marsh, New York, 1956.

³³ Cf. Philo, Joseph 69: “I am free . . . I mean to be enrolled on the greatest and noblest civil register, that of this universe” (πολιτεύματι τοῦδε τοῦ κόσμου); Conf. Tongues 78, the wise are like resident aliens (παροικοῦντες), “they consider their true country to be the heavenly place where they enjoy all their rights (πατρίδα μὲν τὸν οὐράνιον χῶ—ρον ε—ν ᾧ πολιτεύονται); the earthly expanse where they dwell is foreign soil”; cf. Contemp. Life 90: the Therapeutai are citizens of heaven.

³⁴ Lycurgus did not permit the Spartans to leave their country freely and travel elsewhere, where they would risk picking up foreign habits, imitating the ways of ill-formed peoples and accepting principles of government (πολιτευμάτων) different from his own” (Plutarch, Lyc. 27.6). In 20/19: τὸ πολίτευμα τω—ν —Αλεξανδρείων ἀκέραιον ὑπάρχον ἄθρεπτοι καὶ ἀνάγωγοι γεγονότες ἄνθρωποι μολύνωσι (C.Pap. Jud. 150, 5–6 = SB 7448); P.Oxy. 2266, 18. J. A. O. Larsen, “Lycia and Greek Federal Citizenship,” in Symbolae Osloenses, vol. 33, 1957, pp. 5–26.

³⁵ Esth 8:12—“The Jews govern themselves according to very just laws” (δικαιοτάτοις δὲ πολιτευομένους νόμοις); they live according to the laws of God (1Macc 6:11) and conform themselves to their ancestral customs (11:25). Cf. 3Macc 3:4—σεβόμενοι δὲ τὸν θεὸν καὶ τω— τοῦτου νόμῳ πολιτεύόμενοι. To align one’s life with the law is to live according to the law or under the law (τω— νόμῳ πολιτεύεσθαι, 4Macc 2:8, 23; 4:23; 5:16). Moses taught “the people entrusted to his government” (τοὺς κατ’ αὐτὸν πολιτευομένους, Philo, Rewards 4). The Jews define themselves as a people living in accord with the laws contained in their books (Ep. Arist. 31). Josephus, at the age of nineteen, began to live in accord with the principles of the sect of the Pharisees (ἠρξάμην πολιτεύεσθαι τῇ Φαρισαίων αἰ—ρέσει κατακολουθω—ν, Life 12; cf. 262; Ant. 12.38), like Tiberius Polycharmus who “lived according to all the commands of Judaism” (ὅς πολειτευσάμενος πα—σαν πολειτείαν κατὰ τὸν —Ιουδαϊσμόν, CII 694, 6).

³⁶ Acts 23:1, πεπολίτευμαι τω— θεω—. Cf. in 164, ε—γὼ γὰρ πιστεύσας σοί τε καὶ τοι—ς θεοι—ς πρὸς οὓς ὁσίως καὶ δικαίως πολιτευσάμενος ε—μαντὸν ἀμεμψιμοίρητον παρέσχημαι (UPZ 144, 14 = P.Paris 63); cf. the κόρη κόσμου, “the blessed life with the gods” (in Stobaeus 1.49.44; vol. 1, p. 395, 22).

³⁷ Philo, Migr. Abr. 159: ὁ πολιτευόμενος τρόπος = political mores; Good Man Free 76. A decree of Samos in the third century BC in favor of some judges who came from Myndos: “being desirous that the citizens who were at odds, once reconciled, should live in harmony” (ε—ν ὁμονοίᾳ πολιτεύεσθαι, SEG I, 363, 17); “May it please the council and the people that the Samians should be Athenian citizens, participating in public affairs (πολιτευομένους) as they see fit” (J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. 23, 13; cf. 27, 20). In P.Hib. 63, 11: πολιτευσόμεθα ἀλλήλοις = have good relations. The price of an artabe of grain shall be conformed to that in effect at the market of Alexandria (κατὰ τὴν πολιτευομένην τιμὴν ε—ν τῇ ἀγορα— —Αλεξανδρείας, Pap.Lugd.Bat. XI, 14,7).

³⁸ Phil 1:27, πολιτεύεσθε (cf. R. R. Brewer, “The Meaning of politeuesthe in Philippians I, 27,” in JBL, 1954, pp. 76–83; K. Bornhäuser, Jesus Imperator Mundi, Gütersloh, 1938); Pol. Phil. 5.1–2, ε—άν πολιτευσώμεθα ἄξιως αὐτοῦ συμβασιλεύσομεν αὐτω—; 1Clem. 6.1: “An immense multitude of the elect have come to join these people who have lived in holiness” (ὀσίως πολιτευσαμένων); 21.1; 51.2; 54.4: ταῦτα οἱ— πολιτευόμενοι τὴν ἀμεταμέλητον πολιτείαν τοῦ θεοῦ.

³⁹ Πολιτεύεσθαι πρὸς τινὰ means “behave properly, carry out one’s obligations toward someone”; cf. Diodorus Siculus 19.23.1: “Peucestes did what he had to”; 19.46.2: “Pytho conducted himself properly toward the whole army”; 19.79.7; 19.90.5. From the fourth century, the papyri use πολιτευόμενος to mean a functionary (P.Fuad I Univ. 16, 1), a venerable member of the municipal council (P.Mil. 45, 3; 64, 2; republished in SB 9515; 9503; P.Oxy. 2418, 8; 2718; P.Mert. 43. 2; P.Lips. 37, 2; P.Lond. 233, 4 = vol. 2, p. 273; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XI, 11, 4), a curialis (P.Sorb. 63, 1; P.Oxy. 1921, 2; P.Mich. 613, 2; 624, 3, 11; P.Stras. 272, 4; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XII, 10, 2; C.P.Herm. 52, 2; 53, 3; P.land. 40, 10; P.Apoll. 75, 4; SB 7425, 7; 8699, 12; 8988, 31; 9461, 20; N. Lewis, “Four Cornell Papyri,” in RechPap, 1964, vol. 3, p. 33, 5).

⁴⁰ B. Latyshev, Inscriptiones Antiquae, n. 420, 11: κάλω—ς πολειτευσάμενον; 425, 13: πολειτευσάμενον ε—ν πα—σιν ἄγνω—ς; 691, 7; κάλλιστον πολίτευμα ε—πολιτεύσατο (IG IV2, 81, 9; cf. J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1941, p. 247, n. 58); τοι—ς εὐσεβέστατα καὶ κάλλιστα πολειτευομένοις καὶ παρὰ θεω—ν τις χάρις καὶ παρὰ τω—ν εὐεργετηθέντων ε—πακολουθεῖ— (Dittenberger, Syl. 708, 25); ε—νδόξως πολειτευσάμενον (F. K. Dörner, Bericht über eine Reise in Bithynien, Vienna, 1952, n. 10, 25); ἄριστα πολειτευόμενον (I.Olymp. 441; 442; 447; 449); δικαίως πολειτευσάμενον (ibid. 468). “Let all of the Acarnanians appear without fail to celebrate with piety the worship of the gods, and even towards the peoples who are related or are friends, a noble politics, worthy of their ancestors” (J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. 29, 59); a dedication from Thespia in the first century BC, to Athanias, “who carried out his political activity with great success and glory” (πολιτευσάμενον ἄριστα καὶ ε—νδοξότατα, ibid. 44, 9). In the Byzantine period, πολιτευόμενος often means “habitual, customary” (P.Giss. 105, 7–8; P.Genova 37, 5, where the editors make reference to Justinian, Edict. 11, pr. e 1; Justinian, Nov. 83, 8, 2; 52 pr.).

⁴¹ Οἱ— ἄλλοι πολι—ται οἱ— αι—ρούμενοι βέλτιον πολιτεύεσθαι, SB 8852, 15; cf. P.Col.Zen. 11, 5. In a list of groups of tax collections, διὰ τω—ν πολιτευομένων refer to a classification of taxpayers (P.Apoll. 75, 4). The adjective αι—δέσιμος, which is sometimes used with them, is equivalent to our “Reverend.”

πολυτελής

polyteles, expensive, rare, luxurious, precious

polyteles, S 4185; EDNT 3.133; MM 527; L&N 65.3; BAGD 690

In its various usages, this adjective means “oppressively expensive” or “rare and luxurious,” even “sumptuous” (SB 10498, 6), in any event requiring a major outlay;¹ and hence “precious,”² like certain perfumes (Mark 14:3) or wines of a great vintage (Wis 2:7). It is the usual adjective for valuable stones, either as construction materials³ or as what we would call precious stones;⁴ and for rich clothing,⁵ sometimes with a pejorative nuance.⁶ Thus St. Paul asks Christian women to come to church correctly attired “not with braided hair, gold, pearls, or costly clothing.”⁷ This is not a ban on elegance or a certain sort of style, but on flashy luxury or a provocative appearance that not only could stir up envy or lust⁸ but also is altogether out of place when a sinful creature presents herself before God and comes to implore his mercy. Taking up the wisdom theme that places spiritual beauty high above all the joys of the world,⁹ St. Peter also instructs Christians to adorn themselves with virtues rather than with jewels and cloaks. “This is precious before God” (ho estin enopion tou theou polyteles, 1Pet 3:4) does not mean that a gentle and quiet pneuma is very costly, since its value is not monetary; but as with the “seven mountains of precious stones” of Enoch 18.6, which hold stones that are medicinal and beautiful (colored, etc.), we are to understand that the feminine virtues are very useful in God’s sight, for he regards and values them highly.

¹ Thucydides 7.27: keeping the thirteen hundred light troops “seemed too expensive.” The inscription of Rosetta mentions expensive work for the embellishing of the temple (ἔργα πολυτελή; Dittenberger, Or. 90, 33; cf. SEG VIII, 784, 1). The inscriptions mention large expenditures by the agoranomoi: “Having been agoranomos at great expense (ἀγορανομήσαντά τε πολυτελω—ς) and having provided for the heating of two heatable porticos” (L. Robert, “Les Inscriptions,” in J. des Gagniers, Laodicée, pp. 265, 267; cf. G. E. Bean, T. B. Mitford, Cilicia 7, n. 21, 23; 152, 7); MAMA VIII, 408, 7: ἀγορανομίαις πολυτέλεσιν; IV, 152, 5: ἀγορανομήσαντα πολυτελω—ς. This generosity was seen especially in banquets: μετὰ πάσης δαπάνης πολυτελοῦς (Dittenberger, Syl. 783, 41; first century BC; Or. 525, 5); πεποιημένον ε—στιάσεις καὶ ε—πιδόσεις ε—κ τω—ν ι—δίων πολυτελει—ς (MAMA VIII, 484, 18–19; cf. 471, 8–9; Xenophon, Hier. 1.20: costly feasts), and the adverb is synonymous with πλουσίως (I.Sard. 55, 8 = SEG IV, 636) or πολυδαπάνως (MAMA VI, 372, 6; Dittenberger, Syl. 799, 14–15; Strabo 5.1.7; Diodorus Siculus 1.52.2; 17.70.5; 17.91.6; other references in L. Robert, ibid., in J. des Gagniers, Laodicée, p. 267). Cf. the θυσίας πολυτελει—ς offered by Antiochus I of Commagene (IGLS I, 1444).

² P.Mil.Vogl. 74, 4: πολυτελές ὕδωρ (second century). Cf. precious goods or property (Prov 1:13, κτήσις, Hebrew yaqar); costly materials used by the artisan (Philo, Heir 158; Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.191; Philostratus, Gym. 42).

³ Isa 28:16; 1Chr 29:2; inscription of Rosetta (Dittenberger, Or. 90, 34; cf. 132, 8); SB 8881, 8; what Herodian calls λίθοις τιμίαις.

⁴ Jdt 10:21; Esth 5:1; Job 31:24; Sir 45:11; 50:9; Dan 11:38; Josephus, Ant. 12.40; Plutarch, De cohib. ira 13; Callixenes (in Athenaeus 6.202 d), Lucian, Im. 11; Ep. Arist. 66, 79, 80, 114; Jos. Asen. 2.7; 3.10; 18.5; T. Job 28.5; 32.5. In Prov 3:15; 8:11; 31:10, the LXX translates the Hebrew penîm, “pearls,” or penînim, “coral,” as “precious stones.” On luxurious buildings, cf. Diodorus Siculus 17.52.3–4; 17.71.3; on luxurious presents and weapons, ibid. 17.76.8; 17.100.4.

⁵ Xenophon, An. 1.5.8: luxurious tunics; Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 21: pleasure is “dressed in sumptuous clothings”; Josephus, War 1.605: during his stay at Rome, Antipater “bought expensive clothing”; Plutarch, Apoph. Iac. 7; Mulier. virt. 23: a young Gaul condemned to death by Mithridates “was wearing a rich and costly garment (καλήν ε—σθήτα καὶ πολυτελή) when he was arrested”; Agis 18.8; Diodorus Siculus 17.70.3; PSI 418, 19: “if you think that this coat (τὸ τριβώνιον) is too expensive”; 616, 25 (rug or blanket). Thieves tried to grab these magnificent garments, αἰ—σθήτι πολυτειμοτάτη (P.Oxy. 1121, 20; cf. C. Spicq, “Pèlerine et vêtements,” in Mélanges Tisserant, vol. 1, pp. 400ff.).

⁶ Philo, Dreams 2.53: “Who then is the skilled artisan who makes these robes of ruinous purple?”; Josephus, Ant. 15.91: “Nothing was good enough for this extravagant (πολυτελει—) woman, who was enslaved to her greed.” Cf. the prodigalities of Demetrius (Plutarch, Demetr. 19.4).

⁷ 1Tim 2:9. Luxury in women’s clothing is also condemned by Musonius, οὐ τὴν πολυτελή καὶ περιττήν (frag. 19; ed. C. E. Lutz, p. 120, 19).

⁸ Lucian, Vit. Auct. 12: “Listen, everyone! Here is a luxury item that calls for a rich buyer: a life full of sweetness, a life of super-happiness”; cf. Diogenes Laertius 2.75: οὐδὲν κωλύει καὶ πολυτελῶς καὶ καλῶς ζῆν.

⁹ Prov 3:14-15; Wis 7:9–11; 1Pet 1:7.

πόνος

ponos, tiring labor, hard work, fatigue, suffering, pain

ponos, S 4192; EDNT 3.135; NIDNTT 1.262; MM 528; L&N 24.77, 42.49; BAGD 691

The first attested meaning of ponos is “tiring labor, hard work,” after which one rests,¹ and then “the product of labor,”² a meaning that is particularly common in the LXX: “A people whom you do not know will eat the fruit of your labor.”³ In various contexts, ponos refers to the work of one’s hands (Josephus, Ant. 19.113), physical efforts (somatikon ponon, Dittenberger, Syl. 708, 11), spiritual efforts (ponoi psyches),⁴ brief suffering (2Macc 7:36), like the pain of childbirth (Isa 66:7), and other toils that are constantly renewed.⁵ Sometimes it is only a matter of fatigue produced by effort,⁶ which is linked to exercise (Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.135: askesei kai pono; Migr. Abr. 31); sometimes pain (Moses 1.284: ponos e mochthos), all that is “bitter and unpleasant” (Post. Cain 156) and opposed to pleasure (4Macc 1, 4, 9, 20). The range extends from simple care (Philo, Heir 48) and simple difficulties (Wis 9:16; Sir 29:4), like those of a voyage (P.Ryl. 624, 4: tous tes hodou ponous), but accompanied by dangers⁷ and hence by moments of crisis (“I am in difficulty summer and winter,” P.Col. IV, 2, n. 66, 17) to evil of the most diverse sorts,⁸ what we call “trials,”⁹ misfortune (Isa 59:4), calamity (Obad 13, Hebrew ’ed), sufferings that overwhelm the heart (Sir 3:27; Isa 53:11; 65:14; Jer 6:7; Bar 2:25); hence the pairing kopos kai ponos, trouble and woe.¹⁰

Effort, labor, and care vary with the circumstances, first of all in education: “the disciplinarian approach to education gives much trouble” (Plato, Soph. 230 a); “the effort of education” (paideias ponon, Philo, Migr. Abr. 223; Spec. Laws 2.240; PSI 875, 24); then in the assimilation of “sciences that cost much effort to learn.”¹¹ In the practice of a trade, the laborer “uses four times as much time and trouble preparing grain.”¹² In hunting, “the fawn pursued with effort (syn pono) will be caught by the dogs” (Xenophon, Cyn. 9.6); “one exhausts the animal with fatigue” (pono, ibid. 9.20; cf. Josephus, Ant. 2.2, 334). In war, “It is for their country that they toil and fight with enemies.”¹³ In athletics, “those who go to work at gymnastic exercises” (Plato, Leg. 1.646 c); young people are “more exhausted by their efforts (ponois) than this type of exercise (en agonía)” entails.”¹⁴ Finally, and especially, in the medical vocabulary: “With patients who have long fevers, there come . . . many pains in the joints” (ta arthra ponoi, Hippocrates, Aph. 4.44; cf. 45; Plato, Phdr. 244 b); with the Athenian fever, “the illness descended upon the chest” (Thucydides 2.49.3); those who have just been circumcised are in pain (Gen 34:25, Hebrew ka’eb); the trouble of insomnia.¹⁵

Antisthenes is the first to give ponos its technical moral meaning and consider it a good thing.¹⁶ The Stoics classify it as “indifferent” (Diogenes Laertius 7.102; cf. 7.166). Musonius poses the question: “The proposition that ponos is not an evil does not seem plausible to me; the contrary proposition, that ponos is an evil, seems more plausible, because every evil is to be avoided” (frag. 1); but he concludes that ponos is not an evil, and he reports the question posed by a young Spartan to the philosopher Cleanthes, “Is ponos a good thing?” (cf. Diogenes Laertius 7.172). He was “so well trained in virtue that he believed that ponos was closer to the nature of good than to that of evil.” This is also Philo’s opinion: “ponos, enemy of ease,” without which nothing noble is possible among mortals (Sacr. Abel and Cain 35–41; 42–45), is rewarded by God (Philo, Alleg. Interp. 1.80), especially effort toward goodness and virtue (Sacr. Abel and Cain 120; Worse Attacks Better 27). So he adds a great deal to the pagan ethic that exhorted disdaining ponos (Musonius, frag. 7).

Philo is the one who introduced ponos into the ethical vocabulary. He is the only one to praise effort or toil at length—*philoponia*¹⁷—to the point that he contrasts the virtuous with those who do nothing of effort (Worse Attacks Better 34: ponon ouk eidotes). Indeed, ponos is linked with zeal in the service of God (Sacr. Abel and Cain 37): “All good things come from toil and increase with it” (ibid. 40, 41, 113, 115, 120). Nevertheless, it is not effort pure and simple that deserves praise, but effort carried through with art (Worse Attacks Better 17: ho ponos . . . ho meta technes) and with the goal of virtue.¹⁸ God “changes the bitterness of effort to sweetness” (Post. Cain 154); he does not let effort go unrewarded for those who struggle (ibid. 78, tois asketais). So one must persevere in “continuous, tireless ponos.”¹⁹

So when St. Paul writes of Epaphras that “he does not cease to struggle for you (pantote agonizomenos) in his prayers” (Col 4:12) and that he “exerts great efforts” (echei polyn ponon, 4:13) for the Christians of Colossae, Laodicea, and Hierapolis,²⁰ he is not only using a traditional athletic metaphor but also suggesting that this servant of Christ embodies a costly state of mind and activity, concerns and cares, efforts and fatigue, physical and spiritual suffering; that he is engaged in a taxing labor that requires overcoming a thousand difficulties. We would say “takes great pains, goes to a great deal of trouble.”

The three occurrences of ponos in Revelation have the meaning “suffering” or “calamity”: at the punishment of the kingdom of the Beast, the godless “gnawed their tongues in agony” (ek tou ponou).²¹ The medical metaphor is used with regard to blasphemers: “because of their pains and their wounds” (ek ton ponon auton kai ek ton helkon auton, Rev 16:11). Finally, in the age to come there will be no (ouk estai eti) death, no mourning, no crying, no ponos (21:4), that is, no labor, fatigue, suffering, misfortune;²² it is the end of all trials, the abolition of sin’s punishments.

¹ Homer, Il. 1.467; 10.164; Od. 11.54; cf. the Christian inscription at Thasos, n. 370, 14, 16: “What endless pain (πόνος ἄπιρος) the death of a small child would have brought if Christ had not given its parents respite (ἀνάπαυμα)”; Menander, Dysk. 830: rather than “life in luxury at another’s expense, I prefer to get it by my work”; Philo, Creation 167: “Man knew labors (πόνους), difficulties, and sweat in order to procure the necessities”; Alleg. Interp. 3.38, 251; Philo, Moses 1.37; exhausting work (Alleg. Interp. 1.84; Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 23; Conf. Tongues 92; Spec. Laws 1.125); labor, the enemy of ease (Sacr. Abel and Cain 35), “without break or respite” (39); Josephus, War 3.74, 253; 4.373; Ant. 1.238; 3.254; 5.134. Synesius, Hymn. 1.495: ἄμπαυμα πόνων; Wis 5:1; 15:4; P.Oxy. 2704, 2: “Nothing can be expected from our farming and the labors expended on it” (καὶ τω—ν ε—π ἀὐτῇ πόνων). A monument at Agrios: “leading a simple life, in all sorts of labors, far from wealth and malicious envy” (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 114, col. IV, 12).

² Pindar, Pyth. 6.54: “the ornamented work of the bees”; Euripides, Phoen. 30: “the fruit of my travail” (τὸν ε—μὸν ὠδίνων πόνον); Xenophon, An. 7.6.9: “he gathered the fruit of our toils” (τοὺς ἡμετέρους πόνους ἔχει).

³ Deut 28:33 (Hebrew yegîa’); Ps 78:46; 105:44; 109:11—“the fruit of his labor”; 128:2; Prov 3:9; 5:10; Wis 3:15; 8:7; 10:10; Sir 14:15; 28:15; Jer 20:5; Ezek 23:29; cf. Philo, Moses 1.53: profit from another’s labor; Philo, Husbandry 155; Josephus, War 2.598; Ant. 18.266; 20.265.

⁴ J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1952, p. 199, n. 188; cf. ἡδὺν πόνον (GVI, n. 1185, 3); Philo, Husbandry 91; Prelim. Stud. 166; Alleg. Interp. 3.38. Musonius asks what is the best means of livelihood for a philosopher (frag. 11) and replies: work in the fields, where the φιλόπονοι make bodily efforts (πονει—ν), but κατὰ φύσιν. This is the life of a free man who earns his own living by his work; farming leaves leisure to the soul to reflect and become wiser, which is what every philosopher wants to do, and it does not diminish his dignity.

⁵ Sophocles, Trach. 30; SEG VII, 527, 13: ἀναδεχόμενος πόνον ε—κ νυκτὸς καὶ μεθήμεραν; A. Bernand, El-Kanaïs, n. 8, 2: “Many times I was tested by intensified troubles” (cf. E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques 164 2). Simonides has Danae, holding her little son Perseus in her arms, say, “My child, great is my pain” (D. L. Page, Poetae Melici Graeci, Oxford, 1962, frag. 543, 7). Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Comp. 6.26.18: “It depends entirely on those who consent to take the trouble and put themselves out that these precepts should be serious and efficacious, or insignificant and useless.”

⁶ Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 114; Alleg. Interp. 3.135: “the shoulder is the symbol of effort and fatigue”; Worse Attacks Better 9; Migr. Abr. 221; Change of Names 193; Wis 10:9—“Wisdom delivers those who have served her from fatigue.”

⁷ Josephus, War 4.89; Ant. 17.271; BGU 1747, 22: οὐδὲ πόνον οὐδὲ κίνδυνον (64–63 BC) = SB 7410; M. Holleaux, Etudes d'épigraphie, vol. 1, p. 95; J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1946–47, p. 348, n. 183; Josephus, Ant. 1.283; 16.94; 19.317.

⁸ Menander, Dysk. 179: “harshness, that is the ill that he suffers from”; Exod 2:11—“the burdens (Hebrew sebalôt) that weigh upon the Hebrews”; Num 23:21 (Hebrew amal); Jer 4:14; Ps 7:16; SB 6584, 6 (πόνου parallel to κακοῦ).

⁹ Pindar, Nem. 10.147: “Among mortals there are few faithful companions in trials (ε—ν πόνῳ), few who want to share our labors (καμάτου μεταλαμβάνειν)”; Plato, Phd. 247 b: “There [in the vault of heaven] the soul faces trial, there the supreme struggle (ἀγών)”; Wis 19:16—terrible trials; a Christian epitaph of Makaria: “She has heavenly crowns as recompense for her trials” (μισθόν πόνων, SB 5719, 6; E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 60).

¹⁰ Ps 10:7, 14; 90:10; Jer 20:18; cf. Gen 41:41—“God made me forget all my trouble”; Job 3:10; 5:6; Prov 21:7. In the third century, a Roman citizen bequeaths his arourai to his steward Epimachus “in gratitude for the trouble he went to” for the sake of the prosperity of my affairs (P.Oxy. 2474, 37).

¹¹ Plato, Resp. 7.526 c; Philo, Dreams 1.6: “The approach to knowledge costs much toil and trouble”; 1.120; Spec. Laws 1.32; To Gaius 246; Josephus, War 1.16 (great efforts of the historian); Ant. 1.2, 9; 12.14; 19.321; P.Grenf. 1.1, 18: “it is a painful subject”; SB 8422, 3: the deciphering of an acrostic poem, the effort of interpretation is a simple, trouble-free labor; cf. P.Hal. XII, 7: ἵνα μὴ πόνος; which is contrasted with πλήρη πόνων (BGU 1024, col. VII, 29), μετὰ μεγάλου πόνου (SB 10529, B 7; Josephus, War 5.36; Ant. 7.138); cf. Philo, Husbandry 103. The opposite of effort (πόνος) is negligence (ἀπονία, Philo, Heir 212) or slackness (Josephus, Ant. 2.201). Cf. the vision of Maximus: “My nature invited me to cultivate the mystique of labor” (μύστην πόνων), i.e., to write a poem (SEG VIII, 814; E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, 168, 5; A. J. Festugière, Hermès Trismégiste, vol. 1, pp. 47–49).

¹² Plato, Resp. 2.369 e; Josephus, Ant. 17.347. Cf. the ponoi of a governor (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1961, n. 220, n. 536).

¹³ Homer, Il. 17.158; cf. 6.77; 17.718; 21.524–25; Pindar, Isthm. 6.79: “Ajax, in the labors of Ares an extraordinary hero among all the warriors”; Hesiod, Th. 881 (war of the gods and the Titans); Ps.-Hesiod, Sc. 305: “the horsemen took great pains”; Aeschylus, Ag. 330: the exhausting wanderings of night fighting; Pers. 327; Xenophon, Lac. 4.7: “bear military labors” (στρατιωτικούς πόνους ὑποφέρειν). Philo, Moses 1.322; μνήμα πόνων Ἀρεως (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1952, p. 140, n. 43); Josephus, Ant. 5.130; 13.398; 18.7; 19.299.

¹⁴ Philostratus, Gym. 29; cf. 30: respiration is labored during exercises (ε—ν τοι—ς πόνους), 45, 48; Philo, Dreams 1.168: “athletic training preparatory to the efforts required by competition in the arena”; Joseph 223; Spec. Laws 2.98, 99; Rewards 27, 36; Prelim. Stud. 164; Plutarch, De prof. in virt. 4 (76 F): πόνος καὶ ἄσκησις. “The child braved the hard labor of the pancratium” (L. Moretti, Iscrizioni agonistiche greche, Rome, 1953, n. 55, 3; cf. n. 47; I.Lind. 699, b 8); the ponoi are the athletic trials themselves (GVI, n. 763, 5; Anth. Pal. 9.588.6), the ἀγών and the γυμνασία of the martyr (4Macc 11:20). Commenting on the epitaph of a pancratist from Phrygian Dorylaeum (GVI, n. 253, 5), L. Robert (Hellenica, vol. 11–12, Paris, 1960, pp. 342–349) strongly emphasized this agonistic meaning of ponos. Cf. the herald positions reserved for former athletes, μόνους τοὺς ε—ν ἀσκήσει καὶ πόνους γεγενημένους ἀγωνιστάς (PSI 1422, 29).

¹⁵ Sir 31:20; cf. 37:30 (discomfort); Isa 1:5; 53:4; Jer 14:18; 2Macc 9:18; 1Kgs 8:37 (Hebrew mah<Ø>a<^>lâh, sickness); P.Oxy. 234, col. II, 24 (against earache); SB 10762, 3, an amulet ἀπὸ πάσης νόσου καὶ πόνου κεφαλῆς (cf. Jos. Asen. 10.8—“I have a bad headache and am resting on my bed”); 11226, 3, a question to an oracle: εἰ—ε—ξοῦ μοι γέγονεν ὁ πόνος καὶ θεραπείαν μοι διδοι—ς; cf. 8026, 29 (stele at Moschion): “that the balm for my woes be revealed to you”; E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, 167, 10 (hymn to Mandoulis): “that I may rejoin my family and my servants, in my country, without sickness and without painful fatigue” (χαλεποι—ο πόνου); 170, 10 (a proskynema): “May Herod return and regain his country, without sickness and painful fatigue” (χαλεποι—ο πόνου). Aristophanes, Ran. 829: “what caused so much pain for the lungs” (πολὸν πόνον).

¹⁶ Diogenes Laertius 6.2. Cf. D. Dudley, A History of Cynicism, London, 1937, p.13).

¹⁷ Philo, Prelim. Stud. 166; Post. Cain 157. Philoponia, joined with exercise (askesis), is particularly the virtue of the courageous athlete who spares himself no trouble; but it is also used for officials and judges who are zealous in their responsibilities, and for the grammateus who watches over his students, cf. C. Panagopoulos, Vocabulaire, pp. 222ff.

¹⁸ Drunkness 21, 94; Sobr. 38, 65; Migr. Abr. 144, 167; Prelim. Stud. 108: “rugged struggles for the good”; 162: “the feast of the soul is effort that has reached its goal”; Post. Cain 95: “the Beautiful is a perfect good, ponos an imperfect advantage”; Change of Names 170: “effort goes along with the useful, ease (ῥαστώνη) with the harmful”; Moses 1.154; 2.183–184; Good Man Free 69; Spec. Laws 4.124. These thoughts derive from the Pythagorean doctrine of the Υ, where the hard toil of the route to the summit will be followed by rest. F. Cumont (Lux Perpetua, pp. 263–279) compares Vers d’or 66, Pythagorean: “after healing your soul you will save it from these toils” (ψυχὴν δὲ πόνων ἀπὸ τῶ—νδε σαώσεις, p. 404), and the tomb inscription of a disciple of Pythagoras who taught the obligation to work as the first rule of life (τὸν πόνον; F. Cumont, Symbolisme funéraire, p. 422). Pagan mysteries insisted on it: “salvation comes from struggle” (ε—κ πόνων σωτηρία, Firmicus Maternus, Err. prof. rel. 22.1); ἀγαθὸν οἱ—πόνοι, αἱ—δὲ ἡδοναὶ ε—κ παντὸς τρόπου κακόν (Iamblichus, VP 85).

¹⁹ Flight 41; Spec. Laws 2.260; Worse Attacks Better 27; Migr. Abr. 220; Change of Names 86; cf. Sir 11:21; Menander, Dysk. 862: “everything is gained through perseverance in effort.”

²⁰ SB 9484, 13: ὁ πόνος γὰρ αὐτῶ—ν ε—πὶ τούτων ἄλλων (letter from the second century).

²¹ Rev 16:10; i.e., in order not to cry out and acknowledge their bankruptcy, not to expose their fears, or not to express their pain, their failed ambitions, their wounded pride, their ruined prosperity (E. B. Allo).

²² Synesius, Hymn. 1.419–420; 436–437 links πόνους and μερίμνας, ὀδύνας. Cf. the epigram dedicated to Apollonius of Tyana, son of Ouranos (of Heaven), ὅπως θνητῶ—ν ε—ζελάσιε πόνους, published by R. Merkelbach, ZPE, vol. 41, 1981, p. 270.

πορθέω

portheo, to sack, ravage, ruin, lay waste

portheo, S 4199; EDNT 3.137; MM 529; L&N 20.374; BAGD 693

This verb, unknown in the LXX, is current from Homer to the Koine with the meaning “sack, ravage, ruin” a city, “lay waste” a territory.¹ The word implies physical or moral violence against persons.² Its three NT occurrences pertain to the persecution of the church by St. Paul before his conversion, so that in Acts 9:21 (ho porthesas . . . tous epikaloumenous to onoma touto) several French translators make this verb synonymous with dioko (1Cor 15:9; Phil 3:6): “Is this not the one who persecuted (or hunted down) those who call upon this name at Jerusalem?”³

In Gal 1:13—“You have heard of my doings when I was in Judaism: I persecuted the church of God beyond measure and ravaged it” (hoti kath’hyperbolen ediokon ten ekklesian tou theou kai eporthoun [G: epolemoun] auten). Eporthoun should be taken as a conative imperfect, “I would have liked to annihilate it.”⁴ The imperfect eporthoi in Gal 1:23 is the same: the Christians of Judea said, “The one who once persecuted us (ho diokon pote) today preaches the faith that he then wanted to destroy (hen pote eporthoi).”⁵ Here pistis has its objective sense, “doctrine,”⁶ which matches the singular “church of God,” referring not to a particular community but to the whole primitive church.⁷

¹ Homer, Il. 4.308; Od. 14.264; Herodotus 1.84; 3.58; Aeschylus, Sept. 583: “destroy the city of his fathers, the gods of his race, by sending a foreign army against them”; Pindar, Nem. 4.26: “Telamon ruined Troy”; Isocrates, Evag. 9.62: “Evagoras ravaged Phoenicia”; Philo, Conf. Tongues 47; Flacc. 54; Moses 1.69; Josephus, Ant. 10.135, the sacking of Jerusalem in 586 (cf. 3Apoc. Bar. 1.1—πορθῆσαι τὴν πόλιν); War 4.534, Simon of Gerasa “ravaged the towns and cities” (synonymous with λυμαίνεσθαι; cf. Acts 8:3); 4Macc 4:23, Antiochus “plundered their city”; around 200 BC, a decree of Istros honoring Agathocles mentions that the Thracians are besieging Bizona and laying waste its territory (τὴν τε χώραν πορθούντων, NCIG, n. VI, 26); in the sixth century AD, the inscription of King Silko in Nubia: ε—πόρθησα τὰς χώρας αὐτῶν (Dittenberger, Or. 201, 17 = SB 8536, 17).

² Euripides, Phoen. 565: “You will see many captive virgins suffer the brutal violence of their enemies” (βία πορθουμένας); Philo, Flacc. 54: “As at the capture of a city, Flaccus allowed those who wanted to do so to pillage the Jews” (πορθεῖ—ν—Ιουδαίου); 4Macc 11:4—“What have we done that you should torture us so?"; BGU 588, 2: πορθοῦντες ὑμα—ς (first century AD); P.Lond. 1677, 26, 36, 52 (sixth century).

³ Persecuted or pursued. The Bible de Jérusalem translates s'acharnait, "dogged, went at fiercely and relentlessly," which gives the right idea (cf. NJB, "did such damage"), but the verb never has exactly this sense in known Greek; still less malmenait, "handled roughly" (E. Osty, J. Trinquet; cf. the English mauled). Better to say maltraitait, "mistreated" (Loisy).

⁴ Cf. A. Oepke, Der Brief des Paulus an die Galater, Leipzig, 1937, p. 22: "und sie am liebsten vernichtet hätte"; F. Mussner, Der Galaterbrief, Freiburg-Basel, 1974, p. 78: "und sie zu ruinieren suchte."

⁵ A. Oepke, Der Brief des Paulus an die Galater, p. 28, "den er einst verstörte."

⁶ Rightly refusing a weakened meaning for πορθέω and contrasting this verb with οἰ—κοδομέω, P. H. Menoud takes it to mean that before his conversion St. Paul attacked the faith of the believers rather than their persons; there was no blood on his hands. Paul undermined the faith of the church by trying to demonstrate from the Scriptures that the crucified one could not be the Messiah ("Le Sens du verbe ΠΟΡΘΕΙΝ, Gal. I, 13, 23; Act. IX, 21," in Apophoreta: Festschrift E. Haenchen, Berlin, 1964, pp. 178–186; reprinted in P. Menoud, Jésus-Christ et la foi, Neuchâtel-Paris, 1975, pp. 40–47). Philo often uses πορθέω metaphorically: to sow devastation in the spirit (Plant. 159) or in the heart (Good Man Free 38); the passions lay waste the whole life of those who feed them (Decalogue 49; To Gaius 114).

⁷ Cf. L. Cerfaux, La Théologie de l'Eglise suivant saint Paul, 2d ed., Paris, 1965, p. 164, n. 1.

ποταπός

potapos, of what origin, from what country; of what sort, of what kind

potapos, S 4217; EDNT 3.141; MM 530; L&N 58.30; BAGD 694–695

Potapos, the only form of this word found in the Greek Bible, is the Hellenistic variation of podapos,¹ formed by popular assimilation to pote.² The basic meaning is "of what origin, from what country?" This meaning remains common in the Koine, in the literary language³ as well as in the inscriptions, for example in this Jewish epitaph from the first century: "Ask Samuel, son of Doras, who he is, whence he comes."⁴ This sense is perhaps not absent from Matt 8:27, where, after the miracle of the calming of the storm, the people ask, “Potapos estin houtos, that even the wind and the sea obey him?” This could be just a synonym for the interrogative tis, “Who then is this?” (cf. the parallels at Mark 4:41; Luke 8:25), but we cannot rule out the nuance “What is his origin? Where does he come from?” Similarly, when the Virgin Mary is surprised by the very unusual greeting addressed to her by an invisible being: dielogizeto potapos eie ho aspasmos houtos (Luke 1:29; D reads podapos an). Certainly she is trying to understand the meaning of the angel’s words (epi to logon), but she is probably also trying to place the angel.⁵ In any event, this is the interpretation taken in Prot. Jas. 11.1—“She looked around her, to the right and to the left, (to see) where the voice was coming from” (pothen haute he phone).

All the other NT occurrences mean “of what sort, what kind,” synonymous with poios ⁶ but with an intensive nuance, pointing to a distinctive category:⁷ “If this man were a prophet, he would know who and of what sort this woman is (tis kai potape he gyne) who is touching him and that she is a sinner” (Luke 7:39). The nuance is admiration in Mark 13:1—“What stones, what a building!”; 2Pet 3:11—“Seeing that everything is to be dissolved in this way, what sort of people should you not be (potapous dei hyparchein) through the holiness of your conduct.” “What sort of persons” expresses originality and greatness, the distinctive nature of these great beings. It is almost an exclamation, as at 1John 3:1—“Behold what manner of (extraordinary) love the Father has given us (potapen agapen dedoken hemin) that we should be called children of God; such we are.” Here potapos seems to combine three meanings: qualis, quantus, unde. ⁸ The kind of love, agape, that we are given is an exceptional, prodigiously generous love, coming from heaven; its nature is divine.

¹ Cf. Phrynichus (ed. Lobeck, p. 45). Ποδαπός is still used in literary Greek, by Menander, Mis. (P.Oxy. 2657, 31); Josephus, Ant. 7.32; Lucian, Vit. Auct. 3: Ποδαπός εἶ σύ, “What country are you from?” ‘From Samos.’”

² Cf. J. H. Moulton, W. F. Howard, N. Turner, A Grammar of New Testament Greek, vol. 1, p. 95; vol. 2, pp. 112, 375; vol. 3, p. 48.

³ Menander, loc. cit., ποδαπός εἶ, ξένε; Erotian, writing about the “sacred disease” (epilepsy), so called because it could be sent by the gods, says that it could also have a natural origin, ποταπῶ— χρήται τύπῳ ὁ νοσῶ—ν (frag. 33, De Morbo Sacro, p. 108); P.Oxy. 413, 155: ποταπὰ περιπατεῖ—ς.

⁴ —Ερώτησον τίς, ποταπός—CII 1451, 8 = C.Pap.Jud. 1451 = SB 7904. This is a variant of the formula τίς, πόθεν, found often in epigrams (MAMA I, 176, 1–2; I.Olymp. 225, 8; Anth. Pal. 9.648). Numerous examples in L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 2, p. 97; vol. 4, p. 47.

⁵ E. Delebecque (Evangile de Luc, p. 6) translates quite accurately, “She pondered from what country this sign of respect came” (Fr. “Elle calculait de quel pays provenait cette marque de respect-là”) and comments: “there is no reason not to give to the recent form ποταπός the meaning of the classical ποδαπός; cf. 7:39.”

⁶ Cf. the reading of D in Acts 20:18—“You know how (ποταπω—ς, read πω—ς) I conducted myself.”

⁷ Sus 54: “under what tree and in what place in the garden did you see them?”; Philo, To Gaius 370: “Terrified as we were, still asking ourselves what would be decided, what the finding would be, of what sort the verdict would be” (ποταπή γένοιτ ἢ κρίσις); Alleg. Interp. 1.91: “what intelligence is and of what sort”; Josephus, Ant. 6.39: after enduring all sorts of evils; 6.345: what sort of person = of what worth; 8.72: what sort of outcome, victory or defeat, would result from this battle; War 2.32; 1.390: “that the question will be what sort of friend I was (ποταπός φίλος) and not whose friend”; Ag. Apion 1.255: Amenophis had learned from another king what the nature of the gods was (ποταποί τινές ει—σι); Aproc. Pet. 4: ποταποί ει—σι τὴν μορφήν = so that we might see what their form was; Hymn of Isidorus to Isis: what is the name of this One? (SB 8141, 29 = SEG 8.551); Ptolemy, Flor. 3.8: ποταπός τις εἶη; Acts Paul Thec. 2: Titus had described Paul’s appearance to Onesiphorus; Lucian, Par. 22: ποταπός δὲ ου—τος ὁ φίλος, ὅστις οὐ βέβρωκεν οὐδὲ πέποικε μεθ ἡμω—ν. In the second century, P.Mich. 492, 21: “If you know that the town secretary put me down for a leitourgia, let me know what sort of leitourgia he assigned me to”; SB 9636, 10, a veteran seeking lodging, mentions the neighbors, ποταπούς κωμίτας ἔχωμεν; in the third century, “Write to tell me what sort (of purple) you want me to bring” (P.Oxy. 1678, 16).

⁸ Of what sort, how great, from where. The nuance “from where” is vital with St. John, who describes each being according to its origin: ε—πίγειος—ε—πουράνιος (John 3:12); ε—κ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ—ε—κ τῆς γῆς (3:31); ε—κ τω—ν κάτω—ε—κ τω—ν ἄνω (8:23); ε—κ τούτου τοῦ κόσμου—οὐκ ε—κ τοῦ κόσμου (8:23; 15:18; 17:14-15; 1John 2:16; 4:5-6; 5:4); ε—κ τοῦ διαβόλου—ε—κ τοῦ θεοῦ (1John 3:8-9), etc.

ποτίζω

potizo, to cause or give to drink, water, irrigate

potizo, S 4222; TDNT 6.159–160; EDNT 3.142; NIDNTT 2.274–275; MM 531; L&N 23.35, 43.9; BDF §§155(7), 159(1); BAGD 695

The first meaning of this verb, “cause to drink, give to someone to drink,”¹ is used first of all for people. Lot’s daughters decide, “Let us cause our father to drink wine” (Gen 19:32-35; hiphil of Hebrew shaqâh); Hagar “gave the boy to drink”;² a physician “gave the patient pure wine to drink” (Hippocrates, Aph. 7.46) and occasionally administered his potion badly.³ When Jesus was crucified, a soldier took a sponge, soaked it with vinegar, fastened it to a reed, and “gave him to drink” (epotizen auton, Matt 27:48; Mark 15:36), thus fulfilling the prophecy of Ps 69:21. Animals are watered: “On the Sabbath day, does not everyone water his ox or ass?”⁴ Potizo, finally, is used for the water that waters and moistens the surface of the ground (Gen 2:6; 13:10), a garden (2:10; Deut 11:10), a vineyard (Isa 27:3), trees (Eccl 2:6; Sir 24:31), plants.⁵

In the papyri, the verb is constantly used in the sense of “irrigate”;⁶ and in the third century BC (P.Cair.Zen. 59155, 3; P.Tebt. 787, 26; P.Haun. 9, 3); “water the ground immediately by hand” (eutheos potison ten gen apo cheros, SB 6733, 3; cf. P.Stras. 193, 5); Psentaes writes Zeno, “I irrigated (soi epotisa) half of the thousand arourai for you” (P.Lond. 2061, 3); “the water in the canal has not risen more than a cubit, so the ground has not been irrigated” (potizesthai, Pap.Lugd.Bat. XX, A, p. 266; P.Wisc. 77, 37).⁷

By making God the subject of this verb, the LXX gives it a religious value: “I will give water in the desert and streams in the steppe to water my people, my chosen” (Isa 43:20); “God waters the sons of Adam with the torrent of his delights” (Ps 36:8); “floods of abundance” (78:15). Wisdom gives her disciple “the water of wisdom” to drink.⁸ Hence the catechetical commands⁹ that are taken over by the NT: “Whoever shall give one of these little ones even a glass of cold water to drink (hos ean potise) because he is a disciple, truly I tell you, that one shall not lose his reward” (Matt 10:42; Mark 9:41). In the parable of the Last Judgment: “I was thirsty and you did not give me anything to drink” (Matt 25:35, 37, 42)!

St. Paul uses the verb metaphorically: “I have given you milk to drink (gala hymas epotisa), not solid food” (1Cor 3:2); the image of the milk diet reserved for babies was current as a way of referring to elementary teaching, as opposed to the deeper doctrine fed on by the “spirituals.”¹⁰ “I planted, Apollos watered (epotisen), but God gave the increase. Now neither is the one who plants anything, nor the one who waters (ho potizon), but the one who gives the increase, namely, God. The one who plants and the one who waters (ho potizon) are but one . . . but each one will receive his own wage in proportion to his own labor.”¹¹ The one who waters only works from the outside, but his kopos —which is tiring and useful—merits a reward, because he contributes to the fruitfulness of the planting.

The most important text from the theological point of view is the one where the apostle compares the church to the human organism, its unity and the solidarity of its members:¹² “We have all been watered by one Spirit” (pantes hen Pneuma epotisthemen, 1Cor 12:13). This aorist passive refers to baptism (cf. ebaptisthemen), which infuses new life and new power.¹³ Compare the image of drinking in John 7:37-39: “If anyone thirsts, let him come to me and drink . . . rivers of living water will flow from within him (Isa 48:21). He said this concerning the Spirit that those who believed in him were going to receive” (John 4:13-14). The filling of the Holy Spirit causes effects comparable to those of drunkenness (cf. Acts 2:13—“they are full of new wine”), but it is poured out from heaven: “The gifts of God, brought by the blowing (epipneusthenta) of the highest graces” (Philo, Prelim. Stud. 38). From there on, the apostle’s thought was inspired not only by the OT, where God gives water to his own, but by the current of thought flowing from Philo, who had often underlined this teaching: “Melchizedek brings wine instead of water, and he gives it to souls to drink unmixed so that they may find themselves possessed by a divine drunkenness that is more sober than sobriety itself.”¹⁴ Those who are still at the preliminary stage of instruction, “thirsty as they are for knowledge, settle near the sciences that can quench their thirst and water their souls” (potizein tas psychas auton, Flight 187); “This well is the divine wisdom, from which drink . . . all souls that are enamored of contemplation, that are possessed by a love of perfection” (Flight 195); “The divine word goes forth like a wellspring of wisdom, after the fashion of a river, to water and irrigate the Olympian and celestial sprouts and plants of souls that are enamored of virtue, as if they were in Paradise” (Dreams 2.242).

So the choice of potizo in 1Cor 12:13 suggests first of all fullness and abundance. (The corresponding French word, abreuver, often has this nuance of “fill”—hence the magnificence of God’s gift, which floods even the mountains [Ps 104:13]—or “inundate,” cover with waters that overflow or come flooding in.) There are also nuances of excellence,¹⁵ of fervor (cf. drinking in someone’s words) and gladness (Philo, cf. the fruit of the Holy Spirit, Gal 5:22); of fruitfulness (cf. John 6:53-54), because dry lands are watered so that they will be productive; and finally of immanence, impregnation, and assimilation, because if one drinks to quench one’s thirst, the thirst is not satisfied until the liquid is swallowed, absorbed.

¹ In principle with a double accusative, τί τινά = something to someone (Gen 24:17), but cf. Tabula of Cebes 5.2, a Neopythagorean writing from the first century: τοὺς εἰσπορευομένους εἰς τὸν βίον ποτίζει τῇ ε—αυτῆς δυνάμει (dative of the thing, accusative of the person); the opposite at 14.

² Gen 21:19; Rebekah caused Jacob to drink (24:18, 45); Exod 32:20; Num 5:24, 26; 20:8; 1Sam 30:11; Judg 4:19.

³ Aristotle, Ph. 2.8; 199a; cf. Philostratus, Gym. 14. For “cause to drink” Rufus of Ephesus used πίνω or ε—πιπίνω (Ren. Ves., ed. Daremberg pp. 12, 3; 33, 6) or προποτίζω (p. 26, 6); “give to drink” (διδόναι πίνειν, pp. 8, 6; 28, 6).

⁴ Luke 13:15—ἀναγαγὼν ποτίζει; Gen 24:14—“I will also water the camels,” flocks (29:2, 3, 7), sheep (29:8, 10; Exod 2:16, 17, 19), all the beasts of the field (Ps 104:11). The charioteer waters the horses (Plato, Phdr. 247 e); “I am that Daphnis... who brought heifers and bulls here to drink” (Theocritus 1.121); Diodorus Siculus 19.94.9: the Nabateans lead their flocks to these reservoirs and water them three days in a row; Dittenberger, Or. 483, 169.

⁵ Philo, Post. Cain 125ff.; Unchang. God 37; Xenophon, Symp. 2.25: “When the deity waters the plants too much, they cannot stand up or let the wind blow through”; Anth. Pal. 1.100: “The Nile, with its floods, knows how to water the earth.”

⁶ Numerous references given in Moulton-Milligan, notably P.Oxy. 938, 5: since the oxen were in very poor condition and could not work, “as a result, the ground was not irrigated” (τῆς γῆς διὰ τοῦτο μὴ ποτιζομένης); S. Witkowski, Epistulae Privatae Graecae 18, 7, letter regarding a vineyard: ὀχιτεύομεν καὶ ποτίζομεν = we have made canals and irrigated. Cf. Philo, Conf. Tongues 38: the farmer puts his feet on the steps of the treadmill used for drawing water “when he wants to water his field” (ὅταν ε—θελήσῃ ποτίσαι τὰς ἀρούρας).

⁷ Likewise in AD 29–30: διόρυκος δι ου— ποτίζετε ὁ κλῆρος, P.Mich. 256, 4; cf. 263, 10; 267, 6; 272, 4; 273, 4; 327, 38; P.Mert. 11, 10, 13, 31 (AD 39–40); 27, 13; 79, 10; P.Fam.Tebt. 3, 14: διω—ρυξ δι η—ς ποτίζεται ἡ ἄρουρα (first century AD); 23, 10; BGU 1645, 11; P.Oslo 155, 3–4; P.Amst. 88, 4, 9; P.Laur. 11 A, 16–21; 14 A, 10; P.Col. VII, n. 172, 11, 13; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIX, 10, 14; SB 7379, 37; 7599, 31; 8546, 16; Dittenberger, Or. 200, 16.

⁸ Wis 15:3; Jer 35:2—“You shall give them wine to drink.” Philo, Alleg. Interp. 2.86–87: “He himself watered the souls that are friends of God and quenched their thirst from a well that he himself brought forth out of his own wisdom.” Often this “watering” is pejorative: God pours out a “wine of dizziness” (Ps 60:4), a “spirit of stupor” (Isa 29:10), poisoned waters (Jer 8:14; 23:15), a “wine of rage” (25:15; cf. Rev 14:8); “I will water the earth with your rotting (corpse)” (Ezek 32:6; to Pharaoh); “You will make them drink tears in abundance” (Ps 80:6).

⁹ Hab 2:15—“Woe to him who gives his neighbor a poisoned cup to drink until they are drunk so that he can behold their nudity”; Job 22:7: “You did not give drink to the thirsty”; Prov 25:21—“If your enemy thirsts, give drink to him,” quoted at Rom 12:20—ε—άν διψα—, πότιζε αὐτόν; Sir 29:25—“You shall give to eat and to drink without receiving thanks.”

¹⁰ 1Cor 3:1; cf. Heb 5:12-14; 1Pet 2:2; Philo, Husbandry 9; Epictetus 2.16.39; 3.24.9.

¹¹ 1Cor 3:6-8. Cf. W. Pesch, “Der Sonderlohn für die Verkündiger des Evangeliums (I Kor. XIII, 8, 14f und Parallelen),” in J. Blinzler, Neutestamentliche Aufsätze: Festschrift J. Schmid, Regensburg, 1963, pp. 199–206; M. A. Chevallier, Esprit de Dieu, paroles d’hommes, Neuchâtel, 1966, pp. 35ff. S. Fugita, “The Metaphor of Plant in Jewish Literature of the Intertestamental Period,” in JSJ, vol. 7, 1976, pp. 30–45.

¹² Cf. J. Havet, “Christ collectif or Christ individuel en I Cor. XII, 12?” in ETL, 1947, pp. 499–520.

¹³ Cf. J. Héring, La Première Epître de saint Paul aux Corinthiens, pp. 112f. ET = pp. 129–130. C. Senft, La Première Epître de saint Paul aux Corinthiens, Neuchâtel-Paris, 1979, p. 161; G. J. Cuming, “ε—ποτίσθημεν (I Corinthiens XII, 13),” in NTS, vol. 27, 1981, pp. 283–285 (translates “nous avons été arrosés, de l’eau a été versée sur nous” [we have been watered, water has been poured on us]). Following Clement of Alexandria (PG 74.889b), a certain number of exegetes connect this spiritual drink to the Eucharist (E. Käsemann, Leib und Leib Christi, Tübingen, 1939, p. 176; L. Cerfaux, La Théologie de l’Eglise suivant saint Paul, Paris, 1965, p. 219; A. Feuillet, Le Christ sagesse de Dieu, pp. 101ff.). Others, relying wrongly on St. John Chrysostom (Hom. on 1Cor 30.2; PG 61.251), think of confirmation (F. Prat, La Théologie de saint Paul, 6th ed., Paris, 1923, vol. 2, p. 316; J. Huby, St. Paul: Première Epître aux Corinthiens, Paris, 1946, p. 289).

¹⁴ Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.82; 1.84; Philo, Post. Cain 126–158. The Alexandrian returns often to this sobria ebrietas: Creation 71; Drunkness 146: filled with graces, the soul is joyful, carried away with enthusiasm; 152: “the soul that is filled with the pure wine of sobriety is no longer in its whole being anything other than a libation, a libation offered to God”; Flight 21, 166: the wise person “found wisdom at hand, descended from heaven in the rain. He inhaled it in pure form, took pleasure in it, and remained drunk with sober drunkenness”; Good Man Free 13; Moses 1.187; Contemp. Life 89. Texts commented on by H. Lewy, Sobria Ebrietas, Giessen, 1929.

¹⁵ The wife in Cant shows her love: “I gave you perfumed wine to drink, the nectar of my pomegranates” (Cant 8:2); cf. Jer 16:7—“drink the cup of consolation.”

πραγματεία, πραγματεύομαι

pragmateia, (civic or cultic) business; pragmateuomai, to tend to business, manage profitably

pragmateia, S 4230; TDNT 6.640–641; EDNT 3.144; NIDNTT 3.1155, 1158; MM 532; BAGD 697 | pragmateuomai, S 4231; TDNT 6.641–642; EDNT 3.144; NIDNTT 3.1155, 1158; MM 532; L&N 57.197; BAGD 697

In the LXX, the noun and the verb are both used almost exclusively for royal and cultic matters.¹ Pragmateia retains the meaning of public business in the edict of Tiberius Julius Alexander, who, with respect to the farming of taxes (teloneia) and term leases (misthosis ousiake) acknowledges: “some harm to ta pragmata has resulted from the fact that many people without experience in such an activity (toiautes pragmateias) have been compelled to undertake it” and orders: “It is fitting that those who are capable should carry out these activities (pragmateuesthai) of their own free will and with zeal.”² But the broad meaning “occupation” (UPZ 9, 13; P.Mich. 174, 8; second century AD) is the definition in 2Tim 2:4, which observes that no soldier involves himself in the affairs of this life (empletetai tais tou biou pragmateiais), conformably to the language of Philo, who uses pragmateiai for “the occupations that we live by.”³ In other worlds, the soldier on a campaign is engaged full-time, is on duty from morning to night and no longer occupies himself with working for his living. No other job demands such exclusive dedication to duty as that of the soldier.

The verb pragmateuomai can have the commonplace meanings “strive” (Plutarch, Them. 19.4; Josephus, Ant. 12.180), “give oneself over to one’s pursuits” (Xenophon, Cyr. 2.4.26; Philo, Flacc. 57; P.Oxy. 2106, 16), “be busy about a matter” to bring it to completion (Philo, Dreams 1.53; P.Tebt. 812, 9). In the papyri, its most common meaning is “carry out a function.”⁴ When it is a private matter, the pragmateuomenos is a businessman or agent;⁵ when it is public business, the participle describes the official (P.Oxy. 34, 2; P.Hamb. 168, a 12), especially in the royal administration⁶ and specifically the tax collector;⁷ all those who see to the king's business.

Given on the one hand this title of nobility and financial specialization, and on the other hand the religious or cultic use of the verb in the LXX, we can see what an appropriate word this is in the parable of the ten minas: the nobleman gives ten minas to his servants, telling them, "Turn them to good account until I return" (pragmateusasthe en ho erchomai, Luke 19:13), i.e., put them to work earning returns in business or in the bank while I am away. The douloi here are not slaves, but free men, more specifically officials in the service of the claimant to the throne who must demonstrate their competence and faithfulness by drawing a profit from what they have received. The emphasis is on this exploiting, this turning to good account;⁸ for this reason J. Dauvillier compared the parable to a provision in Sumero-Akkadian law,⁹ namely 99 in the Code of Hammurabi: the contract "for selling, buying, and investing for profit."¹⁰ Ussâp, from the verb apasu, "increase," is the distinctive element of the contract, referring to the profits to be made by the traveling agent who, in the course of his journeys will sell, then buy, then sell again and finally buy again; his enterprising spirit and his business acumen will allow him to realize considerable profits. So pragmateuomai means not "do business" but administrate, manage profitably the capital at your disposal.

¹ For building the house of Yahweh; 1Kgs 9:1; 10:22 (Hebrew hashaq, attach, link); 1Chr 28:21; Dan 6:4; 8:27. The only exception, 2Macc 2:31, where πραγματεία refers to the narration of events by the historian, as in Polybius 1.1.4; 1.3.1; Josephus, Ant. 1.5: ε—γκεχειρίσμαι πραγματείαν; 14.218: οι—ἀναγινώσκοντες τὴν πραγματείαν = the readers of this history; cf. Aristotle, Ph. 2.7.30.198a. In his Géminos: Introduction aux phénomènes (Paris, 1975, p. 203), G. Aujac establishes two meanings of this noun in the mathematician: "(1) a subject of studies (5.13), the manner in which a certain point is handled (8.55); (2) a treatise covering a certain question (5.24)." For the verb, cf. 6.9; 16.32.

² Dittenberger, Or. 669, 12–13 = BGU 1563 = SB 8444 (AD 68); cf. public function (P.Oxy. 3025, 9; letter of the epistrategos, July 17, 118); SB 8393, 33 (letter of Diocletian to the inhabitants of Elephantine). But a commercial or personal matter: περὶ πραγματείας, η—ς καὶ ὁμολογῆκεις μοι (ibid. 6713, 16; third century BC; cf. 9050, col. VI, 5; P.Oxy. 806, from 20 BC). Nevertheless, a πραγματευτής is not necessarily a merchant (P.Lips. 64, 30; P.Oxy. 1880, 5), but is often a steward, a "businessman" (P.Oxy. 3041, 7; 3048, 15, 18; IGLS 1098; MAMA VIII, 182, 9; 385), cf. L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 10, p. 83; vol. 11–12; p. 291; Etudes anatoliennes, pp. 241, 263, 310. In the papyri, πραγματεῖαι sometimes means “functionaries” (UPZ 20, 42, 53; 110, 25–26; P.Tebt. 5, 143, 161 = C.Ord.Ptol. 53). Commenting on the title πραγματευτής given to Aurelius Lucius in BGU 2126, col. II, 1, J. D. Thomas distinguishes three possible meanings: landowner (P.Brem. 74; P.Oxy. 512, 1257, 2130, 2271, 2421, 2668; P.Michael. 23), an auxiliary official in the collecting of taxes (P.Tebt. 307, 357, 360, 580, 605, 607; P.Oxy. 825, 2567; P.Mert. 15; P.Princ. 131; P.Ross.Georg. V, 61), a subordinate agent to the procurator of the tax department (P.Oxy. 2265; P.Ross.Georg. II, 26; P.Panop.Beatty 1, 210; “A Document Relating to the Estate of Claudia Isidora Reconsidered,” in JJP, 1974, p. 241).

³ Philo, Moses 2.211; “the activities that concern the earning and pursuing of the means of living” (2.219; cf. Spec. Laws 2.65); cf. BGU 1747, 20 (64 BC). Cf. the epitropos of the Thebaid, accusing before the strategoī the soldiers and sailors who were conducting business in the ports and the neighboring towns (P.Panop.Beatty 2, 102, πραγματεύομενοι); and Epictetus 3.24.36; Dio Chrysostom 3.66.

⁴ Gnomon of the Idios Logos 70: “People who occupy a public office do not have the right to buy or to lend at interest in the places where they carry out their function” (ε—ν οἷς πραγματεύονται τόποις).

⁵ P.Dura 13 a, 9 (acting in a real estate purchase); P.Mil. 71, 16, 25 = SB 9264 (transformation of an ἄγραφος γάμος into an ἔγγραφος γάμος); 9090, 3; Stud.Pal. XX, 50, 23; P.Stras. 284, 23; Plutarch, Sull. 17.2: “Quintus Titius, a well-known businessman.” In 4 BC, “an oath taken by the inhabitants of Paphlagonia and the Romans conducting business among them” (Dittenberger, Or. 532, 6 = F. Cumont, Studia Pontica, 66, who refers to many analogous formulas cited by Kornemann, De Civibus Romanis in Prov. Consistentibus, 1891, pp. 102ff.); cf. the oath from Assos: ἔδοχεν τῇ βουλῇ καὶ τοι—ς πραγματευομένοις παρ ἡμι—ν Ῥωμαίοις καὶ τω— δήμῳ τω—ν—Ασσίῳν (Dittenberger, Syl. 797, 10; AD 37).

⁶ P.Grenf. II, 37, 4; P.Hib. 198, 141 and 149 (= C.Ord.Ptol. 11, 1 and 9); P.Tebt. 840, 1; 904, 3 (C.Ord.Ptol. 47, 5; cf. 62, 5); UPZ 106, 5; cf. 172, 2; P.Mich. 232, 1 and 22 (= SB 7568; cf. 9316, col. II, 15 = C.Ord.Ptol. 34); SB 9629, 6 and 9; P.Rev. col. XX, 15; PSI 1310, 27).

⁷ P.Tebt. 350, 5 (AD 70); P.Col.Zen. 120, 12 = C.Ord.Ptol. 28, tax returns should be addressed to the tax farmer; P.Hib. 66, 2; P.Mich. 60, 2; SB 6275, 14: ει—ς ἀνάλωμα τω— πραγματευομένῳ (= C.Ord.Ptol. 25; cf. 17, 11; 18, 10 - P.Rev., col. 36, 11; 37, 11); P.Sorb. 21, 7 and 17: director of the wool farms; cf. O.Wilck. I, 303.

⁸ Cf. Luke 19:16—προσηργάσατο = yielded; verse 18: ε—ποίησεν = produced; Matt 25:16—ἤργάσατο = bore fruit; ε—κερδήσεν = profited.

⁹ J. Dauvillier, “La Parabole des mines ou des talents et le 99 du code de Hammurabi,” in Mélanges J. Magnol, Paris, 1948, pp. 153–165. On the diffusion of Mesopotamian law in the first century, cf. J. Modrzejewski, “Note sur le P. Strasb. 237,” in Eos (Symbolae R. Taubenschlag) 1957, vol. 3, pp. 149ff. R. Taubenschlag, Opera Minora, vol. 2, pp. 505–526.

¹⁰ “If a businessman has given money to an agent to sell and buy and invest abroad, the traveling agent shall invest for profit the money that has been . . . to him.” Cf. οἱ—πραγματευόμενοι Ῥωμαῖοι, Roman merchants, as a group, enjoying their own rights in the Greek world, in I. Assos, n. XIII, 1; XIV, 2; XIX, 1; XX, 1; XXI, 1; XXVI, 10; XXVII, 16.

πράκτωρ, σπεκουλάτωρ

praktor, court officer; spekoulator, attending soldier or bodyguard available for special assignments

praktor, S 4233; TDNT 6.642; EDNT 3.145; NIDNTT 3.1157; MM 533; L&N 37.92; BAGD 697 | spekoulator, S 4688; EDNT 3.263; MM 582; L&N 20.70, 33.196; BDF §§5(1*b*), 109(8); BAGD 761

“The judge will hand you over to the agent, and the agent will throw you in prison.”¹ The debtor here is one who would be wise to reach an amicable settlement with his creditor, because if the creditor files suit, the debtor will certainly be sent to prison for his debts. The carrying out of the judge’s sentence is entrusted to the praktor,² which is sometimes translated “police soldier” sometimes “court officer.” Well-attested in Greece in the classical period,³ this official is charged with collecting monetary fines at the demand of the magistrate who imposes them. A good parallel would be our bailiff, then our tax collector.⁴ The office is copiously attested in the papyri from the Ptolemaic and Roman periods.⁵

Praktors appear very frequently in the papyri from the third century AD as agents of courts of justice, either as tax collectors and receivers or as executors of private debts.⁶ In the former case: “Chrysispos, praktor, asks that Asclepiades, son of Dorion, be forced to pay the (tax) money” (P.Lille 28, 13); in the latter, the complainant asks the strategos to make the praktor intervene to recover what a certain Peithias owes him (P.Magd. 41,5). Similarly, two tax collectors demand payment from Phileas for a debt of four silver drachmas (P.Fay. 14, 1; cf. BGU 530, 36). As a fiscal agent recovering debts owed the state, the praktor is described as praktor tonbasilikon (prosodon; UPZ 153, 12, 24; 154, 11; 155, 12; SB 1178 a 12; 3937, 12; P.Petr. III, 26, 14–15). As a collector of private debts, he is called praktor ton idiotikon,⁷ but if xenoi (resident aliens) are involved, he is called praktor ton xenikon. Thus in a royal ordinance of the second century BC relating to taxes on transactions: “On slaves sold by the executors of private debts (xenikon praktores), the buyers shall pay 19 drachmas per 100, in addition to the action fee of 1 percent” (P.Col. 480, 15). Having been assaulted and struck by Peithias, a complainant—who cannot file a lawsuit—asks the king to write the strategos to send the xenikos praktor to “make Peithias pay the price of his violence and give it to me” (P.Enteux. 74, 17; cf. P.Flor. 55, 26; P.Oxy. 1203, 11; BGU 1325, 40; 1826, 47; 1827, 24; PSI 1105, 8; P.Fam.Tebt. 29, 15, 41; P.Tebt. 5, 221). These agents are stationed in particular towns (P.Lund IV, 1, 10; P.Corn. 16, 20; O.Mich. 126, 2; P.Hamb. 80, 1; 81, 1, 8; 82, 4; 83, 5; cf. P.Ryl. 659, 7), at Memphis (UPZ 118, 1, 15, 24), at Oxyrhynchus (PSI 1328, 5, 19, 61), at Bacchias (SB 11106, 3–4); thus it is easy for them to draw up papers; otherwise, they move (P.Mich. 505, 8; P.Cair.Zen. 59499, 46: ho praktor elthen polon auten; P.Tebt. 21, 3–5; 35, 8; SB 7244, 37; 7376, 20).

When the praktor collects taxes in kind, he is praktor sitikon;⁸ for taxes payable in money, he is praktor argyrikon.⁹ But these taxes or imposts are almost beyond numbering.¹⁰ Thus there are praktores demosion (P.Ryl. 141, 6), laographias (BGU 1892, 75; P.Mich. 582, 16; P.Alex. 16, 2, 11; P.Ryl. 595, 1 and 189; from AD 57; P.Col. I, recto, 1 a-b; SB 1026, 15; cf. W. L. Westermann, C. W. Keyes, Tax Lists and Transportation Receipts from Theadelphia, New York, 1932, pp. 3ff. O.Oslo 8, 3; 10, 3), politikon (PSI 776, 2; P.Oxy. 1419, 2), hieron (P.Eleph. 17, 5; 25, 2); metropolitikon (P.Oxy. 1538, 18), stephanikon (aurum coronarium; BGU 62; 362, 542; 548; P.Lond. 474, 477; PSI 733, 5 and 38; P.Stras. 199, 2; SB 10293, 16; P.Oxy. 1441, 1), balaneiou (BGU 362; P.Rein. 130; SB 10424, 1, from July 2, AD 65), annonas oxou (P.Mich. 390, 4), ousiakon (for the lands attached to estates, P.Mich. 599, 1), gerdiakou (the tax on weavers),¹¹ elaiou (P.Tebt. 119, 54), geometrias (P.Rein. 134, 3; O.Wilb. 35–39), chomatikou (tax on dikes, P.Sorb. 65, 1), naubiou (P.Fam.Tebt. 35, 4; P.Oxf. 9,5), etc.

Obviously one official could not carry out all these tasks;¹² so there were not only associates who together with him formed a board in a given locality—*hoi metochoi praktores*¹³—but also numerous subordinates: cheiristai (SB 9203, 4; 9237, 1, 9, 25; BGU 345), grammateis (secretary, scribe, or clerk; P.Sorb. 65, 2; P.Kroll 2, 12), boethoi (O.Mich. 6, 4: Hermogenes boethos ton praktoron) and especially the hyperetai, who are by far the most commonly mentioned. These are often portrayed as assistants or adjuncts of the praktor with the power to represent him and act in his name,¹⁴ hence having the same powers. In Matt 5:25, a parallel text to Luke 12:58, the judge hands over the recalcitrant debtor to a “beadle” or bailiff who has been incarcerated: ho krites to hyperete (cf. UPZ 118, 18, tou kriteriou hyperetes). But the very term hyperetes indicates that this is an underling, a subordinate officer.¹⁵ Furthermore, the hyperetes is almost anonymous, whereas the praktor is almost always named,¹⁶ because he is the titled officer. Finally, it is always mentioned that the action is done dia praktoron (P.Erl. 48, 31; P.Lond. 2016, 9; P.Brem. 43 r 20, 29; P.Bon. 33, 4; SB 7196 r, col. VI, 13; v col. IV, 16; 8972, 2, 5, 8) or meta praktorsi (P.Erl. 105, 86) and that the debtors address and pay only them,¹⁷ whereas these expressions are never used with hypereteis. In short, hypereteis act on the orders of their superiors: hyperetes ho para tou praktoros (P.Hamb. 168, a 19; third century BC).

Obviously, these tax collectors were not always tenderhearted folk, and sometimes they abused the modest circumstances (metriotes) of those subject to them (P.Ryl. 659, 7); the latter are rightly or wrongly “disturbed” by their investigations and lodge complaints (P.Lond. 2008, 7; third century BC; cf. P.Cair.Zen. 59460). Abuses are inevitable (PSI 1160, 8). Sometimes it even happened that with the connivance of his secretary or the town secretary the praktor tried to rip off a taxpayer (Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 22, 7, 10, 16; P.Mert. 8, 19). But normally these court officers had the responsibility of carrying out judicial sentences;¹⁸ their functioning was strictly limited. For example, an ordinance of Ptolemy Euergetes II in 121–118 BC: “The collectors of private debts (tous ton xenikon praktoras) shall not arrest the royal farmers or their subordinate workers, nor the other subjects who according to earlier ordinances cannot be enslaved, under any pretext” (P.Tebt. 5, 222; cf. P.Rein. 18, 39–42). Already in the third century BC, P.Hal. I, 126 forbids the praktor and his assistants from arresting members of the privileged classes (royal emissaries, etc.): mede ho praktor mede hoi hyperetai paralambanetosan toutous. During the time of Claudius or Nero, someone declares “he never gave an armed guard to a tax collector” (ouden dedoken tois praktorois machairophoron, P.Mich. 577, 7).

Nevertheless, as we can see from Luke 12:58, it was indeed the praktor to whom the magistrate gave the arrest warrant (cf. P.Oslo 20, 3; P.Tebt. 34) so as to put the debtor in prison (desmoterion).¹⁹ It is surprising that imprisonment for debts was contemplated at this time, since an ordinance of Ptolemy VI Philometor or Ptolemy V Epiphanes (163 or 186 BC) had forbidden the practice, though only in Egypt:²⁰ “None of the strategoï, epistatai, epimeletai, tax collectors, . . . or other officials who manage the affairs of the king, the cities, and the temples shall arrest anyone for a private debt or offense or out of personal animosity” (SB 9316, col. II, 12). But was this execution of a writ against the person of the debtor ever actually suppressed? Not only do we see the practice eventually accepted by borrowers in the first century BC (P.Oxy. 1639, 16–17; P.Yale 60, 12–13; from the year 6–5) and actually carried out in AD 23

(P.Oxy. 259), but in 68, the edict of the prefect of Egypt, Tiberius Julius Alexander, has to intervene once again because of the imprisonment of debtors and reserve the praktoreion for debtors to the state alone: “As certain ones, under the pretext of serving the interests of the state, have had outstanding debts payable to others transferred to themselves and have imprisoned certain people in the praktoreian and in other prisons (kai eis allas phylakas), which I have heard were closed precisely in order that the recovery of debts should be carried out against property, not persons. . . . I order that in no case shall free men be incarcerated in any prison whatsoever (eis phylaken hentinou), unless they are criminals, nor in the praktoreion, except for debtors to the imperial treasury.”²¹ These liberal measures must have been unknown in first-century Palestine.²²

The spekoulator occasionally appears together with the telones and the praktor in accounts from the second century AD (P.Cair.Goodsp. 30, col. VII, 31; cf. real estate registries from the fourth century, P.Flor. 71, 652, 763, 811). This official also carried out the functions of the tax collector in the fourth century, as in this sworn declaration: “To Valerius . . . apion, spekoulator and gold and silver tax collector” (spekoulatori apaitete chrysou kai asemou, P.Cair.Isid. 127, 1; P.Mich. 644, 13). Hence the complaints about harrasing investigations in connection with the embole tou sitou (P.Oslo 88, 20; P.Oxy. 1223, 21) and even outright accusations (CPR V, 2, n. 12, 4). This person is in effect an official with wide-ranging responsibilities (P.Ross.Georg. V, 61, 61 A verso 2ff.; cf. I, 17, 22; P.Oxy. 3079, 6) and rather high in rank, since one is seen, still in the fourth century, addressing to the chief of police of Taampemou an order to immediately provide an ass and a guard to the sentinel he has sent to him (P.Oxy. 1193, 1). This appears to be a superior officer: “I handed you over to my lord Halladius, but also to my master Hesychius the spekoulator” (parathemen de se kai to kyrio mou Helladio, alla kai to despote mou Hesychio to spekoulatori, P.Oslo 59, 9). He is associated with the eparchos (P.Oxy. 1223, 21), with the demosioi iatroi (P.Harr. 133), and with the frumentarii.²³ He may have a certain amount of wealth,²⁴ or at least freedom of action. In the fifth century, the spekoulator Gennadios invites “his lord Makarios” to dinner to celebrate the birth of his son (P.Oxy. 1214,1). His dignity is apparent in the Lebanese inscription dedicated to the health and victory of the reigning sovereigns by “Severa . . . wife of Theodoros, former spekoulator” (apo spekoulatoros, IGLS 2980; cf. P.Mich. 469, 24; P.Laur. 42, 4).

Such are the features of this personage, unknown in the LXX, that can be drawn from the papyri, all rather late. None of this matches the name of the office (Hellenized from the Latin speculator) or the picture in Mark 6:27 of a low-ranking underling: “The king (Herod), immediately sent a guard (spekoulatora). . . . He went and decapitated him (John) in the prison, brought the head on a platter, and gave it to the young woman.”

Etymologically, a speculator is one who looks (from afar), observes,²⁵ then a scout, spy, explorer;²⁶ finally, one who brings news, a messenger, courier.²⁷ Since these men are always near the prince, waiting for his mail to be ready, they become bodyguards (Tacitus, Hist. 2.11; Suetonius, Claud. 35) and are called upon to perform quite varied services. In the imperial army, the speculatores perform different functions than in the pretorian guard (CIL III, 1650); they are attached to the headquarters staff of the provincial governor,²⁸ under the orders of an optio (CIL 141371) with the rank of principalis. In a given legion (CIL VI, 3358: “speculator exercitus Britannici”) they constituted a “schola speculorum” (ibid. III, 3524).

As underlings who were available for all sorts of assignments, spekoulatores could carry out an execution. M. J. Lagrange²⁹ compares Mark 6:27 to the Hebrew rasîm, runner-bodyguards who sometimes served as executioners; thus “the king (Saul) said to the runners who were with him, ‘Turn around and put to death the priests of Yahweh’” (1Sam 22:17; cf. 2Kgs 10:25). This meaning of speculator is current in the first century in Latin authors: “The centurion in charge of the execution ordered the guard to sheathe his sword (condere gladium speculatorem jubet) and led the prisoner back” (Seneca, Ira 1.18.4); “During the civil war, a master who was on the list of the proscribed was hidden by his slave, who put the rings of the condemned man on his fingers and his clothing on his back. He presented himself thus to the police (speculatoribus occurrit), saying that he asked nothing more than that they should carry out their orders and stretched out his neck to them” (Seneca, Ben. 3.25). So also in the acts of the martyrs. At the moment of his execution, St. Paul prayed in Hebrew, and while he was praying, “as the spekoulator relieved him of his head, milk spurted into the soldier’s garments” (hos de apetinaxen autou ho spekoulator ten kephalen, gala epytisen eis tous chitonas tou stratiotou, Mart. Paul 5; ed. Lipsius, p. 115, 17). In the Acts of Appian, the spekoulator could be a speculator Augusti, i.e., a member of the imperial bodyguards, chosen from the pretorian cohort.³⁰

So we must classify the spekoulator of Mark 6:27, a biblical hapax, as one of the Latinisms of the Second Gospel.³¹

¹ Luke 12:58—ὁ κριτής σε παραδώσει τω— πράκτορι, καὶ ὁ πράκτωρ σε βαλεῖ— ει—ς φυλακὴν. Cf. the inscription of the astynomoi at Pergamum: “The astynomoi shall conduct a hearing and pass sentence as seems right to them; if, even then, some (private persons) do not obey them, the strategoï shall impose the legal fine on them and entrust its collection to the praktor” (παραδότωσαν τω— πράκτορι πράσσειν, Dittenberger, Or. 483, 7); P.Hal. I, 126: μηδὲ ὁ πράκτωρ μηδὲ οἱ— ὑπηρέται παραλαμβανέτωσαν τούτους. The link between ἀντίδικος and πράκτωρ, already seen in Demosthenes, C. Theocr. 58.20, is also found in P.Oxy. 533, 11, 23 (second-third century).

² Πράκτωρ is used only here in the NT, and only once in the OT, where it translates the Hebrew participle nogsîm, “those who use force, compel, demand, treat roughly”; Isa 3:12—“O my people, your oppressors (πράκτορες) glean you.”

³ Andocides, Myst. 77, 79; Demosthenes, C. Macart. 43.71; C. Theocr. 58.20. 48 (cf. J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1942, p. 355, n. 144; 1958, p. 300, n. 396). In the inventory of the treasury of Athena at Imbros (published by NCIG, n. XXI, 4, 14), the three πράκτορες, who made up a commission, were financial controllers. They established the inventory of the property belonging to the sanctuary and did the appraisals. Similarly, the association of the μύσται of the god Mandros set up a commission of πράκτορες to gather the funds for the purchase of a chair for this association (I.Cumae, 37, 15 and 49). In Aeschylus, Eum. 319, the Erinyes appear as πράκτορες αἵματος to make the criminal pay his blood-debt; the praktor is a watchful avenger (Suppl. 647; Aeschylus, Ag. 111). For the evolution of this institution according to the inscriptions, cf. H. Schaefer, “Πράκτωρ,” in PW, vol. 22, 2, col. 2538–2548.

⁴ In an act of donation from AD 87, the witness Pausanias is presented as εἰ—σαγωγεὺς καὶ πράκτωρ καὶ τω—ν σωματοφυλάκων, i.e., bailiff, tax collector, member of the bodyguard (P.Dura 18, 10, 32; 19, 19).

⁵ Cf. S. PlodzieĚ, “The Origin and Competence of the ΠΡΑΚΤΩΡ ΧΕΝΙΚΩΝ,” in JJP, vol. 5, 1951, pp. 217–227; J. Vergote, “Le Nouveau Testament et la papyrologie juridique,” in Eos (Symbolae R. Taubenschlag), 1957, vol. 2, p. 153.

⁶ P.Hal. I, 47, 54, 116, 119; P.Cair.Zen. 59136, 6; 59367, 9; 59460, 6, 12; 50490, 46, 53; P.Col. 480, 15; P.Hamb. 168 a 19; P.Hib. 30, 18,; 814, 2, 40. Cf. R. Taubenschlag, Law of Greco-Roman Egypt, pp. 401ff., 410, 416.

⁷ P.Col.Zen. 54, 48; P.Mich.Zen. 71, 1; P.Hib. 34, 7; SB 7446, 1; 7450, 50.

⁸ BGU 414; 425, 457, 515; 2063; 12; SB 11025, 15; P.Oxy. 1196; 2235, 19: “No tax has ever been paid to the praktōres for this land”; O.Mich. 25, 2: Ἀὐρήλιος —Ωρος καὶ Κοπρίων πράκτορες σιτικῶ—ν κώμης Φιλαδελφίας; cf. O.Aberd. (ed. G. Turner) n. 22, 3; 31, 1; O.Brüss.Berl. (ed. P. Viereck), n. 8, 5; 65, 1.

⁹ BGU 15; 25; 41; 42; 1891, 467; PSI 1236, 6; P.Mil.Vogl. 183, 4; 237, 5; P.Oslo 29, 2; 116, 2; P.Sorb. 66, 1: “Apollonides and Antonios, cash tax collectors of Notos” give a receipt for the payment of taxes in cash; P.Stras.

188, 2; 195, 3; P.Fam.Tebt. 39, 11; P.Corn. 16, 3; 42, 3; SB 11259; 11245; P.Wisc. 42, 3 (cf. 38, 1: λόγος πρακτορείας; C.P.Herm. 22, 1; H. C. Youtie, Scriptiunculae, vol. 1, p. 407, n. 29); O.Ont.Mus. II, 100–126, 130, 149, 202, 214; cf. n. 224: ἀχυροπράκτορες.

¹⁰ Cf. the tax rolls from Karanis; P.Mich. IV, 224, 6332, 6333, 6343, 6388, 6402, 6417; S. L. Wallace, Taxation in Egypt, Princeton, 1938 (index, p. 506); O.Bodl. III (index, pp. 197–199).

¹¹ P.Mich. 598, 2; from AD 49. In 91, the death certificate for a weaver-slave is addressed not to the βασιλικὸς γραμματεὺς (P.Mert. 9; BGU 2021, 2087; P.Phil. 6; P.Petaus 4–9), nor to the γραμματεὶς μητροπόλεως (P.Mich. 579; P.Oxy. 2564, 2761; P.Stras. 528, 530; P.Mert. 84), nor to the κωμογραμματεὺς (P.Stras. 200, 306, 312, 522; P.Mich. 538; P.Phil. 7; BGU 2331; P.Petaus 3), but to the πράκτορες χειρωναξίου γερδίων (P.Oxy. 2957, 1); this is because the deceased is a taxpayer, cf. W. Brashear, “P. Sorb. inv. 2358 and the New Statistics on Death Certificates,” in BASP, vol. 14, 1977, p.8.

¹² In AD 185, to help the πράκτορες ἀργυρικῶ—ν, who did not have the personnel to collect all the numerous taxes, the strategos of the Arsinoite nome appoints four assistants to this leitourgia (P.Mich. 536).

¹³ O.Mich. 7, 5; P.Oslo 116, 2; P.Princ. 125, 4; 130; 18; P.Fam.Tebt. 39, 3; P.Fouad 66, 4; P.Alex. 16, 2, 11; 124 (p. 28), 464 (p. 29); P.Corn. 16, 3; 42, 3; P.Hamb. 81, 1, 8; 82, 4; 83, 5; cf. P.Mich. 647, 4: οἱ—κοινωνοὶ πράκτωρες. In the second century, at Tebtunis, the μέτοχοι πράκτορες collected the φόρος ε—δαφῶ—ν on a tract of land (P.Mil.Vogl. 283, 2 and 7).

¹⁴ P.Hal. I, 147: ὁ πράκτωρ ἢ ὁ ὑπηρέτης (a complaint against the depositions of false witnesses); lines 54, 116: ὁ πράκτωρ ἢ ὁ ὑπηρέτης πραξάτω καθάπερ ε—γ δίκης ε—κ τῶ—ν ὑπαρχόντων; line 119 (a complaint against assaults).

¹⁵ Ep. Arist. 111. In P.Mich. 505, 4–6, where the ὑπηρέτης and the πράκτωρ intervene, the former is only a bank clerk who gives a sum of money to the latter: δεδωκέναι τῶ—πράκτορι ὡς ἵνα σοι μεταβάληται. But αὐτοὺς τοὺς πράκτορας μετὰ καὶ τοῦ ὑπηρέτου (SB 7529, 15).

¹⁶ P.Mil.Vogl. 183 a 11: Τρύφων πράκτωρ; 237, 5: Ἡρωονος πράκτωρ ἀργυρικῶ—ν; BGU 1851, 5: Ζώιλῳ πράκτορι; P.Cair.Zen. 59367, 9: Κράτωνα τὸν πράκτορα; P.Rein. 130, 6: Petemenophis the collector (AD 35); 134, 1: Chesmois, cash tax collector; 136,1: Asclas and Soter; 137, 1; P.Ryl. 595, 1: Nemesionos (AD 57); UPZ 153, 12, 14: Onomarchos; etc.

¹⁷ P.Oxy. 2140, 7; P.Mich. 383, 3, 17, 21; P.Princ. 70, 11: ἔδωκας τοι—ς πράκτορσιν λόγον (cf. H. C. Youtie, Scriptiunculae, vol. 2, pp. 891, 894); P.Petr. 13, 17, 6: παραγέγραμμαι τω— πράκτορι ὡς ὀφείλων πρὸς τὰ ἀμπελικά; P.Fam.Tebt. 26, 3, 9; BGU 530, 36 (first century AD). Cf. the receipts from πράκτορες: BGU 1891, 2, 467; 2028, 3, 7; 2067, 6; 2103, 4; 2288, 3; 2289, 5; 2290, 6; P.Fay. 35; 42; 47; 51; 53–55, etc.

¹⁸ P.Lips. 120; P.Oxy. 712; BGU 970; 1038; UPZ 118; P.Tebt. 707; P.Mert. 59. Cf. R. Sugranyes de Franch, Etudes sur le droit palestinien à l'époque évangélique, Fribourg, 1926, pp. 51ff.

¹⁹ BGU 1138, 12, 14 (twelfth year of Augustus); cf. P.Mich. 383, 8 (from AD 106–109). The πρακτόρειον was originally the place where the πράκτωρ worked, before it became a prison; cf. at Mylasa ε—μβάλλεσθαι ει—ς τὸ πρακτόρειον (Dittenberger, Or. 515, 32). At Theadelphia, in AD 3–4, the πράκτωρ is accompanied by a guard, τὸν φυλακείτην (P.Mert. 8, 19).

²⁰ Cf. C. Préaux, Economie royale, pp. 537–543. The Rosetta Stone (Dittenberger, Or. XC, 13–14).

²¹ Dittenberger, Or. 669, 15–18 = SB 8444. G. Chalon, T. Julius Alexander, pp. 115ff.

²² Cf. the parable of the Unforgiving Servant (Matt 18:23–35), who “cast his debtor in prison (ἔβαλεν αὐτὸν ει—ς φυλακὴν) until he should pay what he owed” (verse 30); but the Master hands him over to the torturers (παρέδωκεν αὐτὸν τοι—ς βασανισταί—ς). Cf. C. Spicq, Dieu et l'homme, pp. 54–61; J. Modrzejewski, “Servitude pour dettes ou legs de créance (Note sur CP Jud. 126),” in RechPap, vol. 2, Paris, 1962, pp. 75–98.

²³ P.Mich. 472, 16; CIL VI, 3358; cf. Fiebiger, “Frumentarii,” in PW, vol. 7, col. 123; F. Lammert, “Speculatores,” ibid., series II, vol. 3 A 2, col. 1583–1586.

²⁴ Cf. P.Cair.Isid. 32, 9: grain receipt from the third century, in the name of Ptolemaeus and Thaisarion, son of Penerates the spekoulator; P.Erl. 105, 34 (fourth-century accounts).

²⁵ Pliny, HN 11.8.8; Cicero, Nat. D. 2.140; Livy 31.24.

²⁶ Caesar, B Gall. 1.47.6; 2.11.2; 5.49.8; Livy 28.2. Cf. Ps.-Aristotle, Mund. 6.398 a: “slaves of the king, couriers and spies (ἡμεροδρόμοι τε καὶ σκοποί), messengers, and men who watch for signals.”

²⁷ CIL 5.271; Bell. Afr. 31.4: “in praetorio dedens per speculatores et nuntios imperabat”; Tacitus, Hist. 2.73; Suetonius, Calig. 44; Livy 40.7. On these imperial couriers cf. “Essai sur le cursus publicus sous le haut-empire romain,” in Mémoires... Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres, vol. 14, 1940, pp. 327–336.

²⁸ BGU 2332, 6 (deed of sale in the fourth century): Aurelius Hol receives from Flavius Adelpnos, spekoulator of the prefect’s officium in the province of Augustamnica (σπεκουλάτωρι τάξεως ἡγεμωνίας Αὐγουσταμνικῆς), an advance payment of 12,000 talents of silver for wine. It seems that these spekoulators functioned as quartermasters.

²⁹ Evangile selon saint Marc, p. 162.

³⁰ H. A. Musurillo, Pagan Martyrs, p. 213.

³¹ Like κεντυρίων (Mark 15:39, 44, 45), λεγιών (5:9, 15), δηνάριον (6:37; 12:15; 14:5), κοδράντης (12:42), ξέστης (7:4), etc.

πραῦπάθεια, πραῦς, πραῦτης

praypatheia, moderation, mildness, leniency; prays, moderate, mild, lenient; praytes, moderation, mildness, leniency

praypatheia, TDNT 5.939; EDNT 3.146; MM 534; L&N 88.59; BAGD 698 | prays, S 4239; TDNT 6.645–651; EDNT 3.146–147; NIDNTT 2.256–264; MM 534; L&N 88.60; BDF §§26, 47(4); BAGD 698–699 | praytes, S 4240; TDNT 6.645–651; EDNT 3.146–147; NIDNTT 2.256–259; MM 534; L&N 88.59; BDF §§26, 47(4); BAGD 699; ND 4.170

These terms, which have no etymology, are used relatively little in the inscriptions and are exceptional in the papyri; they belong to the literary language, where they have a rather curious semantic evolution. To be sure, their meaning has to do with mildness, but that definition is rather loose.¹

Praos, a word that is not found in Homer, appears for the first time in Herodotus, but it is the verb prayno that is originally most used. In Ps.-Homer, H. Hermes 1.417, Apollo, who is angry, lets himself be calmed by the lyre;² in Hesiod, patient mules are tamed (Hesiod, Op. 797; Th. 254). Xerxes seeks to calm his team (Aeschylus, Pers. 190; cf. Xenophon, Eq.

9.10: calm a horse); Darius counsels Atossa to calm their son with gentle words.³ In medicine, prayno expresses the diminution of evil: “the fever lessened.”⁴

In the classical period, praotes, a calm and soothing disposition, is contrasted with rage and savagery (Plato, Symp. 197 d). It implies moderation (Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 1125 b), which permits reconciliation (Chilon, in Stobaeus 4.7.24; vol. 4, p. 255). Solon makes it a precept: “Be mild toward your own” (pros isthi, Stobaeus 3.1.72; vol. 3, p. 115). Hero is a beneficent sovereign who is “full of mildness toward the citizens” (Pindar, Pyth. 3.71); and for the first time the kindnesses of this quality are specified: Jason, exuding affable words with a mild voice, set forth the bases of a conciliating debate (Pyth. 4.136). The praotes of the Spartan general Brasidas gained everyone’s sympathy.⁵

In the orators, praotes becomes a leniency and an indulgence—which is not without naivete—that is characteristic of the natural goodness of the Athenians.⁶ Andocides, for example, owes his impunity to the Athenians and their lack of leisure (Lysias, C. Andoc. 34); “The leniency of your character, Athenians, gives great help to the guilty” (Demosthenes, C. Mid. 184; cf. Embassy 104; C. Timocr. 51); “Will their impudent and criminal acts find leniency with you?”⁷ This forbearance, which implies mutual aid between associates,⁸ is the mark and the virtue of a political regime: “In a democracy, there is more mildness (than in an oligarchy);⁹ laws are rigorously established, but “in punishment there is more leniency than the laws ordain.”¹⁰ Also, praotes is synonymous with “moderation”;¹¹ it makes rulers more accommodating and humane.¹² “I want to urge you . . . to try mildness and humaneness. . . . Harshness (chalepotes) is painful for those who practice it and those who suffer it; praotes is well esteemed with humans and all other living beings” (Isocrates, Phil. 116); it “mellows” all relations (Isocrates, Paneg. 47; cf. 102; Xenophon, Cyr. 2.1.29) between citizens (Plato, Resp. 2.375 c) even while it remains implacable toward enemies (Tim. 18 a). Thus praotes spreads throughout the land (Isocrates, Evag. 49, 67; Hel. 37) and even adversaries are won over (Xenophon, Ages. 1.1.20). In AD 41, Emperor Claudius asks the Alexandrians to live with the Jews in mutual kindness: “If both sides will abstain from these things and live with mildness and philanthropy toward each other” (ean touton apostantes amphotoi meta praotetos kai philanthropeias tes pros allelous zen ethelesete, P.Lond. 1912, 101).

Since praotes is opposed to roughness and severity, corrects violence and the excesses of tyranny, and moves judges and the powerful to clemency, it became a constant epithet for the emperor, kings, and high officials. Agrippa considered it to be a trait of royalty more than a virtue (Josephus, Ant. 19.334). Plato attributed it to the kings of Atlantis (Critias 120 e); Agesilaus was indulgent toward private offenses and very mild toward his friends (Xenophon, Ages. 11.6.10; cf. 2). At Syracuse, Hiero II

“settled the situation with such moderation (praos) and generosity that the Syracusans . . . made him their general” (Polybius 1.8.4). Ptolemy VI Philometor, more than anyone else, was mild and good (Polybius 39.7.3; with Philip V, this meekness was a mere facade, 10.26.1). Demetrius had “a certain praotes that drew all hearts toward him” (Diodorus Siculus 19.81.4; cf. 11.67.3). According to Philodemus of Gadara, the praotes of the good king, who does not take vengeance for plots, wins sympathy.¹³

With Plato and Aristotle the contours of praotes come into focus. The former sees it as a quality of the good person (Leg. 5.731 d); the latter makes it a virtue, contrasting it with wrath and vengeance; the praos is inclined to forgive (Eth. Nic. 4.11.1125bff.; Rh. 2.3.1380a; Ps.-Aristotle, Mag. Mor. 2.7.1108a6). Praotes is without hatred and spitefulness (Plato, Resp. 6.500 a) and moderates the punishment of offenses (Leg. 9.863 d). But—and this is a notable innovation—the praos keeps his serenity in all the misfortunes that come his way, bearing them calmly and patiently: the wise man, if he happens to lose a son, a brother, wealth, “bears it as mildly as possible.”¹⁴ In a privileged fashion, the teacher learns praotes by remaining patient in the face of the errors and objections of his interlocutors: “Only put more mildness into your teaching so as not to force me to abandon it.”¹⁵

Menander shows how Cnemon, who is awkward and surly (chalepos, dyskolos), became accommodating; his praotes is the victory of goodwill.¹⁶ But in Plutarch “praotes has the place of honor” to an exceptional degree, as J. de Romilly puts it.¹⁷ He praises it in almost all his heroes and states that “deliberateness and mildness are the essential qualities of the statesman and are passed on to him by reason and education” (Cor. 15.4). Nicocles had said, “Temperament alone does not make sovereigns severe or mild. . . . Have less confidence in my mildness than in your virtue” (Isocrates, Nic. 3.55), and Epictetus 3.20.9 emphasizes that the trainer exercises the athlete’s patience, calmness, and mildness (to anektikon, toaorgeton, to praon). Likewise animals are taught to remain calm and docile,¹⁸ barbarians are “tamed” when they are made milder (exeprayne, Plutarch, De Alex. fort. 330 a), and honest people learn to maintain their serenity: “the person who is accustomed to apply himself to affairs with flexibility and moderation is very mild and agreeable in his dealings with other people” (eukolotatos . . . kai praotatos, De tranq. anim. 7.468 e; cf. De frat. amor. 17.488 b). This implies submission to reason (De cohib. ira 1.453b–c), moderation of the passions (praotes pathon, De prof. in virt. 83 e; cf. 78 b; 80 b–c), and self-mastery (Fab. 17.7). But then this balance between insensitivity and cruelty (De virt. mor. 445 a) is a virtue that is put between courage and justice (ibid. 2.441 b), and even a divine virtue,¹⁹ superior to purely intellectual qualities.²⁰

The praos has a mild look (Plutarch, De cohib. ira 6.456 a), a smiling countenance (4.455 a–b), a soft voice (Xenophon, Symp. 1.10), a tranquil demeanor (praotes poreias, Per. 5.1; Fab. 17.7); is accommodating and affable (Arist. 23.1), courteous (Alex. 58.8), charming and gracious (Ages. 20.7; Aem. 3.6), but also quiet and reserved (De frat. amor. 16.487 c), and at the same time easygoing and welcoming toward all (Praec. ger. rei publ. 32.823 f). His character is conciliatory.²¹ He does not like quarrels (Lyc. 25.4) and remains patient as Socrates was toward a shrewish wife and stupid children (Cat. Mai. 20.3). In the event of a misunderstanding, he is not slow to be reconciled (De frat. amor. 18.489 c). His simple and affable ways (Conv. sept. sap. 3.148 d) may captivate opponents (De frat. amor. 16.487 c ; cf. Luc. 29.6; Pomp. 33.2); this is the triumph of praotes, because “the characteristic of mildness, pardon, and reconciliation, is to lift up, save, spare, fortify” (De cohib. ira 10.458 c).

Philo had already emphasized most of these traits, but meekness was not really part of his theological vocabulary (he preferred hemerotes). The virtue of praotes is put in action with peace and calmness (Philo, Moses 1.328, 2.279; hesyche te kai praos, Creation 81) and moderation that come easier with age, when the passions are more tamed (103, epieikeia kai praotes; cf. Dio Cassius 55.12). Thus it presupposes self-mastery (Sacr. Abel and Cain 27) and translates into a friendly look and a soft voice (Moses 1.331; Abraham 153). Philo emphasizes tranquility, affability, and a sort of mellowness;²² the virtue is not to be impassible to or thrown into convulsions by misfortune, but to moderate one’s feelings, to “lighten the weight of events in quietness and calm” (hesyche kai praos, Abraham 257). The fat from the breast of the sacrificial victims, which is reserved for the priests, symbolizes “gentle mildness” (Spec. Laws 1.145). Masters are gentle with servants (Decalogue 167). Prudence “takes care to remain in kindness, mildness, and affability” (ten eumene kai praeian kai hileon, Alleg. Interp. 1.66). This discretion was that shown by Macro in reprimanding Gaius quietly and mildly (hesyche kai praos), bending over to speak in his ear so that no one else would hear (Philo, To Gaius 43). We might also say that this is God’s discretion.²³

In light of the secular parallels, it is not surprising that the OT attributed praytes to Moses²⁴ (Num 12:3; Sir 45:4; cf. Josephus, Ant. 3.97, 316) to David (Psalms 132:1), to Artaxerxes (Esther 5:1 e), to the high priest Onias (2 Macc 15:12), and to the Messiah.²⁵ It is surprising, however, to see the LXX uses prays and praytes exclusively to translate the Hebrew words ʿanaw, ʿanî, ʿa^ˆnawâh, ʿanâh, always expressing humility and abasement;²⁶ prays is even synonymous with tapeinos (Isa 26:6; cf. Sir 10:14) to the point that unlike chrestotes, praytes is never attributed to God. This new meaning appears in the first occurrence of the term, regarding Moses, who was “very prays (Hebrew ʿanaw), the most prays man on earth” (Num 12:3). This can hardly have to do with “non-violence”—since the mediator of the covenant, in resisting Pharaoh’s oppression, had killed an Egyptian (Exod 2:12)—rather, it means a religious quality involving radical submission to God and modesty in dealings with other people. As it happens, Moses shows “clemency” by praying for his sister Miriam when she is stricken with leprosy after plotting against him. It is worth noting that apart from Dan 4:19 (a soft voice), the OT never uses prays with a secular meaning. The praeis are the “humble of the earth” (Job 24:4), the abased, the poor, exploited by the wicked, to whom they have to give in. Therefore they are blessed by God (Zeph 3:12), who teaches them (Ps 25:9; cf. Matt 11:25), saves them (Ps 76:9; 147:6; 149:4), relieves them on the day of misfortune (Ps 94:13, prayno), and finally “toppling the thrones of princes makes the praeis sit in their stead” (Sir 10:14; cf. Luke 1:51-53). These “humble possess the land” (Ps 37:11) and rejoice to hear Yahweh’s praise (Ps 34:2). These, then, are religious people, whose outstanding model will be the Messiah-King, who appears not proudly on a noble war-horse but “humble, mounted on an ass,” to enter his capital (Zech 9:9; cf. Matt 21:5).

OT praytes is perfect submission to the divine will (Ps 132:1), and the Lord loves the combination of faithfulness and meekness (Sir 1:27; 45:4) that characterizes his people. In contrast to prideful exaltation, these folk always remain modest (Sir 10:28); if a poor person accosts them, they reply gently (Sir 4:8); if a woman expresses herself with modesty, her husband is no common mortal (Sir 36:23)! This absence of any immoderation characterized Onias, “of modest bearing and gentle manner (praon de ton tropon), distinguished in his speech and gifted from childhood with all the practices of virtue” (2Macc 15:12). A person who conducts himself in that manner is loved by all people who are accepted by God (Sir 3:17). This is no longer a matter of self-mastery or of reining in one’s anger, but of a heart disposition and comportment characterized by restraint and modesty. It is the distinctive mark of souls that belong to God and “fear” him, have a sense of his transcendence and of their own poverty. Having been tested, they have acquired an approachable manner, measured speech, reserved attitudes. Their praytes is not so much mildness as indulgence (French mansuétude). The Latin word mansuetudo derives from mansuesco, literally, “accustom to the hand,” hence “tame”; so mansuetudo, “taming,”²⁷ came to mean serene receptiveness, as opposed to impetuosity or insolence, hostility or gruffness. It is in a way the docile and respectful attitude of a servant toward his master, always ready to submit.

If the NT heightens and focuses these essential meanings, it does not change them by making praytes a major Christian virtue. It is notable that this noun is unknown in the Gospels and the adjective prays is found only in Matt (and at 1Pet 3:4), but with remarkable significance: “Blessed are the praeis, because they shall inherit the earth.”²⁸ This is a resumption of Ps 37:11, where praeis translates the Hebrew ‘a<^>nawîm. So it means the poor, the small, the persecuted, and better—as the Syrians understood—the “humble” in the moral sense. It is not the sociological condition that is exalted, but religious submission and confidence in God, which translates into patience and mildness.²⁹ The stable happiness of peace and security that is promised them is “possession of the land,” not occupation of the land (of promise), the land of Israel in the political sense; still less “all the land,” the whole world,³⁰ but entrance into the kingdom of God here below and ultimately in heaven. The “inheritance” here is blessedness for the destitute who have looked to God for everything.

Totally submissive toward God and meek toward people, Jesus presented himself as “meek and lowly of heart” (prays kai tapeinos te kardia) and on these grounds invites people to receive his teaching (Matt 11:29). Thus he reveals his innermost soul, but he also takes up a tradition that is constant from Pindar and Isocrates and that attributes praytes to teachers. Far from being despotic, the Master must be patient and discreet toward his students lest he discourage or offend them; in his condescension he puts himself on their level and answers their problems, being at their service. At the entrance of the Messiah-King into his capital on Palm Sunday, Matt 21:5 quotes Zech 9:9—“Your king comes to you, humble (prays, Hebrew ‘ani), mounted on the foal of an ass,”³¹ the mount of the poor, and not on a horse, the warrior’s noble mount.

Using a bold metaphor, 1Pet 3:4, addressing Christians, appeals to “the secret person, the one of the heart, in the incorruptibility of a meek and calm spirit.”³² These women are to accept the dependency they are in vis-à-vis their husbands, whom they hope to convert to the faith (cf. the beatitude of the meek, Matt 5:4), with the help of the meekness that disarms opponents (2Tim 2:25), according to Israel’s experience (Ps 149:4-5). Aware of their weakness, docile, and submissive, these Christian women are “poor” folk who know no bitter zeal. They are often mistreated, even insulted, but they remain peaceful (Titus 3:2) and disposed to forgive (2Cor 10:1; Gal 6:1). Like the Messiah, they neither dispute nor cry out (Matt 11:29; 12:19). Thus they imitate the Suffering Servant and obtain the victory of good over evil.

As for praytes (eleven times in the epistles), it is first of all the characteristic of the apostle. “What do you want? Shall I come to you with a rod, or with love and in a spirit of meekness?” (e en agape pneumatē te praytetos)³³ is almost a quotation of Job 37:13, where God’s will is realized either by the rod (Hebrew shebet) or by lovingkindness (hesed) linked with justice; but St. Paul links praytes and agape. If the rhabdos (rod), used for punishment, symbolizes Israelite and Greek education,³⁴ the apostle’s love is that of a father, without violence, all gentleness and serenity; it persuades rather than rails. Moreover, it is not the man who commands; St. Paul exhorts “by the meekness and gentleness of Christ” (dia tes praytetos kai epieikeias tou Christou),³⁵ setting these opposite submission, because praytes disarms opponents.

This meekness is poured out into the hearts of all Christians by the Holy Spirit,³⁶ and it is what maintains unity and harmony between all members of the community: “I urge you . . . to lead a life worthy of the calling that you have received, in all humility, meekness, and patience; bear with one another with love”³⁷ without grumbling. “You, God’s chosen ones, put on compassion, kindness, humility, meekness, patience; bear with one another and forgive one another, if anyone has a complaint against another.”³⁸ So if one member of the community “is taken in a fault, you who are spiritual must restore him in a spirit of meekness, taking care for yourselves, for you yourselves are also capable of being tempted.”³⁹

The praytes of believers cannot be confined to relations with other Christians; it has to extend to all people. “Remind the faithful not to slander anyone, not to be quarrelsome, but conciliatory (epieikeis), showing constant humility toward all people.”⁴⁰ This receptiveness toward one’s neighbor, this affability, this kindness in relations, which are manifestations of love (agape), must be plain for all to see: “Who among you is wise and understanding? Let him show it by good conduct, by acts marked with the humility that belongs to wisdom” (en prayteti sophias, Jas 3:13). This then is a characteristic of Christian comportment, a touchstone of a person who possesses agape; such a person cannot be other than prays.

This virtue, which is required in teachers (Matt 11:29) and educators (2Cor 10:1; Gal 6:1) because it is persuasive (Matt 5:4), is especially necessary in dealings with the undisciplined or refractory: “A servant of the Lord must be not combative but affable (epios) toward all . . . instructing opponents with humility” (2Tim 2:25). After all, such people may be acting in good faith, so their objections must be accepted with patience, without annoyance. Through meekness, which unites humility and clemency (cf. Dio Cassius 48.3; 55.12, 17), one can remain calm and bring back the errant and the guilty. The aim is to save souls, not to triumph over a conquest. This is the same attitude that 1Pet 3:15 commands for all believers: “always ready to give an answer to anyone who asks the reason for the hope that is in you, always with humility and respect.”⁴¹

Praypathia (a biblical hapax), which seems to be synonymous with praytes,⁴² is commended by St. Paul to Timothy: “Man of God . . . pursue righteousness, piety, faith, love, constancy, meekness” (1Tim 6:11), all indispensable virtues for the pastor who will be serene, accessible to all, not given to violent reaction, fomenting peace.

¹ The major study on the question is that of J. de Romilly, La Douceur dans l'apensée grecque, Paris, 1970, who gives a comparative analysis of philanthropia, sophrosyne, syngnome, epieikes, epios, and observes at the outset that in the subjective sense, “mild” (or gentle or sweet, French doux) is the opposite of “bitter” (Fr. amer) and is synonymous with “pleasant”

(Fr. agréable; the sweetness of living, of seeing the light); as a human attitude it is the opposite of violence, harshness, and cruelty. In the sphere of ethics, “mildness means kindness of manners, benevolence shown toward others. . . . Toward the unfortunate, it becomes close to generosity and goodness; toward the guilty it becomes leniency and understanding; toward the unknown, people in general, it becomes humaneness and almost charity! In political life, likewise, it can be tolerance, or again, clemency, depending on whether one is dealing with citizens, or with subjects, or with conquered people. At the root of these various meanings, there is nevertheless a single disposition to accept others as those who are wished well” (p. 1).

² Ps.-Homer, H. Ares 10 (actually an Orphic hymn of the fourth-fifth century AD): “From on high shed your mild brightness on our lives.” An inscription from Lebadaea in the third century honors the mildness of Artemis (JG VII, 3101). Hymn to Isis (first-third century): —Εγὼ πραυ4νω καὶ κυμαίνω θάλασσαν (I.Cumae, n. 41, 43).

³ Aeschylus, Pers. 837; cf. Herodotus 2.121 δ: he pretended to calm down; 2.181: “unless the anger of Amasis was softened.”

⁴ Hippocrates, Epid. 7.118; Aretaeus, SD 1, 2, 3, for those who suffer with migraines, “darkness lessens their pain” (cf. N. van Brock, Vocabulaire médicale, p. 211). Cf. Prov 18:14—“A man’s spirit sustains him (πραυ4νει; pilpel of the Hebrew kûl) when he is ill.” The adjective praos is used in this sense by Plato: children ask a physician to care for them as gently as possible (Lg. 4.720 a). Philo (Sacr. Abel and Cain 121) compares the wise person’s stance toward the wicked to that of a physician who “softens” a patient’s pain; Unchang. God 65. The epitaph of Cosmas, a Cretan veterinarian, presents himself as ὡς ἀληθω—ς πρα—ος καὶ ἡσύχιος ἀνὴρ (I.Cret. II, p.100, n. 8).

⁵ Thucydides 4.108.3; cf. Aristophanes, Pax 934: “Let them be mild-spirited (ἡπιοι). So we shall be lambs for each other, and with our allies more accommodating (πραότεροι);” 998: “a sweetening leniency,” substituting for violence, can unite the Greeks. Euripides, Bacch. 436, compares Dionysus to a dangerous animal who shows himself to be tame (praos).

⁶ Isocrates, Antid. 20: the Athenians, “the most merciful and mildest of all men,” 300.

⁷ Demosthenes, C. Timocr. 170; cf. 218: “To be indulgent toward such individuals . . . would be to habituate and instruct in crime the vast majority among you”; Aristotle, Ath. Pol. 22.4: “the habitual praytes ” of the Athenians permitted the supporters of the tyrants to stay when the tyrants themselves were ostracized; Polybius 1.72.2–3: the Carthaginians do not name as governors those who act toward their citizens “with mildness and humaneness”; much different is the praotes of the Romans (3.98–99; 28.3.2).

⁸ H. Bolkestein, Wohltätigkeit und Armenpflege im vorchristlichen Altertum, Utrecht, 1939, pp. 108–109.

⁹ Demosthenes, C. Andr. 51; cf. C. Timocr. 163; Isocrates, Areop. 67: “No one could praise the leniency of those people more than that of the democracy”; 20; Panath. 56: “These facts establish how much more moderate and mild we have shown ourselves in the practice of political affairs”; Nic. 2.8; 3.16–17, 32; Antid. 70: “the mildest of all regimes”; Plato (Resp. 8.558 a) notes that in a democracy certain convicted criminals freely circulate in public, as if no one cared about them or saw them.

¹⁰ Isaeus, in Stobaeus 4.7.25; vol. 4, p. 255; cf. Plato, Leg. 9.867 b: for murders committed in anger but without premeditation, milder penalties must be inflicted (τιμωρίαι πραότεραι).

¹¹ Isocrates, Panath. 56: “We have shown ourselves much more moderate and mild (μετριώτερον καὶ πραότερον) in the practice of political affairs”; 121; Antid. 125, Timothy treated the cities taken by force with greater mildness and faithfulness than any other allied city showed; Ep. 7 ad Tim. 5 and 12.

¹² Demosthenes, Chers. 33: “You political men ought to have accustomed yourselves to being πράους καὶ φιλανθρώπους”; Aristophanes, Pax 936: “we shall be lambs for each other, and more accommodating with our allies.”

¹³ Hom. 7.12–16. One cannot fail to attribute praotes to Pompey (Plutarch, Pomp. 33.2), Alexander (Alex. 58.7–8), Agis (Agis 21.5), Aristides (Arist. 23.1), Cimon (Cimon 6.2), Flamininus (Flam. 6.2), Lycurgus (Lyc. 28.13), Timoleon (Tim. 3.4; 37.6), Brutus (Brut. 30.6), Caesar and Augustus (Dio Cassius 43.20; 53.6; cf. Josephus, War 6.383: Titus, διὰ πραότητα, welcomed fugitives; Ant. 17.212; Archelaus) and other notables. At Amorgos, a man is praised for his kosmietes and praotes (IG XII, 7, 240), like Anicetus in Phrygia (MAMA I, 237), Lucius Antonius at Aphrodisias (MAMA VIII, 524, 7). At Pergamum, Aelius Isidorus is ὁ πραῶς ἰδίαι, mild in his private life (IGRom. IV, 504); at Megara, a young man who is “mild (praos) and kindhearted [is] beloved by all” (IG VII, 115–117; Kaibel, 462). In the sixth century AD, Theodorus is “mild, naturally generous, accommodating” (Anth. Pal. VII, 606 = GVI, n. 485); cf. C. Panagopoulos, Vocabulaire, pp. 216–222. L. Robert (Hellenica, vol. 4, Paris, 1948, p. 16; vol. 11–12, p. 551; pp. 223ff.) mentions Praos as a proper name at Athens in the fourth century, and also several personal names formed on this root (IG II2, 1928, 20; VII, 600).

¹⁴ Plato, Resp. 3.387 e; cf. Plato, Lysis 211 e; Menex. 249 c; Crito 43 b: Socrates has always had an even temper in his past life, but “never so much as in this present misfortune (imprisonment) . . . with such calmness, such mildness (ῥαδίως . . . πράως) you endure it.” Cf. Xenophon, An. 1.5.14: “He spoke tranquilly (πράως) of what he had suffered”; Epictetus 3.10.6: bear events with patience; 2.22.36; 4.7.12; Josephus, Ant. 5.167; 7.117; Plutarch, Dem. 22.3, after a bereavement, “to bear such losses with mildness and serenity”; Per. 34.1, “bore unpopularity and hatred calmly and in silence”; 39.1; Cat. Mai. 24.10, who “bore the death of his eldest son with calm and philosophy”; De adul. et am. 57 e; De cohib. ira 13.462 a: Nero endured the loss of the ship with more moderation; De frat. amor. 11.484 b: when Athenodorus had suffered great prejudice, he showed neither indignation nor regret, but bore his brother’s folly with indulgence and serenity; De aud. poet. 35 d; reading and listening to works of poetry teaches us to bear our own misfortunes with mildness.

¹⁵ Plato, Grg. 489 d; cf. Euthd. 302 c: “speak better and do not prepare your lessons so roughly” (μὴ χαλεπῶς); Resp. 1.345 a; Meno 75 d; Phdr. 268 e; Philostratus, VS 2.17. The teacher must impose his authority with meekness, even if he is contradicted (P.Mich. 219, 8; third century AD); Plutarch, Pomp. 60.8, who “endures this untimely scoffing with mildness.” In discussions and debates one learns to listen with calm and benevolence before formulating criticisms (De audiendo 40 b). Marcus Aurelius 11.18 urges that the most violent person should be admonished with meekness.

¹⁶ Menander, Dysk., hyp. 12; 779; cf. P.Oxy. 2329, 24 (C. Austin, Comicorum Graecorum Fragmenta, n. 256). Irritated, one calms down (Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.267). Antigonus in his old age took things epios and praos (Ps.-Plutarch, Reg. et imp. apoph. 182 a). “How charming is a father who is mild and young at heart” (ὡς ἡδὺν πραῶς καὶ νεάζων τῶν τρόπων πατήρ, Menander, frag. 749, p. 211; ed. Kock).

¹⁷ Cf. H. Martin, “The Concept of praotes in Plutarch’s Lives,” in GRBS, vol. 3, 1960, pp. 64–73.

¹⁸ Isocrates, Antid. 211: by certain methods horses, dogs, and most animals, even lions (213), are given “more mildness”; mildness engendered in the most ferocious animals inspires admiration (214). Cf. Sent. Sextus 545: παιδευτικὸς θέλων εἶναι ἄσκει πρᾶυτητα.

¹⁹ De sera 5.551 c: “mildness and longsuffering are divine aspects of virtue”; cf. Lyc. 28.13: “I judge Lycurgus’s character according to his meekness and his justice in all the rest. I see even the divinity itself add its testimony in his favor.” For Themistius, praotes can make the king godlike (Themistius, Or. 19.226 d; 229 a–b).

²⁰ De def. or. 1.395 a; this praotes is “a mildness full of good grace . . . that does not show sourness or harshness at retorts.” While in the NT praotes is a permanent and indispensable virtue for Christians, in Plutarch’s biographies it is often a purely occasional trait. Thus the praotes Artaxerxes (Art. 1.1; 2.1; 4.4) was nevertheless merciless toward Mithridates and had his own son Itarios put to death.

²¹ Without asperity. Cf. De cohib. ira 453 b: the farmer makes the land smooth and fertile, soft and workable, just as mildness disposes a person to good deeds; cf. Xenophon, Oec. 19.17: farming is a humane and kindly art, i.e., one that easily divulges its secrets; Pindar, Ol. 13.85: the bit that makes Pegasus docile. — The opposites of πρᾶυτης are ἀγριότης (Plato, Symp. 197 d), βίαιος (Leg. 1.645 a), ὀργιλότης (Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 4.11.1125b26), ἀποτομία (Ps.-Plutarch, De lib. ed. 187), ὕβριστής (DioChrysostom, Or. 3.40), especially χαλεπότης (Plato, Resp. 1.354 a; 2.375 c; 6.472 f; 493b; Leg. 9.867 b; Aristotle, HA 9.1).

²² Cf. Creation 34: “the evening quietly (πράως) welcomes the burden of darkness”; Alleg. Interp. 1.42: “the gentle wind (πνοή) is like a breeze and a peaceable and mild exhalation (ἡρεμαία καὶ πραει—α)”; Migr. Abr. 101: like dew from heaven, God made “the rain of celestial intelligence fall upon us without violent inundation but tranquilly, mildly (ἡρέμα καὶ πράως), like a beneficent dew.” We could say of the Philonian praos that he is “all sweetness,” according to the designations of fruit trees in P.Cair.Zen. 59033, 12: σύκινα Χι—α, ε—ρινεά, Λύδια, πραέα, φοινίκεα, ὄλονθοφόρα.

²³ Worse Attacks Better 117: “The wellspring of divine wisdom flows more calmly and peaceably” (ἡρεμαιοτέρῳ καὶ πραοτέρῳ); 146: “God in his goodness will correct our offenses with mildness and indulgence” (ε—πεικω—ς τε καὶ πραοτέρῳ); Pap. Graec. Mag. 4, 1046: “To me, O Lord, show yourself to be ι—λαρός, εὐμενής, πρᾶυς, ἀμήνιτος.” In a fifth-century speech, οὐκ ε—πεικῆς οὐ πρα—ος, οὐκ εἰ—δὼς ε—ρυθρια—ν (published by K. Treu, in Proceedings XV, vol. 2, p. 14).

²⁴ Beginning with the third century BC the spellings πραυ4ς, πραυ4της substituted for πρα—ος, πραότης (cf. E. Mayser, Grammatik, vol. I, 1, p. 121; BDF §§26 and 47), but there is still πρα—ος in 2Macc 15:12 (cf. the genitive πραέως, 1Pet 3:4) and πραότης (Esth 3:13).

²⁵ Zech 9:9. According to T. Abr. A 1.1, the patriarch lived the 995 years of his life in quietness (ἡσυχία), gentleness (πραυ4της) and righteousness.

²⁶ Cf. C. Spicq, “Bénignité, mansuétude, douceur, clémence,” in RB, 1947, pp. 321–329; P. van den Berghe, “Ani et ‘Anaw dans les Psaumes,” in R. de Langhe, Le Psautier, Louvain, 1962, pp. 273–295. According to J. Dupont, Béatitudes, pp. 25–29, the first meaning of the Hebrew ‘anaw would be “bent, abased, bowed down, prostrated,” hence the humble and modest person.

²⁷ Cf. A. Ernout, A. Meillet, Dictionnaire étymologique de la langue latine, Paris, 1932.

²⁸ Μακάριοι οι— πραει—ς, ὅτι αὐτοὶ κληρονομήσουσι τὴν γῆν, Matt 5:4. This is the second beatitude, which takes up the first (“Blessed are the poor”); cf. J. Dupont, Béatitudes, vol. 1, pp. 251ff.

²⁹ J. Dupont, Béatitudes, vol. 3, pp. 486–545.

³⁰ In this correlation between “merit” and “reward” in the beatitude, we must not nevertheless exclude a note of psychological attraction and seductiveness that the whole literary tradition attributes to praytes: meekness wins hearts, and its silent triumph, which knows no borders, may be universal.

³¹ Albertus Magnus saw the meaning well: “When everyone sees the Lord carried gently (by the colt of the ass), let people be built up to faith, and let them be ashamed not to be mildly disposed toward him to whom even a beast of little intelligence and hitherto unbroken was tame” (“Cum videntibus omnibus Dominum mansuete portari [a pullo asinae], homines ad fidem aedificarentur, et verecundarentur non mansuescere ad eum, ad quem animal parvi sensus, et adhuc indomitum mansuescebat,” In Lucam 19.30; ed. Borgnet, vol. 23, p. 582; ibid. 19.35, p. 586). Cf. R. Bartnicki, “Das Zitat von Zach. IX, 9–10 und die Tiere im Bericht von Matthäus über den Einzug Jesu in Jerusalem (Mt. XXI, 1–11),” in NovT, 1976, pp. 161–166.

³² Τοῦ πράεως καὶ ἡσυχίου πνεύματος; Musonius asks the philosopher to endure adversity peaceably: πράεως δὲ καὶ ἡσύχως οἴσει τὸ συμβάν (frag. 10, ed. C. E. Lutz, p. 78, 10).

³³ 1Cor 4:21; cf. D. Daube, “Paul a Hellenistic Schoolmaster?” in R. Loewe, Studies in Rationalism, Judaism and Universalism, in Memory of L. Roth, New York, 1966, pp. 67–71.

³⁴ Cf. Philo, Prelim. Stud. 94; Change of Names 135 (cf. M. Alexander, De Congressu Eruditionis Gratia, Paris, 1967, p. 168, n. 2). The rod is used for the correction of delinquents (1QS 11.1; Thucydides 5.50; cf. LSAM, n. 9, 29; LSCG, n. 83, 24). Keepers of flocks are called “rod-bearers” (P.Oxy. 1626, 9; P.Panop.Beatty 2, 241, 274).

³⁵ 2Cor 10:1 (cf. Matt 11:29). R. Leivestad, “The Meekness and Gentleness of Christ,” in NTS, vol. 12, 1966, p. 159.

³⁶ Gal 5:23. After “love, joy, peace, patience” in the list of the fruit of the Spirit, come “faithfulness, meekness, temperance.” Jas 1:21 urges receiving “with humility (ε—ν πραυ4τητε δέξασθε) the word implanted (in you), which can save your souls.” Here praytes is not only fervent acceptance and submission but the initiative to hear the word of God and the assent of the heart to what it says (cf. Ps 132:1; 76:9).

³⁷ Eph 4:2; cf. M. Barth, Ephesians, vol. 2, pp. 454–459.

³⁸ Col 3:12. Humility, self-effacement, is an antidote to self-love; praytes, which is completely gentle, avoids clashes; patience reins in irritation and assures the maintenance of peace.

³⁹ Gal 6:1. Meekness is a classical quality of the “corrector,” but here the motive is new: awareness of one’s own potential for failure in similar circumstance to those in which the offender fell. This honest and humble approach leaves no room for arrogance or harshness; cf. royal souls, some of whom are arrogant, others humble, τὰς δὲ ὑπερηφάνους, τὰς δε πραείας (Hermes Trismegistus, frag. 26.8).

⁴⁰ Titus 3:2; same linking of πραυ4της and ε—πεικεία, MAMA VII, 524, 7.

⁴¹ —Ἀλλὰ πραυ4τητος καὶ φόβου; these two latter words must constitute a hendiadys: deferential meekness. As for the ἄλλά, it must be understood as explained by J. Carmignac (“L’Importance de la place d’une négation . . . [Philippiens II, 6],” in NTS, vol. 18, 1972, p. 156): “after an affirmative proposition, ἄλλά means not ‘but,’ but ‘however, moreover,

notwithstanding, nevertheless.’ This meaning, which is already clearly attested in Homer, for example in the Iliad 1.116 and Odyssey 1.6, is altogether classical in Greek. Cf. F. M. Abel, Grammaire, p. 346, n. 78 n. ” This self-control in the heat of argument is commended by Plutarch, De sera 5; De Pyth. or. 1.

⁴² Cf. Philo, Abraham 213: Abraham usually gave in to quarrelsome and unruly people “because of mildness of temperament of their master”; πραῦπαθής: good-natured (Spec. Laws 4.93), accommodating (To Gaius 335); πραοπαθει—v: to be meek (Flight 6).

πρεσβεία, πρεσβεύω

presbeia, embassy, delegation; presbeuo, to act as ambassador

presbeia, S 4242; EDNT 3.147–148; NIDNTT 1.192–193, 197; MM 534; L&N 37.87; BAGD 699 | presbeuo, S 4243; TDNT 6.681–683; EDNT 3.147–148; NIDNTT 1.192–194, 197; MM 534; L&N 38.88; BAGD 699

A presbeutes can be an emissary, a messenger, an envoy (2Chr 32:31; 1Macc 13:21; 14:21, 22, 40; 15:17), like a presbys,¹ hence a mere spokesman;² but normally, in the Hellenistic period, this was an ambassador in the full sense of the word, sent by the Greek cities to each other and to the kings.³

The role of these emissaries could vary—according to P.Col.Zen. 60, 5, there was a “treaty on embassies.” Sometimes they were tools in political intrigue, as when some fellow citizens of a claimant to the throne “sent an embassy after him (apesteilan presbeian) to say, ‘We do not want this man to reign over us’”;⁴ sometimes they defended financial interests, as at Samos in the third century BC, where “the citizens called for an embassy to be sent to Antiochus to recover their property and Boulagoras was designated ambassador . . . and performed with absolute zeal and devotion” (SEG I, 366, 9). Usually they establish or strengthen good relations between cities⁵ and above all negotiated treaties of alliance and friendship (1Macc 4:11; cf. 8:17; 15:17). It is in this sense that, finding himself in an inferior position, a king under attack “sends an embassy (presbeian aposteilas) to sue for peace.”⁶ Examples are common. Deut 20:10-12 prescribes: “When you draw near to a city to do battle with it, you shall invite it to come to terms . . . if it does not make peace with you, if it goes to war against you, you shall besiege it,” which Josephus paraphrases, “When you are about to go to war, send an embassy and heralds to those who are willingly hostile” (mellontas de polemein presbeian kai kerykas pempein para tous hekousios polemious, Ant. 4.296). “Trypho knew that Simon was on the verge of joining battle with him; he sent him messengers (presbeis)” to ask for the money that he claimed Jonathan owed (1Macc 13:14). Around 200 BC, “when the Thracian, commanded by Zoltes, appeared with an army of consequence in Scythia, marching against the Greek cities that had submitted to Rhemaxos, Agathocles was elected ambassador. He crossed enemy territory, passing through a good number of tribes, not shrinking from danger, and he persuaded the barbarians not only to do our city no harm but also to track down and return all the livestock that had previously been carried off by the pirates.”⁷

As for the verb presbeuo, it is used only twice in the Bible, by St. Paul, who uses it for an ambassador of Christ: “On Christ’s behalf, then, we are ambassadors (hyper Christou oun presbeuomen), given that God is urging through us (di’ hemon). We ask on behalf of Christ, be reconciled to God” (2Cor 5:20); “Pray for me that I will be given an open mouth to announce boldly the mystery of the gospel, of which I am ambassador in chains” (presbeuo en halysei, Eph 6:20). The apostle gives himself a title of nobility, for a legate is a noteworthy personage,⁸ at the top of the military hierarchy, and presbeuon and presbeutes are technical terms for imperial legates in the Greek Orient.⁹ For example, in the second century AD, when Emperor Claudius acknowledges receipt of the “gold crown” that a gymnastic club sent him on the occasion of his victorious campaign in Britain, his letter ends thus: “The ambassadors were (hoi presbeuontes esan) Tib. Cl. Hermas, Tib. Cl. Cyras, Dion son of Miccalos, an Antiochene” (P.Lond. 1178, 14; vol. 3, p. 216). A decree at Thespieae for young volunteer soldiers mentions the names of two delegates to the imperial authorities: “Envoys from the city (hoi presbeuontes): Eirenaios, Bentios. Eirenaios fulfilled this mission for the third time as a volunteer.”¹⁰

That the apostle indeed means presbeuo in the full sense of the word is proven by the very way in which he describes his mission: (a) hyper Christou, on behalf of Christ (cf. I.Priene 108, 164: “he served as ambassador on behalf of the township”—epresbeusen hyper tou demou, 129 BC; Dittenberger, Syl. 591, 5; 656, 15; 805, 7: “having often served as ambassador on behalf of his country”—presbeusanta pollakis hyper tes patridos); hence, not in the Lord’s place, but in his service; (b) the justification of this mission: “seeing that God exhorts through us.”¹¹ The sovereign speaks through his ambassador (di’ hemon; cf. 1Macc 10:51; Eph 6:19, en anoixei tou stomatos mou); the credit given the ambassador’s words corresponds with the authority of the sovereign. Paul is not the one who matters—he does not act in his own name, and his message does not originate with himself—he represents Christ, and when he speaks, his words are to be taken as coming from God;¹² (c) the goal of the apostolic embassy is to offer reconciliation with God, and Paul begs his hearers to accept this offer.¹³ Ambassadors (hoi presbeuontes) inform (1Macc 14:21; I.Delos 175, 2) in the same terms with which they have been instructed (1Macc 10:51).

¹ Num 21:20; 22:5; Deut 2:26; Isa 39:1; 57:9; 68:9; an ambassador to peace talks, 1Macc 9:70; 10:51.

² An ambassador is sent with letters that specify the object of his mission (Josephus, Ant. 12.225, 227). Cf. Philo, Giants 16; Abraham 115; Plant. 14 (angels, cf. Heir 205; Julius Pollux, Onom. 8.137: ὁ δὲ πρεσβευτῆς εἶη ἄν καὶ ἄγγελος διάκονος). A letter of Augustus: “the presbeis whom you sent to me in Gaul” (P.Oxy. 3020, frag. 1, col. I, 4; col. II, 2); Jos. Asen. 7.4: the Egyptians sent Joseph their messengers with gold, silver, and precious gifts. A θεωρός was “a special ambassador with a sacred mission to a foreign land” (G. Daux, in REG, 1967, p. 294). SEG II, 257; XVIII, 235; 288; XIX, 381; ISE, n. 91; M. Holleaux, Etudes d'épigraphie, pp. 433–448.

³ In the second century BC, a decree of Phalanna for the judges from Metropolis: “Thaumandros and Antisthenes were sent by our city on an embassy to the city of Metropolis to ask for a court to regulate trials and the rendering of accounts. . . . The citizens of Metropolis honored our ambassadors with appropriate honors” (NCIG, n. 12, 3, 10); a decree of Miletus (second century) in honor of Eirenias; “sent as an ambassador, he was zealous in his interview (with King Eumenes)” (ibid. VII, 9); “So that the Thasians may know of the piety of Hestiaios toward the gods, his zeal for our people, and the gratitude of this city, let an ambassador be appointed to take this decree to them” (I.Thas. 169, 27; cf. 170, 28; 174, A 3); P.Corn. 11, 1: “To Aurelius Apollonius, presbyteres of the most famous city of the Alexandrians”; P.Dura 38, 11: “To Flavius Antiochus, the emperor’s presbyteres”; SB 7263, 5; 7944, 2; Josephus, War 7.58. Presbyteres are constantly the recipients of honorific decrees, I.Delos 1621, 1699, 1855; I.Car. 166, 4, 8, 12, 19: “After ambassadors were sent regarding the interests of the city of Ktesicles . . . he thought to obtain what we were asking for”; SEG I, 151; VI, 555; XVIII, 216; XX, 28, 730; SB 8300, 3 (first century AD); MAMA VI, 103; considerable documentation in E. Olshausen, Prosopographie der hellenistischen Königsgesandten, Louvain, 1974.

⁴ Luke 19:14; cf. Philo, To Gaius 239: “As suppliants we ask for time to choose ambassadors and send them with a petition to the master (the emperor)”; the letter of Claudius to the Alexandrians: “as if you lived in two cities that you should send two embassies” (P.Lond. 1912, 91); PSI 1160, 11 (= SB 7448); 1434, 5; decree for Orthagoras of Araxa, “sent on an embassy (ἀποσταλεις πρεσβευτῆς) by the people to each of the cities . . . he did not fail to carry out his mission (τὰς πρεσβείας) in a fashion worthy of our people . . . then, sent on a mission to the ambassadors of Rome who were with Appius, and again on a mission to the Roman ambassadors who were with Poplius, he carried out his two missions in a manner worthy of our people and of the confederation, and he served all the interests of the city; he accomplished, moreover, many other missions, without asking for traveling expenses” (J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. IV, 5ff.). A decree from Apollonia from the second century BC honors Pamphilos, who had carried out numerous embassies: “When the ten legates came from Rome (τω—ν δέκα πρεσβευτω—ν ἀπὸ Ῥώμης) to set affairs in order with Cnaeus, the proconsul, at Apamea, Pamphilos went to them and conducted himself in an excellent and effective manner on behalf of his country . . . with all zeal and ardor he put each matter in order (the territorial standing of the front part of Asia Minor in the wake of the defeat of Antiochus III).” Next he was sent to Rhodes, where “he and his fellow ambassadors (μετὰ τω—ν συμπρεσβευτω—ν) fought against the natives who were our adversaries. . . . Having carried out numerous other embassies for the common good (ἄλλας τε πλείονας πρεσβείας πρεσβεύσας ὑπὲρ τω—ν κοινω—ν) and having behaved properly in all of them and having dealt correctly with matters, he continued to supply numerous advantages to the city” (I.Car. 167, 1ff., 9ff., 15ff.); L. Robert, Etudes anatoliennes, p. 322. In the Byzantine period, πρεσβεία means intercession, supplication (P.Ness. 52, 1; SB 7428, 17).

⁵ A decree of Argos in the fourth-third century in honor of the Rhodians: “Argos sent an embassy to Rhodes . . . now they have sent an embassy to Philias . . . to give notice that Rhodes has never flagged in its devotion to Argos and that it will continue to pursue the same policy in the future” (NCIG, n. VIII, 9, 12); cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 412, 6; “the marvelous embassy” of Abraham’s servant, who chose Rebekah as wife for his son” (Philo, Prelim. Stud. 11).

⁶ Luke 14:32, ε—ρωτα— τὰ πρὸς εἰ—ρήνην is a Hebraism that normally expresses greetings: Judg 18:15; 1Sam 10:4; 17:22; 25:5; 30:21; 2Sam 8:10—ε—ρωτήσαι αὐτὸν τὰ εἰ—ς εἰ—ρήνην; T. Jud. 9.7—αι—τοῦσιν ἡμι—ν τὰ πρὸς εἰ—ρήνην; Josephus, Ant. 12.405: τὰ πρὸς τὴν μάχην = ready for battle; cf. Ps.-Plutarch, Cons. ad Apoll. 14: τὰ πρὸς τὸν θάνατον = death is to be expected. J. M. Creed, The Gospel According to St. Luke, London, 1953, p. 195.

⁷ A decree from Istros in honor of Agathocles, in NCIG, n. VI, 17; cf. lines 28, 33: “once again chosen as ambassador to Thrace and to Zoltes the chief of the Thracians, he extended the pacts and agreements previously concluded with them”; line 49, 54; I.Kour. 87 (with the observations of R. S.

Bagnall, T. Drew-Bear, in ChrEg, 1974, pp. 188ff.). Cf. Dio Chrysostom 1.27.

⁸ Cf. the letter of Cn. Cornelius Dolabella, proconsul of Macedonia, “to the council and people of Thasos. Your ambassadors . . . , worthy men and our friends, sent by a worthy people, our friend and ally, were presented before me . . .” (I.Thas. 175, 2). Cf. the honorific decree for a Tabenian in the first century AD who “was ambassador to peoples, to (Roman) leaders who came through (Asia) as consuls, and to dynasteis” (L. Robert, Etudes anatoliennes, p. 325; cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 374, 37); honorific decree of the province of Asia for Quintus Pomponius Flaccus, “who carried out the office of night strategos with all legality and went on an embassy to Rome at his own expense” (L. Robert, “Les Inscriptions,” in J. des Gagniers, Laodicée, p. 265, 11); the questions asked of an oracle: “will I be ambassador (εἰ—πρεσβεύσω)? will I be senator?” (P.Oxy. 1477, 16). An ambassador is thus much more highly esteemed than a κῆρυξ (1Tim 2:7; 2Tim 1:11; Epictetus 3.21.13). Hence the sociable reception that Alexander, for example, gave to embassies (Diodorus Siculus 17.2.2; 17.4.9; 17.113.4).

⁹ Meaning cited by A. Deissmann, Light, p. 374, who makes reference to the examples furnished by D. Magie, De Romanorum Juris Publici Sacrique Vocabulis Sollemnibus in Graecum Sermonem Conversis, Leipzig, 1905, pp. 89ff. Today we may refer to the examples and classification (ambassador, legate of the hegemon, the proconsul, the emperor) of H. J. Mason, Greek Terms, pp. 147, 153.

¹⁰ NCIG, n. XV, 25, 27. The disinterestedness of ambassadors is often mentioned in the inscriptions; cf. MAMA VI, 3, at Laodicea: “Terentius Longinus . . . after twice serving without pay on embassies to Lucius Aelius Caesar in Pannonia and to the great emperor Titus Aelius Hadrianus Antoninus Augustus Pius at Rome.” Their devotion is similarly emphasized, as in the decree of the Athenian cleruchies for Euboulos of Marathon: “sent on several embassies, he often, through sustained effort, secured the interests of the Athenians of Delos” (I.Delos 1498, 14).

¹¹ Ὡς, followed by an explanatory participle, is epexegetic; it means not “as if” but “inasmuch as”; cf. T. Muraoka, “The Use of ΩΣ in the Greek Bible,” in NovT, 1964, pp. 60ff.

¹² Cf. P. E. Hughes, Paul’s Second Epistle to the Corinthians, 4th ed., Grand Rapids, 1973, pp. 209ff.

¹³ J. Dupont, La Réconciliation dans la théologie de saint Paul, Bruges-Paris, 1953; J. F. Collange, Enigmes de la deuxième Epître de Paul aux

Corinthiens, Cambridge, 1972, pp. 266–274. In the fourth century BC, “the city of Argos sent an embassy to Polyperchon to beg him to free the people of Pallantion (who were taken prisoner) when the land of Pallantion was conquered by Menemachos, and Polyperchon freed the people and granted this favor to Argos” (SEG XI, 1094, 18). A century later, the inhabitants of Gortyn sent an embassy to Cnossos to ask for a physician (Dittenberger, Syl. 528, 2).

προβάλλω

proballo, to bring or put forward, present; to bud

proballo, S 4261; EDNT 3.152; MM 537; L&N 23.195; BAGD 702

At Ephesus, the Jews in the midst of the mob “pushed Alexander to the fore” (proballonton auton, Acts 19:33). This meaning—“bring forth, present”—recurs constantly in the papyri and the inscriptions.¹ “I had the misfortune of being nominated by the citizens as grain commissioner, although I was not of age to take on this leitourgia . . . I was put forward by certain persons who were acting out of jealousy” (P.Mich. 23, 3; third century BC); “You were wrong to nominate us for the office of ktenarchos” (SB 10202); “Having been officially presented by the inhabitants of the town for the above-mentioned jobs.”²

In the LXX, the physical meaning “bring out, cast forward” is seen when the third Maccabee brother “stuck out his tongue as soon as they asked” (to cut it off, 2Macc 7:10); when twenty youths throw themselves against the wall,³ when Razis “tore out his own entrails, took them with both hands, and threw them at the mob.”⁴ But in Judg 14:12, 13, 16, Samson sets forth a riddle.⁵

None of these texts is analogous to the use of proballo in the parable of the Fig Tree, Luke 21:30. Where Mark 13:28 and Matt 24:32 have “when the leaves have come out” (ekphye), Luke reads “when they have put forth.”⁶ Clearly this verb has a very wide range of meaning, and only the context can provide specificity.⁷ Here we must translate “when they are already budding.” The agricultural parallels from the first century have been cited. With respect to plants that flower and give off fragrances, Dioscorides, Mat. Med. 2.205: “in the summer it produces a milky-white flower” (theros de galaktinon anthos proballei); 4.50: “in the autumn the leaves produce a smell” (proballei de kata to phthinoporon ta phylla tragou osmen); Josephus, Ant. 4.226: “if the plants produce fruit before the fourth year” (an karpon probale ta phyta); Epictetus 1.15.7: “Nothing great is produced suddenly, since it is not so even with the grape and the fig. If you said to me now, ‘I want a fig,’ I would answer that it takes time. Let the flowers appear first, then the fruit (eita probale ton karpon), and finally let it ripen.” Since this meaning is not attested in the papyri, we must conclude that it belongs to literary Greek, where its usage attests to a traditional rhetorical topos.

¹ Moulton-Milligan cite P.Ryl. 77, 43: ε—μάθομεν τὸν —Αχιλλέα προβαλόμενον ε—αυτὸν εἰ—ς ε—ξηγητείαν (644, 6, 10 is too mutilated to yield a meaning); P.Oxy. 1424, 5; Dittenberger, Syl. 1104, 29: ἡ σύνοδος . . . ὁμοθυμαδὸν προεβάλετο τοὺς εἰ—σοίσοντας αὐτοί—ς τὰς καθηκούσας τιμὰς; 797, 23: φίλους τε κρινεῖ—ν, οὓς ἂν αὐτὸς προαιρῆται, καὶ ε—χθρούς, οὓς ἂν αὐτὸς προβάληται.

² C.P.Herm. 21, 13; cf. Stud.Pal. XX, 54, 6: τοί—ς προβαλομένοις τὸν ἡμέτερον υἱ—όν . . . εἰ—ς κοσμητείαν τῆς αὐτῆς πόλεως (= Chrest.Wilck., n. 402); SB 5231, 9 (first century); 7696, 45: εἰ—ς τὴν πρυτανίαν ταύτην; line 61: εἰ—ς κοσμητείας; Fouilles de Delphes III, 3; 239, 16: “Let the archons appoint those whom the majority shall nominate” (second century BC). In Prov 22:21—“those who put you forward” are “those who sent you” (Hebrew shalah). Often it is a question of “putting forward” an excuse; cf. Thucydides 1.27.4; 2.87.3; P.Panop.Beatty 1, 87, 154, 157; SB 8987, 36.

³ 2Macc 10:35; cf. Xenophon, An. 1.2.17: Cyrus “order the whole column to present arms and advance”; 6.5.16: “advance upon the enemy with shields in front”; Polybius 1.18.3; 1.48.10; 2.5.5; 3.72.9; 3.113.6 = deploy, place in advance.

⁴ 2Macc 14:46; cf. Plutarch, Per. 28.2: “He had their bodies thrown out with no burial”; Prov 26:18—“throwing words to men” (Hebrew yarâh).

⁵ Hebrew hûd. Cf. the use of προβάλλω for texts that set forth geometrical problems to be solved (C. Mugler, Terminologie géométrique, p. 356); Hippocrates, Acut. 8.1: “As a rule, physicians do not even raise such questions; and perhaps even if they were raised, they would not be answered”; Galen, Anim. Pass. 2.57: set forth as a problem.

⁶ Ὅταν προβάλωσιν ἤδη. E. Delebecque (Evangile de Luc) translates: “Tous les arbres, dès qu’ils poussent leurs pointes.”

⁷ In optics, προβάλλω refers to the changing field of vision as projected in front of the body by the eyes, “la projection du flux visuel suivant l’orientation des yeux, en avant du corps” (C. Mugler, Terminologie optique, p. 321). In obstetrics, babies that stick an arm or leg out (Hippocrates, Mul. 1.69; other references in W. K. Hobart, Medical Language, pp. 75, 140ff.). In sports, for the boxer who is on guard, in a defensive posture (LSJSup, p.

125). Without a technical meaning: “keep before the eyes” (Ep. Arist. 212); in the Byzantine period: a party to a contract who did not know how to write and could not sign drew a cross with his own hand (προβαλόντος τῆ αὐτοῦ χειρὶ †, P.Mich. 607, 35). Philo, for whom this is a favorite verb, uses it in the pejorative moral sense of rebuffing or rejecting vice (Abraham 22, 104, 137, 210), those who dishonor virtue (Moses 2.9; Spec. Laws 2.60; Virtues 136, 200), with a nuance of aversion (Post. Cain 134; Moses 1.45–46).

προβιβάζω

probibazo, to instigate

probibazo, S 4264; EDNT 3.153; MM 538; L&N 33.299; BAGD 703

It is difficult to pin down the meaning of this NT hapax.¹ When Herodias asks for the head of John the Baptist, Matt 14:8 specifies probibastheisa hypo tes metros autes. This is usually taken to mean “urged on by her mother”;² but the two occurrences in the LXX mean inculcate, instill in the mind (Exod 35:4, hiphil of the Hebrew yarâh; Deut 6:7, piel of the Hebrew shanan), and this is the meaning retained by F. Field.³ Even though it is attested by only a single Byzantine papyrus (P.Lond. 1708, 262), it will do here, with the idea being “upon her mother’s instigation.” Support comes from Musonius, replying to the objection “Is it not unreasonable for a man who is capable of influencing the young to study philosophy (probibazein neous eis philosophian) to work the earth or busy himself with manual labor?” (ed. C. E. Lutz, frag. 11, p. 82, 23).

¹Certainly we must reject the reading προεβίβασαν in D2, Ψ, P, Chrysostom at Acts 19:33 and retain συνεβίβασαν, “they indoctrinated” (P74, a, A, B, E, cf. 1Cor 2:16), cf. E. Haenchen, Acts, p. 574.

² Προβιβάζω = cause to advance; cf. Dio Cassius 58.23: “Tiberius promised to elevate (literally, push) Caius to other duties”; P.Mur. 116, 15 (= SB 10305; remarriage contract, AD 124), προβιβάζεται δὲ —Ελεαιο—ος Σίμωνος τὴν αὐτὴν γαμικὴν κο[ινωνίαν]: if Eleaios, son of Simon, promotes the marital society; P.Sarap. 88, 4, letter to Heliodorus at Anoubion: τὸ πένθος μοι ἐ—κάστης ἡμέρας προβιβάζω, “my pain increases (or is prolonged) every day, because none of those who should have carried letters to you has left”; P.Petaus 27, 24: προβιβάζω αὐτά = I urge them along.

³ F. Field, Notes on the Translation, p. 11, who does not retain the connotation of temporal priority expressed by the Vulgate’s praemonita, “instructed ahead of time”; but this is explained by Mark 6:24—“She went out and asked her mother, ‘What shall I ask for?’” This nuance—“instruct”—is the resolute choice of A. H. McNeile, The Gospel According to St. Matthew, London, 1952, p. 210.

προκοπή, προκόπτω

prokope, progress; prokopto, to progress, advance

prokope, S 4297; TDNT 6.703–719; EDNT 3.157–158; NIDNTT 2.128, 130–131; MM 542; L&N 13.57; BAGD 707 | prokopto, S 4298; TDNT 6.703–719; EDNT 3.157–158; NIDNTT 2.128, 130; MM 542; L&N 13.57, 42.18, 59.64, 67.118; BDF §308; BAGD 707–708; ND 2.95, 4.36

The substantive is unknown in classical Greek¹ and the verb in the LXX. Both mean literally a move forward, an extension, and are used most often in the figurative sense of progress, growth, advancement.²

The meaning is often neutral (“Night has advanced; day is near”),³ sometimes pejorative (heretics will constantly get worse—*prokopsousin epi to cheiron*⁴—in the direction of impiety, 2Tim 2:16); but usually it has to do with improvement and success. Philip, prefect of Jerusalem, learns that Judas Maccabeus was progressing little by little (kata mikron eis prokopen erchomenon) and that his successes were becoming more and more frequent.⁵ This is the most common meaning of prokopto in the epistolary papyri, where the writer expresses the hope that his correspondent will be well and will prosper: errosthai se euchomai kai prokoptein;⁶ and it is in this sense of continual and effective advancement in knowledge and in morals that we read Gal 1:14—“Progressing in Judaism more than most of those of my age in my nation, surpassing them in zeal for the traditions of my ancestors.”⁷

Such progress becomes generally known and draws more and more esteem from those who know about it.⁸ Likewise, the arrest and trial of Paul turned out “rather for the advancement of the gospel, for throughout the praetorium and everywhere else, my chains have become well-known in Christ, and most of the brethren, encouraged in the Lord . . . are proclaiming the word with increased boldness.”⁹ In Phil 1:25, the apostle’s presence should contribute to Christians’ progress and joy in the faith.¹⁰ This moral and religious meaning is ever clearer in 1Tim 4:15—“Let your progress be manifest to all.”¹¹ Thanks to his training (verses 7–8), Timothy will no longer be seen as an inexperienced novice; he will progress continually.

Scholars traditionally mention that prokope is a technical term in Stoic philosophy,¹² and it is indeed true that this term is used for a person’s moral and spiritual evolution. According to Chrysippus, the sage is a person who is progressing (prokopton) from folly to wisdom, from vice to virtue.¹³ But if the Stoa contributed greatly to the spread of this term in the first century and used it for moral values (he prokope pros areten, Epictetus 1.4.3ff.), this usage cannot be said to have influenced the NT writers, at least not directly, because the idea of prokope was so generally current without reference to origin or technical signification. Thus Philo—who was knowledgeable about contemporary philosophy—defines moral progress as “that which is incomplete and strives for completion,”¹⁴ and distinguishes two or three classes of people: the perfect person (ton teleion) and the one who is progressing morally (ton prokoptonta) have a strong and ardent desire for the good and already share in the divine fixity and stability (Dreams 2.234–237); “for the wicked (ton phaulon), God is Lord and Master; for those who are progressing and improving (ton en prokopais kai beltiosesi) he is God; but for the best and most perfect (ton d’ ariston kai teleiotaton), he is Lord and God” (Change of Names 19). If the capability for improvement and perfection (Post. Cain 78) never disappears (Husbandry 166; cf. Cleanthes, in Stobaeus, vol. 2, p. 65, 10), “all progress depends on God” (Alleg. Interp. 2.93; cf. P.Lund II, 1, 4 = SB 8088).

Epictetus sensibly observes: “It is ridiculous to imagine that one can progress in things that one knows nothing about” (2.17.4). Moreover, it is commonplace to keep track of progress in scientific knowledge,¹⁵ in moral education, and in the assimilation of wisdom. Ben Sirach says, “Progress came to me through wisdom.”¹⁶ Philo repeats that study and instruction make for progress toward perfection,¹⁷ and Josephus notes that wisdom produced progress in Daniel, Mishael, and Abednego (sophias en prokope genomenous, Ant. 10.189). It is in this sense that “Jesus grew in wisdom and in stature with God and with men.”¹⁸ We may cite this eulogy for a young citizen of Istropolis: “he laid a foundation for himself, progressing in stature and advancing toward godliness” (hypestesato te te helikia prokopton kai proagomenos eis to theosebein, Dittenberger, Syl. 708, 18; first century BC). And we might add this epitaph from Aphrodisia: “children who departed in the midst of progress.”¹⁹

¹ The work of L. Edelstein (The Idea of Progress in Classical Antiquity, Baltimore, 1967) studies the idea, not the word.

² The substantive is often synonymous with αὐξήσις (Polybius 3.4.2: the growth and progress of the Roman power) and βελτίωσις (Philo, Etern. World 43: people are used to knowing growth, progress, improvement, or their opposites; Abraham 26). The first meaning of προκόπτω is transitive, “draw out, lengthen a metal plaque by hammering it”; hence “prepare, open a road” (Thucydides 4.60.2); in an intransitive sense: “advance along a route” (Josephus, Ant. 2.134, 340; 3.42; Thucydides 7.56.3).

³ Rom 13:12, ἡ νύξ προέκοψεν (K H. Schelkle, “Biblische und patristische Eschatologie nach Rom. XIII, 11–13,” in Sacra Pagina, Paris-Gembloux, 1959, vol. 2, pp. 357–372); cf. Josephus, War 4.298, τῆς νυκτὸς προκοπούσης = at the moment when night is coming on; Pap.Lugd.Bat. I, 17, 6, τοῦ χρόνου προκόψαντος = time having passed by; P.Stras. 180, 11.

⁴ 2Tim 3:9, 13; cf. the progress of sedition, Josephus, Ant. 4.59: τῆς ἐπι τὸ χειρὸν προκοπῆς; T. Jud. 21.8, προκόψουσιν ἐπι κακῶ; Polybius 5.16.9; cf. Xenophon, Hell. 7.1.6: advance not at all, not arrive at the goal.

⁵ 2Macc 8:8; cf. Polybius 2.12.7: τῆς ἐπι τὸ βέλτιον ἤρξαντο προκοπῆς = the Romans began to get back on their feet; Josephus, Ant. 18.340: their qualities carried the Parthians to a high level of power (προὔκοψαν ἐπι μέγα δυνάμεως); Diodorus Siculus 14.98; 17.69.4: “those who could make progress in some sort of industry”; Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 113: “Try to achieve progress and improvement (προκοπὴν καὶ βελτίωσιν), for it is progress that makes toil bearable.”

⁶ P.Stras. 140, 15 = P.Sarap. 100 = SB 8022; cf. P.Mich. 209, 4: πρὸ μὲν πάντων εὐχομέσθαι ὑγιένειν καὶ προκόπτειν, “above all, I pray for your health and success”; P.Hamb. 104, ἐρωσθαί σε εὐχομαι διὰ βίου καὶ προκόπτοντα τὰ μεγάλα; P.Ryl. 233, 16: εὐχομαι σε τὸν Κύριον ἰδεῖν ἐν μείζοσι προκοπαῖς, ἐν ἀδραῖς εὐημερίαις; P.Brem. 15, 34: ποιῶν σε τὰς ἀδροτάτας προκοπάς; P.Oxy. 122, 15; P.Gen. 74, 3; PSI 1437, 8; P.Tebt. 276, 39: the alignment of certain planets will favor prosperity from birth, ἀπὸ νεότητος τὰς προκοπάς ἀποτελοῦσιν; proskynema of Maximus: “Grant me, O Lord, great success in the army. . . . I will pour out to you libations for this success” (SEG XXIV, 1224, 4, 7). Progress in the accomplishment of tasks, κατὰ προκοπὴν τῶν ἔργων (P.Oxy. 1631, 20; P.Mert. 24, 10).

⁷ Προέκοπτον ἐν τῷ —Ιουδαϊσμῷ ὑπὲρ πολλοὺς συνηλικιώτας ἐν τῷ γένει μου; A. Deissmann (Light, p. 179) compares BGU 423, 17, where Apion, a soldier in the Romano-Egyptian fleet of the second century, writes to his father: “Thou hast taught me well and I therefore hope to advance quickly, if the gods will.”

⁸ Ep. Arist. 242: “This conduct will advance us in their esteem”; Josephus, Ant. 20.205: καθ’ ἐκάστην ἡμέραν ἐπι μέγα προὔκοπτε δόξης, “each day the high priest Ananias advanced greatly in reputation.” T. Gad 4.5—τῶν εὐπραγούντων ἐν προκοπῇ ἀκούων καὶ ὀρώ; B. Latyshev (Inscriptiones Antiquae, n. 79, 6), μέχρι τὰς τῶν Σεβαστῶν γνώσεως προκόψαντος.

⁹ Phil 1:12, εἰ—ς προκοπὴν τοῦ εὐαγγελίου (cf. the reporting of victory and military progress in P.Giss. 27, 7: εὐαγγελίζονται τὰ τῆς νείκην αὐτοῦ καὶ προκοπῆς). Thus there is progress and victory for the kerygma.

¹⁰ Εἰ—ς τὴν ὑμῶ—ν προκοπὴν καὶ χαρὰν τῆς πίστεως.

¹¹ 1Tim 4:15: ἵνα σου ἡ προκοπὴ φανερὰ ᾖ πα—σιν. The emphasis is on the visibility of this progress and the perception of it by witnesses, as when an athlete's physique improves day by day and stirs admiration; this will help strengthen Timothy's authority in the eyes of the Ephesian Christians; cf. φανερός, Acts 4:16; I.Priene VIII, 42: ὅπως δ' ἂν ᾖ φανερὰ πα—σιν; I.Bulg. 659, 21; P.Tebt. 333, 12.

¹² A. Bonhöffer, Epikte, p. 128; E. V. Arnold, Roman Stoicism, 1911, p. 325 (who sees Pompey as a type of the proficiens); G. Stählin, "Fortschritt und Wachstum," in Festgabe J. Lortz, Baden-Baden, 1958, vol. 2, pp. 13–25; idem, in TDNT, vol. 6, pp. 703–719; O. Luschnat, "Das Problem des ethischen Fortschritts in der alten Stoa," in Philologus, 1958, pp. 178–214; G. T. Montague, Growth in Christ, Kirkwood-Fribourg, 1961, pp. 165ff.

¹³ Cf. Chrysippus, frag. 45, 217, 530, 532 (ed. SVF, vol. 3, 104, 18; 51, 37, 142, 17, 33); Bion (in Diogenes Laertius 4.50); Posidonius (ibid. 7.91: "The proof of the reality of virtue is that people like Socrates, Diogenes, and Antisthenes have progressed toward it"; cf. 127); Epictetus 1.4: περὶ προκοπῆς; idem, Ench. 48; Seneca, Ep. 71.36: "magna pars est profectus velle proficere"; cf. G. Verbeke, "Augustin et le Stoïcisme," in Recherches Augustiniennes, Paris, 1958, pp. 69ff.

¹⁴ Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.249: προκοπή . . . ἀτελὲς ε—φιέμενον τοῦ τέλους; Drunkness 82: Jacob was going to exchange his progress for perfection; Plutarch, Quaest. conv. 2.3.2: "progress is the middle ground between natural dispositions and perfection"; De comm. not. 10: "With respect to moral progress people resemble not the blind but the near-sighted, not those who have drowned, but those who are swimming and are near the port." Cf. W. Völker, Fortschritt und Vollendung bei Philo von Alexandrien, Leipzig, 1938.

¹⁵ Philo, Flight 213: "You who were progressing and deepening your knowledge of the cycle of preliminary instruction"; Josephus, Life 8: "My great progress in studies earned me a reputation for memory and superior intelligence"; Plutarch, De prof. in virt. 10: νέω . . . ἀνδρὶ γευσσάμενω προκοπῆς ἀληθοῦς ε—ν φιλοσοφία; Marcus Aurelius 1.17.8: "I did not advance very far in rhetoric, poetry, and other studies"; Diodorus Siculus 16.6: "Dio had made great progress in the study of philosophy"; Lucian, Hermot. 63; προύκοπτον ε—ν τοι—ς μαθήμασι; cf. G. Pire, Stoïcisme et pédagogie de Zénon à Marc-Aurèle, Liege-Paris, 1958, p. 65.

¹⁶ Sir 51:17: προκοπή ε—γένετό μοι ε—ν αὐτῇ (cf. σοφία, verse 17 b; παιδεία, verse 16). The Hebrew is different: “for me its yoke was an honor.” Cf. Plutarch, De prof. in virt. 7: ἀληθῆς προκοπή.

¹⁷ Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain; cf. Flight 172: “the teacher is capable of effecting progress in us, but only God . . . can effect supreme perfection in us”; cf. Husbandry 166; P.land. 3, 5: ταχέως μὲν περὶ παιδείαν προκόπτει. Around the turn of the millennium, a decree from Delphi (Fouilles de Delphes III, 4, 59) honors the rhetor Artemidorus who “manifested (toward the Delphians) the same zeal as toward his own country and his fellow citizens; by working together with the foremost and best citizens for progress in education and letters (ει—ς προκοπήν παιδείας καὶ λόγων), he procured worthy people for Delphi also” (L. Robert, Noms indigènes, p. 491).

¹⁸ Luke 2:52—προέκοπτεν τῇ σοφίᾳ καὶ ἡλικίᾳ καὶ χάριτι; J. E. Renié, “Et Jesus proficiebat sapientia et aetate et gratia apud Deum et homines,” in Studia Anselmiana 27–28 (Miscellanea A. Miller), Rome, 1951, pp. 340–350; H. Riedlinger, Geschichtlichkeit und Vollendung des Wissens Christi, Freiburg-Basel, 1966, pp. 48–54; H. Temple, “Christ’s Holy Youth According to Lk II, 52,” in CBQ, 1941, pp. 243–250.

¹⁹ E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. XXXV, 12, ἦν λίπον ε—ν προκοπαι—ς.

προπετής

propetes, recklessly hasty, impulsive (with overtones of injustice)

propetes, S 4312; EDNT 3.160; MM 544; L&N 88.98; BAGD 709

Certainty is impossible in translating the two NT occurrences of this adjective. At the riot at Ephesus, the clerk asks his fellow citizens to do nothing propetes (meden propetes prassein, Acts 19:36), and according to 2Tim 3:4, people in the last days will be prodotai, propeteis. Literally, the term means “fallen forward,” hence “inclined toward.”¹ Figuratively, it expresses lack of control or quickness, in either a favorable or a pejorative sense;² in the latter case, it means reckless precipitousness.³

The adjective, unknown in the papyri, is used in the LXX only by the Wisdom writers for prattlers who talk without thinking, but the fact that they are abominated and promised ruin indicates that this is one of the gravest sins of speech; moreover, propetes does not exactly match the original Hebrew.⁴

With respect to action, the proteteis are those who are impulsive, who get carried away⁵—like a bolting horse (cf. proales, Sir 30:8)—who cannot reason soundly and who make themselves known by their violence, people who wreck everything, who take wild chances. The Greeks grouped them with the reckless and the bold: hoi thraseis propeteis (Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 3.10.1116a7); “giving free rein to your recklessness and boldness” (te sautou propeteia kai thrasyteti, Demosthenes, C. Andr. 22.63); “the Romans showed more boldness and daring” (tharraleoteron kai propetesteron, Polybius 3.102.11; contrasted with the prudence and circumspection of their adversaries); “quick to rush at everyone” (Xenophon, Cyr. 1.4.4, contrasted with aidous); “Cleitos, a bold and reckless young man” (thrasys te kai propetes neanias, Josephus, Life 170); “Herod had enough self-control not to do something rash (tou me propetes ti poiesai) under the influence of passion.”⁶ At the beginning of the third century, a tax collector complains that his methods are criticized as unjust and violent (prepetos epi tauta, P.Oxy. 3028,7).

In light of these usages, we should understand the propeteis in 2Tim 3:4 to be frenzied and unjust; and the Ephesian rioters are warned against not “reckless precipitousness” but uncontrolled or ill-considered aggression.

¹ Hippocrates, Prog. 3: “the tendency to sink in the bed and slide toward the feet”; Art. 1: “the top of the humerus naturally inclines in this direction”; Xenophon, Hell. 2.3.15: Critias stooped (προπετης ἦν) to having many people executed”; 2.3.30: “He is the one who was most inclined to transform the democracy.”

² Aristotle, HA 9.1.5.608b: “the females have more liveliness”; Isocrates, Demon. 1.15: “Abstain from immoderate laughter (γέλωτα προπετηῆ) and presumptuous talk”; Aeschines, In Tim. 1.191: “unbridled sensual pleasure (αι—προπετει—ς τοῦ σώματος), passions that are never assuaged, these are the things that inhabit the haunts of brigands”; Josephus, Ant. 5.106 = without reason or motive; Diodorus Siculus 15.29.

³ Cf. the account for the allotment for a “five-day” work detail, from the third century AD: τοὺς λόγους τῶ—ν πενθημερῶ—ν μὴ προπετῶς γράφης, ἕως ἂν ἔλθης εἰ—ς τὸ λογιστήριον τοῦ στρατηγοῦ (SB 9925, 3; to be added to P. J. Sijpesteijn, Penthemeros Certificates in Greco-Roman Egypt, Leiden, 1964).

⁴ Sir 9:18—“The person who speaks recklessly is hated for his volubility”; Prov 10:14—“The mouth of the foolish (Hebrew <I+>ewil) is a disaster in the offing”; 13.3: “the one who opens his mouth (Hebrew pasaq) to ruin.” Roman soldiers “catch those who speak thoughtlessly” (προπετει—ς), i.e., who speak ill of Caesar without thinking about who they are talking to (Epictetus 4.13.5) or without dreaming of the consequences, like Cyrus asking “impulsively (προπετω—ς), like a child who no longer fears anything” (Xenophon, Cyr. 1.3.8); cf. dangerous procedures (πρὸς τὸ προπετω—ς τι πράττειν, Demosthenes, C. Leoch. 44.58).

⁵ Hotheaded, Philo, Spec. Laws 3.175; Dreams 2.182 (vehement); Unchang. God 163.

⁶ Josephus, Ant. 15.82. Cf. the προπέτεια of Uzzah (2Sam 6:7). In Demosthenes, C. Arist. 23.130, propeteia corresponds to anger; both are opposed to moderation (μετριωτέρα); P. Tebt. 268, 47: ἡ σὴ προπέτεια (fragment of a classical work, third century AD; cf. P. Cair. Masp. 97, col. II, 42; sixth century). An ostrakon from the same period links indifference and rashness, προπετεία [δ] ἀνεπιστρεψία, εἰ—καιότης, ἕτεροι τοιαῦται [μυρία], in C. Austin (Comicorum Graecorum Fragmenta, n. 318), who cites a mutilated fragment of Menander, where προπετω—ς ε—πι[. . . seems to have the sense of attacking (n. 257, 100; cf. J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 3 A, p. 344).

προσκαρτερέω, προσκαρτέρησις

proskartereo, to be firm, endure, persevere, remain faithful to a person or a task; proskarteresis, constancy, diligence, perseverance, persistence

proskartereo, S 4342; TDNT 3.618–619; EDNT 3.172; NIDNTT 2.767–768; MM 548; L&N 34.2, 35.28, 68.68; BDF §202; BAGD 715 | proskarteresis, S 4343; TDNT 3.619–620; EDNT 3.172; NIDNTT 2.767–768; MM 548; L&N 68.68; BAGD 715

Given the Koine’s love for compound forms and its tendency to reinforce the expressivity of words, we might think that proskartereo would hardly differ from plain kartereo —“be firm and courageous, endure,”¹ even “persevere” (2Macc 7:17), which is the meaning of proskartereo in Tob 5:8 (in a). When Moses commands the explorers of Canaan, “Be courageous” (Num 13:20), the LXX uses proskarteresantes to translate the hiphil of the Hebrew hazaq.

Nevertheless, the usage of proskartereo (usually with the dative) shows new connotations, whether of remaining faithfully attached to a person or of applying oneself exclusively to a certain thing, devoting oneself to it tirelessly. In the first case, Simon the sorcerer, after being baptized, stuck close to Philip (en proskarteron to Philippo, Acts 8:13); the centurion Cornelius calls one of the soldiers who is in his service.² We may compare Mark 3:9, where Jesus asks his disciples “that a boat be kept ready for him” (hina ploiarion proskartere auto), i.e., at his disposal, so that he may use it when he wants.

According to Rom 13:6, the tax officials constantly apply themselves to their task (eis auto touto proskarterountes). This diligence is already clear in Daniel, where the two elders frequent the house of Joakim (houtoi prosekarteroun en te oikia loakim, Sus 6, Theodotion) and is not rare in the papyri:³ “The little one greets you; she is diligent in her studies” (aspazetai se he meikra kai proskarterei tois mathemasi, P.Brem. 63, 24). It is always a matter of persevering, not letting up,⁴ as is seen in the technical use of the verb in the legal vocabulary: the defendant and the complainant are at the disposition of the court until the final settlement of the suit, as in this summons from 104/5: “Let them keep themselves at the disposition of the court of the same governor until my claim against them is satisfied.”⁵ Thus proskarteresis has a connotation of waiting without lapse,⁶ but with a nuance of stubbornness, like that of the tribe of Ephraim besieging Bethel (Josephus, Ant. 5.130), and finally the verb refers to the exertion of great efforts, especially in military language: “Epaminondas bade his soldiers hold fast” (Xenophon, Hell. 7.5.14); “the soldiers, by persevering (or “with great effort,” proskarteresantes) dislodged four stone blocks” (Josephus, War 6.27); “the others pursued the operations with all their might” (Polybius 1.55.4; cf. Achilles Tatius 1.10.7: “if she remains obstinate, do not use force,” kan men proskartere, episches ten bian).

These components should be kept in mind when we look at the five NT texts that remark on or call for perseverance in prayer. The idea is constant diligence, effort that never lets up, confident waiting for results; and several times these characteristics are emphasized by the periphrastic construction of the participle with the imperfect of the verb to be, showing continuity and suggesting perseverance that does not falter or fail: “these were all persevering with one accord in prayer” (houtoi pantes esan proskarterountes homothymadon te proseuche).⁷ When the apostles refuse to wait on tables so that they may devote themselves to prayer and the ministry of the word (Acts 6:4), their dedication has connotations of exclusivity. The application of the verb proskartereo to prayer, a usage without parallel in secular Greek and in the LXX, is original to the NT authors; its frequency points as much to an actual state of affairs in the primitive church as to an apostolic demand. It is regrettable that the theological treatises on prayer did not explore the richness of the meaning of this expression, because it is the apostolic translation of the Master’s precept “that they ought always to pray . . . and never lose heart” (to dein pantote proseuchesthai . . . kai me enkakein, Luke 18:1; cf. 1Thess 5:17).

The substantive proskarteresis, “constancy, diligence, persistence” (Philodemus of Gadara, Rh. 1.11), unknown in the papyri, is a biblical hapax describing Christian prayer; it should be understood as having the same richness of meaning as the corresponding verb: “Live a life of prayer and supplication; pray always, in the Spirit. Keep at it with tireless perseverance (eis auto agrypnountes en pase proskarteresei), with intercessions for all the saints” (Eph 6:18). The word is found again in Jewish acts of emancipation at Panticapaeum in AD 80 in a rather enigmatic formula: choris is ten proseuchen thopeias te kai proskartereseos; ⁸ also choris tou proskarterein te proseuche epitropeouses tes synagoges ton loudaion kai theon sebon. ⁹ We translate: the slave shall be free “except [for his obligation] to attend the prayer service regularly”; the Jewish synagogue is the best example of a place for prayer to God.

¹ Heb 11:27; cf. Job 2:9; Sir 2:2; Philo, Husbandry 152; Epictetus 1.26.12; T. Job 4.10.

² Acts 10:7—τω—ν προσκαρτερούντων αὐτω—; cf. P.Lond. 196, 3 (vol. 2, p. 153), προσκαρτερει—ν τω— Νεοκύδει; P.Brem. 48, 17: προσκαρτερει—ν αὐτῇ (AD 118); P.Giss. 79, col. II, 9: “Epaphroditus has hitherto been guilty of no negligence but is devoted to us and to all your affairs” (ἀλλὰ προσκαρτερει— ἡμι—ν καὶ πα—σι τοι—ς πράγμασί σου— AD 117); P.Oxy. 530, 9: “I have long been devoted to the affairs of Pausirion.” Horus is attached (προσκαρτερήσαντι) to the baths for a salary of one drachma per day (P. J. Sijpesteijn, The Family of the Tiberii Julii Theones, Amsterdam, 1976, n. XV,4).

³ In AD 104, the command of the prefect Gaius Vibius Maximus for the census provides “that they devote themselves diligently to their farming” (τῇ προσηκούσῃ αὐτοί—ς γεωργίαι προσκαρτερήσωσιν, P.Lond. 904, 27; vol. 3, p. 125); cf. the request of two brothers selected as farm workers on the royal estate (δημόσιοι γεωργοί) that one of them be released “so that we may be able to devote ourselves also to our own farming” (ἵνα δυνηθω—μεν καὶ τῇ ε—αυτω—ν γεωργία προσκαρτερει—ν, P.Amh. 65, 3; republished in SB 9050, col. III, 3 and A. Kränzlein, “Die Papyri Vind. inv. 2582 a, 25824 b und Amh 65,” in JJP, vol. 6, 1952, pp. 195–237); the edict of the prefect Q. Aemilius Saturninus, ἵνα διὰ τὴν σὴν τύχην δυνηθω—μεν προσκαρτερει—ν τω— ἔργω (P.Lund IV, 1, 20; republished in SB 9340; second century); προσκαρτερω—ν τῇ στρατηγία ἀδιαλίπτως εἰ—ς τὸ ε—ν μηδενὶ μεμφθῆναι (P.Oxy. 82, 4; third century); ephebic inscription in honor of a kosmetes (καὶ τοῦ διατηρηθῆναι τὴν εὐφημίαν αὐτοί—ς προσκαρτερω—ν ε—πιμελω—ς καὶ προσεδρεύων, Dittenberger, Syl. 717, 84); Polybius 1.59.12: ε—πιμελεία προσκαρτερω—ν.

⁴ P.Brem. 16, 15: “It is enough that Hierakion perseveres and to me . . .” (ἀρκετὸς γάρ ε—στιν Ἱερακίων προσκαρτερω—ν καὶ ε—μοὶ . . .); inscription of Antiochus I of Commagene at Nimrud Dagh, Arsameia, and Selik (IGLS, n. 1, 130, 168; 47, col. III, 17; IV, 2–3; 51, 14 = Dittenberger, Or. 383).

⁵ Προσκαρτερήσωσι τω— τοῦ αὐτοῦ ἡγεμόνος βήματι ἄχρι ου— ε—κβιβασθῆ ἃ ἔχω πρὸς αὐτούς, P.Oxy. 2852, 33; cf. 261, 12: Demetria pleads physical weakness as an excuse for being absent, οὐ δυναμένη προσκαρτερῆσαι τω— κριτηρίῳ διὰ γυναικείαν ἀσθένειαν (AD 55); 260, 14: προσκαρτερήσιν μέχρι ου— ἃ ἔχωμεν πρὸς ε—αυτούς ε—γβιβασθῆ (AD 59); 2597, 8; P.Hamb. 4, 7: προσκαρτερήσιν τω— ι—ερωτάτῳ τοῦ κρατίστου ἡγεμόνος . . . βήματι (AD 87); P.Oslo 19, 4; PSI 806, 17 (cf. 1265, 8; E.Wipszycka, in JJP, vol. 16–17, 1971, p. 228); P.Ross.Georg. II, 27, 6; P.Stras. 196, 16; P.Mich. 533, 7: Heracleides swears to the prefect in 137 that he will be present at the tribunal until the sentence is handed down (προσκαρτερήσιν τω— βήματι μέχρι ου— διευθύνῳ ἃ πρὸς με ἔχει Ἡρακλείδης); P.Fouad 22, col. II, 13, a lawsuit between members of the same family, AD 125: Isidora takes an oath to appear at Alexandria to settle her dispute with Deios, “and I will remain at the disposal of his excellence the archidikastes until I have completed by business with Deios” (καὶ προσκαρτερήσιν τω— κρατίστῳ ἀρχιδικαστῆ ἄχρι ἂν ε—κβιβασῶ ἃ ἔχω πρὸς τὸν Δει—ον); BGU 628, 9; P.Mert. 91, 4, a petition to the strategos: the complainant asks that his adversaries be notified of his complaint so that they may be informed and may present themselves before the tribunal until the difference between them is settled (ἴν εἴδωσιν καὶ προσκαρτερήσωσιν τω— σω—+ δικαστηρίῳ ἄχρις ἂν τὰ μετοξὺ ἡμῶν πέρατος τύχη).

⁶ Π.Οξψ. 1764, 4: “Φορ α νυμπερ οφ δαψσ ωε η̄αε βεεν ωαιτινγ φορ Πηιλεασ τηε βυτχηερ” (πολλὰ ἡμέραι προσκαρτεροῦμεν Φιλέῳ τω— μοσχομαγείρῳ); P.Ross.Georg. II, 31, 11: “For a long while I waited for Hermaiscos to pay the seven staters; finally he gave me twenty-four drachmas”; P.Mil.Vogl. 189, 7; PSI 598, 7: προσκαρτέρησον οὖν ἕως ἂν —Ετέαρχος παραγένηται.

⁷ Acts 1:14; 2:42 (cf. P. H. Menoud, La Vie de l'église naissante, Neuchâtel-Paris, 1952, pp. 23–24; J. A. Fitzmyer, Semitic Background, pp. 271–303); 2:46; 6:4; Rom 12:12.

⁸ B. Latyshev, Inscriptiones Antiquae, vol. 2, n. 52, 53, 364. RIJG (vol. 2, p. 299) translates “aller librement . . . excepté dans la maison de prière consacrée au culte et à la persévérance” (“go freely . . . except in the house of prayer, which is consecrated to worship and perseverance”). J. B. Frey (CII 683, 14; 684, 21; 691, 20): total liberty for the freed slave “except with respect to prayer, to which he will owe devotion and diligence”; προσκαρτέρησις is attested in an inscription from Andros in the sense of devoting oneself to a profession (W. Peek, “Griechische Inschriften,” in Ath. Mitt. 1934, p. 69).

⁹ CIRB, n. 71, 6–7; Republished by B. Lifshitz, “Notes d’épigraphie grecque,” in RB, 1969, p. 95; cf. M. Hengel, “Proseuche und synagoge,” in Tradition und Glaube (Festgabe K. G. Kuhn), Göttingen, 1971, p. 174; ἡ προσκαρτερία (I.Priene 109, 101; from 120 BC).

προσλαμβάνομαι

proslambanomai, to take in addition, seize, conquer, take with oneself, aid, assist, take in, add, receive proslambanomai, S 4355; TDNT 4.15; EDNT 3.175; NIDNTT 3.747–748, 750; MM 549–550; L&N 15.127, 15.167, 15.180, 18.2, 34.53; BDF §169(2); BAGD 717

This compound of lambano, “take, receive, possess,” can keep the same meaning; for example, Heracles says to his son, “Take me here to lift me up” (Sophocles, Trach. 1024; cf. Aristophanes, Lys. 202). But at Ach. 1215 (“Take [labesthe] my leg, take it again [proslabesth’], my friends”), Aristophanes retains the significance of pros- (“additionally”; Polybius 3.70.2; cf. Euripides, Med. 885; Hipp. 1011) added to the simple verb: “take in addition.” Thus one takes a food with one’s bread (Xenophon, Mem. 3.14.4; cf. Symp. 4.8) or “adds” dishonor to misfortune (Thucydides 5.111.3; Tht. 207 c; Phdr. 272 a). Hence the meanings “add,¹ adjoin, bring along”: “Cyrus took with him a large number of horsemen and peltasts” (bearers of light shields, Xenophon, Cyr. 1.4.16); “If I had joined him to you as an ally” (An. 7.6.27; Sophocles, OC 378); then “come to the aid of”: Dio undertook a campaign against Dionysius and “with the help of the people (proslabon ton demon) expelled him” (Aristotle, Pol. 5.10.32); and finally “take, conquer” cities or lands (Xenophon, Hell. 4.4.1). — In the middle voice, proslambanomai retains this latter meaning (Polybius 1.37.5), and likewise “take with oneself” (volunteers, Chariton, Chaer. 8.2.14); but above all it means “take part in an enterprise, come to the aid of, assist”: “It was right that you should lend me your help” (Plato, Leg. 10.897 d); “Clearchus put his own hand to the work . . . men who had passed the age of thirty also took part.”²

In the LXX, two occurrences have the meaning “add, adjoin,”³ one means “receive, accept” (those banished from Jerusalem, 2Macc 10:15), and the other five have theological meanings. God is the subject of the verb, but in each case the underlying Hebrew is different: God decides to take Isr as his people (1Sam 12:22; ‘asâh with the double nuance of acquiring and instituting); “From on high he stretched forth his hand, he grasped me, he drew me out of the great waters” (Ps 18:16, Hebrew mashâh); “If my father and mother were to abandon me, Yahweh would take me in” (Ps 27:10, Hebrew ‘asap); “Happy is the one whom you choose and take for yourself to abide with you in your court” (Ps 65:4, Hebrew qarab, bring near, present); “You will guide me with your counsel, and then afterward you will receive me in your glory” (Ps 73:24, Hebrew laqah, “seize, take, conquer, carry off”). This usage in the Psalms shows that proslambano is an element in Isr’s religious language and could not fail to have an influence on NT usage.

With Philo, the meaning “add” is predominant. An illness of the soul is added to bodily illness (Unchang. God 66; Migr. Abr. 55), sorrow to sorrow (Moses 2.225), new joys to past happiness (Virtues 67); if there are too few people in the household, one takes a neighbor in addition to eat the lamb (Heir 193); tax collectors add to their brutality the immunity that is assured by their masters’ directives.⁴ The nuances “to take for oneself” (Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 119), “acquire” (Decalogue 136; Good Man Free 12, 159) and “take to oneself” (Plant. 64) are well attested; but we may emphasize “to master” (Conf. Tongues 110, the passions) and “seize” (To Gaius 347). In Josephus, “add” is less frequent,⁵ but “adjoin” (in the sense of taking on associates) and “receive help” recur endlessly;⁶ which attests the common social nuance of this verb in the first century. The meaning “take by force” is not absent: “the rebels sought to take the upper city in addition to the places that they already occupied” (War 2.424).

In the papyri, it is often a question of “receiving” what is due,⁷ but also of “adjoining” persons as witnesses (P.Mert. V, 32: “bringing with me the same Panas,” proslabonta syn emoi ton auton Panan), associates (P.Dura 13 a 10, metochous proslabesai), partners (P.Oxy. 3092, 4: proslambanesthai autous koinonous; P.Amh. 100, 4: proselabeto ton Kornelion koinonon), or collaborators (P.Fay. 12, 10: proslabomenos synergon Ammonion), who provide their services (UPZ 19, 25, diakonein hemin) and their help (P.Oxy. 71, col. II, 9: eis boetheian). In 157 BC a new meaning appeared, “to enlist” in an army. A prostagma of Ptolemy VI Philometor and Cleopatra II says, “To Demetrius. Enlist (proslabesthai) Apollonius the Macedonian in the company of Dexilaos” (P.Lond. 23, 21; vol. 1, p. 38 = UPZ 14, 14; cf. 208, 3; 214, 1). Similarly, in the same period, an honorific decree for Orthagoras of Araxa: “Our people were quite zealous toward them (the people of Orloanda) to obtain their liberty and their integration (proslephthosin) into the confederation of the Lycian people. . . . By his action he contributed to their integration (eis to proslephthenai autous) into the community of Lycians.”⁸ This reception into a community is not merely official but also implies emotional ties (UPZ 144, 11: proseilepsai philon), as in the marriage contract in P.Mur. 115, 5, from the second century AD: the husband “has agreed and concluded to reconcile anew and take back the same Salome . . . as his legitimate wife.”⁹

In the NT, the verb proslambano is used only in the middle voice. The first text is difficult. When Jesus has announced his passion, Peter proslabomenos auton “began to rebuke him, saying, ‘God forbid, Master, it shall not be’” (Matt 16:22; Mark 8:32). How should this be translated? A. Schlatter cites Josephus, Ant. 18.4 as a parallel: Judas the Gaulanite “assured himself of the help of Saddok, a Pharisee” (Saddokon Pharisaion proslabomenos).¹⁰ St. Matthew, however, comments on proslabomenos with “began to rebuke him,” and it is difficult to see how the aorist participle here could mean “come to the aid of, help” Jesus. Other moderns see here a synonym of paralambano, “take along with oneself,” so that Peter “drew him aside” or “apart”; but this meaning is not attested. Why not refer instead to the numerous occurrences of this verb in the sense of “take by force, seize, master” and see here an illusion to the impetuosity of the apostle, who adds and opposes a claim against Christ’s affirmation, wanting to cause him to change his mind. This would account for the quite brusque character of Christ’s response: “Get behind me, adversary; you are setting up a stumbling-block” (skandalon, Matt 16:23), an obstacle on the way of the cross.

On the other hand, the five occurrences in Acts are completely traditional. At Thessalonica, “jealous Jews took as allies (proslabomenoi) some wicked men” (Acts 17:5); at Ephesus, Priscilla and Aquila, after hearing Apollos, “took him with them (proselabonta auton) and explained the way of God to him more precisely” (18:26). At the end of the storm, St. Paul says to his companions, “Today is the fortieth day that you have been in suspense and fasting and have taken nothing more to eat” (methen proslabomenoi). When the apostle himself started to eat, “all were encouraged and also took food” (autoi proselabonto trophes, 27:36). At Malta, “the barbarians showed us uncommon humaneness (ou ten tychousan philanthropian) ... receiving (proselabonto) us all, because of the rain and cold that had come on” (28:2). Note well this link between kind and beneficent humaneness and reception. Nothing has less of a juridical flavor than help given to shipwreck victims. Here, the heart receives and helps the neighbor. In this same way proslambanomai became with Paul a Christian virtue.

In four occurrences, the apostle Paul uses the present or aorist middle imperative (proslambanesthe, proslabou) three times. “Receive the one who is weak in the faith.”¹¹ This is not about taking aside a brother whose conduct is not in harmony with ours. The verb indicates that we must take him with us and introduce him warmly into our fellowship. This is more than a manifestation of brotherly love; it is a primitive requirement of the Christian religion, formulated thus: “The one who eats must not scorn the one who does not eat, and the one who does not eat must not judge the one who eats, because God has received him” (ho theos gar auton proselabeto, Rom 14:3). He has chosen him as his own, taking him from the world to make him a believer and bring him into his church. How can this divinely established brotherhood be refused? The new exhortation is “Receive then one another, just as Christ has received you, for the glory of God” (Rom15:7). The two propositions correspond precisely: dio proslambanesthe allelous on the one hand and kathos kai ho Christos proselabeto hymas on the other. Christ’s welcome of all of his own without distinction with a view to the perfect unity of the community is the model for each Christian’s welcoming of all his fellow-Christians, and at the same time is an individual precept. This is an evocation of the hospitality which was the first manifestation of brotherly agape in the primitive church¹² and which must of course be present at the outset in every community.¹³

In a concrete case, St. Paul tells Philemon to observe this principle towards Onesimus, a runaway slave who would normally have been punished. “If you have any regard for the bonds that unite us, receive him as if he were myself” (proslabou auton hos eme, Phlm 17). According to the previously cited texts, he is not only being asked to receive this guilty person into his house, nor simply to pardon him, but even to treat him with complete respect, generosity, and attentiveness. As a parallel we may cite BGU 1141, 37, from 34 BC: “Twice I received him into my house” (dis proselabomen auton eis oikon par’ eme). We may add a Latin letter of recommendation addressed to a military tribune in the second century, in which Aurelius Archelaus commends to him his friend Theon: “I ask you, my lord, to look upon him as if he were myself, for he is such a man as should be loved by you.”¹⁴

¹ Ep. Arist. 2 quotes an iambic trimeter: προσμανθάνειν ἀεί τι καὶ προσλαμβάνειν (“Always to learn and enrich oneself”).

² Xenophon, An. 2.3.11–12; cf. Aristophanes, Pax 9: “help me, in the name of the gods”; Chariton, Chaer. 8.2.13: “I will not let you have regrets, with the help of the gods.”

³ Wis 17:10—“wickedness always adds to the difficulties”; 2Macc 8:1—Judas Maccabeus and his companions, recruiting partisans in the villages, join themselves to those who stand firm in Judaism.

⁴ Spec. Laws 2.93; cf. 3.101; Decalogue 25; Joseph 7; Moses 1.68: “the bush found still more splendor”; 133; Virtues 100: “Moses added something greater”; To Gaius 114, passion “receives the simultaneous help of vanity and ambition”; Alleg. Interp. 2.23: “the vegetative power augmented by imagination”; cf. fetuses that stay longer in their mothers’ wombs (1.9).

⁵ War 1.35: “Bacchides with his natural cruelty exaggerated the godless orders of the prince”; 1.446: “Their hatred was doubled by frank speech”; 1.483; Ant. 1.306: “She added to this woman’s fame”; 4.296: add profit; 15.160: a new prestige; 19.351: he received in addition Judea, Samaria, and Caesarea. Hence “amass” (3.56). Cf. “increase one’s experience” (Thucydides 6.18.6); add new acquaintances to one’s collection (Isocrates, Demon. 1.18); “adding what we need to our assets” (Andocides, De Pace 3.23).

⁶ War 1.329: “Herod attached auxiliaries”; 2.67: “Varus attached an additional 1500 armed men to his forces”; 2.425, 427, 588; 4.138; Ant. 5.120: “having received Simeon’s help”; 6.108; 14.84, 452; 18.4; 19.60; Life 39: “they were obliged to take on the Galileans as allies”; War 1.561: “Alexander’s son could in addition rely on his father-in-law”; 1.567, 568: “the wife of Pheroras allied with her mother, her sister, and the mother of Antipas”; 4.616: Vespasian wrote to Tiberius Alexander “that he would gladly take him as a collaborator and helper”; Ant. 3.64: “Aaron, to whom Raguel was joined”; 5.63; Ag. Apion 1.241: “Osarsiph associated some of the other priests with himself.”

⁷ P.Lond. 2004, 30 (third century BC); P.Cair.Zen. 59355, 144 (= SB 6771; cf. 6727, 5; 9150, 7; 10308, 4); P.Mich. 67, 25; 84, 16. In 50 BC, a prostagma of Cleopatra VII and Ptolemy XII says, “Whoever reports violators of these dispositions to the strategos of the nome will obtain . . . if he is a slave, in addition to his freedom, the sixth part (of the fortune of the guilty party)” (BGU 1730 = SB 7419; C.Ord.Ptol. 73, 15; cf. 50, 31 = P.Tebt. 700, 51).

⁸ J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. IV, 56 and 61. Cf. Plutarch, Pel. 27, 3: “Pelopidas recruited mercenaries on the spot”; decree of Canopus: priests προσλαμβανομένων ε—κ τῆς πέμπτης φυλῆς τω—ν Εὐεργετω—ν θεω—ν ἄλλων πέντε (Dittenberger, Or. 56, 31). In the meaning “fix, attach,” cf. Aristotle, Part. An. 2.9.654b and 27; 3.7.670a14; HA 1.17a22.

⁹ Republished SB 10305 (cf. Xenophon, Lac. 1.9); cf. P.Tebt. 61 a s: τω—ν προσληφθέντων ει—ς τὴν κατοικίαν; P.Petaus 28, 14: ε—πὶ δὲ ὕβριν προσέλαβα. In a very mutilated Christian inscription from Baalbek, it seems that baptismal illumination is in view: προσλαμβάνων φω—ς (IGLS 2834, 4).

¹⁰ A. Schlatter, Der Evangelist Matthäus, p. 516.

¹¹ Rom 14:1. These “weak” ones, who appear suddenly in the vegetarian controversy, are ascetics who abstain from certain foods, or scrupulous folk—or better, converts—whose consciences have not been sufficiently enlightened by the new faith. Cf. J. Dupont, “Appel aux faibles et aux forts dans la communauté romaine (Rom. XIV, 1–XV, 13),” in AnBib 17, Rome, 1963, vol. 1, pp. 357–366.

¹² Rom 12:13—“pursue hospitality”; 1Tim 3:2—the bishop must be hospitable; 1Pet 4:9, all Christians must be φιλόξενοι; Heb 13:2; 3 John: the thoughtfulness and generosity of Gaius in receiving traveling Christians not known to him personally (C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 3, pp. 311–312) are praised by St. John in the manner of an “honorific decree” analogous the one that the Lycian confederation, the council and people of Myra, of Patara, and of Telmessos sent in AD 43 to the Roman Junia Theodora, who was staying in Corinth, and whose hospitality was so remarkable (SEG XVIII, 143, 25ff., 48, 75ff.); her beneficiaries testify for her (lines 9, 16, 32, 61). Cf. the honorific decree of Athens in 347/6: “Let the envoys Sotis and Theodosius be praised for their good offices on behalf of travelers from Athens to the Bosphorus” (Dittenberger, Syl. 206, 49ff.). At Chersonese, a benefactor of the city is praised for having practiced personal hospitality toward the people of the city in time of famine (τ—διόξενοι, B. Latyshev, Inscriptiones Antiquae, III, n. 68, 25); cf. Cimon, the most hospitable of the Greeks, who had a large meal prepared every day for a large number of people (Plutarch, Cim. 10.4); all the poor were admitted (10.1). He surpassed the ancient hospitality and kindness of the Athenians (φιλοξενίαν καὶ φιλανθρωπίαν, 10.6). Here pagan hospitality is not at issue, but the brotherly love commanded by the Master (Matt 25:35, 38, 43–44; J. Winandy, “La Scène du Jugement dernier [Mt. XXV, 31–46],” in ScEccl, 1966, pp. 169–186; P. Miquel, “Hospitalité,” in Dict.spir., vol. 7, 808ff.). Whoever “receives” a brother receives Christ in person (Matt 10:40–42; C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, pp. 809–815). This welcome was so universal and so generous that abuses occurred; Did. 11.3–6 reacts against these.

¹³ W. Barclay (NT Wordbook, pp. 107–109) interprets the apostle’s exhortations in terms of the LXX, where God “receives” his people (1Sam 12:22; Ps 27:10; 65:4) and in terms of the Greek meaning of proslambanomai: “take someone as an associate, aide, partner” and concludes that to “receive” a believer in the church is to treat him as an ally, an auxiliary, an assistant who brings his help to the life of the community; a stable and beneficent active member of the family, by no means a stranger. According to the papyri, we can see such a person as a soldier enrolled in an army. He has been enlisted in the Christian militia in order to be of effective service there, which he can do only in union with his fellow soldiers. The verb proslambanomai meant all of this to Jesus' disciples.

¹⁴ "Peto domine ut eum ante oculos habeas tanquam me est enim tales omo ut ametur a te," P.Oxy. 32, 6–10 = R. Cavenaile, Corpus Papyrorum Latinarum, Wiesbaden, 1958, n. 249.

προτρέπομαι

protrepomai, to urge forward, stir up, exhort

protrepomai, S 4389; EDNT 3.182; MM 554; L&N 33.300; BAGD 722

Protrepo, "urge forward," is used above all in the transitive and with a figurative meaning, "stir up, exhort."¹ Nevertheless, the aorist middle participle, which is a NT hapax at Acts 18:27, is not without difficulty: from Ephesus, since Apollos "wanted to pass over to Achaëa, the brethren exhorted (him) and wrote to the disciples to receive him." This translation follows Chrysostom in supposing that auton should be understood between protrepsamenoï and hoi adelphoi, which is contrary to the usage in the papyri and the inscriptions.² And why exhort Apollos, since he himself has the desire to go to Corinth (boulomenou de autou dielthein)? We could translate, "the brethren encouraged him," but that is not exactly what the verb means.³ According to Codex Bezae and the Harclean Syriac, it was Corinthians at Ephesus who, having heard Apollos, asked him to come to their country (parekaloun dielthein . . . eis ten patrida auton); Apollos did not take the initiative for this apostolic mission. We can remove the difficulty by referring protrepsamenoï not to Apollos but to the Corinthians, who were urged to write a letter of recommendation (cf. Rom 16:1; 2Cor 3:1ff.; Col 4:10): having exhorted, the brothers wrote, or they wrote exhorting, or the brothers exhorted by means of a letter.⁴

The papyri offer numerous parallels to this invitation to make a voyage: "Theon, my brother, salutes you and urges you (protrepetai se) to come to see us at Bacchias" (P.Mich. 496, 19); "urge brother Castor, if he is going to come" (protrepsai Kastora, ean melle elthein, embalesthai tous hemeterous, SB 7349, 6); "we urged him to come with us to survey the flood plains" (proetrepsamen exelthein ham' hemein epi ton horismon ton neson, ibid. 10649, 5); "I urged the father of one of them to come with us to you" (proetrepsa men oun ton patera tou henos auton katelthein met'auton pros se, ibid. 9415, col. XVIII, 12); "when the envoy encouraged him and urged him to go to Egypt" (tou presbeutou protrepsamenou kai parormesantos eis Aigypton elthein, Josephus, Ant. 12.166). The urging is a function of affection or admiration,⁵ as with Pap.Lugd.Bat. XVII, 16, b 15—"for my friend urged me strongly"⁶—and SB 7517, 6, where the subject of the verb is “benevolence”: “Your benevolence impels those who have been wronged to come to you fearlessly” (he se eumeneia protrepetai tous adikethentas aphobos soi proseinai).

The invitation is often very pressing, like the strong urging to serve in a leitourgia,⁷ to make payments or pay taxes (P.Ryl. 617, 12; P.Ross.Georg. III, 9, 10), to meet one’s obligations,⁸ to carry out tasks (SB 9102, 17), and especially to take on a responsibility.⁹ The verb occurs commonly in honorific decrees mentioning that an athlete was “stirred up” to take part in a competition¹⁰ or an official was urged to accept his office.¹¹ It is possible that this noble sense of the word motivated the selection of this verb in Acts 18:27 to make the arrival of Apollos at Corinth somewhat official.

¹ 2Macc 11:7—“Maccabeus exhorted the others to risk themselves along with him to help their brothers”; 4Macc 12:7—“When his mother had exhorted (the seventh brother) in Hebrew”; 15:12—“the mother exhorted her children, together and individually, to die for the sake of piety”; 16:13—“she exhorted them, supplicating them to die for the sake of piety” (προετρέπετο ἰ—κετεύουσα); Xenophon, Cyr. 2.2.14: “it is by making them weep that the law urges citizens toward justice”; Thucydides 8.63.3: Peisander’s delegation urged the noteworthy leaders to establish an oligarchy.

² P.Ryl. 77, 48: “we urged him to assume the office of kosmetes” (ἡμῶ—ν δὲ προτρεπομένων αὐτὸν ἀναδέξασθαι τὴν κοσμητείαν); decree from the second century BC in honor of Eirenias, who “thanks to his own personal authority, stirred up King Eumenes to give the city 160,000 medimnoi of wheat for the building of a gymnasium” (προτρεψάμενος αὐτὸν δοῦναι τῇ πόλει δωρεάν, NCIG, n. VIII, 6).

³ Nevertheless, urging or incitement is often tempered and leaves room for the free initiative of the person urged; cf. P.Panop.Beatty 2, 128: “it would be well, if through a public announcement, προτρέψασθαί σε τοὺς βουλομένους πλέον προσκομίζειν ὄφελος τῶ—ταμείῳ”; P.Oxf. 12, 6: “since you engage me to join with you . . .” (contract for association in the second century); Dittenberger, Or. 339, 90: ἵνα . . . ζηλωταὶ μὲν τῶ—καλλίστων γίνωνται, προτρέπωνται δὲ πρὸς ἀρετήν; cf. Xenophon, Mem. 1.4.1; Josephus, Ant. 7.262: προτρεψαμένου τοῦ —Αμασα— at the suggestion of Amasa, all the Israelites did likewise.”

⁴ Cf. M. Zerwick, Biblical Greek, §262.

⁵ Cf. Wis 14:18—“The ambition of the craftsman impelled even those who did not know the king to intensify their worship” (ἢ τοῦ τεχνίτου προετρέψατο φιλοτιμία).

⁶ Πολλὰ γάρ με προετρέψατο ὁ φίλος. Republished in SB 10286 (second-third century). This nuance of affection often appears in letters; P.Mich. 496, 5: ἤδη προτρέπομαι ε—πιστέλλειν ἡμι—ν περὶ τῆς ὑγείας σου, “I urge you to write me immediately concerning your health” (second century); SB 9533, 4: ἀσπάζομαι καὶ προτρέπομαί σε τὸ αὐτὸ ποιει—ν ὑπὸ χει—ρα (second century); 7335, 6: προτρέπομαι σε γράψαι μοι ἥδιστα ποιήσοντι; P.Brem. 21, 9, καὶ σὲ δὲ προτρέπομαι ε—πιτρέπειν μοι περὶ ὧν βούλει ὅς (sic) ἥδιστα ποιήσοντι.

⁷ P.Oxy. 2569, 14; P.Cair.Isid. 81, 9 = SB 7676. One is urged by the strategos and the people to such an undertaking (UPZ 110, 165; second century BC); cf. Josephus, Ant. 5.171: οὔτε προτρεπομένων οὔτε κωλύόντων.

⁸ P.Mich. 485, 10: “I pray you, brother, to act once again on my behalf and urge Valerius to write to Peios, having confidence in my good faith”; P.Oxy. 1252, verso 32.

⁹ Pap.Lugd.Bat. VI, 15, 3: cf. the honorific inscription of an association for its president: αὐτοί τε ἅπαντες προτρεψάμενοι τοὺς δοκοῦντας ε—ν ε—αυτοί—ς εὐθέτους εἶναι τῆς ἀρχιερωσύνης (SB 8267, 11; from 5 BC). An agonothetes, at his own expense, puts up a statue of a victorious athlete: ε—τείμησε Αὐρ. Μεννέας β? θέμεως ἀγωνοθέτης Αὐρ.—Αλέξανδρον Τιείου προτρεψαμένης τῆς πόλεως ε—νδόξως ἀγωνισάμενον πυθικῶ—ν πανκράτιον (MAMA IV, 132).

¹⁰ Inscription at Aphrodisias for Aurelius Achilles, ὅτι προτρεψαμένης αὐτὸν ὡς πατρίδος τῆς πόλεως εἰ—ς τὸ τελεώτατον τῶ—ν ἀγωνισμάτων. This athlete took the Olympic victory from Ephesus; that city had urged him to participate in its games, as if it were his own country (ed. L. Robert, Opera Minora Selecta, vol. 1, p. 620, who gives numerous other references, p. 165); cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 1073, 37, ε—πὶ πλει—στον ἀγωνίζεσθαι προτρεπόμενος.

¹¹ Honorific decree from 107 BC for the praetor Diophantos, ε—πὶ τὰ κάλλιστα καὶ ε—νδοξότατα τὸν βασιλέα προτρεπόμενος (Dittenberger, Syl. 709, 5); cf. the decree of Lebedos for a judge from Samos, προτρέπωνται δὲ καὶ οἱ—λοιποὶ εἰ—ς τὰ παρακαλούμενα προθύμους ε—αυτοὺς ε—πιδιδόναι (L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 11–12, p. 205, 19).

πρόφασις

prophasis, a reason proffered, pretext, excuse

prophasis, S 4392; EDNT 3.182; MM 555; L&N 33.437, 88.230; BAGD 722

Derived from prophaino, unknown in the OT (cf. 2Macc 3:26), prophasis is used five times in the NT, always in a pejorative sense; four of the occurrences are datives of manner and circumstance, used adverbially.¹ Its first meaning is “a reason that is proffered” without any psychological or moral connotation,² but it is most commonly used to mean “pretext,” a motive set forth deceitfully,³ as with the sailors who “let down the boat to the sea on the pretext (prophasei) that they had to distance the anchors from the bow” (Acts 27:30); the sailors wanted to flee, and they used a false pretext, but St. Paul saw their true intent.

Prophasis often takes on this nuance of lying and pretense: one acts on a hidden motive under the cover of one that is perceptible or respectable.⁴ This fallacious character appears in Mark 12:40; Luke 20:47, denouncing the scribes who make a show of praying at length.⁵ This hypocrisy, rejected by St. Paul,⁶ is that of certain preachers denounced in Phil 1:18 whose intentions are not pure; they preach the gospel out of “envy and strife” (dia phthonon kai erin), then “out of selfish ambition” (ex eritheias), and finally “not from pure motives” (ouch hagnos) and on a pretext (prophasei). This ministry is incited by jealousy, the purpose being to make the apostle’s chains heavier,⁷ that is, to supplant him and undermine his authority. Other Christians “preach Christ out of goodwill, acting in love” (verses 15–16). The apostle concludes, “What does it matter? In one way or another, under pretext or in truth (eite prophasei eite aletheia), Christ is preached, and in that I rejoice.” This dichotomy between true and false motives is classical: prophaseis anti ton alethon pseudeis.⁸

Prophasis finally has the sense of excuse—valid or not⁹—notably that of ignorance: agnoias prophasin hypoteimesamenos (P.Oxy. 1119, 11). In this meaning, John 15:22—“If I had not come and spoken to them, they would have no sin, but now they have not excuse for their sin”¹⁰ of willful blindness.

¹ Πρόφασει; cf. F. M. Abel, Grammaire, § 45 q; K. Deichgräber, “Πρόφασις,” in Quellen und Studien zur Geschichte der Naturwissenschaften und der Medizin, vol. 3, 1932, pp. 209–225.

² SB 8987, 38: εἰς τὴν τούτων πρόφασιν τε καὶ αἰτίαν. T. Job 8.5; Xenophon, Cyr. 3.1.27, Tigranes to Cyrus: “the offenses that we have committed probably give you reason to mistrust us”; Josephus, Ant. 13.427; War 2.348; P.Lips. 64, 8: διὰ τὴν πρόφασιν ταύτην = for this reason; P.Oxy. 1880, 12: ἔνεκεν τῆς προφάσεως; 1897, 5; 2110, 15, 34, 37; 2420, 16; 2478, 23; P.Erl. 105, 7, 9; 109, 7; 132; P.Ant. 44, 6: διὰ τῶν ἐπιπαισῶν προφάσεων = for the reasons mentioned; P.Mert. 98, 12; C.P.Herm. 2, 7: προφάσεις ἀπαραίτητοι, compelling reasons kept me from joining you; P.Mich. 486, 12: πρόφασις παρολκῆς, reason for a delay; Dittenberger, Syl. 888, 137: διὰ γὰρ τὰς προειρημένους ταύτας προφάσεις. F. Robert, (“Prophasis,” in REG, 1976, pp. 317–342) demonstrates that πρόφασις in the medical vocabulary means first of all “first manifestation, initial period, precursor phenomenon, preparatory phase,” then “observable, visible cause,” finally “cause” in general, synonymous with αἰτία. Similarly in Thucydides: ἀληθεστάτη πρόφασις = the truest cause (1.23.6), with the nuance of intention, explanation (6.6.1).

³ “The high officials and satraps sought a grievance against Daniel, but they could find no motive or fault, because he was faithful. These men said, ‘Since we can find no grievance against Daniel, let us find something against him in the law of his God’” (Dan 6:5-6; Theodotion); cf. Demosthenes, C. Olymp. 48.39: “In all that he says, there is nothing but imaginary suspicions, false excuses, and bits of trickery” (προφάσεις ἄδικοι καὶ πονηρία); ibid. 48.42; 48.50; Menander, Dysk. 135: “He is quite pleased to have found a pretext”; 322: “I do not want to send you back on an empty pretext” (οὐ πρόφασιν εἰπὼν βούλομαι ἀποπέμψαι κενήν); Josephus, War 1.654: “These men, under the pretext of serving the law, were in reality serving a deeper design; thus they had to be punished for impiety”; 5.424; Ant. 15.185: in entrusting Mariamne and her mother Alexandra to the keeping of the Ituraean Soemus, Herod finds an occasion or a pretext to honor him; War 4.394: “They feared that their initial opposition would give him a pretext to act against them”; Ag. Apion 1.72: “After I have produced the evidence supplied by these peoples, I shall also mention those Greek historians who have spoken of the Jews, in order to deprive those who are jealous of us this last pretext for controversy against us”; Thucydides 5.53: “The same summer, war broke out between Epidaurus and Argos, the pretext being the sacrificial offering to Pythian Apollo that the Epidaurians were supposed to send for their pasture land, which they did not send”; SB 8444, 15 (= Dittenberger, Or. 669): “As some, under the pretext of the interests of the state, having the debts of others ceded to themselves, have had certain people incarcerated,” line 17, 37; P.Mich. 581, 14: “on the pretext that I was guilty of theft” (second century); 529, 50; 530, 25; 624, 12; P.Oxy. 903, 35; 2235, 13; 2407, 49;

Pap.Lugd.Bat. VI, 37, 13. The rebels gave Cleomenes a pretext for complaining (Plutarch, Cleom. 3.6; cf. Ant. 12.1; 42.1; 53.2).

⁴ Hos 10:4—λαλω—ν ῥήματα προφάσεις ψευδει—ς, “uttering words to disguise lies”; Josephus, Life 79: ε—ν προφάσει φιλίας, “under the cover of friendship”; 282: “on the pretext of an urgent call”; SB 9801, 14: “Everything indicates clearly that they sold the tomb ἀκαταχρημάτιστον under the guise of a lease (προφάσει μισθώσεως) . . . consequently, they will have to restore it” (first century, cf. F. De Visscher, Le Droit des tombeaux romains, Milan, 1963, pp. 197–224); SB 10044, 14.

⁵ Προφάσει μακρὰ προσευχόμενοι; a sentence repeated in Matt 23:14 (sometimes placed after verse 12), but absent from the Vulgate and rejected by the critics.

⁶ 1Thess 2:5—“We have never had recourse to flattery . . . nor disguised greed” (προφάσει πλεονεξίας, as translated by B. Rigaux, Thessaloniens). The Vulgate took this to mean “occasion”; a well-attested meaning of πρόφασις; Cleomenes asks Nicagoras of Messene what occasion brings him to Egypt (Plutarch, Cleom. 25.2); P.Fay. 20, 11: “on the occasion of my succession to the empire”; BGU 1024, col. VI, 21: “Finding the occasion, Zephyrios said”; P.Mich. 503, 22: ει— πρόφασιν ἔχεις ε—λθει—ν ει—ς —Αλεξάνδριαν, “if you have occasion to come to Alexandria”; SB 6751, 8; ἵνα τὴν πρόφασιν τω—ν ναυπηγῶ—ν λύσωμεν (third century BC); 8003, 6: ὡς ἔτυχεν περὶ ταύτης τῆς προφάσεως (Christian letter, fourth century); 9557, 18: καὶ προφάσεις καὶ ἀναβολὰς καὶ ἀναδόσεις ποιησάμενος (cf. M. Hombert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1966, pp. 183–184); 10463, 1, 3: τῇ προφάσει δι’ ἧ—ς γράφω . . . ἢ δὲ πρόφασιν αὐτῆ ε—στιν . . . ; 10567, 43; P.Gron. 19, A 15; μὴ προπάσις (sic) σχῆς; P.Oxy. 2416, 15; P.Ross.Georg. IV, 3, 17; 11, 6.

⁷ Cf. Philo, Moses 1.247: “Those who are pained by a neighbor’s success find satisfaction in seeing ills befall him”; Heraclitus, All. 6.3: “Malevolent envy (ὁ φθόνος) always seeks to sully and denigrate”; Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.122–123; Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Pomp. 3: “The Lacedaemonians gave in to jealousy and fear” (φθόνῳ προφάσεις); P.Thead. 14, 34: “They accuse us out of jealousy”; P.Ryl. 144, 21; P.Oxy. 237, col. VI, 21; 533, 14, ἵνα μὴ ἔχωμεν στομάχους μηδὲ φθόνον; cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 2, pp. 244–252.

⁸ Demosthenes, Corona 225; falsifying the true motives for dealings (τὴν μὲν ἀληθῆ πρόφασιν τω—ν πραγμάτων, ibid. 156); cf. the truest motive, τῇ ἀληθεστάτῃ προφάσει (Thucydides 6.6.1); ordinarily, “the truest reason is also the least avowed” (τὴν μὲν γὰρ ἀληθεστάτην πρόφασιν, ἀφανεστάτην δὲ λόγῳ, ibid. 1.23.6); the “pretext” is contrasted with the “true reason” or the underlying intention (διάνοια, ibid. 6.76.2); “the Athenians . . . march against us with considerable forces on the pretext (πρόφασιν) of helping the Segestans and reestablishing the Leontinians; in reality (ἀληθές) the motive was to possess Sicily and especially our city” (ibid. 6.33.2); P.Tebt. 27, 82, οὔτε γὰρ βίαν οὔθ’ ε—τέραν ἠνδηποτοῦν πρόφασιν προσδεξόμεθα.

⁹ Prov 18:1, προφάσεις ζητεῖ—; Plutarch, Rom. 35.1: “As for the faults that they commit, no plausible excuse is found for them” (ε—νδεα—προφάσεως); P.Michael. 17, 2: “they will have an excuse”; P.Tebt. 702, 17; Pap.Lugd.Bat. VI, 24, 93: “no excuse for the lateness” (second century); SB 7404, 52; 8024, 10, ἔνδοξεν δὲ ε—κ τινος προφάσεως πονηροῦ δαίμονος (act of divorce, fourth century); Stud.Pal. XX, 86, 22; P.Mich. 486, 12; T. Job 11.11—“of all that I have entrusted to you in the interest of the indigent (προφάσει πενήτων) I shall take nothing from you.”

¹⁰ Νῦν δὲ πρόφασιν οὐκ ἔχουσιν περὶ τῆς ἀμαρτίας αὐτῶ—ν; cf. Josephus, Life 167: “they were lacking in loyalty to me, with no excuse” (ἄνευ προφάσεως). In the medical vocabulary, prophasis has the technical meaning “cause”; sometimes it refers to the phenomenon that precedes the sickness or is its point of departure; sometimes the apparent or triggering cause; sometimes the active cause, in which case it is synonymous with αἴτιον, cf. J. Jouanna, Hippocrate: La Nature de l’homme, Berlin, 1975, pp. 291ff.

προχειρίζομαι

procheirizomai, to choose ahead of time, establish, designate, appoint, destine

procheirizomai, S 4400; TDNT 6.862–864; EDNT 3.186; NIDNTT 1.475–476; MM 556; L&N 30.89; BAGD 724

In secular Greek, this verb in the middle voice and with a personal object in the accusative means “choose ahead of time, establish, designate, destine.”¹ In the LXX, it is used especially for people chosen beforehand for a certain mission;² and, with the exception of Dan 3:22,³ it is a noble term, because those entrusted with a mission have been elected or appointed on account of their competence and integrity. They are trustworthy envoys, qualified representatives of God, or the king, or of some other high authority.⁴

It is in this quasi-technical sense that Acts uses this verb—unknown in Philo and Josephus—regarding either Christ (“that God may send to you

Jesus, the one predestined to be Messiah”⁵ or Paul (“the God of our fathers chose you in advance [procheirisato se] to know his will,” Acts 22:14; “I have appeared to you to establish you as a minister and witness of the things that you have seen [procheirisasthai se] . . . ; the Gentiles to whom I am sending you [apostello],” 26:16). An official appointing or delegating is always referred to. In the inscriptions and the papyri, the verb figures in the vocabulary of administration, referring to functionaries or persons officially chosen to carry out a certain function: Boulagoras, in the third century BC, was “chosen by the people several times (procheiristheis te pleionakis hypo tou demou) as their representative in public litigation” (SEG I, 366, 20); in the second century, the chief of police of a town makes his report regarding “one of the guards of Tebtunis who was appointed by Ptolemaeus, the district archiphylaktes” (ton ek Tebtyneos phylakiton procheiristhenton hypo Ptolemaiou, P.Tebt. 731, 3); in the first century, in a rental contract, it means that Demetrius must make payments to the broker or to the treasurer of the association, who will be appointed.⁶

The perfect passive participle prokecheirismenon (Acts 3:20) is a stylistic element in formulas for registration. In AD 48, a contract was “recorded by [. . .], adjunct to Theon, the delegate of the association of agoranomoi.”⁷ In 53, in a sworn agreement, six elders, farmers of the province of Oxyrhynchus, “swear to the officially constituted inspectors of sowing for the nome.”⁸ From the same year we have the identical declaration of five elders, farmers from the village of Ares (P.Fouad 19, 6). Sometimes it is the inspectors of sowing that are designated (P.Oxy. 2185, 5; in 92); sometimes tax collectors (hoi prokechirismenoi praktores, P.Fay. 14, 1; from 124 BC); sometimes the geometer who draws up a certificate of measurement;⁹ sometimes a friend who designates his delegate: “For Castor . . . I Trypho, his fellow ephebe, whom he has appointed.”¹⁰

¹ The verb προχειρίζω is common in Galen, cf. W. K. Hobart, Medical Language, pp. 202–203.

² —Αποστέλλω or ε—ξαποστέλλω; cf. Exod 4:13 (the intermediary through whom God transmits his message, Hebrew shalah); 2Macc 3:7 (the king, having chosen Heliodorus, his prime minister, sent him); 8:9 (Ptolemy, having designated Nicanor, son of Patroclus, of the rank of the first friends, sent him without delay); 14:12 (Demetrius, having chosen Nicanor, sent him; cf. Josh 3:12; Polybius 3.40.2: “the Romans resolved to send”—πέμπειν); Diodorus Siculus 12.27.1.

³ In Dan 3:22 (LXX) it is talking about men who have “prepared” or delivered those condemned to the furnace and who were themselves burned by the flames.

⁴ Plutarch, Caes. 58.8; Plutarch, Galba 8.3; Polybius 1.11.3: “they chose one of the two consuls as the commander”; 2.43.1: “the cities electing in turn a secretary general and two generals”; in the second century BC, Pamphilos is the object of an honorific decree of Apollonia for having put the public finances in order, “the citizens chosen each year (τω—ν προχειριζομένων ἀνδρω—ν) directing each matter in accord with the decree such that there was no further loss” (I.Car. 167, 22); cf. P.Cair.Zen. 59042, 3; Dittenberger, Or. 339, 46: προχειρισαμένου τοὺς τὴν πίστιν εὐσεβω—ς τε καὶ δικαίως τηρήσοντας; cf. line 50. In the first century AD: the members of the association of Zeus Most High choose as their president Petesouchos, who is worthy of this position and the koinon (πρω—τον μὲν προχειρισάμενοι ε—π̄ ε—αυτω—ν ἡγούμενον Πετεσοῦχον Τεεφβέννιος, ἄνδρα λόγιον, τοῦ τόπου καὶ τω—ν ἀνδρω—ν ἄξιον, SB 7835, 5 = P.Lond. 2710; cf. C. Roberts, T. Skeat, A. D. Nock, “The Guild of Zeus Hypsistos,” in HTR, 1936, p. 40, 44); in AD 43, the members of an association voted unanimously to elect one of their members, an excellent person (προχειρίσαι τινὰ αὐτω—ν ἄνδρα ἀγαθώτατον), Cronion, son of Herodes, to be superintendent for one year (P.Mich. 244, 4); likewise, in 47, the salt merchants unanimously elect Apunchis, an excellent man, as inspector and collector of public taxes (ibid. 245, 4 = SB 8030). In the second century BC, it is mentioned that the persons appointed are competent to draw up contracts in accord with the law of the land: ἵνα ε—πιτήδειοι προχειρισεω—σιν καὶ συγκριθω—σι γράφειν τὰ συναλλάγματα ταῦτα (P.Ryl. 572, 30) οἱ πρεσβείαν . . . αὕτη προχειρίζεται τοὺς ε—πιτηδείους (PSI 1160, 12, first century AD).

⁵ Acts 3:20, καὶ ἀποστείλῃ τὸν προκεχειρισμένον ὑμι—ν χριστόν, —Ιησοῦν, which can also be translated, “Jesus, who has been constituted as Christ for you”; several miniscules read προκεκηρυγμένον, “who was preached ahead of time”; Vulgate “qui praedicatus est.”

⁶ P.Ryl. 586, 8: τω—ν προχειρισθησομένω τοῦ κοινοῦ; cf. line 14, 23; Dittenberger, Syl. 601, 5; 873, 14: διὰ τὸν ἄρχοντα . . . ὃν προχειρίσασθε; PSI 1236, 2: “to Flavius, Marion, Discoros, and Apion, προχειρισθει—σι ὑπὸ Κλαυδίου . . . ε—πιστρατήγου”; P.Lond. 376, 5 (vol. 2, p. 77); P.Oxy. 2117, 2: “To their very dear friend . . . of the city of Oxyrhynchus, appointed by (προχειρισθέντι ὑπὸ) his excellency Claudius the epistrategos”; 2118, 5; Pap.Lugd.Bat. VI, 18, 4: “Maron . . . keeper of the archives at Hericlides, also called Valerius, was appointed by Apollonides, strategos of the district of Polemon” (προχειρισθέντι ὑπὸ —Απολλωνίδου στρατηγοῦ) to be inspector of the Oxyrhynchite nome” (117–118); P.Princ. 127, 2: “To Zoilus, Trypho, and their associates, appointed to receive and transmit this statement” (προχειρισθει—σι πρὸς παράλημψιν καὶ κατακομιδὴν βιβλίων πεμπομένων εἰ—ς —Αλεξάνδρειαν, 159/160); P.Mil.Vogl. 254, 7: “the following have been designated for the banquet, and today they have received this nomination” (προεχειρίσθησαν ἐπὶ τῆς ἐστίας, καὶ σήμερον ἐπεστάλησαν οἱ ὑπογεγραμμένοι, with the names following); P.Ryl. 572, 63: τὰ ὀνόματα τῶν προξειρισθησομένων κατὰ τὸν νόμον ὑπόταξον; BGU 1821, 14 (51/50 BC); P.Berl.Zill. 2, 22; SB 6794, 3; 7173, 9.

⁷ P.Fouad 35, 16: σὺν ἑόνι τῶν προκεχειρισμένων ὑπὸ τῶν μετόχων ἀγορανόμων κεχηρημάτισθαι; P.Oxy. 320, 25, in AD 59 (cf. M. V. Biscottini, “L’Archivio di Tryphon tessitore de Oxyrhynchos,” in Aeg. 1966, p. 266).

⁸ P.Fouad 18, 11: τοῖς προκεχειρισμένοις τὴν τοῦ νομοῦ κατασποράν; cf. P.Rein. 94, 13, a similar declaration under oath of two delegates of the “hierotektones of the temple of Thooris, of Isis, of Sarapis, and of the very great theoi paredroi, designated by their fellow hierotektones” (serving in a collegial association, προκεχειρισμένων ὑπὸ τῶν συνίεροτεκτόνων); BGU 1198, 2: παρὰ Σωτηρίχου τοῦ Νούχιος ἰερέως προκεχειρισμένου δὲ καὶ ὑπὸ τῶν συνιερέων Ἀρυώτου.

⁹ UPZ 117, col. I, 10: Ἐγραψεν Ἀσκληπιάδης ὁ προκεχειρισμένος πρὸς τῆ γεωμετρία ὑπὸ Σαραπίωνος; repeated col. II, 4–5 (second century BC); cf. 126, 7.

¹⁰ SB 8403, 7 = Dittenberger, Or. 188, 7: Τρύφων ὁ συνέφηβος καὶ προκεχειρισμένος ὑπὸ αὐτοῦ (July 5, 89); cf. P.Corn. 16, 21: Ἐρμαίῳ προκεχειρισμένῳ παρὰ Πλουτίωνος; P.Oxf. 8, 1 (in 104/105, with the note of the editor, E. P. Wegener). In Polybius 3.40.14, the nuance of authority is clear: “the Romans sent to his aid armies that had been destined for Scipio” (τὰ τῶν προκεχειρισμένα στρατόπεδα; cf. προχειροτονεῖν, Acts 10:41).

πρωτότοκος

prototokos, firstborn

prototokos, S 4416; TDNT 6.871–881; EDNT 3.189–191; NIDNTT 1.667–669; MM 557; L&N 10.43, 13.79, 87.47; BDF §120(1); BAGD 726–727

Only five occurrences of this term can be cited from the papyri, and all of them are from the fourth century. One is in a certificate of adoption (huion gnesion kai prototokon, P.Lips. 28, 15); the others are in magical papyri, with respect to animals (P.Oslo 1, 312: “taking the umbilical cord of a firstborn ram”; Pap.Graec.Mag. 4, 1092, 1101, 3150). It is rare in the inscriptions,¹ and the literary texts that attest it are Jewish- or Christian-inspired.²

So this is in effect a biblical term, used 130 times in the LXX,³ usually in the proper literal of the word, firstfruits of a (human or animal) mother's womb. There are religious connotations, because the firstborn is consecrated to Yahweh;⁴ a qualitative connotation, because it is the "firstborn of the father's vigor" (Gen 49:3; Num 1:20; Ps 78:51), it is the best or the most excellent (Ezek 44:30; cf. Philo, Prelim. Stud. 98); an affective connotation, because it is the best-loved;⁵ an honorific connotation, since the firstborn, through the birthright, shares in the father's authority and is given much property.⁶

All of these nuances appear in figurative uses of the term, for example, when God says to Moses, "Israel is my firstborn" (Exod 4:22), and Luke probably had them in mind when he wrote concerning Mary, "She gave birth to her firstborn" (eteken ton huion autēs ton prototokon, Luke 2:7). He chose this word because of these connotations, and perhaps also to signal that this Davidic firstborn might be a claimant to messiahship.⁷ There is some surface ambiguity, because "firstborn" can be a reference to later offspring;⁸ but on the one hand, the title prototokos was given immediately after birth (Exod 13:2; 34:19; Philo, Cherub. 54); and on the other hand, the literature⁹ and the inscriptions attest that a "firstborn" can be an only child. At Leontopolis in Lower Egypt, the epitaph of a Jewish woman of Arsinoe in 5 BC mentions that she died bringing her firstborn into the world; obviously this child could have had no younger brothers: "Fate, through my labor pains with my firstborn child, brought me to the end of my life."¹⁰

Apart from Heb 11:28 (cf. Ps 78:51), the other occurrences of prototokos in the NT are figurative, all expressive of honor, dignity, or preeminence,¹¹ especially with respect to Christ, the "firstborn of all creation" (prototokos pases ktiseōs, Col 1:15), who has a primacy of excellence in the order of creation¹² that could be described as cosmic. He is also the firstborn with respect to the dead (prototokos ek ton nekron, Col 1:18) and thus has primacy in the order of resurrection, not simply because he was the first to come forth from the grave, but because he came forth as the all-powerful sovereign, the prince of a new humanity (Rev 1:5, ho archon); finally, Christ is honored with a primacy in the eschatological order, because in glory he will be "firstborn among many brethren" (prototokos en pollois adelphois, Rom 8:29); as the first one resurrected, he will be the source of all other glorifications,¹³ and "his brothers" will worship him in love.

A single NT text refers to creatures as firstborn in a figurative sense: Heb 12:23, "the assembly of the firstborn" (ekklesia prototokon), which exegetes take to mean either the patriarchs, or Christians who have already died, or the first converts and martyrs, or all the members of the church militant, or the angels in heaven. In all cases, prototokos is a title of honor, suggesting the privileges discussed above.¹⁴

¹ At Myconos, around 200 BC, in a religious calendar, for a pregnant sow that is giving birth for the first time: υ—ν ε—κύμονα πρωτοτόκον (Dittenberger, Syl. 1024, 16). A. Deissmann (Light, pp. 91–92) mentions two epitaphs, one from Trachonitis, where a pagan priest owes his office to his birthright, ι—ερεὺς γάρ ει—μι πρωτοτόκων ε—κτελετω—ν; the other is Roman: a firstborn who died at the age of two years (πρωτότοκον, διετέξ) is called son of the sun (ἡλιόπαις) because he was born on a Sunday.

² Philo, Spec. Laws 1.138–139: the firstborn males; Josephus, Ant. 1.54; 2.313; 4.71; 5.31 (contrasting τοῦ πρώτου παιδός to τὸν νεώτατον τω—ν παίδων); 1QH 3.8: “Like a woman in travail with her firstborn child . . .”; Sib. Or. 3.627: firstborn lambs and goats that are sacrificed; Jos. Asen. 1.11: “the firstborn son of Pharaoh,” cf. 4.15; 23.1; 25.4; 29.9; Anth. Pal. 8.34: “It is not a vain sacrifice . . . of the firstborn that Nonna has offered to God”; 9.213: two children, the elder and the younger.

³ It translates the Hebrew bejôl/bejîrâh, except in Gen 25:25 (ri’shôn); Exod 34:20 (petet); cf. H. Cazelles, “Premiers-nés dans l’Ancien Testament,” in DBSup, vol. 8, 482–491.

⁴ Exod 13:2, 15; 22:19; Lev 27:26; Num 3:13; 8:17; Deut 15:19; Neh 10:37; cf. S. Daniel, Philon: De Specialibus Legibus, Paris, 1975, pp. 222–223.

⁵ 2Sam 13:21—“David loved Amnon as his firstborn son”; 1Chr 3:1; cf. Josh 6:26; 1Kgs 16:34; Jer 31:9; Mic 6:7; Zech 12:10; Pss. Sol. 13.8; Heliodorus, Aeth. 4.8.6: “a mother whose beloved son has cost her many pains” (ὁ μοῦ πρωτοτόκος καὶ πολύθρηνος γενομένη).

⁶ 2Kgs 3:27—“The king of Moab took his eldest son, the one who was to reign in his place”; 1Chr 5:1–2; 2Chr 21:3—“He had given the reign to Joram, because he was the eldest”; Ps 89:28—“I will make him the highest firstborn of the kings of the earth, and my favor will rest on him forever, and my covenant will be faithful to him”; Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 118, 119, 126.

⁷ Cf. H. Schürmann, Lukasevangelium, p. 104.

⁸ M. J. Lagrange (Luc), cites Lucian, Demon. 29: ει— μὲν πρω—τος οὐ μόνος, ει— δὲ μόνος οὐ πρω—τος; cf. A. Feuillet, “Premier-nés dans le Nouveau Testament,” in DBSup, vol. 8, 491–512. On the “brothers” or cousins of Jesus, cf. J. McHugh, The Mother of Jesus in the New Testament, London, 1975, pp. 200–254, 451–452.

⁹ Pss. Sol. 18.4—“Your correction comes upon us as upon a firstborn, only son” (ὡς υἱ—ὄν πρωτότοκον, μονογενῆ); 4 Ezra 6:58—“We, your people, whom you have honored and whom you have called firstborn and unique, dear and well-beloved.”

¹⁰ —Ωδει—νι δὲ Μοι—ρα πρωτοτόκου με τέκνου πρὸς τέλος ἡγε βίου, CII 1510, 6 = C.Pap.Jud., vol. 3, n. 1510 = SEG I, 570, = SB 6647 = GVI, n. 643; cf. J. B. Frey, “La signification du terme πρωτότοκος d’après une inscription juive,” in Bib, 1930, pp. 373–390.

¹¹ In this sense of the word, Joseph is called “the firstborn of God” (Jos. Asen. 21.3). Cf. A. Durand, “Le Christ Premier-Né,” in RSR, 1910, pp. 56–66; E. A. Cerny, “Firstborn of Every Creature (Col I, 15),” Baltimore, 1938; T. W. Buckley, The Phrase ‘Firstborn of Every Creature’ (Col I, 15) in the Light of Its Jewish and Hellenistic Background, Rome, 1961, H. J. Gabathuler, Jesus Christus, Haupt der Kirche—Haupt der Welt: Der Christushymnus Kolosser I, 15–20, Zurich-Stuttgart, 1965; A. Feuillet, Christologie paulinienne et tradition biblique, Paris, 1973, pp. 48, 170, 230.

¹² Heb 1:6—“When he brought forth his firstborn into the universe, he said, ‘Let all the angels of God worship him’”; cf. A. Vanhoye, “L’οι—κουμένη dans l’Epître aux Hébreux,” in Bib, 1964, pp. 248–253; W. Michaelis, “Die biblische Vorstellung von Christus als dem Erstgeborenen,” in ZST, 1954, pp. 137–157; idem, in TDNT, vol. 6, pp. 871–881.

¹³ Cf. B. Rey, “Créés dans le Christ Jésus: La Création nouvelle selon S. Paul,” Paris, 1966, pp. 177ff.

¹⁴ Cf. Sir 36:11—“Have pity, O Lord, on the people called by your name, and on Israel whom you have made like a firstborn” (πτωρογόνω, which a corrector of Sinaiticus read as πρωτοτόκω); L. R. Helyer, “The Prototokos Title in Hebrews,” in Studia Biblica et Theologica, vol. 6, 1976, pp. 3–28.

πύργος

pyrgos, tower, watchtower, fortress, palace, house, apartment

pyrgos, S 4444; TDNT 6.953–956; EDNT 3.300; MM 560; L&N 7.23; BAGD 730

This term refers to quite diverse structures, from a simple house in a town or a roof apartment¹ to a palace, like that at Malatha in Idumea, to which Agrippa retired (Josephus, Ant. 18.147), or the luxurious dwelling of Aseneth (Jos. Asen. 2.1–2; 14.5), a watchtower, a defensive tower jutting out over the walls,² especially one that dominates a city gate. There are also “towers set up before a port to break the threatening waves and guarantee a safe refuge for those who enter” (4Macc 13:6), not to mention the “wooden towers” that were strapped onto elephants (1Macc 6:37; cf. the pyrgomachountes who do battle in these towers, Polybius 5.84.2) or the towers with ladders that attackers threw against fortifications in order to be on the same level as the defenders (Philo, Spec. Laws 4.229; Josephus, War 5.292; Polybius 5.99.5: towers spaced at intervals of one hundred feet and provided with guard-doors). Metaphorically, a tower, because of its height and strength, can suggest the elaboration of a coherent and bold intellectual system (“the tower of atheism”)³ or, because of its very elaborate perfection, aesthetic splendor.⁴

The most famous tower in the Bible and in all of human history is the tower of Babel, “whose top is in the heavens” (Gen 11:4, 5, 8), a ziggurat, amply commented on by Philo, who saw it as the “sign of an extraordinary madness.”⁵ But the tower most often referred to in the OT is the walled fortress;⁶ these massive towers make it possible to get at attackers from the side and catch them in crossfire. They are usually for the defense of a port or a city. Sometimes pyrgos refers to a donjon (Isa—0:25; T. Jud. 5.5), sometimes the whole fortified city (Judg 8:9; Philo, Conf. Tongues 128, 130), sometimes to small forts scattered through the countryside (1Macc 16:10; 2Macc 10:36). The towers of the wall around Jerusalem were especially numerous and famous,⁷ and they had names.⁸ Thus according to Luke 13:4, the “Tower of Siloam” fell on eighteen people, killing them. It can perhaps be identified with the first foundations found of a tower built along the canal of Siloam.⁹ In any event, we may compare Josephus, War 5.292: Titus ordered the building of three towers fifty feet tall to be erected on each embankment, so that the defenders of the ramparts might thus be put to flight. In the middle of the night, one of these accidentally fell. Josephus relates the melee that followed and the panic that spread, even though no one died.

Another sort of pyrgos is the watchtower in the countryside (2Chr 26:10, 15; 27:4; cf. Judg 7:5), where a sentinel was posted (2Kgs 9:17; 17:9; 18:8) to watch for marauders, jackals, and the occasional fox that attacked fruits, crops, or flocks (watchmen are remunerated, cf. P.Oxy. 2024, 8 and 22: “for the tower guards, seven artabai, ” ton phyllatton ton pyrgon art. ζ?; 2197, 131). Such a tower is often conical and stands about three meters high. They could be used for storing provisions (1Chr 27:25). In Isa 5:2, the tower is presented as the complement of a fence or hedge around a vineyard; this wording is taken up in the parable of the Vineyard and the Tenants (Matt 21:33; Mark 12:1).¹⁰

But there is also the man who wants to build a tower and must first sit down and “count the cost” (Luke 14:28). This is not an inexpensive vineyard tower built with dry stone, but a grandiose palace. One recalls that Herod was above all a great builder of towers. Notably, he built Hippicus, a square tower thirty cubits high; “above, a reservoir held rainwater, and above this was a two-story dwelling, twenty-five cubits high . . . the total height was eighty cubits” (Josephus, War 5.163–166). The height of the tower called Phasaël was ninety cubits (ibid. 5.169). The tower called Mariamme was only fifty-five cubits high,¹¹ but its apartments were more luxurious and ornate than those of the other towers.¹²

These texts show that pyrgos is a quite variable form in ancient architecture, not only because it may be square or cylindrical, but because it may be a defensive tower, a watchtower, or a dwelling (either a simple house or one part of an important residence)¹³—in the papyri, usually the main building of a farm.¹⁴ In the papyri, pyrgos appears in contracts for rentals, sales, mortgages, and marriage, in cadastres, even in complaints to the strategos or a police chief.¹⁵ P.Tebt. 779, 13: “By night he built a wall against our tower” (175 BC); P.Ryl. 138, 20 (AD 34): under the cover of darkness, a certain Orsenouphis broke into an estate belonging to the imperial family and stole from the tower five rakes, five hay sickles, fifteen measures of wool, and two hundred drachmas of silver.{NOTEEND} But while in the Bible tower often has religious value, referring to the strength and certainty of divine protection, it has only a secular meaning in the papyri.

In the inscriptions—which often mention or commemorate the building of a tower, whether as a military edifice,¹⁶ a rural estate,¹⁷ or an urban monument¹⁸—we note that the Olythian proxenos Heracleodoros dedicated “the tower and the hall and the statue to all the gods” (theois pasin ton pyrgon kai ten exedran kai ton andrianta, I.Thas. 376, 2). But the Christian inscriptions follow the biblical tradition of using tower not only as a safe refuge but as a sign of his protection and a pledge of his watchful care: “Lord, keep this tower and those who dwell in it” (IGLS 328); God through his providence has righted “a tower bent by time and the shaking of the earth” (ibid. 785, 4); “the construction of the tower (of the wall) is, with the help of God, the work of the Macedonian quarter” (ibid. 2828, at Baalbeck; cf. 478, 1). Hence the name “Tower of the Lord”¹⁹ and its religious meaning: “Christ Jesus, be for us a Protector-God, a house of refuge, and a mighty tower in the presence of the enemy” (ibid. 1811; cf. 1814); “In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, by the intercession of St. Mary, Mother of God and Virgin forever, and of the glorious archangels and chief apostles, this tower was built” (ibid. 1913).

² Herodotus 2.95: the Egyptians climb up to sleep in towers, where the mosquitos cannot reach them; Xenophon, An. 4.4.2: in Armenia, “most dwellings had towers”; P.Giss. 67, 16: “a bedroom on the tower” (time of Trajan and Hadrian). Cf. Judg 9:46-47: “all the leading people of the Tower of Shechem assembled”; 9:49, 51, 52; m. B. Bat. 1.1; b. B. Bat. 5b ; 1 Enoch 89.50—“A large, high tower was built on the house (Jerusalem) for the Lord of the sheep”; cf. 89.56; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 14, 19, in his will per aes et libram a veteran leaves a third of his tower (τρίτον μέρος πύργου μου), i.e., his house, to two slaves (second century AD). Pliny the Younger describes his property in the Laurentine: “There is also another tower. In this tower, one chamber overlooks the sunrise and the sunset; below that, there is a vast storeroom and stockroom; on the ground floor there is a dining room . . . that overlooks the garden” (Pliny, Ep. ad Gallum 2.17.13); cf. P. Grimal, Les Jardins romains, Paris, 1943, pl. X fig. 1; E. Rizzo, Pittura ellenistico-romana, Milan, 1929, pl. 157 a.

³ Neh 3:25-26; Ps 121:7—πυργόβαρις. The northern face of the establishment at Qumran was dominated by a massive two-story tower, partly jutting out, built in the first century BC, which gives the present ruins the appearance of a fort.

⁴ Philo, Conf. Tongues 196; cf. 113, 115: “our madmen symbolically build the arguments for their vice, as if they were building a tower”; 133; the nuance is pejorative (ibid. 83, Dreams 2.284: building unwholesome doctrines to the height of a tower; T. Levi 2.3) and can indicate unreasonable exaltation, cf. Aristophanes, Pax 749; Ran. 1004; J. Taillardat, Images d’Aristophane, n. 750.

⁵ Such are the comparisons of Cant 4:4—“Your neck is like the tower of David, built for a trophy”; 7:4—“like an ivory tower”; 8:10—“my breasts were like towers,” meaning both developed and guarded. Cf. Tob 13:17—“Jerusalem will be rebuilt . . . its towers and walls made of pure gold.”

⁶ Philo, Conf. Tongues 5; cf. 1, 107, 134, 142, 155, 158; Post. Cain 53; Sib. Or. 11.10, 11.12. Cf. H. Gressmann, The Tower of Babel, New York, 1929; A. Busink, De Toren van Babel, Groningen, 1938; idem, De Babylonische Tempeltoren, Leiden, 1949; L. H. Vincent, “De la tour de Babel au temple,” in RB, 1946, pp. 403–440; A. Parrot, La Tour de Babel, Paris, 1953.

⁷ 2Chr 14:6—“Let us surround these cities with a wall, with towers, gates, and locks”; 37:5—“Hezekiah rebuilt the whole crumbling wall and raised towers upon it”; Jdt 7:32; Isa 2:15; Ezek 26:4, 9; 1Macc 5:5, 65—“Judas burned the towers of the wall of Hebron”; 13:33; 2Macc 10:18, 20, 22.

Diodorus Siculus mentions that the Thebans had a declaration read from atop a high tower (17.9.5) and that Alexander shook the towers and the “curtains” (τὰ μεσοπύργια) with a battering ram (17.25.5), knocking them down to the foundations (17.25.5), or building a wooden tower one hundred cubits high, full of catapults (17.26.6; 17.45.2) with combat stations (17.45.5). He even built towers on ships, allowing him to put up flying bridges and to reach enemy walls (17.32.7–8; cf. 17.71.4; 17.87.5).

⁸ 2Chr 26:9—“Uzziah build towers at Jerusalem, at the Corner Gate, at the Valley Gate, and at the Angle, and he fortified them”; 1Macc 1:33—“They rebuilt the City of David with a large, very strong wall and strong towers”; 4:60; Ps 48:13—“Count the towers of Zion; consider her ramparts.” Josephus, War 5.156: “The walls were dominated by towers that were twenty cubits broad and twenty cubits high; they were square and solid like the wall itself. In their joining and their beauty, the stones did not fall short of those of the temple. Above the imposing mass of the towers . . . were magnificent chambers, and above these, upper chambers and cisterns for collecting the rainwater. . . . The third wall had ninety of these towers. The middle was had forty towers, the old was had sixty. . . . The tower Psephinus, near which Titus camped, was seventy cubits high . . . and was octagonal in form.”

⁹ The Tower of Hananel (Neh 3:1; Jer 31:38; Zech 14:10); “You, tower of the flock (Hebrew migdal-‘eder, cf. Gen 35:21), Ophel, daughter of Zion” (Mic 4:8); the Tower of the Ovens (Neh 3:11; 12:38). Cf. at Caesarea the Tower of Strato (P.Cair.Zen. 59004, 2); in Spain the Turris Hannibalis (Pliny, HN 2.71, 73) and the Turris Augusti (Mela 3.18), etc.

¹⁰ Attackers seize towers by tearing them down (Judg 8:17), by burning (1Macc 5:65), by opening breaches in them (13:43), or by forcing the door (2Macc 14:41; P.Tebt. 47, 16; second century BC). A tower is rebuilt from its foundations (SB 1598,5).

¹¹ Cf. Str-B, vol. 1, pp. 868ff. M. Hubaut, La Parole des Vignerons homicides, Paris, 1976, pp. 21ff. Stud.Pal. XX, 218, 16; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 14, 19; P.Cair.Masp. I, 67097: a contract to sell a farm, including a field with vines and date palms, a wine-press or cistern, a well, a tower, and a μονή; III, 67313. In P.Fam.Tebt. 23, 7–8, a certain Didymus sells part of his field and a fourth of his πυργομαγδών, his guard-tower, in the vicinity of Tebtunis. The magdolon (line 8) is the building where the watchman alerts the villagers who are busy in the fields to the presence of a marauder. These guard towers could be the property of a community that assesses a tax to pay the guards, the μαγδωφύλακες (cf. E. Kiessling, “Magdophylax,” in PW, vol. 14, 1, p. 300). In Africa, localities are called Turris for the defensive works that guarantee the protection of the region; cf. S. Lancel, Actes de la conférence de Carthage en 411, Paris, 1972, vol. 1, p. 137; vol. 2, p. 712, 33; 846, 35; 849, 3 = Turris Alba; 894, 184, = Turris Blanda; CIL VIII, 8209; 22774.

¹² Josephus, War 5.171. Cf. 2Macc 13.5—“At Berea there was a tower fifty cubits high”; Jdt 1:3—Arphaxad “built towers a hundred cubits high at the gate of the city” (Ecbatana); 1:14. In a dream, the sleeper finds himself in Alexandria atop a high tower (με εἶναι ἐ—πάνω πύργου μεγάλου, UPZ 78, 29; second century BC; cf. 146, 27). The πυργίον of P.Tebt. 780, 11 is only ten cubits high (= twenty feet). Cf. the two-story tower (πύργος δίστεγος), which seems to be the most common variety (P.Oxy. 243,15; cf. π. διώρυφος, SB 9556, III, 9). But four- or five-story buildings in the form of a tower were not rare; cf. R. Martin, L’Urbanisme dans la Grèce antique, Paris, 1956, pp.232ff.

¹³ On friezes and architectural fittings, cf. R. Martin, L’Urbanisme dans la Grèce antique, pp. 202ff.

¹⁴ P.Oxy. 243, 15, 17, 38; 248, 29, from AD 80: a rural estate (ἔπαυλις) includes two courtyards, a tower, a dovecote, and commons (πύργος καὶ περιστερεῶν καὶ ἀύλαϊ καὶ ἕτερα χρηστήρια). The importance of a dwelling can be summed up in the number of its towers: ἐ—ν τοι—ς πύργοις (BGU 740, 5); cf. οἰ—κία διπυργία (P.Gen. 44, 12; BGU 2339, 9; P.Hamb. 14, 9; CPR I, 28, 10; P.Lond. 348, 12; vol. 2, p. 215; 1179, 32, 60; vol. 2, pp. 145–146; P.Oxy. 247, 23: τρίτον μέρος οἰ—κίας διπυργίας, ἐ—ν ἡ— κατὰ μέσον αἶθριον, from AD 90. PSI 1112, 21; 1159, 20; P.Ross.Georg. II, 18, 360); cf. the purchase of the second story of the third pyrgos (P.Stras. 110; third century BC), τετραπυργία, Plutarch, Eum. 8.9: Eumenes gives his men the farms and homes in the country (τάς κατὰ τὴν χώραν ἐ—παύλεις καὶ τετραπυργίας; Polybius 31.26.11; Strabo 17.838.)

¹⁵ F. Preisigke (“Die Begriffe πύργος und στέγη bei der Hausanlage,” in Hermes, 1919, pp. 423–432) sees pyrgos only as “commons,” the farm buildings that shelter the workshops and the threshing floors (cf. P.Mil.Vogl. 251, 15; BGU 2033, 12; P.Lond. 371, 3, vol. 2, p. 244: πύργος ἐ—ν ᾧ βαφει—ον καὶ ἕτερα χρηστήρια: a dyer’s workshop on the ground floor), whether or not these buildings were in the form of a tower. It is true that the vast majority of papyrological documents refer to farms (P.Mich. 226, 21: θησαυρὸν ἐ—νεργὸν ἐ—ν ᾧ πύργος, from AD 37) and country houses: περὶ τοῦ παλαιοῦ πύργου τῆς οἰ—κίας (P.Mich. 212, 17; from the second century. 666, 8: μονῆς καὶ πύργου καὶ ἐ—παύλεως; ZPE, vol. 13, 1974, n. 7–8; P.Vindob.Tandem, n. XXVIII, 10). But on the one hand the texts do not say if the tower is incorporated in the building (nevertheless, the pyrgos of BGU 1273, 15 is at the corner of two streets; cf. the corner tower, πύργος ε—πιγώνιος, V. Martin, “Relevé topographique des immeubles d’une métropole: P. Gen. inv. 108,” in RechPap, vol. 2, 1962, p. 51 = q II, 5–6; cf. p. 40 = All, 32; again in SB 9902); on the other hand, sometimes the tower is distinct from the “outbuildings” (P.Lond. 216, 10, vol. 2, p. 186; BGU 650, 8: πύργος καὶ ἕτερα; SB 10696, 4: τὸν πύργον καὶ τὰ συνκύροντα), sometimes it is said to be inhabited (P.Tebt. 47; BGU 1273, 12), sometimes it is mentioned separately from the μονή, the small building where the farm workers live (σὺν λάκκο ὀλοκλήρο καὶ μονῆς καὶ πύργο, P.Michael. 60, 4; cf. 40, 66; 42 A 17; B 11; 46, 10; P.Lond. 1695, 8). Furthermore, on the basis of iconographic monuments (frescos, mosaics, etc.), P. Grimal (“Les Maisons à tour hellénistiques et romaines,” in Mélanges d’archéologie et d’histoire, Paris, 1939, pp. 28–59) and Maria Nowicka (La Maison privée dans l’Égypte ptolémaïque, Warsaw, 1969, pp. 131ff; idem, “A propos des tours-πύργοι dans les papyrus grecs,” in Archeologia [WarsawÓ, vol. 21, 1970, pp. 53–61) have shown that the tower constituted a well-defined architectural type for both dwellings and working buildings.

¹⁶ J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1944, p. 217, n. 130 a; 1955, p. 277, n. 250; ὁ βοῦργος = small stronghold (M. Schwabe, “The βοῦργος Inscription from Caesarea Palaestinae,” in J. N. Epstein Jubilee Volume, Jerusalem, 1950, pp. 273–283; B. Lifshitz, “Inscriptions grecques de Césarée en Palestine,” in RB 1961, p. 123, n. 16). Some say that the Latin burgus = turris was borrowed from the Greek πύργος (cf. M. Labrousse, “Les Burgarii et le cursus publicus,” in Mélanges d’archéologie et d’histoire, Paris, 1939, pp. 151–167; S. Appelbaum, “Economic Life in Palestine,” in S. Safrai, M. Stern, The Jewish People in the First Century, Assen-Amsterdam, 1976, vol. 2, p. 644, n. 4; συντηρεία βουργαρίων, Dittenberger, Syl. 880, 54); but the origin is probably Germanic (burg), and the Latin burgus also entered into Hebrew, cf. L. Robert, Noms indigènes, p. 14.

¹⁷ J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1950, p. 183, n. 173; IGLAM, n. 425, 8: καὶ ἄλλον οἶκον πρὸς τω— πύργῳ. A rural estate is described, with its farm (αὐλή), dwellings (οι—κίαι), and tower (πύργος), cf. I.Sinur., p. 86, n. 51, 11.

¹⁸ I.Bulg., n. 12, 3 ([μονο]πύργον); 57, 8: τὴν σχοινίαν τὴν μεταξὺ τω—ν δύο πύργων οι—κοδομήσας καὶ στεγάσας (first century), 1730; MAMA VI, 2: dedication for a monumental gate of the city of Laodicea: τοὺς πύργους καὶ τὸ τρίπυλον; IGLS, 1610: “This tower (traveler’s quarters) was built in the year 837, in the month of Panemos”; 2507: “Under the very venerable and very holy . . . bishop, this tower was built”; cf. I.Did., p. 53 b: τῆς

οι—κοδομίας τοῦ πύργου (?); P.Oxy. 2624, frag. 28 e: οὐ πόλισμα, οὐ πύργος, οὐ δόμος ε—ύκτιτος (?).

¹⁹ IGLS 2628; cf. 1630: “To protect his country with wisdom, John, abundant in good counsel and spending money unstintingly, presents this tower to his friends as a refuge, through the zeal of Paul the deacon”; 1726: “I Thomas, apostolic visitor by the grace of God, having made a vow and a request to God for the expiation of my sins, for the glory of his name, have raised this tower”; 1768: “the tower was raised, with God, for the salvation and health of the brethren and the servants.” A. J. Festugière, Etudes d'histoire, pp. 212–223. Cf. 3Apoc. Bar. 2.7—τὸν πύργον τῆς θεομαχίας; 3.6; Ps.-Philo, Bib. Antiq. 32.15: “The knowledge of the Lord is there, which builds a tower in you” (turrificat, πυργοποιει—); 32.1: Israel is the tower built by God, as he drew Eve from Adam and Adam from the earth; SB 11240, 7: ε—τοίμος ἔχω οι—κοδομήσαι νέον πύργον. We note that in the Latin inscriptions, from the first century, burgus (originally meaning “a tower”) was the transliteration for πύργος; then βούργος came to refer to a “small stronghold” (Procopius, Aed. 4.6.36; cf. 4.6.21). Cf. B. Lifshitz, “Césarée de Palestine,” in ANRW, Prinzipat, vol. 8, pp. 512ff.

ῥαδιουργία

rhadiourgia, ability, unconcern, unscrupulousness, scheming

rhadiourgia, S 4468; TDNT 6.972–973; EDNT 3.207; MM 562; L&N 88.301; BAGD 733

At Cyprus, St. Paul denounces the magus Elymas as being “full of all guile and all rhadiourgia.”¹ This term, which appears only in the Koine (literary and popular), is a biblical hapax and could be translated “scheming.” But its meaning is very broad. First, it means facility at doing something: “We did not speak to those who were too young concerning the things of love, lest with facility added to the violence of their passions they should give themselves over to it without hesitation” (Xenophon, Cyr. 1.6.34); thence easiness, unconcern, indolence,² then lack of conscience, unscrupulousness: “There are two ways of being struck. One corresponds to the case of the slave whose misdeeds have deserved the blows of the free man—who, having acted unconscionably (dia rhadiourgian), is stretched out on the wheel; the other is that of any inanimate object whatsoever.”³

The most common meaning is “deception, trickery.” In a case of fraud, Cato files suit.⁴ This dishonesty appears most often in financial matters: “The association of criminals and thieves (rhadiourgoi kai kleptai) usually founders in this fashion: through the lack of reciprocal justice and in a general way mutual breach of trust” (Polybius 4.29.4). This meaning, “swindling,” is almost the only meaning attested in the papyri. In 216 BC, a woman complains that her coat has been stolen and asks the strategos for punishment of the theft (peri de tes rhadiourgias, P.Magd. 35, 11; republished P.Enteux. 30). In 114, Marres, priest of Soknebtunis, is angry at the falsification of a figure in his contract. The synallagmatographos had written down a rent of thirty-six artabai instead of thirty. This was a swindle (topara touto rhadiourgemenas); “I have been treated in a flagrantly unjust manner” (edikemenos kath’ hyperbolen, P.Tebt. 42, 16). A defenseless (aboetheton) woman asks the oikonomos that she not be defrauded of the guarantee of her dowry “because of the rhadiourgia of the accused” (dia tou enkaloumenou rhadiourgian, P.Tebt. 776, 31; cf. BGU 226, 14). In the second century AD, the prefect of Egypt stipulates that in order to contest a debt a person will have to declare that the contract is a fake or that fraudulent or deceptive means were used.⁵

In Acts 13:10, it is not a question of money or even of some particular action, but a character trait, a dominant vice. Elymas is called a “son of the devil,” who is the father of lies (John 8:44). The association with dolos, “ruse, trick, fraud,” invites us to translate, “full of all trickery and mischief.”⁶

¹ Πλήρης παντὸς δόλου καὶ πάσης ῥαδιουργίας, Acts 13:10; cf. C. K. Barrett, “Light on the Holy Spirit from Simon Magus (Act. VIII, 4–25),” in J. Kremer, Les Actes des Apôtres, Gembloux-Louvain, 1979, p. 289.

² Xenophon, Cyr. 7.5.74: “If we were to adopt an easy existence (ῥαδιουργίαν) and the enjoyment of a lax life (ἡδυπάθειαν), we would soon disgust ourselves”; Xenophon, Mem. 2.1.20 = softness; Polybius 12.9.5: “The laws and customs of the Locrians of Italy do not correspond at all to the laxity of slaves (οὐ τῆ τω—ν οι—κετω—ν ῥαδιουργία) but to a colony of free men.”

³ Philo, Cherub. 80; cf. the adjective ῥαδιουργός, the unscrupulous man (Worse Attacks Better 165; Conf. Tongues 152), contrasted with πιστός (SB 7241, 15–16). The verb ῥαδιουργέω, “alter, distort”: “It is not easy to give credence to most of the historians of Alexander. They play with the facts” (Strabo 11.6.4); Plutarch, Mor. 2.829d.

⁴ Ῥαδιουργίας προὔθηκε κρίσιν, Plutarch, Cat. Min. 16; cf. Philo, Post. Cain 43: “a life of intrigue, of unscrupulous mischief, of trickery, mingled with passions and full of vices.” The Suda defines rhadiourgos: πλαστογράφος καὶ ὁ κακοῦργος ἀπλω—ς. Rhadiourgoi are swindlers (Philo, Dreams 2.148; cf. Sacr. Abel and Cain 32).

⁵ P.Oxy. 237, col. VIII, 15: εἴτε πλαστῶ—ν γραμμάτων ἢ ῥαδιουργίας ἢ περιγραφῆς ε—νκαλει—ν, cf. UPZ 162, col. VI, 3; P.Stras. 40, 30 (sixth century). The jurisdiction of the prefect of Egypt around 133–137 extends περὶ πλαστογραφίας καὶ ῥαδιουργίας (SB 10929, 10).

⁶ Eusebius denounces the “deceitful temptations” of the demon, πρὸς τὰς τοῦ δηλωθέντος κακοτέχνους ῥαδιουργίας.

ῥίπτω

rhipto, to throw, throw away, get rid of, lay out, scatter

rhipto, S 4496; TDNT 6.991–993; EDNT 3.212–213; MM 564; L&N 15.217, 16.10, 85.37; BDF §§ 13, 68, 101, 308; BAGD 736

This verb is used in the NT with the same meanings as in classical Greek and the LXX (Hebrew shalaj).

(a) “To throw.” For example, throwing a ship’s rigging and anchors into the sea.¹ It is better to be thrown into the sea—i.e., to die a cruel death—than to be a cause of stumbling.²

(b) “To throw away, rid oneself of.”³ The object may be things like money (Ezek 7:19), as when Judas, before going to hang himself, throws the pieces of silver in the temple (Matt 27:5); or persons, as with the demon who “having thrown the possessed person down in their midst came out of him, doing him no harm.”⁴ The nuance of abandonment and rejection is 14:9—“You have cast me behind your back”; Neh 9:26—“They have cast your law behind themselves”; Joel 1:7; Philo, Flacc. 37: cast off.

(c) “Unload, unburden oneself.” When this is done at the feet of someone of high station, there are connotations of veneration and confidence: the crowds cast their sick at Jesus’ feet (Matt 15:30), as Judah threw himself at Joseph’s feet to appease his anger (Josephus, Ant. 2.159), or as an old man threw himself to the ground and knelt before Dionysius (P.Oxy. 1089, 31; cf. T. Job 39.9). With respect to things, rhipto means “to leave” (on the spot, P.Ryl. 125, 25: “they left the box in my house empty”—eripsan en te oikia mou ten pyxida kenen) or “to replace,” for example, the lead weight on the opening of the ephah (Zech 5:8; cf. Judg 8:25).

(d) The LXX often uses the verb for throwing corpses into a field or into a tomb,⁵ especially the perfect passive participle errimmenos (Hebrew napal),⁶ which would be the equivalent of our “recumbent” or “laid out” (French gisant), as in Josephus, Ant. 6.362: “laid out on the ground” (epi ges errimmenous). The participle can also refer to beggars sleeping on the hard ground (Epictetus 3.26.6) and more generally to objects placed, arranged,⁷ or even scattered here and there (Enoch 21.3–4; BGU 1857, 9). This pejorative connotation is present in Matt 9:36—Jesus “took pity on them because they were weary and lying on the ground (hoti esan eskylmenoi kai errimmenoi), like sheep without a shepherd.” They were not only exhausted but also abandoned, without resources, scattered and dispersed;⁸ only a pastor could gather them together and assure their survival.

(e) It is more difficult to interpret Acts 22:23—in the temple court, the Jews, exasperated at Paul, “cried out, cast (their) cloaks (kai rhiptounton ta himatia) and threw dust in the air.”⁹ This is reminiscent of Job’s three friends, who “raised their voices and wept; each tore his cloak (rhexasantes hekastos ten heautou stolen) and poured dust on his head.”¹⁰ But rhipto does not mean “to rend, tear” (diarhesso); it would be better to translate “tear off, pull off” (Isa 33:12) remembering that the motive is anger or indignation, as when Moses threw down the tables of the law and broke them (Exod 32:19; Deut 9:17). As Plato says, “What a statement you have just made! In setting it forth, you should expect to see a great number of people, and people not to be taken lightly, hurriedly cast off their garments (hoion rhipsantas ta himatia) and strip, take up whatever weapons are ready to hand, and rush at you with all their might.”¹¹

This is a theatrical gesture,¹² one customarily used by lawyers;¹³ it has with good reason been compared to the Roman jactatio togarum.¹⁴ But we do not know exactly what the gesture was. In any event, rhipto should mean “agitate” rather than “throw,”¹⁵ which is confirmed by the medical vocabulary, in which rhipto is used for convulsions¹⁶ and by the examples cited by F. Field,¹⁷ following Wettstein.

¹ Acts 27:19—τὴν σκευὴν τοῦ πλοίου ἔριψαν (better attested than ε—ρίψαμεν, H, L, P, Harclean, Peshitta, Bohairic; the vague σκεῦος would be the usual term for a ship’s armament, cf. J. Vars, L’Art nautique dans l’antiquité, Paris, 1887, p. 61); Acts 27:29. Cf. cast into the sea, Xenophon, Cyn. 9.20; Achilles Tatius 2.11.5; 3.2.9: “the pilot ordered the cargo to be thrown [into the sea]” = T. Job 18.7; Exod 15:1, 4, 21; Neh 9:11; Exod 1:22 (in the Nile); Jer 51:63 (in the Euphrates); 2Kgs 2:21 (in the water); 2Kgs 2:21 (in the water); 2Chr 30:14 (in the Kidron); Philo, Alleg. Interp. 2.102; Drunkennes 111; Husbandry 82; Moses 2.249; cf. Good Man Free 115; same meaning as ἀπορίπτω (Acts 27:32).

² Luke 17:2; cf. Plutarch, Rom. 18.1: “the Tarpeian Rock, from which criminals were thrown”; Xenophon, Cyr. 3.1.25: “they anticipate death by throwing themselves into the void”; Menander, Dysk. 583: “Nothing is left for you but to throw yourself into the abyss”; Josephus, War 1.150: “They threw themselves over the precipices in large numbers”; Judg 9:53—“A woman threw a millstone onto the head of Abimelech and fractured his skull”; 11:21-22; P.Fouad 29, 9: “one of them cast a stone, and my son . . .

sustained a head injury”; P.Lips. 40, col. I, 17; T. Zeb. 2.7—μὴ ἀποκτείνωμεν αὐτὸν ἀλλὰ ρίψωμεν αὐτὸν εἰς ἓνα τῶν ξηρῶν λάκκων τούτων; cast into the fire (Exod 32:24; Jer 36:23; Ezek 5:4; 4Macc 12:20; 17:1). A stone devoted to Isis bears this dedication: “Thrown by his horses (ῥιφθεὶς ἐξ ἵππων) from his carriage, Isidorus, for being saved, as an act of thanksgiving for his feet, has dedicated the image of his foot to the blessed (Isis)” (SEG XX, 501 = SB 10161; L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 10, p.281).

³ Ῥίπτω is the technical verb for throwing away one’s weapons; Plato, Leg. 12.944b; Xenophon, Cyr. 4.2.33; Josephus, War 2.625; 1Macc 5:43; 7:44; 11:51; BGU 1024, col. III, 16; one sheds one’s clothing (2Kgs 7:15); P.Tebt. 48, 23: “throwing away his ἱμάτιον, he took flight”; P.Fouad 85, 13: “she promised either to bring him to an agreement or to have the case thrown out before the magistrate”; one rids oneself of all care (C.P.Herm. 10, 9; same meaning as ἐπιρίπτω, 1Pet 5:7; cf. Luke 19:35); cf. Josephus, Ant. 16.248.

⁴ Luke 4:35. Hagar, expecting her child to die, threw him under a bush (Gen 21:15); Joseph’s brothers threw him into a cistern (Gen 37:20); 2Sam 18:17; Jer 38:6; Dan 6:8, 13, 17, 24 (the lions’ den).

⁵ 2Kgs 9:25-26; 13:21; Tob 1:17; 2:3; Isa 14:19; Jer 22:19; 26:23; 41:9; 50:30; Ezek 19:12.

⁶ Judg 4:22; 15:15; 1Kgs 13:24-25, 28; Jer 14:16; 36:30; Ep Jer 71; Ps 88:6; Jdt 6:13; 14:15; 1Macc 11:4; Josephus, Ant. 6.191: the Philistines see Goliath lying on the ground, ἰδόντες ἐρριμμένον; Philo, Dreams 2.269; Joseph 25; leave unburied.

⁷ Josephus, Ant. 3.7; P.Lips. 40, col. II, 20; PSI 404, 8: ἔστι δὲ ὑπαίθριον τὸ στιππύον ἐρριμμένον ἐν τοῖς Παταικίωνος (third century BC); P.Cair.Zen. 59467, 5; P.Oxy. 1915, 17; cf. Epictetus 1.23.10; T. Abr. A 5: “God placed the thought of Abraham’s death in the heart of Isaac” = B 4.

⁸ 2Macc 3:29—“This man lay silent, without hope, with no one to help”; Josephus, War 4.324: the priests “were nude, exposed to sight (ἐρριμμένοι γυμνοί), to be devoured by dogs and wild beasts”; P.Paris 19, col. II, 3: καλωσ οὐμ ποιήσεις ἐπιτροφήν μου ποιησάμενος, ἔρριμαι γὰρ κακῶς διακείμενος ἅπ ἐκείνου (third century BC). Cf. Philo, To Gaius 326: cast off into the darkness.

⁹ Interpreters have suggested that the Jews “tore” their garments as a sign of mourning (but this is not the right verb for that), or that they “took them off” to prepare to stone Paul (which is not credible, given that they were in the sacred precincts). On the gesture of throwing one’s cloak (Luke 19:35), cf. the note of E. Delebecque, Evangile de Luc, p. 121.

¹⁰ Job 2:12 = T. Job 28.3; cf. Josephus, War 2.322: “the high priests could be seen covering their heads with dust, tearing their vestments, exposing their chests” (γυμνοὺς δὲ τὰ στέρνα τω—ν ε—σθήτων διερρηγμένων); 4.324; cf. E. Haenchen, Acts, p. 633, n. 1; Plutarch, Cic. 37.2: pulled in both directions (ῥιπταθείς).

¹¹ Plato, Resp. 5.474 a; cited by H. J. Cadbury (Excursus, “Dust and Garments,” in F. J. F. Jackson, K. Lake, The Beginnings of Christianity, London, 1933, vol. 5, pp. 269–277; H. J. Cadbury, The Book of Acts in History, London, 1955, pp. 38, 54), who sees these gestures as intended to ward off the curse that Paul’s attitude was expected to provoke.

¹² Heliodorus, Aeth. 6.8.3: Charicleia “was taken by fits of rage and despair, furiously undid her hair, tore her clothing (θοιμάτιον περιρρηξάμενη)” which she calls “the pantomime of our pain”; Plutarch, De superst. 3: Jewish women, ῥίψεις ε—πὶ πρόσωπον; cf. T. Abr. A 11: Adam, seeing the multitudes going to perdition, “grabbed his hair and his beard and threw himself at the foot of the throne, groaning and weeping.”

¹³ In the Acts of Isidorus (Recension B = P.Lond. inv. 2785, 37 = H. Musurillo, Pagan Martyrs, p. 22 = idem, Acta Alexandrinorum, Leipzig, 1961, p. 15) the lawyer makes a gesture with his hand and throws his cloak: ὁ ῥήτωρ τῆ δεξιά— . . . τὸ ι—μάτιον ἔρριψεν; cf. Dio Chrysostom 1.114; Gregory of Nazianzus, Or. Bas. 15, PG, vol. 36, 516: “they cry, they throw dust in the sky (οὐρανῶ— πέμπουσι κόνιν), they beat the air.”

¹⁴ Ovid, Am. 3.7.74: “Revocate, Quirites, et date jactatis undique signa togis.”

¹⁵ Cf. Wis 18:18—“thrown down half dead, one here, one there”; Xenophon, Cyn. 9.20: the deer throw themselves into the sea or a body of water “with disorderly leaps.”

¹⁶ W. K. Hobart, Medical Language, p. 2.

¹⁷ F. Field, Notes on the Translation, p. 136; cf. Aristaenetus, Ep. 1.26 (admiration for a dancer): ὁ δὲ δῆμος ἀνέστηκέ τε ὀρθὸς ἀπὸ θεύματος . . . καὶ τῶ— χει—ρε κινεῖ— καὶ τὴν ε—σθήτα σοβει—; Lucian, Salt. 83 (hamming up the role of Ajax μαινόμενος): ἀλλὰ τό γε θέατρον ἅπαν συνεμεμήνει τῶ— Αἴαντι, καὶ ε—πήδων, καὶ ε—βόων, καὶ τὰς ε—σθήτας ἀπερρίπτουν. Cf. the texts of Anacreon, Melanippides, Timotheus, and the adespota, cited by D. L. Page, Poetae Melici Graeci, Oxford, 1962, n. 382 b; 501, 8; 758; 791, 165; 939, 19; 1037, 14; idem, Supplementum Lyricis Graecis, Oxford, 1974, n.477,11.

ῥυπαρία, ῥυπαρός, ῥύπος

rhyparia, dirtiness, filth; rhyparos, dirty, filthy; rhypos, dirtiness, filth

rhyparia, S 4507; EDNT 3.215; NIDNTT 1.479; MM 565; L&N 88.256; BAGD 738 | rhyparos, S 4508; EDNT 3.215; NIDNTT 1.479; MM 565; L&N 79.52, 88.257; BAGD 738 | rhypos, S 4509; EDNT 3.215; NIDNTT 1.479; MM 565; L&N 79.55; BDF §51(2); BAGD 738

The nouns mean “dirtiness, filth” (Plutarch, De vit. pud. 2: nurses scrub the dirt from small children; Phoc. 18.4: “a poor old man, dressed in a dirty cloak”; Plutarch, De sera 26) and the adjective “dirty.” They are used for impure metals (Dioscorides 5.74; cf. 1.56), for base and trivial remarks: “In describing the sublime, one must not stoop to dirty and disgusting details” (eis ta rhypara kai exybrismena, Ps.-Longinus, Subl. 43.5; T. Jud. 14.3, en dialogismois rhyparois). In the papyri, rhyparos refers to grain that has not been winnowed or purified,¹ and especially to debased coinage.²

In the Bible, the term “dirty clothes” (as opposed to festal clothes) appears in Zech 3:3-4 and again in Jas 2:2, contrasting the man with luxurious clothing and the poor man in a worn and dirty garment, just as when Pharaoh orders “that the prisoner be given splendid clothing instead of the filthy garment that he has.”³ Stains or dirt are washed away; 1Pet 3:21 points out that the purpose of baptism is not to get rid of bodily dirt.⁴

In classical Greek, moral stains are filth,⁵ and it is not surprising that Jas 1:21 gives rhyparia this figurative meaning of a stain that one washes away in order to be clean (katharos, John 13:10); similarly Teles and Plutarch use this term for sordid greed.⁶ The transition from the literal to the moral meaning of rhypos was clear in the LXX (“Who will draw the pure from the unclean? No one”)⁷ and common in literary texts: “Making your soul pure (katharen psychen) and washing away that which soils it”;⁸ “These meditations (on the stars) purify stains here below” (Marcus Aurelius 7.47).

¹ P.Fay. 16, 10 (first century BC); P.Tebt. 1057, 5; P.Ryl. 715, 3 and 8; C.P.Herm. 77, 3; P.Oxy. 1906, 1; 1910, 17; 1947, 2; P.NYU 11, 200; cf. P.Athen. 50, verso 4 and 14, ῥυπαροῦ μετρηταί; O.Bodl. 397, ὑπὸ δώματος ῥυπαροῦ. In P.Oxy. 234, col. II, 18, ῥυπω—δες = discolored. Cf. ῥυπαρω—ς, [to act] in a dirty way (Epictetus 2.9.4).

² P.Tebt. 238, 6: twelve devalued silver drachmas (AD 23); P.Fay. 52, a 3; P.Ryl. 194, 3; Pap.Lugd.Bat. VI, 39, 4; P.Mich. 224 (3045); 225 (526); 372, col. II, 9; P.Rein. 134–137; BGU 1613 B, col. II, 20 (AD 69/70); 1898, 166; P.Mert. 64, 5, 9 (with the editors' note, p. 47); etc. Cf. V. B. Schuman, in Aeg. vol. 32, 1952, p. 249; idem, "The Income of the Office of the ΠΡΑΚΤΟΡΕΣ ΑΡΓΥΡΙΚΩΝ of Karanis," in BASP, vol. 12, 1975, pp. 34ff. Cf. the bath tax in P.Cair.Mich. 359 (P.Cair.Mich., pp. 25ff., 33).

³ Philo, Joseph 105: καὶ ἀντὶ ῥυπω—σης λαμπτὰν ε—σθῆτα ἀντιδόντες; Aproc. Pet. 21, 30: ἄνδρες ῥάκη ῥυπαρὰ ε—νδεδύμενοι (in lieu of punishment); Josephus, Ant. 7.267: Memphibostos, ῥυπαράν τε τὴν ε—σθῆτα περικείμενος; Sib. Or. 5.188; Dio Cassius 65.20: "Vitellius put on a sorry-looking tunic, dirty and torn"; Artemidorus Daldianus, Onir. 2.3; BGU 1564, 10: ε—φ ᾧ ποιήσουσι τὸν ἰ—ματισμὸν ἔκ τε καλῆς καὶ λευκοτάτης ε—ρεα—ς χωρὶς παντὸς ῥύπου (second century); P.Giss. 76, 3: τρίγωνας ῥυπαρὰς β? καὶ στολὴν ὁμοίως λευκὴν; a law of Gambreion regarding mourning apparel, ἔχειν φαιὰν ε—σθῆτα, μὴ κατερρυπωμένην (Dittenberger, Syl. 1219, 6; third century BC). Job 9:31 links refuse (ῥύπος) and clothing.

⁴ 1Pet 3:21—οὐ σαρκὸς ἀπόσεις ῥύπου. The nouns ῥυπαρία and ῥύπος refer to something that is sticky and greasy, like suint (Hippocrates, Fract. 21) or earwax; idem, Liqu. 4.2; Clement of Alexandria, Paed. 2.10.87; Pap.Graec.Mag. 36, 332: μι—ξον δὲ καὶ ται—ς κριθαι—ς καὶ ῥύπον ἀπὸ ὀτίου μούλας = P.Oslo 1, 332.

⁵ Cf. L. Moulinier, Le Pur et l'impur dans la pensée des Grecs, pp. 25, 38, 60.

⁶ Teles speaks of people not using their wealth, οὐ χρωμένους δὲ τούτοις διάνελευθερίαν καὶ ῥυπαρίαν (in Stobaeus, Flor. 97.31); Plutarch, Mor. 2.60 d: οἰ—κονομικὸς χωρὶς ῥυπαρίας = Pertinax was thrifty without being sordid (text inserted by some manuscripts in Dio Cassius 76.5). Cf. Julius Pollux, Onom. 3.116: μικροψυχία, ἀνελευθερία, μικροπρέπεια, καὶ ὡς Κριτίας, ῥυπαρία. The legend of St. Pelagia, p. 6, 30, concerning baptismal purification, is cited: ἀφῆκεν ε—ν τω— ὕδατι πα—σαν αὐτῆς τὴν ῥυπαρίαν.

⁷ Job 14:4—τίς γὰρ καθαρὸς ἔσται ἀπὸ ῥύπου (Hebrew tame'), cited by Philo, Change of Names 48; cf. Job 11:15; Isa 4:4—"when the Lord has washed the filth (Hebrew so'âh) from the daughters of Zion and rinsed the blood from the midst of Jerusalem." It is clear from Plutarch that ῥυπαρία is very pejorative: "We see no animal other than the pig taking so much pleasure in the mire and in the unclean and filthy places” (τόποις ῥυπαροῖς—ς καὶ ἀκαθάρτοις, Quaest. conv. 4.5.3).

⁸ Lucian, Vit. Auct. 3: τὸν ε—π αὐτῇ ῥύπον ε—κκλύσας; cf. Philo, Unchang. God 7: “If we make an effort to be grateful . . . we will purify ourselves of our faults and wash away the stains that taint our lives” (ε—κνιψάμενοι τὰ καταρρυπαίνοντα τὸν βίον); Rev 22:11.

σανίς

sanis, plank, board

sanis, S 4548; EDNT 3.228; MM 568; L&N 7.79; BAGD 742

From its first occurrences, sanis, “plank, board,” was used for a leaf of a wooden door.¹ Thus the epitaph of Lysandros, dead at Karanis at age twenty, says, “During the night, my companions did not make the cedar doors resound”;² and thus the brothers who want to preserve their sister’s virginity propose barricading or blockading her: “If she is a door, we will set up planks of cedar against her.”³ This wood can be of all sorts, from that which is carried by camels,⁴ the lid of a trunk (kiboton) in which the priest Jehoiada bored a hole (2Kgs 12:9), and writing tablets,⁵ to the cedar floors in the rooms for eating and resting in the royal palace (Josephus, Ant. 8.134; SEG XXII, 114, 17, en sanidi leleukomene —1st century AD).

Sanis is especially used for ships, whether for the sides (Ezek 27:5; Anth.Pal. 9.415.6), the gangway (Euripides, Hel. 1556; Polybius 1.22.5), the planks, like those that saved the shipwreck victims in Acts 27:44,⁶ or the “floor” of a floating bridge burned by pirates (Philo, To Gaius 129).

¹ Homer, Od. 2.344; Il. 9.583: Oineus “shook the well-joined planks of the door”; 12.121: “He did not find the leaves of the gate closed, nor the long door-bar”; 12.453, 461: “the door groaned . . . the planks were smashed.”

² Κεδροπαγει—ς σανίδα, SEG I, 567, 6 = SB 6706 = GVI, n. 1680 (who dates the inscription to the third-second century BC).

³ Cant 8:9, Hebrew lûah, which is “said of objects with a smooth surface: a stone table (Exod 24:12ff.), metal panels (1Kgs 7:36), wooden planks (Exod 27:8; 38:7; Ezek 27:5). . . . [Here_ the word is used for planks used inside a door to bar its leaves. They are of cedar, a precious wood . . . strong and incorruptible” (A. Robert, R. Tournay, Le Cantique des Cantiques, Paris, 1963, p. 311).

⁴ SB 9075, 8; cf. P.Col.Zen. 5, 57: “at Libanos, prices of woods”; Plutarch, Per. 28.2: Pericles had the soldiers of the Samian navy, already half-dead, tied to planks and finished off with clubs.

⁵ Dio Cassius 42.32: Antonius “broke the tablets on which these two laws were written”; Dittenberger, Syl. 975, 30: ἀναγράψαντες εἰς τὴν σανίδα; 1011, 15.

⁶ —Ἐπὶ σανίσιν; “the substantive σανίς could refer to the sides, which would mean that the hull of the ship was broken up, but most likely it refers to the boards used to secure the cargo in the hold and keep it from sliding when the ship rolled and pitched” (J. Renié, Actes des Apôtres, Paris, 1949, p. 344); cf. P.Flor. 69, 21 and 24: ε—ξηλοῦσι σανίδες [πλ]ατείας ε—τέρου τοίχου τοῦ προκειμένου πλοίου (fragment of an account from the third century BC); P.Cair.Zen. 59755, 12 (list of a ship’s furnishings), where the editor proposes the reading ε—στρωμένον, διὰ νηὸς σανίς, following P.Lond. 1164, h 7 (vol. 3, p. 164; third century AD).

σαργάνη, σπυρίς

sargane, spyris, basket

sargane, S 4553; EDNT 3.229; MM 569; L&N 6.148; BAGD 742 | spyris, S 4711; EDNT 3.267; MM 586, 618; L&N 6.149; BDF §34(5); BAGD 764

These two substantives, unknown in the LXX,¹ seem almost synonymous, since St. Paul, in his escape from Damascus, was let down the wall en sargane according to 2Cor 11:33 (omitted by F, G) and en spyridi in Acts 9:25.²

Some have wanted to see sargane as a fish basket,³ while it is actually a woven wicker basket with varied uses: “Peltai (small shields) are hidden in large straw and wool baskets (en angesin), . . . smaller weapons in baskets full of raisins and figs (en sarganais), and daggers in amphoras of grain, dried figs, and olives” (Aeneas Tacticus 29.6). In the papyri, it is a container for grain or wine,⁴ or more precisely, a unit of measure,⁵ the weight of a shipment, valued at 150 pounds in P.Cair.Isid. 10, 4ff.; 13, 50; 16, 22; 17, 2ff.; SB 9176; 9384, 54, 62; P.Mil.Vogl. 152, col. II, 52, 59: eis episkeuen sarganon. There are smaller units, however: sarganition hena (BGU 236, 11; from AD 57); sarganion (P.Lips. 21, 18).

A spyris is also a woven basket, but more commonly used, although it is unknown in Josephus, and of smaller capacity. The word is used at Matt 15:37 and Mark 8:8, and also at Matt 16:10 and Mark 8:20, in each case referring to the baskets in which the pieces of bread and fish left over from the multiplying of the loaves were placed; the two latter texts place spyris parallel with kophinos.⁶ Some have concluded that a spyris is a basket for bread or fish.⁷ But, apart from the fact that the spyris may be of different sizes (spyridion, Pap.Lugd.Bat. II, 8, 13; P.Tebt. 414, 19; P.Oxy. 1293, 30), it is used for the picnic basket in which each one brings his own food,⁸ not only for a basket of good dates (P.Oxy. 116, 19), nuts (741, 2), or delicacies (1070, 31) but also dry pitch (pisses xeras sphyridas, SB 1, 9). So the word means a portable container and can be translated “bag” or “parcel.” The price of a parcel is figured, as with the baskets of nails in P.Col.Zen. 94, 7 (cf. P.Fay. 102, 3ff., in AD 105; time spyridon, UPZ 112, col. V, 18; from 170 BC), and receipt of the parcel is acknowledged in a business letter (SB 7572, 3; 9025, 19). There is no specifying the size or shape, since the word refers to an instrument of torture in Philo, who describes a tax agent torturing taxpayers: “He tied a cord with a sliding knot (brochos) to a basket full of sand (ammou spyrida plere) which he hung from their necks, a crushing burden” (Spec. Laws 3.160).

¹ Hebrew has four terms for “basket”: sal, for bread loaves and cakes (Gen 40:16; Lev 8:2; Num 6:15) or meat (Judg 6:19); dûd, for fruit (Jer 24:1-2, figs); tene', for provisions (Deut 26:2, 4; 28:5, 17); kelûb, literally, “woven,” used for fruit (Amos 8:1-2) but also for a bird cage (Jer 5:27).

² On the parallelism of these two texts, cf. C. K. Barrett, New Testament Essays, London, 1972, pp. 95ff. This mode of transport, used for an escape in Josh 2:15; 1Sam 19:12, is also the way one can be hoisted up to the monastery of St. Catherine at Sinai.

³ Probably by making it a derivative of σαργι—νος (Aristotle, HA 9.2.610b, classes σαργι—νοι among fish that live in schools, between smelt [ἀθερίναι] and needle-shaped fish) or of σαργός, the sargus, another species of fish (ibid. 5.11.542b).

⁴ P.Flor. 269, 7: τὰς οἰ—νηγὰς σαργάννας; P.Cair.Masp. 67010, 19: μεμεσωμένας σ[αργάναι]ς σιτίνου τε καὶ ξηροῦ χόρτου (Berichtigungsliste, vol. 3, p. 34); P.Flor. 175, 32: ἔχουσι σαργένας (or σαργάννας) οἰ—νηγὰς (M. David, p. 58); P.Lond. 1770, 20: ἀχύρου σιτίνου σαργάννας (M. David, pp. 99, 271); P.Cair.Goodsp. 30, col. 23, 13 (second century).

⁵ O.Mich. 779, 5; 780, 5; 783, 3; 788, 1–2; O.Bodl. q., 17; P.Oxf. 16, 15: “Each year I will give you a sargane of combustible straw”; P.Oxy. 2272, 21; 2154, 23: “Send me at least one sargane of small straw”; SB 1970; 9003, 2; 9019, 2; 10299, 7, 14.

⁶ Normally, κοφίνος is used especially for working the earth (Ps 81:6); its measure varies (PSI 428, 52: ε—ν κοφίνω μεγάλω), from twenty to forty λίτραι, according to P.Oxy. 43 (AD 295).

⁷ Cf. Herodotus 5.16—“If you let an empty basket down into the lake with a rope, in a very little while you can pull it out full of fish”; Aristophanes, Pax 1005: “eels from Copais arrive by the basket”; P.Ryl. 127, 34: “a basket containing fifty loaves” (AD 29); P.Oxy. 936, 15: a small Kanopic basket with four loaves.” The spyris was probably part of a fisherman’s gear; according to Philip of Thessalonica, “a pair of rush baskets” (δισσὰς σχοινογενει—ς σπυρίδας, Anth. Pal. 6.5.4); and Julian, the prefect of Egypt, says, “a pair of well-woven baskets” (ζευγός τ̄ εὐπλεκέων σπυρίδων, ibid. 28, 5), “two baskets with some cork” (σπυρίδας θ̄ ἄμα φελλω—, ibid. 29, 3); but Leonidas of Tarentum specifies, “fish baskets” (τὰς ι—χθυδίκους σπυρίδας, ibid. 4, 2). Cf. “A Note by the Late Dr Hort on the Words κόφινος, σπυρίς, σαργάνη,” in JTS, 1909, pp. 567–571.

⁸ Epictetus 4.10.21: among the advantages of being consul is that of offering to dine from baskets, σπυρίσιν δειπνίσαι; Athenaeus 8.365 a: each one brings a meal in a basket, δει—πνον ἀπὸ σπυρίδος.

σάρξ, σαρκικός, σάρκινος

sarx, flesh; sarkikos, of the flesh, carnal; sarkinos, fleshy, of the flesh, carnal

sarx, S 4561; TDNT 7.98–151; EDNT 3.230–233; NIDNTT 1.671–672, 674–682; MM 569; L&N 8.4, 8.63, 9.11, 9.12, 9.14, 9.15, 10.1, 22.20, 23.90, 25.29, 26.7, 58.10, 88.279; BDF §§160, 266(2), 258(2), 272, 275(4); BAGD 743–744 | sarkikos, S 4559; TDNT 7.98–151; EDNT 3.229–230; NIDNTT 1.671, 764, 677, 682; MM 569; L&N 26.8, 41.42, 79.1, 79.4; BDF §113(2); BAGD 742 | sarkinos, S 4560; TDNT 7.98–151; EDNT 3.229–230; NIDNTT 1.671, 674, 682; MM 569; L&N 9.13, 26.8, 41.42, 79.4; BDF §113(2); BAGD 743

E. Schweizer noted that in Homer the word “flesh” was used especially in the plural,¹ a usage that remained common in literary Greek (cf. Hippocrates, Peri sarkon; Quintus of Smyrna, Dio Chrysostom, etc.). It refers to the flesh of the human body (Herondas, Mimes 4.6: “flesh that seems to palpitate, hot”) but more often, it seems, animal flesh.² It is associated with bones,³ muscles, sinews, veins,⁴ viscera,⁵ and blood.⁶

Sarx can be pale (Sophocles, Phil. 1157) or white (Euripides, Med. 1189), old (Aeschylus, Ag. 72), vigorous (Sept. 622) or torn (Euripides, Hipp. 1239, 1343). Being material, flesh finally meets death: “his old flesh was torn from his bones” (Euripides, Med. 1217); “the daughter and the father lie dead” (1119); the vital force departs. Sarx is contrasted with nous,⁷ or the immortal psyche,⁸ or logos (Epictetus 1.3.5), or pneuma (Euripides, frag. 971: “He who, swelled with flesh, is extinguished like a star fallen from heaven, freeing the spirit for the aether”). It is notably the “miserable flesh” (Epictetus 1.3.5) that distinguishes humans from the gods.⁹ What is more, if sensations are detected by means of the sensitivity of the flesh (paraisthesis sarkine),¹⁰ thinkers from Epicurus on (Epictetus, Against Epicurus 2, frag. 6, col. 2) reflect on “pleasure according to the flesh” (he kata sarka hedone) as compared to pleasures of the psyche (Plutarch, Quaest. conv. 5.1) and conclude around the turn of the millennium not only that the latter are greater,¹¹ but that the pathe tes sarkos (bodily sensations) are a crude sensual pleasure, usually an appeasement of sexual instincts.¹²

The LXX translates the Hebrew basar especially with sarx,¹³ referring to the whole living creature, human or animal,¹⁴ the very person (Lev 13:18; Eccl 4:5; 5:5; cf. my sarx = me, Ps 119:120), the whole being (Gen 2:23; Ezek 37:6, 8; Job 2:5; Ps 68:2; Eccl 5:5), and especially the body.¹⁵ But since the body’s vitality (Hebrew nepeš) is in the blood (Gen 9:4-5; Lev 17:1; Deut 12:23), the composite human is referred to by the expression “flesh and blood,”¹⁶ the locution kol basar; “all flesh,” means all human beings;¹⁷ and kinship is defined as the same biological origin, by blood as well as flesh.¹⁸ God formed the body in the mother’s womb (Job 12:10; 34:15—the God of all flesh), beginning with inert earthy matter, which he animated with his breath (Gen 2:7, cf. 6:3, 13); one lives only insofar as one breathes, which means that the body is capable of dying (Ps 104:23; Zech 14:12). Being a creature (Isa 31:3; Jer 17:5; Joel 3:1), it is characterized by weakness and fragility;¹⁹ this is one of the most obvious contrasts with the deity.²⁰ The Wisdom writers emphasize the devaluation of the flesh. A “body of flesh” is pejorative,²¹ as is “eyes of flesh” (Job 10:4), which see poorly: since they discern only appearances, they are deceived. We cannot speak of a dualism of flesh and spirit²² that would correspond to the opposition between good and evil, but fleshly being, which belongs to the earth, is not only separated from the world of the pneuma, which belongs to heaven (4 Ezra 3:1), but is inferior to it.²³

The Synoptic Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles mention flesh only rarely, and always with its OT meanings.²⁴ Likewise the Fourth Gospel, in which this word always occurs in Jesus’ speech.²⁵ Used six times regarding the Eucharist (John 6:51-56), and made more specific as “the flesh of the Son of Man” or “my flesh and my blood,” it refers to the body and soul of Jesus, his person given to communicate eternal life. Twice sarx is opposed to pneuma.²⁶ John 8:15 is pejorative: “You judge according to the flesh,” that is, according to appearances; this is a superficial, incomplete, and false judgment. These nuances are traditional in Israel, and there is not the slightest theological elaboration.

In the Pauline writings, on the other hand, the “flesh” is constantly mentioned, and with meanings so different that one could almost say that they vary from verse to verse.²⁷ First, there are a large number of occurrences with the neutral biological meaning, “flesh” as a synonym of “body”: “No one ever hated his own flesh” (Eph 5:29); “I am absent in the flesh (physically) but in spirit I am among you.”²⁸ Then there is “human nature” in the noblest sense, since the incarnate Son of God was “born of the race of David, according to the flesh.”²⁹ The “body of his flesh” (Col 1:22) is his humanity. “Flesh” can also mean human existence (1Pet 4:6) here below (Eph 6:5) and its conditioning: Onesimus is a brother beloved “both according to the flesh and according to the Lord” (Phlm 16), which means humanly and divinely.

There is already a pejorative nuance in 1Cor 1:26, which observes that at Corinth there were “not many wise according to the flesh,” that is, humanly gifted;³⁰ and in 1Cor 7:28, where spouses experience “affliction in the flesh”;³¹ and also in 2Cor 5:16—“We no longer know anyone according to the flesh; even if we knew Christ according to the flesh, yet now we no longer know him.”³² This pejorative value of sarx is described as a “weakness”;³³ the flesh is ephemeral as the grass (1Pet 1:24; Isa 40:6) and mortal (2Cor 4:11); it is the seat of sensations and the emotions; it is passible.³⁴ Its infirmity and poverty are such that “no flesh (creature) may boast before God.”³⁵

It gets worse. St. Paul, probably inheriting something from the Qumran sect, or in any event depending on contemporary Jewish conceptions, sees the flesh as a source of evil, of dissolute actions,³⁶ always ready to break free (Gal 5:13), like an insolent slave (cf. Col 2:23, plesmone tes sarkos), rebelling and wishing to become an autonomous authority: “When we were in the flesh (under its orders, in a state of sinfulness), the passions ... acted in our members” (Rom 7:5); “no good dwells in me, that is, in my flesh” (7:18); “sin dwells in me” (7:21). This is not to say that what we today call the body is corrupt. Sarx is almost personified; more precisely, it retains here its basic meaning of “human nature,” but human nature as vitiated. It is the “whole person” that is corrupt, a perverse mind and will. Just as the arm and the hand are considered as autonomous and responsible for actions in which they are really just instruments, Paul treats the flesh—the inferior part of a person—as the locus of the passions and covetousness.³⁷ He attributes to it epithymia,³⁸ which is constantly opposing the pneuma: “the flesh lusts against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh; these are (principles that are) opposed to each other (tauta gar allelois antikeitai) The works of the flesh are manifest; they are sexual immorality, impurity, debauchery, idolatry, magic, hatred . . .” (Gal 5:17-19). There is a radical opposition between on the one hand sarx and epithymia kake (Col 3:5; 1Cor 10:6) and on the other hand reason, spirit, God's will.³⁹

The Pauline parenthesis is based on this experience: "With my reason I serve the law of God, but with my flesh the law of sin."⁴⁰ The Christian life is essentially defined as a liberation from sarx and a submission to pneuma: "We walk not according to the flesh, but according to the spirit. Those who live according to the flesh have their minds set on the things of the flesh; those who live according to the spirit have their minds set on the things of the spirit."⁴¹ Indeed, "the inclinations (to phronema) of the flesh lead to death, but the inclinations of the spirit lead to life and peace (with God). This is why the inclinations of the flesh are enmity toward God, because they are not in submission to the law of God, nor can they be. Now those who are in the flesh cannot please God. But you are not in the flesh, but in the spirit, if it is true that the Spirit of God dwells in you."⁴² "Take no thought for the flesh, (to satisfy) its lusts" (Rom 13:14; Gal 5:15); "Let us purify ourselves from every stain in flesh and in spirit, making ourselves perfectly holy, in the fear of God" (2Cor 7:1; cf. 1Cor 7:34). The conflict is such that "those who belong to Christ Jesus have crucified the flesh with its passions and lusts" (Gal 5:24). The last denunciation is that given by 1John 2:16—"All that is in the world—the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, the pride of life—is not of the Father, but of the world."⁴³

Sarkikos. — This rare⁴⁴ adjective is used by St. Paul with the same nuances as the substantive sarx, first of all in the neutral, slightly depreciatory sense of "material goods" (ta sarkika), as opposed to spiritual goods (ta pneumatika, Rom 15:27, 1Cor 9:11), then in a pejorative moral sense: "carnal wisdom" (duplicity, hypocrisy, etc.) as opposed to the grace of God (2Cor 1:12); or "carnal weapons" (ta hopla . . . sarkika), which are weak rather than dynata (10:4). Finally, there is the most pronounced Pauline theological meaning, describing the human and earthly order: "When there is jealousy and strife among you, are you not carnal (ouchi sarkikoi este) and walking according to man (kata anthropon)?" (1Cor 3:3). 1Pet 2:11 emphasizes sinful tones that are discordant with the divine: "I urge you . . . to abstain from these carnal lusts which make war against the soul."

Sarkinos. — Used much more than the preceding verb, this adjective takes on varied meanings in the secular literature; it denotes the carnal nature of the body,⁴⁵ sometimes with the nuance "corpulent"⁴⁶ or "fleshy": "Look for the fleshy fish (ton sarkinon ichthyn) lest you starve to death";⁴⁷ sometimes "real."⁴⁸ The LXX uses sarkinos for weakness and powerlessness,⁴⁹ and St. Paul gives it the same pejorative meaning as sarx: "the law is spiritual (pneumatikos) but I am carnal (sarkinos), sold to sin";⁵⁰ "I was not able to speak to you as to spiritual people (pneumatikois), but as to carnal people (sarkinois), as to nursing infants in Christ" (1Cor

3:1); babies are only flesh; they are not anti-spiritual, but they are still non-spiritual.

¹ E. Schweizer, F. Baumgärtel, H. Meyer, “σάρξ,” in TDNT, vol. 7, pp. 98–151. Cf. E. Schweizer, “Die hellenistische Komponente im neutestamentlichen σάρξ-Begriff,” in ZNW, 1957, pp. 237–253.

² Hesiod, Th. 538, Prometheus “had put beneath the skin flesh and entrails heavy with fat”; flesh of fish and small animals (Dioscorides, Mat. Med. 2.4; Julius Pollux, Onom. 5.51). It can be only an isolated bit of flesh (Euripides, Bacch. 1130; 1136: scraps; Nicander, frag. 78, 16), notably sacrificial flesh (Dittenberger, Syl. 1047, 7: γλω—σσαν καὶ σάρκας τρει—ς ; 1171, 5; LSCG, n. XI, B, 12; XXIX, 4; Supplément, n. XIX, 33; LSAM, n. XXIV, A, 16: σάρκας καὶ σπλάγχνα: portions of beef); one eats flesh (Aeschylus, Ag. 1097; Euripides, Tro. 775; Antiphanes, frag. 326 = J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 2, p. 308), but flesh thus consumed is more likely to be called κρέας (Rom 14:21; 1Cor 8:13; Theocritus, Id. 25.224).

³ Euripides, Hec. 1072, Polymestor: “gorge myself on their flesh, their bones”; Plato, Phd. 96 d: “flesh adds to flesh, bones to bones”; Tim. 84 a: “what joins the flesh to the bones”; Aristotle, Part. An. 2.9.655b23: “bone and flesh”; Aristotle, Gen. Cor. 1.5.321b19.

⁴ Homer, Od. 11.219: “The sinews no longer hold the flesh or the bones”; Plato, Tim. 74 b: “sinews and flesh”; 82 c; Aristotle, Part. An. 1.5.645a29: “what humankind is composed of, for example, blood, flesh, bones, vessels, and other such parts”; 2.1.546b15: “the parts that form the organs are composed of bones, sinews, flesh, and other such tissues”; Epictetus 2.9.18: “what is eaten and digested . . . has become sinews, flesh, bones, blooming complexion, healthy respiration”; 4.7.32.

⁵ Homer, Od. 9.293: “One would have said a lion . . . entrails, flesh (σαρκάς), marrow, bone, he did not leave anything”; Hesiod, Th. 538,

⁶ Plato, Symp. 207 d: “Every day a person is new . . . hair, flesh, bones, blood, the whole body.” Blood is the most closely related to flesh (Empedocles, frag. 98; cf. H. Diels, Fragmente der Vorsokratiker, 8th ed., vol. 1, 346, 23), since the latter is produced from the former. “The mother’s blood coagulates, forming the flesh of the embryo, and in the midst of the flesh the navel is separated” (Hippocrates, Nat. Puer. 15–17). Cf. flesh and belly (Loc. Hom. 1.2), bones (3.1; 4.2; 13.3, 5), veins (3.6), is filled with phlegm (29.1); is tested by cold (10.2), is soft (Fist. 1.1), is cut into (Morb. 50.4), it swells (48.1); it develops or diminishes according to certain exercises (Vict. 2.2; 9.3), long-distance races warm it (63.1), as do certain foods (78.1; 79.3); it is moist (56.7; 57.1; 60.3–4); at maturity a person is well fleshed-out (32.5); it is in the flesh that tumors grow (89.11) and dropsy (Hippocrates, Acut., appendix 52.1); the juice of certain seeds is more laxative than their flesh (pulp; Vict. 45.4); rockfish have tender, light flesh (48.1–3; 49.3), etc.

⁷ Aeschylus, Sept. 622; cf. Euripides, El. 387; Empedocles, frag. 126 (= Diels, vol. 1, 362, 5): ἀλλογνώ—ς χιτῶν σαρκός = strange garment of flesh; used by Plutarch, De esu carn. 4 and Porphyry (in Stobaeus, Ecl. 1.49, 60; vol. 1, p. 446, 21ff.); Philo, Heir 268; Alleg. Interp. 2.49.

⁸ Plato, Symp. 211 c; Leg. 12.959 a, “The psyche is superior to the soma; it is immortal,” and it is contrasted to the “bulk of the flesh (τὸν τῶ—ν σαρκῶ—ν ὄγκον) that is being buried”; Plutarch, Adv. Col. 20; De sera 17; epitaph of Philoxenos: “Kaunos (a city in Caria) consumed your flesh in a raging fire” (SB 4314, 6).

⁹ Epictetus 2.8.2: “What then is God really? Flesh? — Never”; Polyaeus, Strat. 3.11.1.

¹⁰ Philodemus of Gadara, Piet. 116, 13ff.; Philo, Heir 71; Husbandry 97; Alleg. Interp. 2.41; 3.158; Abraham 164; Giants 35.

¹¹ Diogenes Laertius 10.137; Ps.-Plutarch, Cons. ad Apoll. 13: “To live without being in submission to the slavery of the flesh (ἀδούλωτον τῇ σαρκί) and its passions, which draw the spirit (καὶ τοι—ς ταύτης πάθεσι), that is a good and happy fortune”; Plutarch, De virt. et vit. 3; Mor. 2.1096 c: ται—ς τῆς σαρκὸς ἐ—πιθυμίας. The flesh is the seat of the passions: ἐ—ν τῇ σαρκὶ ἢ ἡδονή (Epicurus, Sent. 18); “bodily passions, issuing from the flesh, in which they have taken root” (Philo, Heir 268); “carnal good is pleasure stripped of reason” (Giants 40); the way of wisdom is devoted to “attacks and rejections of every companion of the flesh” (Unchang. God 143; cf. Husbandry 97; Alleg. Interp. 2.49–50); 4Macc 7:18: “Only those who give themselves to piety with vigilance are able to rule the passions of the flesh.”

¹² Cf. the Epicurean Metrodorus, in Plutarch, Adv. Col. 30; Suav. viv. 14. Philo is especially pessimistic: the body and its passions draw people into sin (Plant. 43; Heir 296); sexual pleasure is the origin of evil (Alleg. Interp. 3.143, 159; Creation 151–164; Spec. Laws 1.192). Since for the soul the flesh is a weight, a servitude, a coffin, a funeral urn, a cadaver to drag about (Giants 31; Heir 268; Migr. Abr. 12; Husbandry 25; Unchang. God 2), an obstacle to growth in wisdom and to the flight of the soul toward God

(Migr. Abr. 14; Dreams 2.232), one must disengage from it through askesis (Spec. Laws 4.114; Giants 30; Change of Names 32; Dreams 2.67; Unchang. God 3).

¹³ One hundred forty-eight times (always in the singular, except Prov 14:30), but also κρέας (79 times), σῶμα (23 times), and χρώς (14 times, cf. Acts 19:12; literally, the skin, the epidermis); but σάρξ also translates the Hebrew she'er, “meat” (Lev 18:6; 25:49; Num 27:11—the flesh of his body). Cf. D. Lys, La Chair dans l’Ancien Testament: Bâsar, Paris, 1967; J. Scharbert, Fleisch, Geist und Seele im Pentateuch, Stuttgart, 1966, P. Dhorme, Emploi métaphorique, pp. 7–10, 113; J. Luzzi, “Basar en el contexto veterotestamentario,” in Ciencia y fe, 1958, pp. 3–28.

¹⁴ In the latter case, sarx is especially meat used as food (1Kgs 17:6; 19:21; Num 11:4, 13, 18ff.), which is more often called κρέας (Gen 9:4; Exod 12:8; Deut 12:15, 20; 14:8), notably the flesh of sacrificial victims (Isa 65:4; Jer 11:15; Hag 2:12; Lev 6:20; Num 18:18; Deut 16:4; 1QS 9.4—“the flesh of the whole burnt offerings”); cf. Dittenberger, Or. 78, 16.

¹⁵ Gen 2:23; 2Kgs 5:10, 14; 9:26 (dogs devour Jezebel’s body); Job 6:12; 33:21. The corpse (1Sam 17:44; 2Kgs 9:36). A part of the body (Lev 6:3; 15:2-3), muscles (Sir 19:12; 38:28; 4Macc 9:20, 28), tendons (Job 10:11), skin (Exod 4:7; Lev 13:2-4, 11, 38, 39, 43; 13:18, 24; Lam 3:4; Pss 102:6; Job 19:20; Prov 14:30; Josephus, Ant. 15.236: the skin of the flesh), bone (Job 2:5; T. Sim. 6.2; Jos. Asen. 16), heart (Pss 73:26; 84:3; Eccl 2:3; 11:10; Ezek 11:29; 36:26—a heart of flesh = receptive to God’s will), the flesh of the foreskin (Gen 17:11, 14, 23-25; Lev 12:3); flesh of uncircumcision (Gen 17:11ff.; Lev 12:3; 13:10ff.), uncircumcision of the flesh (Ezek 44:7, 9; cf. Jdt 14:10; Sir 44:20; Jub. 15.13). Cf. stoutness = fat of flesh (Isa 17:4; Dan 1:15).

¹⁶ Sir 14:18; 17:31; Wis 12:5; cf. “all flesh in which is found a breath of life” (Gen 6:17; 7:15).

¹⁷ Isa 40:5; Jer 12:12; 25:31; 45:5; Joel 3:1; Zech 2:17; Job 12:10; 34:15; 1QSb 3.28; 1Q34, frag. 3; the population of a land (Ezek 21:4, 9); every living being, beasts included (Gen 6:17; 9:11; Num 18:15; Pss 136:25; Dan 4:9).

¹⁸ Gen 2:23—“flesh of my flesh”; the woman is the very own flesh (ἴδια σάρξ) of the man (Sir 25:26; Adam and Eve 3; Gen 29:14; 2Sam 5:1; 19:13; Judg 9:2; 1Chr 12:1; Neh 5:5; Lev 18:6; 25:49); between brothers and sisters (Gen 37:27; Lev 18:12-13; 20:19).

¹⁹ Ps 56:5; 78:39; 109:24; Job 6:12; 33:21; Sir 28:5; 31:1; 40:8; Isa 31:3; cf. 2Chr 32:8—“an arm of basar” (cf. 1QH 15.12—“a hand of flesh”); the military might of Egypt is only flesh (Ezek 31:3); much study is weariness of basar (Eccl 12:12); 1QH 4.29; 8.31–32; 15.12, 21.

²⁰ Isa 31:3; Jer 17:5; Ezek 40:5–6; Joel 3:1; Zech 14:12; Dan 2:11—“gods whose dwelling is not with flesh”; cf. 2:5ff.; CD 2.20—“all flesh that was on the earth succumbed and died” (W. D. Davies, “Paul and the Dead Sea Scrolls: Flesh and Spirit,” in K. Stendahl, The Scrolls and the New Testament, New York, 1957, pp. 157–182; K. G. Kuhn, “New Light on Temptation, Sin, and Flesh in the New Testament,” ibid., pp. 94–113; R. E. Murphy, “BSR in the Qumran Literature and Sarks in the Epistle to the Romans,” in Sacra Pagina, Paris-Gembloux, 1959, vol. 2, pp. 60–76; J. Pryke, “‘Spirit’ and ‘Flesh’ in the Qumran Documents and Some New Testament Texts,” in RevQ, 1965, pp. 345–360); Jub. 7.4; 21.10; SB 2034, 2; 3901, 2; 4949, 2; 6035, 3; 7429, 2; 7430, 1; etc.

²¹ Sir 23:17 (Col 1:22; 2:11); 1 Enoch 102.5; 1QpHab 9.2; Nah 2:6.

²² Jdt 10:13; Wis 7:1, 7; cf. 4Macc 7:13; Pss. Sol. 16.14; Jub. 2.2, 11; 1QH 18.21–24; T. Abr. B 13; T. Job 27.2, Satan to Job, “you who are flesh, I who am spirit”; 38.2—“Who are we to meddle in heavenly things when we are flesh?”; Josephus, Ant. 19.325; War 2.154; 6.47: the psyche separates from the flesh at the moment of death.

²³ 1QH 15.17. Following Jer 25:31 and Hos 4:1, the Qumran literature represents God putting “all flesh” on trial (CD 1.2)—i.e., sinful humanity—and emphasizes the relationship of flesh to sin: “I stumble because of the sin of the flesh” (1QS 11.12), “flesh of perversity” (9); “flesh of guilt” (1QM 12.11). A “spirit of flesh” (1QH 13.16; 17.25) is a perverse spirit (cf. Rom 8:1–9). Cf. T. Jud. 19.4—“I was ignorant, like man and like flesh, corrupted by sin.”

²⁴ Matt 19:56 (Mark 10:8; cf. 1Cor 6:16; Eph 5:31), regarding monogamous marriage, quotes Gen 2:24—“the two shall be one flesh,” a single being. Matt 24:22 (Mark 13:20; Luke 3:6; cf. Isa 40:5): “No flesh (no living being) could be saved”; Matt 26:41 (Mark 14:38; cf. Gal 2:16 = Ps 143:2)—“the flesh is weak” (contrasted with the pneuma); Luke 24:39—“a pneuma does not have flesh and bone” (no body). The phrase “flesh and blood” refers to humans as incapable of perceiving the divine (Matt 16:17) and inheriting the kingdom of God (1Cor 15:50; Gal 1:16). Acts 2:17 quotes Joel 2:28; Acts 2:26 quotes Ps 16:9; Acts 2:31—the flesh (the body) of Christ did not see corruption (cf. Ps 16:10).

²⁵ With the exception of the prologue, where 1:14 should be translated, “The Word became human,” i.e., took on a human nature. The depreciative nuance of passible, mortal flesh is an intentional contrast with the divine Logos (1:1), where the filial doxa is still evident. This Son of God has sovereignty over “all flesh” (17:2), i.e., over all people. S. de Ausejo, “El concepto de ‘carne’ aplicado a Cristo en el IV Evangelio,” in Sacra Pagina, Rome, 1959, vol. 2, pp. 219–234.

²⁶ John 3:6—“That which is born of the flesh is flesh; that which is born of the spirit is spirit” (cf. Gal 6:8). The flesh begets carnal beings, the spirit begets spiritual beings. St. Augustine emphasizes the contrast between these two types of generation as corresponding to two very different worlds: “Una de terra . . . de mortalitate . . . de masculino et femina . . . , alia de caelo . . . de aeternitate . . . de Deo et ecclesia” (on this text). John 6:63—“The spirit makes alive; the flesh (without the spirit) is of no avail” for communicating spiritual life. Cf. the eating of flesh (Rev 17:16; 19:18, 21; Quintus of Smyrna, Posthomerica 11.245) and flesh that is eaten away (Jas 5:3).

²⁷ E. D. Burton, Spirit, Soul and Flesh, Chicago, 1918; F. Prat, La Théologie de saint Paul, 6th ed., Paris, 1923, vol. 2, pp. 487–489; W. Schauf, Σάρξ: Der Begriff ‘Fleisch’ beim Apostel Paulus, Münster, 1924; H. Mehl-Koehnlein, L’Homme selon l’Apôtre Paul, Neuchâtel-Paris, 1951, pp. 12–17; W. D. Stacey, The Pauline View of Man, London, 1956; A. Sand, Der Begriff ‘Fleisch’ in den paulinischen Hauptbriefen, Regensburg, 1967; E. Brandenburger, Fleisch und Geist und die dualistische Weisheit, Neukirchen, 1968; R. Jewett, Paul’s Anthropological Terms, Leiden, 1971, pp. 49–166.

²⁸ Col 2:5; cf. 2:1—“Those who have not seen my face in the flesh”; 1:24. Circumcision is an operation practiced on the flesh (Rom 2:28; Eph 2:11; Col 2:11, 13). “All flesh is not the same flesh, but there is one of men, another of beasts, another of birds, another of fish” (1Cor 15:39; in 15:39–41, sun, moon, and stars are referred to as σώματα, celestial bodies. J. Héring describes this meaning as the “chemical sense” of sarx). Abraham, “our father according to the flesh” (Rom 4:1; Heb 12:9); the Israelites are “our kinsmen according to the flesh” (Rom 4:1; 11:14; cf. 9:8; 1Cor 10:18). The OT liturgy could procure only fleshly purity (Heb 9:10, 13). The men of Sodom ran after “other flesh,” another kind of body, namely, that of angels (Jude 7). Paul’s thorn in the flesh (σκόλοψ τῆ σαρκί), “an angel of Satan to torment me” (2Cor 12:7), must be an allusion to Num 33:55, where Canaanites who are spared “will become thorns (σκόλοπες) in your eyes.” If we recall Gal 4:13–15 (“It was because of an infirmity of the flesh [δι’ ἀσθένειαν τῆς σαρκός] that I first preached the gospel to you; even though the infirmity of my flesh was a trial for you, you showed no scorn, no disgust. . . . You would have plucked out your eyes to give them to me”), we will conclude that Paul’s missionary activity must have been hindered by an affliction of the eyes, probably by an “eye migraine,” described by Dr. Uhle-Wettler (“Der Pfahl im Fleisch und die Fausthiebe Satans bei Paulus,” in Hengstenbergs Evang. Kirchenzeitung, 1913, pp. 130ff., 145ff.). This illness is distinguished first of all by an agonizing pain (bohrende, drilling, boring) in the head, as if the skull had just been smashed with a hammer. In certain cases, the eye was so terrible to look at that even the physician recoiled at the sight. The attacks recur periodically and are of unequal duration. Between attacks—sometimes periods of several years—the patient may have enormous energy. Cf. A. Lechler, Des Paulus Pfahl im Fleisch, Giessen, 1947; T. Y. Mullins, “Paul’s Thorn in the Flesh,” in JBL, 1957, pp. 299 (a personal enemy of Paul); P. Andriessen, “L’Impuissance de Paul en face de l’ange de Satan,” in RSR, 1959, pp. 462–468 (attacks and intrigues of the Jews); P. Menoud, “L’Echarde et l’ange satanique (II Cor. XII, 7),” in Jésus-Christ et la foi, Neuchâtel-Paris, 1975, pp. 23–30 (Israel’s unbelief); H. Binder, “Die angebliche Krankheit des Paulus,” in TZ, 1976, pp. 1–13.

²⁹ Rom 1:3; cf. 9:5; Gal 4:23; Eph 2:14; 1Tim 3:16; Heb 5:7; 10:20; 1Pet 3:18; 4:1; John 1:14; 1John 4:2. Cf. J. A. T. Robinson, The Body: A Study in Pauline Theology, London, 1952, pp. 34–48; R. Batey, “The μία σάρξ Union of Christ and the Church,” in NTS, vol. 13, 1967, pp. 270–284; P. Bonnard, Anamnèsis, Geneva-Lausanne- Neuchâtel, 1980, pp. 187–193; M. Gilbert, “‘Une seule chair’ (Gen. II, 24),” in NRT, 1978, pp. 66–89; cf. G. Aicher, “Mann und Weib ein Fleisch,” in BZ, 1907, pp. 159–165.

³⁰ Cf. Gal 6:12—“those who wish to look good in the flesh,” make a good impression, εὐπροσωπῆσαι, cf. P. Tebt. 19, 12.

³¹ This could mean problems of a sexual nature that are difficult to overcome, or family cares, or “the ordinary course of this sad world” (E. B. Allo). Cf. 1Cor 5:5—the incestuous man is handed over to Satan εἰς ὄλεθρον τῆς σαρκός and so that his spirit may be saved. Cf. J. Cambier, “La Chair et l’esprit en I Cor. V, 5,” in NTS, vol. 15, 1969, pp. 221, 232.

³² Κατὰ σάρκα is the norm of judgment: from a human, purely natural point of view; J. Cambier, “Connaissance charnelle et spirituelle du Christ dans II Cor. V, 16,” in Recherches bibliques, vol. 5, Paris-Tournai, 1960, pp. 72–96; J. W. Fraser, “Paul’s Knowledge of Jesus: II Corinthians V, 16 Once More,” in NTS, vol. 17, 1971, pp. 203–313; J. T. Keegan, “Paul and the Historical Jesus,” in Angelicum, 1975, pp. 450–484; C. S. Voulgaris, “II Cor. V, 16 and the Problem of St. Paul’s Opponents in Corinth,” in Theologica (Athens), 1975, pp. 3–19 (to know Christ according to the flesh would be to know him as a Jew, a descendant of Abraham, a great teacher in Israel; this would limit salvation to his people and exclude the Gentiles).

³³ —Ἀσθένεια, cf. Rom 6:19: “I express myself in human terms because of the (intellectual and moral) weakness of your flesh” means “I take your feebleness and your limitations into account”; 8:3—the resistance of the flesh robbed the law of Moses of its power (ἡσθένει); Gal 3:3—“After beginning with the Spirit, will you now finish with the flesh?” (circumcision, Judaism).

³⁴ 2Cor 7:5—“Since our arrival in Macedonia, our flesh has had no relief (ἄνεσις); we have been afflicted in everything.” J. Héring translates well, “notre pauvre être.”

³⁵ 1Cor 1:29; cf. Gal 6:13; 2Cor 11:18—“Many glory according to the flesh, boasting of human advantages” (birth, fortune, prerogatives); Phil 3:2, 4, place one’s confidence in the flesh.

³⁶ For example, duplicity, inconstancy, fickleness. II Cor 1:17—“Did I act lightly? Or do I want what I want according to the flesh (κατὰ σάρκα), so that with me there is ‘Yes, yes’ and ‘No, no’?”

³⁷ Cf. “inner man” and “outward man.” Cf. P. Bonnard, Anamnèsis, pp. 66ff.

³⁸ Rom 13:14; Gal 5:15-16; 1John 2:16; Eph 2:3—before we were Christians, we lived “according to the desires of the flesh, serving the caprices of the flesh and its (sinful) thoughts (καὶ τῶ—ν διανοιω—ν, cf. Col 2:18, ὑπὸ τοῦ νοῦς τῆς σαρκὸς αὐτοῦ), so that we were by nature given over to wrath (God’s judgment).” Sensualist false teachers “go after the flesh in impure covetousness” (2Pet 2:10); “they appeal to the debauched covetousness of the flesh and entice people who have barely left behind those who live in error” (2:18); they soil the flesh (1Pet 3:21; Jude 8; cf. 1Pet 2:11); the corruption defiles even the clothing that covers the sarx (Jude 23). Cf. H. Räisänen, “Zum Gebrauch von ε—πιθυμία und ε—πιθυμει—ν bei Paulus,” in ST, vol. 33, 1979, pp.85–99.

³⁹ Rom 7:25—“I am the same person, who by reason serve the law of God, but by the flesh, the law of sin”; Gal 6:8—“The one who sows in the flesh will of the flesh reap corruption; the one who sows in the spirit will from the spirit reap eternal life”; Rom 8:3—“Because of sin, God sent his son in a flesh (human nature) like that of sin, and so condemned sin in the flesh.” The incarnation of the Son of God in an innocent human nature is, by this very exemption from sin, a defeat for hamartia and brings about this defeat in Christians, where it has been acting—“in the flesh”; its tyranny is broken (the sinful condition that issued from the first man, ε—φ ὃ πάντες ἥμαρτον, Rom 5:12; cf. Gen 8:21; Philo, Unchang. God 55).

⁴⁰ Rom 7:24-25. To the references given in C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, p. 178; vol. 2, p. 636, add J. I. Packer, “The ‘Wretched Man’ in Romans VII,” in F. L. Cross, SE, vol. 2, 1964, pp. 621–627; W. G. Kümmel, Römer VII und das Bild des Menschen im Neuen Testament, Munich, 1974; R. Schnackenburg, “Römer VII im Zusammenhang des Römerbriefes,” in Festschrift W. G. Kümmel, Gütersloh, 1975, pp. 283–500; M. Byskov, “Simul Justus et Peccator: A Note on Romans VII, 25 b,” in ST, 1976, pp. 75–87; Seiichi Yagi, “Weder persönlich noch generell—Zum neutestamentlichen Denken anhand Röm. VII,” in Annual of the Japanese Biblical Institute, vol. 2, 1976, pp. 159–173; J. M. Cambier et al., The Law of the Spirit in Rom 7 and 8, Rome, 1976; A. Feuillet, “Loi de Dieu, loi du Christ et loi de l’Esprit d’après les Epîtres pauliniennes,” in NovT, 1980, pp. 35–65.

⁴¹ The verb φρονέω (Vulgate sentire) is difficult to translate, because it is used for the faculty of thinking and feeling, intentions and will, opinions or evaluations, of a lifestyle, a disposition of the soul, a mentality. Here it has to do with convictions and sentiments, leanings and aspirations, “tastes.” Cf. P. N. Lockhart, “φρονεῖ—ν in Homer,” in CP, 1966, pp. 99–102; P.Oxy. 2594, 5: “You thought that I had other sentiments regarding you,” i.e., that I would react differently; P.Ryl. 624, 18, an allusion “to those in the city who do not think as we do” (τῶ—ν ἄλλω—ς φρονούντων); P.Herm., p. 5, n. 33; Ep. Arist. 236.

⁴² Rom 8:4-9. Let us say again that sarx here is not material, as distinct from the soul, nor does it represent sexual desires alone; rather, it is deep-rooted evil which, by means of epithymia, leads to sin. Rom 8:12-13—“My brothers, we are not debtors (ὀφειλέται) to the flesh to live according to the flesh, because if you live according to the flesh, you will die. But if by the Spirit you put to death the works of the body, you will live”; 2Cor 10:2-3: “Some people expect to see us walk according to the flesh; we do indeed walk in the flesh (cf. Gal 2:20; Phil 1:22, 24; 1Pet 4:2), but we do not do battle according to the flesh.”

⁴³ Ἡ ε—πιθυμία τῆς σαρκός; this subjective genitive makes the flesh the subject of the action; it is the flesh that lusts; hence it is evil and one must not be attached to it. It belongs to this sinful world below. In the last analysis, it is God’s enemy. This Johannine dichotomy is less one of flesh and spirit than of earthly and heavenly; cf. N. Lazure, “La Convoitise de la

chair in I Jo. II, 16,” in RB, 1969, pp. 161–205; P. Bonnard, Anamnèsis, pp. 187–193.

⁴⁴ Unknown in the LXX, Philo, and the papyri. In the years BC, we can cite hardly more than Aristotle, HA 10.2.635a11: the color of the discharge “comes closer to that of flesh” (σαρκικώτερα); and Sotades of Maronea, frag. 19, 3 (in connection with skin, δέρμα), in J. U. Powell, Collectanea Alexandrina, Oxford, 1925, p. 244. In the second century AD, Par. Jer. 6.6—the body is the “carnal house” of the heart (τῶν σαρκικῶν οἴκῳ σου). Anth. Pal. 1.107.3: “to triumph over all carnal defilements” (παντῶν σαρκικῶν μολυσμάτων).

⁴⁵ Plato, Leg. 10.906 c: illnesses ἐν σαρκίνοις σώμασι; Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 3.12.1117b 3: boxers receive blows, “it is suffering, even if it is fleshly blows”; Hipparchus, ἐντι θνατοὶ καὶ σάρκινοι (in Stobaeus, Flor. 4.44.81; vol. 4, p. 980, 15); Philodemus of Gadara, Sign.: “living creatures that share our bodily nature” (φύσεως σαρκίνης); Dio Cassius 38.21.3: “the body, since it is carnal (σάρκινον), finds in its substance a thousand pernicious germs.” Cf. TDNT, vol. 7, pp. 98–151.

⁴⁶ Julius Pollux, Onom. 2.233, quoting Aristophanes, frag. 711: ἄνδρα σάρκινον, and Eupolis, frag. 387: σαρκίνη γυνή. Cf. Plutarch, De prof. in virt. 8 (2.79 c): τὸ σάρκινον τῶν λόγων, fullness or density of discourse.

⁴⁷ Ps.-Theocritus 21.66. Cf. Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 63: “having taken upon ourselves the weight (or bulk) of the flesh” (τὸν σάρκινον ὄγκον); Philo, Alleg. Interp. 2.20: “Was the rib that was left not fleshy?”; σαρκίνη seems to imply density.

⁴⁸ Artemidorus Daldianus, Onir. 2.35: “the gods appear to us in flesh and in bone” or in statues. Philodemus considers the gods to be sarkinoi (Piet. 59.21ff.; D. 3, frag. 6). The papyri offer only one occurrence: σχοινίων σαρκίνων (P.Lond. 1177, 169 = vol. 3, p. 186; from the second century AD), noted in the Wörterbuch of F. Preisigke, who translates “Stricke aus Darmsaiten gefertigt,” and in Moulton-Milligan, “leather ropes.”

⁴⁹ 2Chr 32:8—the arm of Sennacherib is of flesh, whereas the arm of God brings help to Israel. Esth 4:17 p, contrasts the carnal king (the idol) with the king of the gods; Prov 29:27. In a positive sense, the heart of flesh (Ezek 11:19; 26:26), contrasted with the heart of stone, is one that is not obstinate, is obedient to God’s will. Cf. the heart as a tablet of flesh that is written on (2Cor 3:3).

⁵⁰ Rom 7:14. M. J. Lagrange comments, “σάρκινος, with the ending -ινος, indicates the material of which a thing is made, cf. δερμάτινος (Matt 3:4); ἀκάνθινος (Mark 15:17).” In this sense, the carnal provisions of the old covenant, concerning the priesthood (ε—ντολῆς σαρκίνης, Heb 7:16), had bearing only upon physical requirements: carnal descent, privileges of race, bodily wholeness.

σβέννυμι

sbennymi, extinguish, quench

sbennymi, S 4570; TDNT 7.165–168; EDNT 3.235; NIDNTT 3.109–111; MM 570; L&N 14.70, 68.52; BDF §92; BAGD 745

The literal meaning of sbennymi is “put out a fire”;¹ the fire of Gehenna is not quenched;² the OT heroes of the faith “quenched the raging of the fire”;³ but lamps are quenched for want of oil (Matt 25:8; T. Job 43.5); the Messiah does not quench the smouldering wick (linon);⁴ and the shield of faith can put out the flaming darts of the Evil One.⁵

The metaphorical usages are constant, both in the LXX and in the secular literature, meaning “annihilate, cause to disappear.” The object can be offspring (2Sam 14:7; Prov 10:7), prosperity (Job 18:5; Prov 13:9; Anth. Pal. 9.178), thought and sound reason (Wis 2:3; Philo, Dreams 1.31; Alleg. Interp. 1.46), beauty (Anth. Pal. 5.62), love (Cant 8:7), wrath,⁶ pride (Job 40:12; Anth. Pal. 5.300), the power of the passions,⁷ tyranny (Plutarch, Lyc. 11.13; Josephus, War 2.296, the fire of war), the root of lawsuits,⁸ etc. But none of these usages clarifies 1Thess 5:19, “Do not quench the Spirit.”⁹ The context has to do with spiritual gifts, and the present imperative with me would mean to stop prohibiting those inspired by the Holy Spirit from communicating what they have received (cf. 1Cor 14:39, me kolyete). But the singular to pneuma points not to the charismatics but to the person of the Holy Spirit, or better the Holy Spirit’s inspiration,¹⁰ which is like a shining and burning flame.¹¹ Just as 2Tim 1:6 says to revive, rekindle God’s gift,¹² 1Tim 5:19 urges each believer not to suppress or restrain it,¹³ according to the principle of 1Cor 14:32—“the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets”—and its application in Rom 12:6-8. A divine communication must not be kept to oneself, since by definition it is intended for the edification of all; and it is even worse to cut oneself off from the source and refuse to hear “what the Spirit says to the churches” (Rev 2:11, 17, 29, etc.).

¹ Wis 16:17—“Water, which quenches all, gave the fire even more strength” (cf. Exod 9:22-26); Philo, Plant. 10: “fire is not put out with air”;

4Macc 18:20; 9:20—“the heaped-up coals were extinguished by the dripping blood”; Artemidorus Daldianus, Onir. 2.9: “the fire that goes out in the heart is an omen of poverty” (cf. Lang, “σβέννυμι,” in TDNT, vol. 7, pp. 165–168).

² Mark 9:48, following Isa 66:26; cf. Lev 6:2, 5, 6: the fire on the altar of whole burnt offerings is not quenched (Hebrew kabah). Inextinguishable fire represents magnitude of punishment (Isa 1:31; 34:10; 66:24; Jer 17:27; Ezek 20:47-48; Amos 5:6); but the sun will disappear at the hour of judgment (T. Levi 4.1).

³ Heb 11:34 (an allusion to the three children in the furnace, Dan 3:49-50; 1Macc 2:59); cf. Josephus, War 7.405: the Romans undertook to extinguish the fire (at Masada); 6.243: Titus ordered his guard to put out the fire.

⁴ Matt 12:20—καὶ λίνον τυφόμενον οὐ σβέσει (quoting Isa 42:3); cf. 2Sam 21:17—“You will not quench the lamp of Israel”; 2Chr 29:7—“They closed the doors, they put out the lamps (of the sanctuary)”; Isa 43:17—“They are extinguished like a wick, they are consumed”; Job 21:17—“the lamp of the ungodly is extinguished”; Prov 20:20; 24:20; Sir 28:12—“If you spit on a spark, it will go out.”

⁵ Eph 6:16. Pila ardentia are javelins dipped in sulfur, resin, and pitch and set afire before they are thrown, cf. the Numidians at the battle of Zama (Sallust, Iug. 57; cf. Caesar, BCiv. 2.2.1; Thucydides 2.75.5, πυρφόροις οἰ—στοι—ς).

⁶ 2Kgs 22:17 = 2Chr 34:25; Jer 4:4; 7:20; 21:12; Plato, Leg. 10.888 a; Aelian, VH 5.11.

⁷ Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 15; Plato, Leg. 8.835 d; 4Macc 3:17; 16:4; cf. Sir 23:17; P.Ryl. 712, 2.

⁸ In the fifth-sixth century in the papyri, C.P.Herm. 31, 20; SB 7033, 34, 67; 9763,35.

⁹ Τὸ πνεῦμα μὴ σβέννυτε. Cf. W. C. Van Unnik, “Den Geist löscht nicht aus,” in NovT, 1968, pp. 255–269.

¹⁰ H. Almqvist (Plutarch und das Neue Testament, p. 123) cites Plutarch, De Pyth. or. 17: “If the Pythia no longer prophesies in verse, it is either because she is no longer near the abode of the god or because the inspiring exhalation has completely dried up and its efficacy ended”; on this “exhalation,” cf. De def. or. 42, 50.

¹¹ Acts 2:3—“tongues as of fire appeared to them, were distributed, and rested on each of them”; 18:25, Apollos, ζέων τω πνεύματι; Rom 12:11, τω πνεύματι ζέοντες; cf. John the Baptist, “a lamp that burned and gave light” (John 5:35).

¹² —Αναζωπυρέω; cf. Plutarch, Quaest. conv. 1.2.3; C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, vol. 2, pp. 707ff.

¹³ The two meanings are equally attested. Sometimes σβέννυμι expresses a complete disappearance, notably with death: “when you are extinguished” (Ezek 32:7); epitaph of Apollos in the second-first century BC: “I was snuffed out at the age of twenty-seven” (GVI, n. 1002, 2; E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 11), sometimes an attenuation, as with Metellus, diminished by age, ἤδη σβεννύμενον ὑπὸ γήρωσ, as bronze goes soft (Plutarch, Pomp. 8.6), springs or liquids dry up little by little (Aristotle, HA 3.21.4; Anth. Pal. 9.128), the joy of the Romans diminished upon the discovery of a new obstacle (Josephus, War 6.31); cf. the calming of sorrow (Ant. 11.40).

σεμνός, σεμνότης

semnos, serious, grave, dignified, majestic, respectable; semnotes, seriousness, gravity, dignity, majesty

semnos, S 4586; TDNT 7.191–196; EDNT 3.238; NIDNTT 2.91–93; MM 572; L&N 88.47; BAGD 746–747 | semnotes, S 4587; TDNT 7.191–196; EDNT 3.238; NIDNTT 2.91–93; MM 572; L&N 88.46; BAGD 747

These terms, which express seriousness, gravity, dignity, and majesty, and which describe the venerable and august qualities of persons, occur often in classical Greek. They are used seven times by St. Paul; six of these occurrences are in the Pastoral Epistles. Their meaning in no way derives from Stoicism; it corresponds to common Hellenistic usage, as copiously attested in literary texts, honorific inscriptions, and funerary epigrams.

Semnos is a common modifier for divinities¹ and things pertaining to them: the temple (2Macc 3:12; Philo, To Gaius 198), the high priest,² the law (2Macc 6:28; Ep. Arist. 5, 171, 313), the Sabbath (2Macc 6:11), the sacred psalms (Philo, Contemp. Life 29), and religious clothing (ibid. 66). Applied to people and things, semnotes suggests grandeur, magnificence, solemnity, a quality that inspires respect, fear, or reverence.³ It refers especially to honorable conduct, a dignified and level-headed existence, and a high standard of morality: ho semnos bios = the religious life.⁴ It is in this sense that 1Tim 2:2 expresses the hope “that we may lead a calm and tranquil life in all godliness and religious dignity” (en pase eusebeia kai semnoteti). The church is the household or family of God (3:5), and its members are a priestly congregation; the semnotes of each one is the dignity of a liturgy, a mode of existence defined by piety and worship, marked by the seriousness, gravity, decency that are fitting in God’s presence.⁵ The papyri,⁶ like the honorific decrees, emphasize the nobility or excellence of semnotes: “for a dignified life” (epi te semnoteti tou biou);⁷ a decree of Delphi for an enkomiographos: “exhibited worthiness of character” (ethon epedeixato semnoteta);⁸ at Magnesia, a son boasts of his father’s dignity: “because of the dignity of his character and the nobility he inherited from his forbears”;⁹ at Philadelphia in Lydia: “praised for character and for a dignified and stable life” (epi te ethei kaibiou semnoteti kai eustatheia epainethenta, Ath. Mitt., 1900, p. 122, n.1); at Thyatira, “praised for dignified character and reasonable ways” (epi te tou ethous semnoteti kai tropou epieikeia epainoumenon, Hermes, 1930, p. 109).

Semnotes has to do not only with bearing and attitude (Philo, Flacc. 4), one’s comportment in general (en pasi semnoteti, Dittenberger, Syl. 807, 14; Or. 567, 200), or even collective behavior (to semnon tes philadelphias hymon, BGU, 1024, col. VIII, 7; cf. 1Clem. 47.5; 48.1), but with a religious and moral posture that bears the mark of excellence: “Whatsoever things are true, noble (hosa semna), just, pure, lovely, honorable . . . think on these things” (Phil 4:8; cf. Dio Chrysostom 31.6). The episkopos will raise his children in submission, meta pases semnotetos (1Tim 3:4), meaning that the dignity of those in authority inspires fear and respect,¹⁰ or better that the educator imparts flawless moral rectitude to his students.¹¹ Titus in his teaching is to maintain “purity, dignity (semnoteta), speech that is wholesome and unassailable.”¹² Deacons must be semnoi (1Tim 3:8), i.e., serious and honorable, because they carry out a public function that requires respectability in the minister¹³ and inspires respect and even praise in those who witness his life, like the high priest Ananus, “a venerable and just man who, despite his noble birth, his dignity, and his honors, loved to treat the humblest as his equals” (Josephus, War 4.319), or Caristianus, who is praised in the year 98 for having carried out his command over all Greece “with brilliance and in a praiseworthy manner” (semnos kai axiologos, Fouilles de Delphes, III, 4; n. 47, 7). There is nothing off-putting about this gravity; seriousness does not rule out kindness.¹⁴

“Likewise, the women [must be] dignified” (1Tim 3:11), after the fashion of Aphrodisia, a steady woman, involved in her husband’s business: Aphrodeisia semnotate kai pistotate . . . gynaiki.¹⁵ Semnotes is one of the virtues that is praised in women: Hannah led a calm and austere life;¹⁶ Esther was the same when she appeared before Ahasuerus (Josephus, Ant. 11.234); the mother of the Maccabees shared the same virtue (4Macc 17.5). A woman is adorned not with gold and silver, but hosa semnotetos, eutaxias, aidous (Plutarch, Con. praec. 26). In the papyri, and especially in the inscriptions, semnotes is sometimes purely honorific,¹⁷ but usually it is an outstanding quality suggestive of reserve and restraint, discretion, self-mastery under all circumstances: gynaika semnen,¹⁸ whether with respect to young women,¹⁹ or especially married women (“the noble and most dignified wife,” he kale kai semnotate symbios, P. Ross. Georg. V, 6, 27), as at Sinope (“to his wife, Prokope, most reverent, known for her restraint and dignity”—Prokope gynaiki heautou eusebestate kai semnoteti sophrosynes memartyremene, BCH, 1920, p. 359), or Aurelia Philotera, who “lived with dignity and distinction” (semnos kai epiphanos zesasan, IG X, 2, n. 176, 11–13; cf. 194, 6–9: “the dignified and affectionate Pontia Kallistiane,” ten semnotaten kai philostorgon Pontian Kallistianen). Semnotes, frequently in the superlative,²⁰ is associated with philandria (MAMA VIII, 476, 514), philoteknia (SEG VI, 452), and sophrosyne (MAMA VIII, 470, 4). An epitaph from the third century AD: “The dignified Berous, daughter of Chrysippus, was a Penelope in deed and not in fiction, chaste in her marriage, prudent despite her youth, a good mistress of her house and her life” (IGLS 721, 2–3). Some Jewish women are named Semnous.²¹

Titus 2:2 requires old men to be sober, dignified (semnous), level-headed (sophronas); here we could translate semnos as “venerable” or “very respectable”; seriousness, which excludes eccentricity and peculiarity, is a characteristic of old age,²² as this epitaph from the high imperial period says: “You were so dignified, while still a child, that you seemed to have the intelligence of an old man.”²³

A Christian cannot have less virtue than the honest pagan whose epitaph reads “in everything you were dignified” (en panti d’ estha semnos, SEG VIII, 372, 11; second century; cf. TAM II, 422 a 17; b 15); his name is “revered, admired, worthy to be loved by all.”²⁴

¹ Aristophanes, Av. 727: Zeus sits in majesty in the clouds; 2Macc 8:15, the name of God is “august and majestic”; Philo, Spec. Laws 2.7, 2.253; Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.221; the semnos theai = dii Sebastoi are the venerable gods, especially Isis (SB 4094, 8; 8140, 3; 8434 = SEG VIII, 550 = E. Bernand, Philae, n. 157–158) and Poseidon (Sophocles, OC 55; Euripides, IT 1415; Aristophanes, Thesm. 322; C. Austin, “De nouveaux fragments de l’Erechthée d’Euripide,” in RechPap, vol. 4, Paris, 1967, p. 39, line 93); Aphrodite (Euripides, Hipp. 103); Athena (P.Oxy. 2619, ed. D. Page, Supplementum Lyricis Graecis, Oxford, 1974, p. 26); “Calliope, august among the muses” (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 168, 15);

the Erinyes are the Fearsome Ones—Σεμναί (Aeschylus, Eum. 383, 1041); cf. Foerster, on this word, in TDNT, vol. 7, p. 191.

² Philo, To Gaius 296; Josephus, War 4.319. Chairestrate is “august priestess of the Mother of all things” (GVI, n. 421, 1).

³ Ep. Arist. 144: “All has been drawn up with this solemnity in order to inspire wholesome reflection and moral reform, through concern for justice”; 258: the king creates imposing (semna) edifices “so that those who see them will spare them because of their beauty”; Philo, Rewards 97: “majesty (semnotes), strength, and beneficence protect government from subversion”; Joseph 165, 257: impressed by the dignity of Jacob’s appearance, the king received him with all the trappings of respect and esteem. Cf. noble thoughts (Ep. Arist. 271), a royal task (Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 49), “noble combat” (Dittenberger, Syl. 35 E), a theme that is “lofty and pleasing to the gods” (Ps.-Plutarch, De mus. 14). Aristotle defined semnotes as “a mild and becoming form of arrogance” (Aristotle, Rh. 2.17.1391a27); Plutarch, De vit. pud. 3: “a serious (semnos) man, grand and just.” In Strattis (Lemn.): σεμνοπρόσωπον (P.Oxy. 2743, frag. XVII, 6). Diodorus Siculus 17.34.6: the hieratic majesty of bearing of the Great King of the Persians; 38, 2: the august majesty that must surround the wife of Darius.

⁴ Philo, Contemp. Life 25: the life of the Therapeutai and Therapeutrides, which is not only a life dedicated to the worship of God, nor even the practice of the leading moral virtues, but a dignified and serious attitude, a sober bearing, even a nobility of appearance that expresses the quality of the soul (cf. a queenly bearing, Dio Chrysostom, Or. 1.70: τὸ δὲ πρόσωπον φαιδρὸν ὁμοῦ καὶ σεμνόν); Philo, Drunkennes 149: Hannah’s sober and austere life; Josephus, Life 258: “Ask them how I lived; ask them if I carried out my functions in the land with all the requisite dignity and character” (ε—βίωσα . . . μετὰ πάσης σεμνότητος καὶ πάσης ἀρετῆς).

⁵ Cf. Tertullian, Praescip. 43: “ubi metus in Deum, ibi gravitas honesta.”

⁶ BGU 1756, 15: σεμνότατε διοικητά (59/58 BC); 1843, 13: σεμνότατε στρατηγέ (50/49 BC); P.Bon. 46, 11; P.Mil.Vogl. 24, 5: ε—ρρω—σθαι ὡς ε—μὸν σεμνὸν κύριον (second century); SB 7530, 8: τω— σεμνοτάτω πολλά τε χαίρειν; E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 22, col. IV, 3: “a worthy trainer named Hermocrates”; 106, 6: “the prefect’s noble and faithful messenger” (= SEG VII, 797 = SB 7905); 141, 1: “the venerable Memnon”; 168, 7: “I received from the gods the noble gift of eloquent thought.” The term is honorific when applied to cities (Pap.Lugd.Bat. II, 4, 2; P.Stras. 280, 2; P.Oxy. 2108, 17; 2476, 17, 34, 41; SB 6160, 5; 7375, 8; 7803, 6; cf. I.

Biezunska-Malowist, “Acte d’achat d’une esclave,” in P.Coll.Youtie II, p. 507), to a court (ibid. 8246, 7: τω—σεμνω—τούτω δικαστηρίω; cf. 9825, 5; P.Oxy. 2418, 2; I.Bulg. 1391, 4: σεμνω—δεσποσύνω), a dinner club (an ἔρανος: σεμνός σύνοδος, C. Michel, Recueil, 1563, 31); σεμνοτάτα καὶ ἀρχαιοτάτω συνεδρίω (MAMA, vol. 8, 523), to the gerousia (TAM II, 294, 325), to the boule (IG II–III2, n. 3962).

⁷ Honorific inscription of Iotape, in L. Robert, Documents, pp. 78–79.

⁸ Ed. L. Robert, Etudes épigraphiques, p. 18 (cf. p. 20, an inscription of Aphrodisias, τὴν περὶ τὸν βίον σεμνότητι καὶ σωφροσύνη). Idem (in Opera Minora Selecta, vol. 1, p. 681) cites an honorific decree from Delphi, διὰ τὴν εὐτονίαν τοῦ ἔργου καὶ τὴν σεμνότητα τοῦ τρόπου; in another, διὰ τὴν τω—ν ἡθω—ν σεμνότητα καὶ διὰ τὴν τοῦ βίου κοσμιότητα; at Rhodes, τω—ν ἡθω—ν σεμνότητος ἕνεκεν; IG, XII, 1, 84.

⁹ Διὰ τε τὴν τω—ν ἡθω—ν σεμνότητα καὶ τὴν ἀπὸ τω—ν προγόνων εὐγένειαν, I.Magn. 163, 1–3 (republished by L. Robert, Gladiateurs, n. 152); 113, 12, a physician: ἀνάλογον πεποίηται τὴν ε—πιδημίαν τῇ περὶ ε—αὐτὸν σεμνότητι; MAMA VIII, 408, 6: ἡθω—ν τε σεμνότητε καὶ ε—ναρέτου βίου ἀγωγῇ; 409, 2; 410, 4: βίον σεμνὸν καὶ ε—νάρετον; 497,4: διὰ τὴν τοῦ βίου ἀρετὴν καὶ σεμνότητα; cf. 399, 2: τω—ν ἰ—δίω σεμνοτάτω μνείαςχάριν.

¹⁰ Cf. Philo, Spec. Laws 1.142; Diotogenes, in Stobaeus 48.9.62 (vol. 4, p. 268); the king’s majesty must be evident in his prudence, and his conduct must have nothing vulgar about it (ibid. 267); cf. Lucian, Lucret. 5: “all semnoi people and trustworthy witnesses.” Plutarch, Ant. 50.7: “a beautiful and noble sight.”

¹¹ Cf. Sasandros, a sober and dignified (semnos) young man, also studious (MAMA VIII, 263); I.Bulg. 1023, 2: ἡπιος, ἡδὺς ἰ—δει—ν, σεμνός, ἅπανσι φίλος.

¹² Titus 2:7. This “dignity” is above all religious, excluding from preaching profane elements (βεβήλους, 1Tim 4:7; 6:20), myths, and “sophisticated fables” (2Pet 1:16), which are so many profanations of the sacred. A “worthy word” is an utterance that is pure and holy (Prov 8:6; 15:26), showing respect for its object (4Macc 1:17); cf. Ep. Arist. 31: “the teaching (of the biblical books) is august and holy”; Philo, To Gaius 361; Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.225: τὴν σεμνότητα τῆς ἡμετέρας θεολογίας; 1Clem. 7.2.

¹³ Cf. the Latin gravitas honesta; O. Hiltbrunner, “Vir gravis,” in Festschrift A. Debrunner, Berne, 1954, pp. 195–207; J. Gaudemet, “Majestas Populi Romani,” in Synteleia (Festschrift for V. Arangio-Ruiz), Naples, 1964, vol. 2, pp. 700ff. J. P. Lévy, “Dignitas, Gravitas, Auctoritas Testium,” in Studi in onore di B. Biondi, Milan, 1965, vol. 2, pp. 29–94.

¹⁴ Plutarch, Nic. 2.4: “the gravity (τὸ σεμνόν) of Nicias was in no way austere or off-putting”; Per. 5.3; Quaest. conv. 1.1.2: it is in jest that temperance and justice are accused of being too serious; 1.4.2: “one who is by nature serious and grim, not to say sour, relaxes when drinking and becomes more pleasant and friendly”; cf. Philo, Moses 1.20.

¹⁵ MAMA VIII, 182; with the commentary of L. Robert (Hellenica, vol. 13, p. 36), who compares this woman of Cyrene, ἦν πάντες σεμνήν γεινώσκουσιν . . . πολλῶ—ν πραγματιῶ—ν μέτοχος γενόμαν πιστὴ κατὰ πάντα (1Tim 3:11 requires sempnas deaconesses to be πιστὰς ε—ν πα—σιν). Plutarch loves to praise seriousness and respectability as a woman’s true adornment (Plutarch, Con. praec. 145 E–F), as in the case of Octavia, Cicero’s sister, “combining great beauty, seriousness (σεμνότητα) and intelligence” (Ant. 31.4; cf. 51.5); of magistrates (An seni 793 B–D; 801 D); a virtue that culminates in “royal majesty,” as with Demetrius Poliorcetes (Plutarch, Demetr. 2.21) but is proper to all who are well-born (εὐγένεια).

¹⁶ Philo, Drunkenness 149; same link in Creation 164; Spec. Laws 4.179; To Gaius 167; SB 6160, 2, 5.

¹⁷ “The venerable spouse of Emperor Hadrian” (SB 8211, 8); “you remembered his august and legitimate spouse” (ibid. 8212, 8); “venerable Persephone, daughter of Demeter” (epitaph at Thermion, first century BC; ibid. n. 8960, 3); “noble offspring” (epitaph of the Cretan Juliana, in E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 50, 2).

¹⁸ G. E. Bean, T. B. Mitford, Cilicia, n. XXXVII, 4; cf. L. and J. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1964, p. 238, n. 536; p. 252, n. 604; σεμνοτάτη πασω—ν; 1Clem. 1.3.

¹⁹ Heliodorus, Aeth. 10.21.2; τὴν κούρην συνέσει τε καὶ ἤθεσιν ἔργοισι σεμνήν (F. Cumont, Studia Pontica III, 80, 1); σεμνήν θυγατέρα (SEG III, 610, 6).

²⁰ MAMA VIII, 37, 116, 182, 370; GVI, n. 421, 1.

²¹ M. Schwabe and B. Lifshitz, Beth She‘arim, vol. 2, p. IX, a.

²² 4Macc 5:36—“You shall not defile the venerable mouth of an old man”; 7:15—“O venerable white hairs”; cf. Philo, Etern. World 77: “It is a property not of youth but of old age to discern that which deserves veneration and zeal”; PSI 41, 9: a woman declares that she is the offspring ε—κ σεμνω—ν γονέων καὶ εὐδοκίμων; P.Oxy. 2546, 388: θνητω—ν σεμνοτάτων γονέων.

²³ GVI, n. 1935, 11 = SEG VIII, 372 = E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 71.

²⁴ 1Clem. 1.1: τὸ σεμνὸν καὶ περιβόητον καὶ πα—σιν ἀνθρώποις ἀξιαγάπητον ὄνομα.

σημει—ον

semeion, sign

semeion, S 4592; TDNT 7.200–261; NIDNTT 2.626–627, 629; MM 572–573; L&N 33.477; BAGD 747–748

In secular and biblical Greek, the basic meaning “sign”¹ is applied to very different things: the notice that bears a court’s verdict (Plato, Resp. 10.614, c), a seal or signature,² the engraving on a shield,³ a ship’s decoration (Thucydides 6.31.3), a landmark or milestone (Herodian 2.13.18), a flag (Xenophon, Cyr. 8.5.13), the ensign of a flagship.⁴

One of the most widespread meanings in the papyri is distinctive “mark” or identifying “sign,” whether with respect to things, animals, or people: “this marks the burial place” (estin de semeion tes taphes, P.Paris 18 bis, 10; cf. SB 9420, 8); “I sold the female camel whose distinguishing feature is described.”⁵ Gemellus complains to the epistrategos that he was appointed to a leitourgia under a false name and without regard to his characteristics.⁶ Just as a phylactery is a sign worn around the arm (Ep. Arist. 159), circumcision is a mark on the flesh signifying the covenant.⁷ These personal “marks” are not necessarily physical; virtues can also be “distinctives”: “I considered such things to be the signs of good men” (hegoumen semeia agathon andron ta toiauta einai, Dittenberger, Syl. 831, 14; from AD 117). Such are the “signs” or “character traits” (Plutarch, Cat. Min. 24.1: ta ton ethon semeia) by which an apostle may be recognized, according to 2Cor 12:12 (cf. b. Sanh. 98a–b ; 1QS 3.14).

So a semeion is noetic; developed from sema, it is very close to “signal,”⁸ “writing,”⁹ and “message”;¹⁰ literary¹¹ and papyrological texts often treat “sign” as the equivalent of “proof.” This is the authenticating or identifying sign which the Fourth Gospel uses in a theological way and which St. Paul exploits in 2Thess 3:17—“This greeting is in my hand, Paul’s hand, which is the mark (or proof) in every letter; this is how I write.”

The autographed greeting authenticates the letter.¹² Already in 255 BC, a certain Plato, requesting a service from Zeno, sends him as proof of his goodwill two artabai of chick-peas purchased at five drachmas apiece (semeion de hoti soi apestella para Sosou erebinthou kriou artabas β? egorasmenas, P.Cair.Zen. 59192, 8). A century later, Stratonikus, to prove to his wife that it is indeed her husband who is writing to her, mentions as a sign something that he had said to her in private: “Stratonikos to Senchnoubis his wife, greetings. Recognize as a sign: when I said to you to buy the new tunic with the money” (Stratonikos Senchnoubei te gynaike chairein. Semeion hote eipa soi lytrosai ton kainon chitona apo ton chalkon ginouke, SB 7574, 2: a letter on an ostrakon). In the second century AD, the sign to the recipient of a letter that the author is well-informed is that he knows that his wife went out to buy four obols worth of spices (allo semeion soi grapho peri autou, hote he gyne sou exelthousa egorake obolon tessaron artymata to nautiko, P.Petaus 28, 8 and 17). In the same period, Anthestianus, having sent Sarapammon to the potter Psois, who refuses to pay his debts, informs his debtor that he cannot cheat him, because he knows what Psois has said and done.¹³ In the fourth century, Probus asks his sister Manatine to pay one and a half talents to his confidential aide Petronius, and as proof that it is he who is writing (semeiou de charin) says “When I met you at the Caesareion, I said to you, ‘Give me a little of the money that you have from me, so that I may buy a cauldron,’ and you said to me . . .”¹⁴

Thus semeion is the sign whereby the recipient may recognize the identity of the sender; the sender mentions circumstances that only the two of them could know about.¹⁵ This meaning is also found in the epigrams: Bacchon sends his slave to borrow money from the perfumer Aischra and tells him that as a sign of his identity he should refer to his amorous exploits.¹⁶ Likewise, Pytias’s lover wants to summon her: “As proof that it is I, tell her that he came drunk, passing through thieves, guided by Eros the bold.”¹⁷

In the religious sphere, semeion has always meant a prodigy that is recognizable and provides proof for everyone.¹⁸ In the NT, it is a category of miracle, together with mighty works (dynameis) and wonders (terata, Acts 2:22; 2Thess 2:9; 2Cor 12:12; Heb 2:4); but it retains its value as a sign or demonstration.¹⁹ With the prophets, a “sign” is proof that a message is truly from God (Exod 3:12; 4:19; Judg 6:17; 1Sam 10:1, 7; Isa 38:7-8). For Philo, God performs semeia to indicate his will, to teach people, and to introduce them to the knowledge of heavenly things.²⁰ More clearly, according to Josephus, “God uses miracles to convince people” (Ant. 2.274, 280); they are designed to inspire faith (2.276). Hence the persistent demand of Jesus’ contemporaries: “We want to see a sign from you” (Matt 12:38; 16:1; Mark 8:11; Luke 11:16; John 2:18; 6:30). “The Jews seek signs” (1Cor 1:22).

This is how St. John sees miracles: they authenticate Jesus as the Messiah announced by the prophets.²¹ Since they are wonders and manifestations of power (Matt 9:28-29) as well as of mercy (11:5), they legitimate adherence to his teaching (11:20) and give him personal credibility.²² They show who he is: “He manifested his glory and his disciples believed in him” (John 2:11; 11:4). They are above all a sign of the Father’s favor: “No one can do the signs that you do unless God is with him.”²³ By referring to the mirabilia done by Jesus as “signs,” St. John shows that he understands them as data that allow the discovery of the glory (doxa) of the incarnate Word, the revelation that Jesus is with God or comes from God,²⁴ and finally the recognition of the testimony of the Father on behalf of his Son.²⁵

This theology enriches and adds subtlety to the concept of semeion. Should we translate “sign,” “indication,” or “proof”?²⁶ What is certain is that the sign itself needs to be verified. If it is a guarantee of the authenticity of the Sent One and of the truth of the teaching, it has demonstrative power only for souls that are well-disposed or believing. It can provoke astonishment or emotion, even admiration (John 2:23; 6:26; Acts 8:9, 13) without adherence: “Even though he had done so many signs in their presence, still they did not believe in him” (John 12:37). It is even possible to slip into superstition at the sight of wonders, like Alexander, according to Plutarch (Alex. 75.1ff.). The semeia of false prophets appear to confirm error (Deut 13:2-5), and according to 1Cor 14:22, speaking in tongues is a sign for believers, but not for unbelievers. In other words, the “sign” is intelligible only to the religious intelligence; it is a veiled manifestation that only the eyes of the heart can discover,²⁷ a propaedeutic to faith, attracting attention and prompting to an initiative, as with Nicodemus (John 3:2). Thus it is necessary to transcend the materiality of the deed in order to get to its meaning, or better, to the signified reality.²⁸

¹ Hebrew ‘ōt, 79 times in the LXX; cf. C. A. Keller, Das Wort twa als Offenbarungszeichen Gottes, Basel, 1946.

² Plato, Leg. 9.856 a; Tht. 191 d; Xenophon, Hell. 5.1.30; P.Rev., col. 26, 5: ἀποδειξάτωσαν τὸ ἐπιβληθὲν σημεῖον ἄσινές.

³ Herodotus 1.171; Euripides, Phoen. 142, 1111, 1114; cf. P.Warr. 15, 11: “during my absence, the weaver made tunics—ἤργασατο αὐτὰ δίχα σημείου,” i.e. of a certain design or model, or without hems or embroidery (Latin clavus); cf. J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1954, p. 124, n. 88 a.

⁴ Herodotus 8.92. In the LXX, σημεῖον also translates the Hebrew words nes, “pole, flag, standard” (Num 21:8-9; Isa 11:12; 13:2; 18:3; 28:12, 27; 33:23); siyûn “pillar, monument,” and taw, “mark” (Ezek 9:4, 6; 39:15); mô’ed, smoke “signal” (Judg 20:38; cf. Josephus, War 2.579; 3.88, 105; 6.68; Ant. 5.46; 12.404; 18.61); môpet, “prodigy, wonder” (Exod 7:9; 11:9-10); cf. R. Formesyn, “Le Sèmeion johannique et le sèmeion hellénistique,” in ETL, 1962, pp. 856–894; ôt = “ensign” in 1QM 3.12; 1QpHab 6.4.

⁵ Πέπρακα τὸν κάμηλον θήλιαν οὐ— τὸ σημει—ον πρόκειται, BGU 427, 30; P.Ross. Georg. II, 18, 226; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XVI, 15, 7: an adult female ass, white, with a mark over the right eye; SB 5679, 6: ὄνου λευκῆς οὔσης, ε—χούσης σημει—ον ε—πὶ τοῦ τραχήλου; P.Oxy. 1635, 9 (first century BC). In a Samian law from the second century BC, the prytaneis are invited to place the landmarks (σημει—α ποιήσαντες) and limit the location of each division of the people (χιλιαστύς, Dittenberger, Syl. 976, 5).

⁶ Ἡ ἄλλο τι τω—ν ε—μω—ν σημείων, P.Mich. 426, 14; cf. PSI 897, 70: σὺν τοι—ς ἄλλοις τεκμηρίοις καὶ σημείοις; 1118, 11 (from AD 25 or 37); SB 7662, 16: “Maris, the beneficiary, took your name and description” (ἔλαβεν σου τὸ ὄνομα καὶ τὰ σημει—α καὶ λέγει ὅτι . . .); P.Oxy. 1463, 29–29: ἀκολουθῶς τοι—ς σημείοις τω— ὑπομνήματι ε—γγεγραμμένοις (according to Berichtigungsliste, vol. 3, p. 137). Cf. J. Hasebroek, Das Signalement in den Papyrusurkunden, Berlin-Leipzig, 1921; G. Hübsch, Die Personalangaben als Identifizierungsmerk, Berlin, 1968.

⁷ Σημει—ον διαθήκης (Gen 17:11); Rom 4:11—σημει—ον ἔλαβεν περιτομῆς; b. shabb. 137b ; cf. b. B. Qam. 119; m. Kil. 9.10; b. Menah. 37b ; BGU 347, 14; 1064, 18; SB 15, 17; 82, 9; 9027, 18: Σηρήνος ε—πύθετο τω—ν παρόντων ι—ερογραμματέων ει— σημει—ά τινα ἔχοιεν οι— παι—δες. The mark of Cain, cf. Gen 4:15; Philo, Rewards 72; Worse Attacks Better 177; Josephus, Ant. 1.59 (there are unfavorable signs; cf. Plutarch, De vit. pud. 1.528 c). Cf. “God’s mark on the just” and “the mark of perdition” on sinners in Pss. Sol. 11.8, 10.

⁸ Herodotus 9.59; Josephus, Ant. 12.404.

⁹ Philo, Moses 2.115; Prelim. Stud. 146; P.Mil.Vogl. 50, 7: ε—άν οὖν σημει—όν σοι ε—νέγκη ἢ ε—πιστολὴν (first century AD); P.Oxy. 724, 3; 1QS 10.4; m. shabb. 7.2; 12.3–4; Plutarch, Cat. Min. 23.3: Cicero had the scribes instructed in “signs which, in a brief, shortened form, stood for several letters” (a shorthand system). On semeion as a geometrical point, from Autolycus, cf. C. Mugler, Terminologie géométrique, pp. 376–377.

¹⁰ P.Oxy. 293, 6: οὔτε διὰ γραπτοῦ οὔτε διὰ σημείου (AD 27); P.Fay. 128, 7: ἔδωκεν ἡμι—ν σημει—ον; Dittenberger, Syl. 685, 70, 75; 2Macc 15:35— “Judas affixed the head of Nicanor to the citadel as a plain and visible sign to all of God's help." Cf. the sign as portent, Plato, Phdr. 244 c; Polybius 3.112.8; Diodorus Siculus 16.27.2ff.; Dan 5:5-9; Philo, Etern. World 2; Creation 58: σημει—α μελλόντων; Josephus, War 6.285, 296; Sir 43:6; 1QH 12.8; 15.20; 1QS 10.4; 1Q27, frag. 1, 1.5; Dittenberger, Syl. 709, 25: προεσάμανε μὲν τὰν μέλλουσαν γίνεσθαι πρα—ξιν διὰ τω—ν ε—ν τω—ι—ερω— γενομένων σαμείων (107 BC); Pap.Graec.Mag. 1, 65: ἔσται δέ σοι διώκοντι τὸν λόγον σημει—ον τόδε; 74: ἔσται δέ σοι σημει—ον ε—ν τάχει τοιοῦτο. This is the meaning of the "signs of the times" (Matt 16:3), signs of the second coming of Jesus (24:3; Mark 13:4; Luke 21:7). These omens are warnings, Sib. Or. 3.457; Josephus, War 1.28; 3.404; Dio Cassius 66.17.2: there were omens that pointed to the upcoming death of Vespasian.

¹¹ Sophocles, El. 24; OT 710; Xenophon, Ages. 1.5; An. 6.2.2; Theophrastus, Char. 28.21; Polybius 4.44.3: "the proof of what I am setting forward"; Philo, Flight 204; Moses 2.18; Prelim. Stud. 92; Sacr. Abel and Cain 80. Σημει—ον is synonymous with σύμβολον in Plato's letter to Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse (Ep. 13.360 a–b), where he refers to a conversation between them that only they knew about: "that the beginning of my letter should be at the same time a sign to you of its authenticity" (ἀρχή σοι τῆς ε—πιστολῆς ἔστω καὶ ἅμα σύμβολον παρ ε—μοῦ ε—στιν; cf. H. C. Youtie, "ΣΗΜΕΙΟΝ in the Papyri and Its Significance for Plato, Epistle 13 [360 a–b]," in ZPE, vol. 6, 2, 1970, pp. 105–116; republished in Scriptiunculae, vol. 2, pp. 963–975); cf. Appian, BCiv. 4.4.14; S. Witkowski, Epistulae Privatae Graecae 34, 15: ἀπεδόθη τὰδ αὐτω— καὶ τὸ σύμβολον τω—ν ε—γ. If σύμβολον and σημει—ον are interchangeable in the sense of "conclusive piece of evidence" (cf. Plutarch, Per. 6.5), their semantics are quite different (cf. P. Gautier, Symbola, p. 72).

¹² Ὁ ἀσπασμὸς τῆ ε—μῆ χειρὶ Παύλου, ὃ ε—στιν σημει—ον ε—ν πάση ε—πιστολῇ· οὕτως γράφω. Cf. Gal 6:11—"See what large characters I write to you with my own hand." Cf. the crosses or authors' marks in the papyri: σημει—ον —Απολλωνίου (P.Rein. 9, line 4 of the summary; 35, 3); σημει—ον Εὐσεβίου (C.P.Herm. 34, 32; with the editor's note); SB 9759, 4; 9914, 9. The sign is a designation in Philo, Creation 49, 98.

¹³ P.Oxy., published in ChrEg, 1969, pp. 101–105: καὶ λόγον μὲν οὐκ ἔσχεσ τοῦ Σαραπάμμωνος ἀλλ' ἔφης αὐτω— ὅτι τὸ νῦν μοι συνχώρησον ε—πεὶ ἀπὸ ξένης ἦλθον μετὰ τῆς πίσεως μου ἵν εἰ—δῆς τὸ σημει—ον.

¹⁴ P.Oxy. 1683, 18 (M. Naldini, Il Cristianesimo in Egitto, n. 65, 18). Cf. SB 8005: πάντως οὖν ἀπαρενόχλητον αὐτὸν ποιήσον, ε—μοὶ χαριζόμενος. σημει—ον ὅτι ἡ προθεσμία σου ε—νέστηκεν (with the punctuation of J. R. Rea, "The Use of σημει—ον in SB V 8005," in ZPE, vol. 14, 1974, p. 14.)

¹⁵ Cf. the kiss of Judas as a sign of recognition (Matt 26:48), and Tobias' asking his father, "What sign of recognition (σημει—ον) shall I give him that he may know me and give me the money?" (Tob 5:2, LXX).

¹⁶ Anth. Pal. 5.181.11: εἰ—πὲ δὲ σημει—ον· Βάκχων ὅτι πέντ̄ ε—φίλησεν ε—ξῆς; cited by R. Merkelbach, "Σημει—ον im Liebesepigramm," in ZPE, vol. 6, 1970, pp. 245–246.

¹⁷ Anth. Pal. 5.213: εἰ—πὲ δὲ σημει—ον, μεθύων ὅτι καὶ διὰ κλωπῶ—ν ἦλθεν.

¹⁸ Polybius 3.112.8: "Every temple, every house was full of signs and wonders"; Strabo 16.2.35; Plutarch, Alex. 75.1; Conv. sept. sap. 3; Philo, Spec. Laws 2.218; Moses 1.210; Josephus, War 1.28; Ant. 10.28; 20.168; P.Oxy. 2624, frag. 1, 8, etc. This is very close to τεκμήριον; but according to Aristotle's logic, (Aristotle, An. Pr. 70a11), a τεκμήριον is a demonstrative argument that is certain, whereas a σημει—ον is an argument that is probable; among the Stoics and the Epicureans, it becomes the point of departure for a deductive argument intended to produce certitude concerning the existence of a reality that is not observable, Sextus Empiricus, Math. 8.142 e; Zeno, Sign. 1.14; Epicurus, Epist. 2.43; Philodemus of Gadara, Sign. 27.

¹⁹ Hymn to Mandoulis: "I have seen the brilliant signs of your power" (SB 4127, 3); cf. Ep. Arist. 44: "that is the sign of friendship and affection"; 150, 270; Diogenes Laertius 8.32: τὰ σημει—α νόσου καὶ ὑγείας; in the second century, Ptolemaeus writes to his father: "since you do not write to me, this will be the sign that you have forgotten me" (ε—πεὶ τῶ— μὴ γράφειν μοι, ἔσται σημει—ον τοῦ δηλοῦν μου ἀμνημονει—ν, P.Mert. 22,9).

²⁰ Philo, Moses 1.95: "God indicated his will to them . . . through signs and wonders" (διὰ σημείων καὶ τεράτων τὸ βούλημα δεδηλωκότος); 1.76: "If they no longer have confidence, they will change once they have received the teaching of the three signs that no human has yet seen and understood"; 1.82, 90, 91; Etern. World 2: "God would not refuse to introduce souls to the knowledge of heavenly things through dreams, oracles, signs, and miracles." Cf. Josephus, War 6.285: "God ordered them to ascend to the temple to receive signs of their salvation."

²¹ Cf. "Les Miracles, signes messianiques de Jésus et œuvres de Dieu," in Recueil L. Cerfaux, vol. 2, pp. 41–50; K. Gatzweiler, "La Conception paulinienne du miracle," in ETL, 1961, pp. 813–846; M. E. Boismard, "Foi et miracle dans le quatrième Evangile," in RB, 1962, pp. 188ff. C. F. D.

Moule, Miracles, London, 1966; Rengstorf, “σημει—ον,” in TDNT, vol. 7, pp. 229ff.

²² John 6:30; cf. 7:31—“When the Christ comes, will he perform more signs than this man?”; 10:42; J. Kallas, The Significance of the Synoptic Miracles, London, 1961.

²³ John 3:2; cf. 5:26; 10:38; 11:42. The most decisive miracle is the resurrection of the crucified, “the sign of Jonah” (Matt 12:39; 16:4; Luke 11:29-30); cf. A. M. Dubarle, “Le Signe du Temple, Jo. II, 19,” in RB, 1939, pp. 21–44; A. Vögtle, “Der Spruch vom Janaszeichen,” in Synoptische Studien: Festschrift A. Wikenhauser, Munich, 1954, pp. 230–277; R. Branton, “Resurrection in the Early Church,” in A. Wikgren, Studies in Honor of H. R. Willoughby, Chicago, 1961, pp. 35–47; J. Sint, “Die Auferstehung Jesu in der Verkündigung der Urgemeinde,” in ZKT, 1962, pp. 129–151; O. Glombitza, “Das Zeichen des Jona,” in NTS, 1962, vol. 8, pp. 359–360; R. A. Edwards, The Sign of Jonas in the Theology of the Evangelists and Q, London, 1971.

²⁴ John 9:33; J. P. Michaud, Le Signe de Cana, Montreal, 1963; M. Orge, “El σημει—ον de la ‘hora’ (Jo. XIII, 1–17),” in Claretianum (Rome), vol. 5, 1965, pp. 95–140; J. Ramos-Regidor, “Signo y poder: A propósito de la exegesis patristica de Jn. II, 1–11,” in Salesianum, 1965, pp. 499–562; 1966, pp. 3–64; L. Erdozáin, La función del signo en la fe según el Cuarto Evangelio, Rome, 1968; A. Geysler, “The Semeion at Cana of the Galilee,” in Studies in John Presented to Pr. J. N. Sevenster, Leiden, 1970, pp. 12–21; S. S. Smalley, “The Sign in John XXI,” in NTS, vol. 20, 1974, pp. 275–288.

²⁵ John 14:10; cf. J. P. Charlier, “La Notion de signe (σημει—ον) dans le IVe Evangile,” in RSPT, 1959, pp. 434–448; D. Mollat, “Le Semeion johannique,” in Sacra Pagina, Paris, 1959, vol. 2, pp. 209–218; W. Nicol, The Semeia in the Fourth Gospel, Leiden, 1972.

²⁶ Σημει—ον can also mean a symbol (Lucian, Syr. D. 33; Philo, Worse Attacks Better 1), a symptom (ibid. 43); an indication (Moses 1.188; Josephus, Ant. 18.211).

²⁷ There are clear signs (Philo, Rewards 31; Abraham 60; Spec. Laws 1.90; Moses 1.269); but in any event they must be interpreted (Dreams 1.197).

²⁸ C. P. Grelot, Sens chrétien de l’Ancien Testament, Paris-Tournai, 1962, pp. 261ff. H. Baltensweiler, “Wunder und Glaube im N. T.,” in TZ, 1967, pp.

241–256; M. Whittaker, “Signs and Wonders’: The Pagan Background,” in F. L. Cross, SE, vol. 5, Berlin, 1968, pp. 155–158; J. Becker, “Wunder und Christologie,” in NTS, vol. 16, 1970, pp. 130–148; G. Dellings, Studien zum Neuen Testament, Göttingen, 1970, pp. 72–129, 146–159.

σηρικός (siriko/q)

serikos (sirikos), silk

serikos, S 4596; EDNT 3.242; MM 573, 575; BAGD 751

Inspired by the lamentation of Ezek 27:9-25 over the ruin of Tyre, the dirge in Rev 18:12 describes the lamentation of the “merchants of the earth” over the ruin of Babylon, the loss of the cargoes from their ships: “cargo of gold and silver, of precious stones and pearls, of fine linen and purple, of silk (sirikou) and scarlet cloth.” The text is interesting both because it evokes the importation of luxury items from Africa and the Orient¹ and also because of the use of the biblical hapax serikon,² which does not appear before the time of Augustus. It derives from Ser (plural Seres), referring to a people of the Far East, probably the Chinese,³ and also products originating in China: silk. At Vespasian’s triumph, where he was accompanied by Titus, “the emperors were unarmed, clothed in silk (esthesin serikais) and crowned with laurels” (Josephus, War 7.126).

It is a curious fact that the ancients thought that silk came from a plant. According to Strabo 15.1.20, “Nearchus said that (the wool that grew on certain trees) was used to weave fine materials used by the Macedonians for cushions and saddle pads; the serica also are of this kind, Byssus being dried out of certain barks.”⁴ Pausanias, writing in the time of Marcus Aurelius, is the one who corrects this error: “As for the threads from which the Seres make their clothing, they do not come from a husk but from a different origin, as follows. There exists in their land a small animal, called by the Greeks a ser. . . . Its size is double that of the largest beetle; for the rest, it resembles a spider. . . . The work of these animals is a fine web that is found rolled about their feet.”⁵

These silk fabrics, given their quality,⁶ enjoyed prodigious success in the first century, especially in the higher classes of society: “The empress’s silk robes, brought out from the palace armories” (Martial, Epigr. 11.8.5). A slave of Marcella, named Thymele, was her siricaria, responsible for the wardrobe of sericae vestes (CIL VI, 9892). Caligula was not afraid to appear in public dressed in silk (processit aliquando sericatus), but he was criticized by Suetonius (“dress unworthy of a Roman and even of a human being,” Calig. 52). In AD 16, a senatus consultum forbade men to wear silk (Tacitus, Ann. 2.33; Dio Cassius 57.15). It was only in the sixth century that sericulture was introduced in the West, at least according to Procopius of Gaza: monks from India, knowing how zealously Emperor Justinian tried to keep the Romans from buying silk from their enemies the Persians, explained to the emperor that it was possible to make silk in Roman territory, “because they said that silk was produced by a worm that nature taught the art and compelled to work. . . . These men brought some eggs to Byzantium; they succeeded in transforming them into worms, which they fed mulberry leaves; and so the Romans began to make silk” (Goth. 4.17).

¹ Cf. Pliny, HN 12.2: “the man came to ask for material from the Seres”; 12.84—“according to the lowest estimate, India, the Seres, and this peninsula take a hundred million sesterces a year from our empire; that is how dearly our women’s love of luxury costs us”; 34.145; cf. 7.21; 14.22; Peripl. Erythr. 39: from the city of Thinaï, “cotton, thread and material called serikon are brought by foot (in caravans) across Bactria . . . as far as Limyrica”; Cosmas Indicopleustes, Top. 2.45: “There are people who, in order to procure silk for miserable trade, think nothing of traveling to the ends of the earth.”

² The text has perhaps been altered (twice the case changes from genitive to accusative). The Jewish tradition (followed by older English translations) identifies the Hebrew meshî (fine material) of Ezek 16:10, 13, with which Yahweh wants to clothe Jerusalem, with silk; but silk did not appear before the time of Alexander. Cf. Aristotle: “Through metamorphosis from the larva there comes first a caterpillar, then a cocoon, then from this a nympa. . . . Certain women unwind the cocoons of this insect in order to weave a fabric from it. It is said that the first to practice this weaving was a woman of Cos, Pamphila, daughter of Plates” (HA 5.19; text copied almost literally by Pliny, HN 11.76). According to the French translator of this text, P. Louis, this has to do not with Chinese silk but with a related species acclimated to Asia Minor.

³ P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique, on this word. Cf. G. Coedes, Textes d’auteurs grecs et latins relatifs à l’Extrême Orient, Paris, 1910 (reprinted as Testimonia of Greek and Latin Writers on Lands and Peoples of the Far East, Chicago, 1979); W. R. in DKP, vol. 5, p. 78.

⁴ Cf. Virgil, G. 2.121: “From the leaves of trees the Seres unwind fine fleeces”; Horace, Epod. 8.15–16; Propertius 1.14.22: “What good were his silks (serica) of varied texture?”; Ovid, Am. 1.14.6; Seneca, Lucil. 90.15; Phdr. 389: “the threads that the distant Seres gather from their trees”; Herc. 667; Pliny, HN 6.54: “The Seres, famous for the wool of their forests; they detach the white down from the leaves by watering them; then our women carry out the twofold task of unwinding and weaving it. Thanks to such complicated operations, carried out in countries so distant, our matron can appear in public wearing transparent material”; Silius Italicus, Pun. 6.4; 17.595–596: “The Seres who dwell in the East see . . . their wool-laden woods whiten”; Statius, Silv. 1.2.122–123; Ammianus Marcellinus 23.6.67.

⁵ Pausanias 6.26.6–9; cf. Philostratus, Imag. 2.28: “Behold the spider that spins nearby. In the art of weaving it is not surpassed by Penelope or even the Seres whose fabrics are extremely fine and barely visible”; Heliodorus, Aeth. 10.25.2: “the ambassadors of the Seres brought fabrics woven with the thread produced by the spider of their country, one robe dyed purple, another brilliant white.” Hence Hesychius: “Σῆρες: animals that spin silk; or the the name of the people from which ὀλοσηρικόν comes”; “Σηρω—v: the worms that make serika. Seres are worms.”

⁶ Plutarch, De Pyth. or. 4: “Why should not the same thing be fine and solid? Such is the case with materials of silk and linen” (ὥσπερ τὰ σηρικὰ καὶ τὰ βύσσινα); Dionysius Periegetes 752–757: “The barbarous tribes of the Seres . . . weave multicolored flowers of their desert country and with much art make precious garments with the brilliance of the prairie flowers, which the work of the spiders cannot rival”; Dio Cassius 43.24: Caesar had veils of silk (παραπετάσματα σηρικά) unfurled above the spectators; “Now this fabric is a work of the softness of the barbarians, and from them it has spread to us as a result of the excessive love of luxury of a people that has become completely effeminate.” Σηρικόν is attested only once in the papyri, in a list of various articles (P.Oxy. 1922, 3; fifth century). Moulton-Milligan cites IG XIV, 785, 4 (σιρικοποιός); IG III2, 3513, 2 (σιρικάριος).

σκληροκαρδία, σκληρός, σκληρότης, σκληροτράχηλος, σκληρύνω

sklerokardia, hard-heartedness; skleros, hard, dry, stiff, inflexible, rigid; sklerotes, hardness; sklerotrachelos, stiff-necked; skleryno, to harden

sklerokardia, S 4641; TDNT 3.613–614; EDNT 3.254; NIDNTT 2.152, 156, 180, 184; L&N 88.224; BDF §120(4); BAGD 756 | skleros, S 4642; TDNT 5.1022–1024, 1028; EDNT 3.254; NIDNTT 2.153–156; MM 578; L&N 20.3, 76.15, 88.135, 88.136; BAGD 756 | sklerotes, S 4643; TDNT 5.1022–1024, 1028–1029; EDNT 3.254; NIDNTT 2.153, 155; MM 578; L&N 88.223; BAGD 756 | sklerotrachelos, S 4644; TDNT 5.1022–1024, 1029; EDNT 3.254; NIDNTT 2.153, 155; MM 578; L&N 88.224; BAGD 756 | skleryno, S 4645; TDNT 5.1022–1024, 1030–1031; EDNT 3.254–255; NIDNTT 2.153, 155; MM 578; L&N 88.226; BAGD 756

The substantive skelos (cf. skello, in the active, “to parch, dry up”; passive, “to be parched, dry”) does not exist,¹ but there is skleros, “hard, dry, stiff,” often contrasted with malakos, “soft, supple.” In its literal sense, it is used for stone,² for metals and vegetables,³ for wood,⁴ for wind, air, or climate⁵—as in Jas 3:4, where boats of whatever size are driven by strongwinds (hypo anemon skleron)—or for crisp and loud claps of thunder (Hesiod, Th. 839; Herodotus 8.12). In Hippocrates and Aristotle, the adjective is often used for bones, skin, and various other parts of the body.⁶

In a figurative sense, the word is used to describe style (“forced” metaphors, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Pomp. 1.2.6), difficult circumstances or a cruel fate,⁷ but especially for divine cruelty⁸ or inflexibility (Sophocles, OT 36), for “kings who are kings’ sons, who are harsh and inhumane toward their subjects” (Ep. Arist. 289; cf. Matt 25:24—“I knew that you were a hard man”), and for people of rigid, forbidding, uncultured character (Plato, Tht. 155 e; Plutarch, Cim. 1.2), where hardness is rusticity.⁹

The first occurrences in the LXX describe speech: that which is not pleasing to an interlocutor and not acceptable,¹⁰ or which is expressed roughly; Joseph spoke harshly to his brothers.¹¹ The word is also used for hard work (Exod 1:14; 6:9; Deut 26:6; Isa 14:3; Philo, Moses 2.183), for hard battle (2Sam 2:17), and for heavy servitude;¹² but skleros takes on many more varied meanings in classical Greek, being used especially for persons, sometimes in a positive sense,¹³ but more often pejoratively.¹⁴ Finally, “hardening” becomes a religious idea, expressing rebellion, disobedience, or rejection of God’s will,¹⁵ to be sure, but with the emphasis especially on obstinacy, inflexibility (Cant 8:6). Sir 3:26–27: “The obstinate heart will fall into misfortune”; Isa 48:4—“I knew that you were obstinate, because your neck is made of iron sinews and your forehead is bronze”; Bar 2:33—“They will repent of their stiff neck . . . because they will remember the way of their fathers”; Deut 31:27.

The metaphor of the neck (Hebrew ’orep), the part of the animal body that connects the head to the backbone, is taken from the draft animal, whose efforts to resist are localized in the neck.¹⁶ When the ass or horse refuses to go on, it tightens and stiffens its neck. So to be “hard- or stiff-necked” means stubborn disobedience, hardening or obstinacy in rebellion. To specify this condition, the Bible uses the compounds sklerotrachelos, six occurrences (out of nine) of which describe Israel,¹⁷ and sklerokardia (Hebrew ’arelat lebab). A stiff or hard heart resists divine impulses, refuses to follow that path that God wants it to follow. It is not only closed and insensitive, but disobedient.¹⁸ This substantive is used only twice in the NT, and only by Jesus: “It is because of your hardness of heart that Moses allowed you to put away your wives”;¹⁹ “Jesus showed himself to the Eleven. . . . He rebuked their unbelief (apistia) and hardness of heart, because they had not believed those who saw him raised (from the dead)” (Mark 16:14). Sklerokardia adds to simple unbelief in the resurrection the idea of refusal to believe in it.

The verb skleryno, unknown in Philo and rather rare in secular Greek,²⁰ is common in the LXX, where most of the occurrences have a moral and religious meaning:²¹ the Israelites stiffen their neck or their heart²² rather than return to Yahweh and submit to his will. But it is also said that God himself hardens the heart of the Egyptians (Exod 14:17), that of Sihon, king of Heshbon (Deut 2:30), and even that of Israel when they strayed from God’s ways (Isa 63:17). The most typical case is that of Pharaoh, whose heart God hardened (Exod 4:21; 7:3; 9:12; 10:1, 20, 27; 11:10; 14:4, 8); but it is likewise said that “Pharaoh’s heart was hardened” (Exod 7:22; 8:15; 9:35; 13:15). This simultaneity poses a theological problem, that of the union of divine action and human freedom, which St. Paul did not clarify by stating that “God shows mercy to whom he will and hardens whom he will”;²³ but he suggests the solution in Rom 2:5, where he denounces the hardness of the impenitent heart that scorns the infinite treasures of divine goodness. “By your hardening, by your impenitent heart, you are storing up for yourself a treasury of wrath for the day of wrath.” God is free in his justice to penalize one who obstinately refuses his light and his mercy. Pharaoh’s sklerotes is voluntary;²⁴ it has blinded him,²⁵ keeping him from giving in to the prodigious divine signs wrought by Moses. God uses this obstinacy to free his people, because it is his usual course of action to bring good from evil; just as by giving up his Son to crucifixion he gained the salvation of the world. This salvation, like the crucifixion, was decided from eternity.

¹ P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique, on σκέλλομαι. Cf. K. Dieterich, “Bedeutungsgeschichte griechischer Worte,” in RhMus, 1905, pp. 236–240.

² Dittenberger, Or. 194, 28 (= SB 8334): ε—κ σκληροῦ λίθου; Syl. 972, 96; BGU 952, 10; Wis 11:4; cf. SB 3919: ε—πὶ σκληροῦ βαθμοῦ. Cf. Xenophon, Oec. 16.11: “The ground was too hard to turn over with the team and plow”; Philo, Spec. Laws 3.34: ground too hard and rocky (contrasted with marshy).

³ P.Leid. X, 1: “To get lead to harden, melt it, sprinkle it with flaked alum and vitriol, ground fine and mixed together; and it will be hard” (καὶ ἔσται σκληρός); cf. 3: hard silver; 80: tin (R. Halleux, Les Alchimistes grecs, Paris, 1981, p. 84), wax (Plato, Tht. 191 c), hard and resistant (Philo, Heir 181). Cf. “among sponges, there are some that are very hard and rough” (Aristotle, HA 5.16); water that is “hard” to the taste, like spring water or rainwater (Athenaeus 33 b = 1.59); “pears are costive” (Hippocrates, Vict. 2.55.1).

⁴ Hippocrates, Vict. 2.65.2: “a body hard as wood”; Diogenes Laertius 6.21; a stick (Pindar, Ol. 7.29); Philo, Flight 42: “hard as an oak”; cf. κοίτης σκληρα—ς = sleeping on a hard surface (Plato, Leg. 12.942 d).

⁵ Julius Pollux, Onom. 1, segm. 110: άνεμος βίαιος, σκληρός; Polybius 4.21.5: the harshest climate in all Achaea; Dittenberger, Or. 194, 14.

⁶ Hippocrates, Carn. 3.7: “these bones are harder and more solid”; 15.1: “a hard and dry bone”; 12.1: “the teeth become harder than the bones”; Acut. 45.2: the body; Aph. 5.20; Liqu. 1.1; Carn. 5.1; Acut. append. 49 = hardened skin; Aph. 5.52–53: firm breasts (cf. Genit. 2.1); VM 18: the nose; Acut. append. 26.3: a hard inflammation of the eye; Liqu. 6.4: dry part; P.Mert. 12.21, letter to a physician: dry plasters (AD 58). A papyrus prescribing the diet for patients suffering from chronic constipation: τοι—ς μὲν σληράν ι—σχυρω—ς καὶ δυσήκεστον ἔχουσι τὴν κοιλίαν (in L. C. Youtie, H. C. Youtie, “A Medical Papyrus,” in Scritti in onore O. Montevicchi, Bologne, 1981, p. 432, line 5). Aristotle, HA 3.10: “the hair is stiffer”; Part. An. 3.3.4: the skin is hard; cf. Plato, Tht. 162 b: “I am already stiff at my age” (contrasted to young); Plutarch, Ages. 13.4: “big and strong athlete”; 59275, 9: bitter dishes.

⁷ Antiphon 3.3; Euripides, Alc. 500; Sophocles, OC 1615; Diodorus Siculus 14.105.2: hard conditions of the decision of Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse. Cf. Acts 26:14—“It is hard for you to kick against the goad,” an effort as useless as it is painful.

⁸ Aristophanes, Nub. 1264; Plutarch, De def. or. 21: σκληροὶ θεοί, Anatolian deities; cf. L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 7, Paris, 1949, pp. 50ff.

⁹ Σκληρότης is linked with ἀγριότης, ἀγροικία, Plato, Resp. 3.410 d; 607 b; Aristotle, Poet. 15.11; Eth. Nic. 4.8.

¹⁰ Gen 21:11-12: σκληρὸν ῥῆμα = Sarah asking Abraham to expel Hagar; 45:5, Joseph to his brothers: “Let it not seem to you to be a hard thing (σκληρὸν φαίνεσθαι) to have sold me”; Deut 1:17—τὸ ῥῆμα σκληρὸν = a matter too difficult for you; 15:8; 2Sam 19:44—“the word of the men of Judah was harder (ε—σκληρύνῃ) than the word of the men of Israel”; 2Kgs 2:10—“You ask me a difficult thing”; Tob 13:12—λόγον σκληρόν. Demetrius: ὁ λόγος σκληρός (in Stobaeus, Flor. 3.8.20; vol. 3, p. 345, 17); BGU 140, 14: τοῦτο οὐκ ε—δόκει σκληρὸν εἶναι. All these texts help us understand John 6:60—after the announcement of the Eucharist, “many of his disciples said σκληρός ε—στιν ὁ λόγος ου—τος.” An off-putting utterance, hard to accept (with the will; not “difficult to understand”). Likewise Jude 15: “hard (tough, provocative, insolent) words that godless sinners said against the Lord” (περὶ πάντων τω—ν σκληρω—ν ὧν ε—λάλησαν); cf. 1 Enoch 5.4; 27.2.

¹¹ Gen 42:7, 30: ε—λάλησεν σκληρά (Hebrew qasheh); 1Kgs 12:13—reply harshly; 2Chr 10:13.

¹² 1Kgs 12:4; 2Chr 10:4; 2Macc 6:30—“I endure cruel sufferings”; Isa 8:21—a distressed and hungry land; 19:4—a hard master; 21:2—a painful vision (cf. 1Kgs 14:6—a hard message); Isa 27:8—a fierce blast.

¹³ Job 9:4—“Who has remained strong (solid)?”; 22:21; 28:2—“Someone strong and powerful”; David acknowledged, “the sons of Zeruah are stronger than I” (2Sam 3:39).

¹⁴ Korah, Dathan, and Abiram were wicked or perverse (Hebrew rasha') men, Num 16:26; Hannah declares, “I am a woman whose soul is troubled,” literally, “pained in spirit” = in great affliction (1Sam 1:15; quoted by Philo, Drunkenness 149–150); for cruel plans (Jdt 9:13). Nabal was a hard (or uncouth) and mean man (σκληρός καὶ πονηρός, 1Sam 25:3; quoted by Josephus, Ant. 6.296); μὴ γίνου σκληρός = do not become wicked (Eccl 7:17); cf. Sir 30:8—“an untamed horse becomes stubborn.”

¹⁵ Judg 2:19—“The Israelites corrupted themselves and followed a path of hardening” (= hardened conduct); Prov 28:14—“The one who hardens his heart will fall into misfortune” (hiphil of the Hebrew qashâh). Philo, who contrasts harshness and mildness (Plant. 133), the smooth and the coarse (Migr. Abr. 50; Abraham 239; Creation 62), denounces rebellious and hard characters (Spec. Laws 2.39), hardened and dried out souls (Rewards 114), but thinks that habit can make characters lacking in suppleness malleable and can reeducate them (Spec. Laws 4.218).

¹⁶ Cf. the French expressions “coup de collier” (put one’s back into it); “franc du collier” (hard-working). P. Dhorme, Emploi métaphorique, p. 93.

¹⁷ Exod 33:3, 5; 34:9; Deut 9:6, 13; Bar 2:30. A NT hapax, this adjective is uttered by St. Stephen: “People of stiff necks and uncircumcised hearts and ears, you always resist the Holy Spirit” (Acts 7:51; cf. Prov 9:1; Sir 16:11). Hippocrates noted, “Rigidity of neck (τράχηλος σκληρός) is harmful” (Coac. 2.14; ed. Littré, vol. 5, p. 640). Philo does not use this term; cf. the substantive σκληροτραχηλία in T. Sim. 6.2.

¹⁸ Deut 10:16 (quoted by Spec. Laws 1.305); Jer 4:4; Sir 16:10; cf. the adjective σκληροκάριδος, Prov 17:20; Sir 16:9; Ezek 3:7.

¹⁹ Matt 19:8. Here “hardness of heart” could mean: (1) an inability to understand the indissolubility of marriage; (2) a failure to obey the law established by God “at the beginning”; (3) recalcitrance of soul, tangible bad will, wickedness; (4) for his disciples, Jesus abrogates Moses’ temporary concession and reestablishes a law of perfection, because they have purified hearts.

²⁰ Hippocrates, Liqu. 2.7: “the dried-out body hardens”; 6.3; Aristotle, HA 5.16.7: “the wind and bad weather hardened the sponges.”

²¹ K. L. Schmidt, “Die Verstockung des Menschen durch Gott,” in TZ, 1945, pp. 1–17; F. W. Danker, “Hardness of Heart,” in CTM, 1973, pp. 89–100. Several secular occurrences, Ps 90:6—grass “withers in the evening, it is dried up”; Gen 49:7—the rage of Simeon and Levi is violent (Hebrew qashâh); Judg 4:24—“The hand of the sons of Israel became harder (grew heavier and heavier) over Jabin, king of the Canaanites”; 2Chr 10:4; Sir 30:12—“Beat his sides while he is still a child, lest he become hardened and refuse to obey you.”

²² Deut 10:16; 2Kgs 17:14; 2Chr 30:8, 29; 36:13; Neh 9:16; Ps 95:8 (quoted and commented on at Heb 3:8, 15; 4:7; cf. C. Spicq, Hébreux, vol. 2, p. 73; and Heb 3:13; cf. W. L. Lorimer, “Hébr. III, 13,” in NTS, vol. 12, 1966, pp. 390–391); Jer 7:26; 17:23; 19:15. In this last text, it is a refusal to hear the word of God, analogous to that of the Jews in the synagogue at Corinth: “As some of them hardened themselves, refused to believe (unbelief, disobedience), and cursed (spoke ill of) the Way (the Christian religion), Paul broke with them” (Acts 19:9). J. Pathrapankal, “Christianity as a ‘Way’ according to the Acts of the Apostles,” in J. Kremer, Les Actes des Apôtres, pp. 533–539.

²³ Rom 9:18. We cannot think that this means mere permission (H. H. Hobbs, Preaching Values from the Papyri, Grand Rapids, 1964, pp. 115–117, comparing the physician who is not the cause of a hardening in the patient and who adapts himself to the nature of the patient, recognizing his actual condition); still less does God stir people to evil; but taking the person’s refusal into account, he does not give him his grace (which is purely gratuitous), which would convert him, because this voluntary hardening corresponds with his plans to show mercy on his people, cf. M. J. Lagrange, Épître aux Romains, Paris, 1931, on this text.

²⁴ In the literal sense, σκληρότης is hardness, roughness. Aristotle distinguishes among physical characteristics “the soft and the hard, the smooth and the rough” (HA 1.4.8; 3.3.4); cf. Plato, Resp. 7.523 e: “Does the sense of touch adequately feel softness and hardness?” In the LXX, it is used for a sledge (Isa 28:27), for the cruelty of death (2Sam 22:6), and for Israel’s unbelief (Deut 9:27). Sacr. Abel and Cain 136: “Those who after working receive no knowledge because they are too hardheaded (διὰ σκληρότητα φύσεως) give up on it”; Spec. Laws 1.304 comments on uncircumcision of heart: “rebels because of their hardness of character, rebel stubbornly and shake off the yoke.”

²⁵ Concerning the πώρωσις τῆς καρδίας, cf. “L’Aveuglement d’esprit, dans l’Evangile de saint Marc,” in Recueil L. Cerfaux, vol. 2, pp. 3–15.

σκύβαλον

skybalon, scrap, debris, refuse, dung, excrement

skybalon, S 4657; TDNT 7.445–447; EDNT 3.256; NIDNTT 1.480; MM 579–580; L&N 6.225; BAGD 758

It is not easy to translate this NT hapax at Phil 3:8, where St. Paul, renouncing confidence in the flesh, meaning his privileges as a Jew, says they are worthless, to be discarded (hegoumai skybala [einai_]),¹ in order to know Christ, gain him, be in him, share in the power of his resurrection.

I. — Skybalon often means “scrap, debris, refuse” (P.Cair.Zen. 59494, 16; CPR I, 175, 16; PSI 184, 7: en skybalois chortou), gleanings (P.Ryl. 149, 22: “grazed them on the gleanings of my vegetable-seed crop”—katemenesan aph’ hou eichon lachanospermou skybalou; in AD 39/40), that which remains (SB 9386, 49: synlegontes skybala ergatai β? . . . oboloi ιβ?) and is given to the dogs,² leftovers (P.Mich.Zen. 31, 15). This is the meaning intended by Philo in Sacr. Abel and Cain 109: “all the rest should be left as refuse (hosper skybala) to the mortal nature”; by Leonidas of Tarentum: “You shall not taste even the leftovers from my dinner” (Anth. Pal. 6.202.6); by Ariston: “the crumbs that fall from the table” (ibid. 6.303.4); by Philip of Thessalonica: the remains of a deceased person (ibid. 7.383.2); by Hegesippus: “the wreckage of a ship” (7.276.2; cf. an anonymous writer: “a half-eaten scrap”—hemidaes skybalon, 9.375); Achilles Tatius: “he reviled the catch and threw it out as refuse of the sea” (eloidorei ten agran kai erripsen hos thalasses skybalon, 2.11.5); Sib. Or. 7.58: “you will be the miserable refuse of war.”³

II. — Skybalon also has the sense “dung, filth” through popular association with skor, according to Moulton-Milligan, who cite P.Fay. 119, 7, where Gemellus informs his son that the donkey-driver has purchased “a little bundle and rotten hay, the whole of it decayed—no better than dung” (mikran dysmen kai chorton sapron kai holon lelymenon hos skybalon, around AD 100). We may compare CD 4.19 (“the builders attached themselves to filth,” Hebrew sô’, in place of saw; cf. the LXX, and the Vulgate of Hos 5:11—sordes) and find a correspondence with the Hebrew tô‘ebâh, ordinarily translated bdelygma (“abomination”), but also akatharsia (“uncleanness”), poneriai (“wickedness”), makrymmata (something that is sent away because it is repulsive), and molynsis (“defilement, pollution”).⁴ In any event, “Debris and filth accumulate in the nooks and crannies of houses” (sesorentai phorytos kai skybalon plethos, Philo, Prov. 2.105), and in ethics the term suggests scorn or disgust: “As when the sieve is shaken the scraps (or impurities, kopria) remain, so does a person’s filth (or uncleanness, skybala) remain in his thoughts” (Sir 27:4; OT hapax). Sir 26:28 uses the verb skybalizo with respect to intelligent men who are scornfully rejected.

III. — Again, skybalon means “excrement,” for example in Artemidorus Daldianus (Onir. 2.25) and the medical writers (Aelian, NA 5.9; other references in Wettstein). This is how the Vulgate (stercora) and Symmachus understood the word in Ezek 4:12, 15. The ritual law of whole burnt offerings, as Philo understood it, was that “nothing should remain of the creature except the excrement and the skin” (skybalon kai dermatos). During the siege of Jerusalem, “many dug through the sewers and old cow dung in order to feed on this ordure; what they would have been unable to look at before became food for them.”⁵

IV. — In any event, the word means what must be eliminated.⁶ J. Huby’s comment is exactly right, in spite of the anachronism: “All of that is worth no more than the contents of a garbage can.”⁷ To convey the crudity of the Greek, however: “It’s all crap.”⁸

¹ The old French versions translated “balayure” (sweepings); Loisy, Crampon, and Bonnard: “ordure” (filth); Goguel and Monnier: “rebut” (scrap); Médebielle: “perte” (waste), with the comment “fumier” (dung); Bible de Jérusalem: “déchets” (scraps; cf. NJB, “filth”); M. Dibelius, J. Gnllka: “Kehricht” (sweepings); F. W. Beare: “rubbish.” C. Lavergne (Diagnose des suffixes grecs du Nouveau Testament, Paris, 1977, p. 251, 3): “σκύβαλον, a synthetic word built from the phrase ε—ς κύνας βλήμενον = thrown to the dogs. σκύβαλα in Phil 3:8 = refuse” (French “immondices”).

² Cf. the Suda, τὸ τοι—ς κυσὶ βαλλόμενον, κυσίβαλόν τι ὄν. In this sense σκύβαλον would be comparable to περίψημα-περικαθάρματα (1Cor 4:13), the residue from the scrubbing and cleaning of an object.

³ Σκύβαλον πολέμου λυγρὸν ἔσση. Plutarch, De Is. et Os. 352 d: “The residue of foods, the excess of the secretions, is vile and impure, and it is the result of a secretion that gives rise to wool, fur, hair, nails”; σκυβαλικός in Them. 21.4 is a bad reading in one manuscript for κυβαλικοι—σι. —The proper name Σκύβαλος is attested in the third and fourth centuries, P.Oxy. 43, col. III, 25; 2338, 30 (correct to Σκυβάλλου at line 28; cf. R. Coles, in ZPE, 1975, p. 202); P.Harr. 94, 2; P.Oslo 61, 8; P.Michael. 26, 9; PSI 1358, 1: Κοπρέα καὶ Σκύβαλον; cf. M. Vandoni, “Note di onomastica grecoegizia,” in Hommages à Claire Préaux, Brussels, 1975, p. 797.

⁴ This substantive refers to that which is defective, has a fault or vice, that which is considered impure . . . and for that reason inspires disgust, horror, aversion, is blamed and cursed” (P. Humbert, “L’Etymologie du substantif tō’ébâ,” in A. Kuschke, Verbannung und Heimkehr, Tübingen, 1961, pp. 157–160).

⁵ Josephus, War 5.571. Hesychius gives this definition: σκύβαλα: κόπρος; the same equation is made in Sir 27:4 and Didymus, Zech. 1.390, 394; cf. “lump of excrement” (βολβίτω κοπρίων), a term for the lazy (Sir 22:2), the euphemism ἀσχημοσύνη, Deut 23:14; Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.151, 158 = ἀκαθαρσία; 2.27, 29. But κόπρια refers to dung in Luke 13:8; 14:35; Heraclitus, All. 33.6: “Heracles got rid of the large pile of manure, the disgusting condition in which humanity was stagnating”; similarly, the alchemists used κόπρος and βόλβιτον together (cf. M. Berthelot, Collection des anciens alchimistes grecs, 2d ed., London, 1962, vol. 3, 165, 14; 167, 8; 199, 13; 317, 1 and 142, 19; 146, 15; 221, 22; 222, 13).

⁶ Cf. Mark 7:19; Plautus, Truc. 556: “amator, qui bona sua pro stercore habet”—“a lover who treats his goods as dung has them taken out . . . all that he has is swept outside.”

⁷ “Tout cela ne vaut pas plus que le contenu d’une poubelle,” J. Huby, Les Epîtres de la captivité, Paris, 1934, p. 335.

⁸ The translation of E. Osty, “Pour une traduction plus fidèle du N. T.,” in Ecole de langues orientales anciennes: Mémorial du Cinquantenaire, Paris, 1964, p. 82: “c’est de la crotte.” Also Lang, in TDNT, vol. 7, pp. 446–447 (“Dreck”); M. Dibelius, An die Philipper, 3d ed., Tübingen, 1937, p. 89; E. Lohmeyer, Der Brief an die Philipper, 12th ed., Göttingen, 1961, pp. 135ff. The idea and the word were retained in the patristic and ascetic tradition (stercus, lutum, βόρβορος = mire) to refer to the world, its allure and its vanity (P. Courcelle, “Les Sources patristiques de Sacy,” in SP, vol. 4, Berlin, 1961, pp. 401ff.). On the verbs σκυβαλίζω and ἀνασκυβαλίζω in the inscriptions, cf. J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1977, p. 400, n. 423.

σκωληκόβρωτος

skolekobrotos, worm-eaten

skolekobrotos, S 4662; TDNT 7.456–457; EDNT 3.256; MM 580; L&N 23.166; BAGD 758

This compound, which means literally “worm food,” i.e., “eaten by worms,” belongs to the agricultural vocabulary and is used for plants, trees, fruits, especially grains (Theophrastus, Hist. Pl. 3.12.6; 4.11.1; Caus. Pl. 5.9.1). It is attested in five or six papyri, all from before Christ. Eudemos asks Zeno to decrease the rent because the harvest has been eaten by worms (eisig gar hemin skolekobrotou kai kakou sitou [arourai_ 1ε?, P.Cair.Zen. 59433, 14; cf. Berichtigungsliste IV, p. 16); ibid. 59728, 5: “worm-eaten corpses” (ten skolekobroton somata); P.Mich.Zen. 96, 4: “that has become worm-eaten” (tes gegenemenes skolekobrotou, referring to sesame seed); PSI 490, 4: ten genomenen skolekobroton apokechorekasin enkataleipontes tous georgountas ten gen (a letter concerning a crop guardian); P.Grad. VII, 11: “seed that is not worm-eaten” (spermatos askolekobrotou); P.Tebt. 701, 74 and 81: “for the worm-eaten ground” (eis ten skolekobroton gen; cf. the possible restoration in 1008, 18). In 5/4 BC, P.Oslo 26, 14 attests the neologism holoskolekobrotos.

Since in the Bible “the punishment of the ungodly is the fire and the worm” (Sir 7:17; cf. Isa 66:24 = Mark 9:48), especially worms (Isa 14:11; Sir 19:3; 1Macc 2:62), which symbolize human emptiness (Job 7:5; 25:6) and the decay and decomposition of corpses (Job 17:14; 21:26; Sir 10:11), Acts 12:23 uses skolekobrotos for Herod Agrippa: “he was eaten by worms and died.” For all that, this is not a medical term;¹ but in the secular and religious literature it is used for the death of villains, like Judas (according to Papias)² and an uncle (also named Julian) of Julian the Apostate,³ false prophets like Alexander (Lucian, Alex. 59), cruel rulers like Pheretima, queen of the Cyrenians (“still alive, she was crawling with worms,” Herodotus 4.205); Sulla, who had a purulent intestinal abscess and an infection that caused his flesh to swarm with vermin (Plutarch, Sull. 36.3–4); Pherecydes (Aelian, VH 4.28); Herod the Great (Josephus, Ant. 17.169); and especially persecutors, from Antiochus IV Epiphanes (“the ungodly man’s eyes were crawling with worms,” 2Macc 9:9) and L. Hermianus, the governor of Cappadocia (Tertullian, Scap. 3) to Emperor Galerius (“his intestines were crawling with countless worms”).⁴

¹ Against W. K. Hobart, Medical Language, p. 42; refuted by Lang, on this word in TDNT, vol. 7, pp. 456–457; cf. H. J. Cadbury, Book of Acts in History, pp. 38, 54 n. 14. But this could be a case of helminthiasis, cf. Lesêtre, on this word, in Dictionnaire de la Bible, vol. 3, pp. 583–585

(helminths are entozoans that take up residence in the intestines, but also in the blood, the muscles, the liver, etc., and can cause fatal illness); Deutsche medizinische Wochenschrift, 1963, pp. 287ff. W. Otto, “Herodes,” in PWSup, vol. 2, 143.

² Cf. P. Benoit, in Exégèse et théologie, vol. 1, p. 345 = ET, vol. 1, pp. 193–194.

³ Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. 3.9.

⁴ Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 8.16.4 (most of these examples are cited by E. Jacquier, Actes, p. 374); cf. Lactantius, Mort. Pers.

σπερμολόγος

spermologos, seed-gatherer, gleaner, prattler, buffoon

spermologos, S 4691; EDNT 3.264; NIDNTT 3.525; MM 583; L&N 27.19, 33.381; BDF §119(1); BAGD 762

At Athens, Paul dialogued (dialegomai, Acts 17:17) with the idlers that he met at the agora (cf. agoraios, 17:5; 19:38), who asked, using Athenian slang, “What does this spermologos mean?” (17:18). It is impossible to give the exact connotations of this biblical hapax, a word unknown in the papyri and, it seems, in the inscriptions as well. It is often translated “prattler, speechifier, driveler.” But the etymology is clear: sperma legein means to gather seeds or grains.¹ So as a noun, it refers to sparrows and other birds that peck at seeds scattered on the ground² and is in no way pejorative. Used figuratively, however, the word takes on more diverse meanings: the good-for-nothing who wanders about the market and collects the scraps and debris scattered here and there; cf. Demosthenes: “The accuser . . . a miserable gleaner (spermologos), an outcast from the marketplace” (Corona 18.127); or the prattler, chatterer who is always hunting for news and spreading it everywhere, running his mouth carelessly, who pretends to be in the know but actually spouts his gossip without understanding it: an ignoramus. This highly derogatory meaning is the most commonly attested sense of the word in the first-second century. Philo: “Helicon, a slave of high lineage, a seed-pecker and outcast from society” (To Gaius 203); Plutarch: Alcibiades is accused of abandoning the command of the fleet to “men who owe their influence to their drunkenness and buffoonery (spermologias),” (Alc. 36.2; cf. Plutarch, Demetr. 28.5); “When the soul founders, anger casts aside a jumble of violent, unrestrained words.”³

Given this definition, which makes the word almost an insult, it is difficult to understand how the Epicurean and Stoic philosophers could immediately afterward lead Paul to the middle of Mars Hill and ask him to expound his teaching before the assembly. M. A. Robinson⁴ suggests that Paul must have used the parable of the sower and that this accounts for the use of the word.⁵ Hence the play on words, which does not ridicule the preacher but takes aim at his teaching in a humorous way. It is best to translate spermologos as “this character.”⁶

¹ Cf. Hesychius, Σπερμολόγος: φλύαρος, καὶ ὁ τὸ σπέρματα συλλέγων, καὶ κολοιω—δες ζω—ον.

² Aristotle (HA 8.3.28.592b) includes among the birds “the wren and the rook (σπερμολόγος),” a variety of crow with a narrow beak, scientifically called Corvus frugilegus; Aristophanes, Av. 232: “Innumerable tribes of barley-eaters (κριθοτράγων), races of seed-peckers (σπερμολόγων)”; 579: “A cloud of sparrows must arise to peck at the seeds”; Artemidorus Daldianus, Onir. 2.20: “the small birds peck at the seeds (σπερμολόγοι) and thus find their food easily.” Synonymous with σπερμονόμος in insults εἰ—ς ἀτοραίους καὶ πολυπράγμονας καὶ φιλεγκλήμονας; cf. J Taillardat, Suétone: Περὶ Βλασφημιῶ—ν, Paris, 1967, p. 57.

³ Plutarch, De cohib. ira 6. The meaning “gossip” in Lynceus of Samos and Alexander of Myndos, in Athenaeus 8.22 (344 c); 9.39 (388 a); Dionysius of Halicarnassus 19.5.3. Wettstein cites in addition Maximus of Tyre 30.4 and Strabo 15, p. 1030. —This accounts for the proposed etymology σπεῖρω + λόγους, sower of words.

⁴ M. A. Robinson, “Σπερμολόγος: Did Paul Preach from Jesus’ Parables?” in Bib., 1975, pp. 231–240.

⁵ According to the interpretation given by Jesus and according to a source anterior to Mark 4, which would be Peter (cf. Papias, in Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 3.39.15).

⁶ J. Renié, Actes des Apôtres, “ce pierrot.” The NJB translates “this parrot,” which overplays lack of intelligence; E. Osty and J. Trinquet translate “ce picoreur” and comment: “a derogatory term for any speechifier whose knowledge is made up of bits and pieces of doctrine gathered here and there and everywhere.” Cf. “superfluous refinements due to frivolity” (ταῦτα περίεργα καὶ σπερμολογικά, Plutarch, Quaest. conv. 4, q. 1).

σπιλάς

spilas, gust, squall, (under-sea) rock, boulder

spilas, S 4694; EDNT 3.265; MM 583–584; L&N 79.57; BAGD 762

Jude 12: houtoi eisin hoi en tais agapais hymon spilades.¹ This can be translated “These people are stumbling blocks in your love feasts” or “These people are stains on your love feasts.”² The biblical hapax spilas, unknown in the papyri, can mean “gust, squall,”³ but the predominant classical meaning is “rock, boulder”; cf. Sophocles, Trach. 678: “it dissolved on a rock on the ground”; Theocritus: “an inexhaustible, voiceless stream from the rocks”;⁴ “Here, beneath this sepulchral rock, O stranger, lies Demas.”⁵ Usually, spilades are rocks that are covered by water and thus dangerous: “the waves smashed their ships on the reefs” (Homer, Od. 3.298); “the narrow strait . . . hemmed in by narrow reefs” (Apollonius Rhodius, Argon. 2.550; cf. 558); “the vessels, smashed by the waves against the reefs and promontories” (Polybius 1.37.2). In the area around the port of Jaffa, “there is a series of steep cliffs and reefs jutting far out into the water.”⁶ This meaning is reported by all the lexicographers: “spilades are rocks under the sea . . . rocks hidden by the sea” (spilades hai hyphalos petrai . . . hai hypo thalassan kekrymmenai petrai, Etymol. Mag.); “Apion says that spilades are rocks that form a hollow in the sea, but Heliodoros says they are rocks beside the sea that the waters wash over.”⁷ J. Pollux sums up precisely: “spilas, a reef, a hidden boulder, a stone, a jutting rock, a promontory, a prominence exposed to the wind, a knoll” (Onom. 1.9.115). In Jude 12, where a moral portrait of godless folk who slander the way of righteousness is being sketched, the metaphor is excellent; it suggests the pernicious influence of false teachers in promiscuity at banquets. They present a danger of shipwreck, scandal, or ensnarement for believers.⁸

The use of the masculine article hoi [spiloi ?] with the feminine spilades suggests that there might have been a popular confusion of this word with spilos (“stain on the skin,” and by extension any physical or moral stain).⁹ This is how the Vulgate interprets this text (“maculae”). The Orphic text Lithica 614 is cited: the good woman is “speckled with stains” (katastiktos spiladessi). This meaning would make the text less forceful.¹⁰ In any event, the meal of brotherly love in the Christian community requires greater holiness than the nomos eraniston from the imperial period: “Let no one enter into the most venerable meeting of the dinner club before he has been examined for purity, piousness, and goodness.”¹¹

¹ The reading ἀγάπαις (a, B, K, L, P72, Vulg., Sah., Boh., Arm., Eth.) is preferable to ἀπάταις (A, C, 44, 56, 96), which comes from 2Pet 2:13 (cf.

E. M. Laperrousaz, “Le Testament de Moïse,” in Sem vol. 19, 1970, p. 65) and εὐωχίαις (miniscules, 6, 66). On agapai, cf. P. Batiffol, “Agape,” in Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, vol. 1, 551–556; idem, Etudes d’histoire et de théologie positive, Paris, 1926, pp. 283–325; H. Leclercq, “Agape,” in DACL, vol. 1, 775–848; L. Thomas, “Agape,” in DBSup, vol. 1, 134–153 (supplies the bibliography); E. B. Allo, Première Epître aux Corinthiens, pp. 285–293; C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 2, pp. 345–351; J. Jeremias, Eucharistic Words, pp. 115–122; J. J. von Allmen, Essai sur le repas du Seigneur, Neuchâtel, 1966, pp. 65ff.

² On the basis of St. Augustine and Erasmus (“in dilectionibus vestris,” “inter charitates vestres”), some translate “They are stumbling blocks for your love”; but it is a bit of a stretch to translate ται—ς ἀγάπαις with a singular.

³ A definition defended by A. D. Knox (“Σπιλάδες,” in JTS, 1913, pp. 547–549; 1915, p. 78), from Plutarch (De virt. et vit. 3; Plutarch, De tranq. anim. 17; cf. Heliodorus, Aeth. 5.32.1: “the sea whipped up by a cyclone”), confirmed by the usage of the verb κατασπιλάζω (in Philo, Quest. Gen. 2.71, ed. R. Marcus, p. 165, n. i, R. Harris, p. 28; pointed out by H. S. Jones, JTS, 1922, p. 282); still the meaning in modern Greek: “violent wind, storm-wind, tempest”; cf. M. M. Kokolakis, Πλουταρχει—α, Athens, 1968.

⁴ In Anth. Pal. 9.437.6; Simonides: a priest of Rhea took refuge in a cave, literally under an isolated rock, ε—ρημαίνην ἤλυθ ὑπὸ σπιλάδα (ibid. 6.217.2); Philip of Thessalonica: “peace in the shelter of a wild rock” (ibid. 7.382, 4). In the first century, a man throws himself from a rock, ὅστέα μὲν καὶ σάρκας ε—μὰς σπιλάδες διέχευαν ε—ξει—αι (G. Kaibel, Epigrammata 225, 1).

⁵ Jewish epitaph from 117 BC: —Ωδ ὑπὸ τὸ σπιλάδος μέλαθρον, SEG VIII, 483, 1 = SB 6160 = CII 1490 = C.Pap.Jud. III, p. 152 = GVI, n. 700 = E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 14.

⁶ Josephus, War 2.420; Lucillius: “For ships that sail on the sea, submerged rocks are more dangerous than those that are plain to see” (τω—ν φανερῶ—ν σπιλάδων, Anth. Pal. 11.390, 6); cf. E. Hilgert, The Ship and Related Symbols in the New Testament, Assen, 1962, pp. 145ff.

⁷ Σπιλάδες, ὁ μὲν —Απίων αι— ε—ν ὕδατι κοιλαὶ πέτραι· ὁ δὲ Ἡλιόδοωος αι— παραθαλλάσσαι πέτραι, καὶ πεπιλημένοι ὑπὸ τω—ν ὑδάτων. Apollonius Sophista, Lex. (this reference and the one before it given by J. Chaine, Les Epîtres catholiques, Paris, 1939, p. 315); cf. Hesychius:

Σπιλάδες· αι— πειερχόμεναι τῇ θαλάσση πέτραι; the Suda: Σπιλάδες· αι— εν ὕδατι κοι—λαι πέτραι.

⁸ Cf. 1Tim 1:19. Cf. 1QH 4.10–19: “Teachers of lies and seers of falsehood” address seductive words to the members of the people of God and “to assuage their thirst they give them vinegar (Hebrew homes, a numbing drink) to drink, so that (once they are drunk with this denatured doctrine) they may gaze on their straying and their folly concerning the festivals,” i.e., so that they may sin, act insanelly.

⁹ 2Pet 2:13—greedy teachers are similarly insulted: “Stains and blemishes (σπίλοι καὶ μω—μοι), reveling in their dissipation, they carouse” (cf. Bo Reicke, Diakonie, Festfreude und Zelos in Verbindung mit der altchristlichen Agapenfeier, Uppsala, 1951, pp.354–367); Eph 5:27; cf. σπιλόω, “make a mark” (Wis 15:4), then “a stain” (Jude 23; Jas 3:6).

¹⁰ Cf. in the fourth century the participation of a pagan in a Christian agape under deplorable circumstances: ε—ποίησεν δὲ καὶ ἀγάπην ε—ν ε—κίνη τῇ ἡμέρᾳ, Ἑλλην ὄν, διὰ τὸ ἀμάρτημα ὃ ε—ποίησεν (P.Lond. 1914, 28; cf. H. I. Bell, Jews and Christians in Egypt, p. 59).

¹¹ Μηδενὶ ε—χέστω ε—πιέναι ει—ς τὴν συμνοτάτην σύνοδον τω—ν ε—ρανιστω—ν, πρὶν ἂν δικομασῇ ε—ι ἔστι ἄγνος καὶ εὐσεβῆς καὶ ἀγάθ, published by P. Foucart, Des Associations religieuses chez les Grecs, Paris, 1873, p. 202.

σπλάγχνα, σπλαγχνίζομαι

splanchna, entrails, viscera, compassion; splanchnizomai, to have compassion, take pity

splanchna, S 4698; TDNT 7.548–559; EDNT 3.265–266; NIDNTT 2.593, 599–560; MM 584; L&N 8.58, 25.49, 25.50, 25.54, 25.55, 26.11; BAGD 763 | splanchnizomai, S 4697; TDNT 7.548–559; EDNT 3.265; NIDNTT 2.599–600; MM 584; L&N 25.49; BDF §§108(3), 176(1), 229(2), 233(2), 235(2); BAGD 762

In the fifth-fourth century, splanchna meant the internal parts of a sacrificial victim,¹ mentioned in cultic regulations as part of the compensation of priests and priestesses,² so that the verb splanchnizo meant “consume the entrails.”³ This means the honorable parts, of course, since the word is also applied to humans,⁴ in whom seven viscera are enumerated (Philo, Alleg. Interp. 1.12; Drunkness 106; cf. Spec. Laws 1.62): “the internal parts are called viscera, these being the stomach, the heart, the lungs, the spleen, the liver, and the two kidneys” (Creation 118). The word is also used for the intestines (Abraham 241) or the stomach area in general without any anatomical precision.⁵

The emotions are located in the entrails—since they are what is most intimate and hidden (Post. Cain 118; cf. Josephus, War 4.263)—which are therefore synonymous with what we today call the “heart”: “I suffer in my stomach and in my entrails” (ten koilian mou kai ta splanchna mou pono, Pss. Sol. 2.15); “Abraham, moved to the depths of his entrails, began to weep” (T. Abr. A 3, 5); “The consumption reaches to the entrails, causing through its oppression despair and distress.”⁶ When Aseneth falls in love at the first sight of Joseph, her entrails are smitten (Jos. Asen. 6.1), just as the entrails of the father are disturbed with each cry from his son (Sir 30:7), for children are said to be their father’s entrails (hoi paides splanchna legontai, Artemidorus Daldianus, Onir. 1.44; Philo, Joseph 25; 4Macc 14:13). But the entrails of the foolish are also said to be unstable (Sir 33:5), and blows to the entrails cause suffering (Philo, To Gaius 368). The nuance of pity is attested in 5 BC (hyper splanchnou = through pity, BGU 1139, 17).

This last meaning, unusual in secular Greek,⁷ is the predominant one in the Bible (cf. Prov 12:10; Wis 10:5), especially in the NT, where the entrails (corresponding to the Hebrew rah<Ø>a<^>mîm) are the seat of compassion (Gen 43:30; 1Kgs 3:26; Jer 31:20). The feminine singular rehem, moreover, refers to the uterus, the mother’s womb; so that the entrails are the locus of the mother’s pity for her children (Isa 49:15) and are said to shudder (Isa 16:11; Cant 5:4), to resound and make noise (Isa 43:15), to bubble or seethe (Lam 1:20), or to be in turmoil.⁸ It follows that in the Synoptics, where this compassion is twice attributed to God (Matt 18:27; Luke 15:20), once to the Good Samaritan, and nine times to Christ—almost always to account for a miracle—the word means first of all a physical emotion, true compassion in the face of a neighbor’s misery,⁹ literally a movement of the entrails at the sight.¹⁰ So translating the passive esplanchnisthe as “he took pity” is almost opposite the true sense; “he was taken by (or moved with) pity” would be better. The exact sense is “he had a visceral feeling of compassion.”

The affective quality of the entrails is much emphasized by Paul: whereas the entrails of the Corinthians are constricted, those of Titus are open and go out to the believers (2Cor 6:12; 7:15); Philemon has calmed the entrails of Christians under trial (Phlm 7; cf. verse 20. The apostle loves Onesimus as his own entrails (tout’ estin ta ema splanchna, verse 12), hence as his own child; and he loves the believers in the entrails of Christ (epipotho pantas hymas en splanchnois Christou Iesou, Phil 1:8). This tender compassion is almost hypostasized;¹¹ every Christian must be clothed in it,¹² for it is the expression of brotherly love, with strong connotations of mercy.¹³

The compound eusplanchnos (Eph 4:32; 1Pet 3:8) should not be translated “benevolent, good-hearted”; it is intensive. But whereas in secular Greek having good or strong entrails means being courageous,¹⁴ in Christian terms it means to be tenderly merciful, compassionate: “so display your innate love and compassion and tenderness.”¹⁵ Jas 5:11 coins a new word for this: having long or abundant entrails (polysplanchnos estin ho Kyrios kai oiktirmon), the equivalent of polyeleos (Ps 102:8; SB 8726, 9).

¹ SEG XVII, 377 (Chios); 378 (Chios); Dittenberger, Syl. 57, 3; 1013, 3, 8; 1015, 12; 1016, 3; 1044, 39; etc.

² Cf. LSCGSup, n. 76, 3; 77, 6; 78, 5; LSCG n. 120, 10; 125, 4; 135, 89; 151 A -33; D 10, 12; Philo, Spec. Laws 1.216.

³ The only attestation of the active voice of the verb in secular Greek: a cultic calendar at Cos, fourth century (LSCG, n. 151, D, 14); 2Macc 6:8—take part in a ritual meal.

⁴ Koester (“σπλάγχνον,” in TDNT, vol. 7, p. 548) cites the Corpus Fabularum Aesopicarum XLVII, 1 (292, ed. E. Chambry), where a boy who has eaten too much splanchna says, “Mother, I am vomiting my entrails”; but she said, ‘Not your entrails, child, but the ones you ate!’” (ὦ μήτερ, ε—μω— τὰ σπλάγχνα· ἡ δὲ εἶπεν, οὐχὶ τὰ σά, τέκνον, ἃ δὲ κατέφαγες).

⁵ In the Bible, the entrails stand for whatever is deepest and most intimate (Prov 26:22, Hebrew beten; cf. Ps 22:15; 40:9; John 7:37); Bar 2:17—the spirit of the deceased has left his entrails; 2Macc 9:5–6: intestinal pain; Acts 1:18—Judas’ entrails spilled out; 4Macc 5:30; 10:8; 11:19—the entrails are burned or pierced through and drip with blood; Josephus, Ant. 15.359 (in the singular); War 2.612: “Joseph had them whipped until their entrails showed through”; Menander, Dysk. 548: “I cut out the entrails”; P.Ryl. 63, 6 (astrological text from the third century), the entrails are the province of Jupiter; SB 7452, 23: τω—ν τριχω—ν καὶ τω—ν σπλάγχνων ἀὐτῆς. In an epitaph from the imperial period, Termion suspects that she has been poisoned: “If anyone has ever launched against my entrails or my life the miserable furies of poison” (ibid. 8960, 7 = GVI, 1875 = L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 2, pp. 121ff.)

⁶ Philo, Rewards 151; cf. Aeschylus, Cho. 413; Sophocles, Aj. 995: “the most painful path to my entrails”; Euripides, Hipp. 118 (rage); Euripides, Med. 220; Aristophanes, Ran. 844: “do not overheat your entrails with anger”; 1006: “my entrails are indignant at having to speak to this man”;

Nub. 1036: “I was suffocating to the depths of my entrails, impatient to overturn these arguments”; Geminus calls love “the god that he carries in his heart” (Anth. Pal. 6.260.6); cf. Koester, TDNT, vol. 7, p. 549.

⁷ It is found late (fifth-sixth century) in P.Fuad I Univ. 43, 6 (a theological fragment); C.P.Herm. 16, 4: “I beg you to take pity” (cf. the editor’s note); P.Flor. 296, 23: οὐκ ε—σπλαγχνίσθη ὁ εἰ—ρημένος; SB 9402, 6: ὑπὸ τω—ν σπλάγχνων μου. But according to biblical language, God says: “Abraham is without pity for the sinner (οὐ σπλαγχνίζεται), whereas I am full of mercy for them (ε—γὼ σπλαγχνίζομαι)” (T.Abr. B12); “Let us be patient until the Lord takes pity and has mercy on us” (σπλαγχνισθεὶς ε—λεήσει ἡμα—ς, T. Job 26.5).

⁸ Job 30:27; cf. P. Dhorme, Emploi métaphorique, p. 111ff., 134ff. P. Lacau, Les Noms des partie du corps en Egyptien et en Sémitique, Paris, 1970, 219; G. Schmuttermayr, “RHM—Eine lexikalische Studie,” in Bib, 1970, pp. 499–532.

⁹ Luke 10:33 (E. Höhne, “Zum neutestamentlichen Sprachgebrauch,” in ZWKL, 1882, p. 10); cf. Matt 15:32 (Mark 8:2); 18:27; 20:34; Mark 1:41 (L. Vaganay, “Marc I, 41: Essai de critique textuelle,” in Mélanges E. Podechard, Lyon, 1945, pp. 237–252); Mark 8:2; 9:22.

¹⁰ Matt 9:36—ι—δὼν . . . ε—σπλαγχνίσθη; 14:14; Luke 7:13; 10:33; 15:20; cf. 1John 3:17.

¹¹ God is said to cast his entrails upon the earth: ὁ θεὸς ἀποστελεῖ— τὰ σπλάγχνα αὐτοῦ ε—πὶ τῆς γῆς καὶ ὅπου εὔρη σπλάγχνα ε—λέους, ε—ν αὐτῷ— κατοικεῖ— (T. Zeb. 8.2); ἄχρις οὐ— ἔλθη τὸ σπλάγχνον Κυρίου (T. Naph. 4.5; cf. T. Levi 4.14).

¹² Col 3:12—σπλάγχνα οἰ—κτιρμοῦ; cf. Phil 2:1—εἴ τις σπλάγχνα καὶ οἰ—κτιρμοί (cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 2, pp. 252ff.). The most common Greek equivalent for the Hebrew rah<Ø>a<^>mîm is οἰ—κτιρμοί; but the Hebrew explains the Greek plural (cf. 2Cor 1:3).

¹³ Cf. Luke 1:78—διὰ σπλάγχνα ε—λέους θεοῦ ἡμῶ—ν; T. Zeb. 7.2—σπλαγχνιζόμενοι ε—λεα—τε; 7.3—συμπάσχετε αὐτῷ— ε—ν σπλάγχνοις ε—λέους. 1John 3:17 denounces the rich person who sees the need of the poor person and nevertheless “shuts his entrails” (cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 3, pp. 261ff.).

¹⁴ Euripides, Rhes. 192; cf. ἄσπλαγχνος, “cowardly” (Sophocles, Aj. 472); Chrysippus, in SVF, vol. 2, 249, 12ff.); cf. our expressions “to have guts,” “to have no guts.”

¹⁵ P.Lond. 1916, 31; cf. Pr Man 7: Κύριος ὑψιστος εὐσπλαγχνος, μακρόθυμος καὶ πολυέλεος. A Roman funerary inscription: ι—ερὸς, εὐσπλαγχνος, φιλόξενος (in IGUR, II, n. 411). Ὑπὸ τὴν σὴν εὐσπλαγχνίαν (P.Ryl. 470: a prayer to the Virgin Mary; cf. J. van Haelst, Catalogue des papyrus littéraires juifs et chrétiens, Paris, 1976, p. 314, n.983).

σπουδάζω, σπουδαι—ος, σπουδαίως, σπουδή spoudazo, to hasten, apply oneself, devote oneself; spoudaios, hasty, diligent, virtuous; spoudaios, hastily, diligently; spoude, haste, urgency, zeal, diligence, gravity, seriousness

spoudazo, S 4704; TDNT 7.559–568; EDNT 3.266; NIDNTT 3.1168–1169; MM 585; L&N 25.74, 68.63, 68.79; BDF §§77, 392(1a); BAGD 763 | spoudaios, S 4705; TDNT 7.559–568; EDNT 3.267; NIDNTT 3.1168–1169; MM 585; L&N 25.75, 25.75, 68.65; BDF §§102(1), 244(2); BAGD 763 | spoudaios, S 4709; EDNT 3.267; MM 585; L&N 68.79; BAGD 763 | spoude, S 4710; TDNT 7.559–568; EDNT 3.267; NIDNTT 3.1168–1169; MM 585–586; L&N 25.74, 68.63, 68.79; BAGD 763–764

It is not easy to specify the exact meaning of these terms, which were common in classical and Hellenistic Greek and which translators of the NT almost always take to mean “zeal, urgency.” They are absent from Matthew and John.

I. — The idea of “haste, rapidity, alacrity” is in the forefront, with no psychological or moral connotation. “When the sun rose, the angels urged Lot to leave” (Gen 19:15; hiphil of the Hebrew ’ûs); “The servants hurried to leave”;¹ the shepherds hastened to Bethlehem (Luke 2:16); “Hasten to come to me, quickly” (spoudason elthein pros me, techeos, 2Tim 4:9; cf. BGU 2349, 5). A meaning well-attested in the papyri: “That has to be sped up” (P.Panop.Beatty 2, 78; cf. 218); “Please, sister, hurry to make my tunic” (P.Fuad I Univ. VI, 15); “Hurry to go and find my uncle’s wife.”² This is sometimes the meaning of the adjective spoudaios (P.Brem. 48, 28) and almost always that of the substantive spoude in the LXX: “You shall eat the lamb in haste.”³ The usage of the Koine is similar, whether in literary texts⁴ or (more rarely) in the papyri: “I sailed hastily for Alexandria” (P.Mich. 503, 2); “Please carry out the brickyard work as quickly as possible” (P.Sorb. 63, 2); “I wrote you quickly.”⁵ The only NT use of the word in this sense is perhaps Mark 6:45, where Salome, after asking her mother’s advice, returned “at once, in haste”; but here there seems to be a psychological nuance,⁶ just as the Virgin Mary's departing "with alacrity" (Luke 1:39) means not only "hastily" but "with fervor."

II. — In effect, spoudazo with an impersonal object means above all "apply oneself to, actively involve oneself with" and with a personal object "devote oneself to, take the part of."⁷ In the papyri, the meaning "deal with, take care of" is predominant,⁸ often with connotations of going to some trouble⁹ and doing one's best.¹⁰ It is in this sense of "trying, applying oneself diligently to" and not "hastening" that the NT occurrences of this verb should be understood.¹¹

The adverb spoudaios has the same meaning in Titus 3:13, where the apostle's disciple must take care and do his best to provide for the trip of Zenas and Apollos; and in 2Tim 1:17, where Onesiphorus sought Paul in the Roman prisons with extreme care and without sparing himself any trouble—and succeeded in finding him.¹² Likewise, the substantive spoude, with this nuance of costly effort,¹³ is contrasted with indolence and inertia in Rom 12:11 (te spoude me okneroi) and 2Pet 1:5 (spouden pasan pareisenegkantes); it is not so much a matter of goodwill or zeal, but of making an effort; the formula is classical.¹⁴ Finally, spoude also means "gravity, seriousness."¹⁵ This seems to be the right characteristic for a leader of a Christian community, who must preside en spoude (Rom 12:8)—not with urgency or zeal, but with seriousness, dignity, or solicitude (Ep. Arist. 39); or even in such a manner as to win esteem, i.e., honorably (cf. Josephus, Ant. 14.186; cf. 2.197; 9.182; Philostratus, Gym. 13). It would seem that it was this quality of seriousness that produced in the Corinthians "sorrow according to God," i.e., repentance (2Cor 7:11).

III. — Whatever the nuance of each particular text, the diligence, care, or effort manifested come from an initial goodwill, the pursuit of something one cares about, a desire to succeed;¹⁶ and spoudazo, in the first century AD, expresses the marks of an attentive benevolence, as thoughtful as it is efficient. In 41, Emperor Claudius takes pleasure in the tokens of attachment he has received from the Alexandrians (P.Lond. 1912, 25: spoudasantes kai spoudasthentos; cf. Severus and Caracalla, in I.Bulg. 659, 23), who are for their part impatient to receive tokens of his favor: ha par' emou labein espoudakate (line 52; cf. P.Oxy. 2558, 3: Kaisaron spouden; Dittenberger, Or. 723, 1). With regard to the Thasians, he receives "all the tokens of [their] diligence and piety" (tes hymeteras spoudes kai eusebeias apodechomai pantas, I.Thas. 179, 4), as Octavian wrote to the inhabitants of Rhosos: "Seleucus, my admiral, . . . has shown many tokens of his diligence and eagerness" (pasan eispheromenos spouden kai prothymian, I.GLS 718, 84). This goodwill includes ardor, care, and devotion: "we obtained this thanks to the careful effort of our friends" (tes de ton philon spoudes tychontos epetychamen, P.Tebt. 314, 9); a woman in the second-third century thanks her mother for sending a chair (charin de soi oida, meter, epi te spoude tou kathedrariou, P.Oxy. 963).

Someone who is asking a ruler to intervene calls upon the goodwill of the prospective benefactor: “I urge you, sir, to take the initiative in showing your concern for them.”¹⁷

Finally, spoude expresses fervor, zeal, and eagerness,¹⁸ as in 2Cor 7:12—“the zeal that you showed for us”; 8:7—“you excel in all diligence”; 8:8—“to prove by the zeal of others that your own love is sincere”; 8:16-17—Titus is fervent in his care for the Corinthians; Heb 6:11—the Hebrews must be ardent in their efforts to grow the good fruit of their hope. This is exactly the wording of the papyri: “with full eagerness and joy, of one accord” (meta tes pleistes spoudes kai charas homothymadon, BGU 1768, 7); “as far as possible, I will show my eagerness”;¹⁹ especially the adverb spoudaios: “Let us use creation with ardor while we are young” (Wis 2:6); the Jewish elders begged Jesus with fervor or insistently.²⁰ Telling of the effectiveness of a recommendation, the beneficiary writes, “He introduced me to Aemilianus without delay and eagerly” (anoknos kai spoudaios synestake me, P.Mich. 498, 14). Philoi shows that he is eager to serve (hina pempomen Philoi spoudaioshem in prosenechthenti).²¹ As for Jude 3, pasan spouden poioumenos graphein hymin, we could just as easily translate either “I was in a hurry”²² or “I greatly desired to write to you concerning our common salvation.”²³ All the commentators, following Wettstein, emphasize that the formula pasan spouden poioumenos has classical antecedents going back to Herodotus.²⁴

IV. — When St. Paul points out to the Corinthians that Titus has shown himself very eager (spoudaioteros) to go to them, of his own accord (2Cor 8:17), he wants to impress his recipients with the fact that this promptitude comes from the very heart of his envoy; but, nevertheless, he is using the epistolary formula “I know your devotion,” which became a cliché: “Knowing your devotion to everyone” (eidou sou to spoudeon to pros pantas, P.Oxy. 929, 3; cf. 1064, 6); “for I know your devotion and fairness.”²⁵ We have every right to think that in choosing the adjective spoudaios, he also gave it the connotations “good, excellent, virtuous” that are implied in other NT usages and which were so common in the Koine, that a Roman epitaph uses this word to sum up all the virtues of “Crispina, wife of Procopius, spoudaia, loving the law” (CIL 132). This moral meaning of spoudaios comes especially from Aristotle,²⁶ who probably borrowed it from Antisthenes (Diogenes Laertius 6.104–105). On the one hand, spoudaios means “serious, conscientious”; on the other hand, “meticulous, done well, virtuous.” There are games that are serious (tas espoudasmenas paidias, Aristotle, Rh. 1.11.1371a3–4) in that they require effort, and similarly the work or function (ergon) of moral virtue is the virtuous life (zoe spoudaia), which requires sustained diligence. Xenophon contrasts honest folk, who deserve respect (hoi spoudaioi) against rogues (hoi phauloi, in Cyr. 2.24) and the wicked (poneroi).²⁷ This vocabulary and doctrine were picked up by the Stoics. According to Zeno, there are two classes of humans (to men ton spoudaion, to de ton phaulon), the former practicing virtue, the others doing evil (Stobaeus, Ecl. 2.7.11; vol. 2, p. 99; cf. SVF, vol. 1, 216). Chrysippus says that the spoudaios aner is a rare person (Plutarch, De Stoic. rep. 31), is perfect and happy and does not fall into error.²⁸ Philo inherits this tradition and contrasts the good and the wicked (to phaulon to spoudaio, Giants 56); “The life of the virtuous person consists in deeds (ho spoudaiou bios en ergois), that of the wicked (ho tou phaulou) in words.”²⁹ As opposed to the slave, the spoudaios is not subject to compulsion (Good Man Free 60); “He is perfectly virtuous (pantos spoudaios), this man to whom it is said, ‘I am your God’” (Change of Names 31; cf. Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 124), “incapable of taking on the burden of any evil whatsoever” (Creation 73). As God is the author of all that is worthwhile (spoudaia, Philo, Change of Names 256), it is possible to specify that “God made all virtuous beings for the sake of their affinity with him” (Creation 74).

In everyday Greek, spoudaios refers to good quality: “I am sending you some good melon seeds” (P.Oxy. 117, 2); “we have no other that is good” (P.Flor. 338, 8); the adjective is also used for athletes,³⁰ good people (P.Mich. 213, 11), and true friends,³¹ precisely because they are zealous and eager.³²

V. — We cannot fail to note the connotations of excellence and honor in this term, especially when it is linked with philotimia,³³ as is the case in most of the honorific decrees. For example, a decree at Samos in honor of Boulagoras, “showing eagerness and absolute devotion” (tem pasan epoiesato spouden kai philotimian antikatastas, SEG I, 366, 11; second century BC); a decree conferring proxenia upon Nicias, who spared no zeal, expense, or devotion;³⁴ a decree at a city in Cappadocia in behalf of Apollonius;³⁵ a decree of Apollonia honoring Pamphilos: “With all eagerness and devotion, he set each of these matters in order” (I.Car. 167, 8); decree of Smyrna in honor of some Thasian judges: “for the zeal and devotion with which they acted.”³⁶ Heracleans of the Pontus send an embassy to Hadrian to intercede on behalf of their colony “using all zeal and all genuine affection.”³⁷

This link with philostorgia (“affection”) exploits the affective connotations of the word spoude during this period³⁸ and reveals not only the elements of affection, spontaneity, and unselfishness in Titus’s eagerness to go to Corinth³⁹ and the cordial aspects of brotherly assistance in the primitive church but also how the believers put their whole heart into bearing fruit.

¹ Jdt 13:1. Almost all the other occurrences correspond to the niphal of the Hebrew bahal, “be prompt, arrive suddenly” (Eccl 8:3), with a nuance of suddenness and violence (Isa 21:3); hence “be frightened” (Job 4:5; 21:6; 22:10; 23:15-16).

² P.Fouad 85, 10: Σπούδασον ἀπελθει—ν πρὸς τὴν γαμετὴν τοῦ κυρίου μουῖου (note the frequency of the aorist imperative in the epistolary papyri and the construction of σπουδάζω with the infinitive: σπούδασον ποιῆσαι, SB 9875, 7; cf. E. Mayser, Grammatik, vol. 2, 3, p. 49, n. 1); P.Corn. 52, 9: “Hasten to reply to me”; P.Mich. 516, 5: “Hurry to set sail”; P.Mert. 85, 18: “I want very urgently to hear news from you” (πολὺ σπουδάζω μαθεῖ—ν); P.Mil.Vogl. 291, 8 (republished in SB 9160); 255, 4 (republished ibid. 9654 a); P.Princ. 100, 8; 106, 1; P.Oslo 88, 26; 162, 13; P.Oxy. 2229, 3; Menander, Dysk. 148: “Such haste!”; Josephus, Ant. 15.119; War 2.559; cf. σπουδῆ, 7.190; Ant. 7.223; Plutarch, Ti. Gracch. 4.3: “Why this haste? Why this rush?”; Diodorus Siculus 17.118.2.

³ Exod 12:11, μετὰ σπουδῆς (Hebrew hipazōn); verse 33 (piel of Hebrew mahar); Sus 50; Wis 14:17—“lead back in great haste”; Deut 16:3—“you left Egypt in haste”(ε—ν σπουδῆ); 2Macc 14:43—“because of the liveliness of the combat” (διὰ τὴν σπουδῆν); 1Macc 6:63—“departing in haste, he returned to Antioch” (ἀπῆρεν κατὰ σπουδῆν); cf. 1Sam 21:8; Dan 2:25; Sir 27:3. Whether with ε—ν, κατὰ, μετὰ, or διὰ, σπουδῆ refers to the hasty mode of action; it has adverbial value in the phrase σπουδῆν ἔρχομαι (Sir 20:18; 21:5; 43:22).

⁴ Xenophon, An. 6.5.14: “speaking brusquely”; 7.6.28: “The Thracians, being compelled to save themselves with great haste”; Cyr. 4.5.12: “He only sent his messenger the more hastily”; Hell. 6.2.28: “The last ones had to hurry”; Plutarch, Rom. 8.1: “He ran hurriedly to Numitor”; Publ. 4.2: “seeing them enter hastily”; Sert. 4.2: “Sertorius set about the task with zeal and dispatch” (σπουδῆν καὶ τάχος); Thucydides 1.93.2: the hurry to build; 2.90.3: “He gave the order to embark in great haste and against his will”; 5.66.2; Philo, To Gaius 338: “He was impatient to arrive as quickly as possible at Alexandria.”

⁵ P.Ryl. 231, 13 (AD 40); P.Tebt. 315, 8; SB 6745, 5; 9367, n. X, 14.

⁶ “The idea of quickness has already been expressed by εὐθύς; μετὰ σπουδῆς, then, is rather ‘with gusto’” (M. J. Lagrange, on this text); but “quickly” is not pleonastic and—in reinforcing “immediately”—can suggest the lack of reflection on the part of the daughter of Herodias, who was the mere vehicle of her mother’s wishes. Ardor and stubbornness go together (Plutarch, Ti. Gracch. 10.5).

⁷ Xenophon, Cyr. 1.3.11: “I will tell him that Astyages is seeing to it”; Symp. 8.17: “He concerned himself more with the honor of the eldest than with his own pleasure”; Cyr. 5.4.13; Epictetus 3.4.1: “they came to terms”; Plutarch, Them. 5.3: “applying himself to the cithara”; Per. 24.5: “Aspasia was the object of Pericles’ affection for her learning and her political wisdom”; Cat. Min. 14.4; C. Gracch. 8.2; Plutarch, Demetr. 3.1; Ant. 53.8.

⁸ P.Fouad 85, 13: “take care to safeguard your rights”; P.Oxy. 746, 8: “take care of this, as is just” (AD 16); 113, 24: “take care that Onnophoris buys what Irene’s mother told her”; 1842, 4; 2113, 19; P.Lond. 231, 12; 234, 10; 236, 12; 248, 5 (vol. 2, pp. 285, 287, 290, 306); BGU 1677, 10: εὖ οὖν ποιήσεις σπουδάσας ἀπαρτίσασθαι αὐτά (business letter, second century AD); 1764, 22; P.Panop.Beatty 2, 105; P.Bour. 20, 39: “Let Nonna take care to supply Dionysius faithfully with the half-loaf”; P.Ryl. 607, 5: “take care of spending all the Italian money on purchases”; P.NYU 25, 8: “you, above all others, deal with sending the replacement team”; SB 9843, 5 (letter for the preparation of a Jewish festival, in the second century): “take care to send me some wooden bars and some citrons” (ethrog; cf. B. Lifshitz, “Papyrus grecs du Désert de Juda,” in Aeg, 1962, p. 241).

⁹ A fiancé writes to his future mother-in-law: “you are preoccupied, and you took the trouble to prepare a house for me” (P.Ant. 93, 7); P.Lond. 1912, 34; 1916, 16: ἀναγκαίως οὖν πάνυ σπουδάσατε αὐτῷ—ἀόκνως; SB 9156, 9: ἵνα σπουδάσης τῷ—ἀνδρί; P.Mich. 503, 14; cf. Josephus, Ant. 1.115: ἀπολείποντες σπουδῆς; I.Bulg. 1573, 11: τῆς περὶ παιδείαν καὶ λόγους σπουδῆς.

¹⁰ P.Oxy. 1061, 16 (22 BC). A letter from the second century ends thus: “Do whatever is best, brother” (ἀλλὰ σπούδασον, ἀδελφέ, Pap.Lugd.Bat. I, 15, 29); P.Stras. 154, 5: σπούδασον οὖν, ἄδελφε, ποιῆσαι; SB 8944. Cf. the letter from Heron to Ptollarion in the third century: “You lack diligence (τὸ ἀσπούδαστόν σου); I’ve known you longer than a day” (P.IFAO II, n. 17, 3). I.Bulg. 41, 9; ISE, n. 103, 15.

¹¹ Gal 2:10—St. Paul had always taken pains to help the poor (ε—σπούδασα); he tried to see the Thessalonians again (1Thess 2:17). Christians must make an effort to enter into God’s rest: σπουδάσωμεν οὖν εἰ—σελει—ν (Heb 4:11; cf. Eph 4:3; 2Tim 2:15; 2Pet 1:10; 3:14) [2Pet 1:15 is difficult: “I shall take care that after my departure you will have every occasion to remember these things”; the future σπουδάσω, “I shall do my best,” was changed to the present σπουδάζω by a, P72, Peshitta, Arm., and to the imperative σπουδάσατε]. When the apostle writes to Titus σπούδασον ε—λθει—ν πρός με (Titus 3:12), we cannot translate “hasten” as at 2Tim 4:9, because on the one hand Titus must await the arrival of Artemas or Tychicus, and on the other hand, the meeting at Nicopolis is set only for the winter. So the sense is “try, endeavor.” Cf. Philo, Virtues 218: “trying to be a disciple of God”; 215: “to make harmony reign.”

¹² On the difficulty of finding and contacting a prisoner, cf. C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, vol. 1, p. 145; vol. 2, p. 734. Plutarch, Cim. 8.3: “Cimon sought to find histomb” (ε—σπούδασε τὸν τάφον ἀνευρει—ν, he applied himself diligently to the search, 8.7).

¹³ Thucydides 4.30.3: “a greater effort was justified on the part of the Athenians”; Xenophon, Symp. 1.6: “It is truly worth the effort to hear me”; Philo, Virtues 215: Abraham set out to find the One who is one ἀοκνοτάτη σπουδῆ; Josephus, Ant. 2.222, 340; 4.214, 261; 8.187; 10.44. A Byzantine gloss contrasts leisure time (σχολή) with business time (σπουδή) in Theophrastus, Char. 3.5. After asking for the serious examination of a question (μετὰ σπουδῆς, as in Demosthenes, Prooem. 29, 42, 45, 49, 53, 54), Ps.-Plutarch says that it is not the longest life that is best, but the life in which one’s time is best spent, the life that is fullest (ὁ σπουδαιότατος), like that of the citharist, orator, or pilot who has practiced his profession perfectly (Cons. ad Apoll. 17). The Pythia is as it were “overcome by the relentlessness” of Alexander (Alex. 14.7). I.Ilium, n. 52, 7; 56, 8; 73, 13. P.Mich. 73, 6: τὴν πα—σαν οὖν σπουδὴν καὶ [ε—πιμέλειαν] ποιήσασθε; P.Oxy. 1840, 5: “I do not find that they made much of an effort” (σπουδὴν πολλὴν ε—ποίησαι); P.Tebt. 703, 90 and 184: τὴν πλείστην σπουδὴν ποιού (third century BC); P.Panop.Beatty 2, 222; I.Bulg. 314 A 12; cf. τῆ σπουδῆ καὶ ε—πιμελία (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1953, p. 187, n. 218).

¹⁴ Ει—σφέρειν σπουδὴν, Polybius 22.12.12; Diodorus Siculus 1.83, speaking of Italians traveling in Egypt: οἱ—ὄγλοι πα—σαν ει—σεφέροντο σπουδὴν ε—κθεραπεύσαντες τοὺς παρεπιδημοῦντας τω—ν ἀπὸ τῆς —Ἰταλίας; Josephus, Ant. 11.324; 20.204; letter of Seleucus IV to Seleucia: προσηνέγκατο σπουδὴν ε—πὶ τοῦ βασιλέως (SEG VII, 62, 13); Dittenberger, Syl. 656, 14; 694, 15; inscription from Stratonicea: καλω—ς δὲ ἔχι πα—σαν σπουδὴν ι—σφάρεσθαι (IGLAM 519; cf. A. Deissmann, Bible Studies, p. 361); I.Priene 118, 7: πα—σαν ει—σφερόμενος σπουδὴν καὶ φιλοτιμίαν (first century BC); 42, 14: καὶ τω—ν ε—γδίκων πα—σαν προσενεγκαμένων σπουδὴν καὶ φιλοτιμίαν; P.Tebt. 33, 19: τὴν πα—σαν προσενέγκαι σπουδὴν; other references in M. Holleaux, Etudes d’épigraphie, vol. 2, pp. 87ff.

¹⁵ Plato links seriousness and fantasy (σπουδῆ—παιδία) as complementary ideas (Plato, Symp. 197 e; Leg. 769 a; 771, e; 803 c; Ep. 6.323 d; cf. R. Merkelbach, “ΣΠΟΥΔΗ ΚΑΙ ΠΑΙΔΙΑ,” in ZPE, vol. 20, 1976, p. 200);

likewise Xenophon, Symp. 1.1: “serious actions (ἔργα μετὰ σπουδῆς) are the opposite of diversions (ἐ—ν ται—ς παιδιαι—ς)”; 1.13: “If the company is entirely serious . . . perhaps they are lacking in gaiety”; 2.17: “Socrates, speaking quite seriously”; Plutarch, Caes. 11.4; Plutarch, Per. 8.4: “The comedies of the poets of his day took pot-shots at him, sometimes seriously, sometimes playfully”; Phoc. 8.3: “wise and serious people” (νήφων καὶ σπουδάζων) (contrasted with amusements); P.Paris 63, 131: the penalties were set in seriousness (μετὰ σπουδῆς). Similarly the adjective spoudaios: “These are the amusing and the serious things that were said under the tent” (Xenophon, Cyr. 2.3.1); “You are wrong to ruin the most serious man in our army by getting him to laugh” (ibid. 2.2.16); “Every time there was nothing more serious to do, they amused themselves with this game” (ibid. 2.3.20); “No Athenian would dare to set about a serious task on that day” (σπουδαίου ἔργου, Hell. 1.4.12); Zeno: “All good things are useful, convenient, profitable, advantageous, serious (σπουδαι—α), appropriate, beautiful, suitable” (in Stobaeus, Ecl. 2.7.5d = p. 69, 12). P.Panop.Beatty 2, 107: “Your responsibility is to wait for that with as much seriousness as possible”; cf. a serious and dignified bearing, σπουδαίως καὶ εὐσχημόνως (Xenophon, Cyr. 1.3.1).

¹⁶ P.Hib. 77, 4: καθάπερ ὁ βασιλεὺς σπουδάζει, conformably to the king’s wishes, to what he seeks; P.Bour. 20, 36: τοῦτο γὰρ σπουδάζει, this is the proposed goal; P.Mich. 10, 10: περὶ ὧν ἂν σὺ σπουδάξης, this matter that you are concerned with (third century BC); edict of Cyrene, second century BC: “We are desirous (σπουδάζομεν) that no subject of our kingdom should be troubled” (SEG 9.5.53); ἐ—νεδείξατο πα—σιν σπουδῆν ἐ—ξ ἀρχῆς ἐ—ν λυκάβαντι ἐ—ώ (I.Bulg. 657, 5); P.Oxy. 2558, 3; P.Lond. 1178, 23 (vol. 3, p. 216); 1917, 23: μετὰ σπουδῆς ὅλης καρδίας (fourth century AD); line 22: μαιτὰ (sic) σπουδῆς πνεύματος ἀγίου. Cf. Philo, To Gaius 242; Josephus, Ant. 4.123; 5.120; 13.85; Diodorus Siculus 17.39.4.

¹⁷ Παρακαλω— οἶν, Κύριέ μου, ὑπάρξαι αὐτοί—ς καὶ τὰ τῆς σῆς σπουδῆς, P.Oxy. 1068, 13; cf. 2239, 15: “I am prepared to bring all my concern to bear”; 3086, 6: “it is in these things that the active goodwill of friends is seen” (ἐ—ν γὰρ τούτοις αἰ— σπουδαῖ τω—ν φίλων φαίνονται); P.Yale 33, 7: “The dioiketes is acting diligently in this matter” (περὶ τούτων τὴν σπουδῆν ποιει—ται ὁ διοικητής, third century BC = P.Hib. 44); P.Fouad 86, 18; P.Oslo 58, 4; epitaph for a Christian jurist, who offered his diligence to all (σπουδῆν, ἣν εἶχον, πα—σι χαρίζομενος, SEG VI, 210, 20). Cf. the praise for the spoude of Junia Theodora at Corinth in AD 43 (ibid. XVIII, 143, 3, 17, 49, 55), a fancy for dancers (Plutarch, De frat. amor. 17).

¹⁸ Xenophon, An. 1.8.4: “they set at it with great ardor” (σὺν πολλῇ σπουδῇ); Cyr. 4.2.38: “They carried out with great eagerness that which had been commanded them”; Ep. Arist. 4: “I performed with eagerness”; Philo, Husbandry 166: “the qualities of eagerness to learn (σπουδῆς), of progress (βελτιώσεως), of perfection (τελειώσεως) will never disappear”; Philo, Spec. Laws 1.30, 36, 42: “the passion for study”; 79, 144: religious fervor; Prelim. Stud. 112: “true goods: instruction, progress, ardor (σπουδῆν), desire (πόθον), zeal (ζῆλον) . . . that Moses took along as provision for his journey”; Dreams 2.67: in holiness they consecrated their fervent zeal to piety; Josephus, Ant. 1.222, 256, 260; 10.25; 13.212; Plutarch, Caes. 7.2; Cat. Min. 25.11; Ti. Gracch. 7.3; cf. SB 9156, 4: ὡς πάντως σπουδάσει τῆ ε—ντολῆ αὐτοῦ.

¹⁹ P.Lond. 1924, 7; P.Oxy. 2107, 3; 2194, 9; I.Magn. 53, 61: ἀπόδειξιν ποιουμένους τῆς περὶ τὰ μέγιστα σπουδῆς (third century BC); 85, 12: ὅπως . . . σπουδῆ ἔγδηλος γένηται (second century).

²⁰ Luke 7:4. Cf. Josephus, Ant. 8.6: Bersabe promised to intercede zealously (σπουδαίως); cf. 16.85: recommendation made strongly (σπουδαιότερον); perhaps with the nuance “convincingly,” cf. διὰ σπουδῆς, 16.214). But St. Paul sends Epaphroditus “as quickly as possible” (Phil 2:28, σπουδαιότερως with superlative meaning); the meaning “with care, seriously,” in παραφυλάττειν σπουδαίως, παρακολουθεῖ—ν σπουδαίως (G. E. Bean, T. B. Mitford, Cilicia, n. 31, b 27; a 29); PSI 742, 6: σπουδαίως μεταδοῦναι μοι διὰ γραμμάτων τὸ τῆς ὑποθέσεως.

²¹ P. Giss. Univ. vol. 3, n. 20, 36.

²² Cf. the letter of the Christian Demetrius to Flavianus: ἕτερά σε γράμματα ε—πικαταλαβει—ν ε—σπούδασα διὰ Εὐφροσύνου, “I was in a hurry for you to receive another letter by way of Euphrosynos” (P.Oxy. 939, 18).

²³ Cf. H. Windisch, Die katholischen Briefe, 3d ed., Tübingen, 1951, p. 38; J. B. Mayor, The Epistle of St. Jude, 2d ed., Grand Rapids, 1965, pp. 21ff., 89ff. J. Cantinat, Les Epîtres de saint Jacques et de saint Jude, Paris, 1973, p. 294.

²⁴ Herodotus 5.30: “I will notify with full willingness”; Porphyry, Abst. 2.43; I.Priene 53, 10: “his goodwill left nothing to be desired; to the contrary, he did all that he could” (to reconcile the adversaries—οὐδὲν ε—λλείπων προθυμίας, ἀλλὰ πα—σαν σπουδῆν ποιούμενος); 54, 9 and 39; 44, 13: διότι τὴν πα—σαν σπουδῆν προαιρούμενος ποιει—σαι; PSI 340, 19: δεόμεθα πα—σαν σπουδῆν ποιήσασθαι περὶ Πτολεμαίου; 584, 27: περὶ τῆς κυνὸς πα—σαν σπουδῆν ποιήσαι, οὐ γάρ ε—στιν ε—μή (third century BC); P.Hib. 71, 9: “From the time you receive this letter, put all your efforts

(τὴν πα—σαν σπουδὴν ποιήσαι) into finding the fugitive slave and send him to me under good guard”; P.Mil.Vogl. 255, 4.

²⁵ Οἶδα γάρ σου τὸ σπουδεον καὶ ε—πικέες, P.Oxy. 1218, 4; 2602, 10; P.Ryl. 243, 6; P.Mich. 211, 7; P.Abinn. 6, 5: οἶδαμεν τὸ σπουδεόν σου καὶ τὴν ἀγάπην σου εἰ—ς ἡμα—ς; C.P.Herm. 12, 4; P.Lond. 1918, 10; SB 9607, 2; cf. 9156, 2; 10295, 4. At Philae, in the Byzantine period, the pairing σπουδῆ καὶ ε—πικεία recur constantly (ibid. 7439; E. Bernand, Philae, vol. 2, n. 194, 6; 219, 1; 220, 8; 221, 7; 224, 4; 225, 1; 228, 1) and already Josephus, Ant. 13.245.

²⁶ Aristotle, On Nobility (in Stobaeus, Flor. 88, 52; vol. 4, pp. 723ff.; republished with commentary by J. Aubonnet, in P. M. Schuhl, Aristote, Paris, 1968, pp. 99–115); Eth. Nic. 5.6.1131a28; Eth. Eud. 22.1.1218b34ff.; cf. Harder, on this word, in TDNT, vol. 7, pp. 560ff.

²⁷ Xenophon, Hell. 2.3.19; cf. Plutarch, Per. 1.5: “Ismenias is a worthless fellow (μοχθηρός); otherwise he would not be such a good flute player (σπουδαι—ος ἀύλητής);” Phoc. 38.3.

²⁸ Cleanthes, frag. 566 (in Stobaeus, Ecl. vol. 2, p. 65, 11), ὅθεν ἀτελει—ς μὲν ὄντας εἶναι φαύλους, τελειωθέντες δὲ σπουδαίους; cf. ibid. vol. 2, p. 112, 8 (= SVF, vol. 3, 548), τέλειον ἄνδρα καὶ σπουδαι—ον; Sextus Empiricus, Math. 7.405; Lucian, Vit. Auct. 20; Plotinus, Enn. 1.4.14; Gregory of Nazianzus, Ep. 32 (SVF, vol. 3, 586); Simplicius (ibid., vol. 3, 238), Didymus (ibid., vol. 2, 809). Cf. G. Binder, “Ein neues Epikurfragment bei Didymos dem Blinden,” in ZPE, vol. 1, 1967, p. 37; D. Tsekourakis, Studies in the Terminology of Early Stoic Ethics, Wiesbaden, 1974, pp. 127ff.

²⁹ Dreams 2.302; cf. 34; Alleg. Interp. 1.74; 3.67: “Sensation is among the things that are neither bad nor good (οὔτε τω—ν φαύλων οὔτε τω—ν σπουδαίων) . . . if it arises in a good person, it becomes good (σπουδαία).”

³⁰ Cf. L. Robert, Etudes épigraphiques, p. 26.

³¹ Menander, Dysk. 824. In Egypt, there are associations of spoudaioi (cf. E. Wipszycka, “Les Confréries dans la vie religieuse de l’Egypt chrétienne,” in Proceedings XII, pp. 511–525) and σπουδαι—ος φίλος refers to the zealous friend of an association, cf. J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1971, p. 465, n. 441.

³² It might be said the Philo has a theology of haste: good deeds are done “spontaneously, with no slowness or tardiness” (Sacr. Abel and Cain 53); “obedient children do not delay, they do good actions with all the eagerness they are capable of” (μετὰ σπουδῆς πάσης, ibid. 68); Abraham acted “with all the eagerness, all the speed, all the ardor that he was capable of,” bidding Sarah act quickly (ibid. 59). “In giving thanks and honor to the Almighty . . . let us tolerate no delay” (ibid. 63). Even the priests hurry, “doing everything with eagerness and promptitude” (Moses 2.144), quick in religious service (2.145, 2.170); the tunic that they wear is symbolic of this promptitude (Spec. Laws 1.83; cf. 1.98–99; 2.83, 146; Abraham 62; according to b. shabb. 20a , “the priests are alert”). Commenting on Gen 24:20, “Rebekah hurried to tip the jar,” Philo observes, “In saying that she hurried, Moses shows her promptitude in doing good, the fruit of a disposition of soul from which all jealous feelings are perfectly absent” (Post. Cain 140). When Jesus sends the seventy-two disciples on their mission (Luke 10:1ff.), he exhorts them to promptitude (cf. C. F. D. Moule, The Phenomenon of the New Testament, London, 1967, pp. 66ff.). Cf. D. Daube, The Sudden in the Scriptures, Leiden, 1964, pp. 12ff., 18ff., 74.

³³ Cf. Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 59; Josephus, Ant. 4.105; 6.220.

³⁴ Ει—ς πα—ν σπουδῆς καὶ δαπάνης καὶ φιλοτιμίας οὐθὲν ε—νλείπων, I.Gonn. 41, 13 (second century BC); same formulation: σπουδα—ς καὶ φιλοτιμίας οὐθὲν ε—λλείποντες in a decree of the confederation of Ainians (L. Robert, Opera Minora Selecta, vol. 1, p. 16); decree at Andros (ibid., p. 56); at Delphi (Dittenberger, Or. 305, 4); at Abdera: τὴν πα—σαν σπουδὴν τε καὶ φιλοτιμίαν εἰ—σήνεγκαν προθυμίας οὐδὲν ε—λλείποντες (Syl. 656, 14; cf. P. Hermann, in ZPE, vol. 7, 1971, pp. 72–77); at Odessa (I.Bulg. 41, 9); Thessalian act of emancipation from the second century BC, σπουδῆς καὶ φιλοτιμίας οὐδὲν ε—νλείπων (L. Vidmann, Sylloge Inscriptionum Religionis Isiacae et Sarapiacae, Berlin, 1969, n. 102, 9).

³⁵ Σπουδὴν καὶ φιλοτιμίαν εἰ—σενεγκάμενος, C. Michel, Recueil, n. 546, 18.

³⁶ —Ἐπὶ τῇ σπουδῇ καὶ φιλοτιμίᾳ ἠ— ε—ποίησαντο, cited by L. Robert, Opera Minora Selecta, p. 2), like the decrees of Assos (p. 11), of Athens: τὴν πα—σαν σπουδὴν ποιούμενος (p. 193), of Delphi for a physician from Corone (p. 256).

³⁷ Πάσαι σπουδαι— καὶ πάσα φιλοστοργία κεχραμένοι γνασίαι, B. Latyshev, Inscriptiones Antiquae, IV, n. 71, 6.

³⁸ Josephus uses spoude for the violent passion of the wife of Potiphar (Ant. 2.53, 225; cf. 14.283; 16.302; 18.292), Herod's devotion to Mariamne (War 1.431) or his eunuchs (Ant. 16.230). Already Xenophon, Hell. 3.1.9: "Those of the Spartans who are noble-hearted." In his letter to Rhosos, Augustus writes concerning his envoy: πα—σαν ει—σφερόμενος σπουδὴν καὶ προθυμίαν ὑπὲρ τω—ν ὑμει—ν συμφερόντων (M. Guarducci, Epigrafia greca, vol. 2, p. 117); P.Abinn. 7, 4: Εὐχαριστοῦμεν τω— θεω— περὶ τῆς ὀλοκληρίας καὶ τῆς σπουδῆν (sic) σου; P.Lips. 119, col. II, 5: ει—ς χαράν τε ὁμοῦ καὶ σπουδῆς περὶ τὸ ὀρθω—ς.

³⁹ Cf. P.Flor. 304, 9, from the sixth century, where Apphous is enjoined to assume the office of riparius without remuneration but with this warning: "your zeal (or seriousness) will win you praises (ε—κ σπουδῆς γὰρ ε—παινεθήσαι); negligence will bring you serious danger"; contrasted with childishness in Philo, Spec. Laws 1.314; cf. 2.2. Τὸ σπουδαι—ον σου = your fervor, an expression of friendship, P.Oxy. 2602, 10–14; P. J. Parsons, in P.Coll.Youtie II, p. 421; cf. pp. 565–566.

στασιαστής, στάσις

stasiastes, agitator, troublemaker, fomenter of rebellion; stasis, standing, controversy, rebellion, uprising

stasiastes, EDNT 3.267; MM 586; L&N 39.37; BAGD 764 | stasis, S 4714; TDNT 7.568–571; EDNT 3.267; MM 586; L&N 13.72, 33.448, 39.34; BAGD 764

The biblical hapax stasiastes, used concerning Barabbas, who was in prison "with the seditious" (Mark 15:7), unknown in classical Greek, is attested from the third century BC by two papyri. Païs, a rug-maker, has already brought accusations against Nechtembes to Zeno; today he gives several proofs of his escapades. He has even corrupted other weavers; he is an agitator (hos estin stasiastes, PSI 442; republished as P.Cair.Zen. 59484, 4). A similar accusation brought by Petosiris against another Païs: "memorandum to Zeno from Petosiris: Païs, the agitator, the farmer" (hypomnema Zenoni para Petosirios: Paeis ho stasiastes ho georgos, P.Cair.Zen. 59499, 87). Josephus, Ant. 14.8 presents "a friend of Hyrcanus the Idumean, called Antipater . . . ; he was by nature a troublemaker and seditious."¹ The noun is derived from stasiazo, "be in dissension, plot an uprising" (Xenophon, An. 2.5.28), form parties (Thucydides 4.84.2), revolt.²

With the exception of Prov 17:14 (Hebrew rîb, a private quarrel), all the occurrences of stasis in the LXX fit the first meaning of the term: transitively, the act of standing something up; intransitively, the act of standing still,³ as the moon stood still (Josh 10:13); hence the connotations of repose, stability, fixity so emphasized by Philo with moral or religious significance.⁴ But the NT uses this meaning—“stand, remain in place”—only once, with respect to the way to the heavenly sanctuary, which was not yet open “so long as the first tent (the tabernacle of the old covenant) remained” (Heb 9:8) or was functional (echouses stasin). This agrees with the usage in 2Chr 30:16; 35:10, 15; Neh 9:3; 13:11, because holding a place or a position is often synonymous with carrying out a function. Valerius Pius, for example, gives thanks and accepts the position of secutor and the assurance that he has been given (euchariston auto kai epidechomenos ten genetheisan pros auton stasin kai dexian, P.Mich. 485, 7; cf. Marcus Aurelius 6.41.2).

Standing up can mean standing up in opposition to or disagreement with someone. This sense of stasis is attested five times in Acts, with the same connotations as in contemporary Greek. It can be a matter of conflicting ideas, a source of controversy and polemics;⁵ these discussions bring out disagreements and stir up commotion and trouble⁶ that are hard to smooth over, between either individuals or social groups,⁷ like the violent dispute in Acts 23:10. Usually, stasis refers to social disorders,⁸ whether civil war (Dittenberger, Syl. 528, 4; third century BC, at Gortyn; Josephus, Ant. 14.22), revolution (Thucydides 7.33.5), revolt (Josephus, Ant. 20.117), an insurrection,⁹ an uprising (P.Brem. 11, 30 = C.Pap.Jud. 444, 30), a riot. Thus emperor Claudius refers to the tarache kai stasis of the Alexandrians against the Jews,¹⁰ and in a dream Martyrius sees the riots and madness at Lycopolis, followed by attacks and pillage (P.Oxy. 1873, 2). All these texts show the gravity and violence implied by Hellenistic stasis and help explain the connection between insurrection and murder in Luke 23:19, 25.

¹ Δραστήριος δὲ τὴν φύσιν ὄν καὶ στασιαστής, Josephus, Ant. 14.8; cf. War 6.157: “a large number of agitators, having nothing else to pillage . . . attacked the Roman posts en masse”; Dionysius of Halicarnassus 2.1.3; 6.70; Diodorus Siculus 10.11.1.

² Jdt 7:15: “You will inflict severe punishment on them for revolting”; 2Macc 4:30—“The inhabitants of Tarsus and Mallus revolted”; 14:6—“The Hasideans fomented war and insurrection, not letting the kingdom enjoy peace” (εὐσταθείας); Dio Cassius 10.32: “Violent insurrection led to a revolution against the state”; Zosimus 1.61: Aurelian “quickly subdued the Alexandrians who were agitating and dreaming of revolt” (στασιάζοντες καὶ πρὸς ἀπόστασιν ἰδόντας).

³ Cf. E. Boisacq, Dictionnaire étymologique, on this word. Stasis is the place (Deut 28:65; Nah 3:11; Dan 8:17; 10:11; Neh 8:7; Sir 23:12; cf.

Polybius 2.68.7: “He held his initial position at the summit”; workplace, BGU 1122, 18, 21; in 12 BC), especially for the feet (1Chr 28:2; 1Macc 10:72); but also the normal state of the house of God (2Chr 24:13), the stone pillar at Shechem (Judg 9:6, Hebrew musab; on this meaning, cf. Xenophon, Cyn. 2.8: “stakes”; the erecting of a structure, cf. P.Petr. 46, 3, 1; Xenophon, Cyn. 9.16: “the setting up of a trap”; A. Deissmann, Bible Studies, p. 158ff.); also a “statute,” a pact, a royal edict (Dan 6:7; 1Macc 7:18). In astronomy, στάσις and σύστασις refer to the stability of the weather or the position of the planets in the zodiac, cf. Geminus, Intro. to Astronomy 2.8–10; 17.3.47.

⁴ Alleg. Interp. 2.99: “conduct that upsets the stability of the created and perishable being is what causes misdeeds” (the passions); Dreams 2.237: “fixity, stability, and identity made eternal by his immutable, unchanging character” is an attribute of God; cf. 2.222; Creation 120; Philo, Post. Cain 29: “God orders . . . staying motionless with him”; 23: “the one who approaches God desires immobility”; one prays to obtain it (Abraham 58); “stability and unchanging rest are found with God” (Giants 49).

⁵ Acts 23:7—a controversy between the Pharisees and the Sadducees (ε—γένετο στάσις); cf. Philo, Heir 248: “The difficulty of finding and rooting out the truth caused dissensions of the spirit” (στάσεις ε—γέννησε); Josephus, Life 143: The Tarichaeans and strangers on the one side and the Galileans and people of Tiberias on the other had differing opinions and conflict arose (γίνεται στάσις); cf. Philo, Drunkennes 98: “surges of unreason created internal discord” (στάσιν ε—μφύλιον); Post. Cain 183: “having calmed the rebellion in him” (καταπαύσας τὴν αὐτῷ—στάσιν); 185; Plutarch, C. Gracch. 13.2: seditious talk; Cic. 3.3: dissension.

⁶ Acts 15:2—the agitation at Antioch arose from a quarrel with the Judaizers. At Seleucia, life is marked by dissension between Greeks and Syrians (ε—ν στάσει καὶ διχονοίᾳ, Josephus, Ant. 18.374; 16.73).

⁷ P.Col.Zen. 74, 8, the protest of Paris, drafted against his will into the Egyptian military; P.Rein. 18, 16: “unjust quarrel” provoked by a creditor; 19, 12; P.Stras. 20, 10 (republished, 280): a contract of renunciation (διάλυσις), persons who have long been in conflict decide to make peace and end their quarrels (στάσεις διαλύσασθαι); Xenophon, An. 6.1.29: “There would be less division with a single leader than with several”; Philo, Spec. Laws 1.108: “The law attempts to suppress animosities in the lives of the priests”; 3.192: “God destroys the factions in the cities”; Josephus, War 2.10; 5.98: “the factions revived the civil war”; Ant. 18.8; Plutarch, Sert. 4.7: “the faction of Marius.” On στάσις as a political party (like μερίς, αἵρεσις, ε—ταιρεία), cf. K. D. Stergiopoulos, Τὰ πολιτικά κόμματα τῶ—ν ἀρχαίων —Αθηνῶ—ν, Athens, 1955.

⁸ Acts 24:5—the lawyer Tertullus accuses Paul of stirring up disturbances; cf. Josephus, War 2.175–176; Ant. 20.109; Philo, Flacc. 135: “Isidorus, very good at organizing στάσεις and θορύβους.” Diodorus Siculus 18, summary 1; 39.4.

⁹ Acts 19:40, the clerk of Ephesus: “We run the risk of being accused of insurrection for what has happened today”; Luke 23:25—“Pilate released the one who had been imprisoned for insurrection and murder”; Josephus, Ant. 4.59, 76; War 1.236; Plutarch, Cat. Min. 28.6: “a law that introduced insurrection and civil war to Rome”; 45.7; 47.2; Ant. 53.11; P.Bour. 10, 18 (= SB 6643; 88 BC): “You will do well to watch the region, to be on the defensive, and, if individuals set out to disobey you and start a new insurrection, to arrest them.”

¹⁰ P.Lond. 1912, 73 = C.Pap.Jud. 153, 73. The ταραχή—στάσις link is common in Philo, Dreams 2.251; Post. Cain 119; To Gaius 113; Prelim. Stud. 176; Josephus, Ant. 20.174; Diodorus Siculus 13.33; cf. θόρυβος, Flacc. 135; P.Brem. XI, 26, 30; I.Magn. 114, 3–4, 11; φιλονεικία (Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.243); cf. Delling, “στάσις,” in TDNT, vol. 7, pp. 568–571. Josephus often emphasizes the damaging effects of stasis: troubles that force citizens into exile (Ag. Apion 1.194); violation of the laws (Ant. 20.117), the ruin of institutions (4.140), assassinations (4.376; 18.8), etc. Cf. the first Roman insurrection that ended in bloodshed, Plutarch, Ti. Gracch. 20.1.

στέγω

stego, to hide, contain, bear up, endure

stego, S 4722; TDNT 7.585–587; EDNT 3.272; MM 587; L&N 25.176; BAGD 765–766

This verb, which is relatively rare in literary Greek, as well as in the papyri and inscriptions, derives from the Indo-European (s)teg, “cover, hide” (cf. Kasch, on this word, in TDNT, vol. 7, p. 585). It has diverse meanings, as summarized by Hesychius: “stegei: hide, contain, bear up, endure” (kryptei, synechei, bastazei, hypomenei). The word is used for covering a house with a roof, as in a dedication by a thiasos at Olbia (“They covered the synagogue”)¹ or for covering a container to keep a liquid from spilling.² Hence the connotations of protecting and defending,³ of enduring and resisting, either literally (“They bore up against the onslaught of the barbarians")⁴ or in a moral sense: "Being able to endure the deprivations no longer" (Philo, Flacc. 64, meketi stegein); Moses was "unable to contain (me stegon) a feeling of reciprocal love and affection for his people" (Virtues 69); "For my father did me much evil, and I bore up until your arrival" (ho gar pater mou polla moi kaka epoiesen, kai estexa heos elthes, P.Oxy. 1775, 10); "it is necessary to be zealous, to bear up, to speak out" (zelotypein gar dei stegein karterein, P.Grenf. 1.18; second century BC); Palladas: "I cannot hold back this rage" (Anth. Pal. 11.340). It is in this sense that St. Paul, not taking advantage of his right to live off of the gospel, endures all his privations (1Cor 9:12; panta stegomen) or is unable to endure the impatience or distress caused him by lack of news from the Thessalonians: "no longer being able to bear it" (meketi stegontes, 1Thess 3:1, 5).

We may understand 1Cor 13:7 in the same way: "love bears all things" (he agape . . . panta stegei).⁵ It seems preferable, however, to give stego its classical sense, "keep secret, hidden,"⁶ which is its meaning in Sir 8:17—"Do not seek advice from a fool; he will not keep the matter confidential" (OT hapax); "remain silent." From Philo: "Not being able to keep quiet the secret of the greatness and beauty of virtue" (Philo, Abraham 261); from Josephus: "Once he was drunk, he could no longer keep secrets" (Life 225; cf. Ant. 19.48); a petition to the king, third century BC: "let him no longer hold out in the district on account of the preceding complaints" (ouketi stege en to nomo dia tas prokeimenas aitias, P.Tebt. 769, 74); or the edict of the prefect Cn. Vergilius Capito, December 7, AD 48: kai toutous de stege monon dechesthai tous dierchomenous. ⁷ Thus, in all circumstances, love is characterized by discretion; in particular, it keeps quiet about evils and does not record them on a balance sheet; it covers evil with silence and does not try to exploit it, as mothers excuse their children's faults and as Christ begged pardon for his executioners (Luke 23:34). So St. Paul says, "Persecuted, we show tolerance" (1Cor 4:12; cf. 1Pet 4:8 = T. Jos. 17.2). Far from complaining about all of the dishonest and base deeds that may do him harm, the long-suffering charitable person conceals them, in a way, and thus overcomes evil with good (1Thess 5:15; Rom 12:17, 21; 1Pet 3:9).

¹ CII 682, 9 = B. Lifshitz, Synagogues juives, n. 11; cf. Josephus, Ant. 5.314: Samson is placed in a room where two columns support the ceiling; Plutarch, Rom. 20.6: "the earth covered the wood"; P.Cair.Zen. 59251, 7; P.Ness. 22, 20, 26. Enoch 14.11: αἱ—στέγαι = the roofs. Plutarch, Dem. 21.2; I.Perg. 158.

² Plato, Resp. 10.621 a: "no vase can contain the waters of the River of Forgetfulness"; Critias 111 d, soil strata made impermeable to rain by clay;

Thucydides 2.94.3: “their ships, which were not water-tight (οὐδὲν στέγουσαι) caused them concern”; an epigram of Catilius: “Halting your respectful steps, friend, examine me well” (SB 8422, 1); πολλοὶ ἅμα στείχουσι δαήμεναι (ibid. 8356, 5); εἶτ’ αὐτοὶ στείχετε σωιζόμενοι (ibid. 8382, 2). The verb στεγάζω in P.Lond. 1204, 18; P.Ryl. 233, 7: τὸ ἕτερον ὕδροψυγει—ον αὐριον στεγάζεται; cf. G. H. Whitaker, “Love Springs No Leak,” in Expositor, ser. 8, vol. 21, 1921, pp. 126–128.

³ Sophocles, OC 15: “towers protect the town”; Aeschylus, Sept. 797.

⁴ Polybius 3.53.2; Aeschylus, Suppl. 135: “the vessel halts the assault of the sea”; Antipater of Thessalonica: “his hands no longer had the strength to support so heavy a burden” (Anth. Pal. 6.93.4); Dittenberger, Syl. 700, 23: ἔστεξεν τὴν ε—πιφερομένην τω—ν βαρβάρων ὀρμήν. On the στεγνά of a flock in the countryside, cf. M. Launey, Armées hellénistiques, vol. 2, p. 694.

⁵ St. Cyprian, who translated “omnia diligit” (PL, vol. 4, 632, 733) must have read στέργει. C. K. Barrett (A Commentary on the First Epistle to the Corinthians, London, 1968, p. 304: “supports all things”) cites Simeon the Just (third century BC): “By three things the world subsists: by the law, by the service (the temple worship), and by works of love” (Pirqe ‘Abot 1.2; cf. C. Spicq, Prolégomènes à une étude de théologie néo-testamentaire, pp. 156ff.).

⁶ Sophocles, OT 341: “Well, it will come what will, though I keep mute” (σιγῇ στέγω); Phil. 136: “What must I conceal, what must I say before this man?”; Euripides, El. 273: “They will keep your words secret and mine”; Thucydides 6.72.5: “their secrets would be better kept”; Polybius 4.8.2: “Aratus was skilled both at speaking . . . and at keeping secret what he had decided”; 8.14.5; Lucian, Nav. 11; cf. H. Conzelmann, First Corinthians, pp. 223–224: “draw a veil of silence over”; C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 2, p. 91. F. Field (Notes on the Translation, pp. 175f.) cites the proverb: —Αρεοπαγίτου στεγανώτερος.

⁷ SEG VIII, 794, 25 = Dittenberger, Or. 665 = SB 8248, 25. Cf. Stobaeus, Flor. 62.19.26 (vol. 4, p. 427): πιστὸν μὲν οὖν εἶναι χρὴ τὸν διάκονον τοιοῦτόν τ’ εἶναι, καὶ στέγειν τὰ δεσποτώ—ν.

στηρίζω

sterizo, to support, sustain, strengthen, fix firmly in place, sterizo, S 4741; TDNT 7.653–657; EDNT 3.276; MM 589; L&N 30.80, 74.19, 85.38; BDF §§71, 74(1), 400(7); BAGD 768

The basic meaning of this verb is “support, sustain, strengthen,” and in the passive voice “lean, settle, be confirmed,”¹ but its nuances vary considerably in various usages. These are first of all cosmic: the “rainbows that the son of Kronos fixed on a cloud”;² “a wave appeared to us, touching the sky.”³ More common, however, is the meaning “set up, plant, fix.” “I did not have the means either to plant my feet or to climb the trunk”;⁴ the camel’s hump “is set on the rest of its body” (perfect passive of esteriktai, Aristotle, HA 2.1.499a17). Finally, in medical language, the illness or the pain settles in a certain part of the body.⁵ In a number of its late occurrences, sterizo has the nuance of steadfast determination,⁶ but apparently it never had a moral significance in classical Greek.

It was the LXX that gave it a religious and moral meaning. It preserves the secular meanings, as with Jacob’s ladder “leaning on the earth (esterigmene, Hebrew nasab) and reaching to the heavens” (Gen 28:12; cf. Philo, Dreams 1.3.; 1.133; 2.19), but it emphasizes the meaning “sustain”⁷ and “lean” (“If anyone leans on this broken reed that is Egypt, his hand will be pierced”).⁸ In so doing it gives sterizo a nuance of stability, of lasting fixedness, of solidity,⁹ so that the verb has to be translated “strengthen, make firm.” According to Exod 17:12, “Aaron and Hur held Moses’ hands (Hebrew tamaj), so that his hands were firm (esterigmenai, Hebrew ‘emûnâh) until sunset” (cf. Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.45). On the rare occasion this strengthening is pejorative,¹⁰ but almost always God is the one who does the establishing (Sir 6:37; 1Macc 14:14; Pss. Sol. 16.12), or the heart is what stands firm,¹¹ that is, what is strong, convinced, persevering. This is a virtue that goes with faithfulness.

Philo inherits this vocabulary: “the plaster must harden and acquire solidity” (Husbandry 160); “The feet are the support and the stable base of a man.”¹² Not only is the meaning “stability” emphasized, but it becomes a spiritual quality that the hesitant and the divided lack; they are “unable to find a permanent seat” (Migr. Abr. 148), “unstable beings, scattered, carried here and there, always moving away without ever establishing (sterichthenai) themselves anywhere” (Prelim. Stud. 58). It is precisely in the midst of the worst difficulties that changeless fixedness must be shown: “Do not let yourself be submerged or engulfed, but fix yourself firmly (sterichtheis) and energetically turn back the stream of difficulties that are pouring out on you with extreme violence from above to below, from here and there, from all sides at once.”¹³ This precept is taken up by Christian parenesis. This intensive sense of sterizo (“stand firm”) is owed to Philo, whose affinities with the vocabulary of the NT are never sufficiently noted.

There is nevertheless a Hebraism that Philo did not exploit, which consists in placing or fixing one’s eye or face toward or against someone.¹⁴

In the latter case, hostility is entailed, but “to set one’s face” to do something expresses an absolutely firm resolve, an unshakable decision or attitude, a definitive intention. This is exactly the meaning in Luke 9:51—at the beginning of the great journey to Jerusalem, during which Jesus crosses Samaria, Judea, the Jordan and even turns his back on the capital, the evangelist notes that “he set his face to go to Jerusalem” (autos to prosopon esterisen tou poreuesthai eis Ierousalem). Perhaps Luke is thinking of Isa 50:7, “I set my face like a flint”; in any event, he wants to point out Christ’s absolutely firm resolve—almost obstinacy—to get to the Holy City, whatever may be the dangers, the suffering, and the diverse circumstances of the pilgrimage.¹⁵

We must understand the same sense of absoluteness with “the great gulf solidly fixed (perfect passive, esteriktai)” that separates poor Lazarus from the wicked rich man (Luke 16:26). It is absolutely uncrossable, cutting off any communication. More important is Jesus’ order to Peter: “When you have returned, strengthen your brothers” (sterison tous adelphous sou, Luke 22:32). Not only does this verb here find its original technical parenetic meaning, taking on a moral sense, but it envisions a faith thenceforth indefectible: make your brothers unyielding. In his first epistles, St. Paul sees the goal of his apostolic ministry as being “to strengthen and encourage” the faith of the disciples, to establish them solidly, without oscillation, to make them capable of standing fast without discouragement or doubt,¹⁶ notably in the midst of the physical, moral, and doctrinal calamities of the end times. Just as Jesus had entrusted to Peter the responsibility of firmly establishing the apostles, who had been scandalized and disoriented by their Master’s passion (Matt 26:31), these in turn strengthen the faithful in the wait for the Parousia. Their resolution must be strong and sustained: “Have patience . . . strengthen your hearts, for the Lord’s coming is near” (Jas 5:8); “The God of all grace . . . when you suffer a little (while), he himself will equip you, strengthen you, fortify you, ground you” (autos katartisei, sterixei, stenosei, themeliosei, 1Pet 5:10; the reading with the verb sterizo must be kept). Peter addresses persecuted Christians who must remain unshakable in their faith, because their hearts—full of a vigor infused by God—have a sort of immovability in the midst of all the disasters (cf. 5:8, the devil like a roaring lion). The accumulation of the four verbs of stability points out well the importance of “firmness” among the Christian virtues. Once the baptized have committed themselves to the Christian credo, they will remain unchangeably fixed in it (esterigmenous en te parouse aletheia, 2Pet 1:12). No deficiency is to be allowed. The last occurrence of sterizo (in the imperative) in the NT is addressed to the church at Sardis: “Be watchful, and strengthen the rest that was close to perishing.”¹⁷

¹ In the third century BC, Philonides writes to his father: καλω—ς ε—πόησας σπουδάσας, ὅπως ἂν παρὰ Τελέστου γραφῆ στηριχθῆς (SB 7183, 2).

² Homer, Il. 11.26; 4.443—“her forehead will lean on heaven”; Aristotle, Mete. 376b23; Ps.-Aristotle, Mund. 4.395b4: τω—ν δὲ σελάων (the meteors) ἃ μὲν ἀκοντίζεται, ἃ δὲ στηρίζεται; Plutarch, Mor. 75 d, 938 a (of stationary celestial bodies); Aratus, Phaen. 10: αὐτὸς γὰρ τὰ γε σήματ᾽ ε—ν οὐρανῶ— ε—στήριξεν ἄστρα διακρίνας; cf. the mother of the Maccabees fixed (established) in heaven (4Macc 17:5).

³ Euripides, Hipp. 1207, οὐρανῶ— στηρίζον; cf. Bacch. 972, 1083; Hesiod, Th. 779: columns of silver πρὸς οὐρανὸν ε—στήρικται; Plutarch, Sull. 6.11: “a shining flame rose toward the sky.”

⁴ Homer, Od. 12.434; Il. 16.111; Hesiod, Th. 498: “Zeus fixed the stone on the earth”; Callimachus, Hymn. Ap. 2.23: “the rock set on the Phrygian shore”; 1 Enoch 24.2— “mountains leaning against each other”; T. Job 32.7—“set up tables.” Leonidas of Tarentum: “I lean now on my staff” (Anth. Pal. 7.731; cf. Philo, Creation 84); Plutarch, Eum. 11.8: “the horses try to lean on their forelimbs.” Marcus “set himself up (in effigy, στερηκθέντα) on the field ceded inexpensively by Sperentios” (IGLS 2114, 8). Boundaries between towns are referred to by the stereotypical formula λίθον διορίζοντα κόμης Γασιμμέας καὶ Ναμαρρίων στηριχθῆναι (Dittenberger, Or. 612, 8; 769, 11; in Gaulanitis, cf. J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1956, p. 179, n. 335). Cf. PSI 452, 3: κανόνι στηρίζαι ὑπὸ θατέρου μέρους τω—ν κοινωνῶ—ν (fourth century).

⁵ Hippocrates, Aff. 3.3: ὀδύνη ε—στηριγμένη = the pain has settled (= Acut., append. 25); 4.49.4: “the bilious humor, dispersed in the body or settled”; 4.50.5: “the blood, where it works the most, settles and heats up”; 4.51.8; 4.52.2, 4; 4.53.1–2; 4.54.6: the solitary worm attaches itself also to the back; Aph. 4.33: στηρίζει ἢ νοῦσος = the illness is fixed. With the Athenian plague, “the disease was fixed in the heart” (ε—ς τὴν καρδίαν στηρίζειεν, Thucydides 2.49.3).

⁶ Sib. Or. 3.27: “He himself fixed the type of appearance of mortals” (ε—στήριξε τύπον μορφῆς μερόπων); Diogenes Laertius 2.136: ε—πὶ δόγματος στηρίζειν = to hold to his opinion.

⁷ Gen 27:37—Isaac “sustained Jacob with grain and wine” (Hebrew samaḥ); Ps 104:15—“that bread may sustain the heart of man” (Hebrew saʿad); Cant 2:5—“Sustain me with cakes” (piel of samaḥ); Sir 13:21—“the rich person who falters is sustained by his friends”; Prov 15:25—“Yahweh sustains (causes to stand, hiphil of nasab) the widow's boundaries"; Sir 3:9; Isa 59:16—"His righteousness sustained him" (samaḵ); Ps 51:14—"sustain me with an upright spirit" (samaḵ). This latter Hebrew verb is the one usually underlying στηρίζω. At Qumran, it means "give support, strengthen, sustain." 1QH 7.6—"I praise you, Lord, because you have sustained me with your strength"; 2.7—"You sustain my soul and strengthen my heart"; 1QM 8.7, 14—a sustained sound; 1QS 10.25—a solid border; 4.5 and 8.3—strength of character; 1Qhϕ.35—"a strong inclination"; 2.9—"a firm support for those whose hearts are anxious."

⁸ 2Kgs 18:21 (cf. Philo, Husbandry 75: the horseman "who does not clutch anything that he can depend on falls"); Sir 15:4—the one who relies on wisdom will not be moved; 1Macc 2:17—"supported by sons and brothers."

⁹ Dan 7:38—"The matter was fixed (kept, Aramaic nitret) in my heart"; Ps 111:8—"Your ordinances are fixed forever"; Sir 24:10—"In Zion I was established (settled)"; 38:34—the artisans "keep the fabric of the world stable"; 39:32—"From the beginning I have been convinced"; 40:19—"Children and the founding of a city establish a name"; 42:17—"in [God's] glory the universe stands firm" (Hebrew hithpael of yasab, subsist, resist). Cf. join with, share in an inheritance, 1Sam 26:19 (hithpael of sapâh).

¹⁰ 1Macc 2:49—"Now the reign of arrogance and outrage is established."

¹¹ Judg 19:5, 8: "Strengthen your heart" (Hebrew sa'ad); Ps 112:8—"His heart is firm, he does not fear"; Sir 5:10—"Stand firm in your knowledge"; 22:16—"The heart that is fixed on the thought of its plan will not be slack when the time comes"; 1Macc 14:26—"Simon stood firm" (ε—στήρισε αὐτός, intransitive).

¹² Drunkenness 156; Creation 67: "the seed deposited in the uterus is fixed there" (στηρίση); Dreams 1.144, 157: "the Lord, firmly established at the top of the ladder"; 1.241: "The universe rests solidly on the power of my word."

¹³ Flight 49 (on Gen 28:2); Dreams 2.11; Spec. Laws 2.202: "Reason, solidly strengthened (στηριχθείς), as on a path or road that is quite dry, will be able to make its journey without stumbling toward things that deserve to be seen and heard"; Rewards 30: "To lean and be established (στηρίσασθαι) only on God, with firm reasoning and unbending and unshakable faith (ἀκλινοῦς καὶ βεβαιοτάτης πίστεως): happy is that one in truth and thrice blessed."

¹⁴ It dates to Amos 9:4—“I will fix my eye on them for misfortune and not for happiness”; στηρίζω translates the Hebrew verb sûm, “put, place, establish, turn”; likewise Jer 24:6, but with the opposite meaning: “I will fix my eye on them with kindness.” Usually it is the face that is strengthened; Jer 3:12 specifies, “I will not set my face against you (Hebrew hiphil of napal), for I am merciful.” This is an exception, because ordinarily when God set his face against a given city or people, “the young women who prophesy on their own initiative” . . . it is “for evil and not for good” (Jer 21:10; Ezek 6:2; 13:17; 21:2). Moreover, it is the verb natan that is used, “give, give out, produce, establish, make”; cf. Ezek 14:8; 16:7; 21:2, 7; 25:2; 28:21; 29:2; 38:2.

¹⁵ Cf. J. Starcky, “Obfirmavit faciem suam ut iret Jerusalem: Sens et portée de Luc IX, 51,” in RSR (Mélanges J. Lebreton), 1951, pp. 197–202 (who translates, “Il durcit son visage et se dirigea vers Jérusalem” [“He hardened his face and set out for Jerusalem”]). E. Delebecque, Evangile de Luc: “Il fit sa marche vers Jérusalem sa perspective inflexible.” Cajetan emphasizes Christ’s force of soul and greatheartedness in facing danger and heading resolutely into it. Cf. H. Conzelmann, Die Mitte der Zeit, 1954 = The Theology of St. Luke, London, 1960, pp. 60–73; J. H. Davies, “The Purpose of the Central Section of St. Luke’s Gospel,” in F. L. Cross, SE, vol. 2, Berlin, 1964, pp. 164–169; H. H. Farmer, “The Courage of Christ,” in ExpT 75, 1964, pp. 176ff. C. F. Evans, “The Central Section of St. Luke’s Gospel,” in D. E. Nineham, Studies in the Gospels, Oxford, 1955, pp. 37–53; G. Friedrich, “Lk. IX, 51 und die Entrückungschristologie des Lukas,” in Orientierung an Jesus (Festschrift J. Schmid), Freiburg-Basel-Vienna, 1973, pp. 48–77.

¹⁶ 1Thess 3:2, εἰ—ς τὸ στηρίζαι ὑμᾶ—ς καὶ παρακαλέσαι ὑπὲρ τῆς πίστεως ὑμῶ—ν, τὸ μηδένα σαίνεσθαι; 3:13—“May the Lord make you grow and abound in love . . . to strengthen your hearts without reproach toward holiness”; 2Thess 2:17—“May God encourage and strengthen your hearts in every good deed and word”; 3:3—“The Lord is faithful, who will strengthen you and keep you from evil.” The initial goal of Rom 1:11 (εἰ—ς τὸ στηριχθῆναι ὑμᾶ—ς) is repeated in the final doxology (16:25, στηρίζαι). Cf. Acts 18:23—St. Paul, in the course of his third journey, crosses Galatia and Phrygia, στηρίζων πάντας τοὺς μαθητάς.

¹⁷ Rev 3:2—στήρισον τὰ λοιπὰ ἃ ἔμελλον ἀπαθανεῖ—ν; cf. S. E. Johnson, “Christianity in Sardis,” in A. Wikgren, Early Christian Origins: Studies in Honor of H. R. Willoughby, Chicago, 1961, pp. 81–90; C. J. Hemer, “The Sardis Letter and the Croesus Tradition,” in NTS, vol. 19, 1972, pp. 94–97.

στόμαχος

stomachos, orifice, throat, esophagus, stomach

stomachos, S 4751; EDNT 3.279; MM 592; L&N 8.66; BAGD 770

Derived from stoma, the biblical hapax stomachos is almost unknown in the papyri and inscriptions.¹ Its primitive meaning is “opening, orifice.” In Homer it refers to the throat, the gullet;² in Aristotle, the esophagus;³ in Hippocrates and the medical writers in general it means the stomach proper: “Suffocation results from the pressing of the liver and the belly against the diaphragm, and from the tightening of the orifice of the stomach.”⁴ Rufus of Ephesus defines this organ thus: “the stomach or esophagus is the conduit through which food and drink descend to the intestines” (Onom. 157); “it goes down between the pharynx and the neck vertebrae” (Anat. 24; cf. 38). But the stomachos is not only the stomach cavity; it is also the neck of the bladder or the cervix.⁵

When 1Tim 5:23 prescribes, “Stop drinking only water; take a little wine on account of your stomach and your frequent illnesses” (meketi hydropotei, alla oino oligo chro dia ton stomachon kai tas pyknas sou astheneias), all exegetes agree that stomachos means the stomach proper, even though the Hebrews, alone of all the peoples of antiquity, had practically no knowledge of this organ.⁶ It is impossible to diagnose Timothy’s trouble, because the lack of vigor (a-stheneia) is a very general reference to illness.⁷ Babylonian, Egyptian, Greek, and Roman physicians are unanimous in pointing out overwhelming fatigue, torpor, general tiredness, chronic bouts of weakness (BGU 2065, 10; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XVI, 3, 29) as symptoms experienced by kakostomachoi,⁸ so this could just as well be a case of gastroenteritis as of varices of the esophagus, a gastric ulcer, etc.⁹ In any event, without resorting to magic, amulets, or phylacteries,¹⁰ ancient medicine was not without resources to combat stomach illnesses.¹¹

In prescribing wine, St. Paul was in agreement with the unanimous opinion of ancient physicians. They prescribed wine as a tonic, a prophylactic, and a remedy to facilitate digestion, combat anorexia, and suppress stomach-rumblings, especially wine sweetened with honey:¹² wine is a stimulant for the stomach.¹³ The wisdom of this treatment was recognized by secular writers: “For persons who have been weakened by stomach ailments and need a tonic remedy . . . physicians strengthen them with wine.”¹⁴ century), in a metaphorical sense, ἵνα μὴ ἔχωμεν στομάχους μηδὲ φθόνον, “so that we may not be caused vexation and annoyance”; I.Cret. I, 17, 11 (second century BC), a man miraculously cured of his illness by Asclepius: στομαχικὸν πόνον ἔχοντα. Add P.Leid.: “apply the right hand o the mouth and the throat” (ἔστω δὲ ἡ χεὶρ δεξιὰ προσέχουσα τῷ στομάχῳ, Pap.Graec.Mag. 12, 128; vol. 2, p. 66, 22).

¹ There is almost nothing to add to the two references given by Moulton-Milligan and LSJ: P.Leid. W, 18, 36 (second century), ἀμφοτέρως (χει—ρας) ἔχων ἐ—πὶ τοῦ στομάχου, “with both hands on his stomach” (Pap.Graec.Mag. 13, 830, vol. 2, p. 124, 36); P.Oxy. 533, 14 (second-third

² Homer, Il. 3.292: “he cut the lambs’ throats”; 17.47: Menelaus spears Euphorbus through the base of the throat; 19.266: “he cut the boar’s throat.” Cf. Philostratus, Gym. 35: “those who have a small, convex chest have illnesses of the throat . . . their breathing is labored”; Epictetus 2.20.33: “They dream only of belching out their little problem and, after exercising their throats, of going to the bath”; Pliny, Ep. 9.36.3: “I read in a loud, firm voice, not so much from the larynx as from the chest” (“non tam vocis causa quam stomachi”); Celsus 1.8: “si quis vero stomacho laborat legere clare debet”; Suetonius, Aug. 84.2; Nero 25, 3; Quintilian, Inst. 11.3.19ff.

³ Aristotle, HA 1.16.495b19: “The top end of the esophagus is attached to the mouth, near the tracheal artery . . . at the other end, it crosses the diaphragm and reached the stomach” (εἰς τὴν κοιλίαν; cf. HA 3.3.664a20–35); Hippocrates, Aff. 4.56.8: “the human esophagus, always wide open, adjoins the stomach”; cf. Nicander, Alex. 379: στόμα γαστρὸς; 20–22, 120.

⁴ Καὶ τοῦ στομάχου τῆς γαστρὸς ἀπειλήμμεμον, Hippocrates, Morb. Sac. 6.374; cf. Dioscorides, Mat. Med. 5.7; Soranus 1.15; Galen, Comm. Hipp., p. 160, 11: “it is the stomach that is in charge of nutrition”; Plutarch, Conv. sept. sap. 15: “the organs of nutrition, the teeth, the stomach, the liver”; Marcus Aurelius 10.31.4: “a robust stomach digests all foods”; Athenaeus 3.79 f; T. Naph. 2.8.

⁵ Hippocrates, Steril. 217: “When the cervix is hard in its entirety or at the end” (ed. Littré, vol. 8, p. 418; cf. Mul. 1.90). Cf. P. Chantraine, “Remarques sur la langue et le vocabulaire du Corpus hippocratique,” in La Collection hippocratique et son rôle dans l’histoire de la médecine (Colloque de Strasbourg, 1972), Leiden, 1975, p. 40.

⁶ P. Dhorme, Emploi métaphorique, p. 133. Nevertheless, the observation of gastric symptoms was an established element of Sumerian medicine: “If a person has a distended stomach and rumbling noises”; “if the stomach is full of acid”; “if the patient is nauseous even when fasting . . . has bitter saliva, a bloated face, a distended stomach; if food and drink cause him pain . . . let him vomit . . . if the muscles are sore and weak”; if when he eats “a person has pain accompanied by a burning sensation in the pit of his stomach and vomits bile” (cited by G. Contenau, “Assyriens et Babyloniens,” in Histoire générale de la médecine, Paris, 1936, vol. 1, p. 84). Likewise in Egypt: “If you find someone who suffers from an obstruction of the orifice of the stomach (stomach = ro – ib), if he has a heavy sensation after eating, if his belly is distended, if his heart fails when he walks”; “his belly is ordinarily heavy, his stomach always painful, burning, and fragile, his clothing is always burdensome, he cannot endure many clothes. . . . He has a bad taste in his mouth” (cited by Fournier-Bégniez, “Médecine des Egyptiens,” ibid., vol. 1, pp. 102–103). P.Ebers, which is addressed to practitioners, contains eighteen “instructions for (caring for) someone who has a sick stomach” and for making it possible for the patient to take food. It diagnoses gastric troubles (which make the limbs heavy, like the onset of general fatigue), the distension of the stomach, gastric hemorrhages, etc. (cf. G. Lefèbvre, Essai sur la médecine égyptienne, Paris, 1956, pp. 124–130). Philo associates nausea of the stomach with intestinal maladies (Rewards 143); he notes that the top of the stomach, adjacent to the esophagus (Spec. Laws 1.217) is located between the viscera and the heart (Creation 118; Alleg. Interp. 1.12).

⁷ Gal 4:13; 2Cor 12:9; cf. Acts 4:9; 1Cor 1:11, 30; 2Tim 4:20; Plutarch, Mar. 33.6: Marius resigns his command on the pretext that illness has sapped his physical strength (ὡς ἐξασυνατω—ν τω—σώματι διὰ τὴν ἀσθένειαν); P.Mich. 618, 11: ἀσθενῆς τοι—ς ὀφθαλμοι—ς; 426, 3, 18ff. P.Flor. 382, 63.

⁸ Epictetus 4.8.34–35. Stomachikoi suffer from a burning sensation, lack of appetite, nausea, and spasms, have bad breath (Dioscorides, Mat. Med. 4.38), cannot digest all foods (Marcus Aurelius 10.31.6), vomit (Epictetus 3.21.1), lose sleep (Galen, Comm. Hipp., pp. 72ff.; 165, 9), have chronic pain (73, 20; 131, 3), acidity (24, 4), indolence (22, 10, νωθρός), etc.

⁹ Cosmas Indicopleustes complains of a “dryness of the stomach” that causes frequent illnesses (Top. Chr. 2.1; 72 D). It is very tricky to identify illnesses referred to by the ancients using words that we use today; for example, sciatica (ischias) can be either a pain in the hip or a neuralgia of the sciatic nerve; phthisis, apoplexy, pleurisy, erysipelas, and cardiology do not refer to the same things, cf. M. D. Grmek, “La Réalité nosologique au temps d’Hippocrate,” in La Collection hippocratique et son rôle dans l’histoire de la médecine, pp. 237–255.

¹⁰ A. Delatte, P. Derchain, Les Intailles magiques gréco-égyptiennes, Paris, 1964, p. 56; cf. the legend on intaglio number 80: “Keep the stomach of Proclus in good health” (Φίλαξον ὑγειῆ στόμαχον Πρόκλου); on numbers 89, 235, 307, 193: “Stomach, digest!” (στόμαχε πέπτε).

¹¹ Aristotle “placed a small skin of hot oil on his stomach” (Diogenes Laertius 5.10). Poultices and potions were prescribed by Assyrian and Egyptian physicians (P.Ebers). For Marcus Aurelius, whose stomach illness was such that he could “no longer take food without experiencing pain and no longer sleep without having nightmares” (Dio Cassius 71.6 and 24), Galen prescribed “a little pepper in some wine” and “applying to the stomach wool soaked in well heated oil of nard” (cited by P. Seidmann, in Histoire générale de la médecine, Paris, 1936, vol. 1, p. 403).

¹² Dioscorides, Mat. Med. 5.7.1; Rufus of Ephesus, Ren. Ves. 2.26; cf. Strabo 6.1.14. On vinum conditum or piperatum (seasoned or peppered wine), cf. Apicius 1.1.2; Anth. Pal. 9.502; Theophanes Nonnus, Cur. Morb., c. 156, line 12 (vol. 2, p. 12; ed. Bernard). But the various mixtures stabilized the wines and made their transport possible (Pliny, HN 14.126), “they work by biting into the stomach; they cause flatulence and help grind up foods” (Athenaeus 1.59 d). Applied in a lotion, wine disinfects (Luke 10:34) and stimulates. Hannibal “had his horses washed with old wine . . . it cured their illnesses and scabies” (Polybius 3.88.1).

¹³ Ἔστω δὲ καὶ οἶνος ε—ς ἀνάκλησιν τοῦ στομάχου, Aretaeus of Cappadocia, ed. Hude, Berlin, 1958, p. 146, 15. Other than wines valued for their very good taste (cf. P.Sorb. 19, 2: ἀστειότατος = an excellent vintage; 255 BC; Plutarch, Quaest. conv. 1.4.2.620 d), distinctions were made between wines that were “good for the stomach” like that of Velitrae (Pliny, HN 14.27 a and c; cf. 23.63; Juvenal, Sat. 5.32), digestifs like that of Chios (Athenaeus 1.59 a, πεπτικός); “the wine called πρότροπος is good for the stomach” (idem 2.24 e). Cf. C. Spicq, “I Tim. V, 23,” in L’Evangile hier et aujourd’hui (Mélanges F. J. Leenhardt), Geneva, 1968, pp. 143–150); P. Boyancé, in BAGB, 1951, pp.3–19.

¹⁴ Plutarch, Quaest. conv. 3.5.2; cf. Artemidorus Daldianus, Onir. 1.66: “To drink a little wine . . . and not get drunk is good.” There is no need to cite all the jokes of drunkards: “a drinker of water (ὕδωρ πίνων) will never do any good” (Anth. Pal. 13.20); “Oh, how I pity drinkers of water” (ibid. 9.406), etc. G. Gourevitch, “Stomachus et l’humeur,” in RevPhil, 1977, pp. 56–74.

στρατολογέω

stratologeō, to marshall or recruit an army

stratologeō, S 4753; TDNT 7.701–713; EDNT 3.280; NIDNTT 3.958, 964; MM 592; L&N 55.19, 55.20; BAGD 770

“No one who is serving as a soldier lets himself become entangled or involved in the affairs of this life; he seeks only to please the one who enlisted him (hina to stratologesanti arese).”¹ The biblical hapax stratologeō, “marshall or recruit an army,” is unknown in the papyri² but attested in several literary texts. When Pharaoh took Sarah, Abraham “enlisted the invincible Ally”;³ “Brasidas had a thousand Helots, and with the allied soldiers who had been enlisted (ek te symmachon stratologethenton), a considerable army was put together” (Diodorus Siculus 12.67.5; cf. 14.54). H.J.Mason gives this definition: stratologeō: dilectum facere, epimeletes hodon kai en allois topois s . . . (IGRom. III, 763; Phaselis Lyciae, 144–7 p.; vide St R. II, 1090 adn.). —stratologia: dilectus, pemphtheis epi s [—] apo Rhomaion (IGRom. III, 824; Thracia, II).⁴

¹ 2Tim 2:4. The thought is repeated by Ignatius of Antioch (Ign. Pol. 6); an analogous idea in Xenophon, Cyr. 5.3.48; Xenophon, Eq. Mag. 6.1; Aeneas Tacticus 16.5; Dio Chrysostom 3.66–67. On ἀρέσκω, cf. F. W. Danker, “Under Contract,” in Festschrift to Honor F. W. Gingrich, Leiden, 1972, pp. 198ff.

² Only “recruitment” (στρατολογία) is attested; P.Lips. 54, 10 and 13 (fourth century AD). To give one’s name is to be enrolled: ἔδωκεν τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ ἵνα στρατευθῆ (P.Abinn. 19, 14; cf. P.Oxy. 1022; P.Ryl. 609; J. F. Gilliam, “Enrollment in the Imperial Army,” in Eos (Symbolae R. Taubenschlag), 1957, vol. 2, pp. 207–216).

³ Josephus, War 5.380: τὸν ἀνίκητον αὐτῷ—βοηθὸν ε—στρατολόγησεν; cf. Plutarch, Caes. 35.1; Dionysius of Halicarnassus 11.24.

⁴ H. J. Mason, Greek Terms, p. 87. (Dilectus [or delectus] is a Latin military technical term for a levy, recruiting.) On dilecti, cf. Lieberman, in PW, vol. 5, 591ff.

συγγένεια, συγγενής, συγγενίς syngeneia, family, kin; syngenes, male relative; syngenis, female relative see also συγγενής

syngeneia, S 4772; TDNT 7.736–742; EDNT 3.282; MM 595; L&N 10.5; BDF §110(2); BAGD 772 | syngenes, S 4773; TDNT 7.736–742; EDNT

3.282; MM 595; L&N 10.6, 11.57; BDF §§47(4), 48, 194(2); BAGD 772 | syngenis, EDNT 3.282; MM 595; L&N 10.7; BDF §59(3); BAGD 772

These noun forms, which do not appear before Pindar, correspond to the idea of “birth, race”¹ and are formed around gignomai, “be born,” then “become, occur.”² So syngeneia means “family,” “kinship”; syngenes means “belonging to the same genos, kin, related”; syngenis is a relative; but there are many nuances.

I. — The first meaning, which remains the commonest, is that of blood ties, the racial meaning,³ which relies on the concept of the family: “the paternal family” (syngeneia patros, Euripides, Tro. 754); “my father’s kinsman” (Or. 1233; Phoen. 291), “a relative’s blood.”⁴ Aristotle notes, “The same person is called son by one, brother by another, by someone else cousin or kinsman by blood, marriage, or affinity.”⁵ These degrees of kinship are specified as brother (Aeschylus, Cho. 199, adelphos, from a, “one,” and delphys, “womb”; cf. Ep. Arist. 7; P.Grenf. II, 78, 13), sister (Aeschylus, Eum. 691), cousin (PV 855); and relatives and friends are linked with them.⁶ Furthermore, syngeneia refers to the kinship of the human race with divinity, that is to say, the origin of humanity with and its likeness to divinity.⁷ Zeus is “father of gods and men” (Homer, Il. 1.544; Hesiod, Th. 546, 643; Op. 59, 169), “the common author of our two races”(Aeschylus, Suppl. 402). From this paternity there derives a resemblance: “Since man shares in the divine lot (theias metesche moiras), he attains this state of kinship (syngeneia) with the gods.”⁸ The Stoics Cleanthes⁹ and Aratus¹⁰ (quoted by St. Paul, tou gar kai genos esmen, Acts 17:28) affirm this divine filiation.

II. — From the physical sense we move on to the metaphorical meaning, “affinity, likeness.” Thus Plato, Phd. 79 b–c, which links likeness and kinship (homoios and xyngenes); 84 b, kinship and similarity (xyngenes and toioutos); 86 b: “of the same nature and family” (homophyte kai xyngene); Resp. 8.559 d. One learns “to know some things by other things if they have some relationship”;¹¹ the lover “does not cease to attach himself to that which is related to him.”¹² “Of all human activities, the one that is the most closely related to God’s activity (contemplation) is the most blessed” (Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 10.9.1178b23; cf. 1179a26). Hence the meanings “of the same type, analogous, having the same properties.”¹³ From the meaning “natural” we move to “connatural.” “Avarice is more natural (innate, symphyes) to man than prodigality” (ibid. 4.3.1121b14; cf. 3.15.1119b9); “Connaturality (syngeneia) disposes children to obey their father.”¹⁴

III. — In usage, and according to their etymology, the terms syngeneia and syngenes take on nuances of solidarity, affection, and pride.¹⁵ “His native city, his comrades, his parents—that is what a man cherishes, that is what is sufficient for him” (Pindar, Paean. 4.33); “blood ties (to syngenes) are terribly strong when friendship is added” (Aeschylus, PV 39; cf. 289); “family conversations (hai syngeneis homiliai) are a strong potion for hearts”;¹⁶ “real kinship produces solid friendship” (Plato, Menex. 244 a; cf. Leg. 5.729 c; 11.929 a). Aristotle insists on this more than anyone else: “Since whatever is conformable to nature is agreeable, and since things that are akin (syngene) have natural links between them, all things that are akin and all like things are mutually pleasant to each other most of the time” (Rh. 1.11.1371b12–13). “The species of friendship (philia) are comradeship (hetaireia), membership in the same household (oikeiotes), membership in the same family (syngeneia), and so on” (Rh. 2.4.1381b34); apart from the friendship of association (en koinonia), there is “friendship of kindred (syngenike) and friendship of comrades (hetairike)” (Eth. Nic. 8.12.1161b12, 16), friendship based on kinship (9.2.1165a19 and 30).

IV. — Finally, syngeneia has a social and political meaning. Plato had already used this term for the “great alliances” of the state (Resp. 6.491 c), but it becomes common in this meaning from the third century BC in the vocabulary of the inscriptions: cities unite in bonds of friendship and kinship.¹⁷ Thus Alabanda is “kin to the Greeks”;¹⁸ “whereas the Rhodians are a people related to the people of Argos.”¹⁹ The formula “kinsmen and friends” (syngeneis kai philoi) recurs endlessly: the Acarnanians “celebrate the cult of the gods with piety and conduct toward peoples that are kinsmen and friends a politics that is noble and worthy of their ancestors.”²⁰ The most notable case is that of a subdivision of the tribe (phyle) of Sinuri.²¹ This syngeneia administers the sanctuary; its members (syngeneis) “are pious toward the deity” (n. 9, 7–8) and can be the objects of honorific decrees; thus Nesaïos “conducted himself well toward the syngeneia” and becomes the brother of the syngeneis (n. 73). So this community was a fraternity.

V. — In the inscriptions, and especially in the papyri, syngenes, “king’s friend,” is a courtly title that usually precedes the person’s function (strategos, epistrategos). The Alexandrian Chrysermos is “kinsman of king Ptolemy” (ton syngene basileos Ptolemaïou).²² King Attalus III calls Athenaeus his kinsman (hemon esti syngenes, I.Perg. 248, 28). The papyri notably associate the “kinsman” with the legal guardian: “having as his legal guardian his kinsman Petearmouthos.”²³

VI. — The OT and the NT conform to current usage without adding any new nuance.²⁴ The LXX uses syngeneia to translate the Hebrew mishpahâh, “family,” in the larger sense of a clan or a tribe;²⁵ the NT always uses this word for kinship (Luke 1:61; Acts 7:3, 14). Syngenes in the words of Jesus is absolutely conformable to OT usage: “A prophet is not scorned except in his country and among his kinsmen (en tois syngeneusin autou) and in his household.”²⁶ St. Luke links it with neighbors (Luke 1:58, hoi perioikoi), with acquaintances (2:44, tois gnostois), with brothers (that is, the closest relatives), and with wealthy neighbors (Luke 14:12, geitonas plousious), with friends (21:16), and with intimate friends (Acts 10:24, tous anankaious philous). For St. Paul, the Israelites are his brothers, his kinsmen according to the flesh (Rom 9:3), that is, they are of the same genos, the same race, sharing with the apostle the same Jewish descent, blood relatives;²⁷ but in the greeting in Rom 16:7, 11, 21, it is not clear why St. Paul would describe Christians in terms of their Jewish origins by calling them his compatriots (syngeneis); he must mean instead that they are related by birth in a way that is “oriental-style” (i.e., very broad), but that they are nevertheless related by common origin in the same family.

The biblical hapax syngenis,²⁸ the feminine of syngenes,²⁹ does not appear in the papyri before the second century AD (“having married my kinswoman”)³⁰ and does not specify any particular degree of relationship. In Luke 1:36, it means that Mary and Elizabeth were both of the Israelite race, but not that they necessarily belonged to the same tribe.

¹ Γένος, “race,” or better “lineage, descent,” unites all those who trace back to a common ancestor. So it first designated the family group, then in the classical period a group of families by virtue of distant ancestry. Cf. Homer, Il. 6.211: “That is the race, the blood, of which I boast to be descended”; Plato, Euthphr. 11 c; Chrm. 155 a; Lysis 205 c.

² P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique, pp. 221ff. Idem, “Les noms du mari et de la femme, du père et de la mère en grec,” in REG, 1946–47, pp. 219–250; J. Wackernagel, “Über einige lateinische und griechische Ableitungen aus den Verwandtschaftswörtern,” in Festgabe A. Kaegi, Frauenfeld, 1919, pp. 40–65 (reprinted in Kleine Schriften, Göttingen, 1956, vol. 1, pp. 468–493). E. des Places, Syngeneia: La Parenté de l’homme avec Dieu d’Homère à la Patristique, Paris, 1964.

³ Cf. συγγένεια associated with the notion of nature (φύα, natural property), Pindar, Nem. 1.27; 1.28: “when heredity (συγγενές, the innate, the inborn) makes us able” to make reason prevail; 5.40; 6.8; Isthm. 1.40; Pyth. 8.44: “his natural disposition (τὸ συγγενές) makes him follow in his father’s path”; συγγενής often means “inborn” (Aeschylus, Ag. 832).

⁴ Euripides, Supp. 148: ἀἶμα συγγενές; Alc. 532: “stranger, not related by birth”; IT 923; Andr. 887: “I want to inquire about a kinswoman”; Sophocles, El. 1202: “you are not here as a kinsman”; 1469; OC 771, 1157; Plato, Plt. 257 d, the kinship (συγγένεια) of Socrates with Theaetetus; 258 a; 298 b; Grg. 472 b (a large family); Leg. 1.627 c: “house and family”; 5.730 b: “friends, relatives”; 11.925 b. E. des Places (Syngeneia, pp. 86ff.) notes three aspects of Platonic συγγένεια: analogy (especially of modes of being and modes of knowing), exemplarity and similitude (correspondence of a copy to the model), and relation between microcosm and macrocosm (sympathy uniting various realms of the world).

⁵ Aristotle, Pol. 2.3.7; cf. 2.4.1; 2.4.10; 2.8.20; Eth. Nic. 10.1180b6; Ath. Pol. 22.4, Hipparchus “was among the relatives (τω—ν συγγενω—ν) of Pisistratus”; cf. the tomb built ε—αυτοι—ς τε καὶ ε—κγόνοις καὶ συγγενέσι of the deceased (IGUR, n. 1005); J. Krauss, Die Inschriften von Sestos, Bonn, 1980, n. 10, 2: οὔτε δὲ τοι—ς τέκνοις οὔτε συγγενει—σιν.

⁶ Plato, Alc. Maj. 105 e: “neither your tutor (epitropos) nor your relatives (syngenes) nor anyone else is in a position to get for you the power that you desire”; Plato, Leg. 9.877 d: “relatives on both sides”; 11.929 b: “his own kin”; Prt. 337 c: “I consider you all kinsmen (συγγενει—ς), family (οι—κείους), and fellow-citizens by nature, if not by law.” Kinsmen and friends or family (Resp. 2.378 c; 5.470 b; 6.485 c; Plato, Leg. 5.729e: “the stranger without companion or kin”; 6.775 a; Plt. 306 c); Euripides, Heracl. 305; HF 1154. P.Mich. 189, 5: μετὰ κυρίου ε—αυτῆς κατὰ πατέρα συγγενοῦς; C.P.Herm. 31, 17: “neither brothers nor sisters, neither nephews nor nieces, neither kin (οὐ συγγενω—ν) nor cousins.”

⁷ Although he contrasts the human race (genos) with that of the gods (Nem. 6.1ff.), Pindar concludes, “Nevertheless we have some tie with the immortals in sublimity of spirit and also in our physical being” (5.5). Amphitryon “entered into the race of gods” (10.13). After death, the soul “still remains alive, an image of our being; for it alone comes from the gods” (Pindar, Thren. 2).

⁸ Plato, Prt. 322 a. Cf. Leg. 10.899 d: “your belief in the gods is perhaps due to some divine kinship” (συγγένεια θεία); 900 a. In the first century BC: “The initiates have a place of honor. . . . How could you not be one of the first to share in this honor, linked as you are to the gods?” (γεννητῆς τω—ν θεω—ν, Ps.-Plato, Ax. 371 d—e); Epictetus 2.8.11: “You have in you a part of this god. Why then would you be ignorant of your kinship (συγγένειαν)? Why not know your origin?”; Dio Chrysostom, Olymp. 12.27: “The innate (ἔμφυτος) notion of the gods that every reasonable being holds by nature because of his kinship with them.”

⁹ Cleanthes, Hymn to Zeus 4: ε—κ σοῦ γὰρ γένος ε—σμέν (Stobaeus, Ecl. 1.1.12; vol. 1, p. 25). A. J. Festugière, Dieu cosmique, p. 211, observing that the line does not scan, corrects γ. ε. to γενόμεσθ and translates “we come from you.” He comments, “Zeus is our father, we are of his race”; and cites Pap.Graec.Mag. 4, 961 (ε—κ σοῦ γὰρ), 2836 (ε—κ σέο γὰρ πάντ᾽ ε—στί).

¹⁰ Aratus, Phaen. 5: τοῦ γὰρ καὶ γένος εἰ—μέν, quoted also by the Jewish peripatetic Aristobulus (frag. 4) in Eusebius, Praep. Evang. 13.12.6ff. Cf. E. des Places, “Ipsius enim et genus sumus’ (Act. XVII, 28),” in Bib. 1962, pp. 388–395; Musonius 17.

¹¹ Plato, Cra. 438 e; cf. Tht. 156 c; Soph. 227 b; Plt. 280 b; Resp. 7.531 d; Aristotle, Rh. 2.23.1398a22.

¹² Plato, Symp. 192 b; Phlb. 11 b, e; 59 c; 66 c; cf. Resp. 6.486 d: “truth is kin to measure”; 487 a: “a person is akin to truth.” In Philo, who links “brother” and “kin” (Dreams 2.166; Moses 2.220; Spec. Laws 1.253, 297; 3.65; Virtues 51; 176; Prelim. Stud. 36) or “sister and kin” (Creation 12: “eternity is sister and kin to the invisible and the intelligible”; cf. 151; Contemp. Life 7; Post. Cain 52; Alleg. Interp. 2.20; 3.242), syngeneia and syngenes have especially the meaning “affinity”: “its like and its kin, because of their affinity and their commonality” (Worse Attacks Better 164; Post. Cain 45); “virtuous beings have an affinity with God” (Creation 74, 106, 144, 147; Migr. Abr. 178; Heir 238; Moses 2.8–9; Spec. Laws 1.247; 3.192; Good Man Free 21) and kinship, relationship: “man has a close kinship with God” (Spec. Laws 4.14; Virtues 79, 218; Rewards 163); “the character that is good and the character that is holy are closely akin to each other” (Alleg. Interp. 1.17; 3.33; Worse Attacks Better 18, 82, 88, 109; Giants 8, 42, 66; Unchang. God 69; Husbandry 26, 141; Conf. Tongues 6; Change of Names 98; Dreams 1.169; 2.26; Decalogue 134; Spec. Laws 3.149; 4.69; Virtues 134, 196); hence “of the same nature, of the same species”: the body fashioned from the earth has “foods of the same nature, those given by the earth” (Alleg. Interp. 3.161; Sacr. Abel and Cain 39; Plant. 15; Sobr. 61; Heir 146; Flight 17; Spec. Laws 3.28), “connatural” (Post. Cain 136), “sharing the same blood” (Unchang. God 4), “inborn” (Drunkenness 40, 90; Moses 2.243), “innate” (Joseph 77), “closely akin” (Creation 62, 163; Alleg. Interp. 1.4).

¹³ Aristotle, Gen. Cor. 2.1.329b29; Mete. 1.2.339a28; 1.3.339b36; Ph. 6.1.231a23; Cael. 1.2.268b29; 1.3.270a24; 3.2.301a4; De An. 1.4.408a8.

¹⁴ Eth. Nic. 10.9.1180b5–7. Philo, Migr. Abr. 178: the natural affinity of earthly and heavenly phenomena spares them from being separated; cf. the connaturality of pleasure, in Epicurus, Men. 129, 135; Pyth. 93, 116; Her. 72, 78. In the properly philosophical sense, the soul has a kinship with the Forms and the Ideas: “the philosopher is in harmony with the words of reason” (τὸ συγγενὲς τῶ—ν λόγων, Plato, Resp. 6.494 d); syngeneia is a link with the intelligible world (6.490 b 3–4), a δεσμός (Epin. 991 e).

¹⁵ Cf. Homer, Il. 6.211: “That is the race, the blood, that I boast to be descended from.”

¹⁶ Euripides, Tro. 51–52; cf. Med. 257: “without mother, without brother, without relative (οὐχὶ συγγενῆ), with whom shall I drop anchor?”; Heracl. 6, 30, 224, 229, 240; Or. 733: “You, the dearest of my companions, my friends, my kinsfolk”; Josephus, Ant. 1.165; 12.338; 16.382; Life 81; Diodorus Siculus 1.92.1: the relatives of a deceased person “tell friends and family”; P.Phil. 2, 1; P.Mich. 203, 34. In the epitaph of the scribe Ammonius: “not without plunging kinsfolk into saddest mourning and grief” (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 64, 7–8). Philo notes “all the seductions of syngeneia ” (Abraham 170) and distinguishes among family members (syngeneis) those whom we call our beloved (Spec. Laws 3.155). He constantly links “relative and friend” (Unchang. God 79; Husbandry 155; Abraham 65; Moses 1.39, 303, 307; 2.171; Spec. Laws 1.68; 2.19; 3.85, 90, 126; 4.141; Virtues 103; Rewards 17; Good Man Free 9, 35; Contemp. Life 14; Flacc. 60, 64, 72); syngeneia must be honored (Joseph 172).

¹⁷ “In the time of Alexander, in Asia and elsewhere, a number of cities or nations with a more or less superficial patina of Hellenism tried . . . by the expedient of mythical filiations to tighten their bonds with old Greece and to ennoble their origins. . . . This was the golden age of artificial συγγένεια” (M. Holleaux, Etudes d'épigraphie, vol. 3, pp. 154–155). Thus the Hellenists of Jerusalem claimed that the Jewish people had a common origin with the Lacedaemonians and were thus “kin” (2Macc 5:9).

¹⁸ C. Michel, Recueil, n. 252, 11–12. The three tribes of Olymos call themselves syngeneiai (LSAM, n. 58, 9–10); cf. the syngeneia of the Aganiteis (SEG II, 537, 2, 6; 538, 8; 546, 8); IGLAM, n. 334, 3, 7, 11, 13; 338, 11; 339, 4, 10; 360, 3.

¹⁹ NCIG, n. VII, 5 (fourth-third century).

²⁰ J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. XXIX, 58 (third century BC); cf. Iasos and Rhodes (M. Holleaux, Etudes d'épigraphie, vol. 4, pp. 147, 149, 315). I.Magn. 15, 10 (Cnidos); 38, 29 (Magalopolis); 47, 3 (Magnesians and Macedonians); 52, 17 (Mytilene); 65, 22 (Gortyne); 70, 2 (a city of Crete); 72, 22 (Syracuse); 97, 12 (Teos); 101, 20 (Larbenai); etc. Inscription 53, 5 has been republished by B. Helly, I.Gonn. 111: “whereas the peoples of Magnesia-on-the-Maeander enjoy friendly relations with the people of Gonnoi and are their kin . . .”; I.Lamps., n. 4, 25, 31.

²¹ I.Sinur., n. 10, 11, 14–20, 30, 46, 50.

²² Dittenberger, Or. 104. Numerous references in A. Bernand, Philae; E. Bernand, Fayoum. In the papyri, BGU 1741, 12 (64–63 BC)–1745, 7; P.Fouad 16, 1; P.Mil.Vogl. 128, 1; SB 8881, 6; C.Ord.Ptol. 48, 3; 51, 7; 52, 33; 57, 3; 59, 6; etc. A very rich inventory prepared by W. Peremans, “Sur la titulature aulique in Egypte,” in Symbolae van Owen, Leiden, 1946, pp. 129–159. Cf. 1Esdr 3:7; 4:42; 1Macc 10:89; 11:31; 2Macc 11:1, 35.

²³ P.Phil. 6, 5; BGU 975, 13 (AD 45); 1579, 5, 25; P.Alex. 10, 5 (AD 69–79); P.Mich. 232, 4 (in AD 36); 262, 3; 266, 3 (AD 38); P.Fam.Tebt. 1, 31; 9, 9; 27, 6, 21; P.Oslo 97, 8; P.Fouad 22, col. II, 4, 22; P.Mert. 68, 2; P.Warr. 9, 6; P.Mil.Vogl. 227, 8; P.Soterichos 3, 1; 25, 6; P.Erl. 22, 4; PSI 923, 4; 1031, 12; 1119, 4; 1319. — Συγγενής also means “compatriot” (Josephus, War 7.262; 2Macc 5:6, συγγενει—ς κάτοικοι; P.Tebt. 61 b, 79; 62, 58; UPZ 14, 8, p. 158), and συγγένεια means “family” (P.Oxy. 487, 9; P.Bour. 25, 15; SB 8542, 8); cf. Ep. Arist. 241; Josephus, War 7.204; Diodorus Siculus 16.52.3: “Mentor was eager to have Artabazus and Memnon come to him with his whole family.”

²⁴ Lev 18:14; 20:20 uses συγγενής to translate the Hebrew dôdâh, “aunt.” Elsewhere, it is just a “relative” (2Macc 8:1; 12:39; 15:18; Tob 6:11), “member of the family” (Lev 25:45), linked with a husband (Sus 63), children, and household members (Sus 50).

²⁵ Exod 6:14; 12:21; Lev 20:5; Judg 9:1; 13:2; etc.; cf. Gen 12:1 (Hebrew môledet) and Num 1:20ff. (Hebrew tôledôt).

²⁶ Mark 6:4. On this declension, cf. F. M. Abel, Grammaire, 9 f. M. J. Lagrange comments, “τοι—ς συγγενεῦσιν by metaplasm for συγγενέσιν, since the singular is συγγενής; but there has been influence from the resemblance to γονεύς; συγγενεῦσι is already in Hippocrates 7.456 C, in Strabo, in Josephus . . . no man is great for his own people; Pliny, HN 35.36. . . . This feeling arises from jealousy, so common in small places, and from familiarity.” We may cite also Epictetus 3.16.11; Philostratus, VA 1.354.12; Dio Chrysostom (cf. G. Mussies, Dio Chrysostom, p. 64); and the rabbi (Str-B, vol. 1, p. 678). Cf. the logion, οὐκ ἔστιν δεκτὸς προφήτης ἐν τῇ πατρίδι αὐτοῦ, οὐδὲι—ατρὸς ποιει—θεραπείας εἰ—ς τοὺς γινώσκοντες αὐτόν (P.Oxy. I, recto£–14).

²⁷ Cf. Recueil L. Cerfaux, vol. 2, pp. 339–364.

²⁸ Luke 1:36—“Elizabeth, your kinswoman (ἡ συγγενίς σου), has also conceived a son.” St. Ephraem took this to mean “your sister”; Isho’dad of Merv took it to mean “your cousin.”

²⁹ Generally συγγενής would be used as a feminine for a woman: γάμει τὴν συγγενῆ (Menander, frag. 929, in J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 3B, p. 876); Josephus, War 7.399; Ant. 8.249; ἡ δὲ συγγενής μου Διδυμάριον (PSI 1105, 8).

³⁰ P.Amh. 78, 9 (republished by Chrest.Mitt., n. 123). Cf. IGUR, n. 246, B 4; Chariton, Chaer. 5.3.7: “It was made known that the kinswoman of Pharnaces was there” (τὴν Φαρνάκου συγγενίδα); G. Cousin, “Voyage en Carie,” in BCH, vol. 24, 1900, p. 340, line 17: τῆς ἀνέκαθεν συγγενίδος ὑπαρχούσης. PSI 1119, 50: Διονύσιος ε—πιγέγραμμαι τῆς συγγενίδος μου κύριος.

συγγενής

syngenes, related; a relative

see also συγγένεια, συγγενής, συγγενίς

syngenes, S 4773; TDNT 7.736–742; EDNT 3.282; MM 595; L&N 10.6, 11.57; BDF §§47(4), 48, 194(2); BAGD 772

A compound of syn and genos, syngenes —attested for the first time in Pindar—means literally a “congener,” but in practice it means “related,” either closely or distantly, in either the literal or the figurative sense of the word.¹

I. — A syngenes, in the Hellenistic period, is first of all a member of a family, a blood relation (Ep. Arist. 7), a nephew (Josephus, Ant. 1.179, 1.316; cf. 1.252, 1.296), an aunt (Lev 18:14; 20:20), a legitimate wife (Sir 41:22), all those who are part of a household (Sus 30, 63; T. Abr. B 2; Jos. Asen. 5.3, 10; 7.2; 10.1; 22.2; 24.9), linked with children, brothers and sisters (Mark 6:4; Luke 14:12; 21:16; 2Macc 15:18; Philo, Contemp. Life 13; P.Oxy. 3014, 2; TAM, 2, 1, 259: teknois kai engonois kai syngeneisi; C.P.Herm. 31, 17), with neighbors (Luke 1:58, hoi perioikoi; 14:12, geiton), and with “acquaintances” (Luke 2:44, tois gnostois), so that it is not possible to specify how closely related “relations” are.² Quite often “relatives” and “friends” are associated,³ and sometimes the affection that binds syngeneis is mentioned.⁴

II. — The papyri constantly mention the “relative-guardian”: meta kyriou tou syngenous (P.Alex. 10, 5; first century AD); “having as legal guardian his relative Petearmouthos” (P.Phil. 6, 5; 7, 5; 8, 5).⁵ There is also “relative and foster parent” (or “relative and nurse,” syngenes kai tropheus),⁶ but the latter designation is not for a function but is a title of honor.

III. — In the language of the inscriptions, the ties of friendship and alliance between two cities are often described as establishing relatedness: “Whereas the inhabitants of Magnesia-on-the-Maeander enjoy links of friendship with the inhabitants of Gonnoi and are their relatives”;⁷ a decree at Pitana: “Whereas the inhabitants of Pergamum, who are relatives and friends and have been well-disposed to our city from the beginning”;⁸ a decree at Lebedos around 200 BC, “to the Samians, who are friends and relatives of the city”;⁹ a decree of the Thessalian confederation: “Whereas the Teans are relatives and friends and are well-disposed toward the Thessalians.”¹⁰

Moreover, there are groupings called *syngeneia*¹¹ that are subdivisions of a tribe (phyle) or of a city (polis); their members are syngeneis, united as “brothers” (I.Sinur. 73, 1, 7). These usages show that syngenes can be understood in a very broad sense, meaning anything from “fellow citizen, compatriot” (2Macc 5:6, parallel to homoethnes; 8:1; Luke 2:4; Josephus, War 7.262), and “relative” through international friendship to relatedness with some other member of a certain group (MAMA VI, 116 = I.Car. 84). We understand that St. Paul refers to the Israelites as brothers and syngeneis “according to the flesh” (kata sarka, Rom 9:23); they are not only his compatriots, they share the same blood (cf. Philo, Spec. Laws 2.80, 82; P.Fay. 115, 4: two pigeons with the same range, syngene chyridia). It may also be this sort of affinity that unites him with Herodian (Rom 16:11; cf. P.Grenf. II, 78, 13: syngeneis adelphoi); so also with Lucius, Jason, and Sosipater (Rom 16:21); and even with Andronicus and Junia (16:7), though the additional phrase “my companions in captivity” would be a way of hinting at the strong bonds that are formed between those who endure trials together (cf. Philo, Spec. Laws 3.126, 155: “There is a kinship more intimate than blood relationship, namely, a shared attitude toward justice and virtue”; Abraham 31; Moses 2.171: “There is no other kinship or friendship than that with good people”). It has been suggested that he is referring to their belonging to the same tribe, Benjamin;¹² or even to “the very broad oriental kinship that can take in hundreds of persons who are dispersed without losing their memory of their common origin, a sort of clan” (M. J. Lagrange, on this text). Or he could mean that they are also from Tarsus (cf. P.Tebt. 61 b, 79; 62, 58: syngeneis katoikoi; second century BC). This mention of syngeneia has an affective connotation; it is even a testimony of honor.¹³

IV. — In 1Macc 10:89; 11:31, kings reward those whom they wish to honor by giving them the title “king’s relative,” the highest court distinction.¹⁴ Mostly *stratego*i and *epistratego*i seem to be so honored,¹⁵ but so is a nauarchos (SB 9970, 1), a dioiketes (C.Ord.Ptol. 61, 8; 64, 2), even an epistolographos (secretary, ibid. 62, 17; 63, 12). It would be better to use the English translation “king’s kinsman.”¹⁶

V. — In a religious sense, there is a kinship of humans with God,¹⁷ which was strongly emphasized by the Stoics.¹⁸

¹ For example, the relationship between God and the soul (Marcus Aurelius 2.1.3; 2.13.3; 3.4.7; 3.11.4; 7.22.1–2; 9.9.4; 9.22.2; 11.9–12; cf. A. M. Festugière, “Sagesse et Christianisme,” in RB, 1931, pp. 401–415; E. des Places, Syngeneia: La Parenté de l’homme avec Dieu d’Homère à la patristique, Paris, 1964) or the affinity between the soul and the stars; Philo, Migr. Abr. 178; F. Cumont, Lux Perpetua, pp. 144, 159; Michaelis, on this word, in TDNT, vol. 7, pp. 736–742.

² Lev 25:45 = member of the family; Tob 3:15 = close relative; 2Macc 12:39; John 18:26, a servant of the high priest, “a relative of the one whose ear Peter had cut off”; P.Phil. 4, 17, the accusers of “his relative Cephalas”; P.Mert. 85, 23: ζήτει . . . ε—άν δυνηθῆς παρὰ τω—ν ἄλλων συγγενω—ν ἡμω—ν ὑπογραφὴν λαβει—ν. P.Petaus 6, 3; 9, 5; Josephus, Ant. 1.343; 7.270; Elizabeth is probably related to Mary by marriage (Luke 1:36, ἡ συγγενίς σου); cf. PSI 1105, 8; 1119, 50: Διονύσιος Διονυσίου ε—πιγέγραμμαι τῆς συγγενίδος μου κύριος; P.Amh. 78, 9: τῆ συγγενίδι μου . . . πρὸς γάμον συνελθών; SEG IV, 255, 4.

³ Συγγενει—ς καὶ φίλοι (a constantly recurring phrase in the inscriptions of Crete, notably in the decrees of asylum for Teians, where it alternates with φίλοι καὶ οἰ—κει—οι); Philo, Moses 1.322; 2.171; Spec. Laws 3.85, 90; 4.141; Josephus, Ant. 1.176; 6.59, 317; 7.43, 164; 8.367; 16.381; 18.23, 99; War 1.556, 620; P.Phil. 2.1; P.Mich. 203, 34: ἀσπάζου . . . πάντες τοὺς συγγενει—ς καὶ φίλους κατ’ ὄνομα. The centurion Cornelius “had invited his relatives and close friends” (τοὺς συγγενει—ς αὐτοῦ καὶ τοὺς ἀναγκαίους φίλους, Acts 10:24). On ἀναγκαί—ος φίλος and necessarii regis, cf. Josephus, Ant. 7.350; 10.5; P.Oslo 60, 5; P.Brem. 50, 5; P.Mil.Vogl. 59, 13; P.Flor. 142, 3; BGU 625, 26; Stud.Pal. XX, 233, 2; C.P.Herm. 1, 6; SB 9415, n. XVII, 11; IGLS 2859, 7; C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 3, p. 92; Prosop.Ptol., vol. 6, p. XIX; Stählin, “φίλος,” in TDNT, vol. 9, p. 160, n. 114; J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1970, p. 418, n. 410.

⁴ Philo, Moses 2.225: caused by the death of their loved ones; Virtues 140: for parents and natural brothers, one puts one’s personal property at their disposal; Josephus, War 3.436; Ant. 6.74. Epitaph of the scribe Ammonius, whose death plunged his family “into the most lamentable cries of sadness” (SEG XV, 853, 7); P.Mich. 498, 15: συνέστακέ με ὡς συγγενῆν σου ὄν ἥδιστα ἔσχε.

⁵ Μετὰ κυρίου ε—αυτῆς κατὰ πατέρα συγγενοῦς, P.Mich. 189, 5; 232, 4 (AD 36); 266, 3 (AD 38); 282, 1; P.Mil.Vogl. 161, col. I, 9; 227, 8; P.Oslo 97, 8; P.Stras. 237, 10; 293, 2; BGU 1579, 5; P.Erl. 22, 4; P.Fouad 22, col. II, 4, 22; P.Mert. 68, 2; P.Vars. 10, col. I, 4, 5; Pap.Lugd.Bat. VI, 1, 31; 9, 9; 27, 6, 21; XIII, 30, 10; P.AdI. 8, 5 (104 BC).

⁶ SEG XVIII, 575–577, 584, 585; BGU 975, 13 (AD 45); Dittenberger, Or. 148, 256; SB 1568, 8036; inscription from Cyprus (in JHS, 1937, pp. 35–36, n. 10); etc.

⁷ I.Gonn. 111, 5 (third century BC); occurs constantly in I.Magn. 15 a 11; 38, 52, 46, 3; 52, 17; 61, 11; 65, 22; 72, 22; 97, 12; 101, 19–20.

⁸ —Επειδὴ Περγαμηνοί, συγγενει—ς ὄντες καὶ φίλοι καὶ εὐνόως διακείμενοι πρὸς τὴν πόλιν ἡμω—ν ἀπ’ ἀρχῆς, I.Perg. 245, 1, and 11 = Dittenberger, Or. 335; cf. L. Robert, Opera Minora Selecta, vol. 1, Amsterdam, 1969, p. 220 (gives other references).

⁹ Πρὸς Σαμίους, φίλους καὶ συγγενει—ς τῆς πόλεως ὑπάρχοντας, L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 11–12, p. 205; cf. Olynthius and Rhodius (SEG XXIII, 547, 2), the Istrians (ibid. XIX, 468, 32); the Scythopolitans and the Jews (Josephus, War 7.364).

¹⁰ —Επειδὴ Τήιοι συγγενει—ς καὶ φίλοι καὶ εὐνοὶ ὑπάρχοντες ἐσσαλω—ν, in ZPE, vol. 16, 1975, p. 37. Cf. a decree of the Acarnanians (216 BC), who “with respect to peoples who are relatives and friends carry conduct politics in a noble fashion, worthy of their ancestors” (J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. XXIX, 58). A decree at Argos (fourth-third century): “Whereas the Rhodians are a people related to the people of Argos” (NCIG, n. VIII, 5; gives as a reference for kinship between two cities Homer, Il. 2.563; Pindar, Ol. 7.19; Thucydides 7.57). SEG II, 257, 4; 450, 3; XIX, 468, 7, 22; L. Robert, Opera Minora Selecta, vol. 1, pp. 99–101.

¹¹ SEG II, 537: ἡ συγγένεια ἢ —Αγανιτέων; 546 = syngeneia of the Μαυνι—ται; C. Michel, Recueil, 476 (at Olymos, second century BC); I.Sinur. 9, 7; 11, 10; 15, 5; 16, 1, 10; 40; 44, 3; 46, 6, 10. Cf. I.Sinur., pp. 26ff.

¹² Cf. Jos. Asen. 8.6: “A pious man will kiss his mother and the sister who belongs to his tribe and his family” (τὴν ἀδελφὴν τὴν ε—κ τῆς φυλῆς αὐτοῦ καὶ τῆς συγγενείας αὐτοῦ); Philo, Spec. Laws 2.126; 4.159: “A person of the same tribe and the same race shares with his fellow citizens profound links based on the supreme kinship (ἢ ἀνωτάτω συγγένεια), which consists in the same citizenship, the same law, the same God”; 1.294: “people who are not your natural relatives”; cf. 317; Josephus, Ant. 5.267; 7.260; 14.396.

¹³ Cf. the expressions ὁμότιμοι τοι—ς συγγενέσιν, “given honor like that given relatives” (P.Paris 15, 20; SB 8886, 6) or ι—σότιμοι τοι—ς πρώτοις φίλοις (APF, 1920, p. 372). Diodorus Siculus 19.52.1: “Cassander wished to appear as a member of the royal family” (τῆς βασιλικῆς συγγενείας).

¹⁴ Diodorus Siculus 17.20.2; 17.21.1; 17.59.2; 17.31.1 (associated with “king’s friend,” cf. 35, 2–3); I.Perg. 248, 28; Dittenberger, Or. 104, 2 (commented on by F. Durrbach, Choix, p. 152, n. 90); 135, 5; 169, 5; SEG XVIII, 580–582; C. B. Welles, Royal Correspondence, n. 36, 20; Josephus, Ant. 7.277; 13.102, 354; 16.156; 17.235; cf. W. Peremans, “Sur la titulaire aulique en Egypte au I^e et I^e s. av. J.-C.,” in Symbolae van Oven, Leiden, 1946, pp. 129–159; E. Bickerman, Institutions des Séleucides, p. 42ff.; Prosop.Ptol., vol. 1, n. 186–334; L. Mooren, “Über die ptolemäischen Hofrangtitel,” in Antidorum W. Peremans . . . oblatum, Louvain, 1968, pp. 161–180; idem, The Aulic Titulaire in Ptolemaic Egypt: Introduction and Prosopography, Brussels, 1975, pp. 165ff., 233ff. Idem, La Hiérarchie de cour ptolémaïque, Louvain, 1977.

¹⁵ P.Fouad 16, 1; P.Ryl. 577, 1; 579, 1; BGU 1741, 12; SB 2100; 4098, 2; 4512; 4638; 6028–6031; 8035 a 5; 8401, 5 (AD 51); 8669, 3; UPZ 162; col. I, 17; 191, 3; 204, 210; 209, 6–8; Dittenberger, Or. 168, 49; J. David Thomas, The Epistrategos in Ptolemaic and Roman Egypt, vol. 1, Opladen, 1975, pp. 43ff. A. Bernand, Philae, vol. 1, n. 19, 32; 20, 2; 41, 2; 51, 2; etc. C.Ord.Ptol. 48, 3; 51, 7; 52, 32; 57, 3; 58, 17; 59, 6; N. Hohlwein, Stratège du nome, p. 135; Prosop.Ptol., pp. 104ff., cf. p. 47. The title of syngenes was given to strategoi of nomes only after 120 BC; cf. A. Bernand, Philae, vol. 1, pp. 179ff.

¹⁶ [In French, cousin du roi. Cf. at 1 Macc 10:89, “Kings Cousins” (NJB); “King’s Kinsmen” (NRSV, NAB); “King’s Kinsmen” (REB).—Tr.] This was Voltaire’s translation, according to J. A. Letronne, Recueil des inscriptions grecques et latines de l’Egypte, 2d ed., Aalen, 1974, p. 347, n. 1; who gives numerous references to Diodorus, Arrian, Athenaeus, etc.

¹⁷ Acts 17:28—we come from God, from whom we receive being and life; Hymn of Cleanthes 1–5; Epictetus 1.3.1–3; cf. E. des Places, Syngeneia: La Parenté de l’homme avec Dieu d’Homère à la patristique, who analyzes the physical, metaphorical, philosophical, and political meanings of syngenes.

¹⁸ Cf. also Epicurus, Epist. 3.124 (to Menoecus): the gods receive those who are like them; Dio Chrysostom, Or. 12.27.

συλλάω †

sylao, to pillage, plunder; to exercise a right of seizure, recover

sylao, S 4813; EDNT 3.285; NIDNTT 3.379; MM 596; L&N 57.234; BAGD 776

†Originally this article was two articles. They have been combined for the reader's benefit.

This verb is a hapax in the LXX,¹ and also in the NT (2Cor 11:8, allas ekklesias esylesa labon opsonion pros ten hymon diakonian), which is ordinarily translated, "I despoiled other churches, taking pay from them for serving you"—which is not particularly clear, due especially to the fact that sylao has a rich variety of meanings.²

The first meaning is that of "drawing" a bow from its case (Homer, Il. 4.105) or "removing" the cover from a quiver (4.116); and very often in Homer it means to remove an enemy's weapons, despoil him of his weapons, snatch them away from him,³ or despoil a corpse (nekron sylao, 10.343, 387; 6.71; Plato, Resp. 5.469 d). Thence the common classical meaning, "remove, steal, pillage," notably sacred treasures;⁴ hence "snatch away, carry off," notably with violence.⁵ But the meaning "plunder, despoil," well attested in the classical period, is confirmed in the Koine: "In time of war and in time of peace, they pillage (sylosin), they despoil, enslave, ravage, sack, insult, mistreat, destroy, dishonor, assassinate."⁶ In the papyri, the word means especially theft with breaking and entering (P.Stras. 296, verso 10) and violence ("they robbed me and carried me off," esylesan me bastazontes, P.Erl. 27, 9) or objects stolen, for example, tools in a tower (P.Ryl. 138, 19; from AD 34; etc; cf. SB 9534, 10), and most often a house that has been plundered.⁷ There is a softened expression in a letter of Serapias to his son Herminis asking him to bring his daughter to him as a favor: "Do not deprive me for the cost of renting a donkey, so that I may show you affection" (me syla mou peri tou naulou tou onou, hina philiazo sou, P.Oxf. 19, 7; third century AD). None of these meanings shed any light on the Paulinetext.

To the contrary, if we refer to the technical legal meaning of sylao ("retaliate by seizing"), the right of seizure being at the root of the exercise of retaliation.⁸ This was an official institution,⁹ cited by Demosthenes, C.Lacr. 35.26: "Without our having done them any wrong, without having any judgment against us, they carried out a seizure of our property

(sesylemetha)—they, Phaselites, as if a right of seizure (sylon), had been granted the Phaselites against the Athenians. What are we to call the refusal to give back what one has received? Is this not the removal by force of another's property?"¹⁰ Likewise Ps.-Aristotle, Oec. 2.2.10: since the Chalcedonians could not pay the foreign mercenaries, they "proclaimed that if anyone, citizen or resident alien, held right of reprisal (sylon echei) against a city or a private person, and if he wanted to exercise it, he had only to sign up. When a great number had signed up, the Chalcedonians—on the pretext of their legal right—seized (esylon) the ships that were leaving for the Pontus. . . . Thus they gathered a great deal of money . . . and they set up a tribunal to decide the claims" (hyper de ton sylon diedikasanto).¹¹

In Ep Jer 17, this verb means "pillage, plunder," which is its meaning in the papyri, where these pillagings are attributed to robbers who also commit assault and battery on persons, if the occasion arises.¹² The nuance of violence, common in classical Greek (Demosthenes, Cor. Trier. 51.13; Polybius 2.8.1–2, piracy; Plutarch, Cim. 8.3–4), is often absent in the Hellenistic period. A mother writes to her son: "Do not take the ass from me for the voyage, so that I may continue in my affection for you" (me syla mouperi tou naulou tou onou, hina philiazo sou, P.Oxf. 19, 7). In an act of emancipation at Delphi, it is provided that those present will be able to exercise the right of seizure on the freed slave as upon a free person, without incurring penalties or becoming subject to any lawsuit or penalty of any sort.¹³

This latter legal text illuminates the hyperbole in 2Cor 11:8—"I despoiled other churches, taking pay from them in order to be of service to you."¹⁴ St. Paul exercised a right of seizure (sylon)—a reply to a refusal to pay off a debt, the taking of security equivalent to the damage suffered, to the justice denied—hence a reprisal.¹⁵ "A private individual who considers himself the victim of a tort by a foreigner (assault, theft, unpaid debt) . . . will take justice into his own hands . . . ; he will seize the person or property of a fellow citizen of his adversary . . . ; hence the action of sylan represents a material compensation" (P. Gauthier, Symbola, p. 212). In this pseudo-judicial act, the one who is the object of the seizure has committed no wrong (Demosthenes, C. Lacr. 35.26), so the apostolic allusion to "other churches" suggests to the Corinthians the seriousness of the consequences of their own failure. Furthermore, ekklesia here refers to religion more than to community, since sylao is often used with the sacred wealth of a sanctuary (Herodotus 6.101); "Socrates never pillaged a temple" (oude ton hieron esylesen ouden, Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.263). An amnesty decree in 163 BC excludes "those who have committed murders and those who have robbed temples and sacred warehouses."¹⁶ In any event, the founder and apostle of the churches had a prior right, established and recognized, to live off of subsidies from these churches.

The use of the verb sylao calls this “right of seizure” to mind, but in a milder form, so that we might translate “we authorized ourselves to recover. . . .” The metaphor should be interpreted in light of the changed circumstances; the idea of seizure has receded, but the idea of collective responsibility is emphasized: each one is held accountable for the actions of all, because each one shares in the property of the community as a whole (cf. P. Ducrey, Le Traitement des prisonniers de guerre dans la Grèce antique, pp. 42–44).

So the hyperbolic and ironic metaphor of 2Cor 11:8 is clarified. The apostle means the just compensation, somehow legal, for subsidies that were not paid him by the Corinthians. By using and abusing the Macedonians’ accommodating attitude toward him, he exercised right of seizure=reprisal (sylai) against the compatriots of his debtors. That is why he states that he has plundered or despoiled other churches that he has conquered in his missionary campaign in Greece. He himself, having been deprived of everything, has taken from elsewhere the minimum salary (opsonion) that was due him from the Corinthians as an apostle. The final “for serving you” (pros ten hymon diakonian) emphasizes that the point is not personal profit, but in a way an official salary. It was the Corinthians’ default that was responsible for this legal action.

¹ Ep Jer 18: the temples are protected with doors, locks, and bars, lest the gods “be plundered by robbers” (ὅπως ὑπὸ τω—ν ληστω—ν μὴ συληθῶ—σι).

² Cf. L. Gernet, Recherches sur le développement de la pensée juridique et morale en Grèce, Paris, 1917, p. 264.

³ Il. 4.166; 6.28; 13.640; 15.428; 16.500.

⁴ Herodotus 5.36: “pillage treasures”; Pindar, Ol. 9.89: “carry off silver cups”; Aeschylus, Pers. 810: “plunder the statues of the gods”; Xenophon, Hier. 4.11: “Tyrants are often compelled to despoil unjustly both temples and men, because they always have new needs for money for necessary expenditures”; Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.263: “Socrates had not pillaged any temple”; Philo, Decalogue 133; Dittenberger, Syl. 372, 5 (third century BC). An ordinance of Ptolemy IV Philometor (or Ptolemy V Epiphanes) excluded from amnesty those who had plundered temples (ι—ερω—ν ἀποδοχίων σεσυληκότων, P.Kroll I, 6 = C.Ord.Ptol. 34 = SB 9316, col. I, 6); IGLS 2707, 5: “Samsigeramos plundered [the god’s treasury?], breaking his oaths” (edict of King Agrippa II).

⁵ Ps.-Hesiod, Sc. 480: “Kykmos despoiled by violence” (βίη σύλασκειν); Plato, Leg. 9.869 b; cf. Aeschylus, PV 761: “Who will snatch the almighty scepter away from him?”; Euripides, Hel. 669: “what god snatched you away from your country?”; Pindar, Pyth. 12.16: “the head of Medusa, carried off by him”; Euripides, Ion 917: “a child carried off by birds of prey.”

⁶ Philo, Conf. Tongues 47; Decalogue 136: thieves “despoil entire cities, caring nothing for punishment”; Spec. Laws 3.203: “What good are foods in abundance when one has been despoiled (σεσυλησθαι) and deprived of the implements necessary for eating them” (the teeth); Alleg. Interp. 3.20: “you have despoiled me of the power to think well” (ε—σύλησάς μου καὶ τὸ φρονει—ν); T. Job 11.10—debtors who have been “robbed” beg Job to show patience toward them.

⁷ P.Tebt. 330, 5: εὔρον τὴν οἰκίαν μου σεσυλημένην = I found my house pillaged; P.Gen. 47, 9; P.Lond. 412, 8 (vol. 2, 280); BGU 2242 b 1 (?); P.Mil.Vogl. 229, 5: ε—συλήθην τω—ν ε—ν τῇ οἰκίᾳ μου ὑπὸ ληστηρίου ε—κπεφορημένων.

⁸ Herodotus 6.101: the Persians pillage and burn temples “in retaliation (συλήσαντες) for the burning of the sanctuaries of Sardis”; Demosthenes, Cor. Trier. 51.13: “When an undertaker of trierarchy sets out on an expedition, he carries out pillage everywhere; the profit is for him, but the first one of you who happens along suffers the loss: you are the only ones who cannot go anywhere without a safe-conduct, because of the seizures of persons and reprisals on property (διὰ τὰς ὑπὸ τούτων ἀνδροληψίας καὶ σύλας) that they have provoked.” Cf. R. Dareste, “Du droit des représailles principalement chez les anciens Grecs,” in REG, 1889, pp. 305–320; again in Nouvelles Etudes d'histoire du droit, Paris, 1902, pp. 38–47; K. Latte, “συλα—ν,” in PW, vol. 4 A 1, col. 1035–1040; Julie Vélissaropoulos, Les Naoclères grecs, Geneva-Paris, 1980, pp. 146ff.

⁹ Cf. in the fifth century BC, the convention established between Cnossos and Tylissos forbidding the pillaging of Cnossian territories and regulating the sharing of spoils (Dittenberger, Syl. 56), the seizures carried out on the Rhodians (Polybius 4.53), on the Boeotians (Polybius 22.4); Lysias, C. Nicom. 30.22: “The Boeotians carry out seizures (σύλας ποιουμένους) because we cannot pay them two talents”; the decree of the Acarnanians (IG VII, 1, 573, 5, 6, 9, 10), the convention between Oianthesia and Chaleion (IG IX, 12, 717), the right of seizure (περὶ τω— σύλω) in the treaty between Miletus and Magnesia (Dittenberger, Syl. 588, 47), between Delphi and Pellana (B. Haussoullier, Traité entre Delphes et Pellana: Etude de droit grec, Paris, 1917, pp. 20–25, 107), at Eresus (IG XII, 2; 527, 3–4); J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1964, p. 245, n. 565.

¹⁰ Cf. Lacr. 13: “a place where there are no rights of reprisal” (ὅπου ἂν μὴ σὺλαι ᾧσιν). The editor, L. Gernet, notes: “Σὺλαι are seizures carried out by the individual who has not been able to obtain justice from a foreigner against this foreigner’s compatriots.”

¹¹ P. Gauthier (Symbola, pp. 210–219), who distinguishes between three meanings of sylao: (1) the act of pillage: piracy, an act of vengeance or sacrilege; (2) a legal and justified act of reprisal, because of a harm for which the victim seeks compensation; the victim himself can seize the person or property of his adversary (even his slaves); (3) associated with a judicial decision, sylon is executory seizure, the praxis (exagoge), an act of self-defense, whereby restitution for harm is carried out by dispossessing the adversary. — Συλλάω can also mean “retake a person by force,” a freedman wrongly reduced to servitude. A decree of Gortyne stipulates: “No one will be able to reduce emancipated persons to servitude. If any such thing happens, and the guarantors of the emancipated person retake him by force (ὑπὸ τιτα—ν συλοι—το), the kosmos for foreigners shall not return him. If the guarantors do not retake him (αι— δὲ μὴ συλοι—εν), each of them shall pay the freedman one hundred staters. . .” (RIJG, p. 103 E, 4). In acts of emancipation at Delphi, it is constantly stipulated: If anyone tries to reduce Manes to slavery, “Manes shall have the right to defend himself by force, as a free man” (κύριος ἔστω Μάνης αὐσωτὸν συλέων ὡς ε—λευερος ᾧν); “Dorcis shall have the right to defend herself by force” (κύρια ἔστω αὐσαυτὰν συλέουσα). M. P. Foucart, who quotes these texts (Mémoire sur l’affranchissement des esclaves, Paris, 1867, p. 11), comments: “The word συλέειν, which refers to the rights of the emancipated person, has great energy; its primitive meaning is ‘steal, remove,’ and here ‘snatch away by force.’ The emancipated person thus enjoys the same rights as the free person and can offer material resistance to anyone who wants to attack his liberty.” Numerous examples in M. G. Colin, Fouilles de Delphes, 3, Epigraphie, fasc. IV, Paris, 1930, n. 70, 12; 71, 12; 78, 10; N. Valmin, ibid., fasc. VI, Paris, 1939, n. 6, 19; 8, 21; 9, 24; 33, 8; 36, 10; 110, 11; 117, 21, etc.

¹² P.Erl. 27, 9: ε—σύλησάν με βαστάζοντες (second century); BGU 1036, 28; 1675, 22; P.Ryl. 138, 19: ε—σύλησέν μου ε—ν τω— πύργω ι—κανὰ ἀργαλει—α (AD 34); P.Mil.Vogl. 229, 5: ε—συλήθην τω—ν ε—ν τῆ οι—κία μου ληστηρίου ε—κπεφορημένων; PSI 1033, 2; P.Stras. 296, 9–10; P.Tebt. 330, 5: “I found my house pillaged”; P.Lond. 412, 8 (vol. 2, p. 280); SB 9534, 10, 15. Similarly in Philo, thieves despoil whole cities (Philo, Decalogue 136); in wartime and peacetime “they pillage, they plunder, they enslave” (Conf. Tongues 47; Spec. Laws 3.203; Alleg. Interp. 3.20); to pillage a temple is to “defraud God of the holiest of his possessions” (Decalogue 133).

¹³ Οι— παρατυγχάνοντες κύριοι ε—όντων συλέοντες ὡς ε—λευθέραν οὔσαν (second century BC), in J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. 42, 11. Cf. this decree at Gortyn: “Let the guarantors of the freedman seize him by force. If the guarantors do not seize him, each of them shall pay one hundred staters” (Inscriptiones Cretae, Rome, 1950, vol. 4, n. 78, 3–4). Cf. συλαγωγέω (Col 2:8; unknown in the papyri): “carry off as booty, kidnap”; Heliodorus, Aeth. 10.35; Aristaenetos, Ep. 2.22: τοῦτον κατέλαβον, ἄνερ, ε—γχειροῦσα συλαγωγῆσαι τὸν ἡμέτερον οἶκον.

¹⁴ Ἄλλας ε—κκλησίας ε—σύλησα λαβὼν ὀψώνιον πρὸς τὴν ὑμῶ—ν διακονίαν.

¹⁵ Ps.-Aristotle, Oec. 2.1347b20; cf. R. Dareste, “Du droit de représailles principalement chez les anciens Grecs,” in REG, 1889, pp. 305–321; P. Gauthier, Symbola, pp. 210ff., 252ff. K. Latte, “συλα—ν,” in PW, IV A 1, col. 1035–1040.

¹⁶ Τῶ—ν ε—κ τῶ—ν ι—ερω—ν ἀποδοχίων σεσυληκότων; P.Kroll 1, 6; republished as C.Ord.Ptol. 34; SB 9316. Cf. Xenophon, Hier. 4.11: “Tyrants are often compelled to despoil temples and people unjustly, because they always have fresh need of funds for necessary expenses” (συλα—ν . . . εἰ—ς τὰς ἀναγκαίας δαπάνας). Cf. P. Ducrey (Le Traitement des prisonniers de guerre dans la Grèce antique, pp. 295ff., 304ff.), who correctly points out “that the activities referred to by συλάω were not all reprehensible or dishonorable” (p. 307, n. 4). ISE, vol. 2, n. 90 and note 1 on p. 52.

συλλογίζομαι

syllogizomai, to calculate, reckon, take into account, summarize, conclude, reflect, meditate, reason

syllogizomai, S 4817; EDNT 3.285; MM 597; L&N 33.157; BAGD 777

The first occurrence of this word in Herodotus gives it the meaning “calculate, reckon,”¹ which remains its predominant sense, notably in the LXX;² and it is the only meaning attested in the papyri,³ even though the nuance “enroll in a list of accounts, be posted” is noted.⁴

From this financial usage we move into the intellectual realm: “calculate, take into account,” notably in Plato and Polybius,⁵ then “summarize, conclude.”⁶ But from Demosthenes on,⁷ the most common meaning is “reflect, meditate, reason.” Thus Isa 43:18, “Do not reckon on the past” (ta archaia me syllogizesthe, Hebrew bîn, in parallel with “do not remember,” me mnemoneuete); Josephus, War 1.560: “Antipater, considering (synelogizeto) the hatred of the people for himself, their pity for the orphans, the zeal that the Jews had shown to his brothers while they were living . . . He then resolved to break these [forced] betrothals at any price”; Plutarch, Brut. 36.6: “While he was reflecting, absorbed in his thoughts, Brutus thought he noticed someone come in”; Sert. 17.8: “Sertorius reflected on it and consulted the people of the country”; Pomp. 60.3: “Having arrived at the banks of the Rubicon, . . . Caesar remained some time thinking (pros heauton syllogizomenos) about the magnitude of his audacious act.”⁸

So we are in a position to translate Luke 20:5, hoi de synelogisanto prosheautous legontes.⁹ Jesus had asked whether John’s baptism was from heaven or from men. His interlocutors, the chief priests, the scribes, and the elders, “reflected together and answered that they did not know.”¹⁰

¹ Herodotus 2.148: “If anyone should calculate the sum (συλλογίσαιτο) of the building and the works of art that the Greeks have produced”; cf. Plato, Leg. 7.799 a: count the feasts that must be celebrated in a year; Polybius 14.4.4.

² Lev 25:27—“If a man has no ‘redeemer,’ he shall calculate the years since his sale” (Hebrew piel of hashab); 25:50—“he shall calculate with his purchaser from the year when he was sold to him”; 25:52—“if few years remain before the year of jubilee, he shall calculate.”

³ P.Cair.Zen. 59598, 3: the commissioner asks Zeno to send him some money because he has calculated the price for the shipping (συνλογεισάμενος οὖν τό τε φόρετρον); 59710, 59; P.Fouad 26, 52, a petition to the prefect: “You can calculate what he received from me, and if it appears after the reckoning that money is due him in justice, he can receive it”; Dittenberger, Syl. 364, 13, a law regulating mortgage debts: “The funds shall be divided between the owner and the creditor according to the estimation of its value and of the sum of the debt” (συλλογισάμενοι τό τε δάνεον καὶ τὴν τίμησιν).

⁴ P.Tebt. 82, 3 (115 BC): sacred lands, αι— συνλελογισμέναι τω— λόγω; P.Lond. 259, 137 (vol. 2, p. 41; AD 90–95); Stud.Pal. I, 69, 371: ὁ δει—να συνλελογισμένος τω— λόγω τω—ν ἀφηλίκων; PSI 494, 6 (third century BC); SB 7193, verso 8; 7196, 6, recto I, 8. Cf. Num 23:9—“a people not taken into account among the nations” (Hebrew hithpael of hashab); Philo, Joseph 43: “seeing the posted quantities exhausted.”

⁵ Plato, Leg. 2.670 c: “They do not take into account that they do this without knowing the least detail about it”; Grg. 479 c; 498 e; Polybius 1.44.1: “The Carthaginians, calculating the requirements for a siege”; 1.63.8: “If one wishes to take into the account the superiority of these quinquiremes over triremes”; 3.61.2: “He calculated how long and difficult a voyage it was from Marseille to Etruria”; 3.81.12: “Hannibal used such calculations and such predictions. . . . He was not deceived in his plans”; 3.93.3; 4.71.1: “Philip, grasping and evaluating all these conditions”; Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.37: Moses calculated the value of the pseudo-sage; in the sense of settling a score, cf. 2.99; 3.38: “Moses struck and settled his account with the friend of pleasure.”

⁶ Demosthenes, Embassy 19.177: “So I want to recapitulate my charges from the beginning”; Plato, Resp. 7.516 b: “He would conclude” concerning the sun; 517 c; 10.618 d: “drawing the conclusion from all that”; Josephus, War 4.125: “the people concluded (from the capture of Gischala) the fate that awaited if the city of Jerusalem was taken.”

⁷ Demosthenes, Embassy 19.47: “When one reflects on the circumstances when the decree was drawn up”; Corona 18.172: “This day called a man . . . who had reflected on the motives and goal of Philip’s acts.”

⁸ Cf. Polybius 1.32.2: “A Lacedaemonian considering the Carthaginians’ armaments, the numbers of their horses and elephants, reasoned (συνελογίσασατο) and declared.” Συλλογίζομαι became a technical term in dialectic from Aristotle on; dialectic “does not construct its syllogisms from whatever premises happen to be available” (Rh. 1.2.1365b35); the marshaling of proofs presupposes “an ability to reason syllogistically” (τοῦ συλλογίσασθαι δυναμένου, ibid. 1356a22). Diogenes of Sinope had the habit of reasoning as follows (συνελογίζετο): “Everything belongs to the gods. Now the sages are friends of the gods, and friends have all things in common. Therefore everything belongs to the sage” (Diogenes Laertius 6.37). The dialectician Euboulides set forth this sort of inexplicable reasoning: “If you have not lost something, you have it. You have not lost horns. Therefore you have horns.” The philosopher Chrysippus denounced this sophism πρὸς τὸν συλλογισάμενον ὅτι κέρατα ἔχει (Diogenes Laertius 7.187).

⁹ Cf. G. Mussies, “The Sense of συλλογίζεσθαι at Luke XX, 5,” in T. Baarda, A.F.J. Klijn, W. C. van Unnik, Miscellanea Neotestamentica, Leiden, 1978, vol. 2, pp. 59–76 (the parallels at Matt 11:25 and Mark 11:31 have διελογίζοντο).

¹⁰ M. J. Lagrange translates, “Ils firent entre eux ces raisonnements”; E. Osty: “Ils firent entre eux ce calcul”; E. Delebecque: “Eux échangeaient leurs raisonnements, en disant” (Evangelie de Luc).

συμπαθής, συμπαθέω

sympathes, sharing the same suffering or emotion, compassionate; sympatheo, to share the same suffering or emotion, be compassionate

sympathes, S 4835; TDNT 5.935–936; EDNT 3.288; MM 598; L&N 25.58; BAGD 779 | sympatheo, S 4834; TDNT 5.935–936; EDNT 3.288; NIDNTT 3.719, 722, 724; L&N 24.80, 25.57; BAGD 778–779

A compound of syn and pathos, sympathes refers to a person who is affected by the same suffering, the same impressions, the same emotions as another, or who undergoes identical trials, and finally “sympathizes” with this other person who is in some sort of trouble, has pity.¹

The first prerequisite for sympathy then is being “receptive” and easily influenced;² the second is being united to the other by a shared nature, society, condition (P.Oxy. 2190, 19), or ailment. Thus God, the Creator and Father, sympathizes with humans (4Macc 5:25); rulers with their subjects;³ above all, mothers with their children.⁴ In this tender sense of the word, 1Pet 3:8 prescribes, “Be like-minded, compassionate, brotherly, with motherly tenderness.”⁵ If compassion means participating in another’s pain,⁶ it is tinged with pity⁷ and includes a tendency to help the unfortunate.⁸ In battle, the victorious part of the army should come to the aid of the part that is struggling (en to ponounti sympathein, Josephus, War 2.579). In a letter of recommendation, the writer asks the prospective benefactor to intervene (hin’ auto synpathete, P.Stras. 174, 5; cf. P.Lond. 1345, 20; 1369, 12). This active meaning of the verb sympatheo is seen in Heb 10:34, which says that the compassionate recipients have effectively helped the prisoners.⁹ This nuance must be retained in Heb 4:15 with respect to the high priest of the new covenant, full of sure mercy, but also powerful and able to give effective help for the weaknesses of his human brethren. This ability is already indicated by the construction with the double negative “we do not have . . . not able,”¹⁰ which reinforces the affirmation that we are certain that Christ, through his compassion, will make up for our lack of strength.

¹ Cf. Michaelis, on this word, in TDNT, vol. 5, p. 935–936; BAGD (on this word) cites Philistion of Nicaea: ε—κ τοῦ παθει—ν γίγνωσκε καὶ τὸ συμπαθει—ν καὶ σοὶ γὰρ ἄλλος συμπαθήσεται παθῶν (ed. Kock, Comitorum Graecorum Gragmenta, II, n. 230).

² Aristotle, Part. An. 7.653b6: “The heat and the principle that are found in the heart are very receptive” (συμπαθέστατον), i.e., they experience the same ailments as the other parts of the body; Agathias Scholasticus: “taut cords are placed by nature in relations of reciprocal sympathy” (Anth. Pal. 11.352.8); Philo, Spec. Laws 1.250; 4.202: they manifested their insensitivity (ἀνηλεές), showing no gesture of humanity or sympathy (ἀνθρώπινον καὶ συμπαθές).

³ Letter of Diocletian to the inhabitants of Elephantine and Syene (SB 8393, 9); Dittenberger, Or. 456, 66; 470, 24; Hyrcanus is moved by compassion (Josephus, Ant. 13.233), Agrippa was χρηστὸς καὶ συμπαθής (ibid. 19.330); likewise Antigonus (Plutarch, Eum. 18.5); Marcellus was “troubled by the thought of what was going to happen” (Marc. 19.2); T. Sim. 3.6.

⁴ Josephus, War 6.211: “Do not be more compassionate than a mother”; 4Macc 14:13—τὴν τω—ν σπλάγχων συμπάθειαν; 14:14—συμπάθειαν καὶ στοργήν; 14:18, 20; 15:4, 7, 11; brother for brother (13:23).

⁵ Πάντες ὁμόφρονες, συμπαθει—ς, φιλάδελφοι, εὐσπλαγχοι. The συμπάθεια-σύμπνοια link is common (Hippocrates, Alim. 23; Porphyry, VP 48–50) and may come from Chrysippus (cf. SVF, vol. 2, p. 154, n. 473; p. 264, n. 912). We know that in Posidonius “sympathy” refers to a rapport between man and the universe or the cohesion between parts of the universe, “cosmic” or “universal” sympathy. Geminus uses the word only in an astrological context, either for the influence of the stars on atmospheric phenomena (17.15, 17.17) or for correspondence between themes of fate for people born under certain signs of the zodiac (2.5, 13, 14, 15, 18). Cf. G. Aujac, Géminos, pp. 128–206.

⁶ Philo, To Gaius 273; Josephus, Ant. 16.102, 329; Plutarch, Tim. 14.2; Ps.-Plutarch, Cons. ad Apoll. 1: so soon after the death of your son, “what was necessary was to sympathize with your pain.”

⁷ Cf. the link with ἔλεος; Philo, Moses 2.228; Spec. Laws 2.115; Polybius 2.56.7; Diodorus Siculus 12.24.5: by telling of his sorrows, the father “moved all the soldiers to pity and inspired much sympathy” (ἄπαντας ἤγαγεν εἰ—ς ἔλεον καὶ πολλήν συμπάθειαν); 17.69.2; cf. 17.15.3; 17.36.1–2.

⁸ Philo, Alleg. Interp. 1.8: “the moon is the star that is most sympathetic toward terrestrial things,” i.e., intervenes favorably in them.

⁹ On the grammar of this verse, cf. F. M. Abel, Grammaire, § 9 d, 69 i, 71 b.

¹⁰ Οὐ γὰρ ἔχομεν ἀρχιερέα μὴ δυνάμενον συμπαθῆσαι ται—ς ἀσθενείαις; on this aorist infinitive, cf. R. A. Ward, “The Preacher’s Use of the Aorist,” in ExpT, vol. 71, 1960, p. 268 b.

σύμφυτος, συμφύω symphytos, innate, natural; symphyo, to be born with, grow with; to be attached or united to or combined with

symphytos, S 4854; TDNT 7.766–797; EDNT 3.290; MM 598; L&N 89.117; BAGD 780 | symphyo, S 4855; EDNT 3.290; BAGD 780

The verbal adjective symphytos, “born with,”¹ hence “innate, natural,”² means not only “of the same nature” (Euripides, Andr. 954) but also “growing together.”³ It is used in the LXX only with respect to agricultural matters,⁴ in accord with the usage of the papyri,⁵ which, beginning with the third century BC, use this term for cultivated land, no matter what sort of crop it is sown with.⁶ This is the meaning of the verb *symphyo*⁷ with respect to the seed that fell among thorns and grew up together with them (kai symphueisai hai akanthai, Luke 8:7).

In a broader sense, this verb means “to be attached or united to or combined with.” Aristotle: “Any body does not combine with any other body” (Aristotle, Sens. 438b2); “lovers want to combine their beings and make one being from two” (Pol. 2.4.6.1262b13); Philo: “together with each soul there dwells (synoikon) an appointed witness that is attached to it at birth.”⁸ In optics, symphyomai (Latin cohaeresco) is used from Plato on to express the idea that the visual flow merges with exterior light in a homogeneous body.⁹ In medicine, it refers to the healing of fractured bones and means specifically “to grow back in such a way as to connect the two fragments, to mend.”¹⁰ Hence symphytos also has this meaning of cohesion and interpenetration. Lycurgus, for example, trained the citizens “always to form one body with the community (to koino symphyeis ontas aiei) like bees, clustered around their leader.”¹¹ It is in this sense that we should understand Rom 6:5—“for if we have been conformed to the likeness of his death.”¹² Moderns rightly translate “if we have been joined to him” (NBJ), “if we have been united with him” (F. J. Leenhardt, Romans, p. 159); but the idea of growth must not be left out, because the very use of the word symphytos suggests the image of a “single plant” (Leenhardt, p. 160) that is getting bigger, and in which the life of the trunk conveys life and fruit-bearing strength to the branches. Through baptism, Christians share in the “virtue” of the crucified Christ.¹³ The members and the head make up a unity; the two organisms are in a vital union, suggesting the “incorporating personality” of the Lord,¹⁴ “una persona mystica” (St. Thomas Aquinas, on this verse).

¹ Aeschylus, Ag. 107; Aristotle, HA 3.20.521b: “the liquids that we have just been speaking of almost always exist from the very beginning of the animal” (τὰ ὑγρὰ σύμφυτα).

² Hippocrates, Vict. 42.2: “innate heat”; 87.1: “surplus of fullness or of evacuation of natural substances”; Genit. 3.1: “Man possesses in himself a number of congenital humors” (συμφυέας); 3Macc 3:22—τῇ συμφύτῳ κακοηθεία τὸ καλὸν ἀπώσάμενοι; Philo, Creation 18: the memory that is innate in the architect; Heir 272, the evils that are congenital to our race; Abraham 160, epithymia is a beast that lives in us (τὸ σύμφυτον ἡμι—ν θρέμμα); Moses 1.198, ε—πεικεία and φιλανθρωπία are connatural to God, hence are divine attributes; Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.42: “It is natural to the Jews (σύμφυτόν ε—στιν), from their birth, to regard these as divine decrees”; Antiphon the Sophist: τῇ φύσει ξυμφύτων (P.Oxy. 1364, 44).

³ Aristotle, HA 5.32.557b: “mites proliferate in wools.”

⁴ Amos 9:13 (οι—βουνοί); Zech 11:3 (ὁ δρυμός); Esth 7:7-8 (ὁ κῆπος).

⁵ P.Cair.Zen. 59596, 4; P.Col.Zen. 78, 28. In 104 BC, P.Lips. 1, 5 (contract for a sale of real estate): ἀμπελω—να συμφύτου means not a vineyard where (fruit) trees have been planted but one that is fully cultivated (cf. ἀσύμφυτος = not worked, abandoned, P.Lond. 1296, 18). M. Schnebel (Die Landwirtschaft im hellenistischen Ägypten, Munich, 1925, p. 245) mentions that the planting of a vine is called φυτεύειν (PSI 434; S. Witkowski, Epistulae Privatae Graecae 18, 4, 15), a new planting νεόφυτον (PSI 371, 11; P.Lond. 131, 192; P.Oxy. 909, 16), a vine that is bearing fruit ζωόφυτος (P.Giss. 56, 6), ἔμφυτος (P.Hamb. 23, 16), σύμφυτος.

⁶ BGU 1118, 28, 33; 1119, 29; 1120, 36; P.Fouad 40, 15 (AD 35); P.Mich. 311, 13 (AD 34), ει—ς χόρτου σποράν σύνφυται καὶ κωπὴν ξηρασίας; 562, 18 (AD 119): “Sabinus, son of Socrates, shall return two fully cultivated arourai of olive trees” (ἀρούρας δύο ε—λαιω—νος συμφύτους); P.Oxy. 729, 22 (AD 137); 1631, 31; P.Ross.Georg. II, 19, 4 (AD 141), κτῆμα σύμφυτον.

⁷ Unknown in the papyri, with the exception of P.Ryl. 427, frag. VIII, 8: τω—ν συνφυόντων (mutilated).

⁸ Philo, Decalogue 87; Josephus, War 6.155: “as if nature had tightly linked horsemen with their mounts” (καθάπερ δὲ συμπεφυκότες αὐτοί—ς); Ant. 13.63; cf. Xenophon, Cyr. 4.3.18.

⁹ Aristotle, Sens. 438a29–29: “vision combines with exterior light”; C. Mugler, Terminologie optique, p. 376.

¹⁰ N. van Brock, Vocabulaire médical, p. 202. She cites Hippocrates, Artic. 14: “The clavicle mends quickly, as do all the other spongy bones”; Soranus (Gyn. 4.5.1), who thus refers to symphysis, the natural mode of joining for two bones; other references in W. K. Hobart, Medical Language, p. 59.

¹¹ Plutarch, Lyc. 25.5; Theophrastus, Caus. Pl. 5.5.2: σύμφυτον γὰρ πα—ν τὸ ζω—ν τω— ζω—ντι, καὶ μάλιστα ὁμογενές, ὅταν ἀφελκωθῆ, καὶ γένηται μία φύσις. Dio Chrysostom says of the first humans in their relation to the divinity, οὐ μακρὰν τοῦ θεοῦ . . . ἀλλὰ ε—ν αὐτω— μέσῳ πεφυκότες μα—λλον δὲ συμπεφυκότες ε—κείνῳ (11.28).

¹² Εἰ— γὰρ σύμφυτοι γεγόναμεν τω— ὁμοιώματι τοῦ θανάτου αὐτοῦ. M. J. Lagrange, taking τω— ὁμοιώματι as an instrumental dative (“associated with Christ by resemblance to his death”) translates “For if we have been united to him to grow with him through the image of his death, we shall also be so with respect to his resurrection” (“Si, en effet, nous lui avons été unis pour croître avec lui par l’image de sa mort, nous le serons aussi quant à sa résurrection”).

¹³ Cf. P. Gaechter, “Zur Exegese von Röm. VI, 5,” in ZKT, 1930, pp. 88–92; F. Mussner, “Zusammengewachsen durch die Ähnlichkeit mit seinem Tode,” in TTZ, 1954, pp. 257–265; V. Warnach, “Taufe und Christusgeschehen nach Röm. VI,” in Archiv für Liturgiewissenschaft, vol. 3, 1954, pp. 284–366; E. Stommel, “Das Abbild seines Todes (Röm. VI, 5) und der Taufritus,” in RQ, 1955, pp. 1–21; J. Gewiess, “Das Abbild des Todes Christi (Röm VI, 5),” in Historisches Jahrbuch (Festschrift B. Altaner), vol. 77, 1958, pp. 330–346.

¹⁴ Cf. J. de Fraine, Adam et son lignage, Bruges, 1959.

συμφωνέω, συμφώνησις, συμφωνία, σύμφωνος

symphoneo, to agree, consent, be of the same feeling; symphonesis, accord, agreement; symphonia, the sound of musical or instruments or instruments and voices together; agreement; symphonos, agreeing, harmonious

symphoneo, S 4856; TDNT 9.304–309; EDNT 3.290; MM 598–599; L&N 31.15, 64.10; BDF §§179(1), 202, 227(2), 409(3); BAGD 780–781 | symphonesis, S 4857; TDNT 9.304–309; EDNT 3.290; MM 599; L&N 31.15; BAGD 781 | symphonia, S 4858; TDNT 9.304–309; EDNT 3.290; MM 599; L&N 14.83; BAGD 781 | symphonos, S 4859; TDNT 9.304–309; EDNT 3.290; MM 599; L&N 31.15; BAGD 781

When the older son returns from the field, he hears “music and choirs” in his father’s house (Luke 15:25). Symphonia can mean the sound produced by a certain musical instrument¹ or of voices and instruments “in concert,” more specifically what we call a band or an orchestra.² This is the meaning here, given the subsequent detail “of choirs.” From Plato on (Plato, Leg. 3.689 d), the word is used for agreement or harmony of feelings and the union that results therefrom among humans,³ and the Stoics define symphonia as “agreement in teaching concerning things related to life” (symphonian de homodogmatian peri ton kata ton bion, Stobaeus, vol. 2, p. 74, 4). In the papyri, the preponderant meaning is “agreement, covenant.” In receipts from AD 67 and 102: “We have received the things from the agreement” (eschomen ta apo tes symphonias, O.Bodl. 1075, 4; cf. 1056, 4); “I have paid the costs pursuant to the agreement (apo tes symphonias) that you made the four workers on the basis of twelve drachmas per arour ’ (P.Lond. 1173, vol. 3, p. 207 = P.Sarap. 103); “He made the purchases in the name of his son Dionysius, after the time of the agreement entered into by him and Isadora-Tatrephes on the one side.”⁴

The biblical hapax symphonesis, unknown in the papyri,⁵ would normally mean the accord between two voices singing together. In 2Cor 6:15, which forbids all syncretism between Christian and pagan cults (“What symphonesis is there between Christ and Belial?”), the nuance of agreement, accommodation, emerges from the parallel terms: metoche (verse 14, participation, affinity), koinonia (verse 14, association, community), synkatathesis (verse 16, assent, accommodation).

The verb symphoneo, much used in the papyri, especially in a legal sense, can mean simple agreement (“The words of the prophets are in agreement with this”)⁶ and homogeneity (the piece of cloth taken from a new garment “will not match the old garment”).⁷ Hence, on a moral level: “to be of the same feeling, to agree together, to consent.”⁸ Such is the symphonia of disciples who agree concerning the object of their prayer (Matt 18:19) or of Ananias and Sapphira, who “agreed together to put the Spirit of the Lord to the test.”⁹ This is analogous to the symphonia of Ammonius and Antiphanes son of Heraclas,¹⁰ and to all those contracts in which the parties state that they have come to an agreement: “They made an agreement”;¹¹ “It was agreed between them.”¹² The most common formula is as follows: “I am in agreement with all that is written above”¹³ or

“The clauses hereunder are agreeable to us.”¹⁴ Often a simple symphono (“I agree”) is followed immediately by a signature.¹⁵

In the parable about the workers sent into the vineyard, when the master of the house “agreed with the workers for one denarius per day” (Matt 20:2, 13), the Vulgate (“conventionem facta”) rightly took this as an authentic work contract. The papyri constantly have symphoneo followed by a price. In AD 78, Maron received from Hermas the whole agreed price: one hundred drachmas paid from hand to hand;¹⁶ for the sale of a part of a house (BGU 1643, 20, eighty drachmas; P.Thead. 1, 11, ten talents of silver; 2, 8, nine talents; P.Corn. 12, 23; 13, 14; P.Mich. 428, 6; P.Stras. 370, 20), of a field,¹⁷ of a pasture (Pap.Lugd.Bat. II, 8, 10; 9 a 10; XIII, 2, 5; 15, 10), of an ass (P.Thead. 3, 7; SB 6001, 7), of a mare (P.Thead. 4, 6: 130 talents of silver), of a camel (P.Stras. 201, 22; P.Vindob.Worp 9, 8), of an acacia (P.Oslo 45, 3; cf. 134, 15), of a slave (Pap.Lugd.Bat. II, 7, 24: 2,200 drachmas; P.Stras. 264, 13), for a job: “I have received from you the 276 drachmas that was agreed on for the hay-making season.”¹⁸

Symphonos, has the same connotations of conformity, correspondence, and coincidence.¹⁹ But in the formula ek symphonou, used with respect to an interruption in conjugal relations “by mutual consent” or “common accord” (1Cor 7:5), we must not simply refer to the papyrological parallels (P.Bon. 24 a 10; P.Oxy. 1673, 28; P.Ness. 21, 26)—which usually write *kathos exymphonou*²⁰—with the legal severity of ex conducto. There is an aesthetic touch and something of moral delicacy and consonance,²¹ perceptible in 4Macc 7:7—Eleazar “echoes the law and philosophy of the divine life”; 14:7—“O holy seven, brothers united in harmony!” The will, desires, and aspirations of Christian spouses coincide in harmonious tonality; two freedoms that agree spontaneously, or better, two hearts that are joined in one precise euphony.

¹ Dan 3:5, 7, 10, 15 (Theodotion) = Nebuchadnezzar’s orchestra (cf. E. Gerson-Kiwi, “Musique,” in DBSup, vol. 5, col. 1432). Ordinarily P.Flor. 74, 5 is cited: συμφωνίας πάσης μουσικῶ—ν τε καὶ ἄλλων (181 BC); P.Oxy. 1275, 9: ὁ προεστὼς συμφωνίας ἀύλητῶ—ν καὶ μουσικῶ—ν; P.Lond. 968, (vol. 3, p. XLIX): ὑπὲρ συμφωνίας τυμπάνων. Cf. Str-B, “Excurs XV,” vol. 4, 1, pp. 396, 400; O. Montevicchi, La papirologia, Turin, 1973, p. 222.

² Aristotle, Cael. 2.9.3.290b. “Certain exegetes who think that symphonia is a sort of instrument are wrong; this word actually refers to collective singing, praising God in harmony; for the Greek word symphonia is translated by the Latin consonantia” (St. Jerome, Epist. 21.29). Cf. the dispute on this meaning between P. Barry and G. F. Moore, in JBL 1904, pp. 180ff.; 1905, pp. 116ff.; 1908, pp. 99ff. On a Roman epitaph: —Οστα— —Αγαθοῦτος συμφωνιακῆς —Οκταουίας (IGUR, II, n. 272). L. Moretti comments, “Fuit Agathus symphoniaca, id est dominae suae Octaviae musicos concentus comparabat,” and cites CIL VI, 23369, 37765.

³ Ep. Arist. 302: “The translators set to the task, coming to agreement (σύμφωνα ποιούντες) on each point of confrontation. From the rest that resulted from this agreement (ε—κ τῆς συμφωνίας), Demetrius then had a copy prepared”; Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.170: “agreement of the citizens in all matters”; 2.179: “absolute likeness in life and mores produces a very beautiful harmony (καλλίστην συμφωνίαν) in the character of humans.” According to 4Macc, the seven brothers formed a sort of choir (13:8; 14:8), hence their “holy and harmonious accord for piety” (14:3).

⁴ P.Rein. 44, 15: μετὰ τὸ τῆς συμφωνίας χρόνον (AD 104); cf. P.Brem. 15, 6 (of an architect): the agreed-upon two-leafed door; P.Tebt. 429, 9: “twenty-eight drachmas, pursuant to the agreement on the subject of irrigated land”; P.Oxy. 104, 20; 2559, 11: instruction sent by the idios logos περὶ τῆς συμφωνίας; SB 7173, 30: ἔνεκα ἀπαρτισμοῦ συμφωνίας οὐσιακω—ν χρο [. . .

⁵ In Pap.Lugd.Bat. XVI, 14, 16, (second century AD): ε—πὶ τῇ προγεγραμμέν[η συμφωνήσει] is a restoration by the editor.

⁶ Acts 15:15—τούτῳ συμφωνοῦσιν. Cf. Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.181: “a single religious teaching conforms to the law”; 2.255: “their conception of God was in agreement with ours”; Ant. 1.107, the historians are in agreement with my exposition; 10.106: “the prophets were in agreement with all that he said”; 15.174: “the other sources do not agree with this account.”

⁷ Luke 5:36; cf. the four kings who joined forces in the valley of Siddim (Gen14:3).

⁸ 1Kgs 12:8—“the priests agreed not to take money from the people any more”; 4Macc 14:6—the young Maccabees were in agreement about dying for the cause of piety; Polybius 2.15.5: at the hostel, the travelers “did not agree on the price of each commodity; they simply asked how much per person.”

⁹ Acts 5:9, ὅτι συνεφωνήθη ὑμι—ν (cf. in a pejorative sense, “conspire, plot together”; Aristotle, Pol. 4.12.1297a1: the rich joining their voice with that of the poor against the middle class); the passive verb should be translated “it was agreed by you,” which suggests the Latin construction “convenit inter aliquos” (cf. E. Jacquier, on this text).

¹⁰ P.Oxy. 260, 7, κατὰ τὰ συμφωνηθέντα ε—μοὶ καὶ —Αντιφάνει (AD 59); 1148, 5, question to an oracle: “Is it better for my son Phantias and his wife to come to an agreement now with her father, or to oppose him?”; Xenophon, Hell. 1.3.8: “the generals came to an agreement with Pharnabazus.”

¹¹ Pap.Lugd.Bat. XVI, 14, 6; VI, 24, 61: “They put the question because of the agreement concluded with their father and the verdict”; 31, 9: “we came to an arrangement with another person on these terms”; P.Sarap. 84, 6: an agreement to hire three workers to mow at a rate of eight obols; line 8: “I shall attempt, if it is agreeable to you, to conclude other similar accords, to the extent possible”; P.Oxy. 3015, 17–19, transcript of a trial: “neither the woman with whom the father of the husband made a more recent agreement nor the sons to whom the shares of the property could be transmitted according to the agreement.”

¹² P.Dura 30, 35, μεταξὺ αὐτῶ—ν συνεφωνήθη (marriage contract); P.Brem. 15, 9; P.Mil. 60, 19: τὴν συμφωνημένην ε—ργασίαν (a banking διαγραφή, second century); SB 7557, 3; 9588, 1: συμφωνει—σθαι με πρὸς τὴν ὑμετέραν μεγαλοπρέπειαν τῇ ὑπηρετήσει αὐτῇ; P.Oslo 35, 14; P.Ross.Georg. III, 44, 9; P.Thead. 10, 13: “I will pay for the additional time the interest . . . agreed between us.”

¹³ Συμφωνι—μοι πάντα ὡς πρόκειται; P.Yale 71, 19; P.Mich. 562, 16; 608, 20; P.Cair.Isid. 131, 5; C.P.Herm. 24, 3; 39, 3; 41, 6; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XVII, 10, 19; P.Erl. 67, 20; 88, 3; P.Oxy. 133, 25.

¹⁴ P.Fouad 20, 14; P.Oxy. 1890, 20; 1891, 23; 2237, 22; 2270, 18; 2348, 51; 2420, 21; P.Rein. 105, 13; 108, 17; etc.

¹⁵ C.P.Herm. 42, 4; 85, 4; P.Ryl. 707, 4; P.Ross.Georg. III, 31, 3; P.Princ. 37, 10 (according to Berichtigungsliste, vol. 3, p. 149).

¹⁶ P.Mich. 583, 12: ἀπέχιν τὸν ὁμολογοῦντα Μάρωνα παρὰ τοῦ Ἑρμα—τος τὰς συνεφωνημένας τῆς τιμῆς ἀργυρίου δραχμὰς ε—κατὸν πα—σαν; 603, 23; 550, 16, 26 (AD 99); P.Oxy. 1672, 17: “our friend said that he agreed with the inhabitants of his town on the price of thirty-two drachmas” (AD 37–41); 2136, 15; 2236, 16.

¹⁷ Pap.Lugd.Bat. II, 6, 13: τὴν δὲ πρὸς ἀλλήλους συνεφωνημένην τιμὴν ἀργυρίου δραχμὰς χιλίας.

¹⁸ P.Oxy. 728, 37 (AD 142); cf. also P.Mert. 19, 7, 12; C.P.Herm. 28, 9; 70, 5; 71, 4; P.Mil.Vogl. 612r, col. VI, 2, 11; col. VII, 4, 8; col. XI, 8; P.Cair.Isid.

80, 6; 83, 6; 84, 4; 92, 6; P.Princ. 149, 6; P.Sarap. 8–11; 20, 11; SB 7996, 12; 8007, 5; 8021, 10; etc.

¹⁹ Eccl 7:14—God has made the happy day and the sad day σύμφωνον, corresponding to each other (cf. Geminus, συμφωνει—ν = put the solar months and the lunar year in harmony, Intro. to Astronomy 8.26, 36, 49, 60; or agree with a certain theory or observation, 2.20; 17.19; 17.21; συμφώνως, 7.7: “which Aratus seems to agree with”; 7.8: “in perfect harmony with mathematics”; cf. G. Aujac, Géminos, p. 207); Josephus, Ant. 15.408; Ag. Apion 2.169; stele of Moschion: “when you have understood the arrival of the source at its end through equivalent paths” (ε—ξ ἴσου σύμφωνον, SB 8026, 37; cf. 9557, 60: πάντα σύμφωνα τάξω ὑμι—ν); P.Dura 30, 28: συμφώνου γενομένου μεταξὺ αὐτω—ν (marriage contract). A corporation of dyers complains about the shortcomings of one of its members: ου—τος γὰρ μὴ βουλόμενος πρὸς τὰ σύμφωνα τω—ν ε—γγράφων ἡμω—ν ὁμολογιω—ν . . . (P.Oxy. 1943, 5; cf. 1973, 10). Astrological prediction: ὦ—ς γίνεται σύμφωνος τῇ ε—ν τῇ κε τοῦ —Επειφ ἀνατολῇ τοῦ ἄστρου (ibid. 2554, frag. III, 16); SB 7033, 82: πείθομαι πα—σι τοι—ς συμφώνοις καὶ ε—περωτηθει—ς ὠμολόγησα; 8951, 18; 9193, 18: συνδοξάσης μεταξὺ ε—μοῦ καὶ σοῦ σύμφωνα; 9298, 27. W. C. Till, “Koptische Parallelurkunden,” in Studi in onore V. Arangio-Ruiz, Naples, 1953, vol. 4, pp. 199ff.

²⁰ P.Mich. 188, 10 (AD 120); 189, 14; 285, 5; 428, 4; P.Princ. 149, 8; P.Ryl. 162, 16; Pap.Lugd.Bat. VI, 23, 9.

²¹ Philo, Dreams 1.28; Sacr. Abel and Cain 74; Unchang. God 25. “The Greeks use σύμφωνος (consonant) for an interval composed of two different sounds whose simultaneous emission causes a single impression in the ear; these are notably the intervals of a fourth, a fifth, and an octave, but not of a third or a sixth” (F. Laserre, Plutarque: De la Musique, Olten-Lausanne, 1954, p. 35).

συναίρω λόγον

synairo logon, to settle an account

synairo logon, S 4868 + 3056; MM 601; L&N 57.229; BDF §310(1); BAGD 783

In the parables of the Unforgiving Servant¹ and of the Talents (Matt 25:19), the king and the master demand an accounting from their servants. The expression is unknown in classical and Hellenistic literary Greek; but it is not a biblicism,² for it is found often in the papyri. In the first century AD,

P.Fay. 109, 6: “I have drawn up the accounts with the father” (synermai logon to patri); in 78–79, on the vineyards of Epimachus in the nome of Hermopolis, it is mentioned that on the fourth of Phaopi “Phibis does not work, because he settles accounts with Epimachus.”³ In the second century, P.Oxy. 113, 27: “Let me know what you have given him, so that I may settle my accounts with him” (hina synaromai auto logon); PSI 801, 3: “the whole account having been settled” (pantos logou synermenou); 921, 8; 974, 29; 1038, 9; BGU 775, 19. In the third century, the account of Heroninus: “The whole account having been settled up to Thoth, I owe . . .” (heos Thoth pantos logou synermenou ophilo, P.Flor. 372, 14); cf. an ostrakon from Nubia: “until the settling of the account.”⁴ In the fourth-fifth century, “to settle the account of their land-owning business” (synarasthai logon ton auton geouchikon pragmaton, SB 9527, 11).

¹ Matt 18:23; cf. R. Sugranyes de Franch, Etudes sur le droit palestinien à l'époque évangélique, Fribourg, 1946, p. 48; C. Spicq, Dieu et l'homme, pp. 54ff.

² It would be more of a Latinism, Dig. 35.1.82; cf. J. V. Le Clerc, Des journaux chez les Romains, Paris, 1938, pp. 218–394; P. Jouanique, “Rationem reddere,” in BAGB, 1961, pp. 228–233.

³ P.Lond. 131, 194 (republished with commentary by A. Swiderek, La Propriété foncière privée dans l'Égypte de Vespasien, Warsaw, 1960, SB 9699): Φι—βις . . . συναίρων μετὰ —Επιμάχου τὸν λόγον; cf. line 407, “the priest Apochras settled the account (of a worker who cuts reeds) with Epimachus himself” (τὸν λόγον πρὸς αὐτὸν —Επίμαχον συνῆρε).

⁴ Ἀχρι λόγου συνάρσεως, in O.Wilck. II, 1135, 5.

συναποθνήσκω

synapothnesko, to die with

synapothnesko, S 4880; TDNT 3.7–21, 7.766–797; EDNT 3.298; NIDNTT 1.430–431, 435; MM 603; L&N 23.118; BAGD 784–785

This verb, which is common in Greek and Hellenistic literature,¹ but totally unknown in the papyri, means simply “die with, disappear at the same time” (Sir 19:10; Diodorus Siculus 17.13.4: the wounded Thebans once more attacked their enemies and “took them along with themselves in death”). It is used especially to express the vow of a fervent heart to live and die with a beloved: “you are in our hearts, united for death and life” (eis to synapothanein kai syzen, 2Cor 7:3). According to the Aristotelian tradition, through philostorgia, “there are even parents who, if their children die, die with them” (tois teknois synapothneskein, Stobaeus 2.7.13; vol. 2, p. 120, 8). Charicleia says concerning her fiancé, “I must live with this man and die with him” (Heliodorus, Aeth. 10.19.2).

But beginning with Herodotus (7.222), it is used also for soldiers who sacrifice themselves with their leader and follow him in death (Strabo 17.2.3). According to Nicolaus of Damascus, the Aquitanian officer Adiatuanus had a guard of six hundred men who were bound to him by avow: “to accompany kings in life and in death (syzontas kai synapothneskontas), they have these men who have made vows to them. In exchange, they share his power, have the same clothing and the same lifestyle, and they by strict necessity die with him (synapothneskousi), whether the king dies through sickness, war, or some other manner.”² St. Paul wrote, “If we die with Christ . . . we shall also live with him” (Rom 6:8). This was not only an expression of faithfulness, but a true devotio,³ that of the apostle Thomas: “Let us go also, that we may die with him” (agomen kai hemeis hina apothanomen met’ autou, John 11:16); and of Peter, joined by the other disciples: “If I had to die with you, I would never deny you (ean dee me synapothanein soi, ou me se aparnesomai)—and all the others said the same” (Mark 14:31). Thus the primitive church composed a baptismal hymn: “If we have begun by dying with (him), with (him) also shall we live” (ei gar synapethanomen, kai syzesomen, 2Tim 2:11; cf. 2Cor 4:10; 1Cor 15:31)—after the fashion of the repentant thief (Luke 23:41-43). These actions, these customs, and this use of language⁴ inspired the wording of the hymn in a more or less conscious manner; but in the new covenant, it is not possible to live from Christ and with Christ without having made the oath to die with him.⁵

¹ Cf. F. Olivier, Essais, Geneva, 1963, pp. 155–177. The only occurrence in Philo is metaphorical: when a woman’s first husband has died, “there also dies with him any possibility of enmity with this woman’s second husband” (Spec. Laws 1.108).

² Hist. Univ. 116 = Athenaeus 6.249 a–b. The baptismal homologia of the “good soldier of Jesus Christ” (2Tim 2:3) can be assimilated to the military oath (sacramentum) in which the soldiers swear to follow their leader and obey his orders with all their might (Polybius 6.21.2–3; Dionysius of Halicarnassus 10.18; 11.43; cited by F. Olivier, Essais, p. 163).

³ Cf. that of the Spaniards to follow Caesar Augustus and never to survive their leader (Res gest. divi Aug. 25.2; Dio Cassius 50.6). “The Iberians devote themselves with such self-denial to those to whom they have rallied that they do not hesitate to die for them” (ὥστε ἀποθνήσκειν αὐτοὺς ὑπὲρ αὐτῶ—ν, Strabo 3.4.18; cf. Plutarch, Sert. 14.5). R. Etienne sees in this religious oath the beginning of the emperor cult (Le Culte impérial dans la péninsule ibérique, Paris, 1958, pp. 75ff., 359ff.).

⁴ The expression became proverbial, cf. Aristophanes, Lys. 123: “we will do it, even if we have to die” (ποιήσομεν, κἄν ἀποθανεῖ—ν ἡμα—ς δέη); Cicero, Att. 7.20.2: “For me, in Italy, with him to the death; and on this point I do not seek your opinion” (“ego autem in Italia καὶ συναποθανεῖ—ν—nec te id consulo”).

⁵ R. C. Tannehill, Dying and Rising with Christ, Berlin, 1967; K. Berger, “Zum traditionsgeschichtlichen Hintergrund christologischer Hoheitstitel,” in NTS, vol. 17, 1971, pp. 400–403.

συνείδησις

syneidesis, conscience

syneidesis, S 4893; TDNT 7.898–919; EDNT 3.301–303; NIDNTT 1.348–351, 353; MM 604–605; L&N 26.13, 27.54, 28.4; BAGD 786; ND 3.85

This word, attested three times in the OT (Sir 42:8, the variant in Sinaiticus; Eccl 10:20, Hebrew mada'; Wis 17:10) makes its first appearance in Democritus¹ and Chrysippus (Diogenes Laertius 7.85; cf. SVF, III, 43, 2–5: “proper to every living creature is his constitution and his knowledge of it”—kai ten tautes syneidesin), then practically disappears from the literature² only to reappear in the neuter participle to syneidos in the first century in Philo, Josephus, Plutarch, etc. Absent from the Synoptics, the substantive is used quite frequently by St. Paul as a central element of his educative moral theology of liberty,³ as much in the major epistles as in the Pastorals; it then appears in Heb and 1Pet, where it is part of the common Christian vocabulary. Where does it come from and what does it mean?

The first known papyrological occurrence is from AD 59. A former soldier, Lucius Pamiseus, having met a convoy of donkeys loaded with stones, led by a slave, received a violent kick from one of the donkeys. The terrified slave took flight: “the slave, aware of his crime, fled” (tou de doulou phygontos kata syneidesin hes pepoetai eperias, P.Fouad 28, 15). He acted not out of remorse but out of the fear of the punishment that he might receive.⁴ In 117, Ammonius and Hermocles write to Apollonius to handle a matter according to his conscience and his point of view, i.e., according to his personal intuition and judgment (estin epi ten syneidesin sou dran, P.Brem. 11, 27 = C.Pap.Jud. II, 444). Between 180 and 192, in a petition to the strategos, the claimant pleads his perfect conscience concerning his right (dia ten perisson synidesin axio, P.Corn. 14, 11). In the third century, Horion asks his correspondent to act conscientiously (oida gar hoti syneidesi spoudazeis emoi, P.Flor. 338, 17), which implies an ethical nuance. This nuance is apparent in the form of remorse on the part of the guilty: “I wanted to show friendship to you, but you did not wait for me, since you must have been troubled by a bad conscience” (hypo kakou syneidotos katechomenos, P.Oxy. 532, 23; second century; cf. 218, col. II, 19, around the beginning of the Christian era, concerning a trial by ordeal: “if the subject has some offense on his conscience”—ean de enklematos tinos eche syneidesin); “troubled by conscience concerning the things that she stole from the household supplies and stores” (thleibomene te syneidesei peri hon enosphisato en te endomeneia kai apothetois, P.Ryl. 116, 9; second century). In the third-fourth century, Alypius writes to his steward: “You have neglected to do it (give an accounting for the production and shipping of the grain), perhaps because you do not have a clear conscience” (ou kalo syneidoti chromenoi, P.Rein. 52, 5). These descriptions of the conscience⁵ are materially analogous to those given earlier in the NT.⁶ They tend to identify the syneidesis with the moral personality, whose integrity remains despite the subject’s offenses.⁷

Philo also had a concept of the pure conscience (Spec. Laws 1.203, ek katharou tou syneidotos), that of the person who has committed no offense (Heir 6) and who is incorruptible (Post. Cain 59), fully in the light before God (Joseph 68); but the conscience is constantly linked with elenchos (Creation 128; Good Man Free 149; Virtues 206; Conf. Tongues 121; Drunkenness 125; Post. Cain 59; Worse Attacks Better 23; cf. the addition of several manuscripts to John 8:9—hypo tes syneideseos elenchomenoi), is the source of remorse (Spec. Laws 2.49: “in the grip of conscience concerning unjust actions”—syneidesei ton adikematon anchomenos; Unchang. God 100), an internal witness linked with God (Joseph 285; Decalogue 91), which convicts the sinner of his guilt (Joseph 47), condemns him (Flacc. 7), holds him back on the slide into evil (Joseph 47), but which also holds the “reins” on his conduct (Worse Attacks Better 23) and directs it freely: “The victim of a transformation states that he cannot eat of the expiatory sacrifice, because his conscience does not allow him to take nourishment and repent” (Flight 159); the wife of Macron, “because of the state of her conscience (heneken tou syneidotos), becomes still more of a wheedler,” (To Gaius 39); the servant of God, “purified from every offense, considers that he loves his Master from his conscience” (ho philodespoton ek tou syneidotos krine, Heir 7). Compare Heb 13:18—“having a good conscience, wishing to conduct ourselves well in everything.”

Philo uses syneidesis and to syneidos rather often, but it cannot be said that he developed the idea, because he uses it above all for the function of blaming for sins, conformably to the Jewish and Stoic traditions.⁸ Josephus also know bad conscience (Ant. 16.102, 212) but accentuates its ethical character: through conscience, Joseph knows that adultery deserves death (Ant. 2.51), and each person is convinced that good deeds are rewarded (Ag. Apion 2.218). Conscience always arises from knowledge, it is a knowing that the subject shares (syn-eidenai) either with himself or with someone else, sometimes purely on a psychological level, sometimes on an ethical level: “Alexander, in addition to the purity of his conscience (meta katharou tou syneidos), was assisted by his powerful eloquence” (in getting himself acquitted, War 1.453).

None of these texts, even those of Seneca, approach St. Paul’s in density and precision; Paul made syneidesis into the interior faculty for the personal discernment of good and evil, the practical rule of conduct and motive for action: “for conscience’s sake” (dia ten syneidesin, Rom 13:5; 1Cor 8:7; 10:25-29; cf. 1Pet 2:19; 3:21). Having abolished the law, and thus morality based on the observance of an external rule, he substituted an individual norm, a spirit for a letter: the Christian is “autonomous.” He took a word that was in the popular vocabulary and whose usage is attested by the papyri, and he distinctively enriched the concept, which was elaborated by popular moralizing preaching, and which was directed—above all in Seneca—toward the conscience that we today call “antecedent” (conscientia antecedens).

BIBLIOGRAPHY. — I gave the bibliography for syneidesis up to 1936 in “La Conscience dans le Nouveau Testament,” in RB, 1938, pp. 1–31 (complemented by that of BAGD, under this word). Add M. Waldmann, “Synteresis oder Syneidesis? Ein Beitrag zur Lehre von Gewissen,” in TQ, 1938, pp. 332–371; J. Dupont, “Synéidésis: Aux origines de la notion chrétienne de conscience morale,” in Studia Hellenistica, vol. 5, Louvain, 1948, pp. 119–153; H. Clavier, “Ἡ Συνείδησις: Une pierre de touche de l’Hellénisme paulinien,” in Symposion, Athens, 1953, pp. 80ff.; C. A. Pierce, Conscience in the New Testament, London, 1955 (cf. the critique of M. E. Thrall, “The Pauline Use of Συνείδησις,” in NTS, vol. 14, 1967, pp. 118–125); G. Rudberg, “Cicero und das Gewissen,” in Symbolae Osloenses, 1955, pp. 96–104; Bo Reicke, “Syneidesis in Rom II, 15,” in TZ, 1956, pp. 157–161; D. Stacey, The Pauline View of Man, London, 1956, pp. 206ff.; C. Maurer, “Glaubensbindung und Gewissensfreiheit im N. T.,” in TZ, 1961, pp. 107–117; idem, “σύνοιδα-συνείδησις,” in TDNT, vol. 7, pp. 898–919; P. Delhaye, “L’Orientation religieuse des actes moraux d’après la sainte Ecriture et la théologie,” in Mémorial A. Gelin, Le Puy, 1961, pp. 422ff.; idem, “Les Bases bibliques du traité de la conscience,” in Studia Montis Regii, 1961, pp. 229–251; idem, “La Conscience actuelle certaine,” in ScEccl, 1963, pp. 227–246; J. Stelzenberger, Syneidesis im Neuen Testament, Paderborn, 1961; idem, Syneidesis, Conscientia, Gewissen, Paderborn, 1964; M. Coune, “Le Problème des idolothytes et l’éducation de la syneidésis,” in RSR, 1963, pp. 497–534; C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, pp. 602ff.; A. Pelletier, “Deux expressions de la notion de conscience dans le Judaïsme hellénistique et le Christianisme naissant,” in REG, 1967, pp. 363–371; G. Molenaar, “Seneca’s Use of the Term: Conscientia,” in Mnemosyne, vol. 22, 1969, pp. 170–180; V. A. Rodgers, “Σύνεσις and the Expression of Conscience,” in GRBS, vol. 10, 1969, pp. 241–254; A. Feuillet, “Les Fondements de la morale chrétienne,” in RevThom, 1970, pp. 367ff., 374ff.; A. Cancrini, “Il tema semantico syneidesis-conscientia,” in Cultura, vol. 7, 1969, pp. 46–70; eadem, “Syneidesis: Il tema semantico della ‘conscientia’ nella Graecia antica,” Rome, 1970; E. Marietta, Jr., “Conscience in Greek Stoicism,” in Numen, 1970, pp. 176–187; P. Leroy, “L’Exégèse thomiste de Rom. XIV, 23,” in Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale, 1971, pp. 149–195; R. Jewett, Paul’s Anthropological Terms, Leiden, 1971, pp. 402ff.; J. Terrien, Le Discernement dans les écrits pauliniens, Paris, 1973, pp.279ff.

¹ Democritus, frag. 297 b; it clearly refers to the moral consciousness: “there are men who, not knowing that the mortal nature comes to nothing, but being conscious (συνειδήσει δέ) of the perverse life they are leading, are tormented by alarms and fears . . .”; cf. W. Nestle, “Bemerkungen zu den Vorsokratikern und Sophisten,” in Philologus, 1908, p. 548.

² There are several rare texts prior to the Christian era: Menander, Mon. 654: βρότοις ἅπασιν ἢ συνείδησις θεός; Periander: Περίανδρος ε—ρωτηθεὶς τί ε—στιν ε—λευθερία, εἶπεν ἀγαθὴ συνείδησις (Stobaeus, Ecl. 3.24.12; vol. 3, p. 604); Diogenes Laertius: τίς γὰρ ἂν η—ττον φοβοί—τό τι ἢ θαρσοίη μάλιστα, ἢ ὅστις αὐτῷ—μηδὲ συνειδείη κακόν (ibid. 14; vol. 3, p. 604); Bias: Βίας ε—ρωτηθεὶς τί ἂν εἴη τῷ—κατὰ τὸν βίον ἄφοβον, εἶπεν ὀρὴ συνείδησις (ibid. 11; vol. 3, p. 603); cf. Pythagoras, Isocrates (ibid.); Xenophon, Ap. 24: “Those who allow themselves to be seduced by false testimony must necessarily be aware (συνειδέσθαι) of having committed a great impiety and a great injustice.”

³ C. Spicq, Théologie morale, pp. 602ff.

⁴ Cf. Philo, Virtues 124: “If someone is another man’s slave, and he flees to you out of fear of his master, or because he is aware of having committed certain offenses (συνειδήσει τινῶ—ν ἁμαρτημάτων), or again because without having committed any offense he is living with a hard and cruel master”; P.Paris 422, 7: “When you have come in early, you will find people aware of the same thing” (ὅταν ι—σελθῆς, καλῆ ὥρα, εὐρήσις συνίδησιν, second century); P.Oxy. 123, 13: ἤδη γὰρ οἱ—τῶ—ν ἄλλων πόλεων συνείδησιν εἰ—σήνεγκαν τοι—ς κολλήγαις αὐτῶ—ν, εἰ—σήλθαν (third-fourth century); BGU 1024, col. III, 7: τὴν συνείδησιν τῶ—ν πεπραγμένων (protocol from a trial, fourth-fifth century).

⁵ Cf. Philo, Good Man Free 99: ε—κ καθαροῦ τοῦ συνειδότος; Rewards 84: to call upon God ἀπὸ καθαροῦ τοῦ συνειδότος; 163: τοῦ συνειδότος ἀψευδές; To Gaius 165; P.Oslo 17, 10: εἰ—καθαρὰν εἶχετε συνείδησιν, κατὰ τί ζητηθέντες ε—πὶ τῆς διαγνώσεως τοῦ πράγματος οὐκ ε—φάνητε ἕως προγράφητε (with the correction of Berichtigungsliste, vol. 3, p. 119); SB 9193, 2: προαιρέσει βεβαίῳ συνειδήσει ὀρθῇ διανοίᾳ (time of Justinian); P.land. 128, 10: διὰ τὴν αἰ—δεσιμωτάτην σοινήδισιν (sic) τῶ—νγοναίων ἡμῶ—ν (fifth century); MAMA VIII, 413 e 12: —Ἰθαρος Μενίππου ἰ—ερόδς εὐσεβῶ—ν δὲ καὶ εὐσυνειδήτως ἔχων πρὸς τὴν οὐρανίαν —Αφροδίτην (Aphrodisias, second century); Marcus Aurelius 6.30.15: εὐσυνειδήτος; cf. a conscience somewhat strengthened: ἔχει τοῦ συνειδότος τινὰ ε—κβεβαίωσιν (Plutarch, De prof. in virt. 16; cf. a peaceful conscience, Plutarch, De tranq. anim. 19); Josephus, War 1.453: “He found a refuge in purity of conscience” (συνήργει δ αὐτῶ— μετα—καθαροῦ τοῦ συνειδότος); Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Th. 8.13: “The greatest merit of Thucydides is that he is never intentionally in error; he never taints his conscience” (μηδὲ μαιίνειν τὴν αὐτοῦ συνείδησιν); cf. 8.3.48; Ant. Rom. 8.1. But in the letter of Artaxerxes to Hippocrates, ἀγαθὴ συνείδησις is only “good advice” (ed. Littré, IX, p. 312).

⁶ Cf. ἀγαθὴ συνείδησις (Acts 23:1; 1Tim 1:5, 19; 1Pet 3:16, 21); καθαρὰ (1Tim 3:9; 2Tim 1:3; cf. Heb 9:14); πονηρὰ (Heb 10:22); ἀσθενής (1Cor 8:7, 10, 12); μεμΐανται (Titus 1:15).

⁷ Cf. its association with oaths, analogous to that of a witness, MAMA IV, 280, 7: διὰ ὄρκον καὶ συνίδησιν καὶ διὰ μόλυμον (Dionysopolis, second-third century). At Pergamum, in the time of Hadrian, merchants who had changed money anywhere other than at the public bank, in order to get a better rate, could not—since they were aware of their offense—take an oath, and give it to the bankers to be rid of it, τοὺς οὖν διὰ τὸ συνειδὸς ὀμνύναι μὴ δυναμένους διδόναι τι αὐτοί—ς (Dittenberger, Or. 484, 37; cf. R. Bogaert, Banques et banquiers, pp. 231ff.); cf. SEG IV, 648, 11: ἔθηκεν ε—ν τῶ—ναῶ— . . . ε—ν συνειδήσι τοιαύτη (Lydia, second century). In a ruling from Lindos concerning a religious tax, around AD 200, “those whose conscience is absolutely clear may consult the oracle (of the god Psithyrus) and offer sacrifices” (χρήσεν καὶ θύιν οἷς καὶ τὸ συνειδὸς ἄριστον, LSCGSup, n. 86, 3).

⁸ T. Reub. 4.3—ἕως νῦν ἡ συνείδησις μου συνέχει με περὶ τῆς ἀσεβείας μου; Epictetus 3.22.94: “For the Cynic, it is not weapons or guards but his conscience (τὸ συνειδὸς) that give this power” of reprimanding vice, of punishing the delinquent (cf. A. Bonhöffer, Epikteke, pp. 156ff.); Heraclitus, All. 37.2: “Consciousness of an offense is slow to come with all guilty people” (συνείδησις ἀμαρτόντος ἀνθρώπου; cf. Heb 10:2—συνείδησις ἀμαρτιῶ—ν); Diodorus Siculus 4.65.7, with respect to Alcmaeon, who killed his mother: καὶ διὰ τὴν συνείδησιν τοῦ μύσουσ εἰ—ς μανίαν περιέστη, “his conscience concerning his stain drove him mad.” The Stoic conscientia, well attested by Cicero, is exploited above all by Seneca (Ep. 43.4–5; Seneca, Vit. Beat. 20.3–5; Tranq. 3.4, citing Athenodorus son of Sandon of Tarsus, d. AD 7). Cf. R. Mulder, De Conscientiae Notione, Quae et Qualis Fuerit Romanis, Leiden, 1908; J. N. Sevenster, Paul and Seneca, Leiden, 1961, pp. 84ff.

συνέχω

synecho, to hold together, associate, take, hold, press, detain, grip, compel synecho, S 4912; TDNT 7.877–885; EDNT 3.306; MM 606–607; L&N 25.241, 30.18, 68.19, 90.65; BAGD 789

Of the twelve occurrences of this verb in the NT, only one has a theological meaning: “For the love of Christ compels (synechei) us.”¹ This rather odd figurative meaning needs to be illuminated by the usage of the Koine.

I. — “Hold together, maintain,” is said of fabric that is held together and stitched² and quite early becomes a technical term for the holding together of the universe in unity;³ with the Stoics, it refers to the divine link that holds the world together.⁴ Philo calls God “the One who created all, who unites and sustains earth and heaven, sea and air,”⁵ in accord with Wis 1:7 (“The Spirit of the Lord fills the universe and contains all things”) or Job 3:23 (God hedges man in on all sides). A Roman inscription from 370 describes Attis thus: “To you, Attis, the Most High, holding all things together.”⁶ This cosmic meaning is unknown in the NT, as is the following meaning.

II. — From the meaning “to assemble”⁷ derives that of being an associate or co-participant in a matter: “Nikon, with whom Penenteris is associated” (ho synechetai ho Penenteris, P.Magd. 26, 7; cf. P.Gen. 38, 8; P.Mich. 370, 26–28); and the meaning “administrate together,” the object being some property or other (P.Paris II, 31, 8; from the third century BC). In a marriage contract from AD 127 between Sarapion and Taïs, the services and profits of the slave Callityche will be shared together (ten douleian kai apophoras autas synexei, P.Oxy. 496, 6).

III. — Probably from this usage comes the sense “devote oneself to, take care of,” as in this epitaph from Thermion in the imperial period: “I shall take care of her as of one of my own children”;⁸ and Acts 18:5, where Paul at Corinth devotes himself entirely to preaching: syneicheto to logo — he is absorbed, completely wrapped up in this ministry.

IV. — The passive synechomai means “be taken, held,” as on the horns of a dilemma (synechomai de ek ton duo, Phil 1:23) or under a compulsion that cannot be avoided. Hence the medical meaning: “be taken” by a fever, an illness, a pain, as was Peter’s mother-in-law (Luke 4:38) or the father of Publius (Acts 28:8; cf. Matt 4:24). Two fourth-century physicians, delivering a medical certificate, state that they have seen the patient in bed, taken by a light fever.⁹ Similarly, on the psychological level, a person can be taken by great fear, as were the Gerasenes (phobo megalo syneichonto, Luke 8:37), or as was Christ, who was oppressed or constrained (pos synechomai) until his baptism was completed.¹⁰

V. — When surrounded by a dense crowd or by encircling enemies, one is both “pressed” and “detained.”¹¹ This nuance of constraint is the most emphasized connotation in the papyri. In 20–50, a woman who was beaten, robbed, and abandoned by her husband asks the archidikastes to make him appear before him and compel him to return her dowry (hopos epanankasthe synechomenos apodounai moi ten phernen syn hemiolia, P.Oxy. 281, 25). In 103 BC, Diocles, an associate of shady characters, is convicted and forced to pay damages to Theotimus, whom he has insulted and attacked (synechomenous tes adikou agoges, P.Fay. 12, 31). Synecho is the ordinary term for the power behind the execution of a judicial verdict: the accused are compelled to pay a certain sum to their victims (synechomenous apodounai autois, P.Ryl. 65, 11; from 67 BC). Sometimes this verb is used for the “seizure” of a commodity, an impounding. In 236 BC, an imprisoned debtor asks the tax farmer to place an embargo on the produce of his vineyards.¹² Much more commonly it is a matter of physical constraint used against a recalcitrant debtor. Dioiketai, toparchoi, komarchoi, epistratego, basilogrammateis, archidikastai, and police chiefs order the “seizure” of the guilty party.¹³ Synecho is even used for impounding by private citizens themselves.¹⁴ In the second century BC, however, a series of amnesty orders (by Ptolemy IV Philometor or Ptolemy V Epiphanes) forbids “confining free men in their houses or anywhere else” (P.Kroll col. II, 18 = C.Ord.Ptol. 34; cf. 53, 260; 53 bis 6; 53 ter 5, 18; 55, 13; PSI 1401, 13). These usages shed light on Luke 22:63, hoi andres hoi synechontes, which is usually translated “the men who were guarding him (Jesus)”; they were “holding him prisoner.”¹⁵

VI. — The violence implied by the idea of constraint is not essential to synecho, which also means “grip, squeeze.” In Acts 7:57, where we say that the members of the Sanhedrin “stopped their ears,” the Greek says that they pressed or bound up his ears in order not to hear (syneschon to ota auton). The same word is also used for shutting the mouth (Isa 52:15; Ps 69:16), for the way the crocodile’s scales are fastened together (Job41:9, Theodotion), for pinching the fingers together (Aristophanes, Vesp. 95).

VII. — All of the meanings discussed above have a part in the love of Christ that constrains us.¹⁶ This love suggests the Lord's seizing us to hold us and maintain us in his sovereign and exclusive possession. It takes possession of us so forcefully that it compels us to love in return (cf. the persistence in Mic 7:18; Ps 77:9) and wraps up our whole being. More than pressure, it is an compulsion (Vulgate "urget nos") that orients our whole life and all our conduct. The fervor of this agape, which is suggestive of a fire (Matt 24:12), can be compared to a burning fever (cf. Heb 10:24—paroxysmos agapes) and thus implies intense emotion, the giving of one's heart. Finally, since according to St. Paul the agape of Christ is essentially linked to the cross, this love in a way oppresses the disciple, just as Christ was in anguish at the prospect of his passion; it judges him and convinces (krino) him to die with his Savior.¹⁷ He is forced to it, as it were.

¹ Ἡ γὰρ ἀγάπη τοῦ Χριστοῦ συνέχει ἡμα—ς, 2Cor 5:14; cf. G. S. Hendry, "Ἡ γὰρ ἀγάπη τοῦ Χριστοῦ συνέχει ἡμα—ς (II Cor. v, 14)," in ExpT, vol. 59, 1947–48, p. 82; C. Spicq, "L'Étreinte de la charité," in ST, vol. 8, 2, 1954, pp. 123–132; C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 2, pp. 127–136; Koester, on this word, in TDNT, vol. 7, pp. 877–885.

² Exod 26:3; 28:7; 36:11; Plato, Phd. 98 d: "the skin keeps the whole together." Metaphorically, "enmity and friendship hold the real together" (Soph. 242 e; cf. Grg. 508 a); "you hold us together for a long time" (Aristophanes, Lys. 1265); Orac. Chald., frag. 23: "for a triad to hold all things in measuring all things" (ὄφρα τὰ πάντα τριάς συνέχη κατὰ πάντα μετροῦσα, ed. E. des Places, after Didymus, Trin. 2.27; PG, vol. 39, 756 a); idem, frag. 30, the intelligible god, "source of sources, matrix that contains all things" (μήτρα συνέχουσα τὰ πάντα); Numenius, frag. 4 a (ed. E. des Places). On the soul "containing" the body, cf. J. Pépin, "Une nouvelle source de Saint Augustin," in REA, 1964, pp. 58–61.

³ Aristotle, in Stobaeus, Ecl. 1.14.1 c (vol. 1, p. 141, 9); Xenophon, Mem. 4.3.13; Cyr. 8.7.22; Ps.-Aristotle, Mund. 6.397b9; G. Méautis, Recherches sur le Pythagorisme, Neuchâtel, 1922, p. 43.

⁴ Atticus, frag. 7, 3: a unique, animated force traverses and penetrates the universe "to bind and hold together all things" (καὶ πάντα συνδοῦσα καὶ συέχουσα); Porphyry, Abst. 2.36; Iamblichus, Myst. 1.19 (58.3): "Things here below are continuous, of a piece with things above"; Alexander of Aphrodisias, Mixt. 224.7; SVF, vol. 2, pp. 137, 30; 144, 26–27; 145, 1; 146, 32; 147, 34.

⁵ Moses 2.238; cf. Plant. 8–10; Etern. World 36–37, 75, 137; Migr. Abr. 181; Flight 112; Heir 188, 217, 281; Quest. Exod. 2.68, 90; Plutarch, De comm. not. 49; De Stoic. rep. 43. Cf. Strabo 11.1.1: “Europe touches (συνεχῆς ἐ—στιν) Asia”; 11.6.7.

⁶ IGUR, n. 129, 2: Ἀττει θ ὑψίστω καὶ συνέχοντι τὸ πα—ν, commented on by F. Cumont, Les Religions orientales dans le paganisme romain, 4th ed., Paris, 1929, pp. 59, 227, n. 57.

⁷ 1Sam 23:8; 2Sam 20:3; Neh 6:10; Xenophon, An. 7.2, 8: call dispersed soldiers together; Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.208: συνέχει κοινωνίαν; P.Mich.Zen. 103, 2: bring camels together; P.Brem. XIV, 9; BGU 1619, 15; 1773, 7; P.Mil. 37, 13; P.Mil.Vogl. 194 a 4; SB 9495, col. II, a 4.

⁸ Παισὶν συνέξω, SB 8960, 30 = GVI, n. 1875 = E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 46; who compares Strabo 14.2.5; Athenaeus 13.578 f. Add Wis 17:19—“the whole world devoted itself unhindered to its work” (ἀνεμποδίστοις συνείχετο ἔργοις); 2Macc 9:2—invade a city; Pindar, Pyth. 1.9: the column of heaven masters Typhon, who has a hundred heads; Xenophon, Cyr. 8.7.22, with respect to the almighty gods, οἱ—τήνδε τὴν τω—ν ὄλων τάξιν συνέχουσιν.

⁹ P.Oxy. 896, 34; P.Flor. 296, 22: τῇ συνεχούση με ἄρρωστίᾳ; C.P.Herm. 19, 11: νόσῳ συσχεθείς; P.Lond. V, 1730, 13: διὰ τὴν συνεχομένην μοι ἀσθένειαν; P.Oslo 124, 13. Often in the medical writers: “the tendons are affected by the suffering” (Hippocrates, Acut., Appendix 37.1; cf. W. K. Hobart, Medical Language, pp. 3ff.). Cf. Demosthenes, C. Con. 54.11: “I was taken by a persistent fever and acute pains” (πυρετοὶ δὲ παρηκολούθουν μοι συνεχει—ς καὶ ἀλγήματα). In Hippocrates, συνεχῆς refers to a fever that continues without remission (J. Jouanna, La Nature de l’homme, Berlin, 1975, p. 294).

¹⁰ Luke 12:50; cf. Wis 17:10—wickedness is constrained by the conscience (συνεχομένη τῇ συνειδήσει); T. Reub. 4.3—ἕως νῦν ἡ συνείδησις μου συνέχει με περὶ τῆς ἀσεβείας μου; T. Abr. A 16: “Death, seized by a great fear” (δειλία πολλῇ συνεχόμενος); in 200, a woman overwhelmed by excessive burdens had to sell her reserves and her jewels; she complains of having had to work all year long—forcibly, if not in anguish (P.Oxy. 899, 11); cf. P.Lond. V, 1676, 25: ἡ συνέχουσα αὐτὸν φοβρωτάτε ἀνομαλία; 1677, 12: συνεχόμενος τῇ ἀπορίᾳ καὶ πενίᾳ.

¹¹ Luke 8:45—οι— ὄχλοι συνέχουσίν σε; 19:43. From the third century BC, συνέχω is used for someone who is obliged to stay somewhere longer than he wishes: “I am detained here” (συνέχομαι δ ε—νταῦθα, PSI 552, 28); “Our brother, having been detained by business in the metropolis since the 28th” (P.Tebt. 754, 2; second century BC); irrigation waters must not be held up more than five days (P.Cair.Zen. 59155, 5). In AD 16: ε—ρωτω— σε ταχύτερον συσχει—ν τὸ πρα—γμα (P.Tebt. 410, 11); P.Hamb. 171, 7, 17, money kept in the bank; P.Hib. 249, 7.

¹² P.Tebt. 772, 10–11; cf. P.Enteux. 3, 7: a seizure of fleeces; 85, 3: “Diophanes wrote to Deinias to hold back” the grain; P.Cair.Zen. 59373, 3–4: seizure of wine and other commodities as security against unpaid import taxes; P.Mich.Zen. 103, 19: Asclepiades’ creditors seize the thirty sacks carried by his camel caravan, ταῦτα συνέχεται ὑπὸ τω—ν οἷς ὄφειλεν ὁ —Ασκληπιάδης; P.Princ. 117, 17 (52–53 BC); BGU 1824, 27; 1854, 17; 2063, 13, 18.

¹³ In the third century AD, farmers who have not paid their debts are arrested (P.Gur. 20, 2); others are kept in the town jail until they can be transferred to Alexandria (P.Tebt. 703, 221; cf. P.Mich.Zen. 36, 6; P.Petr. 20, 1; P.Lond. 1914, 38: —Αρχέλαος συνεσχέθη, Archelaus was arrested). A series of judgments in AD 13 decides that debtors will be held (συνέχεσθαι) until they have paid off their obligation (BGU 1053, 1, 31; 1054, 9; 1055, 28; 1056, 16; 1057, 12; 1106, 37; etc.). In 81 a loan contract provides that the borrower will be detained if he does not pay back the thirty-eight drachmas at the end of four months (ἢ εἶναι αὐτὴν ἀγωγίμην καὶ συνέχεσθαι μέχρι τοῦ ε—κτει—σαι τω— Μάκρω, P.Oxy. 1471, 23; cf. 1882, 4).

¹⁴ P.Cair.Zen. 59347, 3; 59620, 7 and 12 (of a child); often the violence suffered by the liberty of the detainee is emphasized. In March 167, Lysimachus and his brother complain to the epistrategos that a certain Sarapammon has kidnapped their slave (βία συνέσχον, P.Fam.Tebt. 37, 2). Cf. P.Oslo 127, 6: συσχεθῆναι μεθ ὕβρεως; UPZ 79, 20: συνει—χον αὐτὴν καὶ βάειν, μήποτε φύγη.

¹⁵ Cf. 1Macc 13:15—“It is because of the money that your brother Jonathan owes the royal treasury . . . that we are holding him captive” (συνέχομεν αὐτόν); P.Magd. 42, 7: “The komarchos took me to prison and kept me there four days” (προσαπήγαγέν με ει—ς τὴν φυλακὴν καὶ σύνεσχεν ε—ῶ ἡμέρας, P.Enteux. 83, 7); P.Lille 7, 11, 15: “My kinsman Apollonius asked me to return some little books that he had entrusted to my care; when I could not find them, he became angry with me and asked Spinther . . . to arrest me (συνέχειν με). . . . He in turn explained to the jailer why I was arrested (δι ἧν αἰ—τίαν συνέσχημαι)”; Hymn to Isis: “all those who are held prisoner by destiny, which leads to death” (ὅσσοι δε—μοίραις θανάτου συνέχονται ε—ν ει—ρκτηῖ, SEG VIII, 548 = SB 8138 = V. F. Vanderlip, Four Greek Hymns, p. 17).

¹⁶ 2Cor 5:14. In St. Paul’s usage, ἀγάπη with a person in the genitive means the love that belongs to that person (2Thess 3:5; Eph 2:4), so τοῦ Χριστοῦ would be a subjective genitive (cf. Rom 5:5; 8:35, 39; Gal 2:20); but here the context (cf. v. 13) suggests an objective genitive, love for Christ. In reality, these two meanings should not be separated; we have here a comprehensive or “general” genitive, cf. M. Zerwick, Biblical Greek, §36.

¹⁷ Cf. St. Ambrose: “I am fastened as by nails of faith, I am confined by the good fetters of love” (on Luke 5:27).

ΣΥΣΤΑΤΙΚΟΣ

systatikos, setting in relation, appointing, guaranteeing, commending systatikos, S 4956; EDNT 3.313; MM 617; L&N 33.345; BAGD 795

This adjective, derived from synistemi, literally “giving consistency” or “setting in relation,” is used in the neuter for the appointing of a representative,¹ the giving of a guarantee (P.Oxy. 1634, 20; P.Grenf. II, 70, 4) or of orders (P.Tebt. 315, 29). With epistole or grammata, it refers to a “letter of recommendation” (P.Oxy. 1587, 20; Diogenes Laertius 8.87), which usually meant a letter given to a traveler so that he might find a good welcome with the writer’s relatives or friends abroad (P.Oxy. 1064; P.Flor. 173). Diogenes was skeptical of the value of these systatika grammata (Epictetus 2.3.1). St. Paul deemed them superfluous in his case: “Do we need letters of introduction to you or from you?”²

These letters were so commonly used that from the time of Demetrius of Phalerum formularies were available for use as models.³ The oldest ones that have come down to us are from the third century BC.⁴ Recommendations were written for a close friend (anankaios philos, C.P.Herm. 1; first century) or a regular visitor⁵ to a high official⁶ or to any acquaintance at all (SB 7662, 13). Even the emperor or the consuls intervene to recommend their freedmen when they are awarded a certain position or function; they “bear witness” to their qualities or abilities. For example, “The recommendation of your superior moves me to promote you to the distinguished service of the voluptates; I give you the post of . . .”⁷ Christians continued this custom. There are numerous letters between them or from priests recommending their “brother” in the faith to this or that community.⁸

¹ Συστατικὸν εἰς Οὐαλέριν, Pap.Lugd.Bat. VI, 27, 26 (lines 23 and 30); 41, 13, 19: εὐδοκῶ— τὸ προκειμένῳ συστατικῶ— (second century); P.Hamb. 102, 19: τὸ συστατικὸν κύριον ὄν ε—μὸν ι—δίογραφον; cf. PSI 1035, 17; P.Ross.Georg. IV, 6, 9; Aristotle, in Diogenes Laertius 4.18. In the banking vocabulary, συνίστημι is used for persons “presented” to the creditor to pay him, hence, in the Hellenistic period, “representing” the paying party, cf. L. Wenger, Die Stellvertretung im Rechte der Papyri, Leipzig, 1906, pp. 13–15, 186ff. R. Bogaert, Banques et banquiers, pp. 54ff. J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1946–47, p. 354, n. 195.

² Μὴ χρήζομεν . . . συστατικῶ—ν ε—πιστολῶ—ν πρὸς ὑμα—ς ἢ ε—ξ ὑμῶ—ν, 2Cor 3:1 (cf. W. Baird, “Letters of Recommendation: A Study of 2Cor 3:1-3,” in JBL, 1961, pp.166–172; J. F. Collange, Enigmes de la deuxième Epître de Paul aux Corinthiens, Cambridge, 1972, pp. 43ff.); cf. the recommendation of Paul and Barnabas (Acts 15:25), of Apollos (Acts 18:27), of Phoebe (Rom 16:1-2), of Mark (Col 4:10), of Onesimus (Phlm); cf. Timothy (1Cor 16:10-11), Titus and his companions (2Cor 8:22ff.).

³ V. Weichert, Demetrii et Libanii qui ferunt Τύποι —Επιστολικοί et —Επιστολισταί—οι Χαρακτήρες, Leipzig, 1910, n. 2; C. W. Keyes, “The Greek Letter of Introduction,” in AJP, 1935, pp. 28–44; Chan-Hie Kim, Form and Structure of the Familiar Greek Letter of Recommendation, Vanderbilt University, 1970.

⁴ S. Witkowski, Epistulae Privatae Graecae 11–12 (260 BC); 34; 51; P.Cair.Zen. 59042, 59045, 59046, 59192, 59284; in the second century, P.Goodsp. 4; in the first century AD, P.Oxy. 746, 787 (from AD 16), 292 (AD 25), etc.

⁵ P.Mert. 62: ἔστιν μου ε—κ τῆς οἰ—κίας (AD 6; with the corrections of H. C. Youtie, Scriptiunculae, vol. 1, pp. 268ff.); P.Giss. 88.

⁶ —Επιστολὰς συστατικὰς πρὸς τὸν ε—πιστράτηγον (second century), H. Büttner, P.Giss.Univ., n. 20, 1; SB 7600, 17: ἀποστι—λε (?) σοι συστατικὴν πρὸς . . . Σεκοῦνθον τὸν κεντυρίωνα (AD 16). —On the political, social, and judicial levels, a “recommendation” intervenes, approaches someone, solicits, and makes pressing demands, going from simple mediation to means of pressure; cf. Cicero’s seven letters of recommendation, analyzed by E. Deniaux, “Un exemple d’intervention politique: Cicéro et le dossier de Buthrote in 44 avant J.-C.,” in BAGB, 1975, pp. 283–296.

⁷ CIL VI, 8619; Fronto, Ep. ad M. Caes. 5.37 (cf. G. Boulvert, Les Esclaves et les affranchis impériaux sous le haut-empire romain, Aix-en-Provence, 1964, vol. 2, pp. 620ff.); P.Oxy. 1663.

⁸ P.Alex. 29; PSI 208, 1041; P.Oxy. 1162; SB 7269; cf. J. van Haelst, Catalogue des papyrus littéraires juifs et chrétiens, Paris, 1976, p. 360, n. 1196.

σώζω, σωτήρ, σωτηρία, σωτήριος

sozo, to save, deliver; soter, savior, deliverer; soteria, salvation, deliverance; soterios, saving, preserving, salutary, helpful

sozo, S 4982; TDNT 7.965–1003; EDNT 3.319–321; NIDNTT 3.204–206, 209–219; MM 620; L&N 21.18, 21.27, 23.136; BDF §§26, 180; BAGD 789–799 | soter, S 4990; TDNT 7.1003–1021; EDNT 3.325–327; NIDNTT 3.216–223; MM 621–622; L&N 21.22, 21.31; BAGD 800–801 | soteria, S 4991; TDNT 7.965–1003; EDNT 3.327–3.329; NIDNTT 3.205–207, 209–216, 218–219; MM 622; L&N 21.18, 21.25, 21.26; BDF §258(1); BAGD 801 | soterios, S 4992; TDNT 7.1021–1024; EDNT 3.329; NIDNTT 3.216–217, 221; MM 622; L&N 21.28; BDF §§59(2), 113(1), 187(8); BAGD 801–802

“From the adjective σαθός, saos (safe), contracted to sos (Homeric, Attic), soos (Ionian and Koine), is derived the factitive verb saoo, saoso, esaosa (make safe, healthy), that is to say, (1) save from an immediate threat; (2) procure safety by bringing out of a dangerous situation safe and sound.”¹ In Christian language, “salvation, Savior, save” became such specific technical terms that we hardly grasp their meaning for the hearers of the apostolic kerygma. Certainly it is still a matter of being saved from misfortune, but only the usage—literary and popular—of these words allows us to grasp their extension and meaning in the first century: From what dangers is one saved? What is the nature of salvation? Above all, who is the one who saves?²

I. Sozo and soteria in secular Greek. — To save means to deliver when there is a particularly perilous situation, a mortal danger (megalón kindynon, Dittenberger, Syl. 1130, 1; Or. 69, 4; 70, 4; 71, 3; SEG VII, 731; SB 8334, 7; 8862, 4; IGUR, n. 193, 6–8): first of all war or deliverance from enemies or opponents,³ then the perils of navigation: “I saved this shipwrecked man when his crew had died”;⁴ “a young woman was saved from the sea by a dolphin” (Plutarch, Conv. sept. sap. 19; De sol. an. 36); a dedication to Pan: “You saved us when we were astray on the Red Sea . . .

now save the city of Alexandria”;⁵ saved by the god from the sea (sotheis ek pelagous, Dittenberger, Or. 74 = SB 8383, 7); Balbillus, “saved from the waters” (ex hydaton sotheis).⁶ This deliverance, this salvation, is spoken of with respect to all the dangers of an earthly pilgrimage,⁷ notably desert crossings: Besarion was saved from danger thanks to the special protection of the god (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 106, 5 = SB 7905); Isidoros was saved when he was thrown from his carriage by his horses (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, 109, 2; SB 10161); a proskynema of the Cretan Cheidon: “Travelers . . . follow your route safe and sound” (sozomenoi; E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, 157, 2; cf. 159, 1 = SB 8382, 4050). But the most common usage of soteria, sozo, is medical: to save means to heal a disease;⁸ remedies are saviors (Plutarch, De adul. et am. 11; Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.129; Rewards 145, 170; Worse Attacks Better 110; Joseph 110), physicians are saviors. In the second century BC, a decree of Samos honors the physician Diodorus, who cared for and restored many patients and “was the cause of their salvation. . . . He placed the common salvation above all fatigue and all expense.”⁹ In letters, news is sought from correspondents, the writer is anxious because none has been received and rejoices if the news is good: “You will do well to send me a message regarding your health, which is my greatest preoccupation” (P.Phil. 35, 17); “Do not neglect, my brother, to write me regarding your health” (P.Mert. 85, 5; cf. 28, 11); “Write me first, I beg you, regarding your health, and then regarding your desires” (P.Sarap. 91, 7; cf. 92, 21; 95, 6; 100, 13). The physician Eudaemon writes his mother and brothers seeking news from them and assurance regarding their safety (P.Fouad 80, 7). “I rejoiced to receive your letter and to learn that you have been cured of your illness.”¹⁰ Frequently soteria is associated with hygieia,¹¹ which suggests that salvation is not merely deliverance but also protection or preservation: “May I not see my prayer rejected for the salvation of your children as God keeps them” (P.Apoll. 49, 7; cf. P.Fouad 89, 9; P.Lond. 1919, 21); it is in this sense that Soteria is a tutelary household deity (P.Oslo 148, 12).

This weakened meaning is common; to save is to leave alive,¹² protect and pardon,¹³ preserve from misery,¹⁴ remain safe and sound, subsist,¹⁵ with a nuance of security (P.Panop.Beatty 2, 16 and 151; P.Mich. 490, 7), so that a way to say “keep a spark from dying” is “save the seed of fire” (Homer, Od. 5.490); pine is good for preserving wine (Plutarch, Quaest. conv. 5.3.1). One keeps (sozo) one’s beard (Epictetus 1.16.14); Apollonius, an Alexandrian architect, dedicates an altar to Zeus the Sun “for the preservation of all his labors” (hyper tes soterias autou panton ergon, SB 8323); one saves or preserves official documents (P.Fam.Tebt. XV, 49 and 91; SB 9066, col. II, 15), as well as principles (Philo, Spec. Laws 1.59; Epictetus 4.1.120) or a game (Epictetus 4.7.30), marks of kinship (Philo, Creation 145), traditional acts (Spec. Laws 4.102), and a memory (Plutarch, Dem. 2).

In a number of the texts cited, especially in medical usage,¹⁶ sozo and soteria have a positive meaning, referring to a good, namely, good health: being well. This is clearly the case with regard to vows hyper soterias: a statue is set up, a column is erected, an altar is prepared for the prosperity or happiness of loved ones,¹⁷ and especially for the happiness of the emperor;¹⁸ thus authorities or private individuals “save” acity, that is, contribute to its welfare, safeguard its happiness;¹⁹ so soteria is synonymous with eudaimonia (cf. P.Oxy. 2559, 7; Dittenberger, Or. II, 40).

The soteria of the universe is attributed to the gods, because Zeus “has arranged everything for the preservation and perfection of the whole” (Plato, Leg. 10.903 b), he protects and nourishes;²⁰ if we leave aside the philosophers (Plato, Phd. c-d; Resp. 6.492 e; Tabula of Cebes 3.2;4.3;14.1) and the mystery religions,²¹ salvation has no moral connotations.²²

II. Sozo and soteria in the LXX. — In the Bible, “salvation” has the same meanings as in secular Greek: deliverance, protection, healing, health, happiness, and prosperity; but the Hebrew verb yasha', which is most commonly used, would originally have the nuance “be spacious, have plenty of room, be comfortable.” It would be the opposite of sarar, “be pressed, constrained, oppressed.” Salvation is usually Israel’s independence and security, brought about sometimes by heroes like Manoah (Judg 13:5; cf. Jer 14:9; cf. Philo, Unchang. God 17; Joseph 63; Moses 1.317), sometimes and in fact almost always by God himself in response to the cry of his people.²³ Philo constantly emphasizes that the God of Israel is the only Savior,²⁴ helper, and protector of the soul (Drunkennes 111), benefactor (Sobr. 55), providing refuge and complete security (Dreams 1.86; Drunkennes 72); but this OT salvation is also moral and spiritual and applies only to people who have been purified of sin: “Cleanse your heart of evil, O Jerusalem, so that you may be saved.”²⁵

III. Sozo and soteria in the NT. — The secular meanings occur often,²⁶ but the specifically religious meaning is dominant, in contrast to perdition,²⁷ and consists first of all of deliverance from sins (Matt 1:21; Luke 1:68, 69, 71, 77) and “the wrath to come” (Rom 5:9; cf. 1Cor 3:15; 5:5; 1Thess 5:9), and hence “reconciliation” (Rom 5:10-11). It has to do with the salvation of the soul (Mark 8:35; 1Pet 1:9), which is already actual (semeron, Luke 19:9; kath' hemeran, Acts 2:47; nyn hemera soterias, 2Cor 6:2; esothemen, Rom 8:24; sesomenoi, Eph 2:5, 8; esosen, Titus 3:5) and continues to become effective (sozomenoi, 1Cor 1:18; 2Cor 2:15), but will not be complete and definitive until entrance into heaven: eternal life (1Tim 1:16; 6:12), which is still an object of hope (Rom 8:24; Titus 3:7; Heb 6:18; 1Pet 1:3). Two major conditions are required: faith²⁸ and perseverance,²⁹ because the undertaking is difficult in the midst of tribulations (Mark 13:20) and its success can be compromised;³⁰ so much so that one may wonder whether in the end “there will be few saved.”³¹ Jesus answers, “That which is impossible for humans is possible for God” (Luke 18:27). Salvation is a gracious gift from him (Eph 2:5, 8; 2Tim 1:9), his accomplishment of victory through his might (Rev 7:10; 12:10; 19:1) and the action of his Son (John 3:17; 10:9; Acts 5:31; Heb 2:10; 7:25); so that to be called to set out on the way of salvation is joyous news (Eph 1:13), because success is divinely guaranteed: “The gospel is God’s power for salvation.”³²

IV. Soter in secular Greek. — It is first and foremost the gods who have superhuman powers and are soteres in that they deliver people from dangers or protect them (Xenophon, Hell. 3.3, 4; PSI 1241, 7; SB 7530, 4, theon sozonton; 9820; P.Oxy. 3069, 20; P.Köln 56, 8; IGLS 1184, B 5; I.Did. 424, 14–15; Firmicus Maternus, Err. prof. rel. 22: tharrite, mystai, tou theou sesosmenou, estai gar hymon ek ponon soteria). Zeus is invoked by a suppliant at Philadelphia in these terms in the first century: “May Zeus Savior receive this account favorably and grant in return the benefits of health, safety, peace, and security on land and on sea”;³³ Athena (I.Lind., n. 392, 394; I.Rhamn. 23, 3; I.Bulg. 326, 8); Poseidon, “savior of ships” (Ps.-Homer, H.Pos. 22.5); Leda, gives birth to the Dioscuri “for the salvation of the people of earth and of ships” (Ps.-Homer, H. Cast. 33.6); Asclepius;³⁴ Isis and Sarapis, the former being as a healer the object of the most widespread worship.³⁵

With the help or the protection of the gods, humans also can be saviors, especially by delivering their country or perfecting their institutions,³⁶ so that the title soter is used in the fifth century BC for men of politics, for Gelon (Diodorus Siculus 11.26.6), for Brasidas (Thucydides 5.11.1), for Philip of Macedonia (Demosthenes 18.43), for Dionysius of Syracuse (Diodorus Siculus 16.20.6; Plutarch, Dio 46), Camillus (Plutarch, Cam. 10), Lysandridas.³⁷ These tributes are understandable, as is the description of philosophers as “savior”—or alternatively as *boethos*³⁸—but adulation and flattery abuse them:³⁹ an acclamation directed to a prefect, “save the city” (soson polin, P.Oxy. 41, 23); “Save us, prytanes, your government is excellent” (1414, 22); “Prosper, O prefect, protector of honest people.”⁴⁰ For having announced the freedom of Greece, Titus Quinctius Flamininus is proclaimed by the crowd “the savior and defender of Greece” (Plutarch, Flam. 10; cf.16); Theophanes, Pompey’s freedman, is “savior, benefactor, second founder of the country” (Dittenberger, Syl. 753; cf. 751, 754), Marius is “savior of Italy” (Plutarch, Mar. 39); the father of Herodes Atticus (CIG 2.3596; I.Olymp. 622) and various illustrious unknowns, such as Demetrios Kindaburios (TAM II, 3, n. 768) or the officer who denounced Plautianus to Septimus Severus and for this became soter and euergetes (Herodian 3.12.2; cf. 8.3.4), or wealthy donors (MAMA 6.103, 165; I.Car. 11).

All the same, “savior” in the official and functional titles of sovereigns⁴¹ is not unimportant for understanding the language of the NT, especially when the Roman emperor is described as “savior and benefactor,” which are divine attributes.⁴² In the Hellenistic period, after the decay of the polis, the prince is conceived as representing the divinity and procuring the welfare of his subjects, who look to him for everything—security and happiness.⁴³ Especially illuminating is the letter of the proconsul Paulus Fabius Maximus: “Providence, which governs the course of our lives, has shown attention and goodness and has provided for the most perfect good for life by producing the emperor(Augustus), whom it has filled with virtue in order to make him a benefactor of humanity (eis euergesian anthropon). So it has sent to us and to others a savior (sotera) who has put an end to war and will restore order every where: Caesar, by his appearing, has realized the hopes of our ancestors; not only has he surpassed earlier benefactors of humanity, but he he leaves no hope to those of the future that they might surpass him. The god’s birthday was for the world the beginning of the good news that he brought (erxen de to kosmo ton di’ auton euangelion he genethlios).”⁴⁴

V. Soter in the NT. — It is no exaggeration to say that the whole new covenant is summed up in the announcement of the angel to the Virgin Mary: “You shall give birth to a child and you shall call his name Jesus, ”⁴⁵ that is, “Yahweh saves.” This is commented on by Matt 1:21, “because he will save his people from their sins.”⁴⁶ His mission, his raison d’être, his work are expressed in his name: Savior by antonomasia, the center of history, Die Mitte der Zeit. Pilate presents him as “Jesus, called the Christ” (Matt 27:17), and the crowds acclaim him as a king coming in the name of the Lord (Luke 19:38; cf. 1Tim 1:17; 6:15); but faith confesses that “God has sovereignly exalted him and given him a Name that is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow in the heavens, on the earth, and under the earth.”⁴⁷

In the Magnificat, the Virgin Mary sets her motherhood in relation with OT soteria. She “rejoices in God [her] Savior.”⁴⁸ Jesus, forgiving the sins of the guilty (Luke 7:48; cf. 5:24) and proclaiming deliverance to the captives (Luke 4:18), lays down that he has come “to seek and to save that which was lost” (Luke 19:10; cf. 5:32; 15:7, 10, 24, 32), which St. John takes to mean the whole world and the gift of eternal life (John 3:17; 4:42; 10:9; cf. 5:34). St. Peter specifies: “Salvation is in no other” (Acts 4:12), because he is the head (archegos) of the whole economy of salvation (Acts 5:31; 13:23; Heb 2:10; 5:9). As he is the head of the church, he is thereby also “Savior of the body” (Eph 5:24); even Israel will be saved (Rom 11:26).

The Pastoral Epistles insist: “God wishes all people to be saved” (1Tim 2:4) without distinction of race, group, or qualities, because he is all goodness and beneficence (Titus 3:4); “the living God is the Savior of all people, especially those who believe” (1Tim 4:10); “Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners” (1:15). It is “our great God and Savior”⁴⁹ that was manifested (2Tim 1:10), bringing grace and peace (Titus 1:4) in superabundance (Titus 3:6).

VI. Soterios. — This adjective, very common in the LXX (nearly 140 occurrences), means “saving, preserving, salutary, helpful”; often used as a noun, it refers to things,⁵⁰ animals,⁵¹ and people.⁵² The five NT occurrences all have a religious meaning.⁵³ The first two are quotations of Isa 40:5 by Simeon: “My eyes have seen your salvation” (Luke 2:30; 3:6); in this context, this instrument of soteria (T. Sim. 7.1; Dan 5:10) is “almost a personification of the Savior” (M. J. Lagrange, on this text). The “salvation of God” sent to the pagans, according to Acts 28:28, is the preaching of the gospel, the means of access to the kingdom of God.⁵⁴ The grace of God that saves all people (charis tou theou soterios) that has appeared⁵⁵ in a way personifies charis, because it evokes the manifestation of the Son of God, the Savior, from his incarnation and his death to his resurrection; a gift of the Father.

¹ W. Foerster, on this word, in TDNT, vol. 7, p. 965 (we shall borrow many references from the rich documentation in this article); cf. W. Wagner, “Über σωζω und seine Derivate im N.T.,” in ZNW, 1905, pp. 205–235; J. B. Colon, “La Conception du salut d’après les Evangiles synoptiques,” in RSR, 1929, pp. 472–507; 1930, pp. 1–38, 189–217; 370–415; 1931, pp. 27–70, 193–223, 382–412; J. T. Ross, The Conception of Soteria in the New Testament, 1947; R. M. Wilson, “Soteria,” in SJT, 1953, pp. 406–416; M. Goguel, “Le Caractère à la fois actuel et futur du salut dans la théologie paulinienne,” in W. D. Davies, D. Daube, The Background of the New Testament and its Eschatology, pp. 322–341; W. C. van Unnik, “L’Usage de σωζειν ‘Sauver’ et de ses dérivés dans les Evangiles synoptiques,” in J. Cambier et al., La Formation des Evangiles (Recherches bibliques 2), Brussels, 1957, pp. 178–194; reprinted, idem, Sparsa Collecta, Leiden, 1973, pp. 16–34; F. Bovon, “Le Salut dans les écrits de Luc,” in RTP, 1973, pp. 296–307; idem, Luc le théologien, Neuchâtel-Paris, 1978, pp. 259–284; A. George, “L’Emploi chez Luc du vocabulaire de salut,” in NTS, vol. 23, 1976–77, pp. 308–320. Very good classification of usages in BAGD, on this word.

² Our lexicographic research is not tied to theological notions.

³ Homer, Il. 8.500: “Darkness saved the army from extermination”; 15.290: “a god saved Hector”; Plato, Symp. 220 d, wounded, “I owe my salvation to no one in this world except this man. . . . He saved both my weapons and myself.” A soldier of Antiochus writes to a centurion at Dura that he was saved from the Parthians and the Persians (ε—σωθη ὑπὸ τω—ν βαρβάρων, P.Dura 46, 14); SB 8863, 4; 8864, 3: σωθεῖς ε—κ Τρωγοδυτῶν; “Caesar saved Cleopatra’s life when he conquered her kingdom” (P.Oxy. 33, verso, col. V, 12). In 278, the amphyctiones of Delphi instituted an annual feast for “the salvation of the Greeks,” the Soteria, to commemorate the victory won over the Galatians (Dittenberger, Syl. 402, 408, 424, 431, 690; Or. 150; SEG II, 339; SB 8766. The epigraphical documentation has been collected by G. Nachtergaele, Les Galates et les Sôtéria de Delphes, Brussels, 1977, pp. 401ff.). The Sicyonians celebrated the death of Aratus with a sacrifice called soteria, offered by the priest of Zeus Soter (Plutarch, Arat. 53.5). In the combats in the amphitheater, Ajax saved (spared) many lives (ψυχὰς πολλὰς σώσαντα; L. Robert, Gladiateurs, p. 113, n. 55, 5), as did Olympus at Larissa (πολλοὺς ε—ν σταδίοις σώσας, ibid., p. 115, n. 56, 3). When a gladiator asked Caracalla to save his life, the emperor refused; “so perished this athlete, whose adversary might perhaps have saved his life” (Dio Cassius 77.19).

⁴ Homer, Od. 5.130; cf. Lucian, Dial. D. 26.2; Merc. Cond. 1: “I heard them speak of their shipwreck and their unhoped-for salvation.”

⁵ E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 164, 4; cf. 175, col. I, 34: “When the men perished, thrown from the broken ships, behold, they were all saved when they called upon your help” (Hymn to Isis); BGU 423, 8: “When I was in danger on the sea, he saved me right away.”

⁶ IGUR, n. 124, 3.

⁷ Homer, Il. 9.393: “If the gods save me and I return to my country”; Epictetus 2.17.37; Plutarch, Apoph. Iac. 11: “a happily completed return”; P.Brem. 20, 15: “After several days, if the gods protect us, I will come to you.” A dedication to “Pan of the Right Road, for Timouthes . . . and for the salvation of his brothers, for their happy fate” (A. Bernand, Koptos, n. 177). — One can be “saved” from a legal conviction; the job of judges is to “punish the godless and save the innocent” (Andocides, Myst. 31); by asking Archidamos to defend his father, Cleonymos saved him (Xenophon, Hell. 5.4.26). Cf. the good outcome of an affair, P.Mich. 507, 9–10; P.Tebt. 762, 6; SB 8994, 11: τὴν τω—ν πραγματω—ν σωτηρίαν, P.Cair.Zen. 59844, 6; P.Col.Zen. 9, 29; PSI 1241, 7; Menander, Dysk. 840: “interest shows the way to salvation” (ει—ς σωτηρίαν).

⁸ Dittenberger, Syl. 528, 620, 943; I.Cret. I, p. 249, n. 4 C 24; II, chap. III, p. 16, n. 3; IV, n. 168, 11ff., 15ff. N. van Brock, Vocabulaire médical, pp. 230ff., quotes numerous texts from Hippocrates and Galen and shows that “save” means “make it through, preserve, live”; σωτηρία is the opposite of ὄλεθρον or θάνατος; σώζομαι is the opposite of ἀπόλλυμαι or ἀποθνήσκω. Menander, Dysk. 661, 726: an old man who has fallen to the bottom of a well is saved; Philo, Decalogue 12: “good physicians safeguard their patients”; Joseph 76; Unchang. God 66; Sacr. Abel and Cain 123; Spec. Laws 1.224; Drunkennes 140: health causes the saving (of life); Husbandry 98; Josephus, Ant. 4.277: “If the stricken one heals” (σωθέντος); 17.172: Herod, ill, “had no more hope of recovery.”

⁹ J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. XIV, 17. Decree of Delphi for a physician from Corone, J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1955, p. 229, n. 123.

¹⁰ P.Hamb. 88, 3; cf. 89, 5; P.Gron. 18, 13; C.P.Herm. 5, 9; P.Mich. 209, 10; 212, 9; 219, 21; 465, 36; 466, 9, 34; 476, 22; 478, 16 (σέσωμαι = I have been cured); 479, 6, 9; 481, 12; 482, 26; 484, 10; 491, 12; 498, 23; 499, 5: “Every day I offer prayers for your good health . . . that you may be saved for many years”; 502, 14, 19; 503, 7; 510, 10; 514, 26; P.Mil.Vogl. 24, 7; P.Oxy. 939, 20; 1664, 1; 1666, 9; 1766, 9; 2551, 6; 2609, 11; 2788, 3; 3065, 3; 3067, 9; PSI 206, 13; 1414, 16; 1425, 7; 1427, 11; P.Brem. 60, 4, 61, 16, 17, 35, 55; P.Amh. 35, 32: “Your life was saved in sickness by the great god Soknopaeus”; P.Haun. 10, 9; P.Yale 79, 19; SB 6222, 8; 6263, 9; 7353, 12; 9722, 7; 10277, 9; 10651, H 4; 10652, B 12; 10724, 26, etc.

¹¹ SB 6087, 6; 0034, 12; NCIG, n. II, 18–19: “The good effects of the ceremony for the health and the salvation of the council and the people”; I.Bulg. 1116, 5–6; IGUR, n. 299; A. Bernand, Pan, n. 60, 2–3; Philo, Worse Attacks Better 72; Drunkennes 141; Heir 297; Spec. Laws 1.343.

¹² Themistocles to Xerxes, “You will save your suppliant, or else you will cause the loss of a man who has become the enemy of the Greeks” (Plutarch, Them. 28.4); Jos. Asen. 28.16.

¹³ Plutarch, Cat. Min. 66.2: “If I wished to be saved by Caesar’s favor.”

¹⁴ When the Nile floods were deficient, King Ptolemy II and the queen renounced certain taxes “for the salvation of the people” (Dittenberger, Or. 56, 17); cf. Epictetus 3.23.11; I.Thas. 339, 9: “Blessed gods, assure the safety of my brothers who are still living”; epitaph of Heras of Memphis: “Fortuna will preserve you throughout your life” (σώσει πάντα Τύχη βίοτον, E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques 68, 16 = SB 7423); P.Sarap. 89, 14: “May the gods preserve us from our enemies” (cf. SB 6222, 22); P.Oxy. 1644, 2: “I greet you, praying that you may be saved and may prosper with all those of your household.”

¹⁵ Lucian, Peregr. 33; P.Oxy. 935, 7: “With the help of the gods, our brother is safe and sound”; 3065, 5; P.Oslo 148, 4; SB 8434, 4: “The Nile preserves fertile Egypt each year”; 9598, 4. Cf. save from famine (P.Tebt. 56, 11; Jos. Asen. 4.8). Σώζω is contrasted with διαφθείρω, cf. Epictetus 1.28.21: “safeguard the modesty and fidelity”; Democritus, frag. 43, in Diels, Fragmente der Vorsokratiker, vol. 2, 155, 13ff.

¹⁶ Cf. Musonius, frag. 36 (ed. C. E. Lutz, p. 134): “Those who wish to remain and be in good health (τοὺς σώζεσθαι μέλλοντας) must live as if they were following a perpetual regimen”; Plutarch, De adul. et am. 11: φάρμακον σω—ζον = salutary medicine; cf. 36; Dio Chrysostom, Or. 32, 15: the water of Alexandria is healthful; Dittenberger, Syl. 717, 89: διετήρησεν πάντας ὑγιαίνοντας καὶ σωζομένους; 826, II, 14; BGU 423.

¹⁷ “. . . has fulfilled his vow for the prosperity of Kallistos, his wife, and his children” (IGLS 2223), 2502, 2697, 2709; cf. 2005, 2028, 2035, 2037, 2038, 2104, 2144, 2905, 2931, 2932, 2939; I.Bulg. 288, 374, 1537, 1851; 1864; IGUR, n. 119. CII 852, 964, 1438; B. Lifshitz, Synagogues juives, n. 32; 67; 76, 6; 77 c. Socrates was saved from dishonor not by flight but by death (Epictetus 4.1.165; cf. 163). According to Ps.-Plutarch, even while enduring sorrow those who are in mourning must “take care to treat our persons well and see to the well-being of those who live with us” (Cons. ad Apoll. 32).

¹⁸ IGLS 499, 1; 2560, 1; 2727, 2–3; 2744, 2745 bis; I.Bulg. 678, 6; 900, 2; 1374, 2; 1527, 2; 2000, 2; 2013, 2; 2016, 2; 2032, 2; 2027, 2; NCIG, n. 32, 2; P.Oxy. 138, 24; P.Michael. 55, C 3; P.Ness. 21, 22; 22, 12; SB 4282, 8320, 8324, 9863; IGUR, n. 122, 155, 158, 189, 190.

¹⁹ Dittenberger, Syl. 761, A 11: “He did not cease to save (do good for) cities and people” (48–47 BC); 589, 26–31; Ep. Arist. 240: “God gave the legislators their ideas with the intention of saving (causing to prosper) the lives of people”; 281, 292. The sovereign is “the one who saves everything” (Dio Chrysostom, Or. 62, 4); in his benevolence and philanthropy “he sees to the welfare (soteria) and prosperity of his subjects” (ibid. 3, 39). “The king must be able to save his people and do them good” (Musonius, frag. 8; ed. C. E. Lutz, p. 60). I.Did. 424, 20: “The city will remain safe and sound”; J. Pouilloux, Choix, n. VIII, 3, 5: “For the salvation of our fellow-citizens”; E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques 64, 9: epitaph of the scribe Ammonius, who died for the salvation of his country (πατρίδα σώζων πάτθανες[sic]); P.Ness. 52, 1.

²⁰ Dio Chrysostom, Or. 12.29; Plutarch, De comm. not. 31; Marcus Aurelius 10.1.3: “Everything is sent you from the gods . . . and everything that they will grant for the preservation of the perfect being.” Isis is “able to save the universe” (SB 8671, 4 and 7). M. Santoro, Epitheta Deorum in Asia Graeca Cultorum, Milan, 1974, pp. 271ff.

²¹ The philosophical mysteries free from death, promise the soul, which is assured of immortality, a return to God, and thus guarantee salvation, a blessed life in the next world, cf. A. J. Festugière, Monde gréco-romain, pp. 167–184; F. Cumont, Symbolisme funéraire, pp. 425ff.

²² Menander, Dysk. 203: “Most venerable gods, who could deliver me from my toils (σω—σαι τω—ν πόνων)?” makes no appeal to the gods, unlike Christian prayers: Κύριε σω—σον ἡμα—ς ἀπὸ ἀδίκων (SB 8065; cf. P.Lond. 1923, 7). Nevertheless, cf. this invocation to Mandoulis: σώζε με (SB 8511, 8).

²³ Ps 12:6—“I will arise, says Yahweh; I will establish in safety the one who longs for it”; 28:9—“Yahweh, save your people . . . shepherd them”; 60:7—“Save us by your right hand”; Isa 45:17—“Israel will be saved by Yahweh, saved forever”; 48:3; 49:8; 60:16; 63:9.

²⁴ Heir 60; Post. Cain 156; Spec. Laws 1.252: τῆς σωτηρίας αἴτιον; 2.198; Rewards 34; Abraham 137, 176; Migr. Abr. 124. That God is Savior is an article of faith (Sacr. Abel and Cain 70). “It belongs to God to assure the salvation of the good irresistibly” (Virtues 47; cf. To Gaius 196; Dittenberger, Or. 665, 54, τοῦς σώζοντας ἀνεπηρεάστους). God saves from the dangers of the sea (Joseph 149) and journeys (145).

²⁵ Jer 4:14. This is why Yahweh “redeems” his people and will save them at the end times, cf. 1QM 14.10; 1QH 3.19; 15.16.

²⁶ To heal the sick is to save them (Mark 3:4; 6:56; Luke 6:9; 7:3; 8:50; Acts 4:9, 12; 14:9; John 11:12; Jas 5:15), especially by means of miracles—“He saved others” (Matt 27:42; Mark 15:31; Luke 23:35-39)—but these are signs of the saving power of the wonderworker (A. George, Etudes sur l'oeuvre de Luc, Paris, 1978, pp. 134ff.). An escort conducts Paul to Caesarea “safe and sound” (Acts 23:24); the centurion Julius wishes to save Paul (Acts 27:34). People are saved from calamities (Mark 13:20; cf. Acts 7:25; Jude 5), from demons (Luke 8:36), from the flood (Heb 11:7; cf. 1Pet 3:20), especially from storms (Matt 8:25; 14:30; Acts 27:30ff.), and from death (Matt 27:49; Mark 15:30-31; Luke 23:39; John 12:27; Heb 5:7).

²⁷ —Απόλεια, ἀπολέσαι (Matt 8:25; Mark 8:35; Luke 15:4-6, 8, 24, 32; 1Cor 1:18; 8:11; 2Cor 2:15; Jas 4:12); cf. Jude 23, snatch from the flames;

J. C. Fenton, "Destruction and Salvation in the Gospel According to St. Mark," in JTS, vol. 3, 1952, pp. 56–58.

²⁸ Matt 9:22; Mark 5:34; 10:52; Luke 7:50; 8:12, 48; 18:42; Acts 2:21; 14:9; 1Tim 2:15; 1Pet 1:5. Baptism (Mark 16:16; Titus 3:5; 1Pet 3:21). Cf. M. Barth, C. K. Barrett, Foi et salut selon S. Paul (AnBib 42), Rome, 1970.

²⁹ Mark 13:13—"The one who perseveres to the end will be saved"; Luke 21:19; cf. Rev 2:10.

³⁰ 1Cor 3:15; 5:5; Heb 2:3; 6:9; 1Pet 4:18. One must practice good works (1Tim 4:16), know the truth (1Tim 2:4) and the Holy Scriptures (2Tim 3:15), pray (Rom 10:1, 11:14).

³¹ Luke 13:23; 18:26. Cf. C. Spicq, "Le ciel est-il moins peuplé que l'enfer?" in Théologie morale, vol. 1, pp. 473–479.

³² Rom 1:16; cf. 5:10; 1Cor 1:18; 2Thess 2:14; 2Tim 4:18. Salvation accomplished is entrance into the kingdom of God (1Cor 6:9; 15:50; Gal 5:21; 2Tim 4:18), the heavenly city (Heb 13:14), an inheritance (Titus 3:7; Heb 1:14; 1Pet 1:4; 3:7, 9), glory (Eph 1:18; 2Tim 2:12; 1Pet 4:13; 5:4, 10), being crowned (2Tim 4:8), the transformation of the body (1Cor 15:43–53; Phil 3:20), immortality (2Tim 1:10), the accomplishment of our conformity to Christ (Rom 8:29; Phil 3:30ff.), happiness (Rom 8:18; 1Cor 2:9; 2Cor 1:6), etc.

³³ Dittenberger, Syl. 985, 60–62; cf. 408, 6ff.; Aeschylus, Suppl. 27: "protect the homes of the just"; Eum. 760: "Savior God . . . grant me safety"; Pindar, Ol. 5.17; Xenophon, An. 1.8.16; Menander, Dysk. 690; SB 7905; E. B. Allo, "Les dieux-sauveurs du paganisme gréco-romain," in RSPT, 1926, pp. 5–34; cf. O. Höfer, "Soter," in W. H. Roscher, Lexikon für gr. und röm. Mythologie, vol. 4, col. 1236–1272.

³⁴ Asclepius "provides for the salvation of eternal beings as for that which is in a state of becoming" (Aelius Aristides, Orat. 42.4); I. Bulg. 1304, 1831. On an amulet: εἰς Ζεὺς Σέραπις ε—πιφανής —Ασκήπιος σωτήρ (E. Peterson, EIS'EOΣ, Göttingen, 1926, p. 237; cf. 238, 246ff.). He heals the sick (Dittenberger, Syl. 1172; cf. F. J. Dölger, Antike und Christentum, Münster i. W., 1950, pp. 255–266).

³⁵ SEG VIII, 548, 26: σώζονθ ἅπαντες; 34 (with the commentary of V. F. Vanderlip, Four Greek Hymns, pp. 31ff.); 24.1170: Ἴσι καὶ ἄλλαις θεαι—ς ται—ς σωζούσαις; Dittenberger, Syl. 1132; SB 2136; 3926, 12; 8671, 7: "able to save the universe"; 9616, recto, 8. Act of adoration: "I, Ptolemaeus, have in the presence of the very great goddess, our savior Lady Isis, performed this act of adoration for my children and those who love me” (A. Bernand, Philae I, n. 59); Isis, “immortal savior” (σώτειρᾶθανάτη, E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 26; cf. 165, 5); A. Bernand, Koptos, n. 154, 1–2; Y. Grandjean, Aréologie d’Isis, pp. 26, 29; P. Roussel, Les Cultes égyptiens à Délos, Nancy, 1916, 49, 194; L. Vidman, Sylloge inscriptionum religionis Isiaca et Sarapiacae, Berlin, 1969, n. 179, 247, 261: σωθῆς ε—κ νόσου. Cf. H. Haerens, “Σωτήρ et σωτηρία,” in Studia Hellenistica, vol. 5, Louvain-Leiden, 1948, pp. 57–68.

³⁶ Herodotus 7.139: “the Athenians, saviors of Greece”; Plato, Symp. 209 d: “Lycurgus, savior of Lacedaemon and, we may say, of Greece”; Leg. 4.704 d: “there would have to be a great savior and divine legislators”; at Corinth, those who wish to restore the laws would be “saviors of the country” (Xenophon, Hell. 4.4.6); a title that Aratus deserved on this account (Plutarch, Arat. 14 and 42). Joseph is “king of the whole country, its savior and supplier of wheat” (Jos. Asen. 25.6). Cf. in the LXX, the judges “procured deliverance” (Judg 3:9, 15). The Galileans name Josephus “benefactor and savior of their country” (Josephus, Life 244; cf. 259; War 1.625; 3.459;7.71).

³⁷ He had treated Sparta considerately (Plutarch, Cleom. 24). Solon saved Athens (Aristotle, Ath. Pol. 11). Plutarch explains: “The Greeks have given surnames drawn from an accomplishment, such as Soter (savior) or Kallinikos (victorious); from a physical distinctive, like Physcon (potbellied) and Grypos (hook-nosed); from a virtue, like Euergetes (beneficent) and Philadelphos (brotherly); from a success, like Eudaimon (happy), the surname of Baltos II” (Cor. 11.2).

³⁸ Dittenberger, Syl. 814, 34; 843, 20; 943; Or. 194, 15ff. Through his teaching, Epicurus brought interior freedom (P.Hercul. 346, 4, 19). References in A. J. Festugière, Idéal religieux, p. 74.

³⁹ Plutarch ridicules those lawmakers and generals who have themselves called euergetai, kallinikoi (victorious), soteres (Plutarch, De Alex. fort. 2.5; Arist. 6). Jesus rejects these honors (Luke 22:25). Certain people refuse them “in order not to stir up jealousy” (Philostratus, VA 4.31) or because they are “dangerous for the soul” (Ps.-Callisthenes 2.22.12, ed. Kroll, p. 98).

⁴⁰ P.Oxy. 41, 22; cf. Chariton, Chaer. 1.1.11: “Noble Hermocrates, great general, save Chaereas: this will be your main claim to glory.”

⁴¹ It is a special term in the vocabulary of the chancelleries (cf. P. Collomb, Recherches sur la Chancellerie et la Diplomatie des Lagides, Paris, 1926, pp. 98, 101, 123, 127, 139) of the Lagids and Seleucids from Ptolemy I Soter (Pausanias 1.8.6; Dittenberger, Syl. 390, 624; cf. 56, 11, 18; 839, 7–9; Or. 90, 9; 168–173; 219, 36–38); Ptolemy II Soter (SB 1569, PSI 383); Euergetes I Soter (P.Petr. 8 [1] B, 1ff.); Antiochus I of Commagene (IGLS 25; 26, 15); Demetrius Soter (ibid. 1071 A b); Seleucus III (ibid. 1184, A 16); Antiochus IV (Dittenberger, Or. 263); Demosthenes, Corona 43, the Athenians: φίλον, εὐεργέτην, σωτήρα τὸν Φίλιππον ἠγοῦντο; Josephus, Ant. 12.261; Plutarch, De Alex. fort. 2.5; Appian, BCiv. 2.106.

⁴² Fouilles de Delphes III, 2, 70, 45–46: cult offered τοι—ς ἄλλοις θεοι—ς καὶ εὐεργέταις. Cf. P. Wendland, “Σωτήρ,” in ZNW, 1904, pp. 335–353; D. Magie, De Romanorum Juris Publici Sacrique Vocabulis Sollemnibus in Graecum Sermonem Conversis, Leipzig, 1905; L. R. Taylor, The Divinity of the Roman Emperor, Middleton, 1931; W. Schubart, “Das hellenistische Königsideal nach Inschriften und Papyri,” in APF, 1937, pp. 1–26; A. D. Nock, “Soter and Euergetes,” in S. E. Johnson, The Joy of Study (Papers . . . to honor F. C. Grant), New York, 1951, pp. 126–148; E. Stauffer, Le Christ et les Césars, Colmar-Paris, 1956; L. Cerfaux, J. Tondriau, Culte des souverains; D. Cuss, Imperial Cult and Honorary Terms in the New Testament, Fribourg, 1974.

⁴³ This is what is expressed best in the treatises “On Kingship” of the Pythagoreans Ecphantus, Sthenidas, and Diotogenes (in Stobaeus, Flor. 48.7; vol. 4, pp. 263ff.) translated with commentary by L. Delatte, Les Traités de la royauté d’Ecphante, Diotogène et Sthénidas, Paris, 1942. The king is supplied by God and administers his largess, participates in and imitates God’s beneficence; he must “save” the lives of his subjects as the pilot saves the ship, the driver his coach, the physician his patients. Likewise Philo, Moses 1.148–163; 2.2–9; Spec. Laws 4.164, 184–188. Cf. C. Lacombrade, Le Discours sur la royauté de Synésios de Cyrène, Paris, 1951; Le Culte des souverains dans l’Empire romain (Entretiens sur l’antiquité classique 19, Fondation Hardt), Vandoeuvres-Geneva, 1973.

⁴⁴ I.Priene 105, 35ff. = Dittenberger, Or. 458; the inscription is translated into French by J. Rouffiac (Caractères du grec, pp. 72ff.), who comments: “It probably would not have required much touching up of this text for a Christian to be able to apply it to Christ fifty years later. A savior who realizes ancestral hopes; who has a unique importance for humanity; who is so great that he will never be surpassed; whose birth marks the beginning of a new era: so many descriptions that one might think were created by Christian piety, but which nevertheless are found in a pagan inscription from not long before the birth of Jesus.” In his edict from AD 68, Tiberius Julius Alexander: “So that with great confidence you may expect everything, salvation (soteria) as well as material happiness, from the benefactor (euergetou) Augustus, Emperor Galba, who shone forth upon us for the good of the human race . . . I have decreed” (BGU 1563, 16–17); an inscriptions from Halicarnassus, in GIBM IV, 1, n. 894 (= V. Ehrenberg, A. H. M. Jones, Documents Illustrating the Reigns of Augustus and Tiberius, Oxford, 1955, n. 98 a); SB 9528, 7 (Vespasian), ε—ξ ἀρχῆς ε—ξ αἰρέτων σώζων; 8987, 39; IGUR, n. 6, 24, 32, 105. —The “salvation” procured by the emperor extends to the whole universe; Caesar is σωτήρ τῆς οἰ—κουμένης (IG XII, 5, 557); κοινὸν τοῦ ἀνθρωπίνου βίου σωτήρα (C. Börker, R. Merkelbach, I.Ephes., Bonn, 1979, n. 251, 6–7), like Hadrian: τω—σωτήρι καὶ εὐεργέτη τοῦ κόσμου παντός (I.Salam., n. 13, 92, 101 e; C. Börker, R. Merkelbach, I.Ephes., n. 271 f; 274, 8; cf. C. Habicht, Die Inschriften des Asklepieions, Berlin, 1969, n. 7); Marcus Aurelius (ibid. 10; SEG XIX, 758, 13); Gordian III (CIL 10079); θεὸν ε—πιφανῆ καὶ κοινὸν τοῦ ἀνθρωπίνου βίου σωτήρα (Dittenberger, Syl. 760, 7, at Ephesus in AD 48); a Ptolemy πάντων σωτήρα (P.Petr. 8, 2 = 20, 1, 15; cf. 1Tim 4:10); Nero, τω—σωτήρι καὶ εὐεργέτητι τῆς οἰ—κουμένης (APF, vol. 2, p. 434, n. 24; cf. vol. 6 p. 283); σωτήρ τοῦ κόσμου (Dittenberger, Or. 668; cf. John 4:42; 1John 4:14); Galba, ὁ παντὸς ἀνθρώπων γένους εὐεργέτης (BGU 1513, 16); Caracalla (I.Bulg., 632, 7; C.Pap.Jud. 450; C. Börker, R. Merkelbach, n. 298, 9; cf. I.Thas., 180, 8–9); Trajan (IG XII, 1, 978); cf. Isis, able to save the universe, ε—κώζεν κόσμον (SB 8671, 4); praise is extended to prefects (Philo, Flacc. 126; SEG VI, 14; MAMA VI, 103; P.Oslo 127; P.Mich. 422, 32; 582, col. II, 14), but the term can mean simply “protector” (P.Oxy. 38, 18: “I turn to you, my defender [τὸν σητήρα], to obtain my rights,” AD 49–50).

⁴⁵ Luke 1:31; cf. 2:21. Savior and salvation are mentioned six times in the Gospel’s birth narrative, 1:47 (cf. Hab 3:18); 1:69 (Ps 18:3; cf. 1Sam 2:10); 1:71 (Ps. 106, 10); 1:77; 2:11—“There is born to you today . . . a Savior, who is Christ the Lord”; 3:6—ὄψεται πα—σα σὰρξ τὸ σωτήριον τοῦ εοῦ.

⁴⁶ W. L. Dulière, “Inventaire de quarante-et-un porteurs du nom de Jésus dans l’histoire juive écrite en grec,” in NovT, 1959, pp. 180, 217. The Epistle to the Hebrews will be the most precise theological commentary on Matt 1:21—The Son of God “made purification for sins” (Heb 1:3). He manifested himself on the earth “to take away sins” (9:26, 28; 10:12). He is a high priest who officiates “in order to expiate the sins of the people” (2:17; 5:1; 7:27). That is to say, the title “Savior” is applied to Christ as a function of his expiatory death (Matt 26:29). “While the Soter title does grow out of the Kyrios title, it nevertheless emphasizes an idea which is not a prominent part of the Kyrios concept: the idea that the exaltation of Christ to divine Soter very definitely presupposes his work of atonement” (O. Cullmann, Christology of the New Testament, p. 243, referring to Phil 2:9). Cf. idem, Salvation in History, trans. S. G. Sowers et al., New York, 1967).

⁴⁷ Phil 2:9-10. Cf. the doxology in Jude 25: “To the only God, our Savior . . . by Jesus Christ, before all time, now, and for ever! Amen.” V. Taylor, The Names of Jesus, London, 1953, pp. 5ff. L. Sabourin, Les Noms et titres de Jésus, Bruges-Paris, 1963, pp. 135–146.

⁴⁸ Luke 1:47. In the history of Israel, God saved/liberated his people from their enemies (Exod 14:3; Isa 63:8; Ps 106:8, 10, 21), gaining victory and security (2Sam 8:6, 14; 23:10, 12; 2Kgs 18:30-35; 19:34), just as he saved Noah (Wis 10:4). He promises to send the Messiah-King (Jer 23:6), saving and purifying his people (Ezek 34:22; 36:29; Isa 35:4; 63:1) to the ends of the earth (Isa 49:6), and this will be the joy of salvation (Isa 12:2; 25:9; 52:7; Jer 31:7; Ps 51:14), liberation by the Christ (Zech 9:9). This salvation, for the person of faith, is a gift of God (Ps 44:8). He himself is salvation (Ps. 27:1; 35:3; 62:7) for his servants (Ps 91:14) who hope in him (Sus 60), the poor (Ps 34:7; 109:31), the humble (Ps 18:28; 76:10; 149:4), the small (Ps 116:6), those who are upright in heart (Ps 7:11). So he is the “Savior God” (Sir 51:1; 1Macc 4:36); the “God of my salvation” (Ps 51:16), of all the weak (Jdt 9:11), the eternal Savior (Bar 4:22) and Savior of all (Wis 16:7); and as such he is invoked in prayer: ὦ Κύριε, σω—σον δή (Ps 118:25; 106:47; Jer 17:14; Jos. Asen. 12.11; cf. R. Pautrel, “Jugement,” in DBSup, vol. 4, col. 1337ff. W. Trilling, “Salut,” in H. Fries, Encyclopédie de la foi, Paris, 1967, vol. 4, pp. 175ff.). “And all flesh shall see the salvation of God” (Luke 3:6).

⁴⁹ Titus 2:13; cf. 2Pet 1:1; 3:18. The Pastorals borrow a number of terms from the court and religious vocabularies of the period, cf. C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, pp. 251, 640; C. Spicq, Agapè, p. 31, n. 3.

⁵⁰ Eph 6:17—“the helmet of salvation” = means of preservation (cf. Isa 59:17); Wis 1:14—“The products of nature have salutary effects” (σωτήριος contrasted with ὄλεθρος, mortal); Aeschylus, Suppl. 213: “I salute the saving rays of the sun”; Josephus, War 3.171: walls are “a means of salvation for a city”; IGLS 2524, 2; a tower = a refuge (ibid. 1630, 4); Philo, To Gaius 151, the sanctuary of Augustus at Alexandria is “hope of salvation for those who those who are on the run and for those who enter the door”; 190: “nature is salutary”; P.Cair.Isid. 1, 6 (= SB 7622): the prefect Aristius Optatus suppresses ruinous practices and fixes a salutary rule (τύπον σωτήριον) to which one must conform; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 9, 7: τὸν νόμον αἰ5 σωτήριον. Philo uses soterios, “means of salvation” (Joseph 13), regarding education (Plant. 144), the good (Husbandry 99), passivity

(Abraham 102), hesychia (Sobr. 50), food (Migr. Abr. 36; Dreams 1.58), government (Dreams 2.154), for “the salutary flame of virtue” (Heir 37), reason that heals the sufferings of the soul (Dreams 1.112), prudence (Worse Attacks Better 45), sophrosyne (Alleg. Interp. 2.105). He associates this adjective with “useful” (Alleg. Interp. 3.76; Joseph 55; Spec. Laws 4.181).

⁵¹ Xenophon, Eq. 3.12: in war, the horse is very “salutary” for the horseman.

⁵² Thucydides 7.64.2: the warrior must “show his courage, as much for his own personal interest as for the salvation of all” (τοι—ς ξύμπασι σωτήριος). Military conscription (I.Thas. 182, 7).

⁵³ In the OT, soterios was a description for peace offerings (Sir 35:1; 47:2; cf. 1Macc 4:56); σωτήρια ἔθυσε (Dittenberger, Or. 4, 43; cf. Syl. 384, 213; 391, 22). S. Daniel, Recherches sur le vocabulaire du culte dans la Septante, Paris, 1966, pp. 275–285. In a Christian letter, the “common salvation” (?) depends on divine providence (P.Oxy. 1492, 6).

⁵⁴ Cf. Musonius, frag. 49 (ed. Lutz, p. 142): from the mouths of philosophers one receives things “said to be useful and salutary and which bring a remedy for error and vice”; Corp. Herm. 10.15: “This alone is salutary for man: the knowledge of God”; Philo, Dreams 1.147: the words that God utters “through love of humans and compassion for our species” stir up a “saving inspiration” and give new life; Joseph 73: salutary speeches.

⁵⁵ Titus 2:11; cf. Philo, Dreams 2.149: “The saving mercy of God” delivers our race, subject to death; Conf. Tongues 171, the Powers of God “protect (σωτηρίους) that which is created. His right hand and his might are helpful to the human race” (Unchang. God 73; Decalogue 177; Plant. 90; Virtues 49); because “the nature of God is to save” (ἡ σωτήριος φύσις, Conf. Tongues 181; cf. Heir 203); his gifts are beneficent and salutary (Virtues 133).

σωματικω—ς

somatikos, bodily, personally

somatikos, S 4985; EDNT 3.325; MM 621; L&N 8.2; BAGD 800; ND 3.86

In Christ the fullness of the godhead dwelled (Col 1:19) “bodily” (2:9). This is how somatikos is ordinarily translated,¹ with the understanding that the reference is to the resurrected body of Christ (Phil 3:21) or to the church, which is his body on earth. If the adverb is taken to mean “in a bodily fashion,” then we can compare Philo: “The priest ‘shall not be a man,’ according to Moses, when he enters the holy of holies. . . . This has to do not with the body, but with the movements of his soul.”² But how could the divinity be circumscribed or concentrated in Jesus? It would probably be better to translate “personally,” the meaning of the word in the only three papyri in which it is attested: the priests of Bacchias in 178 want to be freed of the leitourgia for the work on the dikes, which is in danger of becoming a personal chore for them (me agesthai somatikos epi ten ton chomaton apergasian, P.Lund III, 8, 15, republished in SB 8748); “that we may be freed from personally completing the work on the dikes”;³ finally, there is P.Fouad 13, 8, which A. Bataille restores to read somatikos apergazesthai hiereis.⁴

¹ It can also be taken to mean “truly, in reality,” as opposed to “symbolically”; cf. Plutarch, De def. or. 26.424 e: “We have yet to consider this center not as spatial but as material” (λείπεται τοίνυν τὸ μέσον οὐ τοπικῶ—ς ἀλλὰ σωματικῶ—ς λέγεσθαι). On Col 2:10, cf. M. J. Lagrange, “Les Origines du dogme paulinien de la divinité du Christ,” in RB, 1936, pp. 26–27; L. Cerfaux, La Théologie de l’Eglise suivant saint Paul, pp. 274–286; A. Feuillet, Le Christ sagesse de Dieu, pp. 225, 232, 286.

² Heir 84: οὐ σωματικῶ—ς, ἀλλὰ ται—ς κατὰ ψυχὴν κινήσεσιν. Cf. monetary or corporal punishment, Dittenberger, Or. 664, 17: κατὰ πα—ν ἢ ἀργυρικῶ—ς ἢ σωματικῶ—ς κολασθήσεται (first century); Vettius Valens (p. 231, 2): be afflicted in one’s body (καὶ σωματικῶ—ς ὀχλήθη); as an adjective, σωματικός in the sense of “manual,” εἴτ̄ ε—ν ἀργυρίῳ εἴτ̄ ε—ν σωματικαί—ς ε—ργασίαις (P.Fay. 21, 10) or “physical,” σωματικῆς ἀσθενίας (P.Flor. 51, 5), σωματικῶ—ν πόνων (Dittenberger, Syl. 708, 11).

³ Ὅπως ὑπεξαιρεθώ—μεν τοῦ σωματικῶ—ς ἀπεργάζεσθαι εἰ—ς τὰ χωματικὰ ἔργα; edited by E. H. Gilliam, “The Archives of the Temple of Soknobraisis at Bacchias,” in YCS, vol. 10, 1947, pp. 256–264.

⁴ This would seem to be the only possible meaning of T. Abr. B 7, where Abraham says to the archangel Michael, “Since I am going to leave my body, I would like to be taken up in person (σωματικῶ—ς ἤθελον ἀναληφθῆναι) to see the creatures that my God has made in heaven and on earth.” Cf. the meaning of the adjective σωματικός, “personal,” in P.Lond. IV, 1345, 21; 1367, 19 (eighth century).

σωφρονέω, σωφρονίζω, σωφρονισμός, σωφρόνως, σωφροσύνη, σῶφρων sophroneo, to be moderate, sober-minded, sensible, sane; sophronizo, to instill a sense of moderation, restore someone to his senses, instruct, train; sophronismos, having good judgment, of sound mind; sophronos, with good sense, with self-control; sophrosyne, prudence, moderation, sound judgment, decency, self-control, mastery of the passions; sophron, moderate, sensible

sophroneo, S 4993; TDNT 7.1097–1104; EDNT 3.329–330; NIDNTT 1.501–502; MM 622; L&N 30.22, 32.34; BAGD 802 | sophronizo, S 4994; TDNT 7.1104; EDNT 3.329–330; MM 622; L&N 33.229; BAGD 802 | sophronismos, S 4995; TDNTM 7.1104; EDNT 3.329–330; MM 622; L&N 32.34, 88.93; BAGD 802 | sophronos, S 4996; EDNT 3.329–330; NIDNTT 1.501–502; L&N 88.94; BAGD 802 | sophrosyne, S 4997; TDNT 7.1097–1104; EDNT 3.329–330; NIDNTT 1.494; MM 622; L&N 32.34, 88.93; BAGD 802 | sophron, S 4998; TDNTD 7.1097–1104; EDNT 3.329–330; NIDNTT 1.501–502; MM 622–623; L&N 88.94; BAGD 802; ND 4.151

These compounds of the verb phroneo—rare in the papyri, used abundantly in classical Greek and very common in the Hellenistic period, especially in the inscriptions—are, strictly speaking, untranslatable.¹ Deriving from sos-phren, they express first of all the idea of spiritual health, a correct or appropriate way of reasoning,² but also a sense of moderation,³ a moderation or reserve that is expressed in inner equilibrium.⁴ Hence sophroneo, “be moderate, sober-minded” (unknown in the LXX); with respect to an exorcised demoniac, “in his right mind” (Mark 5:15; Luke 8:35). It is used of Christians, who should be measured and reserved in their self-concept (Rom 12:3); of Paul, beside himself or euphoric in his relationship with God (exestemen) but reasonable and prudent (sophronoumen) in his relations with the Corinthians (2Cor 5:13); of the Cretans, who must be staid (sophronein peri panta, Titus 2:6); and of believers who are overly excited about the prospect of an immediate Parousia and are called to be calm (1Pet 4:7). Accused by Festus of being mad, the apostle replies, “I am speaking words of truth and good sense” (aletheias kai sophrosynes rhemata apophthengomai, Acts 26:25).

The Stoics treat sophrosyne as one of the four cardinal virtues,⁵ but it is especially identified with prudence (Esth 3:13 c; Wis 9:11, sophronos; Philo, Unchang. God 164), which is given to the apostles along with the spirit of power and of love,⁶ because it is a virtue of rulers.⁷ Sometimes it is contrasted with debauchery (akolasia), and it is confused with enkrateia (Philo, Good Man Free 67, 70, 159, 250–251; Plutarch, Alex. 21.11; 30.10–11; 47.8); it is the virtue of temperance that overcomes the passions.⁸ This nuance is that of the sophron nous, the temperate mind,⁹ and its account for the association of sophron with sobriety (1Tim 3:2; Titus 2:2; 1Pet 4:7) and chastity.¹⁰

Finally, sophrosyne —while connoting moderation and just measure—has to do with character and life conduct (sophrosyne tropon)¹¹ and so becomes a general virtue, the knowledge of what to do and what to avoid.¹² Not only is it of unparalleled nobility,¹³ but it expresses the purest Greek ideal (Plato, Cra. 411 e; Chrm. 159 bff.), and the honorific decrees always mention it as a characteristic of a good life, for example at Mylasa: “having lived with sophrosyne and in his youth having shown forth a perfect example of merit.”¹⁴ This explains the association of sophron and kosmios:¹⁵ the sophron has a feel for the proprieties (sophrosyne kekosmemenou, TAM, II, 288).

Sophrosyne is taught to children “as the virtue that is most appropriate for young people and the first of all virtues, an element of harmony, and productive of good.”¹⁶ Thus is it that educative (paideuoussa) grace teaches us to live “temperately, justly, and piously,”¹⁷ and that older Christian women must instruct the younger women in wisdom, teaching them to love their husbands and their children.¹⁸

The Pastoral Epistles require sophrosyne of the episkopos (1Tim 3:2; Titus 1:8) and of the older men,¹⁹ but they treat it primarily as a feminine virtue, whether with regard to dress,²⁰ chaste and reserved conduct,²¹ or even of the condition of salvation,²² which here seems to be the discretion and reserve that become women.²³ Sophrosyne had been attributed to women from the time of Semonides of Amorgos and Pythagoras: “The best virtue for woman is sophrosyne” (gynaikos de malista areta sophrosyna, in Stobaeus, Flor. 74; vol. 4, p. 589; cf. Flor. 44, 24, vol. 4, p. 154: gynaika de sophronein chre); “Honor sophrosyne, which is the distinctive virtue of women,”²⁴ especially young women;²⁵ certainly it includes modesty (Philo, Spec. Laws 1.138). Aristotle states that it is not the same virtue in women as in men.²⁶ After Musonius Rufus, Plutarch was the leading advocate of this feminine advancement in the first century AD (Mulier. virt. 20; Sol. 20.5; Cleom. 22.2), constantly attested in tomb inscriptions and in honorific decrees: Theophile, “a paragon of sophrosyne”;²⁷ the most illustrious Jullia Bassia, praised by the boule and demos of the Tauromenites;²⁸ or Tata, the high priestess of emperors, “adorned with all virtue and sophrosyne” (kekosmemenen pase arete kai sophrosyne, TAM II, 15, col. II, 9); Claudia, who was “pure in her love for her husband, unsurpassed in her love for her children, . . . indescribable in her sophrosyne” (philandria asynkritos, philoteknia anyperbletos, . . . sophrosyne adiegetos, ibid. 443; cf. 285); “adorned with nobility and sophrosyne and showing forth all womanly virtue” (eugeneia kai sophrosyne kekosmemene kai pasan gynaikeian areten apodeiknymene, ibid. III, 4). In the first century AD, the Roman people and merchants of Assos pay homage to the sophrosyne of Lollia Arlegilla (I.Assos, n. XIV, 2). Likewise the honorific decree paying homage to Stratonike, the wife of Attalos (ibid., pp. 33–34). A woman’s funerary epigram praises her as “chief of sophrosyne” (sophrosynes prytnis, W. Peek, in ZPE, vol. 24, 1977, p. 33). As in Titus 2:4-5, the components of sophrosyne are enumerated: philandria, philostorgia, eutaxia, eutechnia, eunoia.²⁹ The term always refers to a “well-ordered life,” a life above all suspicion and criticism,³⁰ an “honest woman,” the opposite of dissoluteness (Aristotle, Rh. 1.9.1366b; Plutarch, Luc. 1.1). The mores of such a woman are above reproach.³¹ Such was “the worthy Berous, daughter of Chrysippus, who was a Penelope in deed and not in fiction, chaste in her marriage (sophron en gamoteti), prudent despite her youth, a good mistress of her house and her life” (IGLS 721, 5; cf. 2371).

¹ A. J. Festugière, Idéal religieux, pp. 18, n. 2; 30, n. 1; idem, Dieu cosmique, pp. 292ff. On σωφροσύνη, cf. idem, Personal Religion, pp. 12ff. C. J. de Vries, “σωφροσύνη en grec classique,” in Mnemosyne, 1943, pp. 81–101; T. G. Tuckey, Plato’s Charmides, Cambridge, 1951; Luck, on this word, in TDNT, vol. 7, pp. 1097–1104; above all H. North, Sophrosyne, Ithaca, 1966.

² Aristophanes, Lys. 1098: show oneself to be reasonable; Ran. 853; Vesp. 1405, 1440: to have good sense; Thucydides 1.84.3: be able to discern; Philo, Virtues 14: “the correct name for this health is sophrosyne, which safeguards our ability to think”; its opposite is dissoluteness (Aristotle, Rh. 1.9.1366b).

³ Cf. V. Fontoynt, Vocabulaire grec, Villefranche-sur-Saône, 1930; C. Panagopoulos, Vocabulaire, pp. 212ff.

⁴ Philo, Unchang. God 164: “There is moderation (σωφροσύνη) between frivolous dissipation and ignoble greed”; Musonius, frags. 6, 18 B, and 24 (ed. C. E. Lutz, p. 54, line 15; p. 116, line 20; p. 130, line 9). Pompey was loved for “the simplicity of his way of life” (σωφροσύνη περὶ δίαιταν, Plutarch, Pomp. 1.4; cf. 16.2; Ant. 21.2); “ignorance joined with discretion (μετὰ σωφροσύνης) is better than cleverness without restraint” (Thucydides 3.37.3); “unreflective boldness was taken as courageous devotion, prudence as weakness, restraint (τὸ σω—φρον) as a mask for cowardice” (ibid. 3.82.4). It is in opposition to ὑβρις (ibid. 3.84.1) and refers to the element of measure in the artist’s skill (J. Cor. VIII, 3, n. 128 = SEG XIII, 226).

⁵ Musonius, frags. 9 and 17 (ed. Lutz, p. 74, line 25; p. 108, lines 11ff.); Wis 8:7; 2Macc 4:37; Philo, Alleg. Interp. 1.19; 4Macc 1:3, 18, 31; 5:23; Sallustius, De Deis et Mundo 10.1; Lucian, Par. 56; cf. the index of C. J. de Vogel, Greek Philosophy III: The Hellenistic-Roman Period, Leiden, 1959, p. 165; D. Tsekourakis, Studies in the Terminology of Early Stoic Ethics, pp. 59ff.

⁶ 2Tim 1:7—πνεῦμα σωφρονισμοῦ (cf. Josephus, War 2.9 = Ant. 17.210; Plutarch, Cat. Mai. 5.1; cf. Alex. 4.8); when intransitive, σωφρονισμός is a pedagogical term (Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.193). The charism of the perfect educator is first of all to have good judgment, a sound mind, prudence; cf. Cramer's Catena, on this word.

⁷ Sophrosyne is required of the episkopos (1Tim 3:2; Titus 1:8); it is a royal virtue, since the prince must both be master of himself and also maintain order and harmony in the community (Plato, Resp. 4.428 b –432 a; Leg. 3.697 c–e; 6.757 a–c; cf. J. C. Fraisse, Philia: La Notion d'amitié dans la philosophie antique, Paris, 1974, pp. 175ff.); Musonius, frag. 8 (p. 62, lines 10ff.; p. 66, line 8); Arrian, Anab. 4.7.5; 5.7.9; 6.26.3. The first quality demanded of the general, according to Onasander (1.1–2) is to be sophron; cf. F. Zimmermann, Griechische Roman-Papyri, Heidelberg, 1936, p. 60, 11; L. Delatte, Les Traités de la royauté d'Ecphante, Diotogène et Sthénidas, pp. 256, 270; C. Gorteman, “βασιλεύς φιλαλήθης,” in ChrEg, 1958, p. 260, n. 4.

⁸ It gives the strength to master the irrational instincts of the thymos (Plato, Symp. 196 c; Resp. 2.389 d–e; 4.430 e; Leg. 4.170 a); Philo, Alleg. Interp. 1.69–71, 86; 2.81; Heir 209; Husbandry 98: “the antidote to license is sophrosyne, which delivers from evil”; Creation 73; Change of Names 197; Musonius, frag. 4, p. 44, line 16; frag. 5, line 22; frag. 6, p. 54, line 18; frag. 12, line 13; frag. 18 B, line 20; Sallustius, De Deis et Mundo 10.1; Plutarch, De curios. 14: “as training in continence (πρὸς σωφροσύνης), one may at times abstain from one's own wife in order not to be moved by someone else's”; Sert. 1.9: “Sertorius showed himself more chaste (σωφρονέστερον) with regard to women than Philip”; Ages. 14.1: “the continence (σωφροσύνη) of Agesilaus was admired”; Pomp. 53.2; Demetr. 24.2: the continence of Democles was seen in that he escaped the greed of Demetrius by death; also that of Alexander (Arrian, Anab. 2.12; 4.19, 5–6; 20, 2). In the T. 12 Patr., sophrosyne is found only in T. Jos. 4.1–2; 6.7; 9.2–3; 10.2–3, always for sexual continence; cf. J. Becker, Untersuchungen zur Entstehungsgeschichte der Testamente der zwölf Patriarchen, Leiden, 1970, p. 229, n. 2; C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, p. 316; C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 3, pp. 54ff.

⁹ 4Macc 1:35—“the passion of appetite is halted before the temperate mind”; 2:16, 18, 23; 3:17, 19; 7:23; 2:2—“Joseph the temperate (ὁ σώφρων

Ἰωσηφ) mastered luxury”; 15:10—the seven brothers “were just, temperate (σώφρονες), courageous, magnanimous.”

¹⁰ Titus 2:5—σώφρονας, ἀγνάς; cf. Amnia to Heraclea: ἀγνήν καὶ σώφρονα καὶ κεκοσμημένην πάσῃ ἀρετῇ ἤθεσι καὶ φιλανδρίᾳ, H. W. Pleket, Epigraphica, vol. 2, n. 24, 5–11; IGLAM, 1594, 1602; cf. E. Bean, T. B. Mitford, Cilicia, n. 87 b 5. Cf. E. Lövestam, “Über die neutestamentliche Aufforderung zur Nüchternheit,” in ST, 1958, pp. 80–102.

¹¹ GVI, n. 1963; cf. 930, 1783; σώφροσιν τρόποις (C. Austin, Comicorum Graecorum Fragmenta, n. 292, 11); G. Pfohl, Grabinschriften, pp. 25ff. Idem, Inschriften der Griechen, Darmstadt, 1972, p. 81.

¹² SVF, vol. 1, 190; vol. 3, 262, 265.

¹³ It inclines a person to μεγαλοψυχία (R. A. Gauthier, Magnanimité, pp. 115ff. P. Moraux, Le Dialogue “sur la justice,” Louvain, 1957, pp. 146–164); a gift of Isis (SB 8140, 6 = SEG VIII, 550), it was divinized (G. Kaibel, Epigrammata, n. 34), had altars (I.Perg. 310) and priestesses (IGLS 2686). It was personified as virtue, after the fashion of Niké (victory) and Areté (merit). The epitaph of Serapous, shown offering the breast to her child, says, “I am the best of proclamations for those whose sophrosyne is renowned across the universe” (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 57, 8–9). In praise of a high official: χρηστός, εὐγενής, ἀπλοῦς, φιλαβασιλεύς, ἀνδρει—ος, ε—μ πίστει μέγας, σώφρων, . . . πραυ4ς, . . . τὰ πανοῦργα μισω—ν (C. Austin, Comicorum Graecorum Fragmenta, n. 300, col. I, 4; cf. 297, 6).

¹⁴ Ζήσαντος μετὰ σωφροσύνης καὶ ε—ν νεότητι τὰς τελείας ἀρετῆς ἀποδείξεις ει—σενεγκαμένου; BCH, 1888, p. 37, n. 19; ἀρετα—ς ἔνεκεν καὶ σωφροσύνας (SEG XVI, 471, 4); the honorific decree on behalf of M. Alfidius mentions three times the sophrosyne of this athlete (ed. Merkelbach, in ZPE, 1975, pp. 146ff., lines 21, 29, 53); Anth. Pal. 7.513; P. Hermann, Ergebnisse, n. 3, 10; like Joseph: ἀνὴρ θεοσεβῆς καὶ σώφρων (Jos. Asen. 4.7–8). Sophrosyne shone on the countenance of Homer (Christodorus of Thebes, in Anth. Pal. 2.332), of Cato (Plutarch, Cat. Mai. 19.4), of the governors of the peoples and of the gymnasiarchoi, “guardians of good conduct” (G. Kaibel, Epigrammata, n. 948). Aristylla was sophon (GVI, n. 327, 3), as were Philonoe (335), Arcestrate (495), et al. The Massaliotes were distinguished by their virtue (Strabo 4.1.5), which was—in the eyes of Romulus—the Romans’ secret for “reaching the highest pinnacle of human power” (Plutarch, Rom. 28.3). In the first century BC, “The oldest, most frequent, and most widespread praise is of sophrosyne—moral wisdom, moderation, and harmonious living—one of the leading virtues. It is found from the fourth century until the decline of Greek civilization in Attica, in the islands, in the Hellenized quasi-barbaric lands at the borders of the Greek world” (G. Fohlen, “Quelques aspect de la vie antique d’après les épitaphes métriques grecques,” in Les Etudes classiques, 1954, pp. 146ff.); cf. H. North, Sophrosyne, pp. 252ff.

¹⁵ 1Tim 3:2; cf. Plato, Grg. 508 a; Leg. 7.802 e; Nicolaus of Damascus, Vit. Caes. 17.3 (ed. Müller, p. 436); Lucian, Bis Acc. 17: κόσμιον ἄνθρωπον καὶ σώφρονα; I. Magn. 162, 6: ζήσαντα σωφρόνως καὶ κοσμίως; MAMA VI, 119; VIII, 472: ζήσασαν κοσμίως καὶ σωφρόνως; A. Dupont-Sommer, L. Robert, La Déesse de Hiérapolis Castabala, Paris, 1964, p. 46: κοσμίως καὶ σωφρόνως βιώσασαν καὶ φιλοστόργως; Cornelia Fortunata to Tomis: στοργὴν πρὸς ἄνδρὸς κοσμίαν καὶ σώφρονα λιποῦσαν (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1964, p. 195, n. 296); Seneca, Vit. Beat. 8: “vir compositus et ordinatus.” The virtuous person is sui compos.

¹⁶ Athenaeus 1.15 = 8 e; Xenophon, Cyr. 1.2–8: sophrosyne is one of the first virtues taught to Persian children; is it the fruit of paideia (Plato, Resp. 4.430 d), the source and teacher of all the virtues (Iamblichus, Sophr., in Stobaeus, Ecl. 5.45; vol. 3, p. 260); likewise Plutarch, Marc. 2.5; cf. H. North, Sophrosyne, pp. 248ff.

¹⁷ Titus 2:12—σωφρόνως καὶ δικαίως καὶ εὐσεβῶς; it is explicitly a matter of mastering the anarchic ε—πιθυμίας (cf. Ps.-Plato, Def. 415 d: Σώφρων· ὁ μετρίας ε—πιθυμίας ἔχων), a mastery that is not achieved without effort (Musonius, frag. 7, p. 58, line 28) and deserves praise; Junia Theodora in 43, at Corinth: ζῶ—σα σωφρόνως (SEG XVIII, 143, 23–24); τὸ εὖ ζῆν ε—στὶ κοινωνικῶς ζῆν καὶ φιλικῶς καὶ σωφρόνως καὶ δικαίως (Plutarch, Adv. Col. 2); δικαίως ζῆν καὶ φρονίμως καὶ σωφρόνως (Dio Chrysostom 23.7).

¹⁸ Ἴνα σωφρονίζουσιν τὰς νέας, Titus 2:4 (the present indicative must be retained rather than the subjunctive -ζωσιν of C, K, L, and some miniscules). The verb σωφρονίζω, much used by the rhetors (LTGR, p. 346), means give a sense of moderation, to moderate excess, restore to their senses people who are raving (Antiphon, 3 Tetr. 3.2; Xenophon, Hier. 10.3; Thucydides 6.78.2; P.Oxy. 33, col. IV, 11: —Αππιανέ, ι—ώθαμεν καὶ ἡμεῖς—μαινομένους καὶ ἀπονενοημένους σωφρονίζειν; second century), especially delinquents who can learn wisdom through the fear of punishment (Josephus, War 4.119). It is also used in the general sense of calling someone to responsibility (ibid. 3.445), instructing or indoctrinating someone (Plutarch, An seni 2; Quaest. conv. 2.8; Musonius, frag. 8, p. 62, line 11: δει— δὲ [βασιλέα] τοὺς ὑπηκόους σωφρονίζειν ἵν’ ὁ μὲν ἄρχη σωφρόνως).

¹⁹ Titus 2:2—νηφαλίους, σεμνούς, σώφρονας. Cf. the analogous association in Musonius, frag. 8, p. 62, line 20): ταῦτα δὲ ἀνθρώπων προσόντα παρέχεται σεμνὸν καὶ σώφρονα αὐτόν. At Rome, a woman who is σεμνοτάτη πασῶν—v is praised for her qualities: σωφροσύνη, ὁμόνοια, στοργή (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1964, p. 252, n. 601); Appia is σωφροσύνη καὶ σεμνότητι διενέκασαν (MAMA VIII, 470, 8–9); . . . σεμνῆς μετρὸς σωφροσύνην (I.Bulg. 1026, 5); σεμνοπρεπὲς κημήλιον σωφροσύνης . . . Δυνατι—ρα (I.Cret. 2.8.4).

²⁰ Μετὰ αἰ—δοῦς καὶ σωφροσύνης κοσμεῖ—v ε—αυτάς, 1Tim 2:9 (cf. Musonius, frag. 19, line 1). The best parallel is Philo, Spec. Laws 2.62: “On the seventh day, thousands of schools are open in all the cities where intelligence, moderation (σωφροσύνης), courage, justice, and the other virtues are taught. The people are seated in an orderly and calm fashion (ε—v κόσμῳ . . . σὺν ἡσυχίᾳ) and pay perfect attention in order to hear the delectable discourse, while one of the teachers stands giving out very noble and profitable lessons, which help them to progress in all areas of life.” The link between αἰ—δῶς and σωφροσύνη is constant, Xenophon, Cyr. 8.1.31; Symp. 1.8; Philo, Heir 128; Prelim. Stud. 124; Flight 5; MAMA VII, 258, 5; GVI, 1575, 1: σωφροσύνας αἰ—δοῦς τε ε—τύμου χάριν (first-second century); 1564, 1: πότνια Σωφροσύνη, θύγατερ μεγαλόφρονος Αἰ—δος (fifth century). The emphasis is on modesty and decency: σωφροσύνην ἄσκει—v, αἰ—σχω—v δ ἔργων ἀπέχεσθαι (Sib. Or. 2.145). Sovinus, at Kavsa, made separate men’s and women’s rooms for the baths “on account of decency” (σαοφροσύνης δ ἔνεκα, L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 4, p. 83). Together with κοσμέω, κοσμιότης, cf. Philo, Change of Names 217; Spec. Laws 3.51.

²¹ Titus 2:5—σώφρονας, ἀγνάς; cf. Aristophanes, Lys. 473: “behave properly, like a young girl”; the wife of Ischomachus says to her husband: “My concern is to be proper” (Xenophon, Oec. 7.14; cf. 9.9); Musonius, frag. 3, p. 49, line 17): δει— δὴ καὶ σώφρονα εἶναι τὴν γυναῖκα οἷαν καθαρεύειν μὲν ἀφροδισίων παρανόμων, καθαρεύειν δὲ τῆς περὶ τὰς ἄλλας ἡδονὰς ἀκρασίας; 4 (p. 44, 16): σωφρονεῖ—v μὲν αὖ καλὸν τὴν γυναῖκα, καλὸν δ ὁμοίως καὶ τὸν ἄνδρα; Plutarch, De gen. 33: δεήσεις σωφρόνων γυναικῶ—v = the prayers of honest women); I.Cor. VIII, 3, n. 530 (= SEG XI, 154); I.Cret. I, 18, 52 (vol. 1, p. 204); II, 6, 10 (vol. 2, p. 89); TAM II, 1204, 4–5.

²² 1Tim 2:15, μετὰ σωφροσύνης. With an abstract noun, μετὰ defines the fashion in which the action is accomplished: καλω—ς μετὰ σωφροσύνης (I.Perg. 495, 5); Philo, Flight 63: “we must become like God, just and holy, and also prudent” (ὁμοίωσις [θεω—] δὲ δίκαιον καὶ ὄσιον μετὰ φρονήσεως

γενέσθαι); cf. Plato, Phd. 69 b: ἀληθῆς ἀρετή, μετὰ φρονήσεως. The Christian is saved by keeping an element of balance in his or her conduct. In the first century BC, Ocellus, setting down rules for procreation, instructs parents to refrain from any excess (hybris) and to conform to the rules of nature, with proper discretion: τὰς κατὰ φύσιν καὶ μετὰ σωφροσύνης (Ocellus of Lucania, Nat. 4.13; ed. F. G. A. Mullach, Fragmenta Philosophorum Graecorum, Paris, 1875, vol. 1, p. 405).

²³ The first definition of sophrosyne in Plato, Chrm. (159 b) has to do with order and silence (τὸ κοσμίως πάντα πράττειν καὶ ἡσυχῆ). In the legal debate where Philosophy assembles a group of her friends for a jury (Truth, Virtue, etc.), Lucian prominently mentions the mute servants Σωφροσύνη, Δικαιοσύνη, and Παιδεία (Lucian, Pisc. 16–17; cf. Tabula of Cebes 15). An essential characteristic of masculine or feminine sophrosyne is that each one takes care of his or her own business: τὸ τὰ ε—αυτοῦ πράττειν (the third definition in Plato, Chrm. 161 b–d).

²⁴ Heliodorus, Aeth. 4.8.7; cf. 1.3.1; 1.8.3; 1.25.4; 2.4.2; 8.9.22; 10.9.4–5; Ps.-Plutarch, Amat. 23.769 b: “It is absurd to deny women any part in virtue (arete). Is it necessary to speak in particular of their sophrosyne and their intelligence, or of their faithfulness and loyalty?”; Plutarch, Phoc. 19.1: Phocion’s second wife was renowned for her virtue (ε—πὶ σωφροσύνη); so was Cato’s daughter (Cat. Min. 73.6); Dio Cassius 1.26; 47.45; 58.1; Sent. Sextus 235, 237; Philo, Moses 2.136–137; Phytis wrote a treatise Περὶ γυναικὸς σωφροσύνας (Stobaeus, Flor. 74.61 = vol. 4, p. 588). A tomb inscription: Ἀὐρηλία Τατία νατιρηνηὴ τῆ σωφρονεστάτῃ γυναικί (IGUR, II, n. 433; 632: διὰ τὴν σωφροσύνην αὐτῆς; 1039; cf. 449: σῶφρων καὶ φίλανδρε; 565).

²⁵ Demosthenes, C. Neaer. 59.114; Musonius, frag. 4, p. 44; MAMA 1.303: παρθένος σωφρονεστάτη; cf. priestesses, IG XII, 5, 291; I.Perg. 481–482, 495, 532, 576 b, etc.; cf. Amnia, “honored by her country as priestess of Sophrosyne” (IGLS 2686).

²⁶ Aristotle, Pol. 1.13.9.1260a: οὐχ ἡ αὐτὴ σωφροσύνη γυναικὸς καὶ ἀνδρός. According to Theophrastus, certain cities tested young women on this virtue (as a preparation for marriage?) and on household management (in Athenaeus 13.90 = 609 e–610 a).

²⁷ Τῆς σωφροσύνης ὑπόδειγμα, GVI, 1989, 17 (second-first century); cf. 157, 204, 596, 693, 743, 837, 893, 1490, 1778, 1781, 1790; MAMA III, 792. Kleupatra, wife of the physician Nikias, in the second-first century, gained respect through reserved conduct (πινυτοι—ς ἦθεσι) and had “a certain renown among the living on account of her honest comportment” (λῆμα σωφροσύνας, J. Bingen, “Epitaphe grecque et inscription latine de Dymè,” in Mélanges helléniques offerts à G. Daux, Paris, 1974, p. 14); SEG XIV, 722; 25, 1117; IGLAM 646, 816: σωφροσύνη ζήσασα; 831, 950, 963, 1605 a; cf. R.Lattimore, Epitaphs, pp. 276, 291; G. Pfohl, Grabinschriften, pp. 16, 25, 42, 49, 144ff., 273, etc. I. Kajanto, A Study of the Greek Epitaphs of Rome, Helsinki, 1963, pp. 29, 33.

²⁸ Τὴν ἐ—πὶ πάσῃ ἀρετῇ σωφροσύνη τε καὶ σοφία, IGUR, n. 61, 1.

²⁹ MAMA V, 81; VI, 114 A 7; 168; VII, 394; 499 c 5ff.; SEG IV, 634; I.Cret. IV, 304; GVI, n. 243; 1857; Anth. Pal. 7.337; 8.31; Lucian, Pisc. 16–17; Cal. 15. Tabula of Cebes 15 places sophrosyne between kalokagathia and eutaxia.

³⁰ Xenophon, Mem. 2.1; Philo, Sacr. Abel and Cain 27; Heliodorus, Aeth. 10.9.4; Dio Cassius 37.45; 58.1; MAMA VIII, 492, 23; 469, 4; 482, 14; I. Side 121 b 2; GVI 2040, 26 (first-second century); Anth. Pal. 9.132.4; 9.166.2; cf. the references given by A. Kehl, Der Psalmenkommentar von Tura, Cologne, 1964, p. 184.

³¹ Cf. Paulina, wife of Saturninus (Josephus, Ant. 18.66, 73, 76); Philo, Virtues 39; Joseph 50: when her husband returned, Potiphar’s wife “played the part of an honest, well-behaved woman” (τὴν σώφρονα καὶ κοσμίαν), indignant at assaults on her virtue; Rewards 139; Quintus of Smyrna, Posthomerica 1.117; MAMA 4.158, 159; GVI, 876, 1310, 1439; SEG XX, 76 d 4.

ταλαιπωρέω, ταλαιπωρία, ταλαίπωρος

talaiporeo, to bewail one’s misery; talaiporia, misery, devastation; talaiporos, miserable, wretched

talaiporeo, S 5003; EDNT 3.331–332; NIDNTT 3.858–859; L&N 25.136; BAGD 803 | talaiporia, S 5004; EDNT 3.332; NIDNTT 3.858–859; MM 624; L&N 22.11; BAGD 803 | talaiporos, S 5005; EDNT 3.332; NIDNTT 3.858–859; MM 624; L&N 22.12; BAGD 803

In the LXX, the verb talaiporeo almost always translates the Hebrew shadad, almost always in the pual, referring to ravaged lands, devastated countries (Mic 2:4; Joel 1:10; Jer 4:20; Zech 11:2-3), ruined pillars (Hos 10:2)—the aftermath of violence. Philo uses it for the thousand snubs that Flaccus received (Flacc. 155) and the severity of a night spent in the open air (Etern. World 4; Spec. Laws 3.17); Manetho uses it for men toiling in quarries (in Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.237; cf. Xenophon, Mem. 2.1.18);

Josephus uses it for the fatigue of long marches (Ant. 2.334; 3.3) or costly efforts (4.167; cf. P.Mil.Vogl. 24, 15: emou talaiporountos is to pelagos, AD 117), Thucydides for various sufferings and difficulties resulting from war (3.78.1; 5.74.3), for the rainy season (2.101.5), for the plague,¹ for the constraints of existence (1.99.1). It is with this general meaning that it is used in Jas 4:9—“Bewail your misery (talaiporesate), mourn and weep” (NT hapax).

The substantive talaiporia, very common in the OT, has the same meaning and signifies devastation (Job 30:3; Hos 9:6; Isa 16:4; Mic 2:4), pillaging (Amos 3:10), ravaging (Joel 1:15; Hab 2:17), calamity (2Macc 6:9). This is the meaning in Isa 59:7, quoted at Rom 3:16, and of Jas 5:1, where the rich are told to weep over the evils that are going to befall them.²

The adjective talaiporos retains the meaning “miserable” when referring to the precariousness of life, to suffering and privation that must be endured,³ as in Rev 3:17 (“You do not realize that you are wretched, pitiful, poor, blind, and naked”); but more often it refers to psychological and religious wretchedness, as with those who place no value on wisdom and instruction (Wis 3:11), “pin their hopes on dead things” (13:10), or are condemned to death when “if they had pleaded their case even before Scythians, they would have been acquitted” (2Macc 4:47). Even more so people who “keep bad company and are perverted and miserable their whole life long” (Ep. Arist. 130). Two funerary steles of Rhenaea, from the second-first century BC, call for God to avenge the murderers of two young Jewish women, Heraclea and Marthina: “I invoke and call upon God Most High . . . upon those who treacherously assassinated and poisoned the wretched Heraclea.”⁴ In October of AD 64, Thaubas announces to his father, “Your unhappy daughter Herennia (ten talaiporon thygatera sou Herennian) died . . . the ninth of Phaophi in premature labor.”⁵ So when St. Paul cries out “Wretched man that I am” (talaiporos ego anthropos, Rom 7:34), we must interpret this as both infelix and miser: “Unhappy and miserable man that I am! Who will deliver me from this mortal body?” As an exact parallel, these exclamations from Epictetus 1.3.5, attributed to those who live only for the body, forgetful of their divine paternity, have been cited: “What am I then? A poor wretched human, or miserable flesh!” (ti gar eimi? talaiporon anthroparion, kai ta dystena mou sarkidia). The connotations are the same with respect to the person who is afraid to take the necessary food: “Poor wretch! Can you be so blind?” (talaipore; 3.26.3; cf. 4.6.18). The exclamation is a common one (Plutarch, Aem. 26.10), whether after a mistake or a sin (“How unhappy and miserable I am!” Jos. Asen. 6.5, 7) to express the condition of the guilty person (“O miserable soul—o talaipore psyche —how can you say that you have committed no offense?” T. Abr. B 10), or on the occasion of the loss of a loved one.⁶ It is the cry of a broken heart.

¹ Thucydides 3.3.1. Cf. regarding the aches and pains suffered by athletes (κόποι) Hippocrates, Nat. Hom. 22: ἃ ταλαιπωρέοντι τὸ κοπιῶ—ν κτλ.

² In Ep. Arist. 15, ταλαιπωρία refers to the miserable conditions of existence; in Philo, Dreams 1.174 the trials of war (likewise Diodorus Siculus 17.64.4; 17.65.2; 17.94.1); often associated with πόνος (Creation 167; Change of Names 189; Moses 1.322); in Josephus, for the painful toil of prisoners (Ant. 2.62), exertion and fatigue (2.257; War 7.278; cf. Polybius 3.17.8; 3.55.6; Philostratus, Gym. 11: wrestling and the pankration are painful exercises), of the miseries of the people of God in the course of their wandering (Ant. 4.42, 177). T. Job 34.4—“He sat down in the misery (ε—ν ταλαιπωρία) of worms.” In the papyri also, the word refers to a state of misery (P.Tebt. 27, 40; second century BC; SB 9397, 4). But there is also a psychological and moral nuance in a fifth-century letter asking a superior of a community to have compassion on the sad lot of an offender and readmit him to community life: παρακαλῶ— οὖν ὑμα—ς σπλαγχνίσαι ὑπὲρ τῆς αὐτοῦ ταλαιπωρίας (C.P.Herm. 16, 4).

³ Ps 137:8—“Daughter of Babylon, laid waste”; Menander, ταλαίπωρον βίον (in Stobaeus, Flor. 96.42, vol. 5, p. 795; cf. Philo, Prelim. Stud. 174; Philo, To Gaius 274); Menander, Mis., in P.Oxy. 2656, 134, 258: ὦ τοῦ παραδόξου καὶ ταλαιπώρου βίου; 3Macc 5:47, concerning a catastrophe; Tabula of Cebes 19: ὡς ταλαίπωροι καὶ ἄθλιοί εἰ—σι καὶ κακοδαίμονες; Josephus, Ant. 11.1: God took pity on captives and the fate of the miserable men (τω—ν ταλαιπώρων); the proconsul of Macedonia, Cn. Cornelius Dolabella, is told of the difficulties experienced by the Thasians during the war (I.Thas. 175, col. I, 10); “miserable people” are those without the means of livelihood (UPZ 110, 132; from 164 BC); 4Macc 17:7—“my wretched nursings.” A Heidelberg papyrus, 184, frag. VII (C. Austin, Comicorum Graecorum Fragmenta, n. 244, 155); cf. the adverb ταλαιπώρως, “alas” or “lamentably” in P.Gen., inv. 271, col. XII, 42 (cf. MusHelv., 1959, p. 101).

⁴ Ταλαίπωρον Ἡράκλεαν, published in A. Deissmann, Light, pp. 414–415; republished in Dittenberger, Syl. 1181, 4; CII 725.

⁵ P.Fouad 75, 5; cf. P.Hamb. 88, 10: γράφεις μοι περὶ τω—ν χρεωστω—ν τοῦταλαιπώρου —Ιουλιανοῦ. A Christian letter from the fourth century: for me, lowly, wretched, and unworthy to see the light of the sun (διὰ ε—μοῦ τω— ταπινω— καὶ ταλεπώρω καὶ οὐ καταξίω . . . , P.Lond. 1917, 7); an ostrakon: ταλέπορος καὶ ἀμαρτολός (SB 643, 8).

⁶ A. Henrichs, Die Phoinikika des Lollianios, Bonn, 1972, p. 92, 5: ὦ ταλαίπωρε ἄνθρωπε. Ὡρα γάρ ε—στι τω— παιδὶ νῦν ἀποθανει—ν. Separated from his wife, Jacob is deeply distressed: ταπεινός ε—στι καὶ ὀλοταλαίπορος (P.Apoll. 44, 6).

ταπεινός, ταπεινῶ, ταπεινώσις

tapeinos, base, ignoble, of low birth; modest, moderate, humble; tapeinoō, to humble, humiliate; tapeinosis, modesty, humility tapeinos, S 5011; TDNT 8.1–26; EDNT 3.333; NIDNTT 2.259–264; MM 625; L&N 25.295, 87.61, 88.52, 88.64; BAGD 804 | tapeinoō, S 5013; TDNT 8.1–26; EDNT 3.334–335; MM 625; L&N 25.198, 79.87, 81.7, 87.62, 88.56; BAGD 804 | tapeinosis, S 5014; TDNT 8.1–26; EDNT 3.334–335; NIDNTT 2.259–264; MM 625; L&N 87.60, 88.51; BAGD 805

In secular Greek, the tapeinos is usually a person who is base, ignoble, of low birth (P.Oxy. 79, verso 2: “nothing humble or ignoble or despised,” meden tapinon mede agenes mede adoxon; Plutarch, Cic. 10.5; Lucian, Cal. 24), servile (Plato, Leg. 6.774 c, aneleutheros), working at a humble occupation (Demosthenes, C. Eub. 57.5), held in low esteem;¹ it can even refer to lowliness of heart.² This nuance of depreciation remained in polite monastic and ecclesiastical formulas in the sixth century.³ But despite the preponderance of baseness and pettiness, tapeinosis was also considered a virtue even by pagans, namely, the virtue of modesty or moderation, associated with prautes, hesychia, metriotes, kosmiotes, and even sophrosyne; the opposite of hybris, authadeia, and hyperephania.⁴ S. Rehr has provided abundant evidence of this.⁵

Nevertheless, the Christian idea of humility derives primarily from the OT and the example of Christ.⁶ It combines the ideas of poverty, modesty, and mildness.⁷ The humble are contrasted with potentates,⁸ the great (Matt 18:4; 23:12; Rom. 12:16), the arrogant (Jas 4:6), the rich (Jas 1:9; cf. Phil 4:12), with all that is lofty (Luke 3:5; 2Cor 11:7; Jas 4:10; 1Pet 5:6) and glorious (Phil 3:21; cf. Prov 29:23). Here is a profile of the humble:

(a) They are “little people,” of modest circumstances, who are regarded with favor by the Lord.⁹

(b) They are unfortunate sufferers (2Cor 7:6; 12:21), whom God comforts (Phil 2:8; Heb 6:6; 10:29).

(c) They are discreet and self-effacing (Ep. Arist. 257; Rom 12:16; Gal 6:1-3; Eph 4:2; 1Tim 3:6; 1Pet 3:8).

(d) They are humble before the Lord and reserved with respect to their brethren,¹⁰ persuaded of “the misery and emptiness of the whole creation.”¹¹

¹ Plutarch, De vit. pud. 14; Praec. ger. rei publ. 30.822 d; Phoc. 9.5; Cat. Min. 12.5; 32.2; Dem. 1.1; 1.3: obscure and mediocre; C. Gracch. 1.1; Ant. 33.3: “Antony is more timid and humble than Caesar”; cf. 83.2: Cleopatra, “lying miserably on a pallet” (cf. R. C. Trench, Synonyms, pp. 148–153); Philo, Husbandry 61: ἄδοξα καὶ ταπεινά; the contrast of ταπεινή and σεμνή (Aristotle, Poet. 22.1458a18), ταπεινά and ὑπερφανή (Xenophon, Eq. Mag. 5.7), ὄρη ὑψηλὰ ε—ταπείνωσεν (Pss. Sol. 11.5; cf. Matt 23:12; Luke 3:5; 2Cor 11:7), ταπεινοφροσύνη and τιμή (Col 2:23), ταπείνωσις versus δόξα (Phil 3:21).

² Epictetus 3.2.14; 4.1.2; cf. ταπεινοφρονέω: having a low opinion of oneself (ibid. 2.9.10). ταπεινόομαι: be in an inferior condition (Plutarch, Sol. 22.2); “degrade oneself” (Ps.-Plutarch, Cons. ad Apoll. 29); Diodorus Siculus 19.67.3: “Cassander decided that it would be worthwhile to weaken (ταπεινω—σαι) the Aetolians”; P.Oxy. 2554, frag 1.11: οἱ— πλούσιοι ταπεινωθήσονται (astrological prediction, third century); cf. Plutarch, Mulier. virt. 20: “not in a pitiable and lowly fashion” (οὐκ οἱ—κτρω—ς καὶ ταπεινω—ς).

³ The monk Psoïos to his superior: “I pray my master to remember by humble self (τῇ ε—μῇ ταπινώσει) in his holy and efficacious prayers” (P.Fouad 89, 5); in a letter to a bishop: παρακαλω— ὑμα—ς εὔξασθαι ὑπὲρ τῆς ταπεινώσεώς μου; P.Cair.Masp. 67283, 13; cf. P.Gen. 14, 5: παρακαλω— ε—λέους τυχει—ν μετὰ τω—ν ταπεινω—ν μου παίδων; PSI 1343, 2; P.Apoll. 44, 7: “he is humbled and in distress and needs . . .” ε—πειδὴ ταπεινός ε—στι καὶ ὀλοταλαίπορος καὶ χρεῖαν ἔχει . . .”; Christian letter from the fourth century, a request for prayer διὰ ε—μοῦ τω— ταπινω— καὶ ταλεπώρω [sic], P.Lond. 1917, 7). Antiochus I of Commagene: μηδὲ ἄλλην παρεύρεσιν εἰ—ς ὕβριν ἢ ταπείνωσιν ἢ κατάλυσιν (Dittenberger, Or. 383, 201 = IGLS 1; cf. 478); cf. P.Lond. 131, recto 309 (= vol. 1, p. 179): ε—ν τοι—ς ταπεινοί—ς τόποις (AD 78/79).

⁴ Ταπεινός is contrasted with μετέωρος in Geminus, Intro. to Astronomy 1.23; 10.1), refers to a lesser distance (11.2), a lower position on the horizon (1.12; 5.35; 7.15, 20, 27). Cleopatra’s birthday was celebrated “with simplicity” (Plutarch, Ant. 73.5).

⁵ S. Rehr, Das Problem der Demut in der profan-griechischen Literatur im Vergleich zu Septuaginta und Neuen Testament, Münster, 1961, pp. 26ff. Grundmann, “ταπεινός,” in TDNT, vol. 8, pp. 1–26; cf. Plato, Leg. 6.716 a; Xenophon, Ages. 11.11; Plutarch, Alc. 6.5; De aud. poet. 28 d; De sera 549 c; etc.

⁶ Matt 11:29—“Learn of me, ὅτι πραυ4ς ει—μι καὶ ταπεινὸς τῇ καρδίᾳ” (J. Dupont, Béatitudes, vol. 3, pp. 521ff.). Cf. K. Thieme, “Die ταπεινοφροσύνη, Philip. II und Röm. XII,” in ZNW, 1907, pp. 9–33; R. A. Gauthier, Magnanimité, pp. 375ff.; C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, pp. 160–164; vol. 2, pp. 715, 754, 799; R. Leivestad, “ΤΑΠΕΙΝΟΦΡΩΝ,” in NovT, 1966, pp. 36–47; P. Adnès, “Humilité,” in Dict.spir., vol. 7, 1136–1188.

⁷ The verb, substantive, or adjective usually translates the Hebrew ‘anâh or one of its derivatives, which connote misery, usually poverty, affliction, defeat; cf. the Hebrew kana’, be confounded; shapel, be abased; cf. C. van Leeuwen, Le Développement du sens social en Israël avant l’ère chrétienne, Assen, 1955, pp. 13ff.

⁸ Luke 1:52; cf. P. L. Schoonheim, “Die alttestamentliche Boden der Vokabel ὑπερήφανος, Lukas I, 41,” in NovT, 1966, pp. 235–246.

⁹ Luke 1:48—the lowliness of the servant. He exalts the humble (Luke 1:52), who are the poor of Jas 1:9 (A. Gelin, Les Pauvres de Yahwé, Paris, 1953); cf. Josephus, War 4.319; Ant. 5.115; 7.95.

¹⁰ Acts 20:19; Jas 4:10; 1Pet 5:5-6 (cf. J. Dupont, Discours de Milet, pp. 40ff. F. O. Francis, “Humility and Angelic Worship in Col II, 18,” in ST, 1963, pp. 114ff.). One who prays “humbles himself with supplications” (ταπεινοῦται μεθ ι—κετείας, CII 725, 11); this humility/affliction is that of fasting (cf. Jos. Asen. 11.1; Pss. Sol. 3.9). Cf. Lev 23:29.

¹¹ Philo, Prelim. Stud. 107; Post. Cain 48; cf. M. Alexandre, De Congressu eruditionis gratia, Paris, 1967, pp. 179, 246. On humility in rabbinic Judaism, cf. M. S. Enslin, The Ethics of Paul, New York, 1957, pp. 254–276; J. Le Moyne, “Pharisiens,” in DBSup, vol. 7, 1083; Grundmann, TDNT, vol. 8, pp. 13–14.

ταράσσω, τάραχος

tarasso, to agitate, move, disturb; tarachos, agitation, disturbance, confusion, panic, uprising

tarasso, S 5015; EDNT 3.335–336; NIDNTT 3.709–710; MM 625; L&N 16.3, 25.244, 39.44; BAGD 805 | tarachos, S 5017; EDNT 3.336; NIDNTT 3.709–710; MM 626; L&N 25.243, 39.5; BAGD 805

“Agitate, move, disturb” is used for things like water (John 5:4, 7; Ezek 22:2, 13; 34:18-19; Hippocrates, Aff. 55.3), for the stomach or intestines,¹ and for mental uncertainty and confusion,² as with Peter's guards, worried about the escape of their prisoner (en tarachos ouk oligos, Acts 12:18). The same word can be used for a panic, as in 1Sam 5:9; Plutarch, De garr. 13. Tarasso and tarachos are used especially for disorders, social disturbances, political agitation, and riots.³ It is in this sense (Latin tumultus) that they are used in Acts 16:8, 13; 19:23: At Thessalonica, Paul and Silas are accused of instigating a disturbance; at Berea, it is the Jews who agitate and upset the crowds; at Ephesus, it is the riot of the silversmiths. It is a technical term for insurrections, like the Jewish revolt at Cyrene (SEG IX, 168, 8; 252, 6; BGU 889, 23 = C.Pap.Jud. 449); thus tarachos is synonymous with stasis ("uprising," P.Brem. XI, 30 = C.Pap.Jud. 441; Dittenberger, Syl. 684, 13; 3Macc 3:24; stasiastes = factious person, P.Cair.Zen. 59484, 4), ephodos, "clash, attack, irruption" (P.Giss. 41, col. II, 4–5), kinesis, "movement" (Diodorus Siculus 31, frag. 17 b; ed. Dindorf), thorybos, "tumult, confusion" (P.Brem. XI, 25–26), and polemos, "battle, combat."⁴ Hence the choice of words of Emperor Claudius, writing to the Alexandrians in 41: "the disturbance and uprising against the Jews, or better, to speak frankly, the war" (tes de pros loudaious taraches kai staseos, mallon d' ei chre to alethes eipein tou polemou, P.Lond. 1912, 73–74). Just as in France "in the time of the Revolution" or "before the Revolution" is a chronological reference, "in the times of the troubles"⁵ referred to some particular insurrection.

With respect to individuals, tarasso usually expresses simple uneasiness mixed with fear: Zechariah (Luke 1:12), Herod (Matt 2:3), the apostles frightened at the sight of Jesus walking on the water (Matt 14:26; Mark 6:50) or resurrected (Luke 24:38), or disturbed at the prospect of the Master's departure;⁶ the faithful are upset by heterodox teachings (Acts 15:24; 1Pet 3:14 = Isa 8:12). These connotations of disquiet, fear, dismay, and confusion match those of secular Greek,⁷ and of biblical Greek when the frame of mind resulting from a dream is being described. The person's mind is always troubled (etarachthe he psyche autou, Gen 41:8; Dan 2:1; 7:15; Pss. Sol. 6.4).

But this meaning—agitation, care, preoccupations—does not take account of three Johannine texts referring to intense emotion or confusion in Christ's heart, first of all at the tomb of Lazarus;⁸ then at the Last Supper, when "having said these things, Jesus was troubled in his spirit" (John 13:21); and also when the Lord clearly states his anguish at the prospect of his imminent passion.⁹ In all three instances, trembling and dread are envisioned: Jesus was upset. This meaning comes from the LXX, where tarasso translates quite diverse Hebrew verbs to the effect that the earth is quaking (2Sam 22:8, Hebrew ga'ash) or is broken up (Isa 24:19, Hebrew ra'a'), that the mountains are shaking (Job 46:2, Hebrew mûr) or shuddering (hithpapel of ragaz, Ps 18:8; 77:16; cf. Amos 8:8), also the hills (Jer 4:24, hithpapel of qalal). God disturbs the sea (Isa 51:15, Hebrew raga'), the isles are dismayed (Ezek 26:18, bahal), “Syene is shaken in all directions” (Ezek 30:16, Hebrew hûl; cf. Esth 4:4), “the spirit of Egypt will melt in her heart” (Isa 19:3, niphil of baqaq), the nations tremble (Isa 64:2, Hebrew ragaz; cf. Deut 2:25), the city of Susa is dismayed (Esth 3:15, niphil of bûj). With respect to people, the emphasis is always on fear,¹⁰ terror.¹¹ This tumultuous agitation, this upsetting internal trouble (2Sam 18:33, Hebrew ragaz; Jdt 4:2; 7:4; 14:19; 16:10) batters and weakens the soul’s strength (Judg 11:35, hiphil of kara'), crushes it (Ps 42:8, hithpoel of shahah), so that the person faints (Ps 143:4; hithpoel of shamam), stricken with dizziness and reeling like a drunkard (Ps 107:27, Hebrew hagag), unable to speak (Ps 77:4, niphil of pa'am), worn out (Gen 40:6, za'ap), and muddled (Isa 3:12, piel of bala'), routed (Isa 22:5, Hebrew mehûmâh), after the fashion of mental disturbance (Ep. Arist. 314; cf. T. Job 26.6—“troubling your discourse,” tarassonta tous dialogismous sou). When the entrails shudder and shake, it means that they are moved with compassion (Gen 43:30, piel of mahar); 1Kgs 3:26 (niphil of kamar; Sir 30:7; 51:21); if it is the spirit, sadness or gloom is indicated (1Kgs 20:4-5, Hebrew sar).

The meaning “grief” cannot be excluded as a component of the emotion that troubled Jesus at the tomb of Lazarus (cf. T. Job 19.1, when Job learns of the death of his children; cf. 20:7; 33:1; 34:5), but “dread” is clearly meant in the other two Johannine texts, with a nuance of upset and physical trembling (Ps 55:5; cf. Pss. Sol. 8.5—“my bones shook like reeds”), even bruises (Ps 109:22), which emphasizes the real humanity of the innocent Christ, for whom being subjected to death was a real cruelty. This explains why he collapsed in the Olivet garden (Mark 14:33-35; Matt 26:37-39; Luke 22:44).

¹ Gen 43:30; 1Kgs 3:26; Hab 3:16; Jer 14:19; Sir 51:21; Aristophanes, Nub. 386: “Gorged with sauce as you are, your stomach is already upset.” Hence the medical usage (Jer 14:19; Wis 17:8), abundantly attested in Hippocrates: “troubles and sicknesses” (2 Vict. 37.4; 4 Vict. 88.3), of the body (2 Vict. 4.5; 3 Vict. 74.1; 4 Vict. 88.2), of the stomach (2 Vict. 46.3; 52.3; Acut. 56.1–2: mead can upset the stomach; cf. ibid. Appendix 14.1), of the blood (Hippocrates, Nat. Puer. 15.1, 3, 4; 18.3), of sleep (3 Vict. 72.1), of the air (2 Hippocrates, Vict. 38.6), of milk (Aff. 51.2), of the humor (ibid. 47.1–3; 48.1; 51.1, 5, 8, 9); “a person is agitated when he has a fever” (ibid. 46.4). Other medical references in Hobart, Medical Language, p. 93. Euclid and Archimedes use $\tau\alpha\rho\acute{\alpha}\sigma\sigma\omega$ for an irregular proportion, cf. C. Mugler, Terminologie géométrique, pp.411ff.

² Xenophon, Hell. 7.5.27: after the battle of Mantinea, the ταραχή was greater than before; ³ Vict. 71.2: ταρασσεί τὴν ψυχὴν; Acut. Appendix 16.1: disturbed reason; Josephus, Ant. 14.273.

³ Xenophon, An. 1.8.2: “The king approached with a great army; then there was great confusion” (πολὺς ταραχος ἐγένετο); Cyr. 2.1.27; Josephus, War 1.216: “troubles and a veritable civil war broke out at Apamea”; 4.495: “the troubles under the reign of Vitellius”; Life 103: “I would prefer to end the commotion without bloodshed”; Thucydides 2.84.2; 3.77.3. A decree at Istros in honor of Agathocles, around 200 BC, “while our city was in confusion” (τῆς τε πόλεως οὔσης ἐν ταραχῇ, NCIG, n. VI, 9). 1Macc 3:5; 7:22; οἱ— ταρασσόντες = troublers of people (cf. Gal 1:7; 5:10); 1Sam 14:16—the crowd dispersed (niphāl of the Hebrew mûg); Ezek 30:4— “There will be disturbances in Cush”; P.Oxy. 2407, 43: “Do not disturb the assembly”; P.Giss. 40, col. II, 20: ταρασσουσι τὴν πόλιν; UPZ 225, 14; cf. ταραχή, 2Macc 3:30; 10:30; 11:25, letter of Antiochus to Lysias, “desiring that the people should be free of trouble, we have decided . . .”; 13.16; 15.9; Dio Cassius 60.6.6: “the Jews having once again become so numerous that, given their numbers, they could not be expelled from Rome without troubles”; Plutarch, De tranq. anim. 2: in the γυναικεία there arose “woes, troubles, disturbances”; Diodorus Siculus 19.75.5: “they handed over the instigators of the agitation.” In an astrological prediction: ἔσται ταραχή ἐν Αἰ—γύπτῳ (P. Stanford, inv. G 93 bv; published in Ancient Society, vol. 7, 1976, p. 211). In Polybius, ταραχή refers sometimes to a psychological disturbance (5.29.3), sometimes a disturbance, dread on the part of soldiers (5.52.14), sometimes a disorder affecting a flock (5.13.4; 5.15.5; 5.25.4; 5.26.1).

⁴ SEG ix, 189, 3; P.Oxy. 795, 33: κατὰ τὸν πρὸς Εἰ—ουδαίους πόλεμον συμμαχήσαντες; 2554, col. I, 4: ταραχή καὶ πόλεμος (astrological prediction); Philo, To Gaius 119: μέγιστος καὶ ἀκήρυκτος πόλεμος ἐπι— τῶν ἔθνει; Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 4.2.2; cf. A. Fuks, “The Jewish Revolt in Egypt (A.D. 115–117) in the Light of the Papyri,” in Aeg, 1953, pp. 155ff. On the distinction between πόλεμος and ταραχή in the papyri, cf. L. Mooren, in Ancient Society, vol. 4, 1974, pp. 138ff.; but the context is required for discerning the nuance: “disorder” (Plutarch, Cleom. 34.1), “trouble” (Cic. 22.7; 35.1; Ant. 14.4; Diodorus Siculus 17.8.1; 17.9.4; SB 8033, 8; 9681, 9), “agitation” (Diodorus Siculus 17.3.5), “confusion” (ibid. 17.34.7; 17.53.4; 17.88.4; 17.97.3), “tumult” (17.59.6), “insurrection” (17.109.2), etc. Cf. D. M. Pippidi, Scythica Minora, Bucharest-Amsterdam, 1975, pp. 35, 186.

⁵ Rosetta Stone: “all those who showed hostile intentions during the time of troubles” (Dittenberger, Or. 110, 20); cf. UPZ XIV, 90: “at the time of the trouble under the reign of the father of kings, the god epiphanes ” (ἡ ταραχή ε—ν τοι—ς τῆς ταραχῆς χρόνοις); SB 7657, 8: συνέβη ε—ν τῇ γενομένη ταραχῇ (second century BC = 8033); 9681, 9: ε—ν τῇ γενομένη ταραχῇ τω—ν Αι—γυπτίων, republished by F. Uebel (“Ταραχή τω—ν Αι—γυπτίων,” in APF, vol. 17, 1962, pp. 147–162), who comments on the formula in P.Jena, inv. 263, 9 (second century BC); SB 19653 B 9: αι— τοῦ καιροῦ τούτου ταραχαί (second century AD).

⁶ John 14:1, 27: “Let not your heart be troubled”; cf. Job 37:1—“my heart palpitates” (= “is frightened”); Ps 38:11—“my heart does somersaults” (= “is agitated”); 55:5—“my heart shudders” (Hebrew hûl); 109:22—“my heart is wounded” (literally, “pierced,” Hebrew halal); 143:4—“my heart fails me” (literally, “is desolated,” hithpoel of shamam); T. Dan 4.7—ἵνα ταραξῶσι τὴν καρδίαν ταρασσομένης δὲ τῆς ψυχῆς συνεχω—ς; T. Zeb. 8.6. — Trouble takes on a pejorative moral meaning: “The whole life of the fool is subject to convulsions, is agitated and shaken, is perpetual chaos and trouble; it retains no trace of authentic good” (Philo, Conf. Tongues 69); the sinner brings trouble upon his friends (Sir 28:9; cf. Prov 26:21; Wis 14:25). T. Job 36.3—the earth is shaken along with those who inhabit it, i.e., in disorder. Hence the advice, “Do not trouble yourself” (σεαυτὸν μὴ τάρασσε, Marcus Aurelius 4.26).

⁷ Pap.Lugd.Bat. XVII, 14, 30: “I had numerous causes of trouble (ε—ν θορύβοις)... The trouble that surrounds me (τὴν περὶ ε—μέ ταραχήν) will be dissipated” (= P.Ross.Georg. II, 43). P.Oxy. 298, 27, letter from a tax collector: “You wrote me concerning Hermodorus, saying that I am troubling him too much” (πάλι γὰρ πάντα ταρασσει, first century AD); letter of Nero to the Rhodians: οὗς ε—πὶ τῇ+ ψευδω—ς ε—πιστολῇ πρὸς ὑμα—ς κοιμῶν τω— τω—ν ὑπάτων ὀνόματι ταραχέντες πρὸς με ε—πέμψατε (Dittenberger, Syl. 810, 13; AD 55); P.Tebt. 315, 15, letter concerning the accounts of a temple: τοιγαροῦν μηδὲν ταραχθῆς = do not be grieved; P.Alex. 439, 14 = SB 4323; Xenophon, Oec. 8.10: “You also, my wife, if you wish to avoid such confusion”; Eq. 9.4: frighten a horse; Menander, Sam. 672: “you are tormenting yourself” (σαυτὸν ταραττεις); 738: “never have I fallen into such confusion”; Dysk. 313: “I am upset (τετάραγμα) if I have given this impression”; 820: “do not worry about it” (μηδὲν τοῦτό σε ταραττέω); Thucydides 7.86.4: “certain ones were afraid that he would trouble them in their success”; Jos. Asen. 24.12: “When these people heard the words of Pharaoh’s son, they were very troubled”; T. Job 46.3—“Do not be troubled, my daughters, I have not forgotten you.”

⁸ —Ενεβριμήσατο τω— πνεύματι καὶ ε—τάραξεν ε—αυτὸν, John 11:33. We may translate, “He was angry in his spirit and troubled”; or take ε—μβριμάομαι (cf. P.Egerton 2, 51, in the sense of indignation; cf. H. I.

Bell, T. C. Skeat, Fragments of an Unknown Gospel, p. 22), “he growled,” as the effect of an injury; or see it as the translation of the Aramaic ‘eth ‘azaz beruha, “he was troubled in his spirit” (cf. M. Black, Aramaic Approach, pp. 241ff.), or better, given the manuscript variations (C. K. Barrett, St. John, p. 333), eliminate the first verb, which did not exist in the primitive text; it represents a conflation; cf. M. E. Boismard, “Importance de la critique textuelle pour établir l’origine araméenne du quatrième Evangile,” in L’Evangile de Jean (Recherches bibliques, vol. 3), Bruges, 1958, pp. 49ff.

⁹ Νῶν ἡ ψυχὴ μου τετάρακται, John 12:27; cf. X. Léon-Dufour, “Père, fais-moi passer sain et sauf à travers cette heure,” in Neues Testament und Geschichte, (Festschrift O. Cullmann), Zurich-Tübingen, 1972, pp. 157–165.

¹⁰ Gen 42:28; Job 37:1 (Hebrew harad); Gen 45:3; Ps 2:5 (piel and niphah of bahal); Tob 12:12; Wis 5:2.

¹¹ Esth 7:6; Job 24:17; Ps 6:3, 10; 30:7; 48:5; 83:15 (niphah of bahal); Ezek 23:46 (za‘a<^>wâh); Wis 17:4; T. Abr. B 13.

τετραπλοῦν

tetraploun, fourfold, quadruple

tetraploun, S 5074; EDNT 3.353; MM 632; L&N 60.76; BAGD 813

The first attestation of this biblical hapax is in Xenophon,¹ and it hardly appears in the papyri before the third century AD: “Do not fail to write me a letter, keeping in mind that if you do something, you will receive it back quadruple.”² It has a quasi-legal meaning on the lips of Zacchaeus: “If I have wronged anyone, I shall pay it back fourfold” (apodidomi tetraploun, Luke 19:8; cf. M. J. Lagrange, on this text). We may recall Plato’s gradation of fines: the judge sets the penalty at double, triple, or quadruple, according to whether the wound is curable or the victim is disfigured and will no longer be able to defend his country. If the wound is not curable, “the aggressor shall pay quadruple” (ten tetraplasian, Plato, Leg. 9.878 c).

All ancient legal systems had quadruple penalties. In Israel, it was prescribed for the theft of sheep.³ For sins against other people or infidelity to Yahweh, a fifth is added (Lev 5:24; Num 5:7). In a mutilated fragment of the laws of Gortyn, this penalty apparently applies to a sheep thief: “he shall pay quadruple.”⁴ At Rome, for furtum manifestum, “for slave and free alike, the reparation shall be quadruple” (Gaius, Inst. 3.189); likewise, “for property taken by violence, the reparation shall be quadruple” (ibid. 3.209); and for reparation for damage caused by a gathering of people, “the one who gathered them by fraud shall pay a quadruple penalty for each one of them.”⁵

The poena quadrupli for an illegal seizure may have originated in the jurisdiction of the prefects of Egypt, who would have served as a model for imperial legislation.⁶ In any event, the transcript of a trial before the prefect of Egypt Valerius Eudaimon in AD 143 records the conviction of the komogrammateus who presented for a leitourgia someone from his jurisdiction who was aporos, without resources. Here is the sentence: “You have committed an injustice (adikia). You designated a man without resources for a leitourgia. By causing this injustice, you were the cause for the sale of his property. You are liable for a fine. You shall pay the fine to the treasury; but in addition, you shall pay to this man quadruple the price for which his property was sold.”⁷

¹ Xenophon, An. 7.6.7: Two Lacedaemonians declare to the Greeks, “If you join us, you will not only get revenge against an enemy, but also each of you will receive a daric a month; double that for a captain, and quadruple for a general.”

² P.Rein. 117, 14; cf. PSI 1055, 13, a receipt: τοῦ τετραπλοῦ μισθοῦ.

³ Exod 21:37 (cf. Philo, Spec. Laws 4.13); 2Sam 12:6, where the LXX says septuple, but Josephus says quadruple (Ant. 7.150).

⁴ . . .]δοντι τετραπλει—, I.Cret. (ed. M. Guarducci) IV, 41; col. IV, 2; cf. RIJG, vol. 1, p. 395.

⁵ Ulpian, Dig. 47.82 pr. 2–6, 8, 9, 12, 13, 18. Cf. E. Cuq, Manuel des institutions juridiques des romains, Paris, 1928, pp. 565, 573, 582.

⁶ Cf. the edict of Cn. Vergilius Capito, in AD 49, who rewards the informer: “I will have the informer paid quadruple, to be taken from the property of the guilty party” (Dittenberger, Or. 665, 27–29; cf. quadruplator = delator; C. Lécrivain, in DAGR, vol. 4, 797; G. Wesener, PW, vol. 24, col. 710ff.). N. Lewis (“Notationes legentis,” in BASP, vol. 13, 1976, pp. 171ff.) mentions also triple reparation for damage caused to the victim (P.Hal. I, 113; Dittenberger, Or. 572) and a double or triple fine to the public authority: ζημία διπλάσια and τριπλάσια (P.Hal. I, 190–208). Edict of Tiberius Julius Alexander: “If anyone is convicted of falsifying (the tax collected) he shall repay triple [the sum improperly taken?]” (Dittenberger, Or. 669, 59, AD 68).

⁷ —Αποδώσεις . . . τούτῳ ἀνδρὶ τετραπλάσειον, P.Wisc. 23 = SB 9315. Cf. R. Taubenschlag, “P. Wisconsin no. 23,” in JJP, vol. 11–12, 1957–58, pp. 47–49.

τίλλω

tillo, to pick, pluck; to remove something from a shell, husk, or pod

tillo, S 5089; EDNT 3.357; MM 634; L&N 18.9; BAGD 817

In the incident of the ears of grain picked by the disciples on the Sabbath,¹ the usual translation of erxanto tillein tous stachyas is “they began to pick ears of grain” (Matt 12:1; Mark 2:23). The verb tillo, “pick one by one” (hair by hair, leaf by leaf), hence “pluck” (Cratinus, frag. 256), is often used in the middle voice for plucking out the hair or beard as an expression of mourning,² but also for plucking feathers (Dan 7:4; Aristophanes, Av. 285, 352, 365) or leaves.³ In the Koine, it is used for the removal of the fleece from sheep (tois tillousin ta hypodiphthera, P.Cair.Zen. 59430, 3), for a tanner’s plucking the hairs from a hide (P.Petr. II, 32; SB 6990, 3; cf. Aristophanes, Eq. 373: “I will pluck out your eyelashes”), and especially in an agricultural setting for the extraction of a fiber,⁴ for boys who prune palm trees and sweep up the leaves (P.Lond. 131, 384–385), or for a plant that has grains or seeds to be picked out: the chick pea (P.Cair.Zen. 59719, 11), vetch or lentils (SB 9409, col. V, 24 and 31; 9711, col. IV, 2–3; 9715, verso, col. II, 3), sesame (ibid. 6797, 3; cf. 9408, 55). These are shelled. Thus the inhabitants of Great Britain, after storing their cut grain in underground granaries, shell it for their daily food, removing the grains from their hulls (tous palaious stachys tillein, Diodorus Siculus 5.21.5).

E. Delebecque compares this action to that of Jesus’ disciples. They did not pluck the stalks of grain (kalamos) or the ear (stachys) separated from the stalk,⁵ but as only Luke makes clear, they rubbed the ears in their hands⁶ to get the grains out. So we must follow Delebecque’s translation: “It happened that one day he had to pass through a grain field, and his disciples were shelling and eating the grain, rubbing it between their hands.”

¹ Cf. E. Delebecque, “Sur un certain sabbat en Luc VI, 1,” in RevPhil, 1974, pp. 26–29.

² 2Esdr 9:3; Menander, Dysk. 674: “she plucked out her hair, wept, beat her breast”; Philo, Joseph 16; To Gaius 223.

³ Aeschylus, Pers. 209; Theocritus, Id. 2.54; 3.21: Tityrus plucks the leaves from his garland of ivy; Plutarch, Them. 18.4, plucking the leaves and branches from a plane tree; Mor. 233 a.

⁴ P.Lond. 1997, 5: λίνον τίλλειν (with the note of the editor, T. C. Skeat); P.Cair.Zen. 59782, B, 121, 160.

⁵ E. Delebecque, “Les Epis ‘égrenés’ dans les Synoptiques,” in REG, 1975, pp. 133–142; reprinted in idem, Etudes grecques, pp. 76ff.

⁶ Ψώχοντες ται—ς χερσίν, Luke 6:1. The verb ψωχέω is attested only by the physician-poet Nicander of Colophon, in the third century BC, in describing a remedy for the stings of venomous animals: “rub the small, dried, conical grains of savory” (Ther. 629), and Dioscorides, Mat. Med. 5.159.

τρέφω, ἀνατρέφω

trepho, anatrepho, to nourish, raise see also ἀνατρέφω

trepho, S 5142; EDNT 3.369; MM 641; L&N 23.6, 35.45, 35.51; BAGD 825 | anatrepho, S 397; EDNT 1.94; L&N 33.232, 35.51; BAGD 62

The first meaning of trepho is “nourish, raise” (Hippocrates, Alim. 8: “food, that which nourishes,” trophe de to trephon; 21: “food is not food if it does not nourish”; Vict. 1.3.1–2: “water can always nourish”). It also means “thicken, make dense.”¹ The basic meaning is “to facilitate [through appropriate care_ the development of that which is subject to growth.”² It is used most often for “raising” children³—as Jesus was raised at Nazareth⁴—but also for providing subsistence for adults⁵, for fattening animals, for tending plants so that they grow.⁶

From Hesiod and Pindar on (cf. Moussy, Recherches sur τρέφω, pp. 52ff.), trepho is also used to mean “instruct, train, educate,”⁷ and it is in this sense that parents are to use corrections and reprimands inspired by the Lord.⁸

The compound *ana-trepho*⁹ has exactly the same meaning as the simple form, as is attested by usage and the variation in the manuscripts, where the two are easily interchanged.¹⁰ It also means “care for children” (Acts 7:20; Philo, Moses 1.11; Josephus, Ant. 2.238) and “raise” them.¹¹ In the inscriptions, it refers to education by a foster father, as at Aphrodisias, where the epitaph on Zeno’s tomb mentions that also buried there is “Marcus Aurelius Eutyclus, who raised him.”¹² At Jerusalem, St. Paul introduces himself thus: “I am a Jew, born at Tarsus in Cilicia

(gegennemenos), but I was raised (anatethrammenos) in this city, taught (pepaideumenos) at the feet of Gamaliel” (Acts 22:3). The contemporary parallels are numerous: “Moses, of Chaldean race, was born and raised in Egypt” (Philo, Moses 1.5; cf. 1.8, 20); “Our parents brought us forth (egennesan hemas), raised us (ethrepsan), taught us (epaideusan)” (Alleg. Interp. 1.99); “I, Flaccus, who was born (gennetheis), raised (kai trapheis), and educated (kai paideutheis) in imperial Rome” (Flacc. 158; cf. 46); “There are people who have passed from childhood to old age without experiencing the least trouble, either because of a fortunate nature or because of the care that went into their upbringing and education” (dia ten ton trephonton kaipaideuonton epimeleian, Dreams 2.147); “a young man of Jewish birth but raised in Sidon” (trapheis d’ en Sidoni, Josephus, War 2.101); Plutarch, Conv. disp. 8.7; Plutarch, De adul. et am. 25; Num. 5.6. The epitaph of a mercenary: “The land that gave me birth is Apamea, but Egypt is the land that raised me.”¹³

¹ Hence, let the hair grow, Num 6:5 (piel of the Hebrew gadal; cf. Dan 1:5, Theodotion); Homer, Il. 23.142.

² C. Moussy, Recherches sur τρέφω et les verbes grecs signifiant ‘nourrir,’ Paris, 1969, p. 39. Cf. Hippocrates, Alim. 34: “One is nourished (τρέφεται) sometimes to grow and stay alive . . . sometimes to get stronger”; 54: “Dynamis causes everything to grow, nourishes, develops.”

³ Gen 48:15—Elohim has raised me from my childhood (Hebrew ra’âh, ὁ τρέφων με); Pap.Lugd.Bat. VI, 33, 4: τρέφεσθαι τὰ τω—ν —Αντινοέων τέκνα; SB 8681, 3: “I was raised near Isis of Pharos”; Menander, Dysk. 385: “the little girl was not raised among women”; P.Lips. 28, 17–19: ὄνπερ θρέψω . . . ὡς υἱ—ὄν γνήσιον καὶ φυσικὸν ὡς ε—ξ ε—μοῦ γενόμενον; Josephus, Ant. 9.125: “Ahab had seventy children who were raised in Samaria”; Epictetus 2.22.26; 3.22.68: “his children will be raised in the same manner”; Plutarch, Pyrrh. 9.4: “Pyrrhus raised all his sons to be brave and ardent warriors”; Lycurgus 16.7; Diodorus Siculus 19.2.6: “The child (Agathocles) raised in his uncle’s home.” A τροφεύς is a foster father or tutor, often an honorific title given to a benefactor or to an official who makes free distributions of grain or sells it below market, thus “nourishing the city” (Dittenberger, Or. 148; 256, 531; 5ff.; MAMA 6.375; L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 7, pp. 74ff. Idem, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1973, p. 127, n. 329); cf. 1Macc 3:33; 11:39.

⁴ Luke 4:16—ου— ἦν τεθραμμένος. The verb is used especially for nursing in the sense of giving milk, Luke 23:29—the breasts that have not nursed (οἱ— οὐκ ἔθρεψαν). A contract from the year AD 1 with a nurse who “will nurse during the rest of the time” (τοῦτο θρέψει ε—πὶ τὸν ε—νλείποντα χρόνον, P.Ryl. 178, 5); Ps.-Homer, H. Demet. 227; Hippocrates, Nat. Puer. 36.7: “How does milk nourish the child?”; P.Rein. 103, 8, 24: “Let the informant raise her, nurse her with her own milk. . . . I will nurse the slave infant for two years.”

⁵ Matt 25:37—“When have we provided nourishment for you?”; Prov 25:21 (hiphil of the Hebrew ʾajal); Tob 2:10; 14:10; Bar 4:11; Wis 16:23, 26. Meaning “to resupply” (1Kgs 18:13, pual of the Hebrew kûl); Acts 13:20; Rev 6:12, 14; P.Eleph. II, 11; P.Ant. 91, 1 (τρεφόμενον ὑπ ε—μοῦ, “maintained by me”); P.Mich. 477, 38; Menander, Dysk. 471: “Nowhere have I seen a more pitiable domestic staff maintained.” Τρέφω by extension means “guard, preserve the life,” Gen 6:19 (hiphil of the Hebrew hayâh); 50:20; Isa 7:21. In the papyri, especially in marriage contracts and apprenticeship contracts, “to nourish” and “to clothe” are often linked: “The sons or daughters . . . whom she may have by him shall be fed and clothed from the property of the same Elaios” (P.Mur. 115, 9; cf. 116 a, 4, 9); P.Oxy. 275, 14; 2586, 14; P.Oslo 141, 11 (in AD 50); BGU 1050, 12; 1647, 14; P.Fouad 25 verso, col. II, frag. c, 9; 37, 4 (the costs of food and clothing will be the responsibility of the father); PSI 922, 15; 1263, 5; P.Mil. 60, 21; P.Mich. 346 a 6; P.Mil.Vogl. 227, 28; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 14, 26; XVI, 4, 12; 5, 1–13; cf. P.Lips. 28, 18 (act of adoption). ῥεψαμένη = the nourishing earth (P.Oxf. VI, 24; P.Ross.Georg. V, 27, 14; P.Oxy. 2477, 7). Cf. “the plants derive nourishment from the land” (Hippocrates, Nat. Puer. 22.1–2; 23.3, 5; Hippocrates, Vict. 2.37.3; 2.40.20ff.).

⁶ The heavenly Father feeds the birds of the sky (Matt 6:26; Luke 12:24); P.Mich. 203, 21: “take care of my children’s pigs, so that if they come back they will find them.”

⁷ Josephus, Ant. 5.347: “Samuel was raised in the sanctuary”; 9.142; 19.360: “Agrippa had been raised at the court of Claudius Caesar”; cf. Ag. Apion 1.269: they had been raised in the respect of the law (ε—νετράφησαν; cf. 2.204); τὴν τεκοῦσαν καὶ τρέφουσιν (E. Breccia, Iscrizioni greche e latine, n. 163; cf. 40 b 1). Jos. Asen. 2.12: “the large room in which the virgin lived” (ὅπου ε—ντρέθετο ἡ παρθενία); Plutarch, Per. 24.5: “Aspasia trained young hetairai” (παιδίσκας ε—ταιρούσας τρέφουσιν); Phoc. 38; Alex. 5.7: “Many were they who took care of him as educators, pedagogues, and teachers” (τροφει—ς καὶ παιδαγωγοί— καὶ διδάσκαλοι). A τροφεύς is a private tutor or educator (Polybius 31.20.3; I.Delos 1547; SB 1568, 13: “tutor and foster father”); Hymn to Isis: “the one who raised you, Sesoösis” (SB 8141, 31); epitaph from Aline: “You, passer-by, educated by the toils of the Muses” (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 34, 3).

⁸ Eph 6:4—ε—κτρέφετε αὐτὰ ε—ν παιδεία καὶ νουθεσία κυρίου (cf. W. Jentsch, Urchristliches Erziehungsdenken, Gütersloh, 1951, p. 26); cf. Jas 5:5.

⁹ The first certain attestation is in Aristophanes (Ran. 944) with the metaphorical meaning of “fatten”: “I fed her (art) up with monodies.” The verb is a favorite of Xenophons: nourish, care for a horse (An. 4.5.35; Mem. 4.3.10), restore, stir up the courage of the soldiers (Cyr. 5.2.34).

¹⁰ 4Macc 11:15. Cf. W. C. van Unnik, Sparsa Collecta, vol. 1, pp. 266ff., 306ff. (abundant documentation). In the medical vocabulary, however, ἀνατρέφω is used for nourishment selected and administered to rebuild a patient’s strength after an illness, cf. Hobart, Medical Language, p. 207.

¹¹ Acts 7:21—“Pharaoh’s daughter took [Moses] and raised him (aorist middle ἀνεθρέψατο αὐτόν) as her own son”; Wis 7:3–4: “At my birth (γενόμενος) I breathed the common air . . . I was raised (ἀνετρέφην) with care in swaddling clothes”; 4Macc 10:2—“in the same teachings in which we were raised”; Josephus, Ant. 7.149: raise children; 8.201, 216. In the papyri, of which a good number are mutilated (P.Hib. 201, 5; P.Oxy. 2611, 7; P.Ant. 99, 19; P.Cair.Zen. 59262, 4; P.Col. 57, in ZPE, vol. 1, p. 188), with regard to fattening two hogs for the feasts of Arsinoè (P.Cair.Zen. 59379, 1), or a well-brought-up little girl, θυγάτριον νήπιον εὐγενω—ς ἀνατεθραμμένον (P.Oxy. 1873, 9); “I shall raise my unfortunate children” (2479, 17).

¹² Ὁ ἀναθρεψάνεμος αὐτόν, IGLAM, II, n. 1641, a; cf. the epitaph on the tomb of Kladaios, where Αὐρηλία Γλύπτη ἡ ἀναθρεψαμένη αὐτόν is also buried (MAMA VIII, 560, 4). L. Robert (Villes d’Asie Mineure, p. 345) cites an inscription at Antiphellos: τω— ἀνατραφέντι ὑπὸ αὐτῶ—ν ε—ν στοργῇ Αὐρ. Εὐτήχη —Αρσάσιος —Αντιφελλείτη, (cf. this first-century BC epitaph at Thermion: “I will raise [θρέψω] the children that you have had by me in a manner worthy of my love for you, O my companion,” in SB 8960, 27), and in Hellenica, vol. 3, p. 120 (cf. vol. 13, p. 222), TAM II, 338, 434, 940, 956, 974, 990, 1039, 1088. Manaen was foster brother to or had been raised with Herod the tetrarch (Acts 13:1, σύντροφος; cf. the funerary inscription: Αι—λίῳ Διονυσίῃ ἕων σύντροφος ε—πέγραψε; in IGUR, II, n. 285; cf. 400, 586, 591, 896, 1002, 1041).

¹³ Γαι—α δ ἔθρεψεν, SB 5829, 13 = SEG 8.497. Τρέφειν is used for a city or a place; cf. SEG XVII, 373; L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 2, pp. 105, n. 2; 114, n. 2.

τύπος

typos, mold, stamp, statue, idol, any mark left by a blow, model, outline, sketch, decree, verdict

typos, S 5179; TDNT 8.246–256; EDNT 3.372–376; NIDNTT 3.903–907; MM 645; L&N 6.96, 8.56, 58.25, 58.58, 58.59, 58.63, 90.28; BAGD 829–830; ND 1.77–78

Derived from typoo, “mark with an imprint, stamp a form,” the substantive typos properly refers to a mold for producing a shape,¹ or a wooden stamp for making an imprint in clay,² the stroke of a numismatic die, the engraving of seals, a figure that juts out; hence its use for statues and works of sculpture,³ and in particular for idols.⁴ In a general way, typos is used for any mark left by a blow, hence, “If I do not see the nail-print in your hand (ton typon ton helon) and place my finger where the nails were (ton topon ton helon) . . .”⁵

This term is used for the model (Hebrew tabnīt) of the heavenly temple that Moses is told to make (Exod 25:39, quoted at Acts 7:44; Heb 8:5). A typos, then, is an architectural or representational plan, as appears from a contract made with Theophilus, a painter from Alexandria, whereby the artist undertakes to decorate the vault of the house of Diotimus at Philadelphia “according to the model that the owner has seen.”⁶ In the literary arena, Lysias writes a letter to the tribune “in these terms” (echousan ton typon touton, Acts 23:15), literally, “under this form” (cf. 1Macc 15:2), or better, “of which this is the text.” This is as when Ep. Arist. 34 reproduces the letter of King Ptolemy to the high priest Eleazar: “the king’s letter was as follows” (en de he tou basileos epistole ton typon echousa touton). This meaning is often attested in private correspondence and in official documents.⁷

A typos can be an outline, a sketch (Strabo 4.1.1), or a representation of any sort; in this sense Adam was the figure or type of the One who was to come,⁸ i.e., of the second Proto-Human; and the events of the old covenant are figurative and instructive concerning that which can happen to us (1Cor 10:6). The typos contains a teaching.⁹ Hence Rom 6:17—“You obeyed with all your heart the typos didaches that was passed on to you.” We could translate, “the type, form, model of teaching” that constitutes Christian doctrine;¹⁰ but it is preferable to interpret “the rule of doctrine” that constitutes the gospel, since this is a matter of a normative tradition, and in the papyri typos often means “decree, order, rescript,”¹¹ or “judgment, verdict, decision.”¹² It is not surprising that the word should have this legal meaning in the Epistle to the Romans. The nuance would be that of a sort of yardstick according to which the authenticity of the faith could be verified; the opposite of individual conceptions, fantasies, even customs (synetheia, SB 7622, 6). We may cite Plato: “What are the models (hoi typoi) that must be followed in speaking of the gods?” (Resp. 3.379 a).

In ethics, a typos is a model,¹³ hardly different from an example;¹⁴ and it is a technical term in the “pastoral” writings of the NT: the Thessalonians are models for all believers (1Thess 1:7); Timothy and Titus are models through their good works (1Tim 4:12; Titus 2:7); presbyters are models for their flock (1Pet 5:3); and above all the apostle is a model for imitation.¹⁵ Thus being a model for the flock became the golden rule for leaders of Christian communities;¹⁶ the usage of the papyri shows that it is obligatory.

¹ C. Mugler, Terminologie optique, p. 393; Goppelt, “τύπος,” in TDNT, vol. 8, pp. 246–256.

² A. Orlandos, Technique architecturale, p. 93. Cf. Plutarch, Alex. 17.4: “a bronze tablet with archaic characters.”

³ MAMA VI, 14, 2: Δοκτικίου μορφῆς μὲν ἔχω τύπον—“I have here the representation of the body of Docticius, but the image of his divine virtue is carried by every mouth that utters it”; Anth. Pal. 5.274: “I have the image of your beauty stamped on my soul”; 6.56.5: φύσιν . . . τύποις μιμήσατο τέχνη; Josephus, Ant. 15.329: ἀγάλματα καὶ τύπους; SEG VIII, 450, 2: τύπος χιρός (6 BC); SB 8221, 8: τύπον πέτρου. Cf. the accounts for the building of the temple of Asclepius at Epidaurus: “Timotheus, the execution and delivery of the bas-reliefs, for nine hundred drachmas” (C. Michel, Recueil, 584, 36; cf. 687, 18). In the inventory of the ι-εροποιί—τύπος ξύλινος κεραμίδων τω—ν ε—πὶ τὸν Κερατῶνα (I. Delos 442 B, 172), we must interpret, “a wooden relief, representing complementary tiles” (G. Roux, “Le sens de Τύπος,” in REA, 1961, pp. 5–14; cf. E. Will, Le Relief cultuel gréco-romain, 1955, pp. 48–50); capitals sculpted in the Ionic style, ἰωνι τύπων (O. Guéraud, P. Jouguet, Un Livre d’écolier du IIIe siècle av. J.-C., Cairo, 1938, line 146). “Phidias, when he formed the Athena on the Acropolis, put his own image in relief (ε—ντυπώσασθαι) in the middle of the goddess’s shield,” (Ps.-Aristotle, Mund. 399 b 35).

⁴ Amos 5:26—“Sakkuth and Kaiwan, your idols” (Hebrew selem), cited at Acts 7:43—“the τύποι (the figures) that you have made to worship them”; Josephus, Ant. 1.322: Laban’s idols; cf. War 3.420: “the imprint of the chains of Andromeda.”

⁵ John 20:25; cf. Philo, Moses 1.119: “the mark of the wounds caused by the lightning”; Plutarch, Aem. 19.9: “the wound, which left a mark on him for a long time”; Paulus Silentarius: “On the point (of the pike) his teeth-marks are still visible” (Anth. Pal. 6.57.5).

⁶ P.Cair.Zen. 59445, 9 (τὸ παράδειγμα); cf. P.Tebt. 342, 25: κοῦφα ἄρεστὰ τύπῳ τῷ—προκειμένῳ; P.Lond. 1122 b 3 (vol. 3, p. 211): τὸν τύπον τὸν τοῦ ε—λαιουργοῦ παράδος; cf. P.Brem. 51, 5: τὸ δὲ ἕτερον τύπον ἔχων ε—πιθήκης; R. Martin, Architecture grecque, p. 45, n. 9; 177ff.

⁷ Plutarch, Rom. 3.1: “The most trustworthy tradition . . . includes some variations, but here is its general tenor” (τύπῳ δ εἰ—πει—ν τοιοῦτός ε—στι); P.Brem. 49, 13: περὶ τοῦ τύπου ἔγγραφας; P.Flor. 279, 16: κατὰ τὸν αὐτὸν τύπον. In the third century BC: “the form of the usual notice of payment is this” (ἔστιν δὲ ὁ τύπος τῆς διαγραφῆς ὁ ὑποκείμενος, P.Mich. 9, verso 3); “to be enrolled according to the following model” (καταχωρισθῆναι τύπῳ τῷ—δε, P.Oxy. 1460, 12). The formula τῷ—αὐτῷ—τύπῳ καὶ χρόνῳ (P.Flor. 278, col. II, 20; third century AD) recurs constantly in P.Panop.Beatty 1, 28, 63, 130, 135, 262, etc. It refers to the text itself (cf. UPZ I, p. 170); cf. the meaning of the plural οἱ—τύποι τῆς παραρχίας = the minutes (P.Oxy. 1829, 2; with the editors’ note).

⁸ Rom 5:14 (B. Rey, Créés dans le Christ Jésus, Paris, 1966, pp. 45ff.; H. Müller, “Der rabbinische Qal-wachomer-Schluß in paulinischer Typologie—Zur Adam-Christus-Typologie in Röm. V,” in ZNW, 1967, pp. 73–92); hence “typology.” Cf. L. Delporte, “Les Principes de la typologie biblique,” in ETL, 1926, pp. 309ff.; L. Goppelt, Typos: Die typologische Deutung des Alten Testaments im Neuen, Gütersloh, 1939; ET = L. Goppelt, Typos: The Typological Interpretation of the Old Testament in The New, trans. D. H. Madvig, Grand Rapids, 1982; S. Amsler, “La Typologie de l’A. T. chez S. Paul,” in RTP, 1949, pp. 113–128; G. Martelet, “Sacraments, figures et exhortations en I Cor. X, 1–11,” in RSR, 1956, pp. 323–359; 515–559; H. Clavier, “Esquisse de typologie comparée, dans le Nouveau Testament et chez quelques écrivains patristiques,” in SP, vol. 4, Berlin, 1961, pp. 28–49; P. Grelot, Sens chrétien de l’Ancien Testament, Paris-Tournai, 1962, pp. 25ff.; C. Larcher, L’Actualité chrétienne de l’Ancien Testament d’après le Nouveau Testament, Paris, 1962, pp. 489–513.

⁹ The meaning is common in classical Greek: the general conception or idea as distinct from particular cases, cf. Plato, Resp. 3.403 e; 414 a; 6.491 c; 8.559 a; Leg. 4.718c; 9.876 e; Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 1.3.1094b20: a rough outline; 2.7.1107b1; Isocrates, Antid. 15.186: “Here is the outline of intellectual education”; Theophrastus 1.1: “dissimulation, in the general sense of the word” (ὡς τύπῳ λαβεῖ—ν); Polybius 4.38.12: “to have a general idea as close as possible to the truth.”

¹⁰ Cf. J Kürzinger, “Τύπος διδαχῆς und der Sinn von Röm. 6, 17f,” in Bib, 1958, pp. 156–176; F. W. Beare, “On the Interpretation of Romans 6:17,” in NTS, vol. 5, 1959, pp. 206–210; C. H. Dodd, “The Primitive Catechism and the Sayings of Jesus,” in New Testament Essays (Studies in Memory of T. W. Manson), Manchester, 1959, pp. 107–118; U. Borse, “‘Abbild der Lehre’ (Rom. VI, 17),” in BZ, 1968, pp. 95–108. Cf. C. Lattey, “A Note on Röm. VI, 17–18,” in JTS, 1928, pp. 381–384.

¹¹ P.Lond. 77, 47 (vol. 1, p. 234): μηδὲ αἰ—τῆσαι θεῖ—ον καὶ πραγματικὸν τύπον πρὸς τήνδε τὴν διαθήκην; P.Ryl. 75, 8: ζητηθήσεται ὁ πόρος αὐτοῦ, ἤδη μέντοι τύπος ε—στιν καθ ὃν ἔκρεια πολλάκις, Dittenberger, Or. 521, 5 (with note 4).

¹² P.Oxy. 893, 1: “by the verdict of honorable men” (τω— τύπῳ τω—ν ἀξιω[ι]πίστων ἀνδρῶ—ν); 1911, 145: “render a decision” (δοῦναι τύπον εἰ—ς τὴν συγχώρησιν); the formula recurs constantly, 1838, 4: “until I learn what decision I can give him”; 1911, 98, 145: on 16 March 197, the emperors Diocletian and Maximian, to remedy abuses, decided to alter the tax system and set a fixed rule for collection that would have to be followed: τύπον τε σωτήριον δοῦναι καθ ὃν δέοι τὰς εἰ—σφορὰς γίγνεσθαι κατηξίωσαν (P.Cair.Isid. 1, 6; cf. D. Bonneau, “La Disparition de l’episkepsis officielle des terres au IVe ap. J.-C.,” in Proceedings X, pp. 142ff.); P.Gron. 10, 15; C.P.Herm. 16, 5; SB 6270, 21: τὸν τύπον τὸν ἔδωκεν τῇ κώμῃ; 7449, 14; 7622, 6; 8858, 73, 9239, 17.

¹³ 4Macc 6:19—“And if we ourselves should become for youth a model of impiety (ἀσεβείας τύπος), so that we served as an example (παράδειγμα) to those who eat shameful food!”; inscription of Antiochus I of Commagene: τύπον δὲ εὐσεβείας (Dittenberger, Or. 383, 212); P.Ryl. 653, 9: τοῦ ἀρχαίου ἔθους τοῦτον ἔχοντος τὸν τύπον; Strabo 4.1.12: the Cavari “forsook their mores to model themselves after the Romans (εἰ—ς τὸν τω—ν Ῥωμαίων τύπον), whose language and way of life they have taken up.”

¹⁴ Philo, Moses 2.76: “the form of the model (ὁ τύπος τοῦ παραδείγματος) was etched in the spirit of Moses”; Creation 19, 157; Spec. Laws 3.207; 4.173; Unchang. God 43; A. von Blumenthal, “Τύπος und Παράδειγμα,” in Hermes, 1928, pp. 391–414; J. Doignon, “La Trilogie forma, figura, exemplum, transposition du grec ΤΥΠΟΣ, dans la tradition ancienne du texte latin de S. Paul,” in Latomus, 1958, pp. 329–349.

¹⁵ Ἴνα ε—αυτοῦς τύπον δω—μεν, εἰ—ς τὸ μιμεῖ—σθαι ἡμα—ς, 2Thess 3:9; Phil 3:17; cf. P.Lond. 1917, 6: “so that you may raise your hands to God our Master, in imitation of the cross” (ὅπως ε—φάρης τὰς χι—ράς σου πρὸς τὸν

δεσπότην θαιὸν ὡς τοίπως [= τύπος] σταυρω—), cf. line 19. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Din. 7–8 distinguishes the original (ἀρχέτυπος) from works of imitation (μίμησεις) copied from it (ἀποτυπώσασθαι).

¹⁶ Cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, pp. 723ff.

τυφόομαι

typhoomai, to be enveloped in smoke, deluded, dazed, puffed up typhoomai, S 5187; EDNT 3.378; MM 646; L&N 14.64; BAGD 831

Apparently unknown in the papyri,¹ typhoo —formed from the noun typhos, “smoke,” then “vapor that goes to the head”—means “envelop in smoke” and is almost synonymous with typhloo, “to make blind.”² It is used exclusively in a metaphorical sense in its three biblical occurrences—1Tim 3:6; 6:4; 2Tim 3:4—as in secular Greek.³ From Zeno on, typhos, “delusion,” is associated with vanity, vainglory, and ambition.⁴ It is an intellectual vice, the vice of the rhetor who is at the same time unable to see the intellectual light (Philo, Prov. 2.18; Decalogue 4–6) and “unteachable and rebellious” (Drunkness 95; 2Pet 1:9); hence the insult typhos, “deluded old man.”⁵

The passive typhoomai in 1-2Tim refers to a permanent condition: a dazed mind, a blindness (Flight 90; Spec. Laws 1.79; 3.125); to be “puffed up, full of the smoke of vanity, decked out in excessive pretension.”⁶ The pairing “foolish and deluded” speaks for itself.⁷

¹ A fragment of Alcaeus: πάμπαν δ ε—τύφωδ ε—κ δ ἔλετο φρένας (E. Lobel, D. Page, Poetarum Lesbiorum Fragmenta, Oxford, 1955, p. 267, n. 336). A restoration by Koerte of a text of Ps.-Epicharmus: ει—ς τὸ συντυχει—ν ἀηδής ε—στιν ὁ [τετυφωμένος], P.Hib. 2, 5 (cf. C. Austin, Comicorum Graecorum Fragmenta, n. 87). The epitaph for a Christian jurist in Phrygian Eumeneia in the third century: “Let no one, blinded by riches (ε—ν πλούτῳ τυφωθεὶς) conceive presumptuous thoughts” (SEG VI, 210, 26 = GVI, n. 1905, 14).

² “The root typh expresses the idea of smoke, exhalation; typhon is the name of a smoky wind and of a haughty giant” (L. Robin, Platon: Phèdre, Paris, 1947, p. 6, n. 2, on 230 a).

³ Cf. Diogenes denouncing the beclouding vapors (τῦφος), the phantasms of the imagination, or the false human values that obscure the sight of the one thing that is necessary (Diogenes Laertius 6.26.83).

⁴ Philo, Drunkenness 124; Plutarch, De audiendo 39 d; Lucian, Tim. 28; Hermot. 16; cf. N. J. McEleney, “The Vice Lists of the Pastoral Epistles,” in CBQ, 1974, p. 210.

⁵ J. Taillardat, Suétone: Περὶ βλασφημιῶν, Paris, 1967, pp. 143ff. Epictetus 4.1.150: “I know what a slave is who thinks that he is happy: he has lost his head” (τετυφωμένος).

⁶ Philo, Prelim. Stud. 128: οἰ—δει—ν καὶ τετυφω—σθαι καὶ ὄγκον πλείονα τοῦ μετρίου περιβεβλήσθαι; Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.15: “the Greeks are blinded (τετυφω—σθαι) by the thought that they alone know antiquity”; Life 53: “Varus, puffed up with his pretensions.” Sextus Empiricus defines τῦφος as “presumption that causes belief in that which does not exist” (Math. 8.5).

⁷ Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.255: “Apollonius Molon was one of the deluded fools” (τω—ν ἀνοήτων εἷς ἦν καὶ τετυφωμένων); Polybius 3.81.1: “He is foolish and deluded” (ἀγνοεῖ— καὶ τετύφωται).

ὑπερηφάνια, ὑπερήφανος

hyperephania, exaltation, pride, haughtiness; hyperephanos, lifted up, exalted, proud, haughty

hyperephania, S 5243; TDNT 8.525–529; EDNT 3.398; NIDNTT 3.28–30; MM 653; L&N 88.213; BAGD 841 | hyperephanos, S 5244; TDNT 8.525–529; EDNT 3.399; NIDNTT 3.27–32; MM 653; L&N 88.214; BAGD 841

The commonly accepted etymology (hyper + phainomai: someone who shows himself to be above his fellows, elevated) no longer seems acceptable,¹ even if it is taken to mean “visible above others,”² all the more so since the seat of hyperephania is within us.³ The proud person has a heart that is puffed up,⁴ compares himself to others and reckons that he is above them, scorns them (Ps 30:19, exoudenosis); the opposite is the tapeinos.⁵ Moreover, the hyperephanos is constantly associated with the *hybristes*⁶ and the alazon.⁷ These data suggest that we should examine the semantics of these terms circumspectly.

The first known usage of the verb hyperephaneo is pejorative. Hesiod presents the three sons of Sky and Earth as “children full of pride” (hyperephanta tekna) that one hardly dares to name.⁸ Andocides denounces the “lust and pride” of Alcibiades (Andocides, C. Alcib. 4.13), as Demosthenes denounces those who build private dwellings that are more magnificent than the public buildings and that “eclipse the greater part” of these.⁹ The excess that characterizes the proud translates into insolence and misdeeds (Pindar, Pyth. 2.28; Plato, Menex. 240 d). It is a vice of the rich, of kings,¹⁰ and of the successful (Homer, Il. 11.694), whose arrogance “disdains” or “scorns” others.¹¹ So there is praise for a person who shows himself sensitive to the lessons and protests of his fellows, who acts with wisdom and moderation, succeeds in his undertakings, but without for that reason becoming prideful.¹²

This exaltation ends up scorning the divine sovereignty: “It is not thinkable that Achilles had a proud scorn for gods and men” (au hyperephanian theon kai anthropon, Plato, Resp. 3.391 c). Salmoneus, “the most impious and prideful of men . . . thought by his grand deeds to excel Jupiter himself” (Diodorus Siculus 6.7.1–4); “in times of prosperity, men scorn the gods.”¹³ Thus the pagans, and especially the Stoics, who included pride in their catalogs of vices, denounced this sacrilegious excess, which the gods would not leave unpunished.

Nevertheless, hyperephanos could have a favorable meaning,¹⁴ for example, as a personal epithet: “Greet the distinguished Leontas and his family” (P.Oxy. 530, 28; cf. Ibycus, ibid. 1790, frag. 1, 17). It is used for not paying an excessive price for merchandise (PSI 1413, 2, republished in SB 9450), for a proud empire (Aeschylus, PV 405), for odiously luxurious ships (Plutarch, Pomp. 24.4; gilded masts, silver-plated oars), but also for research into causes, a quest of marvelous splendor (Plato, Phd. 96 a); “the art of navigation does not put on grand airs, as if it were working wonders” (Grg. 511 d, hos hyperephanon); “to cast a shadow on an incomparably splendid action” (Symp. 217 e, ergon hyperephanon); at Rome are announced Scipio’s “actions of extraordinary greatness and nobility” (Plutarch, Fab. 26.3, praxeis hyperephanoi); “monuments of an extraordinary greatness” (Plutarch, Per. 13.1, ergon hyp.); “Archidamus fought magnificently” (agonizomenon hyperephanos, Ages. 34.7).

Thus in secular Greek, hyperephania, -os, is used sometimes in a positive sense, sometimes pejoratively. It is essentially an excess with regard to the ordinary and the normal; but usually it is a vice, a person’s exaggerated opinion of himself, which entails disdain for others, even scorn for the divinity. It was the LXX that gave pride—with exceptional insistency—its exclusively moral and religious definition,¹⁵ first of all in sketching the psychological and sociological portrait of the proud person, then and especially in emphasizing the monstrous nature of this vice. And first of all hyperephania is a vice of the heart (Obad 3; 1Sam 17:28; Ps 101:5) that is manifested in insolent, scornful, and lying speech,¹⁶ through attitude and comportment,¹⁷ and especially through actions (poiese en hyperephania, Deut 17:12; cf. Num 15:30; Ps 31:23; Tob 4:13). The proud, insolent person (Jdt 6:19; 9:9; 1Macc 2:47, 49; 2Macc 1:28), presumptuous and haughty (Isa 16:6; Jer 48:29), arrogant (Ps 119:21, 78, 122; 1Macc 1:21; 2Macc 9:7), scorning the neighbor (Ps 123:4; Tob 4:13) and not hesitating to hurt him (Sir 11:30; Ps 36:11; 140:5), even with violence (Prov 8:13; Ps 10:2) to the point of shedding blood (Sir 27:15; 31:26). But this wicked person, who perverts even his companions (Sir 13:1), will be the victim of his own excess (Ps 59:12), abandoned by his friends (Sir 22:22) and will be without support (Sir 51:10; cf. 3:28; Wis 5:8); his “house will be desolate” (Sir 21:4), because “detested by the Lord and by men is pride” (Sir 10:7; 16:8; 25:2). The whole of OT ethics is summed up in Prov 3:34—“God opposes the proud but gives his favor to the humble.”¹⁸

The sentence apparently agrees with the many assertions of pagan authors; but the inspired writers denounce in hyperephania a spiritual perversion and a kind of generalized vice (cf. Ps 73:6) whereby one stiffens the neck and refuses to take the divine commandment into account (Neh 9:16). It is rebellion against the Creator and Lord of all beings. According to Num 15:30, “The one who acts with hand [raised] in pride” outrages Yahweh and dares to rebel against his sovereignty.¹⁹ Hence the scandal: “How will one who is dirt and dust be proud?” (Sir 10:9). If it is already a serious thing humanly speaking to attribute to oneself something that one does not possess or that one has not acquired by one’s own means (Isa 10:13; 14:13-14; 1Cor 4:6-7; Gal 6:3), it is the supreme impiety not to accept one’s creaturely condition: “It is just to submit to God, and as a mere mortal not to pretend to be equal to the divinity” (onta isothea phronein, 2Macc 9:12).

It is remarkable that the NT speaks so sparingly of pride. The substantive hyperephania is found only once, in the words of the Master (Mark 7:22), in a catalog of twelve vices between slander (blasphemia) and moral stupor (aphrosyne), while it is absent from the parallel passage in Matt 15:19. But what is important is to specify the source of these vices: “from within, from the heart of the person, come . . . slander, pride . . .”²⁰ The adjective hyperephanos is used five times, first of all by the Virgin Mary, precisely in the OT meaning (especially Ps 88:11): “He has scattered those who are proud in the thoughts of their heart” (dieskorpisen hyperephanous dianoia kardias auton, Luke 1:51),²¹ that is, the rich and the powerful (as opposed to the tapeinoi in verse 52). Their understanding and their will are oriented against God; they usurp the divine prerogatives. Inevitably, they will be punished and brought low, while the humble will be raised up.

Rom 1:30 and 2Tim 3:2 similarly mention the hyperephanoi in vice lists. In the former case, it is a matter of the past, when philosophers refused to submit their own thought to God’s thought; the latter text has to do with the future, when people will reject the very foundations of morality.²² In both cases the hyperephanoi are linked with the alazones; ²³ immoderation and excess go together. Finally, Jas 4:6 and 1Pet 5:5 both cite Prov 3:34—“God resists the proud [Hebrew lallesim], but gives grace [or kindness, liberality] to the humble”; his favors go to the lowly. In Peter, the quotation of Prov supports the exhortation, “Clothe yourselves with humility.” All of these texts are to be understood in light of the ethics already revealed in the OT.²⁴

¹ An etymology that is “morphologically not very plausible at all” according to P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique.

² Bertram, “ὑπερήφανος,” in TDNT, vol. 8, pp. 525–529.

³ R. C. Trench, Synonyms, pp. 98ff.

⁴ Prov 16:5—ὑψηλοκάρδιος; Rom 12:16—τὰ ὑψηλὰ φρονοῦντες; Tob 4:13—μὴ ὑπερηφανεύου τῆ καρδιά σου.

⁵ Cleobulus, tyrant of Lindos, one of the seven sages, said: Εὐποροῦντα μὴ ὑπερήφανον εἶναι, ἀποροῦντα μὴ ταπεινοῦσθαι (Stobaeus, Ecl. 1.172 a; vol. 3, p. 114). Ep. Arist. 262–263; Ps 88:11; Prov 3:34; Sir 13:20; Luke 1:51–52; Jas 4:6; 1Pet 5:5; etc.

⁶ Cf. Homer, Il. 11.694: “Success had puffed up the bronze-armored Epeians; they despised and outraged (ὑβρίζοντες) us, they plotted wicked things against us”; Pindar, Pyth. 2.28: “his hubris drove him to overweening infatuation” (ὑβρις εἰς ἀνάταν ὑπεράφανον ὤρσεν); Aristotle, Rh. 2.16.1390b33: “the rich tend to be outrageous and prideful” (ὑβρισταὶ καὶ ὑπερήφανοι); Lev 26:19—τὴν ὑβριν τῆς ὑπερηφανίας ὑμῶν; Isa 2:12; 13:11; 16:6; Prov 8:13; 2Macc 1:28; Rom 1:30, etc. Cf. P.Cair.Zen. 59080, 4: μαστιγῶν ε—μὲ ὑπερηφάνως.

⁷ Philo, Virtues 171; Polybius 5.33.8; Josephus, War 6.172: “[Jonathan] was arrogant (ἀλαζῶν) and full of scorn (ὑπερήφανος) for the Romans”; Rom 1:30; 2Tim 3:2.

⁸ Hesiod, Th. 149. This verb, sometimes intransitive (BGU 48, 19), expresses insolence and arrogance (Josephus, War 3.1; Ant. 4.38; Polybius 6.10.8), but usually signifies “to scorn, disdain”: Herod scorned his adversaries (Josephus, War 1.344); Pheroras, under the spell of his passion for a slave-girl, scorned the king’s daughter to whom he was engaged (Ant. 16.194). It can have a weakened meaning; Serenos writes to his sister Posidonia: “You are neglecting me” (σὺ δὲ ὑπερηφανεῖς με, P.Stras. 304, 9; second-third century); likewise Flavius Herculanus to a woman who cannot come to celebrate his son’s birthday: “surely you have more important things to do, and that is why you neglect us” (ἀλλὰ πάντως κρείττονα εἶχες διὰ τοῦτο ὑπερηφάνηκας ἡμας).

⁹ Demosthenes, Org. Fin. 13.30, τω—ν πολλω—ν ὑπερηφανωτέρας.

¹⁰ Plato, Leg. 3.691 a: “an evil of kings who live in pride and softness” (νόσημα ὑπερηφάνως ζώντων); Aristotle, Rh. 2.16; Xenophon, Cyr. 5.2.27ff. (the Assyrian monarch in his arrogance was violent against the weak); Ep. Arist. 211, 262; Diodorus Siculus 24.9.2; P.Flor. 367, 12.

¹¹ In a chapter on ὑπερηφανία, Theophrastus says, “Pride is disdain (καταφρόνησις) of all that is not oneself”; Josephus, Ant. 4.224: “arrogant and filled with scorn for the laws”; War 6.172; Diodorus Siculus 24.9.2: Claudius, drunk with the pride inspired by his forebears, scorned everyone.

¹² Plato, Resp. 3.399 b, μὴ ὑπερηφάνως ἔχοντα. Cf. Ep. Arist. 170, 269: “When pride and stubborn pretension guide conduct, dishonor follows naturally along with the loss of reputation.” In a letter from the eighth century, the writer (a monk?) demands that right be observed and asks that no one take account of his “cockiness” or accuse him of pride (κατ’ ὑπερηφανείαν, P.Apoll. 69, 17). A magical papyrus invokes Anubis to use all his power against Tigeos, ἀνάπαυσον αὐτὴν τῆς ὑπερηφανείας καὶ τοῦ λογισμοῦ καὶ τῆς αἰ—σχύνης (Pap.Graec.Mag. 17, a 6–7; vol.2, p.138).

¹³ Diodorus Siculus 23.11.1; but “prideful mortals are equally hated by the gods” (13.21.4); “fate somehow was pleased to humiliate the arrogance of these proud men, by granting a success completely opposite to the hopes they had conceived” (20.13.3). God decided to punish the Sodomites for their hyperephania (Josephus, Ant. 1.195). “Whoever undertakes to act μεθ’ ὑπερηφανίας provokes the wrath of God” (Philo, Virtues 171; the only use of the term in this author). “Eros, a jealous god, inexorable to the hyperephanoi” (Xenophon of Ephesus, Ephes. 1.2.1); UPZ 144, 50–51: νέμεσις ε—στιν ἀπὸ Διὸς τοι—ς ὑπερηφάνοις (second century BC).

¹⁴ Cf. Alexis, in Athenaeus 2.60 a: παρετίθη ὑπερηφανω—ς ὄζουσα τω—ν ὦρω—ν λοπάς (cf. J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 2, p. 502).

¹⁵ The corresponding Hebrew terms are especially the words ga'al (and its derivatives), “exalt oneself, ascend, inflate”; zed, “prideful, haughty”; zadon, “pride, arrogance”; lîs, “mock, ridicule”; rûm, “be high, elevated; be proud, exalted.” P. L. Schoonheim (“Der alttestamentliche Boden der Vokabel ὑπερήφανος Lukas I, 51,” in Placita Pleiadia opstellen aangeboden aan Prof. G. Sevenster, Leiden, 1966, pp. 235–246; reprinted in NovT, 1966, pp. 235–246) notes the many nuances of these terms in various contexts: (a) insolence, arrogance, presumption (as opposed to humility); (b) mockery, derision, disdain, lying; (c) scorn for the law, wickedness, sin; (d)

impertinence, effrontery, intimidation, impudence; (e) rising up against God and refusing to recognize his omnipotence.

¹⁶ Ps 17:10; 31:18; 119:51, 69, 78; Sir 23:8—“the insolent and the proud will be caught in the snare of their lips”; 27:15, 28—“sarcasm and insults are the business of the proud”; 32:12—“do not sin with proud speech” (λόγω ὑπερηφάνῳ).

¹⁷ Cf. “haughty eyes” (Ps 18:27). Esther gets rid of her magnificent clothing (Esth 4:17k, τῶ—ν ὑπερηφάνων); Ezek 7:20; Dan (Theodotion) 4:34—“those who walk with pride.”

¹⁸ On the pride=humility contrast, cf. Sir 13:20. It is said over and over that God breaks the violence of pride (Lev 26:19), punishes it beyond measure (Ps 31:23), makes the proud to vanish (Isa 13:20), and especially abases the one who is raised up (Isa 2:12), just as he “brings low the pride of the sea” (Ps 89:10; cf. 18:27; 94:2; Job 22:29; 40:11-12; Dan [Theodotion] 4:34.) The proud who are so called by name are the giants (Wis 14:6), Moab (Isa 16:6), Sodom (Ezek 16:49, 56), Sennacherib (Sir 48:18), Nebuchadnezzar (Dan 5:20 [Theodotion]; cf. Jdt 6:2—“Who is God, if not Nebuchadnezzar?”), Nicanor (1Macc 7:34), especially Antiochus Epiphanes (1Macc 1:21; 2Macc 5:21; 7:36; 9:4, 7, 11; 4Macc 4:15; 9:30); cf. Herod (Josephus, Ant. 16.4), Greece (Sib. Or. 3.732), Alexandria (ibid. 5.90), the Persians (ibid. 8.168), Pompey “the Impious” (Pss. Sol. 2.1), who “did not take into account that he was a human . . . he said, ‘I will be master of the land and the sea.’ He did not recognize that it is God who is great, powerful through his immense might” (vv. 32–33). —On the other hand, Moses’ father-in-law advised him to choose as leaders only worthy men who “hate pride” (Exod 18:21).

¹⁹ Sir 10:12—“The beginning of human pride is to depart from the Lord,” which is sin (verse 13); “wisdom is far from pride” (15:8); cf. Babylon saying in its heart, “I and I alone!” (Isa 47:8).

²⁰ Mark 7:22; cf. C. E. Carlston, “The Things that Defile (Mark VII, 14) and the Law in Matthew and Mark,” in NTS, vol. 15, 1968, pp. 75–96.

²¹ E. Delebecque (“Luc I, 51 b, texte et traduction,” in BAGB, 1973, pp. 327–331, reprinted in Etudes grecques, pp. 15–23), on the basis of a^c and certain miniscules that have the genitive singular διανοίας, suggests διανοίας and uses the Old French “forcènement” (the condition of having lost one’s reason), hence “les superbes, il prend le forcènement de leur coeur pour les dissiper.” Str-B, vol. 2, pp. 101ff., cites the rabbinic judgments on pride.

²² Cf. 1QS 4.9–11, where these vices come from a perverse spirit. Cf. N. J. McEleney, “The Vice Lists of the Pastoral Epistles,” in CBQ, 1974, pp. 211ff.

²³ Cf. above, vol. 1, pp. 63ff. A. J. Festugière, Vie spirituelle, pp. 11–15.

²⁴ Theologians distinguish pride from ἀλαζονεία (vainglory, ambition, presumption, conceit) and define it as “excessive love of one’s own excellence,” which leads to substituting oneself for God (St. Augustine, Civ. 14.13; 19.12), hence a mortal sin and the source of all vices (Gregory the Great, Moral. 31.45), notably disobedience and blasphemy. This was the sin of the devil and of the first man (Thomas Aquinas, Ia, q. 63, a. 1–3; IIa IIae, q. 162–163). Cf. T. Deman, “Orgueil,” in DTC, vol. 11, 2, col. 1410–1434.

ὑπεροράω

hyperorao, to look down on, scorn, disdain, ignore, abandon

hyperorao, EDNT 3.399; L&N 30.49; BAGD 841

Etymologically, this verb means “look over, see from above,” and in a pejorative sense “look down on, scorn, disdain.” In the LXX and in the papyri, only this second meaning is attested: “You will be scorned” (ese hypereoramene, Nah 3:11; niphal of the Hebrew ‘alam, “hide, avert the eyes”); “their money will be scorned” (Ezek 7:19); “the jealous person scorns people” (Sir 14:8); P.Hamb. 23, 36: hos an ei nomon boetheias hypereidomenois (sixth century); “the Roman general, disdainful because of his anger and not trusting them, delayed so long . . .” (Josephus, War 2.534). Hence the meaning “to abandon,” for example the ass that has fallen on the road and must be helped up (Deut 22:4); “I will not leave you or abandon you” (Josh 1:5; cf. Ps 9:22); “to leave off, desist” (Isa 58:7); Saul could not leave the country to be ravaged by the Philistines (hyperidein ten gen kakotheisan, Josephus, Ant. 6.281); a noble person cannot extricate himself from danger and remain indifferent to one who threatens his friends (ibid. 14.357).

Finally, where we say “scorn, disdain,” we must understand the meaning “make no allowance for”; cf. 2Macc 7:11—“I got these from heaven, but because of his laws I do not take them into account” (hyperoro tauta). Hence the preponderant use of this verb with respect to the possibility that a prayer will not be answered.¹ It is used often, and only in this sense, in the papyri of the second century BC: “Being a defenseless woman, I beg and pray you not to leave me bereft of what is rightly mine”;²

“I beg you then, O king, not to neglect me, who has been wronged (me hyperidein me adikoumenon), and to order, to the contrary . . .” (P.Magd. 8, 12).

In all these cases, the one in the superior position is not supposed to scorn the suppliant, is asked not to be indifferent but to intervene;³ a contrast is drawn between a possible lack of action and the assuming of a positive stance. This is precisely the case in Acts 17:30—“God, having averted his eyes from these times of ignorance (hyperidon), now makes known. . . .”⁴ Obviously this is not “to scorn” but something more like “to ignore.” God decides not to remember, not to see any longer: “closing his eyes” (Bible de Jérusalem; cf. NJB, “overlooking”). Literally, he no longer takes the guilty past into account but takes another approach: he calls to repentance.

¹ Μὴ ὑπερίδης τὴν δέησίν μου, Ps 55:2; cf. Philo, Joseph 171: “Did we not, without pity, scorn the prayers and supplications of a brother who had committed no offense against us?”

² P.Tebt. 776, 28; cf. 777, 10: μὴ ὑπεριδει—ν με κατεφθαρμένον ε—ν τῇ φυλακῇ; 953, 6; PSI 816, 5; 1309, col. II, 11; UPZ 2, 24; 5, 46; 6, 32; 15, 33; 16, 22; 20, 42; 45, 14: μὴ ὑπεριδει—ν ἡμα—ς θλιβομένας.

³ P.Rein. 7, 26: “I beg you not to show yourself indifferent to the ambush in which this pitiless man has trapped me but to intervene in my behalf” (petition to the king, second century BC).

⁴ Codex Bezae, probably taking its cue from Sir 28:7 (πάριδε ἄγνοιαν), reads παριδών (cf. the Vulgate, “despiciens”). If we translate “overlooking” or “passing over” the times of ignorance, they become parenthetical, a period that has ended; on this verse cf. E. des Places, “Tempora vel momenta (Acts 1:7; cf. 17:26 and 30),” in Mélanges Tisserant, pp. 105–117; idem, “Acts XVII, 30–31,” in Bib., 1971, pp. 526–534.

ὑπηρέτης

hyperetes, rower, crew member, subordinate, servant, police officer, bailiff see also δούλος, οἰ—κέτης, οἰ—κει—ος, μίσθιος, μισθωτός

hyperetes, S 5257; TDNT 8.530–544; EDNT 3.400; NIDNTT 3.544, 546; MM 655; L&N 35.20; BDF §187(2); BAGD 842

It seems that the word originally meant a rower (erasso, to row), one who was on a lower deck of a trireme and hence in an inferior position; then a member of the crew, a sailor under the orders of a skipper;¹ finally, a subordinate, a subaltern, often associated with doulos (John 18:18; Philo, Worse Attacks Better 56) and diakonos.² Anyone who is in service to another person is a hyperetes: hyperetes to kyrio (P.Ryl. 234, 1–2; Philo, Post. Cain 50; Sacr. Abel and Cain 44); but there is a great variety of functions, from the valet who accompanies the hoplite on campaigns (Thucydides 3.17.3), the steward of the emperor's property (IGLS 1631, 2), a tyrant's bodyguards (Plutarch, Praec. ger. rei publ. 28.822 e; Cleom. 37.9), and military administrative officers (P.Rein. 1, 14; UPZ II, 214, 1–2) or other administrators (BGU 2247, 21), to a general's aide-de-camp (Xenophon, Cyr. 2.4.4), a prefect's servant (SB 1126, 11–13), a king's servant³—which is clearly the meaning in John 18:36, “If my kingdom was of this world, my subordinates (hoi hyperetai hoi emoi, angels, disciples, my militia?) would have fought”⁴—and “temple servants” (Philo, Spec. Laws 1.152).

In the papyri, hyperetai appear in the third century BC as people in the service of Zeno,⁵ meaning domestic servants but also “workers” (ergatai, P.Col.Zen. 52, 4), or employees of the master,⁶ among whom there is a hierarchy.⁷ We may compare the servants of the high priest in Matt 26:58; Mark 14:54, 65.

In the NT, hyperetai are usually “police officers,” as in the Greek tradition.⁸ Thus the judge hands a person over to the apparitor or bailiff;⁹ these are the hyperetai who came to arrest Jesus and made their report once their mission was accomplished (John 7:32, 45, 46; 18:3, 12, 18, 22; 19:6), like those who discovered that the apostles were missing from the prison (Acts 5:22, 26). They are always portrayed as servants of the high priests, the Pharisees, the Sanhedrin, or the strategos of the temple; in other words, they are always subordinates.¹⁰

This usage conforms to the papyri, which use hyperetes for subordinate functionaries in the civil and judicial administration.¹¹ They take part in expert evaluations (PSI 448, 13; P.Lond. 214, vol. 2, p. 161), autopsies,¹² promises made under oath,¹³ court hearings.¹⁴ They deliver summonses and verdicts to parties in litigation,¹⁵ give an accounting to their overseers (BGU 1775) and by their signature certify that they have in fact passed on a petition to the party concerned: ho deina hyperetes metadedoka (P.Tebt. 434; P.Petaus 17, 34; 23, 1; 24, 30; SB 7870, 22–23; 7744, 11) or metedothe dia tou deina hyperetou (BGU 226, 24–25; P.Ross.Georg. II, 27; Archives de Kronion, ed. D. Foraboschi, n. 29, 12; 42, 22). Working under the office of the strategos (P.Oxy. 294; 475; P.Fouad 22, col. II, 27; P.Mil.Vogl. 129 and 156; P.Meyer 3), these officials had special responsibility for publicizing enactments. They posted them to bring them to the attention of the public and by so doing conferred an official and sure character upon them.¹⁶

The fact that hyperetai were “official witnesses” and “guarantors of the public trust”¹⁷ helps explain the use of this term for ministers of the new covenant, especially since the Greeks used the expression “servant of the gods”¹⁸ and had hyperetai in their cultic assemblies.¹⁹ Christ appeared to Saul to make him a “minister and witness” of the things that he had seen (Acts 16:16), and the apostle asks “that we be considered servants of Christ and stewards of the mysteries of God.”²⁰ At Salamis, John Mark is the hyperetes of Paul and Barnabas,²¹ not with respect to material services²² but as an aide, a co-worker, helping in the ministry, just as a physician’s assistant cooperates with the physician in treating a sick person.²³ The word has this same religious meaning in Luke 1:2—“What has been handed on to us by the servants of the word” (hyperetai tou logou).²⁴ All the agents of the spread of the gospel play on their own level the role of the secular hyperetai: they promptly obey orders received from a superior²⁵ and they officially pass along a message, carrying it to parties who have an interest in it.²⁶

The hyperetes in Luke 4:20, to whom Jesus gives the scroll after rolling it up, is the verger-sacristan and synagogue warder, the hazzan, an official subordinate to the archisynagogos.²⁷

¹ Cf. τοὺς ἐ—πὶ τοῦ πλοίου ὑπηρέτας (SEG XII, 112, 14; I.Rhamn., add. n. XVII, 14). On the ὑπηρεσία of warships, cf. Y. Garlan, “Quelques travaux récents sur les esclaves grecs en temps de guerre,” in Actes du Colloque 1972 sur l’esclavage, Paris, 1974, pp. 18ff.; M. P. Ervagault, M. M. Mactoux, “Esclaves et société d’après Démosthène,” ibid., p. 84; A. Ortega, “Metáforas del deporte griego en S. Pablo,” in Helmantica, 1964, pp. 103ff.; Rengstorf, in TDNT, vol. 8, p. 534.

² Philo, Contemp. Life 75; Joseph 241; cf. “The people used to be the masters (δεσπότης) of the politicians; today, they are their servants (ὑπηρέται)” (Demosthenes, C. Arist. 23.209; cf. Aristophanes, Vesp. 518; Plutarch, Agis 1.4). Plato contrasts ἄρχων and ὑπηρέτης (Resp. 8.552 b). At Athens, public slaves are often called ὑπηρέται.

³ Prov 14:35; Wis 6:4; Dan 3:46 (Theodotion); Xenophon, An. 1.9.18: “Cyrus had better auxiliaries”; Philo, Plant. 55. A lictor, an attendant (Plutarch, Ti. Gracch. 12.5), an assistant (P.Oxy. 3182, 17; 3245, 8: ὑπηρέτης τῆς τάξεως), a court clerk, an employee, a treasury agent, an aedile, even a legate are described as ὑπηρέται (Plutarch, Phoc. 35.1; Cat. Min. 16.3, 4, 7; 28.1; 36.1; 43.3–4). Cf. H. J. Mason, Greek Terms, p. 96. There are also ἀρχιυπηρέται who are part of the administrative, financial, or military hierarchy, whose functions are hard to define: chief superintendent, treasurer, supervisor of employees, assistant commander to a strategos, etc., P.Cair.Zen. 59006, col. III, 52; P.Oxy. 1253, 21; 3105, 24; 3116, 19; 3131, 12; P.Stras. 46–49; P.Ryl. 590, 2; SB 599, 61; 8246, 46; 9593, 4; UPZ 14, 97; O.Wilck. 1538, 1; Prosop.Ptol., vol. 2, n. 2435–2452; 4406–4407.

⁴ Cf. Antigonus, sending servants and friends several times to get information (Plutarch, Demetr. 17.4).

⁵ P.Col.Zen. 64, 4: τοὺς λοιποὺς ὑπηρέτας; P.Cair.Zen. 59062, 14; 59089 (= SB 6820); 59682, 14: ὑπηρέταις καὶ τοῖς κατὰ τὴν οἰκίαν; PSI 343, 6; 599, 18; 674, 5, 10; P.Lond. 1934, 6–7; 1940, 1.

⁶ Τω—ν ὑπηρετω—ν μου, P.Cair.Zen. 59832, 8; cf. line 14: τω—ν ὑπηρετησάντων μοι; P.Tebt. 890, 71, 115 (second century BC); 891, 33; 1097, 9; P.Giss. 67, 14; P.Stras. 122, 12; P.Harr. 96, 33; P.Oxy. 527, 5; P.Genova 11, 2: ε—ν τοι—ς ὑπηρέταις (letter of recommendation from the first century AD); P.Ross.Georg. II, 18, 301: ὑπηρετω—ν καὶ ποιω—ν τὰ ἀνήκοντα; P.Lond. 131, 373 (vol. 1, p. 181): “To Epimachus, for the son of the same Hephaestion, who is leaving for Hermopolis in the service, eleven obols” (cf. A. Swiderek, Propriété foncière, p. 21); 1934, 7; 1940, 1; 2050, 5; 10, 2074, 21 (cf. 2067, 4: ὑπηρετικόν); I.Ilium, n. 63, 11: τὸν δὲ ὑπηρέτην λειτουργει—ν.

⁷ There are ἀρχυπηρέται, superiors, P.Cair.Zen. 59006, col. III, 52; UPZ 121, 19; P.Ryl. 590, 2; BGU 21, col. III, 1; 466, 1–3; 1035, 3; P.Oxy. 1253, 21.

⁸ The ὑπηρέται, under the orders of the Eleven, are responsible for the execution of criminals (Plato, Phd. 116); Aelius Aristides 45.68 d: ὁ δικαστὴς παραδίδωσι τοι—ς ὑπηρέταις. “The Eleven entered with their agents (σὺν τοι—ς ὑπηρέταις), led by Satyrus (ἡγουμένου αὐτω—ν Σατύρου)” (Xenophon, Hell. 2.3.54); “each time a man went out, the agents put handcuffs on him” (ibid. 2.4.8); Josephus, War 1.655: “the other prisoners were handed over to the executioners” (παρέδωκεν τοι—ς ὑπηρέταις); Ant. 16.232; Diodorus Siculus 17.30.4; 17.107.3; Plutarch, Agis 19.8–9; Cleom. 38.9. In Egypt, ὑπηρέται imprisoned debtors to the state treasury (P.Oxy. 259, BGU 1821) because they were subordinate agents to the tax collectors (P.Tebt. 874, 6; P.Lille 13, 4; SB 1178, 7529).

⁹ Matt 5:25. Cf. J. Blinzler, Trial of Jesus, pp. 61–72; see above, pp. 152ff.

¹⁰ Ep. Arist. 111: “The king set up chrematistai and their personnel (καὶ τοὺς τούτων ὑπηρέτας) in all the nomes to keep the tax farmers from contributing to the reduction of the provisions for the city”; cf. Dittenberger, Or. 106, 15 = SB 8877. At Lebadaea in Boeotia, in the second century BC, an agonothetes, turning in the accounts for his expenditures for the feast of the Basaleia, says that he did not record the sums paid to the personnel and the undersecretary (οὐκ ἀπελογοισάμην δὲ οὔτε ὑπηρέταις οὔτε ὑπογραμματεῖ—, M. Holleaux, Etudes d'épigraphie, vol. 1, pp. 131ff.).

¹¹ P.Corn. 34, 2. They are in the service of the epistates of the nome, working as justices of the peace (UPZ 161; P.Grenf. 1, 11 = Chrest.Mitt., n. 32); serving the praktores (P.Hamb. 168, a, 19; P.Tebt. 814, 22; P.Hal., pp. 116–119), the prefect (CPR I, 18, 35: ὑπηρέτης ἡγεμονικός; BGU 592, 10; P.Oxy. 1102, 25), the idios logos (BGU 388, col. 3; P.Princ. 22), or the archidikastes (P.Mil.Vogl. 25, col. V, 150; P.land. 9; P.Fouad 24, 6), the dioiketes (P.Oxy. 259, 13; P.Flor. 312, 7–8; P.Tebt. 874, 5), the exegetes (P.Tebt. 397, 28; BGU 107, 13–14), the kosmetes (C. Pelekidis, Ephébie attique, pp. 207–268), the chrematistes (BGU 1775, 2; 1776, 11), the nomarchos (1821, 15), etc. The basic study that I am summarizing is that of H. Kupiszewski, J. Modrzejewski, “Etude sur les fonctions et le rôle des hypèrètes dans l’administration civile et judiciaire de l’Egypte gréco-romaine,” in JJP, vol. 11–12, 1958, pp. 141–166; cf. S. J. De Laet, Portorium, Bruges, 1949, pp. 302, 396ff. We may also read the instructions of the πρωτοστάται of Oxyrhynchus to the hyperetes (P.Oxy. 2849).

¹² Death certificates and medical examinations, P.Oxy. 51, 5–7; 475, 4–9, 27–28; 1556, 1–3; P.Oslo 95, 9–12; BGU 647, 5–6; PSI 455, 3; P.Lips. 42, 23; P.Phil. 1, 29.

¹³ P.Fay. 24, 20–21; P.Fouad 22, col. II, 19; BGU 581, 15–17; 891, col. V, 19. They notarize signatures, P.Flor. 312, 8; P.Oxy. 916, 18–19; BGU 388.

¹⁴ When the hyperetes leaves the room, the hearing is over: ε—ξῆλθεν Σαραπίων ὑπηρέτης (SB 7404, 40; cf. P.Stras. 546, 28; P.Oxy. 1102, 24–25; P.Mil.Vogl. 25, col. V, 15; BGU 613, 36, 42; P.Ryl. 77, 31; Pap.Lugd.Bat. VI, 15, 146; 24, 82).

¹⁵ P.Mich. 526, 19; P.Princ. 16; BGU 226; 1775; 1825, P.Tebt. 104; P.Stras. 5; P.Oxy. 2187; P.Fouad 22, col. I, 21; SB 7870, 8001. The bailiff drafts texts: ἀντίγραφον δι’ ὑπηρέτου (P.Stras. 566, 19).

¹⁶ Αὐρήλιος Διονυσόδωρος ὑπηρέτης πρόεις δημοσίᾳ κατεχώρισα (P.Paris 69 = Chrest.Wilck., n. 41, col. I, 18); P.Hamb. 3; BGU 222; 578; 613; P.Tebt. 434; P.Lond. 358 (vol. 2, p. 172); P.Flor. 2; P.Oxy. 1057; CPR I, 20, etc. N. Hohlwein, Le Stratège du nome, pp. 59ff.

¹⁷ This is the conclusion of the treatment by H. Kupiszewski and J. Modrzejewski, “Etude sur les fonctions et le rôle des hypèrètes,” p. 161.

¹⁸ Aeschylus, PV 954: ὡς θεω—ν ὑπηρέτου; cf. 983; Sophocles, OT 712: servants of Apollo; Phil. 990; Philo, Decalogue 119: “parents are the ministers of God in procreation”; 178; Flight 66; Unchang. God 57: the Logos is the minister of the divine gifts; Giants 12; Post. Cain 92; Spec. Laws 3.122; Change of Names 87: an angel, a servant of God; Dreams 1.143; Josephus, War 2.321: “Every priest, every minister of God (πα—ς δὲ ὑπηρέτης τοῦ θεοῦ) . . . fell to his knees”; Epictetus 3.22.82, the Cynic berates those whom he meets “as a servant of the common father, Zeus” (τοῦ κοινοῦ πατρὸς ὑπηρέτης τοῦ Διός).

¹⁹ I.Lind. 487, 20 mentions hyperetai along with priests, musicians, and hymn-singers; cf. I.Magn. 239 a; P.Lond. 2710 = SB 7835 = C. Roberts, T. Skeat, A. D. Nock, “The Guild of Zeus Hypsistos,” in HTR, 1936, pp. 40, 50, 79–80; cf. F. Poland, Geschichte des griechischen Vereinswesens, Leipzig, 1909, p. 391.

²⁰ 1Cor 4:1—ὡς ὑπηρέτας Χριστοῦ καὶ οι—κονόμους μυστηρίων θεοῦ; ὑπηρέτης has been substituted for the διάκονος of 3:5 (cf. 2Cor 11:23; Col 1:25); ὑπηρέτης is the term for a subdeacon in IGLS 1130, 2; cf. J. Murphy O’Connor, Paul on Preaching.

²¹ Acts 13:5; cf. B. T. Holmes, “Luke’s Description of John Mark,” in JBL, 1935, pp. 63–72; C. S. C. Williams, A Commentary on the Acts of the Apostles, London, 1957, p. 156; J. Renié, Actes des Apôtres, p. 184; P. Menoud, Jésus-Christ et la foi, Neuchâtel-Paris, 1975, p. 89: “This term hyperetes does not seem to have the same meaning when applied to John Mark as applied to Paul. John Mark is an auxiliary, secondary with respect to the missionaries Barnabas and Paul. Paul is at the same time ὑπηρέτης καὶ μάρτυς (21:16), i.e., a witness, like the Twelve, but in second place, not an apostle like them, clearly because he is a latecomer to the circle of witnesses.”

²² As understood by D and the Harclean Syriac, ὑπηρετοῦντα αὐτοι—ς; E, ἔχοντες μεθ ε—αυτω—ν, ει—ς διακονίαν; E. Trocmé (Le “Livre des Actes” et l’histoire, Paris, 1957, pp. 44, 69) translates “domestic.”

²³ Cf. Plato, Leg. 4.720 a: ὑπηρέται τω—ν ι—ατρω—ν. On the role of the ὑπηρέτης in examinations by the δημόσιος ι—ατρός, BGU 647; P.Lips. 42; P.Athen. 34; P.Oxy. 475; P.Flor. 59; P.Lond. 214 (vol. 2, p. 161); cf. E. Boswinkel, “La Médecine et les médecins dans les papyrus grecs,” in Eos (Symbolae Taubenschlag), 1956, vol. 1, pp. 181–190. In a Greek tabella defixionis of the second-third century, a physician and his assistant (ὑπηρέτης) are cursed (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1955, 290, n. 292; cf. 1958, p. 197, n. 82). Hobart (Medical Language, pp. 88–89) cites a goodly number of occurrences of this term in the medical writers: the ὑπηρέται are aides who accompany practitioners, and especially those who assist surgeons (Hippocrates, Off. 2), “attentive to the orders of the one who commands them” (ibid. 6; cf. Art. 47; Epid. 5.95). In the military administration, ὑπηρέται are adjuncts; their competence and authority is attested by P.Gur. 19, 4–6; P.Rein. 14, 31; UPZ 205, 7–8; 209, 11–12; 214, 1–8; C.Ord.Ptol. 19, 16; cf. M. Launey, Armées hellénistiques, pp. 125, 325, 767, 832, n. 2.

²⁴ Cf. A. Feuillet, “Témoins oculaires et serviteurs de la Parole (Lc. I, 2 b),” in NovT, 1973, pp. 241–259.

²⁵ Cf. BGU 467, 112ff. Philo, Spec. Laws 3.167; Conf. Tongues 91; Good Man Free 7; Sacr. Abel and Cain 133. Compare the use of the verb: “Aurelia Isidora . . . will always serve (ὑπηρετήσει) Ousorchontemont with glory” (F. Baratte, B. Boyaval, “Catalogue des étiquettes de momies du Musée du Louvre,” in Etudes sur l’Egypte et le Soudan anciens, vol. 3, Lille-Paris, 1975, p. 178, n. 356); “the soul of Pachoumis will serve the great god Osiris of Abydos” (ibid. 2; 1974, n. 245). On ὑπηρεσία (P.Oxy. 3173, 10: ποιούμεθα ὑπηρεσίας, salaries for services at the baths; 2569, 11; 3176, 10), cf. P.Vindob.Sal. 8, 25, p. 199.

²⁶ The ὑπηρέτης is one who passes something along: δι ὑπηρέτου ἀποστέλλεσθαι πρὸς τοὺς διαδότας (P.Panop.Beatty 2, 119, 124; cf. BGU 1825, 8; P.Brem. 37, 5; P.Fouad 30, 22). On the ὑπηρέτης as a courier delivering official correspondence, cf. BGU 1573, 2; P.Oxy. 59, 22; 2114, 20.

²⁷ Cf. m. Tamid 5.3; m. shabb. 1.3; m. Sota 9.15; b. Ta’an. 68a ; b. Ber. 34a (cf. Rengstorf, TDNT, vol. 8, p. 538). CII 172: “Here lies Flavius Julianus, hyperetes. Flavia Juliana, his daughter to her father. May you rest in peace” (at Rome, Via Appia; cf. ibid. p. XCIX); cf. Str-B, vol. 4, 1, pp. 147–149; J. B. Frey, “Les Communautés juives à Rome aux premiers temps de l’Eglise,” in RSR, 1931, pp. 154ff. S. Safrai, “The Synagogue,” in The Jewish People in the First Century, vol. 2, pp. 935ff.

ὑπόδειγμα

hypodeigma, sign, sample, example, model for imitation

hypodeigma, S 5262; TDNT 2.32–33; EDNT 3.402; NIDNTT 2.290, 293; MM 656; L&N 58.59; BAGD 844

The Atticists rejected this word in favor of paradeigma,¹ which is unknown in the NT but used as its synonym in the LXX. Its first meaning is “sign, mark, indicator”; for example, on a sarcophagus in Cilicia: “As a sign of (witness to) her devotion, merit, and sobriety, Titus set up this altar to his wife Juliana.”²

By extension, hypodeigma means “specimen, sample,” just as one cites an “example” in grammar, that is, a “case” or an “illustration.” Philo, Conf. Tongues 64: “As for the worse kind of ‘dawning,’ we find an example in what they tell us . . .”;³ Josephus, War 1.374: “Fortune is often seen to change its countenance; you may learn as much from your own case.”⁴ This is the meaning of 2Pet 2:6—“God gave the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah as an example of what is going to happen to the ungodly”; their case is a sample of what awaits sinners who refuse to be converted. In washing his disciples’ feet, Jesus gave them an example (without the article: an illustration of the servant theology), so that they might act as he acted toward them.⁵ In Heb 4:11; 8:5; 9:23, whether with regard to disobedience or with regard to the earthly sanctuary as a copy of the heavenly temple, a hypodeigma is always a reproduction.⁶ Thus in medicine graphic representations or drawings make a teacher’s lesson easier to grasp.⁷

Already in John 13:15 and 2Pet 2:6, the exemplary act has the value of a lesson.⁸ Indeed, a hypodeigma is a model for imitation, an instructive example, a deed intended to be reproduced;⁹ hence its use in ethics to refer to a virtuous act that should serve as a model: “Take as an example the endurance and patience of the prophets who spoke in the Lord’s name.”¹⁰ The epigraphical attestations are very abundant. At Aphrodisias, Eudamos is praised for his exemplary conduct (“having lived in an orderly and sober fashion and as an example of virtue”);¹¹ likewise Appia, “having lived a sober and orderly life, an example of all virtue” (sophrona kai kosmian pros hypodeigma pases ezekuian aretes, MAMA VIII, 469, 5); Hermia (ibid. 471, 14); Dionysius (ibid. 480, 8); Adrastus (484, 24); and Theodote, “having lived an orderly and modest life, an example of virtue” (zesanta kosmios kai aidemonos kai pros hypodeigma aretes, 190, 10). At Olbia: “imitating the life of those who conducted their public life the most nobly, he became an example to the young of the likeness of noble qualities.”¹² At Nimrud Dagh, Antiochus I of Commagene promotes the cult of his ancestors: “I decree that they shall imitate a good example” (nomizo te autous kalon hypodeigma mimesasthai, Dittenberger, Or. 383, 218). In Trachonitis: “most revered bedfellow, a model of nobility and benevolence, Flavia” (semnotate synomeune, kalon hypodeigma philandron, Phlaouia, GVI, n. 1404). At Delos: “setting forth a godly and generous example also for the others who are living as foreigners” (eusebes hama kai megalopsychon hypodeigma kai tois allois tois ep’allodemias kataballomenos, I.Delos 1521, 6–9).

¹ Phrynichus, Ὑπόδειγμα· οὐδὲ τοῦτο ὀρθω—ς λέγεται παράδειγμα λέγε (ed. C.A. Lobeck, p. 12). Numerous references in J. J. Wettstein, vol. 1, p. 930; vol. 2, p. 704; cf. Schlier, “ὕπόδειγμα,” in TDNT, vol. 2, pp. 32–33.

² Εὐνοίας, ἀρετῆς καὶ σωφροσύνης ὑπόδειγμα —Ιουλιανῆ ἀλόχῳ βωμὸν ἔθηκε Τίτος (MAMA III, 792 = GVI, n. 204); Anth. Pal. 6.342.2; Xenophon, Eq. 2.2.2: ταῦτα ὑποδείγματα ἔσται τῷ πωλοδάμνῃ.

³ Cf. Heir 256: “Running through the other examples, we may try to find what truth they hold”; Ep. Arist. 143: “As a sample, I will point out one case or another”; Plutarch, Alex. 7.9: Aristotle’s treatise on metaphysics is only a mnemonic device for students who are already completely trained; Artemidorus Daldianus, Onir. 4.300.24: the stories of the fulfillment of dreams are chosen by way of example, εἰ—ς ὑπόδειγμα.

⁴ War 6.103: “You have before your eyes the very good example of the Jewish king Jeconiah”; Polybius 3.111.6: “I gave you long discussions supported by examples”; BGU 1141, 43: ἔδειξέ σοι ὑπόδειγμα διὰ τὸ τὸν κρύπτοντα (seventeenth year of Augustus); P.Fay. 122, 16: “I am sending you forty examples of the large size for the machine of Chalothis,” (ἔπεμψά σοι ὑποδείγματα μεγάλων τεσσαράκοντα εἰ—ς τὴν μηχανὴν τῆς Χαλώθεως); P.Oxy. 2411, 40: ἀπὸ πλειόνων ὑποδειγμάτων ὑπέταξά σοι ἀντίγραφον ἐ—πιστολῆς Μαλλίου Κράσσου γενομένου διοικητοῦ (second century AD).

⁵ John 13:15; cf. J. A. T. Robinson, “The Significance of Foot-Washing,” in Neotestamentica et Patristica, Leiden, 1962, pp. 144–147; N. Lazure, Les Valeurs morales de la théologie johannique, Paris, 1965, pp. 155ff.

⁶ Ezek 42:15, probably referring to a vision of the temple: διεμέτρησε τὸ ὑπόδειγμα τοῦ οἴκου. Cf. Theodore of Mopsuestia: “Moses calls the model (παράδειγμα) of the tabernacle a copy (ὑπόδειγμα)” (cited by R. Devreesse, Essai sur Théodore de Mopsueste, Vatican City, 1948, p. 26, n. 1); S. G. Sowers, The Hermeneutics of Philo and Hebrews, Zurich, 1965, pp. 96–97; J. Barr, Semantics, pp. 152–154.

⁷ Cf. Apollonius of Citium, pp. 62, 5; 64, 6; 94, 7; 100, 29; 104, 23, 25; etc. (ed. J. Kollesch, F. Kudlien, Kommentar zu Hippokrates, Berlin, 1965).

⁸ Sir 44:16 presents Enoch as a ὑπόδειγμα μετανοίας τοι—ς γενεοι—ς, an example of conversion for the generations, translating the Hebrew ’ot = “sign” of knowledge for the generations to come; 2Macc 6:28—Eleazar left “the noble example of a good death” for the young; verse 31: “the example of noble courage and a memorial to virtue”; 4Macc 17:23—Antiochus “cited the patience of the Maccabees as an example to his soldiers”; Plutarch, Marc. 20.1: πολιτικῆς ἀρετῆς ὑποδείγματα; Polybius 3.17.8: Hannibal provided an example to his troops.

⁹ Josephus, War 2.397: “to make of you an example for other nations, the Romans will burn the holy city”; I.Priene 117, 57: πολιτοῦ καλὸν ὑπόδειγμα παραστήσας (first century BC).

¹⁰ Jas 5:10; cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, pp. 710ff., 724ff. C. Panagopoulos, Vocabulaire, p. 210.

¹¹ Ζήσαντα κοσμίως καὶ σωφρόνως καὶ πρὸς ὑπόδειγμα ἀρετῆς, MAMA, VIII, 412 c; cf. IGLAM, n. 1610.

¹² Μειμούμενος τῶ—ν ἄριστα πολετευομένων τὸν βίον ὑπόδειγμα τοι—ς νέοις ε—γείνετο τῆς τῶ—ν καλῶ—ν ὁμοιότητος, B. Latyschev, Inscriptiones Antiquae, I, n. 39, 14–15; cf. the honorific decrees in H. W. Pleket, Epigraphica, vol. 2, n. XV, 24: πρὸς πα—ν ὑπόδειγμα γυναικῶ—ν; CIRB, n. 130, 19: πρὸς γάμον ὠραίαν, τὴν σωφροσύνης ὑπόδειγμα. Other references in L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 13, Paris, 1966, pp. 266ff.

ὑποκρίνομαι, ὑπόκρισις, ὑποκριτής, ἀνυπόκριτος hypokrinomai, to answer, interpret (a dream or oracle), recite or declaim, play a role, pretend, dissemble; hypokrisis, answer, declamation, play-acting, deception; hypokrites, interpreter, actor, dissembler, perverse person; anypokritos, authentic, having integrity see also ἀνυπόκριτος, γνήσιος; γνήσιος

hypokrinomai, S 5271; TDNT 8.559–571; EDNT 3.403; NIDNTT 2.468, 474; MM 657; L&N 88.227; BDF §§78, 157(2), 397(2), 406(1); BAGD 845 | hypokrisis, S 5272; TDNT 8.559–570; EDNT 3.403; NIDNTT 2.468–469; MM 657; L&N 88.227; BAGD 845 | hypokrites, S 5273; TDNT 8.559–570; EDNT 3.403–404; NIDNTT 2.468–470; MM 657; L&N 88.228; BAGD 845 | anypokritos, S 505; TDNT 8.570–571; EDNT 3.403–404; MM 50; L&N 73.8; BAGD 76

Curious indeed is the semantic evolution of these terms from Homer and Herodotus to the NT! It would in fact seem that the original meaning of hypokrinomai was “answer.”¹ Homer, Od. 2.111: “Hear an answer from the suitors”; Ps.-Homer, H. Apol. 171: “Tell him in response”; Herodotus 1.2, to the herald of the Colchidians, “the Greeks answered”; 1.116: the answer (hypokrisis) of the child Cyrus to Astyages.² But to answer is to pronounce on a question by expressing one's own thought, so it means not only to declare (Polybius 2.49.7) but to approve (Homer, Il. 7.407) or "answer in complaining" (Josephus, Ant. 12.216); which presupposes reflection and explanation.³ P. Chantraine is right to define the significance of the compound hypokrinomai in Homer, "To explain by bringing forth a response from within oneself."⁴ Xerxes, for example, said to Mardonius that after taking counsel that he would let him know in reply (hypokrineesthai) which of the alternatives he would adopt.⁵

From this meaning, "manifest one's own opinion," hypokrinomai came to mean "interpret a dream or an oracle": "See how an interpreter of the gods would answer" (Homer, Il. 12.228); "Listen to a dream of mine and interpret it" (Od. 19.535); "I do not see how anyone can give any other answer (interpretation) to your dream" (ibid. 555); "the Pythia answered" (Herodotus 7.169); "you who interpret dreams so easily" (Aristophanes, Vesp. 53). Hypokritai are interpreters: "Prophets are hypokritai of mysterious words and deeds" (Plato, Tim. 72 b); a hypokrisis is an oracle's response (Herodotus 1.90).

The predominant use of hypokrinomai is to recite or declaim a text, give a reply in a theatrical dialogue, play a role (Demosthenes, Corona 15); "neither Theodorus nor Aristodemus represented (hypekrinato) this drama ... but every other actor (hypokriton) of former days played it" (Embassy 246); "the poets themselves acted in their tragedies" (Aristotle, Rh. 3.1.1408b23), like Thespis, who "acted (hypokrinomenon) his plays himself."⁶ The hypokrisis is the play of the actors (Ep. Arist. 219; Philo, Dreams 1.205; Marcus Aurelius 11.1), their declaiming as well as their bearing and gestures (Plutarch, Dem. 11.3), when they interpret the speeches of others (Aristotle, Rh. 3.1403b21; Polybius 10.47.10; Lucian, Pseudol. 25; Pisc. 32). The hypokrites is the actor himself, either in tragedy or in comedy (Dittenberger, Syl. 1078, 27; 1089); "Some actors put on a tragedy and recited lines from Euripides" (Philo, Good Man Free 141); but it was not the same hypokritai that played both;⁷ "the figures have the appearance, the dress, and the masks of actors, but they are not actors" (hypokritou echousin, ouk eisi de hypokritai, Hippocrates, Lex; ed. Littré, vol. 4, p. 638); "actors and deceivers (hypokritai kai exapatai) say certain things before informed people and have other things in mind" (Hippocrates, Vict. 1.24, ed. Littré 6.496.14). "In the competitions, the actors count more for success than the poets" (Aristotle, Rh. 3.1.1403b31).

Because both the orator⁸ and the actor practice an art of illusion, our terms came to be pejorative. The actor who plays the role of Agamemnon is not really Agamemnon but pretends to be. So he counterfeits himself and covers his tracks by hiding his own identity: "when tragic actors put on their costumes, they also change their gait, their voice, their bearing, and their language" (Plutarch, Demetr. 18.5). So hypokrinomai comes to mean "pretend,"⁹ "practice deception,"¹⁰ "dissemble" (Marcus Aurelius 2.17; 9.2).

It is a lie acted out, as with Laban, who “lived his life under the sign of hypocrisy and false appearances, pretending to be angry when he felt no real distress” (Philo, Heir 43). Hypokrisis is apate: putting on the show of tears (Demosthenes, Corona 287; cf. 15); “However much you pretend to have paid the dowry, it is plain to see that you paid nothing at all” (Demosthenes, C. Onet. 31.8); “the oligarchs take this oath—‘against the people I will be malevolent, and I will devise against them all the evil that I can’—although they ought to think and pretend the contrary.”¹¹

In the LXX, hypokrinomai (Hebrew ʿanāh) becomes a sin.¹² This is first of all the sin of duplicity, of dissimulation towards others: “hypocrites of the heart” nurse their anger without manifesting it (Job 36:13); “do not be a hypocrite (me hypokrithes) in the lips of men (= before men)” (Sir 40:2). Then it is the sin against sincerity of heart; it is a perversity and an impiety not to act according to what one thinks.¹³ Moreover, the LXX and Aquila used hypokrites to translate the Hebrew hanep, and P. Dhorme¹⁴ has shown that hanep designates the profane (Isa 24:5; Jer 3:1-2, 9; Ps 106:38), the apostate (Isa 10:6), the wicked (Isa 33:14; Job 20:5; Sir 16:6), the infidel (Job 34:30), so that the OT “hypocrite” is a perverse or depraved person.¹⁵ Only this meaning allows us to understand why hypocrisy is linked with poneria (Matt 22:18), with anomia (Matt 23:28), and with kakia (1Pet 2:1) and deserves Gehenna (Matt 24:51; cf. 23:33).

In Philo, hypokrisis often retains its literal sense of deception, associated with cheating, deception, subterfuge, illusion.¹⁶ It is a falsehood that is the opposite of aletheia,¹⁷ but it is stigmatized with an exceptional violence unparalleled except in Matt and Pss. Sol. (4.6—“May God remove those who live in hypocrisy among the saints”; 4.20—“May crows peck out the eyes of hypocrites”); “hateful hypocrisy” (echthras hypokriseos, Joseph 67); “in my eyes, hypocrisy is an evil worse than death” (Joseph 68); “it is the work of a base and altogether servile soul to hypocritically disguise one’s wicked character” (Spec. Laws 4.183); “there is nothing more servile than adulation, flattery, hypocrisy, in which words radically contradict thought.”¹⁸

The verb hypokrinomai is used only once in the NT, with regard to those sent by the scribes and high priests: without revealing their identity, they “play the role of righteous people” to spy on Jesus (Luke 20:20). On the other hand, this deceptive conduct is called hypokrisis with regard to the Pharisees and the Herodians (Mark 12:15), the “leaven of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy,”¹⁹ and in the apostrophe, “Scribes and Pharisees, your outside gives you the appearance of just people in men’s eyes, but inside you are full of hypocrisy and iniquity” (Matt 23:28). Jesus contrasts corruption of heart to the precise material fulfillment of the law’s commands, legal formalism; this gives an appearance and assures a good reputation.²⁰ “In the last days, some will fall away from the faith . . . [misled] by the hypocrisy of impostors” (en hypokrisei pseudologon).²¹ After the fashion of actors, these teachers will put on masks to hide their true identity (cf. Matt 7:15), but they are only “false speakers, falsifiers of words” who would succeed at their scandalous fraud except that they can be judged by their fruits. 1Pet 2:1 explains why hypocrisy is so odious to the Christian conscience; it is because the baptized person is a sincere person who has explicitly renounced perversity in all its forms (1Cor 5:8) and will thus be marked by a fundamental rectitude (2Cor 6:6): “having put off all wickedness and all guile and hypocrisy” (pasan kakian kai panta dolon kai hypokriseis).

As for hypokritai (unknown to St. John), Jesus denounces them in the Sermon on the Mount, stigmatizing them both for the ostentation of their almsgiving and their praying “to be praised by people” (Matt 6:2, 5) and also for claiming to be zealous for their neighbor’s virtue while not correcting themselves; they are hypocrites because they do not have a true hatred for evil.²² According to Matt 23:13, 15, 23, 25, 27, 29, Jesus pronounces seven curses against the “scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites,”²³ which he concludes with the apostrophe, “Serpents, brood of vipers, how will you escape from the condemnation of Gehenna?” (Matt 23:33). The Lord never showed so much anger. Why?

First of all, because the hypocrisy in view here is a vice of teachers,²⁴ who bear the heaviest responsibility: not only do they not enter the kingdom themselves but they also hinder those who would like to enter (Matt 23:13), substituting their own authority for God’s authority and so making them into children of Gehenna (23:15). Moreover, “they say and do not do” (23:3); in not observing the things they impose on others, they are impostors. What is more, they are full of malice; despite their fine appearance, inside they are as befouled as tombs filled with “the bones of the dead and all sorts of uncleanness” (23:27; cf. 23:25). Finally, and above all, these hypocrites are in fact impious; they observe the rites and practice the legal observances, but Isaiah (Isa 29:13) had prophesied well, “This people honors me with their lips, but their heart is far from me.”²⁵ It is all there! The Pharisees represent the sclerosis of revealed religion, a cult of the law that is contradictory to the new covenant, which is a religion of the heart indwelt by the Holy Spirit. Jesus constantly denounces the dichotomy that hypocrisy makes between exterior and interior. This is a serious thing in relations between humans; it is monstrous in relations with God, who “jealously yearns for the spirit that he has placed in us” (Jas 4:5).

It would be tempting to translate the adjective anypokritos, unknown in the papyri, either according to etymology (“without hypocrisy”) or according to usage (“not competent to perform on the stage”);²⁶ but in its six NT occurrences, we must understand it to mean “authentic,” especially with regard to agape, a very original mode of love that has to be distinguished from goodness, from natural devotion, from various counterfeits and false appearances (almsgiving and martyrdom, 1Cor 13:3). To say that authentic love “has a horror of evil and clings to the good” (Rom 12:9) is to distinguish it from guilty kindnesses and consequently to define it as a divine love, very pure and spiritual.²⁷ On the other hand, when St. Paul recommends himself on the grounds of love that is anypokritos, “by the word of truth,”²⁸ he means that the manifestations of his attachment match the sincerity of his devotion. 1Pet 1:22 is decisive: “Having sanctified your souls perfectly, by obedience to the truth (the primitive baptismal formula) in order to have authentic brotherly love” (eis philadelphian anypokriton). Thanks to the sacrament, the new Christian already has a divine love in his heart (Rom 5:5) that lets him love his neighbor with the same love with which God loves him; more precisely, this is a philadelphia, a familial affection whereby brothers (Matt 23:8) love each other in the household of the same Father, who has begotten them all (1Tim 3:15; 1Pet 2:5; cf. 1John 4:7; 5:1), or whereby one lives in brotherhood (1Pet 2:17; 5:9). Only true agape allows this sort of love.

In 1Tim 1:5 and 2Tim 1:5, it is faith that is described as anypokritos, which can be translated “having integrity”; this is not a faith that is “unfeigned, without hypocrisy,” but authentic faith that entails intellectual orthodoxy and religious behavior, loyalty and faithfulness to one’s commitments; its external profession (confession and Christian bearing; cf. Rom 10:10) translates adherence of heart and conviction of spirit. Only the righteous live by this faith (Gal 2:20). Finally, in Jas 3:17, the wisdom that is from above is described as adiakritos (without partiality), anypokritos (in the sense of Wis 5:18).

¹ It is disputed; cf. A. Lesky, “Hypokrites,” in Studi in onore di U. E. Paoli, Florence, 1955, pp. 469–475; H. Koller, “Hypokrisis und Hypokrites,” in MusHelv, 1957, pp. 100–107; J. F. Else, “ΥΠΟΚΡΙΤΗΣ,” in Wiener Studien, vol. 72, 1959, pp. 75–104; B. Zucchelli, ΥΠΟΚΡΙΤΗΣ. Origine e storia del termine, Brescia, 1962; K. Schneider, “Υποκριτής,” in PWSup, Band 8, 1956, col. 187–232; Wilckens, “ὕποκρίνομαι,” in TDNT, vol. 8, pp. 559–571.

² Thucydides 7.55.5: “If they did not answer, they were lost”; Hippocrates, Epid. 7.25: the wife of Theodorus, in a fever, “answered almost constantly by nodding her head”; Fract. 9 and 16. “To reply”: Herodotus 5.49; Aristotle, Rh. 3.1.1403b23; 3.12.1413b21, 28, 30; Aristophanes, Ach. 400: “Happy Euripides, whose slave is so quick to answer.”

³ Herodotus 3.119: to the message of Darius, the wife of Intaphernes “reflected and made this answer”; 7.135; Theocritus, Id. 24.67: “Alkmene called Tiresias, the seer who told the truth about everything; she recounted to him the strange occurrence point by point and invited him to say in response (to explain to her) how this would end.” Derived from κρίνω, “separate, sort, choose,” the compound with ὑπο- in the middle voice expresses that the subject acts with respect to himself or in his own interest; the mind has a reflexive action; cf. F. M. Abel, Grammaire, p. 244.

⁴ “Expliquer en faisant sortir la réponse du fond de soi-même,” P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique, under κρίνω.

⁵ Herodotus 7.101; cf. Homer, Od. 15.170: “Menelaus sought what wise answer he could give them.”

⁶ Plutarch, Sol. 29.6; cf. Diogenes Laertius 3.56; Menander, Dysk., didascal. 14: “The play was put on at the Lenaea, and the role was played by Aristodemus of Skarphe”; Pollux, Onom. 4.123. The ὑποκρινόμενος is an actor (Roman inscription from the period of Augustus, in IGUR, n. 223).

⁷ Plato, Resp. 3.395 a; cf. 2.373 b; Ion 532 d; 536 a; Aristotle, Poet. 6.1450b20, 26; 1461b34; 1462a; Aristophanes, Vesp. 1279; Xenophon, Symp. 3.11; Plutarch, Dem. 7.1; Diodorus Siculus 14.109.2; P.Cair.Zen. 59004, 44: Κλέωνι ὑποκριτῆ ἄλεύρων ἀτράβη α? (a wheat account, republished SB 6777, 44); P.Oxy. 2429, col. II, 31: ὁ ἕτερος τω—ν ὑποκριτω—ν; inscription of Dura-Europus (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1953, p. 180, n. 205), in Boeotia (“Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1956, p. 129, n. 121), at the Lenaea (“Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1972, p. 391, n. 122), at Delphi (L. Robert, Etudes épigraphiques, pp. 30–31), at Apamea: Publius Aelius Crispus, actor in tragic and rhythmic mime (IGLS 1349).

⁸ Cf. Hermeias of Courion: λόγων ὑποκριτῆρες = traffickers in words (in Athenaeus 13.563 d).

⁹ Polybius 5.25.7: “Philip pretended to be persuaded (ὑποκριθείς)”; one plays a role in public that does not match one’s own feelings, like the tyrant who, despite his ambitions and vices, must “play well his role as king” (Aristotle, Pol. 5.11.19.1314a). “Why, being Greek, do you counterfeit the Jew?” (τί ὑποκρίνη, Epictetus 2.9.19–20). Cf. M. Papatomopoulos, “Un argument sur papyrus de la Médée d’Euripide,” in RechPap, vol. 3, Paris, 1964, p. 44.

¹⁰ Marcus Aurelius 3.7; 7.69; Philo, Conf. Tongues 48; Josephus, War 1.520; 2.587; Life 36.

¹¹ Aristotle, Pol. 5.9.11.1310a; Plutarch, Sol. 30.1, Solon to Pisistratus: “You play the role (ὑποκρίνη) of Homer’s Ulysses badly: you act like him, but to deceive your fellow citizens, while he disfigured himself in order to take advantage of his enemies”; cf. 29.7; Polybius 35.2.13.

¹² With the exception of Job 40:2—“The one who criticizes Eloah, will he answer it?” Cf. 2Macc 5:25—the Mysian captain Apollonius, who had been sent by Antiochus “to slay all those who were in the strength of age,” arrived at Jerusalem “pretending to be peaceably disposed” (τὸν εἰ—ρηνικὸν ὑποκριθεὶς).

¹³ Sir 32:15—“The one who examines the law will be satisfied, but for the hypocrite (ὁ ὑποκρινόμενος) it is a stumblingblock.” He has studied the law but does not observe it (cf. Matt 15:7-8; 23:3); Sir 33:2—“The wise man does not despise the law, but the one who is a hypocrite toward it (pretending to observe it) is like a ship in a storm.” In addition, Eleazar refuses to give an example of dissimulation (ὑπόκρισις) that could lead the young astray (2Macc 6:21, 24, 25). This would be play-acting that was unworthy of himself (4Macc 6:15, 17).

¹⁴ P. Dhorme, Le Livre de Job, Paris, 1926, on Job 8:13 (cf. 13:16; 15:34; 17:8; 20:5; 27:8; 34:30; 36:13).

¹⁵ P. Joüon, “ΥΠΟΚΡΙΤΗΣ dans l’évangile et l’hébreu Hanéf,” in RSR, 1930, pp. 312–316; A. W. Argyle, “Hypocrites’ and the Aramaic Theory,” in ExpT, vol. 75, 1964, pp. 113–114.

¹⁶ Philo, Dreams 2.40; cf. Unchang. God 103: “they strip bare their acting”; Migr. Abr. 211: “stop the acting.”

¹⁷ Flight 34, 156; T. Benj. 6.5; Marcus Aurelius 2.16.

¹⁸ Good Man Free 99; cf. 90; To Gaius 162; Josephus, War 1.628; Ant. 16.216.

¹⁹ Matt 16:6; Luke 12:1. Leaven is a symbol for any active principle—good or bad—of assimilation; but it cannot be discerned in the dough. The “leaven of the Pharisees” will always threaten to corrupt Christian simplicity and uprightness; it attaches to works-righteousness more than to heart-righteousness and to the virtue of others more than one’s own. According to A. Negoita, C. Daniel (“L’Enigme du levain,” in NovT, 1967, pp. 306–314), in Aramaic Jesus would have said hâmirâh, “leaven,” but his disciples understood ‘amirâh, “words, speech, doctrine, teaching.”

²⁰ Christian theology will continue to denounce heterogeneity between being and appearing: ὑποκριταὶ εἰ—σιν οἱ— ἄλλο μὲν ὄντες ἄλλο δὲ

φαινόμενοι (Theophylact, on Matt 6:31; PG 123.201); “to sin openly is a lesser evil than to affect holiness” (St. Jerome, on Isa 16:14), a text taken up by the Glossa: “Righteousness simulated is no longer righteousness but a double sin.” In effect, the virtue of truthfulness has as its object “to show what one is through one’s words and one’s life” (Thomas Aquinas, Ila Ilae, q. 111, a. 3, ad 1m). Nothing could be farther from the advice of R. Elai the elder: “If someone sees that his instincts are too strong, let him go to a place where he is not known, dress in black and veil himself in black, and do what his heart desires; let him not profane the name of heaven openly” (b. Īag. 16a). Cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, pp. 287–290.

²¹ 1Tim 4:2. There is a good parallel in the Ploutoi of the comedian Cratinos: γλω—σσαν ὀρθουμένην εἰ—ς ὑπόκρισιν λόγων (J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 1, p. 78). —This vice in a teacher is one thing, but it is another thing for someone to be led to act contrary to conviction on the odd occasion. At the time of the incident at Antioch, St. Peter had stopped eating with Gentiles so as not to incur the blame of the Judaizers: “The other Jews dissimulated with Peter (συνυπεκρίθησαν) to the extent that even Barnabas let himself be carried away by their dissimulation (αὐτῶ—ν τῇ ὑποκρίσει)” (Gal 2:13). The verb συνυποκρίνομαι is used by Polybius 3.92.5: “Fabius pretended to share the ardor and boldness of his soldiers”; Plutarch, Mar. 14.14: “Saturninus put on a performance there together with Marius”; 17.5.

²² Matt 7:5; cf. Luke 6:42. Questioners who pose questions that appear to be aimed at getting information are hypocrites because they are not seeking the truth but simply want to put Jesus to the test (Matt 22:18). Also hypocrites or actors are those Palestinians who can predict rain and hot weather and draw the practical consequences but who take no account of the manifestations of the coming of the Messiah, which is of unmatched importance for their soul. Their hearts are not engaged: “Why do you not judge what would be right to do?” (Luke 12:56, to the crowd). Also hypocrites or persons of bad faith are those who are scandalized by the healing on the Sabbath of a woman who has been sick for eighteen years while they themselves take a cow or ass from the stable on this day of rest (Luke 13:15). Cf. J. A. Ziesler, “Luke and the Pharisees,” in NTS, vol. 25, 1979, pp. 146–157.

²³ On the composition of Matt 23, cf. E. Haenchen, Gott und Mensch, Tübingen, 1965, pp. 29–54; M. Gertner, “The Terms Pharisaioi, Gazarenoi, Hypokritai: Their Semantic Complexity and Conceptual Correlation,” in BSOAS, vol. 26, 1963, pp. 245–268; F. Mussner, Praesentia Salutis, Düsseldorf, 1967, pp. 99–112; S. Légasse, “L’antijudaïsme’ dans l’Evangile selon Matthieu,” in M. Didier, L’Evangile selon Matthieu, Gembloux, 1972, pp. 417–428; S. van Tilborg, The Jewish Leaders in Matthew, Leiden, 1972; J. Bowker, Jesus and the Pharisees, London, 1973. It is fashionable today to rehabilitate the Pharisees as having been besmirched by St. Matthew or a redactor (cf. L. Schottroff, “Die Erzählung vom Pharisäer und Zöllner als Beispiel für theologische Kunst des Überredens,” in H. D. Betz, L. Schottroff, Neues Testament und christliche Existenz [Festschrift H. Braun], Tübingen, 1973, pp. 439–461; C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, p. 289, n. 1). But the Pharisees, who played the major role in the checkmate of Jesus’ public ministry, are well known from the Qumran texts as “hypocrites” (1QH 4.13; 7.34), “lying interpreters” (1QH 2.31; 4.10); “by their brooding, they hatch a viper” (1QH 2.28; cf. 3.12, 18; 5.10, 27); likewise from Josephus (J. Neusner, “Josephus’s Pharisees,” in Ex Orbe Religionum: Studia G. Widengren, Leiden, 1972, pp. 224–244). Cf. J. LeMoyné, A. Michel, “Pharisiens,” in DBSup, vol. 7, 1022–1115; R. Meyer, Tradition und Neuschöpfung im antiken Judentum, dargestellt an der Geschichte des Pharisäismus, Berlin, 1965; A. Finkel, The Pharisees and the Teacher of Nazareth, Leiden, 1964; H. Merkel, “Jesus und die Pharisäer,” in NTS, vol. 14, 1968, pp. 194–208; B. Lindars, “Jesus and the Pharisees,” in Donum Gentilicium: New Testament Studies in Honour of David Daube, pp. 51–63. Cf. R. L. Brawley, The Pharisees in Luke-Acts, New Jersey, 1978.

²⁴ Cf. P. S. Minear, “False Prophecy and Hypocrisy in the Gospel of Matthew,” in J. Gnifka, Neues Testament und Kirche (Festschrift R. Schnackenburg), Freiburg-Basel-Vienna, 1974, pp. 76–93.

²⁵ Matt 15:7; Mark 7:6; cf. Matt 23:23. This contrast between lips and heart is denounced by Jews (b. Pesah. 113*b* ; m. B. Mes. 4.2 [49*a*]) as well as Greeks (Sophocles, OC 936; Ps.-Phocylides 48); cf. P. S. Minear, “Yes or No: The Demand for Honesty in the Early Church,” in NovT, 1971, p. 11

²⁶ Hesychius defines ἀνυπόκριτος: ἄδολος, ἀπροσωπόληπτος. This Koine term appears in the third-second century BC with Ps.-Demetrius Phalereus, Eloc. 194, then in Wis 5:18, in a list of weapons with which God defends the righteous against the wicked: “He will put on sincere judgment (κρίσιν ἀνυπόκριτον) like a helmet.” This means objective, without partiality, without respect for persons; Wis 18:15—the all-powerful word of God “carried your authentic command (ἀνυπόκριτον ἐπιταγήν) as a sharp sword,” the nuance being that the divine ruling (ordering extermination) is irrevocable, will not be retracted (cf. Iamblichus, VP 31.188). The adverb ἀνυποκρίτως: “Do what human nature requires . . . without dissimulation” (Marcus Aurelius 8.5.2).

²⁷ Hence a stranger to jealousy, to vanity, to shrewdness and false appearances, repudiating all egotism, and demanding of itself generosity and devotion, patience, etc. (cf. 1Cor 13:4-7).

²⁸ 2Cor 6:6, to be compared to 1John 3:18 (ἀγαπα—ν ε—ν ἀληθεία) and 2Cor 8:8; in asking the Corinthians to help the poor of Jerusalem, the apostle puts them in a position “to prove that your love is authentic” (τῆς ὑμετέρας ἀγάπης γνήσιον), because agape is by definition a love that demonstrates itself, manifests itself, shows itself, and cannot remain hidden in the heart. Compare sincere love, ἔρωσ ἀκραιφνῆς (Heliodorus, Aeth. 1.2.9); Caesar to the conscript fathers: “beginning to love each other without looking back” (ἀρξάμενοι δὲ ἀνυπόπτως ἀλλήλους φιλεῖ—ν, Dio Cassius 43.17).

ὑπομένω, ὑπομονή

hypomeno, to endure; to wait expectantly; hypomone, endurance

hypomeno, S 5278; TDNT 4.581–588; EDNT 3.404–405; NIDNTT 2.764, 772–774, 776; MM 658; L&N 25.175, 39.20, 68.17, 85.57; BDF §§148(1), 414(2); BAGD 845–846 | hypomone, S 5281; TDNT 4.581–588; EDNT 3.405–406; NIDNTT 2.772–776; MM 659; L&N 25.174; BDF §163; BAGD 846

Plato and Aristotle analyzed hypomone and established the conception of it that would hold for the entire Greek tradition. Plato asked, “In what does courage (andreia) consist?” and answered that it is “a certain endurance of soul (karteria tes psyches) . . . one of the noblest things. . . . It is endurance (karteria) accompanied by wisdom that is noble” (Lach. 192 b–d). Regarding this, Socrates observes, “In war, a man endures (karterounta andra) and is ready to fight because he calculates reasonably that others will help him, that the enemy is less numerous . . . that he has a positional advantage. Would you say that this man, whose endurance of soul relies so much on reason and preparation, is more courageous than the man on the other side who sustains his attack and endures (hypomenein te kai karterein)?”—to which Laches replies that the latter is braver.¹ To be courageous, then, is to be manly, to face difficulties without expecting help or putting one’s confidence in others; one endures alone, as Aristotle notes.² He makes hypomone a virtue, because it is a noble thing to keep to the mean in difficult circumstances: “one endures (hypomenon) despite the fear that one feels . . . for the beauty of the deed.”³

Stoicism⁴ emphasizes this will to resist all evils, disease, death: “Constancy is the bearing of pain and distress on account of the good”

(karteria: hypomone lypes, ponon heneka tou kalou, Ps.-Plato, Def. 412 c); “one must bear, resist, hold fast, fortify one’s resolution and barricade it with firmness and endurance (karteria kai hypomone) drawn from within, the most potent of virtues” (Philo, Cherub. 78); in the pancratium, the athlete “by the constancy and vigor of his endurance (to karteriko kai pagio tes hypomones) breaks the strength of his adversary until the victory is complete” (Good Man Free 26); between prudence and temperance on the one hand and justice and piety on the other, Philo locates “andreia, which permits endurance (hypomones axion),” (Change of Names 197; cf. Zeno: andreia peri tas hypomonas, in Stobaeus, Ecl. 2.7.5b2; vol. 2, p. 60, 14; Josephus, Ant. 3.16); “the courageous man (ho andreios) has learned to endure (ha dei hypomenein)” (Change of Names 153); constancy or perseverance is an athletic virtue (Sacr. Abel and Cain 46; Good Man Free 26) personified in Rebekah.⁵ For Plutarch, “to flee death is not blameworthy if one wishes to live for noble reasons, and to meet it head-on is not praiseworthy (outh’ hypomone kalon) if one does so through being tired of life” (Pel. 1.8).

The book of 4Macc illustrates the extreme of this virtue, since its “philosophy demands of us courage (andreian) that will cause us to endure (hypomenein) willingly all sorts of woes” (4Macc 5:23), whether these be the most diverse tortures⁶ or the pains of childbirth (16:8). The seven martyred brothers “by their courage and their endurance (te andreia kai hypomone) won the admiration of the whole world and of their own executioners.”⁷ Already in Philo we find this endurance of death,⁸ of a surgical operation (Unchang. God 66), of torture (Dreams 2.84), of the punishment of Tantalus (Heir 269), of captivity (Unchang. God 115), of slavery,⁹ of exile (Cherub. 2), of mistreatment.¹⁰ It is always a matter of bearing up with courage (andreios hypomenon, Moses 2.184), of enduring what is hard to bear; this hypomone guides the ascetic (Flight 38) who is moving toward beatitude; but it also has to do with enduring privations or minor nuisances,¹¹ fatigue (Migr. Abr. 144), an affront (Flacc. 104; To Gaius 369), unmerited poverty (Flacc. 132), the vicissitudes of fortune (Menander, Dysk. 768), harm (P.Oxy. 904, 5), familial woes (P.Hamb. 22, 2; P.Oxy. 1186,4).

So if hypomeno means “suffer” (Joseph 94), even in its most softened sense,¹² it implies self-mastery: one contains oneself,¹³ bears, endures, and perseveres,¹⁴ sometimes with a nuance of expectant waiting or of patience motivated by hope.¹⁵ The verb even has the weakened meanings “to consent”¹⁶ and “to accept”¹⁷ and is frequently used for a responsibility, a leitourgia, expenses that one takes on.¹⁸

But in reading the LXX, one enters a different semantic world altogether. For one thing, all the occurrences of the substantive hypomone translate the Hebrew verb qawâh (in the piel) or one of its derivatives tiqwâh, miqweh, Hebrew terms that signify expectant waiting, intense desire;¹⁹ for another, this hope usually has God as its object: “My hope is in you (Yahweh)” (Ps 39:7; 71:5; Jer 14:8; 17:13). Not only is this the first time that hypomone has a religious meaning; it also contradicts the refusal of the Laches and the Eudemian Ethics to credit this virtue to one who is counting on help from someone else. For the believer, hope comes from God (Ps 62:5; Sir 17:24), “the expectation of the pious will not be disappointed” (Sir 16:13; Ps 9:18). This is not what we today call theological hope, but a constancy in desire that overcomes the trial of waiting, a soul attitude that must struggle to persevere, a waiting that is determined²⁰ and victorious because it trusts in God. As for the verb hypomeno, seven occurrences are conformable to secular usage,²¹ but thirty-four others express waiting,²² translating the Hebrew qawâh (in the piel or hiphil) and rarely hakâh. One waits on God for everything.²³ This is a permanent disposition of the soul: “Our souls wait upon Yahweh” (Ps 33:20); “in you do I hope all day long” (Ps 25:5). Strength is required (Ps 27:14; Job 6:11), but there is certainty of never being let down (Ps 25:3; Isa 49:23; Jer 14:22); hence the beatitude of perseverance: “Blessed is the one who abides (makarios ho hypomenon) and reaches the 1,335 days” (Dan 12:12).

This blessedness of those who endure is taken up by Jas 1:12; 5:11. The NT takes its inspiration both from the secular Greek tradition²⁴ and from the theology of the LXX, especially the synonymous relation between hope and constancy. From his first letter to the last ones, St. Paul links hypomone with elpis (hope) in the triad of theological virtues: “Remembering the efficiency of your faith, the labor of your love, and the constancy of your hope (tes hypomones tes elpidos) in our Lord Jesus Christ.”²⁵ The nuance is that of perseverance despite difficulties, assuring salvation: “The one who endures to the end will be saved” (ho de hypomeinas eis telos houtos sothesetai, Matt 10:22; 24:13; Mark 13:13); “save your souls by your endurance” (en te hypomone, Luke 21:19); “God will give eternal life to those who give themselves over to good works with endurance” (Rom 2:7). Enduring trials with constancy is what makes it possible to bear fruit; this is the last word in the explanation of the parable of the Sower.²⁶ 1Cor 13:7 attributes to love this indefatigable capacity to endure despite the ingratitude, vileness, bad conduct, and problems that all communal living involves: “agape endures everything” without complaining or becoming discouraged. God is the source of this constancy (Rom 15:5), which is the possession of all disciples²⁷ and the authenticating mark of an apostle (2Cor 6:4; 12:12).

Christ gave the example—“He endured the cross” (hypemeinen stauron, Heb 12:2)—and each disciple must “consider what he endured from sinners.”²⁸ This is why Paul and Revelation set Christian hypomone in relation with the most serious trials (thlipsis). One endures them and bears them, as the Lord commanded cross-bearing,²⁹ but the very word hypomone implies that a happy outcome is expected: the resurrection. The Christian theology of patience will retain these data of revelation.³⁰ Moulton-Milligan gives no papyrological reference for the substantive hypomone; no attestation has since been found.

¹ Lach. 193 a. Cf. Grg. 507 b: “to observe justice and piety is also to be courageous (ἀνδρει—ον) . . . the wise man knows how to bear what his duty orders him to bear (ὑπομένοντα καρτερεῖ—ν ὅπου δεῖ—)”; Plato, Resp. 4.440 c–d: “If a person believes that he is victim of an injustice . . . let him become indignant and fight for what appears to him to be justice, let him steadfastly endure (ὑπομένων) hunger, cold, and other similar things until he has triumphed, and let him not cease his generous efforts before either obtaining satisfaction or dying . . . he takes up arms on behalf of reason”; Tht. 177 b: “to endure for a long time rather than flee like a coward” (πολὸν χρόνον ὑπομει—ναι καὶ μὴ ἀνάδρωσ φυγει—ν); Hecataeus of Abdera: “The lawgiver forced young people by practice to acquire courage, endurance, and the wherewithal (ἀνδρείαν καὶ καρτερίαν καὶ τὸ σύνολον) to endure all evils (ὑπομονὴν πάσης κακοπαθείας)” (frag. 13.7); according to Musonius, the body is trained to endure suffering and privation (ὑπομονή τω—ν ε—πιπονω—ν), but the soul strives for ὑπομονή τω—ν ε—πιπονω—ν πρὸς ἀνδρείαν (Stobaeus, Ecl. 4.29.78; vol. 3, p. 650, ed. C. E. Lutz, frag. 6, p. 54, 14–17; cf. frag. 7, p. 56, 17 and 20). Polybius 4.51.1: hypomone in war; Demetrius Phalereus, in Stobaeus, Ecl. 8.20 (vol. 3, p. 345). Plutarch, Apoph. lac. 2; Ps.-Plutarch, De plac. philos. 4.23; A. J. Festugière, “ΥΠΙΟΜΟΝΗ dans la tradition grecque,” in RSR, 1931, pp. 477, 486; P. Ortiz Valdisieso, “ΥΠΙΟΜΟΝΗ en el Nuevo Testamento,” in Ecclesiastica Xavieriana (Bogotá), 1967, pp. 51–161; 1969, pp. 115–205; Hauck, “ὑπομένω,” in TDNT, vol. 4, pp. 581–588.

² Aristotle, Rh. 3.9.1410a: “to endure and to follow (ὑπομονή, ἀκολουθήσις) are antithetical terms.”

³ Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 3.10.1115b17–23; cf. 1115a6: “the domain within which courage is the medium is that of fear and boldness”; 1115a32: “the person is called courageous who remains fearless in the face of a noble death”; 2.3.1104b20: “It is pleasures and pains that make us bad, whether by seeking the pleasures or avoiding the pains that should not be sought or avoided”; Eth. Eud. 3.1.1230a26ff. Over the centuries, hypomeneo and hypomone take on diverse shades of meaning: “remain” (as opposed to “follow”; Homer, Od. 232, 258; Aristotle, Rh. 3.9.1410a5), “preserve” (Herodotus 4.149; Pindar, Pyth. 2.26), “bear” (Aristotle, HA 3.20.522a8: goats do not bear mounting; Isocrates 8.65; Sophocles, OT 1323), “sustain” (Diodorus Siculus 5.34.5), “endure” (Herodotus 6.12: slavery; Plutarch, Cat. Min. 5.8: illnesses; Ant. 43.3: military campaigning; Caes. 17.2: fatigue), “stand up to, resist” (Homer, Il. 5.498; Plato, Soph. 235 b; Polybius 4.51.2). Patience or endurance is a quality, even a virtue, in Plutarch, Crass. 3.8. The least common denominator of all these meanings is “abide (μένω) . . . despite the difficulties.”

⁴ Cf. the references given by A. J. Festugière, RSR, 1931, pp. 482ff. A. SVF, vol. 3, 263–265, 286; Diogenes Laertius 8.24, 53.

⁵ Rebekah is sometimes called ε—πιμονή—tenacity (Flight 24, 45; Cherub. 40, 47) assuring the continued practice of the good (Alleg. Interp. 1.55)—sometimes ὑπομονή—perseverance (Flight 39, 194; Prelim. Stud. 37; Sacr. Abel and Cain 4; Alleg. Interp. 3.88; Worse Attacks Better 45, 51; Plant. 169; Migr. Abr. 208; Dreams 1.46), which restores strength (Unchang. God 13; Cherub. 78; Good Man Free 26). Rebekah is a stable virtue that allows the obtaining of divine wisdom. Philo was perhaps interpreting the name of Rebekah as the Hebrew rb + qwh, “firm hope or confidence”; but cf. V. Nikiprowetzky, “Rebecca, vertu de constance et constance de vertu chez Philon d’Alexandrie,” in Sem, vol. 26, 1976, pp. 109–136.

⁶ 4Macc 6:9; 7:22; 9:6, 22; 15:32; 16:1, 17, 19, 21; 17:7, 10.

⁷ 4Macc 1:11; 17:23, the tyrant “had noted the courage (τὴν ἀνδρείαν) of their virtue and their endurance in torments (τὴν ε—πὶ ται—ς βασάνοις ἀπό—ν ὑπομονήν) and he cited their endurance as an example to his soldiers”; 7:9—“O father (Eleazer), by your glorious constancy (διὰ τω—ν ὑπομονω—ν εἰ—ς δόξαν) you have strengthened our faithfulness to the law”; 9:8, 30; 17:12, 17. The mother of the Maccabees is “more manly than a man through her endurance” (15:30; 17:4).

⁸ Worse Attacks Better 178; Husbandry 75; Joseph 226; Moses 2.206; Rewards 70; Good Man Free 146; Etern. World 20; Flacc. 175; To Gaius 192, 209, 307–308.

⁹ Alleg. Interp. 3.199; Moses 1.247; Spec. Laws 2.68; Virtues 111; Good Man Free 45; Joseph 228.

¹⁰ Moses 1.72, 90, 102, 106, 146, 164, 222, 281; Decalogue 86; Spec. Laws 1.313; 2.95; Rewards 157, 162; Contemp. Life 42; Flacc. 77, 116, 117; dangers (Spec. Laws 3.43), punishments (Moses 1.237; 2.53; Joseph 104; Spec. Laws 3.39, 98, 146, 182), violence (Joseph 52), toil and fatigue (Spec. Laws 2.69, 207; 4.112, 124), incurable infirmities (4.200), woes (Good Man Free 24, 89, 120; Contemp. Life 19; Flacc. 53, 114; To Gaius 234); P.Oxy. 237, col. VIII, 38; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 13, 13; Plutarch, De sera

30.566 f, 567d; Epictetus 2.2.13; Octavian bestows the right of Roman citizenship on Seleucus, who “has often greatly suffered and risked his life for us, shrinking at nothing when it comes to enduring evils (τω—ν πρὸς ὑπομονὴν δεινω—ν), he has shown his faithfulness” (IGLS 718, 13–15). Histria honors three ambassadors who “traveled across enemy territory, facing numberless dangers” (SEG XVIII, 288, 8). Orthagoras of Araxa is honored for “not having ceased to fight at the front rank, taking on all the dangers and all the fatigues” (J. Pouilloux, CIG, Paris, 1960, n. IV, 11).

¹¹ Post. Cain 9, 49, 87; Joseph 36; Dreams 1.47; Moses 1.224; To Gaius 127; Abraham 136, 193; Spec. Laws 2.88; Virtues 122; P.Panop.Beatty 2, 150; SB 9763, 39

¹² Menander, Dysk. 269: “Young man, will you suffer that I should speak to you a bit seriously”; 368: “perhaps he will suffer that I should speak a word to him”; Epictetus 1.2.25: not to endure an idea; T. Job 10.1.

¹³ Alleg. Interp. 3.13: κατέχεται ὑπομένων; Husbandry 173: “they do not endure that God . . . should be revealed as the cause of their goods.” It is possible for the verb to have no moral meaning at all: “things which can be subject to [one of the two sources of destruction]” (Etern. World 22, LCL; 23, 129); the external sense endures with the help of the mind (Alleg. Interp. 2.41, 104; Virtues 135); “images without consistency” (τὰ μὴ ὑπομένοντα, Spec. Laws 1.26); Joseph 141).

¹⁴ Menander, Dysk. 958: “It is perhaps better to endure what awaits me there”; Sam. 144: “I have decided to endure everything”; Josephus, Ant. 2.7; to persevere in a work, 3.53; 12.122: persist in fighting; Pss. Sol. 2.40—invoke God with perseverance (ε—ν ὑπομονῇ). Porphyry, Abst. 1.2.1: “resistance appropriate to the efforts that philosophy requires”; Abst. 1.2.3: “they endure the removal of the genitals”; 1.56.2–3. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Comp. 6.4.15: “no one has the patience to read [certain works] to the end.”

¹⁵ Cratinus, Dionysalex., ὑπομένει τὸ μέλλον (P.Oxy. 663, 32); Xenophon, An. 4.1.21: “I did not wait for you”; Appian, BCiv. 5.81.343; Ep. Arist. 175: “The king walked while awaiting (ὑπέμενε περιπατω—ν) the moment to greet those arriving”; Spec. Laws 1.199: “to wait patiently the necessary time (ὑπομένειν), looking forward to the advantages (χρηστὰ προσδοκω—ντες) that would concern the future”; P.Tebt. 747, 11: “You waited until . . .” (third century BC); P.Mich. 601, 16.

¹⁶ Philo, Dreams 1.173: “You consented to be called father”; Abraham 115, 116, 182; Spec. Laws 1.68, 246; 2.87; 3.82; 4.3, 216; Good Man Free 27, 122; To Gaius 355. One submits to an oath (P.Oslo 93, 15; Dittenberger, Or. 484, 38). Not to consent or tolerate is to “refuse” (P.Haun. 9, 6 = SB 9422; P.Tebt. 768, 10; P.Fay. 11, 21; P.Thead. 13, col. II, 12; Dittenberger, Syl. 591, 9).

¹⁷ Dreams 2.202; Joseph 69, 167; Spec. Laws 3.164; Virtues 210; To Gaius 31.

¹⁸ Spec. Laws 2.222; Good Man Free 6, 36; Plutarch, Arat. 14.2; Rosetta Stone: “He bore great expenses” (Dittenberger, Or. 90, 11 and 21 = SB 8299); Dittenberger, Syl. 1104, 14; C. Michel, Recueil, n. 459, 19; 475, 10; I.Sinur., pp. 32–33, n. 9, 26; L. Robert, Etudes anatoliennes, p. 454, line 5; PSI 435, 11: διότι ὑπομενω— τὴν λειτουργίαν (third century BC) = SB 6713, 11; P.Panop.Beatty 2, 241: “None of the inhabitants should be submitted to any imposition of that sort”; P.Mich. 524, 14 (AD 98); P.Got. 6, 13: “If he does not accept, we ourselves will fulfill his duty”; P.Tebt. 758, 8; P.Lond. 2006, 8: the shepherds will not be able to continue any longer (μὴ δύνασθαι ὑπομένειν) if they do not receive anything; 2074, 8: they will not stay, if I do not give them something to satisfy them; SEG XII, 100, 13: “Theosebes having defaulted on the judgment” (οὐκ ὑπομείναντος τὴν κρίσιν); SB 9108, 13: οὐχ ὑπομένει τὴν καταγραφὴν; cf. P.Lond. 220, col. I, 15.

¹⁹ Cf. Sir 38:27—the artist puts his obstinacy, his determination (ὑπομονή) into changing the design of his seals. Cf. W. Meikle, “The Vocabulary of Patience in the Old Testament,” in Expositor, ser. VIII, vol. 19, 1920, pp. 219–225; idem, “The Vocabulary of Patience in the New Testament,” Expositor, pp. 304–313; C. Spicq, “ΥΠΟΜΟΝΗ: Patientia,” in RSPT, 1930, pp. 95–106; P. A. H. de Boer, “Etude sur le sens de la racine QWH,” in OTS, vol. 10, 1954, pp. 225–246; “We note frequently, if not generally, a sense of firmness, cohesion, and consistency. In the language of the translators, it is consistency, solidity that appears to be the basic meaning” (ibid., p. 232); “tqwh abstractly designates a firm hope, that is, a hope bearing on what has consistency” (ibid., p. 241).

²⁰ Death is welcome “for the old man . . . who is contrary and has lost patience” (Hebrew tiqwâh, Sir 41:2); “Woe to you who have lost patience” (Sir 2:14); 1Chr 29:15—οὐκ ἔστιν ὑπομονή = there is nothing more to wait for; 2Esdr 10:2; Job 14:19.

²¹ Delay (Exod 12:39), remain (Num 22:17), hold fast (Job 8:15; Sir 22:18), bear (Mal 3:2; Sus 57), have courage (2Macc 6:20).

²² Tob 5:7—“Wait for me (ὑπόμεινόν με); I will speak with my father”; Job 3:9; 6:11; 14:14—“I will wait until my relief comes”; 32:4—“Elihu had waited”; Ps 106:13—“They did not wait for his counsel”; Hab 2:3—“if the vision is delayed, wait for it”; Zeph 3:8.

²³ 2Kgs 6:33; Ps 37:9, 34; 40:1; 130:5; Prov 20:22; Sir 51:8; Mic 7:7; Isa 25:9; 40:11; 51:5; 60:9; Lam 3:24-25; Nah 1:7.

²⁴ Luke 2:43—“The child Jesus remained (ὑπέμεινε) at Jerusalem, and his parents did not know it”; Acts 17:14—after Paul’s departure from Berea, “Silas and Timothy remained there.” Cf. Xenophon, Symp. 9.7: “Socrates and those who had remained went out with Callias”; Josephus, Ant. 18.328; P.Petr. III, 43 (3), 14: ὑπομει—ναι ἕως Παύλι? (third century BC); PSI 322, 4.

²⁵ 1Thess 1:3; 2Thess 1:4—“We are proud of your endurance and of your faith during all your persecutions and in the tribulations that you bear”; 1Tim 6:11—“As for you, man of God, . . . pursue righteousness, piety, faith, love, constancy . . .”; Titus 2:2—“Let the old men be . . . wholesome in faith, love, and endurance”; 2Tim 3:10—“You have followed me in teaching, in conduct, in plans, in faith, in patience, love, and constancy” (this could perhaps be from a liturgical formula, cf. G. Delling, Worship in the New Testament, London, 1962, pp. 60ff. On the triad, cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 2, pp. 365–378); Rom 5:4—“endurance produces character, character produces hope”; 8:25—“we hope for what we do not see, we wait with constancy”; 15:4—“so that by constancy and the comfort of the Scriptures we may possess hope”; Heb 10:36, hypomone allows one to obtain what God has promised; Rev 2:19—“I know your works and your love and your faith and your service and your endurance.” Cf. P. Goicoechea, De Conceptu ὑπομονῆ apud S. Paulum, Rome, 1965.

²⁶ Luke 8:15—“What is in the good soil are those who have heard the word with a good and noble heart and keep it and bear fruit through constancy” (καὶ καρποφοροῦσιν ἐ—ν ὑπομονῇ, cf. L. Cerfaux, “Fructifiez en supportant [l’]épreuve,” in Recueil L. Cerfaux, vol. 3, pp. 111–122); Col 1:11—“You will bear fruit . . . you will acquire all constancy and patience” (εἰ—ς πα—σαν ὑπομονὴν καὶ μακροθυμίαν).

²⁷ 2Cor 1:6; Heb 10:32; 12:1—“Let us run with endurance (δι ὑπομονῆς τρέχωμεν) the trial before us”; 12:7—εἰ—ς παιδείαν ὑπομένετε; the verb can be an imperative (the Peshitta): bear, submit yourself (cf. B. W. Blackwelder, Light from the Greek New Testament, 2d ed., Grand Rapids, 1976, p. 92), but it is more likely a present indicative; and εἰ—ς has causal value: calamities endured by the community are inflicted by God so as to educate (Hebrew mûsâr, education through correction) souls that are dear to him, as with a father and his children. Filiation and education go together; παιδεία derives from παι—ς; Jas 1:3-4: “The trial of your faith produces endurance. Let endurance come to full flower,” as with Job, who bore so many trials (Jas 5:11); Rev 3:10; 13:10—“This is the endurance and the faith of the saints”; 14:12.

²⁸ Heb 12:3. In 2Thess 3:5, “Let the Lord guide your hearts toward the love of God and the endurance of Christ,” ει—ς τὴν ὑπομονὴν τοῦ Χριστοῦ can be understood as a call to participate in the sufferings that Christ endured (Rev 1:9). Less probably, this could be the constancy to wait for Christ, or simply hope that has Christ as its object.

²⁹ Rom 5:3—“Tribulation produces endurance” (ἡ θλι—ψις ὑπομονὴν κατεργάζεται); 12:12—τῇ θλίψει ὑπομένοντας; 2Tim 2:10—“I endure everything (πάντα ὑπομένω) for the sake of the elect, so that they also may obtain salvation” (cf. G.H.P. Thompson, “Ephesians III, 13 and II Tim. II, 10 in the Light of Colossians I, 24,” in ExpT, vol. 71, 1960, pp. 187–189; M. Barth, Ephesians, vol. 1, pp. 356ff.); 2Tim 2:12—“If we endure, we shall also reign with (him)”; Heb 10:32—“You have endured such a great trial of suffering” (πολλὴν ἄθλησιν ὑπεμείνατε παθημάτων); Rev 1:9—“I, John, your brother and associate in the tribulation and the kingdom and the endurance of Jesus”; 2:2-3; 3:10.

³⁰ T. Deman, “La théologie de l’ΥΠΟΜΟΝΗ biblique,” in DivThom (Pl.), 1932, pp. 2–20: An audacious force in the enterprise of salvation (aggredi), patientia is also resistance and endurance (sustinere), which is made immune by its vigor to sorrow and discouragement; it is stimulated by its expectatio of the final end and divine help.

ὑπόστασις

hypostasis, substance, firmness, confidence, collection of documents establishing ownership, guarantee, proof
see also πίστις

hypostasis, S 5287; TDNT 8.572–589; EDNT 3.406–407; NIDNTT 1.710–714; MM 659–660; L&N 31.84, 58.1; BAGD 847

The usual Latin equivalent of hypo-stasis is sub-stantia, which in philosophical terms means the essence of an entity, that which is hidden beneath the appearances.¹ This meaning, however, is not attested in the NT, apart from Heb 1:3, where the Son is the imprint or effigy of the substance of the Father.²

In an ethical sense, hypostasis refers to what is deep in the heart—firmness, calm, confidence, courage;³ hence the meaning “hope” or psychological and moral support in Ruth 1:12; Ezek 19:5;⁴ Ps 39:7 (Hebrew tôhelet) and “assurance”—probably the meaning in 2Cor 9:4; 11:17,⁵ and certainly in Heb 3:14—“if we hold our initial confidence (literally, the beginning of assurance) till the end.”⁶ It is more difficult to translate Heb 11:1, estin de pistis elpizomenon hypostasis,⁷ where the Vulgate simply transcribes the word in question (“Fides est substantia sperandarum rerum”) and most moderns translate it “assurance or solid confidence.” But in the papyri our noun is usually used for property, for a right of possession: “without risk for myself and my property” (P.Oxy. 138, 26; 1981, 27; 2478, 28; P.Berl.Zill. 6, 4; SB 8986, 22; 9463, 6; 9566, 10); “the scribe attributed more land to me than I actually own” (P.Oxy. 488, 17; cf. P.Wisc. 61, 15); in an account from the fourth century, “produce from a property of twenty-four arourai.”⁸ Hypostasis is also used for the contents of a house.⁹ The commentaries of the church fathers and the medievals followed this line of interpretation: faith contains the substance of eternal life, which is the prima inchoatio (first beginning) of the object of hope. It already possesses that hope, perhaps only faintly, but nevertheless in its true essence.¹⁰

This nuance of anticipation can be narrowed down further. Hypostasis means point of departure, beginning (Diodorus Siculus 1.66), provision for the future (P.Panop.Beatty 1, 269; P.Tebt. 336; 7; P.Stras. 309, verso 2; P.Fay. 343; SB 7360, 12), offer (P.Panop.Beatty 2, 144, 158), commitment or guarantee.¹¹ According to the edict of Mettius Rufus, all owners of building and land have to have deeds on record establishing their property rights.¹² Thus a hypostasis is a collection of documents establishing ownership, deposited in the archives¹³ and proving the owner’s rights; hence it is a guarantee for the future. Moulton-Milligan are right to translate Heb 11:1 “Faith is the title-deed of things hoped for.”¹⁴ This was also the interpretation of the Peshitta: pyso, “guarantee, proof.”¹⁵ Faith is a title of ownership on property that is in the future.

¹ Philo, Dreams 1.188: “this world, whose substance is perceived only by the intelligence”; Ps.-Aristotle, Mund. 4.395a30–31 (contrasted with κατ᾽ ἔμφασιν); b3–17 (phenomena contrasted with substantial reality, κατ᾽ ὑπόστασιν); Albinus, Didask. 25: “the soul is an incorporeal essence with respect to its fundamental being (ὑπόστασις)”; Ps.-Plutarch, De plac. philos. 3.5.1; Philo, Etern. World 88, 92: “this brilliance has no substance of its own”; Aëtius 3.5.1: “among the phenomena of the heights, some are of a material nature”; cf. C. Mugler, Terminologie optique, p. 400; H. Dörrie, “Hypostasis: Wort und Bedeutungsgeschichte,” in Nachrichten der Akademie der Wissenschaften in Göttingen, I, phil.-hist. Klasse, V, 1955, pp. 35–92 = Platonica Minora, Munich, 1976, pp. 13–69; Koester, on this word, in TDNT, vol. 8, pp. 572–589.

² Comparable is “to have” (Deut 11:6 [Hebrew yeqûm, that which exists, reality]; Job 22:20), means of subsistence or of living: ὑπόστασις ζωῆς (Judg 6:4, mihyâh; Pss. Sol. 15.7; 17.26; T. Reub. 2.7); existence, life (Ps 39:5; 89:47, Hebrew heled; 139:15).

³ Polybius 4.50.10: “The Rhodians, seeing the firmness of the Byzantians” (τὴν τω—ν Βυζαντίων ὑπόστασιν); Diodorus Siculus 1.6; 16.32.3; Josephus, Ant. 18.24: “many had seen the firmness of their resolve.” Cf. ὑποστατικω—ς = firmly (P.Lond. 2188, 295).

⁴ In these two texts, ὑπόστασις translates the Hebrew tiqwâh (cf. P. A. H. De Boer, “Etude sur le sens de la racine QWH,” in Oudtestamentliche Studien, vol. 10, 1954, pp. 225–246). Compare ὑπόστασις as “sustenance, support, help,” Ps 69:2; Wis 16:21—“Your help showed your mildness toward your children.”

⁵ Certain exegetes translate 2Cor 9:4, ε—ν τῇ ὑποστάσει ταύτη, “in this matter”; others, “on this supposition” or “on the basis of this assurance.” E, K, L, P, and the Syriac interpret correctly by adding τῆς καυχίσεως to ὑποστάσει. This is confirmed by 2Cor 11:17—ε—ν ταύτῃ ὑποστάσει τῆς καυχίσεως, “with this assurance in boasting” (“avec cette assurance-là dans la vanterie,” E. B. Allo), i.e., the assurance with which I boast. But J. Héring interprets “by placing myself in the arena of boasting” (“en me plaçant sur le terrain de la vantardise”).

⁶ Heb 3:14—τὴν ἀρχὴν τῆς ὑποστάσεως (contrasting against ἀπόστασις, verse 12). Cf. ὑπόστασις as coming into existence, in Proclus and Iamblichus: τὴν πρώτην ὑπόστασιν (A. J. Festugière, Hermès Trismégiste, p. 216 and n. 4); or as the originality of the primitive stock of the Jewish race (τὴν πρώτην ὑπόστασιν, Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.1).

⁷ M. A. Mathis, The Pauline πίστις-ὑπόστασις according to Hebr. XI, 1, Washington, 1920; R. E. Witt, “Ἰπόστασις,” in Amicitiae Corolla (Volume of Essays Presented to J. R. Harris), London, 1933, pp. 253–264; E. Grässer, Der Glaube im Hebräerbrief, Marburg, 1965, pp. 45ff. et passim.

⁸ P.Harr. 99, 22; cf. P.Lond. 1343, 1; P.Athen. 61, 10 (first century AD); P.Princ. 53, 17 (same date); 75, 15; BGU 1621, col. III, 1 (second century); 2180, 7; 2207–2210; P.Oxy. 1274, 15; P.Michael. 41, 8; 60, 2; C.P.Herm. 31, 12–13; P.Fouad 85, 1–2, “my fortune”; P.Apoll. 8029, 21; P.Phil. 1, 23, “an estimate made not according to an unofficial declaration but according to their true standing with respect to property”; P. Hermann, Ergebnisse, p. 8, n. II, 9: διὰ τε ταύτην τὴν ὑπόστασιν. Luther understood Heb 11:1 to mean possession; cf. K. Hagen, A Theology of Testament in the Young Luther: The Lectures on Hebrews, Leiden, 1974, p. 86.

⁹ Cf. A. A. Schiller, “A Family Archive from Jeme,” in Studi in onore V. Arangio-Ruiz, Naples, 1953, vol. 4, p. 340. Cf. ὑπόστασις = baggage (Jer 10:17) and load, burden (Deut 1:12, Hebrew masâ’), i.e., a container that one carries.

¹⁰ Πρόληψις ε—κούσιος ε—στι, “faith is a voluntary preconception,” Clement of Alexandria, Strom. 2.2 (PG, vol. 8, 940; ed. Berlin, vol. 2, 117); 2.4 (PG, vol. 8, 948; ed. Berlin, vol. 2, 121); cf. ὑπόστασις as the contract for a lease, P.Tebt. 61 b, 194; 71, 111 (second century BC); in astrology, ὑπόστασις means “foreordained reality” (cf. Koester, TDNT, vol. 8, p. 579); M. M. Schumpp, “Der Glaubensbegriff des Hebräerbriefes und seine Deutung durch den hl. Thomas von Aquin,” in DivThom (Fribourg), 1933, pp. 397–410; C. Spicq, Hébreux, vol. 2, pp. 337ff.

¹¹ P.Eleph. 15, 3: οἱ— δ ὑπογεγραμμένοι γεωργοὶ ε—πέδωκαν ἡμι—ν ὑπόστασιν; P.Corn. 50, 6: κὰν μὲν ὑπόστασιν λάβης, δήλωσον μοι (first century); cf. Jur.Pap. 59, 34, 42.

¹² Petition of Dionysia, AD 186: τὰ ἀντίγραφα τῶ—ν συγγραφῶ—ν ται—ς τῶ—ν ἀνδρῶ—ν ὑποστάσεσιν ε—ντίθεσθαι (P.Oxy. 237, col. VIII, 26; with the note of Grenfell-Hunt, on this text).

¹³ Cf. E. Kiessling, “Ein Beitrag zum Grundbuchrecht im hellenistischen Ägypten,” in JJP, 1965, p. 77. This would be close to διπλώμα, P.Wisc. 53, 4; cf. F. Dölger, J. Karagannopulos, Byzantinische Urkundenlehre (Handbuch der Altertumswiss., XII, 3, 1, 1), Munich, 1968.

¹⁴ An example of a title-deed, SB 9086, col. III, 1–11, from AD 104: —Εγδιαστρώματος τῆς τῶ—ν ε—γκτήσεων βιβλιοθήκως κτλ.; this is the end of a deed of cession for ten arourai of land by Ammonius to Collauthis; this land was previously ceded to Ammonius by a woman (whose name is lost), and Collauthis in turn ceded the land to Trypho. Thus it is established that the latter is the legitimate owner; cf. P. J. Sijpesteijn, “SB VI, 9086 and ΕΚΧΩΡΗΣΙΣ,” in ZPE, vol. 19, 1975, pp. 87–99.

¹⁵ A meaning that corresponds to that of πίστις in classical Greek: “surety, deposit, guarantee”; cf. Sophocles, Phil. 813, OC 1632; Thucydides 5.45; Xenophon, An. 1.2.26; Xenophon, Cyr. 7.1.44.

ὑποτάσσω

hypotasso, to make subordinate, submit, append, attach

hypotasso, S 5293; TDNT 8.39–46; EDNT 3.408; MM 660; L&N 37.31; BDF §202; BAGD 847–848

It may be said that this verb is peculiar to the language of the NT,¹ and that “submission,” which should not be confused with obedience,² is a major virtue in the Christian pastoral writings, expressing the relations of subordination in the cosmic and religious order.

God has placed everything in submission to Christ,³ to whom the angels are subordinate (Heb 2:5; 1Pet 3:22); the church is in submission to the Lord (Eph 5:24); Christians submit to God, to his law and his training,⁴ but also to one another to cooperate (1Cor 16:16) in the fear of God (Eph 5:21; cf. Rom 13:8). Woman is subordinate to man,⁵ the wife to the husband,⁶ the children to the parents (1Tim 3:4; cf. Marcus Aurelius 1.17.3), the young to the old,⁷ slaves and servants to their master (Eph 6:5, Titus 2:9; 1Pet 2:18), subjects (cf. Ep. Arist. 205, 207, 265; Josephus, War 2.140; Polybius 21.43, hoi hypotattomenoi) to their sovereign;⁸ and finally the Christian must submit to every human creature.⁹ We may conclude that the baptized person is a “son of obedience” (1Pet 1:2, 22) in all the larger or smaller human communities in which he is placed (1Pet 2:13–3:12), contributing to the maintenance of the order¹⁰ fixed by the plan of providence whereby all creatures are ordered in a hierarchy (Wis 11:21).

It is clear that hypotasso does not have the same range in these differing communal relationships; but it is always reverent submission, seen as a self-offering (cf. Titus 3:1–2). It means first of all accepting the exact place God has assigned, keeping to one’s rank in this or that society,¹¹ accepting a dependent status,¹² especially toward God (Jas 4:7), like children who are submissive to a father’s discipline (Heb 12:9), after the fashion of the child Jesus.¹³ This religious subjection is made up of an obedient spirit, humaneness of heart (Ep. Arist. 257), respect, and willingness to serve. To submit is to accept directives that are given, to honor conditions that are imposed, to please one’s superior (Titus 2:9) or honor him by the homage that is obedience (cf. Eph 6:1), to repudiate egotism and aloofness. It is to spontaneously position oneself as a servant toward one’s neighbor in the hierarchy of love.¹⁴

All of this is absolutely new and has no secular parallel.¹⁵ The papyri only use hypotasso with respect to copies or postscripts added to a letter, or an “adjunct” document. For example: “Attached is a copy of the petition that was addressed to us”;¹⁶ P.Mert. 59, 9: “what follows is a copy” (estin antigraphon to hypotetagmenon, second century BC; cf. Dittenberger, Or. 629, 6); “I have added a note to the attached request”;¹⁷ P.Yale 56, 6: “the attached ordinance, translated from the Greek” (to hypotetagmenon prostagma).¹⁸ This became a formula: hypotetachamen soi to antigraphon, “We submit to you a copy of the letter written to us by the members of the gymnasium of Omboi” (C.Ord.Ptol. 49, 7; cf. 45, 5; 51, 8, 52, 15; 58, 7; 60, 15, 17).

¹ In the LXX, ὑποτάσσω is a virtue only in Ps 62:1, 5—“Is not my soul in submission to God”; Hag 2:19—“submit your hearts”; 2Macc 9:12—“It is right to submit to God, and as a mere mortal not to pretend to be equal to the divinity.” In Ps 8:6; Dan 7:27 the messianic reign is in view. The other occurrences are political (submission of the peoples to one king or one God, 1Chr 22:18; 24:24; Ps 18:47; Wis 8:14; 18:22; 2Macc 8:9; 13:23), as in Josephus, War 2.361, 433; 4.175; Polybius 3.13.8, etc.

² The literal meaning of ὑποτάσσομαι is “to order oneself under” a leader (Onasander 1.17; Plutarch, Pomp. 64.5), “subordinate” (Nic. 23.5; T. Jud. 21.2—God subordinates the royal power to the priestly authority); in the passive or middle, “consent to an authority, remain in one’s place,” cf. C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, pp. 534ff., 592ff. E. Kamlah, “ΥΠΟΤΑΣΣΕΣΑΙ in den neutestamentlichen ‘Haustafeln,’” in O. Böcher, K. Haacker, Verborum Veritas (Festschrift C. Stählin), Wuppertal, 1970, pp. 237–342; W. Schrage, “Zur Ethik der neutestamentlichen Haustafeln,” in NTS, vol. 21, 1974, pp. 8–14.

³ 1Cor 14:27-28 (citation of Ps 8:7; cf. E. Schendel, Herrschaft und Unterwerfung Christi, I Kor. XV, 24–28, Tübingen, 1971); Eph 1:22; Phil 3:21; Heb 2:8; 1Pet 2:24. God puts all creation in submission to himself, Pap.Graec.Mag. II, 13, 579; cf. I, 2, 101.

⁴ Rom 8:7; 10:3; Heb 12:9; Jas 4:7; cf. Epictetus 3.24.65: τῷ θεῷ ὑποτεταγμένος; 4.12.11: “I have someone whom I must please, to whom I must submit, whom I must obey: God, and after God myself.”

⁵ 1Cor 14:34; 1Tim 2:11; cf. K. H. Rengstorf, “Die neutestamentlichen Mahnungen an die Frau, sich dem Manne unterzuordnen,” in W. Foerster, Verbum Dei manet in aeternum (Festschrift O. Schmitz), Witten, 1953, pp. 131–145.

⁶ Eph 5:22-24; Col 3:18 (cf. J. E. Crouch, The Origin and Intention of the Colossian Haustafel, Göttingen, 1972); Titus 2:5; 1Pet 3:1, 5; Plutarch, Con. praec. 33; Quaest. conv. 9.2.2; cf. F. J. Leenhardt, F. Blanke, Die Stellung der Frau im N.T., Zurich, 1949; L. Hick, Stellung des hl. Paulus zur Frau, Cologne, 1957, pp. 141ff.

⁷ 1Pet 5:5; Philo, Spec. Laws 2.226; cf. C. Spicq, “La Place et le rôle des jeunes dans certaines communautés néotestamentaires,” in RB, 1969, pp. 518ff.

⁸ Rom 13:1, 5; Titus 3:1; cf. Dittenberger, Or. 654, 7: σύμπασαν τὴν ἡβαίδα μὴ ὑποταγεῖ—σαν τοι—ς βασιλεῦσιν ὑποτάξας; J. Dauvillier, Les Temps apostoliques, Paris, 1970, pp. 677ff. C. F. D. Moule, Birth of the NT, p. 171, n. 2.

⁹ Ὑποτάγητε πάσῃ ἀνθρωπίνῃ κτίσει διὰ τὸν κύριον, 1Pet 2:13. This strange expression (H. Teichert, “I Petr. II, 13: Eine Crux interpretum,” in TLZ, 1954, pp. 303ff.) should be compared to Josephus, Ant. 15.372: “Herod thought more highly of the Essenes than of a mortal nature (person)” (κατὰ τὴν θνητὴν φύσιν). This wording was used to make as broad as possible the range of those whom Christians must respect (cf. verses 17–18) and especially to correct the idolatrous divinization of power. We may also understand it “in terms of the isonomia and democratic constitution of the polis, where each citizen—equal and like all the others—is referred to the social kosmos: commanding and obeying are not opposites. It is a symmetrical relationship that keeps each one in his place and assures the stability and order of the whole” (P. Lévêque, P. Vidal-Naquet, Clisthène l’Athénien, Paris, 1964, p. 77).

¹⁰ Cf. 1Cor 14:32-33: “the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets, for God is not a God of disorder, but of peace” (M. A. Chevallier, Esprit de Dieu, paroles des hommes, pp. 185ff.). The animals are placed under human dominion (Philo, Creation 84); “the wise person subjects secondary goods to himself” (Alleg. Interp. 3.26); cf. Ep. Arist. 11, 266.

¹¹ Rom 8:20 (cf. A. Viard, “Expectatio creaturae, Rom. VIII, 19–22,” in RB, 1952, pp. 337ff.); 1Cor 15:28; Phil 3:21.

¹² 1Cor 14:34. The use of the middle voice (ὑποτάσσομαι, cf. Col 3:18) emphasizes the voluntary character of the submission and alleviates whatever might be humiliating about subordination, whatever suggests inferiority (Philo, Decalogue 168; Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.201). Such is the case with women, for whom the wearing of the veil on the head should give expression in worship to this hierarchical “order” which dates back to creation.

¹³ Luke 2:51; the periphrastic construction ἦν ὑποτασσόμενος αὐτοῖς—ς emphasizes that the dependence of the incarnate Son of God toward his parents was constant; cf. L. Laurentin, Jésus au Temple, Paris, 1966, pp. 165ff.

¹⁴ Cf. Gal 5:13; 6:2; 1QS 11.1–2: “I will practice benevolent charity . . . to respond with humility to haughty spirits and with deference to unjust men who point the finger.” A. Jaubert (Clément de Rome: Épître aux Corinthiens, Paris, 1971, p. 79), after citing 1Clem. 37.2–3, where each one is to keep his place and carry out the assigned tasks, cites 1QS 2.21–23: “Let every man of Israel know well his place in the community of God. . . . Let no one descend below his station and no one climb above the place allotted to him.” Everyone must obey those who were enrolled before him (1QS 6.26).

¹⁵ At most, this epitaph for a beast-fighter on a stele in Amasia could be cited: “Troilus, after vanquishing all the bears in the stadium (ὑποτάξας) was himself vanquished by fever” (F. Cumont, Studia Pontica, II, n. 167).

¹⁶ P.Mich. 232, 1; 425, 4; 584, 16 (AD 84); P.Oxy. 1877, 4; 1878, 5; 2277, 2, 6, 11; 2408, 7; 2584, 4: “conformably to the attached petition” (κατὰ τὴν ὑποτεταγμένην αἴτιον).

¹⁷ P.Phil. 1, 4; P.Fouad 13, 7; 26, 10; C.P.Herm. 67, 3; P.Cair.Isid. 76, 3; P.Oslo 107, 5; P.Oxf. 2, 36; P.Brem. 54, 9; BGU 1759, 3 (first century BC); P.Corn. 20, 9, 34, 53; Pap.Lugd.Bat. VI, 15, 34: τὰ ἀντίγραφα ὑπέταξα; 43, 23; XVI, 31, 14; 33, 3; etc.

¹⁸ Cf. a stele at Laodicea in Media: “Attached below is a copy of the ordinance that was addressed to us by the king” (L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 7, p. 7, line 4); I.Thas. 171, 8: “We append to this letter a copy of the honors that we have awarded to your fellow-citizen”; a decree of the city of Seleuceia in Pieria: “an ordinance whose transcription is found below” (SEG VII, 62, 4–5; cf. M. Holleaux, Etudes d'épigraphie, vol. 3, pp. 199ff.); a letter of Ptolemy VI Philometor: “we have received the letter to which you attached a copy of the memorial sent by the soldiers of the garrison at Thera” (Dittenberger, Or. 59, 6; cf. 137, 10; Syl. 664, 11; 880, 11).

ὑστερέω, ὑστέρημα, ὑστέρησις, ὕστερον, ὕστερος

hystereo, to be late, be left behind, lack, fail, run out; hysterema, hysteresis, lack, poverty; hysteron, after, next, later, finally; hysteros, coming behind, coming after, late, future hystereo, S 5302; TDNT 8.592–601; EDNT 3.409; NIDNTT 3.952–954; MM 661–662; L&N 13.21, 57.37, 65.51, 87.65; BDF §§101, 180(5), 189(3);

BAGD 849 | hysterema, S 5303; TDNT 8.592–601; EDNT 3.409; NIDNTT 3.952–953, 955; L&N 57.38, 85.29; BAGD 849 | hysteresis, S 5304; TDNT 8.592–601; EDNT 3.409; NIDNTT 3.952–953, 955; L&N 57.37; BAGD 849 | hysteron, S 5305; TDNT 8.592–601; NIDNTT 3.952–953; MM 662; BAGD 849 | hysteros, S 5306; TDNT 8.592–601; EDNT 3.409; NIDNTT 3.952–953; MM 662; L&N 61.16, 67.50; BDF §§62, 164(4); BAGD 849

In this family of words, the evolution was from a local sense to the commoner temporal sense, then to a general idea of inferiority.¹ The adjective hysteros, “coming behind, after” in space, then in time,² is used for “the following day”³ as well as for “later, next”⁴ and for posterity, a distant future,⁵ but it may refer to something that is merely second, subsequent.⁶ It takes on a pejorative nuance in the expression “arrive too late” (Homer, Il. 18.320), “late, tardy” (Aristophanes, Vesp. 691), and especially with the sense of being “inferior.”⁷ This latter meaning is well attested in Philo,⁸ who especially loves this adjective and gives it the same meanings as classical Greek.⁹

The denominative verb hystereo has especially the meaning “be late, arrive late, too late,”¹⁰ but also “let oneself be outrun, left behind,”¹¹ hence a nuance of inferiority and even—in the Hellenistic period—insufficiency and inefficacy: the manna was given “without insufficiency or excess.”¹² This is the predominant meaning in the LXX (especially for the Hebrew haser): “lack, fail, run out.”¹³ It is also found in Philo (Husbandry 85: lack opportunity), Josephus (Ant. 1.98; cf. 15.70), Dioscorides (5.86), and especially in the papyri.¹⁴ “Such a person works and tires himself out and presses on and is only more lacking” (Sir 11:11; cf. 11:12); “If you are useful to the rich man he will use you, but if you have nothing he will abandon you” (13:15); a sad spectacle is that of the “failing” warrior (26:28); “you have been weighed in the balance and found wanting” (kai heurethe hysterosa, literally, lacking weight, Dan 5:27 [Theodotion]). The adverb hysteron, the opposite of nyn (“now”),¹⁵ retains in the LXX the commonplace meanings of the adjective: next, after, finally.¹⁶ It is particularly common in the papyri.¹⁷

The NT completes this semantic evolution; almost all of the fifteen occurrences of the verb hystereo (John 2:3 is a bad manuscript reading) have the sense “to lack,” whether on a human or a spiritual level. The rich young man, having observed all the commandments, asks, “What do I still lack” to be perfect (Matt 19:20; cf. Mark 10:21)? While Jesus was with his apostles, did they lack anything (Luke 22:35)? When Paul arrived at Corinth, he lacked everything (2Cor 11:9), but he knew how to live with abundance as well as how to go wanting.¹⁸ He thinks that he is in no way beneath (behind, inferior to) those most eminent apostles who wish to surpass him (2Cor 11:5; 12:11). The Corinthians lack no spiritual gift.¹⁹

The meaning of the eight occurrences of hysterema poses no problem (“poverty, lack”), although it does not appear in the secular language before the third century BC, and then only twice. In a petition to the strategos, the farmers of Oxyrhynchus attest that they have worked their hardest, sown, and even borrowed large sums of money, in order to avoid any tardiness or deficiency (eis to methen hysterema genesthai);²⁰ but the six occurrences in the LXX suggest that this substantive was current in Alexandrian Koine: “This place where nothing is lacking of all the things that are on the earth” (Judg 18:10; 19:19, 20; Hebrew mahsôr); “if the things necessary for whole burnt offerings are lacking, they will be given to them” (2Esdr 6:9); “what is lacking cannot be numbered” (Eccl 1:15); “for those who fear him, there is no privation (lack)” (Ps 34:9). The Lord comments on the alms given by the poor widow: “This woman, out of her poverty (ek tou hystereatos autēs), gave all she had to live on.”²¹ The Macedonian Christians supplied Paul’s poverty (to hysterema mou, 2Cor 9:9), and Epaphroditus risked his life to help the apostle, given the absence of the “lacking” Philippians (hina anaplerose to hymon hysterema).²² On the level of emotions, when the apostle was—if we may put it so—“in a state of lack,” Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus “filled my privation” (1Cor 16:17). Faith always needs to be supplemented, filled from an abundance, whether of knowledge, or of faithfulness, or of fervor; so St. Paul prays night and day that God will fill what is lacking (ta hystere mata) in the faith of the Thessalonians, whatever is concretely insufficient; this would be needs rather than deficiencies.²³

After this, the two biblical occurrences of hysteresis are clear, since this noun and hysterema are synonymous. According to Mark 12:44, the poor widow gave “out of her poverty” (ek tes hystere seos autēs, cf. Luke 21:4); and St. Paul protests, “It is not poverty (ouch hoti kath’ hysteresin) that inspires my words” (Phil 4:11), before going on to say, “I know how to lack (hysterein) and I know how to live with abundance” (4:12).

The adjective hysteros is used but once: en hysterois kairois (1Tim 4:1), which means not “the last days” (cf. 1Pet 1:5, 20—en kairo eschato), but in days to follow, later times, the future. As for the adverb hysteron, it retains its classical meanings: “after, next, later” (Matt 21:30, 32; 25:11; John 13:36; Heb 12:11) and “finally.”²⁴

¹ P. Chantraine, Dictionnaire étymologique, on this word.

² Aristotle, Pol. 5.10.23: “Dionysius the Younger”; Josephus, War 1.342.

³ Plato, Leg. 3.698e: “arrive one day after the battle”; Josephus, Ant. 3.236; 14.73, 464.

⁴ Herodotus 1.130.2; Plato, Leg. 9.865 a; Thucydides 4.90.1: “arriving after his colleague”; 8.41.1; P.Oxy. 237, col. VIII, 40: “if a search is made afterward”; 2131, 18: “that I be able afterward”; Wis 19:11, “after which . . .”

⁵ Euripides, Tro. 13: πρὸς ἀνδρῶ—ν ὑστέρων; P.Oxy. 1118, 12: ε—ξ ὑστέρου = for the future. Cf. Ep Jer 72: “far from . . .”

⁶ Antiphon 6.14: “my second discourse”; Plato, Grg. 503 c; Leg. 10.896c; Aristotle, Ph. 8.7.261a: “growth, alteration . . . subsequent to generation”; Josephus, Ant. 7.244; P.Hib. 52, 10: “so that there is no subsequent loss.” Cf. 1Chr 29:29—“the acts of King David, from the first to the last” (Hebrew ‘ah<Ø>a<^>ron).

⁷ Plato, Tim. 20 a; Sophocles, Ant. 746; Isocrates, Big. 16.31; Plutarch, Fab. 24.5: yield precedence.

⁸ Philo, Plant. 132: “the creature finds itself in everything placed after the Creator”; Creation 45: a secondary rank; Cherub. 89: the last rank; Prelim. Stud. 23; Creation 68: the fish, the last and vilest of animals; To Gaius 286, 307.

⁹ “Next, after” (Creation 26: “movement comes about either after the thing moved or simultaneously”); say or do next (Alleg. Interp. 1.53; 2.13; Abraham 81; Virtues 179; Etern. World 125), a little later or a little farther off (Creation 65; Alleg. Interp. 1.55; Worse Attacks Better 10; Post. Cain 24; Husbandry 21; Spec. Laws 1.258; 2.215); immediately afterward (Prelim. Stud. 139; Joseph 8, 196; Moses 1.79, 169; Contemp. Life 44); a day later (Husbandry 150; Abraham 245; Moses 2.288; Flacc. 130, 140; To Gaius 87), the final limit (ὑστατος; Creation 77, 83, 87; Drunkennes 15; Heir 172), extreme old age (Flight 55), the future (εἰ—ς ὑστερον, Abraham 184), much later (Conf. Tongues 149; Abraham 254; Joseph 261; Moses 1.242; 2.29); final, last (Worse Attacks Better 84; Moses 2.186; Spec. Laws 2.95; Flacc. 9), especially in opposition to πρότερος (Unchang. God 54, 105; Husbandry 138; Drunkennes 48; Sobr. 22; Flight 73; Dreams 2.166; Abraham 47; Moses 2.50; Spec. Laws 3.85; 4.112; Virtues 222; Rewards 102, 125; To Gaius 31: “first and last lesson”; 261).

¹⁰ Herodotus 6.89: the Athenians “arrived one day later than the date that had been set”; Euripides, Phoen. 976: “If you are late . . . you will die”; Plato, Grg. 447 a: “Are we late?”; Demosthenes, C. Neaer. 59.3: “if your reinforcements arrived too late”; Xenophon, An. 1.7.12: “Abrocomas arrived five days after the battle”; Polybius 2.11.13: “he was too late to help”; Joseph 182; Moses 2.233; Josephus, Ant. 6.235, 195; P.Oxy. 118, 30:

things necessary for his visit are useless if they arrive too late (cf. H. C. Youtie, Scriptiunculae, vol. 1, pp. 341–345); PSI 432, 5.

¹¹ Isocrates, Paneg. 4.164: “our ancestors were outstripped by the barbarians”; Thucydides 1.134.2; 3.31.2; Plato, Resp. 6.484 d: “they are not inferior to them in any kind of merit”; 7.539 e: “so that even for experience they should not lag behind the others”; Alleg. Interp. 2.100: the soul must remain behind the passions, keep its distance.

¹² Heir 191: μήθ ὕστερησαι μήθ αὖ περιττεῦσαι; Josephus, War 1.271: the courage of Phasael “made vain the king’s cruelty”; Ps.-Plato, Epin. 983 d: πάντως ὕστερει—.

¹³ Deut 15:8; Neh 9:21—“they lacked nothing”; Eccl 6:2; 9:8; 10:3—his heart failed; Cant 7:2—wine is not lacking; Sir 10:27; 51:24; 7:34—“Do not fail those who weep”; Ps 23:1—“Yahweh is my shepherd, I will not lack anything.” Cf. Hebrew gara: “Why will we fail to offer the offering to Yahweh” (Num 9:7); hadal: “the person who has failed to do the Passover” (Num 9:13); “Let me know what I lack” (Ps 39:4); mana: “Yahweh does not take happiness from those who walk in perfection” (Ps 74:11); Job 36:17.

¹⁴ P.Hib. 43, 7: “See to it that no one lacks an oil presser, so that you will not be responsible” (third century BC); 65, 29; BGU 1074, 7: μήτε ὕστερει—ν τι ὑμι—ν τω—ν ὑπαρχόντων δικαίων; P.Oxy. 1293, 24; 1678, 5: “if the favorable moment is lacking we have no more hope”; P.Col. IV, 2, n. 114, A 3; SB 6771, 111; 6778, 12: ἵνα μὴ ὕστερήσωμεν τῆς ἐ—ργασίας; 7241, 50: μὴ γένηται ἀμελίας καὶ ὕστερεθῆ τι.

¹⁵ Homer, Il. 1.27 (cf. Od. 8.202, later). An act of emancipation of slaves in the third century BC, “for the children that they have now (νῶν) and that they may have in the future (ὕστερον)” (J. Pouilloux, CIG, n. 38, 7); cf. Menander, Dysk. 358: “Wait; later he will take his customary route”; Philostratus, Gym. 2: “I will show later how this comes about”; Josephus, Ant. 1.325: ἐ—ς ὕστερον; 4Macc 12:7—“we shall tell a little later.”

¹⁶ Hebrew ’aharītah; Prov 5:4; 23:31; 24:32; 2Macc 5:20; 6:15; Sir 27:23—“but afterwards the hypocrite changes his mouth (his speech)”; Jer 29:2; 31:19; 40:1; 50:17—“Assyria was the first to eat the straying sheep; the last was Nebuchadnezzar.”

¹⁷ P.Fouad 44, 28: “Lucius will not be able in the future to bring any suit” (loan of money in AD 44); P.Sorb. 63, 3: “Do not hinder the construction of the cistern... lest afterward (ἵνα μὴ ὕστερον) they make a report . . .”; P.Mich. 173, 39; 490, 22: “I learned it too late”; P.Princ. 119, 30; P.Oxy.

718, 11: “a very long time later, after forty years had passed”; 1062, 8: “you wrote me afterward”; 2981, 6: “later I came to Chaireu”; 3104, 24: “in the event of a future inquest”; 3192, 21; P.Brem. 48, 26; P.Tebt. 701, 78; P.Fam.Tebt. 15, 53; 30, 2; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XX, 36, 2: “after the sending of my previous letter, a little later I took Stakhas . . .”; SB 11008, 24; 11221, 8; etc.

¹⁸ Phil 4:12—οἶδα . . . καὶ περισσεύειν καὶ ὑστερεῖ—ᾶναι. Cf. the prodigal son, who after spending all his money “began to lack,” to feel his privation, to find himself in need (Luke 15:14); faithful people of God, leading the life of fugitives, are described by the present middle participle: ὑστερούμενοι (Heb 11:37), destitute, lacking everything. The quality of one’s food has no meaning in the spiritual order: “If we do not eat, we have no less (ὑστερούμεθα), and if we eat, we have no more (περισσεύομεν)” (1Cor 8:8); “God has arranged the body so as to give more honor to that which lacked it (τω—ὑστερουμένῳ),” (1Cor 12:24, the principle of decency). Only Heb 4:1 retains the classical meaning, “arrive too late.”

¹⁹ 1Cor 1:7. It is necessary to watch lest any brother be deprived of grace (Heb 12:15); sinners are deprived of the glory of God (Rom 3:23).

²⁰ P.Tebt. 786, 9 (138 BC). In the third century BC, Apollonius writes to Leon, the toparchos of Philadelphia: “see to the sowing statement (διαγραφή τοῦ σπόρου) with the habitual cooperation . . . have it ready . . . if there is a delay (ε—ἂν ὑστερήμα γένηται), you will be sent before the dioiketes ” (P.Yale 36, 6 = SB 9257; cf. P. Vidal-Naquet, Le Bordereau d’ensemencement dans l’Egypte ptolémaïque, Brussels, 1967, p. 21; J. A. S. Evans, C. Bradford Welles, “The Archives of Leon,” in JJP, vol. 7, 1953, pp. 35ff.). Cf. Corp. Herm. 4.10: “such is the deficiency (ὑστέρημα) that affects the dissimilar with regard to the similar”; 13.3: “for your part, supply my lacks (τὰ ὑστερήματα) in the manner that you promised” (from the French of A. J. Festugière).

²¹ Luke 21:4 (following the French of E. Delebecque, Evangile de Luc). The collection for the poor of Jerusalem allows the abundance of some to supply the destitution of others: “In the present circumstances, your superfluity (τὸ ὑμῶ—ν περίσσευμα) goes for the lack of those people (εἰ—θὸ ε—κείνων ὑστέρημα), so that their surplus may pass on to your own lack (ὑστέρημα), so that equality may come about” (2Cor 8:14); the deficit of the “saints” who are experiencing famine is filled (τὰ ὑστερήματα τῶ—ν ἁγίων, 9:12).

²² Phil 2:30. Cf. Col 1:24—“I complete in my flesh what is lacking in the tribulations of Christ”; cf. J. Kremer, Was an den Leiden Christi noch

mangelt, Bonn, 1956; G. Le Grelle, “La Plénitude de la Parole dans la pauvreté de la chair,” in NRT, 1959, pp. 233–250.

²³ 1Thess 3:10; cf. B. Rigaux, Thessaloniciens, on this text.

²⁴ After forty days and forty nights of fasting, “finally Jesus was hungry” (Matt 4:20). After the successive sending of servants to the tenants in the vineyard, “finally he sent his Son” (21:37); after the seven husbands had died, “finally the woman herself died” (22:27; cf. Luke 20:32); after many false witnesses, finally two appeared (Matt 26:60; Mark 16:14).

φαιλόνης

phailones, cloak

phailones, EDNT 3.411; MM 663, 665–666; L&N 6.172; BDF §§5(1), 25, 32(2); BAGD 851

St. Paul, a prisoner at Rome, asks Timothy to bring him the cloak (ton philonen) that he left with Carpus at Troas.¹ This refers to a short, heavy coat of thick and coarse material (Plautus, Mostell. 991), usually with a hood (Pliny, HN 24.138), that effectively protected the torso and arms from rain and cold² but hindered movement (Tacitus, Dial. 39.3).

The word phailone-phainole was borrowed by late Greek from the Latin paenula,³ which in turn originally came from Greek⁴ and according to its etymology—and the etymological meaning was not entirely lost⁵—would have referred to a very striking, easily visible color.⁶ The spelling is quite variable: phelones, phailones, phelonis, phailonin, phelonin, ⁷*phelonin*,⁸ and the transposition of the l and the n has been retained in modern Greek: phainoles (P.Oxy. 3057, 4: “I received your letter, the trunk, and the capes”; 3201, 4: phenolou idochromou; line 7: phenoles melas). In addition there are the diminutive forms, so popular in the Koine: phailonion, phelonion.

This cloak is frequently mentioned in the papyri.⁹ Usually made of wool,¹⁰ the cape is categorized as a winter garment (Julius Pollux, Onom. 7.13, 60–61); more precisely, there is a cheimonikon phelonin which is more expensive than the summer cape.¹¹ Along with these notes on purchases and gifts, the paenula appears most often in requests for remittal, which is exactly what 2Tim 3:13 is; cf. P.Oxy. 1583, 6; 1584, 7, 18; P.Mich. 496, 10, 13: “You say that I will receive the phainolas and the pig. The pig I have not received, but I have received the phainolas.”

¹ 2Tim 4:13. Cf. C. Spicq, “Pèlerine et vêtements,” in Mélanges Tisserant, pp. 389–417; E. Haulotte, Symbolique du vêtement selon la Bible, Paris, 1966, pp. 63ff. P. Trummer, “‘Mantel und Schriften’ (II Tim. IV, 13),” in BZ, 1974, pp. 193–207. For the literary parallels, cf. Wettstein, on this text, and F. Field, Notes on the Translation, pp. 217f.

² Artemidorus Daldianus, Onir. 2.3: “The chalamys . . . an omen of persecutions and constrictions . . . because the chlamys envelops the body; the same is true for the phainoles and every other garment of that sort”; ibid. 5.29: “she wanted to cover him with what is called in Latin a paenula, which was unstitched in the middle”; cf. PW 18.2, col. 2279–2282; 19.2, col. 1593; DAGR, vol. 4, 285ff. P.Hamb. I, pp. 39ff. This “immense overcoat,” which enveloped the body, gave rise to the chasuble, cf. H. Leclerq, “Vêtements,” in DACL, vol. 15 B, 3005.

³ Cf. Martial 14.130: “paenula scortea”; 145: “paenula gausapina”; Epictetus 4.8.34: “When someone sees someone wearing a paenula (ε—ν φαινόλη), he picks an argument with him.” All the Latin manuscripts of 2Tim 4:13 transliterate the transposition φαινόλην—paenulam, phaenulan (in one instance phenolem). Cf. the curious early Latin exegesis of this verse in H. J. Frede, Ein neuer Paulustext und Kommentar, Freiburg, 1973, vol. 1, pp. 212ff.

⁴ M. Leroy, “Paenula,” in Latomus, 1939, pp. 1–4; cf. the numerous analogous cases in F. Benoit, Recherches sur l’Hellénisation du midi de la Gaule, Aix-en-Provence, 1965, pp. 20ff.

⁵ Pap.Lugd.Bat. VI, 49 b, col. I, 1: the inventory of the property of a minor mentions a cape of red scarlet, half worn-out (φαιλόνη κοκκίνη ήμιτριβή). Cornelius tells his son Hierax that he is sending white cloaks that can be worn with purple capes (μετὰ τω—ν πορφυρω—ν φορει—σθαι φαινολίωv, P.Oxy. 531, 14); in P.Hamb. 10, 19–20, the cape is Spanish white with Laconian stripes (φαινόλην λευκοσπανόν τέλειον λακωνόσημον); according to P.Michael. 38, 9–11, the tailor Julianus will provide a striped cape on credit (ίνα δόση σοι στιχαροφελω—vιν).

⁶ Cf. φαίνω, φαινολίς; “She saw the brilliant aurora come” (φαινολίς—Hώς, Ps.-Homer, H. Demet. 1.51); cf. E. Schwyzer, “Ein armenisch-griechisches Nominalsuffix,” in MusHelv, 1956, p. 50.

⁷ Next to καμάσιν, “shirt,” in a word list, cf. M. Leroy, “Un papyrus arméno-grec,” in Byzantion, 1938, p. 527. In P.Lond. 481, 1, φακνολες is interpreted by the editor, F.G. Kenyon as φαινόλης, the Greek form of the Latin paenula; but H. J. M. Milne (Catalogue of the Literary Papyri in the British Museum, London, 1927, n. 187), followed by J. Kramer (“Sprachlicher Kommentar zum lateinisch-griechischen Glossar, P. Lond. II, 481,” in ZPE, vol. 26, 1977, pp. 232, 238) reads φακ γνοβες μανδατα and translates “fac nobis mandata.”

⁸ Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIII, 18–21: “Let them bring me a cape, because mine was lost at the fuller’s” (κομισάσθωσαν πρὸς με φελόνιν). Cf. φαιλόνιν ὀλοπλακ in P.Sorb. inv. 2142 (published by A. Bataille, “Un inventaire de vêtements inédit,” in Eos (Symbolae R. Taubenschlag), 1957, vol. 2, pp. 83–99; republished in SB 9570, 1).

⁹ Meinersmann, Die lateinischen Wörter und Namen in den griechischen Papyri, Leipzig, 1927, p. 62; R. Cavenaile, “Quelques aspects de l’apport linguistique du grec au latin d’Egypte,” in Aeg. (Mélanges Vitelli II), 1952, p. 196. Clarification by S. Daris, “Il lessico latino nella lingua greca d’Egitto,” in Aeg., 1960, p. 295. To this, add P.Yale 82, 2: ἔδωκα τὸν φαιλόνην μου τὸν ἄσιρω with the correction of H. C. Youti, in ZPE, vol. 16, 1975, pp. 268–271; P.Mil.Vogl. 256, 20: “you shall receive the woolen paenula from Sarapis” (republished in SB 9654; but the reading is not τὸν φαινόλην αι—ριον οἱ τὸν φαινόλην· αι—ρει—ν πάντως, but τὸν φαιλόνην αὔριον; cf. Berichtigungsliste, vol. 6, p. 90) and in a list of clothing from the second-third century, O.Bodl. 1947.

¹⁰ P.Giss. 12, 4: ἔπεμψάς μοι ὑγιω—ς τὸν στήμονα καὶ τὴν κρόκην τω—ν φαιλωνίων.

¹¹ P.Michael. 38, 3; cf. P.Giss. 79, col. IV, 2: τοὺς φαινούλας σου τεθεραπευμένους ἤνεγκεν . . . —Απολλώνιος; cf. P.Oxy. 736, 10: “cost of mending Coranus’s φαινόλη: an obol and a half”; 933, 30: “Find out from Antinoüs if he bought the φαιλόνην for your child”; P.Mich. 201, 10: “Ask Arion what the price would be for having the capes woven” (AD 99); cf. the φελονω—ν in a list of payments (P.Fay. 347), in a bleaching bill or a laundry list (P.Gen. 80, 14), in a weaver’s accounts (P.Oxy. 1737, 9, 15; cf. 936, 19).

φθόνος

phthonos, malevolent envy
see also βασκαίνω

phthonos, S 5355; EDNT 3.423; MM 667–668; L&N 88.160

Derived from phthio, “perish, waste away,” phthonos would literally mean “depreciation, diminution, denigration.” The customary translation is “envy” or “jealousy,” and often there is an association with zelos; ¹ but unlike this latter term, phthonos is always pejorative. It is hardly possible to imagine what is meant by the “devil’s jealousy,” through which death is said to have come into the world.² We must translate “malevolent envy.”

This vice is denounced in the NT sin lists, where it is associated with malice (kakia, Titus 3:3; 1Pet 2:1; cf. T. Benj. 8.1) and strife (eris, Rom 1:29; Gal 5:21; 1Tim 6:4); and it is a commonplace in Hellenistic diatribe.³ Stobaeus collected fifty-nine sayings on envy (Peri phthonou, Ecl. 3.38; vol. 3, pp. 708ff.). Plutarch wrote a treatise on envy and hatred (Peri phthonou kai misous; cf. De prof. in virt. 14). This malevolence is stigmatized as the worst of evils,⁴ it is defined as sadness occasioned by the thought of another’s good,⁵ and its harmful effects on social and political life are denounced.⁶

In effect, this malevolence is aggressive and seeks to do harm,⁷ at least through slander (Plutarch, Per. 13.15: “Hence jealousy against one person, slander against another”) and quite often through lawsuits: “What is more, he has the face to file malicious charges (phthonous aitias) against me with no basis” (P.Ryl. 144, 21, AD 38); “Nothing was taken; they are accusing us out of jealousy.”⁸ It is in this sense that Jesus was handed over to Pilate out of envy⁹ and that Paul’s opponents, in a spirit of rivalry, began to preach dia phthonon kai erin.¹⁰ The best parallel is from Nicolaus of Damascus: “Some, in order to please Caesar, heaped honors upon him, while others, in their perfidy, approved and proclaimed these extravagant honors only in order that envy (phthonos) and suspicion might make Caesar hateful to the Romans.”¹¹

¹ Lamia, happy and beloved wife of Demetrius, “inspired jealousy and envy (ζήλον καὶ φθόνον) in her friends and the other wives of Demetrius” (Plutarch, Demetr. 27.5). On the difference between these two terms, cf. Aristotle, Rh. 2.11.1388a35–b6: ὁ ζήλος is “the honest passion of honest people” (emulation); τὸ φθονεῖ—ν is “the base passion of base people” (envy); cf. this dedication of a portrait: “It is not envy but emulation (οὐ φθόνος ἀλλὰ ζήλος) that is inspired by those who have had portraits done of their father and mother” (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, 113, 31; cf. R. C. Trench, Synonyms, pp. 87ff. E. des Places, “Du Dieu jaloux au Nom incommunicable,” in Hommage à Claire Préaux, Brussels, 1975, pp. 338–342; P. Adnès, “Jalousie,” in Dict. spir., vol. 8, col. 70ff.). Nevertheless, “God loves jealously (πρὸς φθόνον ἐπιποθεῖ)—the spirit that he has made to dwell in us.” On this translation, cf. E. Schweizer, in TDNT, vol. 6, p. 447, n. 789 (gives Jewish parallels, to which add Josephus, War 3.372); C. Spicq, “—Ἐπιποθεῖ—ν, Désirer ou chérir?” in RB, 1957, pp. 189ff. S. S. Laws, “Does Scripture Speak in Vain? A Reconsideration of James IV, 5,” in NTS, vol. 20, 1974, pp. 210–225.

² Wis 2:24; cf. the denunciation by Democritus of the “envy and jealousy of accursed demons”; Diodorus Siculus 17.46.2: Alexander did not fear “the envy of Fortune”; P.Cair.Masp. 153, 11. A funerary stele at Amasia denounces the evil eye or the fate that cause the sudden death of a young woman: φθόνος εἶλε πικρὸς ζωῆς τάχος ἀφειλάμενος (F. Cumont, Studia Pontica, n. 123, 6). Same meaning on a talismanic medallion (SEG 9.818; cf. P. Perdrizet, Negotium perambulans in tenebris, Strasbourg-Paris, 1922, pp. 27ff.), a graffito (C. B. Welles, “Inscriptions from Dura-Europus,” in YCS, vol. 14, 1955, p. 153); the mosaic of Cheikh Zouède: “Let envy and the evil eye stay away from this happy art” (SEG XXIV, 1197 c); “Un opuscule hermétique sur la Pivoine” (ed. A. J. Festugière, in Vivre et penser = RB, 1942, pp. 249, 257, n. 47): “to serve as a victory charm . . . against any sort of evil eye, malignant influence, or machination.”

³ Musonius, frag. 7: πρὸ δέ γε τοῦ ζητει—ν, ὅπως ᾧ φθονεῖ— τις κακοποιήσῃ τοῦτον, τὸ σκοπεῖ—ν ὅπως μηδὲν φθονήσῃ μηδενί (ed. C. E. Lutz, p. 58, lines 1–2); T.Sim. 4.7—ἀποστήσεται ἀφ’ ὑμῶν—ν τὸ πνεῦμα τοῦ φθόνου; Dio Chrysostom, Or. 77, 78. One wondered how envy could be resisted (Ep. Arist. 224).

⁴ Menander: τὸ κάκιστον τῶν—ν κακῶν—ν πάντων φθόνος (in Stobaeus 28.29, vol. 3, 713; J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 3 B, p. 778, n. 540, 6); Philo, Spec. Laws 3.3: “The cruelest of evils, envy, which hates good” (ὁ μισόκαλος φθόνος); “the basest” (Galen, Anim. Pass. 1.7.35); P.Oxy. 1901, 54: δόλος φθόνος πονηρός; Philo, Spec. Laws 1.320: “Envy does not dwell with virtue”; 2.249; Josephus, War 1.77: “None of our good sentiments is strong enough to resist φθόνος to the end.”

⁵ Ps.-Plato, Def. 416: Φθόνος· λύπη ε—πὶ φίλων ἀγαθοί—ς ἢ οὐσιν ἢ γεγεννημένοις; Diogenes Laertius 7.63.111: λύπη ε—πὶ ἀλλοτρίοις ἀγαθοί—ς. Plato had observed that envy was the only passion not accompanied by pleasure, since the one who experiences it suffers (Plato, Phlb. 49 a; cf. Leg. 9.870 c), but he specifies that its effect is “perceiving evils experienced by one’s friends and rejoicing instead of being sorry for them” (Phlb. 49 c–d). These observations are seconded by Philo in his example of the envious: “Those who are pained by their neighbor’s good, who derive satisfaction from seeing them suffer evil” (Moses 1.247).

⁶ Wis 6:23; 1Macc 8:16. Plutarch denounces spiteful envy as the source of political rivalries, constituting an obstacle to the advancing or success of a candidate (Lyc. 3.6), plotting against the prince (ibid. 7.3), stirring up strife in the city (8.3; cf. T. Sol. 18.38), opposing authority (Num. 2.10; 20.7; 22.9; Alex. 11.1; Caes. 11.3; 64.4). Herodian points out that the announcement of a victory provokes uprisings because of “jealousy, quarrels between different people, hatred, and division between fellow-countrymen” (Herodian, Hist. 3.2.7). Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.222: “They attach themselves to the most famous people, sometimes out of malevolence (τινὸς μὲν διὰ φθόνον καὶ κακοήθειαν) . . . but people with sound judgment condemn their great malice (πολλὴν αὐτῶ—ν μοχθηρίας)”; Diodorus Siculus 17.114.3.

⁷ Heraclitus, All. 6.3: “Malevolence (ὁ φθόνος) always seeks to defile and denigrate,” especially that which is great and noble (Dionysius of Sinope, in Stobaeus, Ecl. 3.38.2 a; vol. 3, p. 708). It attacks glory and brilliant success: “It is difficult to avoid the slanders of envy, especially when occupying a post that confers great authority” (Josephus, Life 80); “When he learned that I was well-liked by my men, he sank into an extraordinary jealousy . . . that sparked hatred” (ibid. 122–123). Thucydides 6.78: superiority gives rise to envy. The harms of φθόνος are mentioned by Philo (Joseph 5), Plutarch (Arist. 7.2; Cat. Mai. 16.4), and often in funerary epigrams, Anth. Pal. 9.814; the first-century monument of Agrius, “They live like true philosophers, leading a simple life, in all sorts of toil, far from wealth and evil-minded envy” (φθόνου κακοζήλου, E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 114, IV, 13); a mosaic at Serdgylla: “May the honor (that is yours) repel envy and always increase your glory” (IGLS 1490, 7); “May the Triune God drive envy far away” (ibid. 1599, 1); “In the presence of the cross, φθόνος is powerless” (ibid. 1909); MAMA VI, 163; E. Peterson, EIS ἘΟΣ, p.35; J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1960, p. 164, n. 188; 1965, p. 179, n. 441; L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 11–12, pp. 23, 97 n. 2; vol. 13, pp. 265, 268; cf. W.C. van Unnik, ΑΦΟΝΩ ΜΕΤΑΔΙΔΩΜΙ, Brussels, 1971, pp. 12ff.

⁸ P.Thead. 14, 34; cf. P.Oxy. 237, col. VI, 21: ε—πὶ φθόνῳ δὲ μόνον λαιδορούμενος; 533, 14; P.Bour. 20, 28: οὐδεὶς φθόνος ε—στίν = the child has not been mistreated; P.Mich. 423–424, 13: φθόνῳ περικλι—σαι; SB 7518, 12; these are almost all of the attestations of φθόνος in the papyri.

⁹ Mark 15:10; Matt 27:18—διὰ φθόνον; cf. Lysias, Inval. 24.2: διὰ φθόνον = διὰ πονηρίαν; Philo, Moses 1.2: διὰ φθόνον. According to Dionysius of Halicarnassus, in judging Plato’s merits and demerits, rhetors and philosophers “conceded nothing to envy or hatred (οὐ διὰ φθόνον ἢ διὰ φιλαπεχθημοσύνην) but only to love of truth” (Pomp. 1; cf. 3).

¹⁰ Phil 1:15; cf. 1Clem. 5.5 (cf. A. Fridrichsen, “Propter invidiam: Note sur I Clém. V,” in Eran. Rudbergian., vol. 44, 1946, pp. 161–174).

¹¹ Vit. Caes., ed. Piccolos, Paris, 1850, p. 25.

φιλόγαθος

philagathos, loving the good, loving good people

philagathos, S 5358; TDNT 1.18; EDNT 3.424; NIDNTT 2.549; MM 668; L&N 25.105; BAGD 858

The etymological meaning of this adjective, which is rare in the literature,¹ is “loving the good” or “loving good people.” It deserves consideration, given the importance of its use in two biblical texts. It is clear that since agathos, “good,” is the opposite of kakos, “bad,” the philagathos, corresponding to the misoponeros (Philo, Moses 2.9; Ep. Arist. 292) would have to be one who treats those around him as friends, thus inspiring attachment and confidence in them; hence, it would mean kind and generous toward others. The term seems not to be used except with regard to important and influential persons, for example, Pascentius, who is addressed by the priest Theon as philagathe Paskentie (P.Oxy. 2193, 5; 2194, 5), and the emperor Marcus Aurelius.² The Letter of Aristeeas makes it a royal quality: the king who is philagathos, in his love of the good, is anxious to attach himself to men of culture and of a superior spirit” (Ep. Arist. 124); the sovereign (hegoumenos), “enemy of evil and friend of the good, attaches importance to saving a human life” (292). Philo, setting out to determine what a lawgiver (nomothetes) should be, says, “He should possess all the virtues to perfection and completely” (Moses 2.8); but some virtues are better suited than others to particular activities. For the legislative faculty, there are four especially appropriate virtues: “love of humanity, love of justice, love of good, and hatred of vice” (to philanthropon, to philodikaion, to philagathon, to misoponeron, 2.9). Philo further defines philagathos: “the love of the good requires accepting things that are good by nature and procuring them without charge for those who deserve them so that they may use them freely” (ibid.). That being philagathos means having a taste for the good and the fine—that is, that it is a moral disposition, a virtue—is confirmed by its attribution to the well-intentioned husband who keeps his wife wise and honest.³

Philagathos belongs first and foremost to the vocabulary of the inscriptions. It is used constantly to describe honest folk:⁴ “he conducted himself well and with a love for the good” (anestraphe kalos kai philagathos);⁵ sometimes “pious” is added.⁶ In their official praises, a thiasos, a synagogos, and a synodos mention a member’s propriety, his probity in the exercise of his office, his good relations, and also his respect for the gods in liturgical ceremonies (aretas heneka kai philagathias tes eis ten patrida);⁷ above all, effectively demonstrated beneficence is mentioned (eis heautous, SB 1106, 5). After stating that Athenopolis is a noble and good man (aner kalos kai agathos), since he has shown himself to be a lover of the good (philagathon heauton parechomenos, line 10), I.Priene 107, 16 praises him for his generosity (philagathia) as a benefactor of the people

(second century BC). Moreover, the philagathos is assisted in his devotion by a paraphilagathos.⁸

The word's value is prodigiously enhanced by the fact that it is one of the twenty-one descriptions of the divine Wisdom: "there is in it a spirit... that loves the good" (esti en aute pneuma . . . philagathon, Wis 7:22; Alexandrinus omits en and reads "it is a spirit . . . that is philagathos"); wisdom, which is most holy, loves to share its riches and is always ready to pass them along. It is in this same sense that philagathos is listed among the seven positive qualities required of candidates to the episcopate: as an overseer over the household of God, the episkopos must have a love for guests in his heart; but as philagathos, according to the foregoing references, we must understand that he is profoundly good, loving to act well and to do what is good; this is not a mere inclination, like eunoia, but an effective and generous devotion: the Christian philagathos works to realize the good and takes pleasure in it.

¹ With regard to friendship, Aristotle says: φιλάγαθος οὐ φίλαντος (Aristotle, Mag. Mor. 2.14.3.1212b18); Plutarch, Thes. 1.7: "Ariadne merited the love of a god for having been enamored of the noble and the good (φιλόκαλον και φιλάγαθον) and passionate for what is greatest"; Polybius 6.53.9. Cf. M. Landfester, "Philos."

² P.Oxy. 22, col. II, 11 (these are the only two papyrological attestations). A certain Appianus scoffs at an emperor (perhaps Commodus) by pointing out the superior qualities of his predecessor, Marcus Aurelius: "first of all, he loved wisdom (ἦν φιλόσοφος); secondly, he did not love money (ἀφιλάργυρος); thirdly, he loved virtue (φιλάγαθος)" (R. MacMullen, "The Roman Concept Robber-Pretender," in RIDA, Brussels, 1963, pp. 221–225). Cf. the analogous association of virtues in an honorific decree from the year 5 BC for the president of an association: ἀρετή τε καὶ φιλαγαθία καὶ ἀφιλαργυρία πρόδηλος γείνηται (SB 8267, 4); cf. Διονύσιος ἄρχων καὶ φιλάγαθος ε—πόησεν συνόδω νεωτέρων (ibid. 8841, 1; in AD 31).

³ Plutarch, Con. praec. 17. Cf. C. Panagopoulos, Vocabulaire, p. 211.

⁴ CIRB 76, 10: φιλάγαθος — Αντίμαχος; 79, A 3: φιλάγαθος Κέσστιον; 80, 4; 81, 4; 84, 3; 86, 3; 89, 3; 91, 4; 92, 5; 105, 9; 1263, 4; 1278, 4; 1279, 5; 1280, 6; etc.

⁵ I.Bulg. 13, 3 (Dittenberger, Syl. 762, 13); B. Latyshev, Inscriptiones Antiquae, vol. 2, n. 63, 3; SEG II, 485, 9.

⁶ I.Did. 215 B; 1, 6: εὐσεβῆς καὶ φιλάγαθος; 391 B; I, 14; 221, 1, 6: ἀνὴρ εὐσεβῆς καὶ φιλάγαθος; 232 A, 1, 4; B 5. Cf. φιλαγαθία linked with εὐσέβεια (I.Priene 109, 217), with εὐνοια (ibid. 71, 12).

⁷ MAMA VI, 167, 2 (I.Car. 12: second-first century BC); I.Olymp. 424, 5; I.Priene 112, 113; 113, 94, 119; at Andros (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1970, p. 426, n. 441); SEG VIII, 504; SB 6117, 4: τῆς πρὸς τὴν πόλιν εὐνοίας καὶ φιλαγαθίας χάριν (18 BC); 7456, 7; 9987, 7; 1033, 4; 10124, 3.

⁸ B. Latyshev, Inscriptiones Antiquae, vol. 2, n. 60, 6; 61, 4; 62, 4; CIRB, n. 83, 5; 88, 4; 90, 7; 99, 13; 100, 8; 103, 5; 107, 4; 1259, 10; 1262, 6; 1282, 7; 1287, 5; 1288, 7.

φιλανθρωπία, φιλανθρώπως philanthropia, kindness toward people, generosity; philanthropos, kindly see also ε—πιείκεια, ε—πεικῆς

philanthropia, S 5363; TDNT 9.107–112; EDNT 3.424–425; NIDNTT 2.547, 549, 551; MM 668–669; L&N 25.36, 88.71; BAGD 858 |
philanthropos, S 5364; TDNT 9.107–112; EDNT 3.424–425; NIDNTT 2.550; MM 669; L&N 88.72; BAGD 858; ND 1.87, 88

Philanthropy—“that noble virtue” (Philo, Spec. Laws 1.221)—is a key word in the Hellenistic period, in literature as well as in the papyri and the inscriptions.¹ The Stoics defined it as “a kindly disposition in human interaction.”² In this sense of the word, “Wisdom is a kindly spirit” (Wis 1:6; 7:23) and “the just person must be kind” (12:19), emphasizing niceness, affability, cordiality.³ Such a person was the centurion Julius, who “treated Paul humanely at Sidon, allowing him to visit the Christians and receive their attentions” (Acts 27:3; cf. Plutarch, Them. 31.7; Aem. 37.2: granting the prisoner Perseus more humane treatment). So also were the barbarians on Malta, who showed the shipwreck victims “uncommon kindness” (Acts 28:2), and the Alexandrians, who were to be mild and friendly toward the Jews.⁴

This goodness is expressed especially as solicitude, in a willingness to serve, and in effective liberalities; it is a form of generosity.⁵ In the Hellenistic period, it is the virtue of benefactors, especially divinities whose protection and providence have been shown toward people or toward a certain city.⁶ This is not only the belief of Musonius (frag. 17, ed. Lutz, p. 108, line 14), but of the lowly peasants of the Fayum in AD 6–7: “the philanthropic god knows” (oiden ho philanthropos theos, SB 9286, 1); “and I heard, because the philanthropic god took care” (kai ekousa, hoti ho philanthropos theos epeskepsato).⁷ It is above all the conviction of Philo, who sees in the divine attributes of epieikeia and philanthropia a manifestation of God's mercy (Moses 1.198) and who—having drafted a Peri philanthopias (Virtues 51–186)—worked out a theology of the philanthropy of the true God, who loves humankind (Virtues 77, 188; Philo, Abraham 79; 137, 203), is giving (Creation 81), shows remarkable solicitude (Spec. Laws 3.36; 1.120; Josephus, Ant. 1.24). Philo compares the kind of reception reserved for kings: “For the king of kings, for God who is Lord of all things, who through his mildness and philanthropy has deigned to visit his creation, who descends from highest heaven to the ends of the earth for the good of our race—what sort of dwelling should be provided for him? . . . A soul in conformity with his will” (Cherub. 99). Better yet, God is like a father, providing for the welfare of his family and patient toward the rebellious (Prov 2:6). This is the context in which Titus 3:4 occurs: “when the goodness (chrestotes) and philanthropia of God our Savior appeared.” This linking of goodness-benignity and philanthropy is constant.⁸ Philanthropia is used to extend divine mercy to all of humanity, but it implies a gracious and broad generosity that gives and forgives better than do kyrioi here below.⁹

Given that Hellenistic sovereigns were seen as the image and representation of God on earth, they were all supposed to possess the philanthropia of the euergetes,¹⁰ a kindly beneficence that is quick to show clemency,¹¹ that showers benefits (referred to as philanthropa)¹² upon subjects, and that finally establishes harmony and peace (cf. the letter of Claudius to the Alexandrians: meta praotetos kai philanthropeias, P.Lond. 1912, 102). On the one hand, the king sees to it that he is “philanthropic” toward his subjects (Ep. Arist. 208); on the other, he wants to gain in return some loyalty from them: “the philanthropy and affection of the governed” (ton hypotetagmenon philanthropia kai agapesis, ibid. 265). After the fashion of Ptolemy, he bears witness concerning himself that he has “given his best efforts to being humane” (tais te heautou dynamesin pephilanthropeke pasais, Rosetta Stone; Dittenberger, Or. 90, 12; cf. SB 10648, 11; SEG XXV, 445, 2, 4, 34). Furthermore, petitions to the king, the prefect, and the strategos address specifically their philanthropy in order to persuade them to intervene favorably¹³ and allow the petitioner to “share in the common privilege” (pros to kame dynasthai tes koines philanthopias metaschein, P.Oxy. 2919, 10; 2918, 16). Precedents are cited: “Since you have always acted with extreme benevolence, now do so again . . .” (P.Sorb. 53, 6); the hoped-for benefits are celebrated: “thus shall we benefit from your benevolence”;¹⁴ and thanks are given for this philanthropy.¹⁵

¹ The bibliography is considerable; S. Lorenz, De Progressu Notionis φιλανθρωπίας, Leipzig, 1914; W. W. Tarn, “Alexander’s φιλανθρωπία and the 'World-Kingdom,' in JHS, 1921, pp. 1–17; S. Tromp de Ruiter, “De Vocis Quae est φιλανθρωπία Significatione atque Usu,” in Mnemosyne, 1932, pp. 271–306; M. Fuerth, Caritas und Humanitas, Stuttgart, 1933; H. I. Bell, “Philanthropia in the Papyri,” in Hommages à J. Bidez, F. Cumont, Brussels, 1948, pp. 31–37; N. I. Herescu, “Homo, Humanus, Humanitas,” in BAGB, 1948, pp. 64–75; A. J. Festugière, Hermès Trismégiste, vol. 2, pp. 301–309; C. Spicq, “La Philanthropie hellénistique, vertu divine et royale,” in ST, vol. 12, 1958, pp. 169–195; J. Kabiersch, Untersuchungen zum Begriff der Philanthropie bei dem Kaiser Julian, Wiesbaden, 1960; A. J. Voelke, Les Rapports avec autrui dans la philosophie grecque, Paris, 1961, pp. 70ff.; H. Martin, “The Concept of Philanthropia in Plutarch’s Lives,” in AJP, 1961, pp. 164–175; R. Le Déaut, “φιλανθρωπία dans la littérature grecque jusqu’au Nouveau Testament,” in Mélanges Tisserant, pp. 255–294; M. Landfester, “Philos,” pp. 537ff.; R. Rieks, Homo, Humanus, Humanitas, Munich, 1967; A. Nissen, Gott und der Nächste im antiken Judentum, Tübingen, 1974, pp. 466ff.; F. Casavola, “Culture e scienza giuridica nel secondo secolo di C.” in ANRW, vol. 15, pp. 157ff.; L. Heinemann, “Humanitas,” in PWSup, vol. 5, 282–310.

² SVF, vol. 3, 292; Ps.-Plato, Def. 412 e; cf. φιλανθρώπως ἀποκριθῆναι = give a friendly response (I.Thas. 174, D 1).

³ Depending on the context, it can be translated “humane” (Plutarch, Demetr. 4.1; Diodorus Siculus 17.102.3) in contrast with “severe” (Plutarch, Cic. 21.5), amiable (Diodorus Siculus 17.40.1), affable (17.112.6; Plutarch, Dem. 29.3), benevolent (Cic. 40.5), cordial (Polybius 5.10.1; 5.11.6; 5.62.2; 5.63.8; 5.75.7; 5.77.6; 5.78.6; etc.); cf. Menander, Dysk. 105: “Desiring to show myself to be altogether courteous and diplomatic” (φιλόανθρωπος σφόδρα ε—πιδέξιος); 146: “He does not seem entirely accommodating” (οὐ πάνυ φιλόανθρωπον); 573: “Each time I pass before you (O Pan), I pray to you as a well-mannered man” (φιλανθρωπεύομαι); Polybius 2.12.5: “They found in both of these people the requisite cordiality” (τῆς καθηκούσης φιλανθρωπίας); 2.38.8: the Achaean political system is characterized by equality and liberality (ἰ—σότητι καὶ φιλανθρωπία); 2.70.1: In everything Antigonus treated the Lacedaemonians with generosity and benevolence (μεγαλοψύχως καὶ φιλανθρώπως); Plutarch, Nic. 11.2: τὸ μὴ φιλόανθρωπον = an antisocial bearing; cf. Cat. Min. 50.2; Crass. 3.5; a letter of Marcus Aurelius to the Athenians, in ZPE, vol. 8, 1971, p. 177, line 8; P.Oxy. 2981, 14; φιλανθρωπηθήση = you will be recompensed (second century); cf. the linking of χάρις and φιλόανθρωπος, Plutarch, Praec. ger. rei publ. 24.818 d–e; Sol. 2.1.

⁴ Letter of Emperor Claudius; P.Lond. 1912, 83: πραέως καὶ φιλανθρώπως; cf. Hecataeus of Abdera: τὴν ἠπιότητα καὶ φιλανθρωπίαν

τοῦ Πτολεμαίου (cited by Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.186); Plutarch, Amat. 18.1: “Does not love make people more friendly and agreeable?” (φιλανθρωποτέρους καὶ ἡδίους); cf. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Pomp. 2; SB 7457, 20: οἱ—κείως καὶ φιλανθρώπως. Eleazar’s philanthropy is linked to his φιλία, 2Macc 6:22; cf. LSAM, p. 183, line 3: τὰ τῆς φιλανθρωπίας καὶ φιλίας καὶ ὁμονοίας δίκαια; Plutarch associates it with πραότης (Mar. 8.2; Pyrrh. 11.8; 34.7–11; Alex. 58.8; cf. 44.5; 71.8), as does Lucian (Lucian, Phal. 1.3); Philo links it with koinonia (Spec. Laws 1.324). It means “friendly” at SEG VIII, 372, 8. The most common form of φιλανθρωπία was being friendly, giving a good welcome to an interlocutor (Plutarch, Demetr. 9.2; 37.1), showing that form of courtesy that was demonstrated by the Athenians who “having seized the mail belonging to Philip, with whom they were at war, read all the letters, except for one from Olympias, which they did not open but sent back sealed as it was” (ibid. 22.2). Cf. C. Panagopoulos, Vocabulaire, pp. 218ff.

⁵ 2Macc 13:23—the king “offered a sacrifice, honored the temple, and was generous toward the holy place” (τὸν τόπον ε—φιλανθρώπησε); P. Michael. 4, 23: “the River (the Nile), full of φιλανθρωπία, first of all brought sustenance (to Egypt)”; P. Tebt. 739, 19, 40: Assos granted proxenia, the rights of citizenship, and other privileges (τοι—ς ἄλλοις φιλανθρώποις, I. Thas. 170, 7; cf. 171, 5, 44); Polybius 28.20: “Antiochus showed philanthropy toward those people and gave a piece of gold to each Greek colonist”; Philo, Spec. Laws 2.63, 71; Plutarch, Alex. 44.3–5; Caes. 34.7; Sull. 31.7. Inscription at Aphrodisias: εὐνοία καὶ κοινω—ς πρὸς πάντας καὶ ι—δία πρὸς ἕκαστον φιλανθρώπως καὶ πλείστας ε—γγύας ὑπὲρ πολλω—ν ε—κτείσαντα (MAMA VIII, 406, 4); I. Magn. 105, 13: μετ̄ ει—ρήνης δὲ καὶ τῆς πάσης ὁμονοίας καὶ φιλανθρωπίας; I. Did. 269, 13: εὐσεβῆς πρὸς τοὺς θεούς, φιλάνθρωπος δὲ πρὸς τοὺς ἀνθρώπους; I. Priene 115, 5: ἀναστρεφόμενος ε—ν πα—σιν φιλανθρώπως (first century BC). Medicine is a philanthropic profession (Galen, Med. Phil. 1.56; cf. Hobart, Medical Language, p. 297); Hippocrates, Praec. 6: “Where there is love of mankind, there is also love of art.”

⁶ The protector Sardis, Demeter is “the philanthropic goddess” (Philostratus, Ep. 75); Apis “of all the gods most benevolent toward humankind” (Xenophon of Ephesus, Ephes. 5.4.10; cf. 4.2.4), Kronos (Plato, Leg. 4.713 d), Eros (Symp. 189 d), Hermes (Aristophanes, Pax 393); Apollo (Plutarch, De Pyth. or. 16; Num. 4; De Stoic. rep. 38); Asclepius (R. Cagnat, IG, Paris, 1911, n. 826); Prometheus (Lucian, Sacr. 6).

⁷ SB 9397, 3; cf. 8701: the dedication of an image of St. Stephen: τῇ τοῦ δεσπότου ἡμω—ν Χριστοῦ φιλανθρωπία; a Christian letter, (ibid. 10467, 4): ὁ φιλόανθρωπος δεσπότης θεὸς κύριος ἡμῶ—ν; a prayer of the fifth-sixth century: ὁ θεὸς ὁ παντοκράτωρ ὁ ἅγιος ὁ ἀληθινὸς φιλόανθρωπος (P.Oxy. 925, 2); G. Lefèvre, Recueil d'inscriptions grecques-chrétiennes d'Égypte, Cairo, 1907, n. 636, 12; 650, 1; 661, 9; 664, 12; 665, 12; 666, 14, 667, 16. The lector Andrew takes refuge in God, the benevolent judge (πρὸς σε τὸν φιλόανθρωπον κριτὴν, A. C. Bandy, The Greek Christian Inscriptions of Crete, Athens, 1970, n. 104). A Byzantine notary writes to Madame Kyra: οἶδεν ὁ φιλόανθρωπος θεός (P.Vindob. 31496, ed. H. Gerstinger, in Eos (Symbolae R. Taubenschlag), 1956 vol. 1, p. 213).

⁸ Esth 8:12, k, l; Philo, Joseph 82, 176, 198: “obliging and kindly words”; 264; Virtues 97, 101, 182: “mild, good, and humane proselytes”; Flight 96; Abraham 203; Spec. Laws 2.75, 141; 3.156: ὄνομα εὐνοίας ὅ τι χρηστὸν καὶ φιλόανθρωπὸν ε—στιν; To Gaius 67: Gaius was not long ago thought of as χρηστὸς καὶ φιλόανθρωπος; Josephus, Ant. 10.164: τὴν τοῦ Γαδαλίου χρηστότητα καὶ φιλανθρωπίαν; Plutarch, Luc. 18.9: φύσει χρηστὸν ὄντα καὶ φιλόανθρωπον; Ages. 25.6; Sol. 15.2; Arist. 27.7; Arat. 12.1; Cic. 9.6; 52.3; Quaest. conv. 1.1.4: stories that stir up a desire to emulate good and humane actions (χρηστῶ—ν καὶ φιλανθρώπων ζήλον); Dio Cassius 73.5.2: “a philanthropia, a chrestotes, . . . an attentive care for all that pertains to the public interest were evident in the whole administration around the emperor (Pertinax)”; the general must treat cities that surrender φιλανθρώπως καὶ χρηστῶ—ς (Onasander 38.1); Iamblichus, Agr. (in Stobaeus 4.5.76; vol. 4, p. 223); Heliodorus, Aeth. 5.18.5; Galen praises his father, χρηστότατον καὶ φιλανθρωπότατον ἔχων πατέρα (5.40–41, K); B. Latyshev, Inscriptiones Antiquae 39, 20–21; F. A. Hooper, Funerary Stelae from Kom AbouBillou, Ann Arbor, 1961, n. 92: Διονυσάριον Σαραπίωνος ἄλυπε φιλόανθρωπε φιλότεκνε χρηστὴ χαι—ρε. Numerous references given in F. Field, Notes on the Translation, pp. 161, 222.

⁹ In religious contexts it is impossible simply to transliterate and say “philanthropy,” because in English the word is so thoroughly secular. But the Greek Fathers, especially St. John Chrysostom, and the Eastern liturgy (Byzantine, Syrian, Palestinian, Alexandrian, Egyptian, Nubian, etc.) retained this word as a divine epithet; so much so that at Faras, from the eighth to the twelfth century, this was almost the only attribute of Christ and of God; cf. J. Kubinska, Faras, vol. 4, Warsaw, 1974.

¹⁰ Esth 8:12 l; 2Macc 4:11; 13:23; 14:11; 4Macc 5:12. Antiochus commends his son to the Jews, writing, “I am persuaded that with all benevolence and humaneness (ε—πεικῶ—ς καὶ φιλανθρώπος) he will scrupulously follow my intentions and will be fully condescending toward you” (2Macc 9:27). This virtue is attributed to Moses (Philo, Virtues 66; Spec. Laws 4.24), to the Israelite kings (Josephus, Ant. 8.385), to Aeolus, king of Lipari (Diodorus Siculus 5.7), to Cyrus (Xenophon, Cyr. 1.2.1), Ptolemy Philadelphus (Ep. Arist. 290), Eumenes II of Pergamum (Fouilles de Delphes III, 3, 239, line 11), Pisistratus (Aristotle, Ath. Pol. 16.8), the emperors Hadrian (BGU 140), Antoninus (SEG XIX, 476, c 11), Severus Alexander (P.Fay. 20, 15), Galen (Sel.Pap. 217, 16: ἵνα διὰ τὴν προγόνων ἀρετὴν ἀπολαύσῃ τῆς ε—μῆς φιλανθρωπίας), Diocletian and Maximian (P.Oxy. 889, 4–5), Severus and Caracalla (P.Oxy. 705, 20), to any conquering king who showed clemency toward the vanquished (Plutarch, Dem. 22.4), to Darius (Diodorus Siculus 17.5.6), and above all to Alexander (ibid. 17.2.2; 17.4.3; 17.4.9; 17.5.1; 17.22.5; 17.24.1; 17.37.3; 17.37.6; 17.38.3; 17.103.7; 17.104.4). The senate decreed that each year sacrifice should be offered to the Philanthropy of Tiberius (DioCassius 59.16). A statue was erected in honor of the proconsul D. Plautius FelixJulianus, ἀγνίας καὶ φιλανθρωπίας χάριν (I.Kour., n. 90). It is a virtue of prefects (P.Lond. 1912, 81: ἡγεμῶν φιλάνθρωπος; SB 11223, 25), of Seleucus (Plutarch, Demetr. 50.1), of Antony (Ant. 3.10), of “Theodore, the renowned decurion” (SB 7439), of the epimeletes (ibid. 8396, 39), of a choregos of Eleusis (Dittenberger, Syl. III, 1094, 3–5), of all those who “bring to light their devotion to the people” (I.Gonn. 109, 4), or whose decisions are benevolent (Plutarch, Cim. 1.7; Phoc. 5.1; 10.7; Cat. Min. 21.10; 23.1; 26.1; 29.4; 60.1). The honorific decrees emphasize it (ISE, n. 55, 2, 24, 34). On the “philanthropy” of laws, cf. Pap.Lugd.Bat. II, 4–5; BGU 1024, col. VIII, 18–20; P.Oxy. 2177, 18; Demosthenes, C. Timocr. 24, 191; Philo, Virtues 28; Spec. Laws 1.129, 324; 2.78, 104, 107, 128, 183; Josephus, Ag. Apion 2.211–214; Plutarch, Cic. 30.2.

¹¹ Pap.Lugd.Bat. XVI, 3, 9. Philanthropic prostagma are “amnesty ordinances,” BGU 372, col. II, 19; 1156, 26; P.Ryl. 155, 7–8; SB 9508, 10; C.Ord.Ptol., n. 53ff.; G. E. Bean, T. B. Mitford, Cilicia, n. XXXI c, 10, 12, 16.

¹² I.Cor. III, 10; I.Cret. (ed. M. Guarducci), vol. 1, pp. 27–28, 60, 120; vol. 2, p. 15; IGLS 1998, 9–10; Dittenberger, Syl. 618, 14; 699, 12; Or. 139, 20–21; P.Tebt. 124, 7; 739, 40; SB 599, 60; 620, 3–4; Diodorus Siculus 19.9.6; 19.24.1 (Agathocles); 19.44.3 (Antigonos); 19.50.2 (Cassander); 19.54.5; 10.56.1 (Ptolemy); 19.91.5 (Seleucus); 19.110.3: “Hamilcar showed benevolence to all.” M. T. Lenger, “La Notion de ‘bienfait’ (philanthrôpon) royal et les ordonnances des rois Lagides,” in Studi in onore di V. Arangio-Ruiz, Naples, 1953, vol. 1, pp. 483–499.

¹³ P.Mich. 529, 13: δεόμενος σου φιλανθρωπίας; P.Thead. 22, 11; 23, 12; P.Cair.Isid. 53, 15; P.Mert. 43, 3; P.Oxy. 2267, 8; BGU 522, 5; 1572, 16; P.Erl. 34, 13; PSI 292, 19; P.Tebt. 31, 21; 382, 34, 64; 397, 27; 770, 16; 775, 18; C.P.Herm. 19, 13; P.Ryl. 296, 12; 578, 15 = C.Pap.Jud. 43; SB 6760 a 34; 6944, 10; 8994, 17; 9168, 15; 10271, 27; 10522, 10. Cf.

P.Magd., pp. 5ff.; P. Collomp, Recherches sur la chancellerie et la diplomatique des Lagides, Paris, 1926; P.Enteux., pp. xxiiff. and n. 5, 8; 6, 7; 22, 13; 44, 8; 47, 9; 60, 12; 60, 12; 62, 13; 74, 19; 86, 15.

¹⁴ P.Phil. 10, 21: ἵν ὦμεν πεφιλανθρωπημένοι; P.Mil.Vogl. 71, 26; P.Oslo 22, 17; SB 6236, 51; 7259, 47; 9264, 26. An honorific decree from the Fayum mentions along with “personal customs” (τω—ν ι—δίων ἡθω—ν) the benevolence, generosity, and moderation (εὐμενω—ς, φιλανθρώπως, τὸ ε—πιεικέες) of the honored person, who has been of service to the city (SB 6185; cf. Plutarch, Praec. ger. rei publ. 20.816 d).

¹⁵ C.P.Herm. 10, 6; SB 8396, 39. It is the same in relations of friendship (P.Princ. 187, 9; PSI 94, 4), “I thank you for your kindness in the matter of the olive oil” (P.Mich. 483, 3 = SB 7355; P.Oxy. 3057, 8; P.Mich. 232, 18 = SB 7568, from AD 38; P.Mich. 489, 10; 494, 8; P.Fouad 54, 9, 13). A. Pelletier, “La Philanthropia de tous les jours chez les juifs hellénisés,” in Paganisme, Judaïsme, Christianisme (Mélanges M. Simon), Paris, 1978, pp. 35–44.

φιλαργυρία, φιλάργυρος

philargyria, love of money; philargyros, loving money see also αι—σχροκερδής, ἀφιλάργυρος; ἀφιλάργυρος

philargyria, S 5365; EDNT 3.425; NIDNTT 1.138, 2.550; MM 669; L&N 25.107; BAGD 859 | philargyros, S 5366; EDNT 3.425; NIDNTT 2.550; MM 669; L&N 25.108; BAGD 859

The substantive, unknown in the LXX and the papyri,¹ occurs in the NT only in 1Tim 6:10—“For philargyria is a root of all evils” (rhiza gar panton ton kakon estin he philargyria). This saying can be traced back to Plato² and is a commonplace in diatribe. Stobaeus attributes to Democritus the saying, “Wealth arising from evil dealings purchases notorious shame” (ploutos apo kakes ergasies periginomenos epiphanesteron to oneidos kektetai) and of Bion he says, “He said that the love of money is the metropolis of all evil” (ten philargyrian metropolin elege pases kakias einai, Ecl. 10.36–37; vol. 3, p. 417). Apollodorus of Gela: “It is the head of all evils, for they are all present in the love of money” (to kephalaion ton kakon, en philargyria gar pant’ eni, ibid. 16.12; p. 482); T. Jud. 19.1—“Philargyria leads to idolatry”; Sib. Or. 2.115: “Gold, prince of evils, life-destroying, crushing all things” (chryse, kakon archege, biophthore, panta chalepton); 3.235: “Those who care only for justice and virtue know nothing of cupidity (philochremosyne), which for mortals gives rise to myriads of evils, perpetual famine and war.” In a listing of evils (ponera),

Tabula of Cebes 19.5 includes “pain, wailing, arrogance, love of money (philargyrian), incontinence, and all other wickedness”;³ likewise Epictetus 2.16.45; cf. 2.9.12 and Plutarch: “The desire to acquire wealth causes all the wars.”⁴

As for the lovers of money (philargyroi) in the last days,⁵ they are victims of an innate passion (4Macc 2:8), like the Pharisees (Luke 16:14), and above all the sophists, “word-merchants” (logopoloι, Philo, Prelim. Stud. 53, 127; Post. Cain 116), and the philosophers who hawk wisdom in a dishonorable way (Giants 37, 39).

¹ The same is true of the adjective φιλάργυρος, which is attested only as a proper name (P.Oxy. 1678, 12; I.Priene 313, 653; I.Cret. IV, 223, I.Thas. 225), but is common in the imperial period (cf. L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 13, Paris, 1965, p. 260). The verb φιλαργυρέω, unknown in the NT, is used in 2Macc 10:20; cf. Dittenberger, Syl. 593,12.

² Plato, Leg. 9.870 a, c: “The power that money has to give birth to a thousand and one furies of insatiable, infinite grasping. . . . This love of riches is the first and greatest source of the greatest cases of murder.” The wording in 1Tim may perhaps be a quotation from a comic author (cf. S. T. Byington, “1 Timothy VI, 10,” in ExpT, 1944, p. 54), but the idea belongs to Plutarch, De cupid. divit. 524 e–f; cf. 525 e–f –526a; C. Panagopoulos, Vocabulaire, pp. 205ff.

³ Τὴν λύπην καὶ τὸν ὀδυρμὸν καὶ τὴν ὑπερηφάνειαν καὶ τὴν φιλαργυρίαν καὶ τὴν ἀκρασίαν καὶ τὴν λοιπὴν ἅπασαν κακίαν. Cf. Tabula of Cebes 34, 3: μέθυσον καὶ ἀκρατὴ εἶναι καὶ φιλάργυρον καὶ ἄδικον καὶ προδότην καὶ τὸ πέρας ἄφρονα.

⁴ Ps.-Plutarch, Cons. ad Apoll. 13; cf. Plutarch, De cupid. divit. (on the greed of Crassus, cf. Crass. 1.5; 2.1; 6.6; 14.5); Diogenes Laertius 6.50; Diodorus Siculus, Exc. 21.1; Dio Chrysostom 4.84 and 129; 66.1; Aulus Gellius 3.1; Lucian, Char. 17; Choricus of Gaza: χρυσέ, κακῶ—ν ἀρχηγέ, καὶ τῶ— ἔχοντί σε φόβος καὶ τῶ— μὴ ἔχοντί σε λυπή (cited by A. Dain, in Anth. Pal. 9.394, p. 23, n. 2).

⁵ In the sin list at 2Tim 3:2 (cf. N. J. McEleney, “The Vice Lists of the Pastoral Epistles,” in CBQ, 1974, pp. 211ff.). This vice fits well at Ephesus, the greatest commercial center in Asia Minor; these greedy people are found again in a similar list in T. Levi 17.11.

φίλοι

philoï, friends, confidants, dear ones

philoï, S 5384; TDNT 9.146–171; EDNT 3.427–428; NIDNTT 2.547–551; MM 671; L&N 34.11; BDF §§190(1), 227(2); BAGD 861

When the Lord calls his apostles “friends,” he bases this choice of words on the fact that “I have made known to you all that I heard from my Father.”¹ We can refer to the disciplina arcani, so important in the rabbis and at Qumran,² but we should also recall a specific meaning of philos, namely, “confidant, one to whom a secret is entrusted,” not only because “all things are common to friends,”³ and not only because the master-disciple relationship is assimilated to a friendship relationship,⁴ but because people entrust their most intimate and precious secrets only to those whom they love and in whom they have confidence.⁵ Cf. Philo, Dreams 1.191: “The word of God addresses some as a king authoritatively telling them what to do. . . . For others, it is a friend who with persuasive gentleness reveals numerous secrets that no profane ear may hear.” It is in this sense that “the prophet is called the friend of God” (Moses 1.156), especially Moses, to whom God spoke with the confidence and intimacy that people use with friends (hos pros ton heautou philon, Exod 33:11). “The wise are friends of God, especially the most holy lawgiver. For freedom in speech is akin to friendship: with whom does a person speak freely, if not with a friend? Thus it is altogether fitting that Moses should be celebrated in the Scriptures as the friend; thus all that he risks saying in his boldness can be chalked up to friendship.”⁶

St. Paul bids Titus, “Greet those who love us in the faith” (aspasai tous philountas hemas en pistei, Titus 3:15; cf. P.Yale 80, 11; 83, 24; P.Mich. 477, 3), and St. John says to the elder Gaius, “The friends greet you. Greet the friends by name” (aspazontai se hoi philoi, aspazou tous philous kat’ onoma, 3John 15).

Both expressions recur often in the epistolary papyri: aspazou tous philountas hymas (P.Lund 3, 17; cf. P.Ryl. 235, 5); aspasai tous philountas se pantas (P.Oxy. 1676, 38–39; cf. BGU 332, 7); aspazou tous philountes pantes pros aletheian.⁷ Greetings are sent to a father, mother, sister, all those in the household, and friends: aspazome Ammonan ton patera mou kai ten meteran mou ka ten adelphen kai tous en oiko pantas kai tous philous (P.Mert. 28, 17); “Greet my mother, my sisters, the children, and all who love me” (ten meteran, tas adelphas, ta paideia, pantas tous philountas me aspazou, Pap.Lugd. Bat. XVII, 16 b 19; cf. P.Oxy. 2594, 15). These “friends” could be friends in the strict sense⁸ or it could mean mere acquaintances: “Greet Theon and Zoilus and Harpokras and Dionysus and all of our people.”⁹ Similarly the “friend and benefactor” of a city (TAM III, 139), or “friend and ally” (1Macc 10:16; 12:14; 15:17, and the inscriptions—

I. Magn. 38, 52; SEG XIX, 468, 32; XXIII, 547, 2, etc.); even the passerby (addressed by an epitaph, TAM III, 548).

So it is often necessary, and a sign of profound affection, to greet each one “by name”: “I greet my very sweet daughter Makkaria . . . and all of our people by name” (aspazomai ten glykytaten mou thygatera Makkarian . . . kai holous tous hemon kat’ onoma, P. Oxy. 123, 21–23; cf. 930, 22–26); “Greet all of your people warmly by name”;¹⁰ “Greet all those who love us by name” (aspazou pantas tous philountas hemas kat’ onoma, P. Athen. 62, 30, first-second century; cf. P. Oslo 151, 20; P. Warr. 18, 30); “Greet Tasokmenis my esteemed sister and Samba and Soueris and her children and Sambous and all the relatives and friends by name” (aspazou Tasokmenin ten kyrian mou adelphen kai Samban kai Souerin kai ta tekna autes kai Samboun kai pantes tous syngeneis kai philous kat’ onoma, P. Mich. 203, 34); “I greet my daughter warmly and your mother and those who love us by name.”¹¹ These parallels to 3John 15 are quite numerous, but the best of them all is this, from a second-century ostrakon: Annius, writing to his “very sweet friend” (glykytato), concludes, “The friends greet you. Greet . . . the guardian and Niger . . . and all by name.”¹²

In the epitaphs, the adjective philos is used especially with father, mother, child, parents;¹³ in the papyri, it is especially the superlative philtatos that is used, notably in greetings. In AD 1: “Dionysius to Theon, to philtato pleista chairein” (P. Oslo 47, 1; cf. 49, 1; 56, 1; 82, 6; 85, 8); in 58, the same expression, from Chairas to Dionysius (P. Mert. 12, 1; cf. 23, 1; P. Mich. 210, 2; 503, 1); in 68, Heracleides greets his very dear Satabous.¹⁴ Christians take up the apostolic formulas¹⁵ and can be very expressive of their affection: “It is the same toward you, dearest one, for as in a mirror you see my engrafted affection and love for you, which is always fresh” (to auto de estin kai pros se, o philtate, kai gar hos di esoptrou katides ten pros se mou emphyton storgen kai agapen ten aei nean, P. Oxy. 2603, 17).

¹ John 15:15 (cf. Luke 12:2-4). Cf. W. Grundmann, “Das Wort von Jesu Freunden (Joh. XV, 13–16) und das Herrenmahl,” in NovT, 1959, pp. 62–69; G. M. Lee, “John XV, 14: ‘Ye Are My Friends,’” ibid. 1973, p. 260; E. A. Judge, The Social Pattern of Christian Groups in the First Century, p. 38.

² J. Jeremias, Eucharistic Words, pp. 76ff.; C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 3, p. 165, n. 5.

³ Κοινὰ τὰ τῶ—ν φίλων, a Pythagorean maxim that was often quoted, Plato, Lysis 207 c; Phdr. 270 e; Resp. 5.462 c; Aristotle, Pol. 2.2.1263a29–30; Eth. Nic. 8.11.1159b31; Euripides, Or. 735; Plutarch, Amat. 21.9; De adul. et am. 24; Athenaeus 1.14.8 a. On the mediation of friends, cf. A.

Biscardi, “Μεταξὺ φίλων, clausola di stile nei documenti di manomissione dell’ Egitto romano,” in Studi in on. di E. Volterra, vol. 3, Milan, 1971, pp. 515–526.

⁴ Aristotle, frag. 673 R; P.Hercul. 1018, col. XII, 5; H. I. Marrou, Histoire de l’éducation, p. 62 = ET, pp. 57ff.; C. Spicq, Agapè: Prolégomènes, pp. 26ff., 181ff.

⁵ St. John Chrysostom comments thus: “As the greatest proof of friendship is to entrust secrets (τὰ ἀπόρρητα), he tells them that he has deemed them worthy of such a communication (τῆς κοινωνίας).”

⁶ Philo, Heir 21; cf. Plato, Tim. 53 d: “As for the higher principles, they are known only to God, and among mortals only to those who are friends of God”; Aeschylus, Pers. 160, 169: “It is to you that I wish to say everything, friends . . . advise me”; Thales: “One must believe one’s friends even when they say the unbelievable” (in Plutarch, Conv. sept. sap. 17); Seneca, Ben. 6.34.5: “It is in a court, not in an atrium, that one looks for a friend; there he must be received, there kept; it is in our thought that he must find a secret sanctuary”; Ep. 3.2.3.

⁷ P.Fay. 118, 25; 119, 25; BGU 625, 35; P.Brem. 61, 42; P.Mich. 490, 18; 494, 15–16; 495, 32; cf. F. X. J. Exler, The Form of the Ancient Greek Letter: A Study in Greek Epistolography, Washington, 1923, pp. 114–115; C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 3, pp. 85ff.; T. Y. Mullins, “Greeting as a New Testament Form,” in JBL, 1968, pp. 418–426; M. Landfester, “Philos.”

⁸ P.Oslo 49, 11: ἀσπάζου τοὺς σοὺς πάντας καὶ τὸν κύριον —Απολλώνιον τὸν μόνον φίλον; C.P.Herm. 12, 14: οἱ— φίλοι καὶ γνώριμοι; 1, 6: ἀναγκαι—ος φίλος (cf. BGU 1874, 4; P.Oslo 60, 5; P.Mil.Vogl. 59, 13), γνήσιος φίλος (P.Fouad 54, 34; P.Oxy. 1841, 6; 1845, 6; 1860, 16); τω— ἀγαθωτάτου σου φίλω (P.Mich. 498, 9).

⁹ Ἀσπασαί—έωνα καὶ—ώϊλον καὶ Ἄρποκρα—ν καὶ Διονυσοῦν καὶ τοὺς ἡμω—ν πάντας, ed. E. G. Turner, “My Lord Apis,” in RechPap, vol. 2, 1962, p. 118, line 15 and 20.

¹⁰ Ἀσπασε πολλὰ τοὺς ἡμω—ν πάντας κατ’ ὄνομα, P.Oxy. 2275, 16–17; cf. 2276, 28; PSI 838, 11; 1054, 10; 1332, 27; 1333, 24; 1423, 27.

¹¹ —Ἀσπάζομαι τὴν θυγατέρα μου πολλὰ καὶ τὴν μητέρα σου καὶ τοὺς φιλοῦντας ἡμα—ς κατ’ ὄνομα, P.Mich. 216, 26; cf. 209, 25; 221, 19: ἀσπάζομαι σε μετὰ τω—ν τέκνω—ν σου: ἀσπάζομαι καὶ τοὺς φιλοῦντας ἡμα—ς κατ’ ὄνομα; 476, 31; 477, 40–44; 479, 20; 491, 19; 493, 21; P.Harr. 104, 15; BGU 27, 15; P.Mert. 82, 16–19; P.Abinn. 6, 23–24; 25, 15;

P.Ross.Georg. III, 4, 25–28; SB 7353, 19; 7336, 32–25; 7357, 20–23; 800, 33; P.IFAO II, n. 40, 11: ἄσπαζε τοὺς φιλοῦντας ἡμα—ς πάντας καθ ὄνομα; A. Bernand, Philae, I, n. 65: “X performed this act of adoration for his friends, by name, and for all their children, for the good”; P. Perdrizet, G. Lefèbvre, Les Graffites grecs du Memnonion d’Abydos, Nancy-Paris, 1919, n. 481, 492, 580.

¹² J. Schwartz, “Deux ostraca de la région du wadi Hammamat” (in ChrEg, 1956, pp. 118–123; cf. O.Aberd. 70, 8). The schoolboy Arion prays each day for his father, and concludes ἄσπάζω πολλὰ τοὺς ἡμω—ν πάντας κατ ὄνομα σὺν τοι—ς φιλοῦντι ἡμα—ς (in Sel.Pap. 133, 21).

¹³ GVI: father (n. 1204, 1737, 2026), mother (1208, 1210, 1909), child (1206, 1350, 1389, 1849, 1923), parents (1361), friends in the strict sense (1211, 1; 1212, 1270, 1363, 1630; 1633, 1821); cf. Diodorus Siculus, “Le Lexique de l’amour dans les papyrus et dans quelques inscriptions de l’époque hellénistique,” in Mnemosyne, 1955, pp. 27ff.

¹⁴ P.Berl.Zill. 9, 1; C.P.Herm. 1, 2 (first century); P.Corn. 51, 1; P.Princ. 163, 1; 187, 5; P.Rein. 112, 2; P.Mert. 83, 1; 90, 5; P.Mich. 602, 2; 634, 4; P.Yale 79, 3; 80, 13; 81, 2; 83, 2; 84, 2; P.Oxy. 3030, 2; 3063, 1; 3085, 1; 3086, 1; P.Mil.Vogl. 51, 2; 62, 2; 76, 2; 201, 2; P.Bon. 44, 1; P.Brem. 51, 1; 52, 1; Pap.Lugd.Bat. VI, 43, 4; XIII, 19, 1; in the plural, φιλτάτοις φίλοις (BGU 1568, 3, 17; P.Panop.Beatty 1, 244; P.Brem. 3, 4; P.Oxy. 2183, 3; 3026, col. I, 16; P.Mert. 66, 2; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XVII, 7, 1). The vocative φίλτατε is found especially in wishes: ἔρρωσο, φίλτατε! (P.Oslo 82, 13; P.Oxy. 2610, 11; 3030, 16; 3063,24; P.Yale 79, 29; 84, 10; P.Mert. 28, 22; P.Princ. 68, 15); γράφω σοι φίλτατε (Pap.Lugd.Bat. VI, 42, 29; 43, 9, 14).

¹⁵ M. Naldini, Il Cristianesimo in Egitto (cf. the index on ὄνομα, p. 409); J. O’Callaghan, Cartas cristianas griegas del siglo V, Barcelona, 1963, n. IV, 15–16; IX, 19; XXIII, 5; XLVIII.

Φιλόλογος

Philologos, Philologus

Philologos, S 5378; EDNT 3.427; NIDNTT 2.550; MM 670; L&N 93.380; BAGD 860

As a common noun, this word does not occur in the Bible. It can have a positive or a pejorative sense: “one who loves to talk, a babbler” or “one who loves literature, a scholar” (Epictetus 2.4.1; 3.10.10; 4.22.107; TAM 2.919: ton agathon philologon). It is applied especially to the Athenians.¹ It is used in official praise (MAMA VIII, 263), for example, for physicians (TAM II, 147, 5; CIL III, 614; cf. V. Nutton, “Menecrates of Sosandra, Doctor or Vet?” in ZPE, vol. 22, 1976, p. 96), and epitaphs and letters apply it to students,² even to a young girl: Tetria, philologe, chaire (SEG, XXII, 335, 1–2).

The proper name Philologus, mentioned in Rom 16:15, is fairly common at Rome in the familia of Caesar’s household (CIL VI, 4116), in Egypt,³ and in Asia Minor.⁴ It seems to be particularly common for slaves and freed slaves;⁵ as in this inscription: “Philologus, chief huntsman, for faithfulness and hard work.”⁶ The absence of a patronymic, the tasks that are entrusted to him, and the qualities that he has demonstrated indicate an inferior social standing.

¹ Plato, Leg. 1.641 e: “All the Greeks have the idea that our city is a friend of discourse and a great discourseser” (ὡς φιλόλογός τ’ ε—στὶ καὶ πολυλόγος); Plato, Lach. 183 c: “I seem sometimes to love discussions (φιλόλογος) and sometimes to hate them (μισόλογος)”; Tht. 161 a (philologos with a sophistic nuance: a lover of arguments); Diodorus Siculus 12.53.3: “The Athenians, distinguished people and lovers of discourse” (τοὺς —Αθηναίους ὄντας εὐφρυνεῖς καὶ φιλολόγους). The word is particularly common in Plutarch (53 times, especially in Quaest. conv., cf. 1.10.2), where the philologoi are cultivated folk (πεπαιδευμένοι) as opposed to ἰ—διω—ται: “Cornelia was always surrounded by Greeks and learning” (C. Gracch. 19.2; cf. 6.4); “Cicero was fond of Greek learning” (Cic. 3.3); “the adolescent Philologos was taught in the arts and sciences” (ibid. 48.2; 49.2); Alexander “had an innate appetite for literature (φύσει φιλόλογος) and for reading” (Alex. 8.2; cf. G. Nuchelmans, “Studien über φιλόλογος, φιλολογία, und φιλολογεῖ—ν,” Zwolle, diss. Nijmegen, 1950; H. Kuch, Φιλόλογος: Untersuchungen eines Wortes, Berlin, 1965, A. G. Kaloyeropoulo, “Epitaphe mégarienne,” in Ath. Ann. Arch., vol. 7, 1974, pp. 287–291); C. Panagopoulos, Vocabulaire, p. 227.

² SEG IV, 111 (cf. L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 13, pp. 48–49; “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1938, p. 458, n. 362; 1965, p. 110, n. 180; 1974, p. 296, n. 573); XXII, 355; P.Oxy. 531, 11; IGUR, n. 736. The philologoi of P.Oxy. 2177, 40 are perhaps the teachers of the Museum of Alexandria (H. A. Musurillo, Pagan Martyrs, p. 201).

³ P.Lond. 256 a (vol. 2, p. 99, AD 15). P.Oxy. 2190, 7; SB 1481, 33; P.Apoll. 83, 11: “to the embroiderer Philologus” (an account of receipts and disbursements).

⁴ MAMA VIII, 241, 298 (Iconium); at Priene: ὁ τόπος —Αλεξάνδρου τοῦ Φιλολόγου (I.Priene 313, 32; cf. L. Robert, Noms indigènes, p. 302); at Chios (SEG XVI, 488, 6), at Termessos (TAM III, 358, husband of a freedwoman), at Paros (IG XII, 5, 161); at Thera (IG XII, 3, 339, 12; 671 a 5; 1527); cf. L. Robert, Hellenica, vol. 13, pp. 45ff.

⁵ Cf. the references in H. Lietzmann, An die Römer, 4th ed., Tübingen, 1933, p. 127; but Plutarch says “there is no father who loves letters (φιλόλογος), honors, or money as he loves his children” (De frat. amor. 5). Suetonius, in Rhet. 10, includes “Atticus Philologus, son of a freedman, born at Athens.”

⁶ Φιλόλογον ἀρχικύνηγον πίστεως καὶ φιλοπονίας ἔνεκεν, G. E. Bean, Journeys in Northern Lycia, Vienna, 1971, n. 42; but the philologoi in Dionysius of Halicarnassus (Orat. 2.8.5) are well-read people, as opposed to the general public, hence “inquiring minds” (Plutarch, Quaest. conv. 5.1.1), the learned (6.4.1), always wanting to learn more (6.8.3).

φιλοξενία, φιλόξενος

philoxenia, hospitality; philoxenos, hospitable
see also ξενία, ξενίζω, ξενοδοχέω, ξένος

philoxenia, S 5381; TDNT 5.1–36; EDNT 3.427; NIDNTT 1.686, 690, 2.547, 550; MM 671; L&N 34.57; BAGD 860 | philoxenos, S 5382; TDNT 5.1–36; EDNT 3.427; NIDNTT 1.686, 690, 2.550; MM 671; L&N 34.58; BAGD 860

Christ mentioned hospitality as a distinguishing characteristic of his true disciples,¹ and in the primitive church it was the most obvious and most common work of love, shown either to journeying brethren (cf. Jas 4:13) or especially to preachers of the gospel.²

Among the works of brotherly love,³ Rom 12:13 commends eagerness to welcome traveling Christians: “pursuing hospitality” (ten philoxenian diokontes). We may compare b. shabb. 104a (“Such is the custom of the merciful [Hebrew hasidim] of pursuing the poor”) or Gallias, a citizen of Agrigentum in the fourth century BC, who received numerous xenones in his house. He was so philanthropos and philoxenos that he posted his slaves at the city gates to welcome strangers when they presented themselves and ask them to his house.⁴

In the Hellenistic period, philoxenia is an act of philanthropia; ⁵ the stranger, received as a guest, is addressed and treated as a friend (xenos kai philos),⁶ and the Greeks honor those who practice broad hospitality. At Chersonesus, a benefactor of the city is praised because in time of famine he personally showed hospitality to citizens of the city (idioxenoi, B. Latyshev, Inscriptiones Antiquae, IV, n. 68, 15). Sotis and Theodosius receive praise “for the good offices toward travelers going from Athens to the Bosporus” (Dittenberger, Syl. 206, 50–51); likewise Aglaos of Cos, “who always honors and gives a noble welcome to those who come to him from our various cities either as envoys or for some other reason . . . working to do good to each of those who ask him.”⁷ In AD 43, Junia Theodora, a Roman living at Corinth, is honored by a decree by the Lycian confederation and the deme of Telmessos because she “tirelessly showed zeal and generosity toward the Lycian nation and was kind to all travelers, private individuals as well as ambassadors, sent by the nation or the various cities.”⁸

Spanish hospitality was imbued with a religious spirit.⁹ Semitic hospitality was particularly generous, as is suggested by T. Job 10: “I also had thirty tables put in my house, which were at all times kept ready only for strangers. . . . And if a stranger asked for alms, he had to take a meal at table before receiving what he needed. I did not allow anyone to leave my home with an empty stomach.” This hospitality of Job is referred to in Abot R. Nat. 7.1–3 (cf. Str-B, vol. 4, 1, pp. 566–567).

In the Christian church, it was the bishop, acting as host on behalf of the local community, who was philoxenos and offered a bed and shelter to traveling brothers (1Tim 3:2; Titus 1:8). But for all Christians, hospitality was to be the first evidence of their philadelphia, according to Heb 13:2—“Do not neglect hospitality (tes philoxenias me epilanthanesthe), for through hospitality some have without knowing it entertained angels.” The stranger who is welcomed is a messenger of God. This religious motivation refers first of all to Abraham,¹⁰ but also to Lot (Gen 19), Manoah (Judg 13:3–22), and Tobias (Tob 12:1–20).

These examples make an impression, as does the promised reward,¹¹ which was important, because hospitality was onerous. Everything that the travelers needed had to be supplied,¹² and certain people abused their host’s goodness (Did. 11.3–6; Herm. Man. 2.5). Consequently, many people tried to keep their doors closed.¹³ Hence the added detail in 1Pet 4:9—“Practice hospitality to one another without grumbling” (aneu gongysmou).

Philoxenos is unknown in the papyri,¹⁴ and the noun is attested only in a Christian letter from the fourth century: “I write this letter on this papyrus so that you may read it with joy . . . and with a welcoming attitude borne of patience, filled with the Holy Spirit.”¹⁵

¹ Matt 25:35; cf. J. R. Michaels, “Apostolic Hardships and Righteous Gentiles: A Study of Matthew XXV, 31–46,” in JBL, 1965, pp. 27–37; J. Winandy, “La Scène du Jugement dernier (Mt. XXV, 31–46),” in ScEccl, 1966, pp. 169–186; L. Cope, “Mt. XXV, 31–46 Reinterpreted,” in NovT, 1969, pp. 32–44; J. Mánek, “Mit wem identifiziert sich Jesus? Eine exegetische Rekonstruktion ad Mt. XXV, 31–46,” in Christ and Spirit in the N.T. (in honor of C. F. D. Moule), Cambridge, 1973, pp. 15–25.

² Matt 10:11; Acts 16:15; 21:7, 17; 18:14; Phlm 22; Titus 3:13; 3John 5-8; 1Clem. 1.2: τὸ μεγαλοπρεπὲς τῆς φιλοξενίας ὑμῶ—ν ἦθος; cf. 10.7; 11.1; 12.1; P.Oxy. 2603, 34–35: “If possible, do not hesitate to write to the other communities concerning the travelers so that they may be welcomed in each place (ὅπως προσδέξωνται κατὰ τόπον) as is meet (ὡς καθήκει)” (PSI 1041, 12); Studia Pontica, vol. 3, n. 20, 16. A. Harnack, Die Mission und Ausbreitung des Christentums, 10th ed., Leipzig, 1924, pp. 200ff. = ET The Mission and Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Centuries, trans. J. Moffatt, New York, 1908, vol. 1, pp. 347ff. D. W. Riddle, “Early Christian Hospitality: A Factor in the Gospel Transmission,” in JBL, 1938, pp. 141–154; H. Rusche, Gastfreundschaft in der Verkündigung des Neuen Testaments, Münster, 1958; J. A. Grassi, “Emmaus Revisited,” in CBQ, 1964, pp. 463–467; M. Landfester, “Philos,” pp. 112, 120, 152; C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 2, pp. 809ff. In the second century, Bishop Melito of Sardis wrote a book On Hospitality (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 4.26.2). St. Ambrose notes: “Good hospitality earns no small reward; not only do we gain peace for our hosts, but if they are covered with the light dust of offenses, receiving apostolic preachers removes these” (In Luc. 6.66); cf. P. Miquel, “Hospitalité,” in Dict.spir., vol. 7, 808ff.

³ The first meaning of the verb ἀγαπάω is a welcoming love, which is manifested toward guests who are honored and given first-class treatment (C. Spicq, Agapè: Prolégomènes, pp. 38, 52, 66, 82, 120); cf. H. I. Kakride, Notion de l’amitié, pp. 41, 91ff.; V. T. Avery, “Homeric Hospitality in Alcaeus and Horace,” in CP, 1964, pp. 107–108. —On the pericope Rom 12:9-21, cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 2, pp. 142ff. E. Käsemann, “Gottesdienst im Alltag der Welt (Röm 12),” in Judentum, Urchristentum, Kirche, (Festschrift J. Jeremias), Berlin, 1960, pp. 165–161; C. H. Talbert, “Tradition and Redaction in Rom 12:9-12,” in NTS, vol. 16, 1969, pp. 83–93.

⁴ Diodorus Siculus 13.83; Athenaeus 1.5.4; Valerius Maximus 4.8.

⁵ Polybius 4.20; Diodorus Siculus 13.83; Heraclides Ponticus, frag. 3, 6: φιλανθρωπία τοι—ς ξένοις.

⁶ Dittenberger, Or. 416, 5; Plutarch, C. Gracch. 19.2: “Cornelia had many friends and a good table for welcoming them” (καὶ διὰ φιλοξενίαν εὐτράπεζος, following the French translation of R. Flacelière); cf. the inscriptions gathered by L. Robert, Etudes épigraphiques, p. 142. On ξενική φιλία, cf. Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 8.1.1155a20–22 (A. J. Voelke, Les Rapports avec autrui dans la philosophie grecque, pp. 52ff.); Philo, Moses 1.35ff.; Epictetus 1.28.23; 3.11.4. A Corinthian is called Ξενόφιλος, “friend of strangers” (I.Rhamn., n. XI, 24; cf. XIV, 2). Φιλόξενος is rather common as a proper name (cf. REG, 1934, p. 224; 1936, p. 361; 1960, p. 186, n. 318; 1963, p. 276, n. 263; 1964, p. 247, n. 572; L. Robert, Noms indigènes, p. 432, n. 4; L. Robert, Stèles funéraires, Paris, 1964, n. 160). The city of Delphi honors the rhetor Herodes Atticus, φιλίας καὶ φιλοξενίας ἔνεκα (Dittenberger, Syl. 859 a).

⁷ F. Durrbach, Choix, n. 92, 20ff.

⁸ SEG XVIII, 143, 49ff.; cf. lines 28–29, 75ff. Cimon, “the most hospitable of the Greeks” (Plutarch, Cim. 10.4), had a meal prepared at his home every day for a large number of persons. All the poor were welcomed (10.1). He surpassed the ancient hospitality and beneficence of the Athenians (φιλοξενίαν καὶ φιλανθρωπίαν, 10.6). On Greek hospitality, cf. Heliodorus, Aeth. 2.22.1–3; A. Aymard, “Les Etrangers dans les cités grecques,” in L’Etranger (Recueils de la Société J. Bodin, IX, 1), Brussels, 1958, pp. 125ff. C. Préaux, “Les Etrangers à l’époque hellénistique,” ibid., pp. 143ff. P. Gauthier, Symbola, pp. 19ff. et passim.

⁹ Diodorus Siculus 5.34: “The Celtiberians were humane and benevolent toward guests. They were eager to offer their homes to strangers, vying for the honor of welcoming them and regarding as a person beloved of the gods the one whom the traveler chose as his host.”

¹⁰ Abraham’s hospitality is mentioned by Philo, Abraham 107–118; Josephus, Ant. 1.196; 1Clem. 10.7; T. Abr. A 17: “hospitality unbounded, like the sea.” Often represented by Byzantine painters, it is invoked in Christian inscriptions: “Just as Abraham showed hospitality to the angels, Se . . . built . . .” (IGLS 1963).

¹¹ Apoc. Paul 27; H. Chadwick, “Justification by Faith and Hospitality,” in SP, vol. 4, Berlin, 1961, pp. 281–285.

¹² Rom 16:1–2. On the requirements for lodging, cf. IGLS 1998, 11ff. Edict of Germanicus: “Having learned that because I was coming there were requisitions of boats and beasts, and that homes were forcibly taken over to provide lodging for us, and that private persons were harassed . . .” (SB 3924 = Sel.Pap. II, 211.). N. Lewis, “Domitian’s Order on Requisitioned Transport and Lodgings,” in RIDA, 1968, pp. 135–142; D. Gorce, Les Voyages, l’hospitalité et le port des lettres dans le monde chrétien des IVe et Ve siècles, Paris, 1925; E. Wipszycka, Les Ressources et les activités économiques des églises en Egypt, du IVe au VIIIe siècle, Brussels, 1972, pp. 116ff.

¹³ P.Petr. II, 12 (cf. N. Hohlwein, Le Stratège du nome, p. 128); G. E. Bean, T. B. Mitford, Cilicia, n. 79: ἀφειδω—ς δόντα καὶ διαδόματα καὶ ε—στιάσαντα πολείτας καὶ ξένους (cf. the editors' note, p. 99).

¹⁴ Cf. the dedication θεα— μεγίστη —Ισερμούθι φιλοξένω —Ισίδωρος γλύπτῃς ε—ποίει καὶ ἀνέθηκεν ε—π̄ ἀγαθω— (SEG VIII, 538 = SB 8129).

¹⁵ Μαιτὰ φιλοξενίαθ μακρόνμιαθ πεπληρωμαίνῃ πνεύματοθ ἀγίου (P.Lond. 1917, 4 = H. I. Bell, Jews and Christians in Egypt, p. 81). Cf. G. Husson, "L'Hospitalité dans les papyrus byzantins," in Proceedings XIII, pp. 169–177.

φίλος τοῦ Καίσαρος

philos tou Kaisaros, king's friend

philos tou kaisaros, S 5384 + 2541; EDNT 2.235; BAGD 395–396

The title of honor "king's friend," used at the Persian, Egyptian, Lagid, and Seleucid courts,¹ then at Rome,² ordinarily refers to high dignitaries who dress in purple,³ have free access to the king, serve as councillors,⁴ and are entrusted with civil and military functions (1Macc 11:26; 2Macc 1:14; 10:13; 14:11). The seventeenth book of Diodorus Siculus supplies a great deal of data on the "friends" or "companions" of Alexander and of Darius (cf. F. Carrata Thomes, "Il problema degli eteri nella monarchia di Alessandra Magno," in Università di Torino, Pubbl. della Fac. di Lett. e Fil., vol. 7, 1955, pp. 14–15, 27ff.). The king assembled his "friends" in council (17.16.1; 16.30.1) and asked for their honest opinions (17.39.2; 17.54.3). Some shared his own opinion (17.45.7); others said the opposite (17.30.4). They gave the king information (17.112.3; 17.115.6) and inquired concerning his intentions (17.117.4). There was a hierarchy among these principal collaborators (17.107.6; 17.117.4), who were chosen from among the most capable men (17.31.1), esteemed by the king (17.37.5), beloved (17.114.1), and enjoying his confidence (17.32.1). He feasted with them (17.16.4; 17.72.1; 17.73.7; 17.100.1; 17.110.7; 17.117.1) because they went with him when he moved from place to place (17.96.1; 17.97.1; 17.104.1; 17.116.5); and he entrusted delicate assignments to them (17.37.3; 17.52.7; 17.55.1; 17.104.3; 17.112.4). He distributed honors and wealth to them (1.35.2; 17.77.5; cf. Athenaeus 12.539 f). These friends sought the king's good and were ready to stand with him in danger (17.56.2; 17.97.2; 17.117.2), but sometimes they were obsequious (17.115.1; cf. 17.118.1) and jealous of each other (17.101.3), and sometimes they went so far as to plot together against the king (17.79.1; 17.80.1). According to Polybius, King Philip of Macedonia took counsel with his friends (5.2.1; 5.4.13; 5.22.8). He gathered them for deliberations (5.58.2; 5.102.2). They shared the same convictions (5.9.6) and were similarly influenced (5.36.8), but they could be circumvented by intriguers (5.50.9). The friends voted unanimously (5.16.7) and the king's decision followed their opinion (5.63.3). They accompanied the king (5.56.8–9; 5.87.6; 5.101.5), surrounded and assisted him (5.12.5), and shared in his responsibilities (5.16.5), especially the command of his troops (5.21.1; 5.83.1).

Among the “friends of the king” three or four levels of hierarchy can be distinguished: mere friends,⁵ honored friends,⁶ first friends,⁷ and finally the syngenes or “king’s kinsman”;⁸ but this title was also granted to vassals, and was no more than an honor, a distinction (1Macc 2:18; 11:57; 15:32; SEG VIII, 573; Philo, Flacc. 40; P.Oxy. 3022, 12), and “first friends” could be on the same level as the chiliarchs and machairophoroi of the royal guard.⁹

When the Jews cry out to Pilate, regarding Jesus, “if you release him, you are not a friend of Caesar (ouk ei philos tou Kaisaros), for whoever makes himself a king is against Caesar,”¹⁰ there are three possible interpretations: (1) a commonplace appeal to loyalty, a litotes meaning, “You would be an enemy of Caesar not to condemn this royal pretender”;¹¹ (2) the technical meaning amicus Augusti;¹² (3) but Pilate is not a dignitary or important and influential person at the imperial court.¹³ The final option is that this distinction is conferred upon him as an equestrian¹⁴ and governor of Judea, but with the fluidity of meaning that marked this official “friendship” in this period.¹⁵

The thought of incurring the emperor’s disfavor won out over Pilate’s belief in Jesus’ innocence (ouden heurisko aition, Luke 23:4, 14). Losing the emperor’s favor would mean the end of his career, or at least a compromised future, the ruin of his ambitions, perhaps the confiscation of his wealth, loss of liberty, perhaps even exile or death.¹⁶ Pilate gave in to the blackmail.

¹ Cf. F. Cumont, L’Egypte des astrologues, pp. 34ff.; E. Bickerman, Institutions des Séleucides, pp. 40ff.; K. C. Atkinson, “Some Observations on Ptolemaic Ranks and Titles,” in Aeg, 1952, pp. 204–214; C. Spicq, Agapè: Prolégomènes, pp. 165ff.; C. de Witt, “Enquête sur le titre smr-pr,” in ChrEg, 1956, pp. 89–104; H. Donner, “Der ‘Freund des Königs,’” in ZAW, 1961, pp. 269–277; L. Mooren, “Über die ptolemäischen Hofrangtitel,” in Antidorum W. Peremans, Louvain, 1968, pp. 161–180. The references are given by W. Peremans, “Sur la titulature aulique en Egypte au Ile et Ier siècle avant J.-C.,” in Symbolae ad Jus et Historiam Antiquitatis Pertinentes (Symbolae von Oven), Leiden, 1946, 129–159; idem, Prosop.Ptol., vol. 6, pp. 21ff., 85; M. Holleaux, Etudes d'épigraphie, vol. 3, pp. 220–225; L. Mooren, The Aulic Titulature in Ptolemaic Egypt: Introduction and Prosopography, Brussels, 1975, pp. 52ff., 173ff., 225ff. A title of the strategoï (cf. G. Mussies, in Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIV, pp. 13–46) and epistrategoï (J. David Thomas, The Epistrategos in Ptolemaic and Roman Egypt, Opladen, 1975, pp. 43ff.).

² L. Friedländer, Mœurs romaines du règne d'Auguste, Paris, 1885, vol. 1, pp. 128ff.; F. Cumont, Les Religions orientales dans le paganisme romain, pp. 127, 273, n. 6. M. Lemosse, Le Régime des relations internationales dans le haut-empire romain, Paris, 1967, pp. 44, 67, 75, 87, 93.

³ 1Macc 6:14–15: “He gave him his crown, his robe, and his ring” (cf. 6:28; 7:8; 10:19–20); Esth 6:9—“Let the garment be given to one of the friends of the king”; cf. 1:3; 2:18. A civil officer in Solomon’s court was “king’s friend”; 1Kgs 4:5; cf. T. N. D. Mettinger, Solomonic State Officials, Lund, 1971, pp. 63–69; M. Paeslack, in Theologia Viatorum V, (Festschrift Albertz), 1954, pp. 92–93.

⁴ Ep. Arist. 125: “giving him the most useful advice with absolute frankness”; P.Oxy. 3019, 7; cf. I.Delos 1532, 4; 1535, 5; 1544–1548; 1571, 2; 1573, 3; 1581, 1; Dittenberger, Or. 685, 121. On the distinction between a court title and an honorific title, i.e., between the phenomenon of the φίλοι and the hierarchy created at the beginning of the second century BC, cf. L. Mooren, The Aulic Titulature in Ptolemaic Egypt; idem, La Hiérarchie de Cour ptolémaïque, Louvain, 1977.

⁵ 1Macc 7:8; Josephus, Ant. 13.225; Polybius 31.3.26; P.Tebt. 728, 4; 895, 11–12; UPZ 161, 2–3; 187, 1; 194, 1–2.

⁶ P.Dura 18, 10: τῶν πρώτων καὶ προτιμωμένων φίλων; 19, 18; 20, 3; P.Ryl. 66; Dittenberger, Syl. 651, 10; Or. 754, 2; Polybius 5.25.3: “The most illustrious of the king’s friends”; Diodorus Siculus 17.37.5; C. B. Welles, Royal Correspondence, n. 45, 3: —Ἀριστόλοχον τῶν τιμωμένων φίλων. Cf. A. Momigliano, “Honorati Amici,” in Athenaeum, vol. 11, 1933, pp. 136–141.

⁷ Πρωτοί φίλοι, a category perhaps sometimes confused with the preceding one, 1Macc 10:60, 65: “The king gave him the honor of enrolling him among his first friends”; 11:27; 2Macc 8:9; P.Rein. 7, 28–29; P.Stras. 564, 14–16; P.Tebt. 778, 1; 895, 1; PSI 166–172; SB 632, 1; 9963; 9986; 10078; 10122; SEG XIII, 557, 571; XX, 208; Dittenberger, Or. 93, 3; 119;

160; 255; 256. “It is an old habit among kings and those who want to appear kingly to divide a whole population of ‘friends’ into classes; and it is a prideful thing to make a great deal of the right to cross or even approach his doorstep, and, as a supposed honor, to authorize you to stand guard near the entrance, and to step into the house in front of others. . . . Among us, C. Gracchus, then Livius Drusus were the first ones to establish this custom of separating their people into groups and receiving some privately, some in small groups, and others en masse. So these people had first-class friends and second-class friends, but never true friends” (Seneca, Ben. 6.34.1–2). Cf. Dio Cassius 57.11: οὐδὲν ἰσπεύα τῶν πρώτων εἶα; Diodorus Siculus 19.48.6: “Antigonus gave a big welcome to Xenophilus and pretended to honor him as the equal of his first friends” (ἐν τοις μεγίστοις τῶν φίλων). But if Diodorus calls ranking Macedonians friends in the entourage (19.91.4), and particularly royal persons (19.35.5)—which makes “friend” an official title—elsewhere the meaning is broader (cf. F. Bizière, Diodore de Sicile: Bibliothèque historique, Livre XIX, Paris, 1975, p. 156).

⁸ 1Macc 3:32; 2Macc 11:12; P.Tebt. 7, 7–8; 26, 5–6; 72, 241; 700, 70; 743, 5–6; SEG XIII, 552, 553, 556, 568, 571–591; SB 4225, 1; 4321; 5219; 7410–7412; 8036, 4–5; Dittenberger, Or. 259. To this category was assimilated the τροφεύς, “tutor” or “foster father,” raised with the king, 1Macc 1:6; SB 1568, 1; Dittenberger, Or. 148; 256. J. A. Letronne, Inscriptions, pp. 350ff.

⁹ SB 624; 5827; 7270; BGU 1190; E. Bernand, Fayoum, pp. 49ff., 53ff.

¹⁰ John 19:12 (cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 3, pp. 239ff.; Stählin, “φίλος,” in TDNT, vol. 9, pp. 166–167). On the historicity of this account, cf. M. Dibelius, “Das historische Problem der Leidensgeschichte,” in Botschaft und Geschichte, Tübingen, 1953, vol. 1, pp. 248–257; “Herodes und Pilatus,” ibid., pp. 278–292; J. Blank, “Die Verhandlung vor Pilatus, Joh. XVIII, 28–XIX, 16 im Lichte johanneischer Theologie,” in BZ, 1959, pp. 60–81; J. Blinzler, Le Procès de Jésus, pp. 286, n. 13ff., 378ff; ET = Trial of Jesus.

¹¹ But in this case, the wording would more likely be φιλόκαισαρ or φιλοσέβαστος, cf. IGLS 2759, 2760.

¹² Suetonius, Tit. 7.2; Pliny, Pan. 84; Josephus, Ant. 12.298; cf. A. Deissmann, Light, p. 378; E. Bammel, “Φίλος τοῦ Καίσαρος,” in TLZ, 1952, pp. 205–210.

¹³ M. J. Ollivier, “Ponce Pilate et les Pontii,” in RB, 1896, pp. 247–254; 594–500; P. L. Maier, Pilatus: Sein Leben und sine Zeit, Wuppertal-Vohwinkel, 1970; R. E. Brown, John, vol. 2, pp. 847, 879.

¹⁴ Cf. T. P. Wiseman, “The Definition of ‘Eques Romanus’ in the Late Republic and Early Empire,” in Historia, 1970, pp. 67–83.

¹⁵ Without any formal nomination and therefore without the issuing of a certificate, elevation to the rank of philos—which was normal for senators—was common from the time of Augustus for legates and prefects, as a reward for their loyal service.

¹⁶ Cf. Epictetus 4.1.45–48: “the evil that is injurious and must be fled . . . is not being Caesar’s friend.” An offending slave only risks a lashing, but losing Caesar’s friendship can mean beheading.

φιλόστοργος

philostorgos, authentically loving, tenderly devoted, beneficent

philostorgos, S 5387; EDNT 3.428; NIDNTT 2.538–539, 542, 550; MM 671–672; L&N 25.41; BAGD 861; ND 2.101–103, 3.41–42

The first characteristic of “authentic love” (Rom 12:9) is that it fills Christians with tender devotion to each other (verse 10; cf. F. Cumont, Studia Pontica III, 20, 14). Thus may we translate philostorgoi, which in the Koine often replaces the simple form storge,¹ which expresses familial affection, an attachment sealed by nature and blood ties, uniting spouses, parents and children, brothers and sisters.² Because this instinct or feeling is shared by animals and humans,³ Philo considers it a virtue only to the extent that it remains under the rule of reason;⁴ but in common usage, usage philostorgia has the more positive sense of the mother’s innate love, benevolence, and devotion toward her children;⁵ then that of a husband for his wife⁶ or a wife for her husband;⁷ of a father for his sons⁸ and of sons for a father.⁹ But philostorgia is also used for all links of kinship,¹⁰ even one’s attachment to guest-friends (SEG XVIII, 143, 69), or the attachment of slaves to their master.¹¹

Quite often, philostorgia is identified with gratitude.¹² Not only do writers of wills leave their property to those who have shown affection for them,¹³ but on August 29, 58, Phairas writes to his physician: “I hope that if I cannot return in equal measure the affection you have shown me, I may at least show some token of gratitude.”¹⁴ This extension of philostorgia to strangers shows that this sentiment is not limited to mere benevolence¹⁵ but also includes active beneficence, devotion, and generosity; thus

Hippolytus appeals to the dioiketes Acusilaus: “I beseech you, in your philostorgia, concerning my sons who are with Soterichon . . .”¹⁶

In the language of the inscriptions from the second century BC, philostorgos is synonymous with “benefactor.” A decree of Athens confers praise and a gold crown to King Attalus I as the benefactor of the city “with all goodwill and philostorgia.”¹⁷ Attalus II honors his brother Eumenes II “for virtue and goodwill and his philostorgia toward him” (aretēs heneken kai eunoias kai philostorgias tes pros heauton, I.Ilium, n. 41). Attalus III writes “so that you may know how much philostorgia we have for him.”¹⁸ The merchants of Laodicea erect a statue in honor of Heliodorus “because of his goodwill and philostorgia toward the king and good deeds toward themselves” (eunoias heneken kai philostorgias tes eis ton basilea kai euergesias tes eis hautous, Dittenberger, Or. 247, 6). The city of Gythion honors the public physician Damiadas “who has in everything abundantly demonstrated his goodwill and philostorgia toward our city.”¹⁹ The word is also used for devotion to country²⁰ and with a religious meaning as an epithet for the savior goddess Isis of Carene;²¹ but with the abuse of the expression, especially in the honorific inscriptions,²² it came to be purely a polite term and an expression of official “sympathy” (2Macc 9:21; cf. Dittenberger, Or. 257, 4; TAM II, 283, 360, 443, 484, 662, 716, etc.) or of some undifferentiated form of attachment.²³

¹ On στοργή in the inscriptions of the first-second century, cf. GVI, n. 946, 1015, 1079, 1112, 1156, 1263, 1265, 1419, 1442, 1737, 1869, 1919, 1975, 2002, 2011. Diodorus Siculus 17.65.3: the devotion of Alexander’s officer’s to him; cf. 17.114.1.

² TAM II, 243: φιλοστόργω ἀδελφω—: IG XII, Suppl. 29: ε—κτροφῆς ἔνεκεν καὶ φιλοστοργίας τῆς ε—αυτω—ν. Cf. C. Spicq, Agapè: Prolégomènes, pp. 4, n. 2; 5, n. 2; 12, n. 7; 26, n. 5; 27, n. 2; 61, n. 3. Idem, “Φιλόστοργος,” in RB, 1955, pp. 497–510. On philostorgia, brotherly love, φιλοστοργότατον ἀδελφόν (E. Breccia, Iscrizioni, n. 154; cf. 135); cf. an inscription at Pisidia: τὸν δὲ ἀνδριάντα ἀνέστησαν Νεωνιανὴ Νανηρὶς ἢ μήτηρ καὶ Φλογιανὴ —Αννιανὴ ἢ ἀδελφὴ φιλοστοργίας καὶ μνήμης χάριν (SEG II, 713, 4–6); at Saïda, a tomb holds the body of Heraclea, a dear friend or own sister of the “old mother,” γνωθὴ θ Ἡεράκλεια φιλοστόργοιο τεκούσης (B. Haussoullier, H. Ingholt, “Inscription grecques de Syrie,” in Syria, 1924, pp. 338–340). A father’s affection for his children, cf. the tomb inscription τω—υι—ω— φιλοστοργίας ἔνεκεν (C. Naour, “Inscription et relief de Kibyratide et de Cabalide,” in ZPE, vol. 22, 1976, pp. 126 and 128); between spouses, cf. the στοργή βεβαία of an inscription of Nicomedia published by S. Sahin, ibid., XVIII, 1975, p. 42, n. 125; cf. XXI, 1976, p. 189.

³ With mares, the maternal (φιλόστοργος) affection develops naturally (Aristotle, HA 9.4.611a12). A cruel beast, ἀστόργου θηρός (GVI, n. 1078, 4). Little ones must not be separated from their mother, especially while nursing (διὰ τινὰ φυσικὴν μητέρων πρὸς ἔγγονα φιλοστοργίαν, Philo, Virtues 128). Plutarch wrote a little treatise “On the Love (φιλοστοργία) of Offspring,” in which he observes the affection of male and female, especially the latter, toward their young (De am. prol. 2). He insists that this sentiment comes from nature (3–5).

⁴ Abraham 91, 168, 198; Virtues 192; Moses 1.150; Spec. Laws 2.240; 3.153, 157; To Gaius 36; Frag. 202 on Gen 27:12-13 (ed. N. Ralph, p. 230); cf. Josephus, Ant. 4.135; 7.252; 8.193; Epictetus 1.11; 3.17.4; 3.24.58ff. Plutarch (De frat. amor. 4) uses philostorgos to describe old men who are “sensitive” to the way their dog or horse is treated. On the manifestations of this affection, cf. C. Panagopoulos, Vocabulaire, p. 214.

⁵ Ἡ μήτηρ ὡς ἐ—πὶ παιδί, καὶ φύσει φιλόστοργος, P.Oxy. 1381, 104. In his will, Petosorapis asks his sister to take responsibility for his younger brother Epinicos and be a mother to him (εἰ—ς αὐτὸν μητρικῆ φιλοστοργία, P.Oxy. 495, 12; P.Mich. 148, col. II, 9); GVI, 956, 3: φιλοστόργου μηρός; M. Dunand, in RB, 1932, p. 579: φιλοστόργω μητρί. “There is a foolproof way of knowing: the mother’s instinct; from the first meeting, she feels a warm affection (philostorgia) for her child” (Heliodorus, Aeth. 10.24.8). The earth is the “common hearth of gods and humans, and we must all bow before her as before a land that nourishes us and celebrate her and cherish her (ὑμνεῖ—ν καὶ φιλοστοργεῖ—ν) as the one who gave birth to us” (Theophrastus, in Porphyry, Abst. 2.32, p. 162, 6); “Apelles and Metrothemis, children of Cleanactides [raised this monument to] their nurse Meliteia, [daughter] of Lysanias, because of the nurture [that she gave them] and her tender affection for them” (ἐ—κτροφῆς ἔνεκεν καὶ φιλοστοργίας τῆς ἐ—αυτω—ν, CIG 6850 b). Apollonis, queen of Pergamum: διεφύλαξε τὴν εὖνοιαν καὶ φιλοστοργίαν μέχρι τῆς τοῦ βίου καταστροφῆς (Polybius 22.20; cf. I.Perg. 169). Stratonice raised with affection and magnificence (ἔθρεψε φιλοστόργως καὶ μεγαλοπρεπῶ—ς) the children that her husband had with a slave (Plutarch, Mulier. virt. 21); “friendship (φιλίας), parental love (φιλοστοργίας), and philanthropy . . . the link between them is indissoluble” (De virt. mor. 12); “Is philostorgia for children natural to humans?” (Quaest. conv. 2.1.13; Agis 17.4). In the aretology of Cumae, Isis presents herself: —Εγὼ στέργεσθαι γυναι—κας ὑπὸ ἀνδρῶ—ν ἠνάγκασα (line 27, ed. Y. Grandjean, Arétalogie d’Isis, p. 123); L. Robert, Documents, pp. 81; 84 n. 1; idem, Hellenica, vol. 13, p. 38.

⁶ Ῥηγίνη γυναικὶ ἀγνοτάτη καὶ φιλοστόργω (IGUR, vol. 2, n. 752); IG X, 2, n. 608; MAMA I, 117; IV, 250; VIII, 235; I.Lind. 456 b 6; IGLS 1364, 6;

SEG XIX, 840: γυναικὴ ἰ—δία φιλοστοργίης ἔνεκεν; G. Pfohl, Inscripfen der Griechen, Darmstadt, 1972, pp. 171ff.; J. and L. Robert, "Bulletin épigraphique," in REG, 1963, p. 148, n. 134; Hellenica, vol. 7, pp. 9–10; edict of Eriza (Dittenberger, Or. 224, 16; cf. 307–308); G. Kaibel, Epigrammata, n. 44, 2–3; 244, 6; Ps.-Plutarch, Cons. ad Apoll. 9: "the poet Antimachus loved his wife tenderly" (φιλοστόργως); cf. Stobaeus, Flor. 24: Γυναι—κα δὲ τὴν κατὰ νόμους ἔσκατος στεργέτω καὶ ε—κ ταύτης τεκνοποιεῖσθω (vol. 4, p. 154,10).

⁷ Τὸν φιλοστοργότατον ἄνδρα. The two wives of the general Ceteus loved him tenderly (Diodorus Siculus 19.33.1–2). Πριμιτεῖβω γλυκυτάτῳ καὶ φιλοστόργῳ . . . πατήρ (IGUR, II, 2, n. 914). φιλοστοργίας ἔνεκεν recurs constantly in the tomb inscriptions, TAM II, 92, 93, 105, 148; SEG XX, 54, 8, 200, 7. F. K. Dörner, Bericht über eine Reise in Bithynien, Vienna, 1952, n. X, 30. The wife of the silversmith Canopys "bore witness to him for three years of a pious affection" (στοργή, E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 19); SEG II, 712, 7; C. B. Welles, Royal Correspondence, n. 67, 2–3; cf. n. 35; G. Kaibel, Epigrammata 189, 1; 409, 6. ZPE, vol. 29, 1978, pp. 98, 104.

⁸ P.Tebt. 408, 7: παρακαλω— σε περὶ υἱ—ω—ν μου τῆ φιλοστοργίᾳ (in AD 3); MAMA I, 288, 319; VIII, 247; SEG XIV, 803; SB 10652 c 2: Eudaimonis to Apollonius τῷ— φιλοστοργοτάτῳ υἱ—ω—; I.Car. 175 b; GVI, 1950, 7; B. Latyshev, Inscriptiones Antiquae, I, 357, 6; 362, 6; 364, 7, 15; IV, 71, 6; L. Robert, Opera Minora Selecta, vol. 1, p. 311, n. 2; I. Kajanto, A Study of the Greek Epitaphs of Rome, Helsinki, 1963, pp. 29, 33.

⁹ Τὴν ἀγαθὴν στοργὴν πρὸς φίλιον πατέρα, F. K. Dörner, Bericht über eine Reise in Bithynien, XXII, 16; Dittenberger, Or. 229, 6; 331, 46; G. Kaibel, Epigrammata 151, 15; I.Lind. 465 d 5; I.Car. 175 b, c; I.Side 121 b 6; SEG XIV, 775, 3; H. W. Pleket, Epigraphica, vol. 2, n. 35, 5: πρὸς τοὺς γονεῖ—ς φιλοστοργίας, cf. MAMA IV, 166; VIII, 392; C. Naour, "Inscription de Lycie," in ZPE, vol. 24, 1977, p. 276; J. and L. Robert, "Bulletin épigraphique," in REG, 1958, p. 325, n. 476: τὸν ἀγαθὸν καὶ φιλοστοργότατον πατέρα.

¹⁰ I.Lind. 300 c 9; 455, 10; 458, 10; 465 e 4; f 13; g 3; MAMA VIII, 367, 375; ZPE, vol. 8, 1971, p. 35; I.Sinur., n. 9, 36; cf. 14, 6; 15, 10; 38, 2.

¹¹ G. E. Bean, Journeys in Northern Lycia, n. 39. In wills, slaves are often freed because of their devotion, P.Oxy. 494, 6; P.Oslo 129, 15; P.Grenf. III, 71, 12; Chrest.Mitt., n. 361, 16; in 354, a Christian freed his slaves "in gratitude for the goodwill that you have always shown toward me, your affection, and your service" (καὶ ἄνθ ὧν ε—νεδείξασθε μοὶ κατὰ χρόνον εὐνοίας καὶ στοργῆς ἔτι τε καὶ ὑπηρεσίας, Delphi, n. 124, cited by P.

Foucart, Mémoire sur l'affranchissement des esclaves, Paris, 1857, pp. 45–46).

¹² G. E. Bean, T. B. Mitford, Cilicia, n. 1, 10–14.

¹³ P.Mich. 341, 9: κατ' εὐνοίαν καὶ φιλοστοργίαν (sic) τοῦ Διδύμου πρὸς τὴν θυγατέραν Ἡερακλέαν; PSI 904; P.Stras. 284, 13; P.Oxy. 492, 5; SB 8035 a 4.

¹⁴ P.Mert. 12, 12: εἰ— μὴ τὰ ἴσα σοι παρασχει—ν, βραχεία τινὰ παρέξομαι τῇ εἰ—ς ε—μὲ φιλοστοργία.

¹⁵ The pairing φιλοστοργία—εὐνοία is constant, cf. Stud.Pal. XX, 35, 9: εὐνοίας καὶ φιλοστοργίας ἕνεκα; SB 5294, 9; Josephus, Ant. 4.134; Chrest.Mitt., n. 361, 9; Polybius 22.20.3; Vettius Valens (ed. W. Kroll), p. 76, 27; SEG VII, 382, 11: εὐνοίας καὶ στοργῆς χάριν.

¹⁶ Παρακαλῶ— σε περὶ υἱ—ω—ν μου τῇ φιλοστοργία τω—ν περὶ Σωτήριχον κτλ., P.Tebt. 408, 7; cf. P.Flor. 338, 10: καὶ νῦν τάχα ἢ σὴ σπουδὴ καὶ φιλοστοργία κατανεικήσῃ τὴν ε—μὴν ἀκαιρείαν; P.Ant. 100, 2.

¹⁷ Μετὰ πάσης εὐνοίας καὶ φιλοστοργίας, I.Perg., 160, B, 19; cf. Antiochus IV Eiphanes (175–164), ποιησάμενοι πρὸς ἀλλήλους μετὰ πάσης εὐνοίας καὶ φιλοστοργίας (Dittenberger, Or. 248, 21). Letter of Antiochus VIII Grypus (125–96), τὴν πρὸς αὐτὸν εὐνοίαν μέχρι τέλους συντηρήσαντας, ε—μμείναντας δὲ τῇ πρὸς ἡμα—ς φιλοστοργία (ibid. 257, 7).

¹⁸ Ὅπως εἰ—δῆτε ὡς ἔχομεν φιλοστοργίας πρὸς αὐτόν, I.Perg. 248, 43 (=Dittenberger, Or. 331). Philodemus of Gadara, Hom., frag. V b 22 (ed. Olivier, p. 8).

¹⁹ Τὰς εἰ—ς τὰν πόλιν ἀμω—ν εὐνοίας τε καὶ φιλοστοργίας τὰν μεγίσταν ἀπόδειξιν διὰ πάντων ποιούμενος, IG Vol., 1, 1145, 33 (P. Foucart, "Inscription de Gythion," in REG, 1909, pp. 405–409); cf. Dittenberger, Or. 231, 16–18; 256, 8; I.Delos 1517, 11 (F. Durrbach, Choix, pp. 154–155); SEG IV, 418 B 10.

²⁰ Διὰ τὴν πρὸς τὴν πατρίδα φιλόστοργον εὐνοίαν (A. H. Jones, "Inscriptions from Jerash," in JRS, 1928, pp. 153–156). Decree of the city of Olymos in Caria: διακείμενος φιλοστόργως πρὸς ἕκαστον τω—ν πολιτω—ν (Dittenberger, Or. 248, 21); Polybius 31.25.1: φιλοστοργία πρὸς ἀλλήλους. F. G. Maier, Griechische Mauerbauinschriften, Heidelberg, 1959, n. XLIV, 8; L. Robert, Opera Minora Selecta, vol. 1, p. 311.

²¹ P.Oxy. 1380, 12: ε—κ τῆ Καρήνη φιλόστοργον; cf. line 131: κόσμον θηλειω—ν καὶ φιλόστοργον; Dittenberger, Syl. 1267, 23; cf. SB 591. St. John Chrysostom calls God πατήρ φιλόστοργος (A. Wenger, Jean Chrysostome: Huit catéchèses baptismales, Paris, 1957, pp. 135, 142, 144, 150, 182, 184, 197). On philostorgia to describe the feelings of a person or a city toward a king, cf. the references in M. Holleaux, Etudes d'épigraphie, vol. 3, pp. 94ff.

²² L. Robert, Etudes anatoliennes, p. 352 b and c, p. 366.

²³ Cf. “love of life,” πρὸς τὸ ζῆν φιλοστοργίαν (2Macc 6:20). In his treatise On Marriage, Antipater of Tarsus contrasts conjugal and paternal love to friendship and other relations (φιλίαι ἢ φιλοστοργίαι); Stobaeus, Ecl. 67.22.25, vol. 4, p. 508. Likewise, Julius Pollux (Onom. 5.20.114) gives as synonyms of φίλος: εὔνους, οἰ—κει—ος, ε—πιτήδειος, ε—ται—ρος and adds ὁ γὰρ φιλόστοργος ἕτερόν τι. Later on, when listing synonyms for φιλόστοργος, he includes φιλότεκνος, ἀνδ φιλόμουσος (6.37.167).

φλυαρέω, φλύαρος

phlyareo, to babble; phlyaros, babbler

phlyareo, S 5396; EDNT 3.429; MM 673; L&N 33.374; BAGD 862 | phlyaros, S 5397; EDNT 3.429; L&N 33.375; BAGD 862

A phlyaros is a babbler who talks at random; phlyareo means “spout nonsense.”¹ Thus St. Paul is making a humorous attack on the sin of speech committed by certain idle women who make endless visits “just to chat” and make empty talk (1Tim 5:13). Phlyaros can mean childish babbling,² speech that makes no sense (P.Cair.Zen. 59300, 7; PSI 434, 7, 9), foolishness, silliness.³

These terms seem to have been used in polemic to denounce the inaneness of an argument or an accusation,⁴ and it is in this highly pejorative sense that Diotrophes “is spreading silly and malicious talk about us.”⁵

¹ Xenophon, Hell. 3.1.18: “Dercylidas wasted his time on twaddle”; 6.3.12: “See how silly this talk is”; Aristophanes, Nub. 364: “This is all rubbish”; Philo, Contemp. Life 64: “dinner parties filled with such silliness”; Plutarch, Phoc. 27.9: Callimedon says to Antipater, “If Phocion continues to talk

nonsense, are you going to believe him?"; Cic. 2.2: "these premonitions are ordinarily taken as empty dreams and foolishness"; cf. the references given by P. N. Harrison, Paulines and Pastorals, London 1964, p. 134.

² P.Heid. VI, 12 = SB 2266 (Christian letter from the fourth century): ἵνα οὖν μὴ πολλὰ γράφω καὶ φλυαρήσω, ε—ν πολλῇ λαλία οὐκ ε—κφεύξονται τὴν ἁμαρτίην.

³ Anth. Pal. 13.31; Philemon: 0Ω Κλέων, παῦσαι φλυαρω—ν = stop spouting silliness (in Stobaeus, Flor. 30.4; vol. 3, p. 663); Menander, Dysk. 831: "Do not talk nonsense"; 892: "Go s. yourself, you and your stupidities"; Sam. 613, 628, 758: "What is this foolishness?"; 830: "Enough of this foolishness"; 862, 891: "You are talking nonsense to me"; Atticus, frag. 9, 1: Aristotle dared to call the loftiest of beings "twaddle, babble, and silliness" (λήρους δὲ καὶ τερετίσματα καὶ φλυαρίας). This is from the comic vocabulary; cf. Epicharmus, πλάνην, φλυαρίαν (C. Austin, Comicorum Graecorum Fragmenta, n. 84, 28); Eupolis (ibid. 96, 78 = P.Oxy. 2813).

⁴ Philo, Dreams 2.291: "They are only impotent babblers who claim . . ."; Etern. World 49; Spec. Laws 1.176; Philo, Contemp. Life 19: "these people spread endless nonsense." Josephus, Life 150: "I made clear the silliness (τὸν φλύαρον) of their accusation of witchcraft"; Strabo: "Eratosthenes calls the interpreters of the Odyssey and the poet himself babblers" (φλυάρους, Prolegomena 1.2.7; cf. 1.2.3; 1.2.23; φλυαρέω = talk balderdash, 1.2.14; 1.3.1); 4Macc 5:10—"Will you not wake up to the stupidity spouted by your philosophy?"

⁵ 3John 10. Cf. Diogenes Laertius 7.173: τὸν Διόνυσον καὶ Ἡρακλέα φλυαρομένους ὑπὸ τω—ν ποιητω—ν; cf. P.Berlin 13270, 5.

φροντίζω

phrontizo, to think or meditate about, worry about, attend to, take care of phrontizo, S 5431; EDNT 3.440; MM 676; L&N 30.20; BDF §155(7); BAGD 866–867

Those who have placed their trust in God must apply themselves to excelling in good works (hina phrontizosin kalon ergon proïstasthai).¹ It is difficult to translate this present subjunctive. The verb phrontizo, which in the Koine sometimes takes an accusative complement, takes in both the intention and the execution. It means first of all to think on something, to meditate on it, dream about it (PSI 1265, 3: phrontizontes kai pronoian poioumenoi), with connotations of concern² and even of fear or anxiety;³ then “worry about, attend to, take care of,” notably with regard to public affairs.⁴ The word is used for taking things to heart (Ep. Arist. 124) and actively looking after them (Sir 35:1; 41:12) out of an awareness of one’s responsibility to carry through; this is clearly the sense in Titus 3:8.

This is why this verb is used so often in the papyri in official and private letters, especially the aorist imperative phrontison.⁵ In AD 68, the prefect Tiberius Julius Alexander tells those under his jurisdiction, “I have sought means to help you”;⁶ the publication of the edict vouches for the governor’s concern for those under his jurisdiction. The private individuals among them are as urgent as the high officials: “Do not fail to see to it.”⁷ Quick action is required: phrontison eutheos (P.Ryl. 78, 26). The recipient’s attention is required (P.Mert. 63, 14; in AD 5), he is urged to show solicitude and diligence⁸ or be reproached for negligence (“I am amazed that you did not take care . . .”—thaumazo pos ouk ephrontisas tes mechanas tes Talei, P.Mil.Vogl. 256, 3). It is often a matter of supplying what is lacking, finishing what remains to be done, hence seeing that something is completely carried out.⁹ No trouble is spared (ephrontisa ou metrioi, SB 4323, 2), especially when “the law of nature teaches us to take care” of a good father (P.Ryl. 624, 16), to watch over one’s children’s health (P.Rein. 109, 3; PSI 973, 4, 11), to be of service to family and friends (PSI 1246, 1–3; SB 9106, 5; 9395, 12: “take care . . . as dear brothers,” phrontisatai . . . hos adelphoi gnesioi), and to fulfill religious obligations: “taking care that all that was customarily done for the gods should be carried out properly” (Rosetta Stone, SB 8299, 18); “taking much more care than his predecessors with respect to the sacred animals” (ibid., line 31); and in AD 98: “He took care of the temple and the well and the rest of the works” (ephrontise tou hierou kai tou phretos kai ton loipon ergon, SB 8331, 21). It is in this context that the exhortation to effective mutual concern in Titus 3:8 occurs.¹⁰

¹ Titus 3:8. On the construction of this verb introduced by ἵνα (Pap.Lugd.Bat. VI, 15, 108), cf. B. G. Mandilaras, Verb, n. 582, 594; or in the imperative, n. 702, 704, 716, 717; cf. 684, 2; 791, 1.

² Ps 40:17—“Lord, think on me” (Hebrew hashab); Wis 8:17—“having thought about this in my heart”; Sir 8:13—“If you have given your pledge, consider yourself obligated to pay.”

³ 1Sam 9:5—“Lest my father be anxious about us” (Hebrew da’ag); Job 3:25; 23:15 (Hebrew pahad); Prov 31:21 (yara’).

⁴ 1Macc 16:14; 2Macc 4:21; 11:15; Sir 50:4; cf. Ep. Arist. 121—devote oneself to Hellenistic culture; 245: see to looking after these matters;

Josephus, Ant. 14.312: “I will take care of your interests”; Life 94: “This was not the time to be concerned with gaining the affection of the Tiberians”; Polybius 3.12.5: “Those who are in charge of business should take especial care to learn people’s dispositions”; Achilles Tatius 4.9.2: οὐδὲν φροντίζουσα κρύπτειν ὅσα γυνὴ μὴ ὄρα—σθαι θέλει.

⁵ BGU 1772, 25 (57/56 BC); 249, 20; 1568, 9 (the eirenarchos; cf. P.Stras. 309 recto 2); P.Achm. 8, 15: “Take care to put the shipments up for auction” (letter from the imperial procurator to the strategos); Pap.Lugd.Bat. XVI, 34, 26; 35, 35; PSI 1125, 3 (the epitropos); P.Tebt. 762, 11: φρόντισον οὖν περὶ ου—σοι γέγραψα (third century BC); P.Oxy. 2114, 11; UPZ 159, 7: φρόντισον οὖν, ὅπως μὴ ἀδικηθῆ ὁ ἄνθρωπος; P.Yale 38, 5; P.Alex. 1, 8 (official letter concerning provisions for soldiers), φρόντισον ὅπως ἄρτων μὲν ε—κπέσσονται καθ ἡμέραν; P.Ant. 31, 5 (from the logistes to the kosmetes); P.Rein. 91, 4 (from the prefect Maevius Honoratianus), τοιγαροῦν φρόντισον μηδεμίαν μέμψιν; P.Berl.Zill. 3, 6 (from the prefect Minicius Sanctus); 4, 17; P.Corn. 47, 7; P.Panop.Beatty 1, 24, 131, 392, 395; 2, 29, 58, 63, 83, etc.; P.Tebt. 911, 19; P.Ross.Georg. V, 25, 1; SB 7345, 3; 8246, 1; 9025, 32; 9260, 5; 9468, 5; cf. 7622, 11; 8248, 13; 8334, 24; 8933, 2; 7472, 5: ὁ στρατηγὸς φροντιει—.

⁶ Γινώσκητε ὅτι ε—φρόντισα τω—ν πρὸς τὴν ὑμετέραν βοήθειαν ἀνηκόντων (BGU 1563, 19 = Dittenberger, Or. 669). Cf. the edict of the prefect Aristius Optatus: “Let the provincials take care to pay their taxes” (οι—ε—παρχειω—ται φροντισάτωσαν, P.Cair.Isid. 1, 11; cf. 71, 10). The strategos “looked after the paroikoi placed under his command” (I.Rhamn. XIV, 11, p. 209).

⁷ P.Oxy. 1871, 6: μηδὲν οὖν ἀμελήσεις τοῦτο φρόντισον; cf. 1929, 3; 2114, 11; 2153, 14; 2228, 28, 33, 38; P.Princ. 22, 5; 27, 3; 97, 5; P.Mich. 511, 9; 529, 24; P.Oslo 150, 16; O.Bodl. 2001; cf. P.Brem. 76, 5; P.Dura 128 e 1; P.Haun. 9, 7; SB 7984, 10: σὺ οὖν φρόντισον περὶ τούτων; 9256 recto 17–18. P.Grenf. II, 77, 15: φροντίσατε οὖν τὰ ἀναλωθέντα ε—τοιμάσαι.

⁸ Εὖ ποιήσεις νῦν γε φροντίσας αὐτὴν παραγενέσθαι, P.Mil.Vogl. 27, col. II, 12; cf. P.Mich. 211, 2: “You will do well to see to our affairs” (καλω—ς ποιήσητε φροντίσαντες τω—ν ἡμετέρων); 476, 14; 481, 16; 486, 21; 601, 13: σὺ οὖν καλω—ς ποίσεις φροντίσας ὡς οὐ περισπασθησόμεθα (second century BC); UPZ 73, 4: καλω—ς οὖν ποίσης φροντίσαι μοι σιτάριον; 110, 149; 202, frag. II, 3; P.Michael. 11, 6; cf. P.Apoll. 68, 6: οὐκ ἔχει ἄλλον τι νῦν φροντίζοντα τω— δεσπότη αὐτοῦ; P.Tebt. 703, 99: μὴ παρέργως φρόντιζε (third century BC); PSI 742, 13: φρόντισον . . . κατὰ τάχους.

⁹ C.P.Herm. 32, 19: εἰ— δὲ καὶ ἠ—τον φροντίζω τῆς βεβαιώσεως = P.Michael. 40, 46; 45, 56; 52, 24; P.Ant. 91, 14: φροντίσαι τω—ν λοιπῶ—ν ὑπολειφθέντων ἡμι—ν πραγμάτων; 188, 7.

¹⁰ εὐδοδῶρου νεωτέρου φροντίζοντος = Theodorus the younger being curator (CII 723; B. Lifshitz, Synagogues juives, n. 2); “I Theodorus, chief synagogue ruler, having been in charge for four years (φροντίσας)” (CII 722; B. Lifshitz, n. 1).

φω—ς, φωστήρ, φωσφόρος, φωτεινός, φωτίζω, φωτισμός phos, light; phoster, light-giver, luminary; phosphoros, morning star, dawn; photeinos, luminous; photizo, to shine, give light, illuminate, enlighten, baptize; photismos, lighting, illumination, baptism

see also φωσφόρος

phos, S 5457; TDNT 9.310–358; EDNT 3.447–448; NIDNTT 2.490, 493, 496; MM 680; L&N 2.5, 6.102, 11.14, 14.36, 28.64; BDF §126(1*b*); BAGD 871–872 | phoster, S 5458; TDNT 9.310–358; EDNT 3.448–449; NIDNTT 2.490, 493; MM 680; L&N 1.27, 14.49; BAGD 872 | phosphoros, S 5459; TDNT 9.310–358; EDNT 3.449; NIDNTT 2.490, 493, 495; MM 680; L&N 1.32; BAGD 872 | photeinos, S 5460; TDNT 9.310–358; EDNT 3.449; NIDNTT 2.490, 493; MM 680; L&N 14.50, 14.51; BAGD 872 | photizo, S 5461; TDNT 9.310–358; EDNT 3.449–450; NIDNTT 2.490, 493–495; MM 680–681; L&N 14.39, 28.36; BDF §74(1); BAGD 872–873 | photismos, S 5462; TDNT 9.310–358; EDNT 4.450; NIDNTT 2.490, 493; MM 681; L&N 28.36, 72.3; BAGD 873; ND 1.98–99

The first attestations of “light” (phaos, which contracts to phos)—and this remains constant—place it in relation with its source, the sun: “When the brilliant light (lampron phaos) of the sun had set” (Homer, Il. 1.605); “the sun, whose light is the most penetrating to see” (oxytaton phaos);¹ “Hail, fatherland; hail, light of the sun” (Aeschylus, Ag. 508); “the night will always hide the light of the sun under its cloak of stars” (Aeschylus, PV 23). Associated with the sun are the heavenly bodies that are luminous:² “the light of the heavenly bodies enables us to see as clearly as possible and provides that visible objects are seen.”³ The light of the moon is always a disputed topic. According to Plato, the heir of Thales, “the moon receives its light from the sun.”⁴ For Epicurus, “it can be supposed that the moon derives its light from itself, but it can also be supposed that it gets it from the sun” (Epicurus, Epist. 2.94). Cleomedes (2.101, 104) thinks that the two causes may operate simultaneously. In any event, “no object is visible without light, but every color that is in each object is visible in the light.”⁵

Phaos is used especially for daylight.⁶ To express a being's entry into life, the Greeks say that he has been brought to day, that he appears in the light.⁷ "To see the light" (horan phaos) is synonymous with "to live"; "to leave the light" (leipein phaos) is to die: "I will not much longer see the brilliant light of the sun";⁸ "Never will you be able to harm either me or anyone who sees the light" (Sophocles, OT 374; cf. 1229); "Ajax no longer sees the light" = he is dead (Phil. 415); the wife of Admetus "consented to die for him and to see the light no longer."⁹

Of course, light can have earthly sources: people, lamps, torches,¹⁰ especially fire.¹¹ We must emphasize—because knowing this is indispensable for the understanding of Matt 6:23; Luke 11:34-35—that beginning with Euclid, treatises on optical geometry do not represent vision as involving the reflection of light from the things we see onto our retinas but rather attribute an active role to the eye. Vision is a movement of the eye toward things; the eye emits rays that are propagated along a straight line,¹² a sort of invisible fire. This is why Homer could call the eyes "beautiful lights" (phaea kala, Od. 16.15; cf. Il. 16.645), Plato could state that "the eye is the most sunlike of all the sense organs" (Resp. 6.508 b), and Empedocles could compare the eyes to lanterns with linen linings (frag. 84, 3; Diels 7). To speak of disturbed vision, Philostratus writes of "the light in the eyes" (to en ophthalmois phos, Gym. 14), and for the blinding of the Cyclops, Euripides writes, "Say who must be first to take the fiery stake and burn out the light of the Cyclops."¹³

We might say that, for a Greek, light is the most excellent of all realities; the attributes given it are suggestive: holy (phaos hieron, Hesiod, Op. 339; P. Warr. 21, 30 and 34; Pap. Graec. Mag. I, 4, 978), pure (hagnon, Sophocles, El. 86; katharon, Pindar, Pyth. 9.90; Aratus, Phaen. 1013), sweet,¹⁴ joyous,¹⁵ most beloved (philtaton; Sophocles, El. 1224, 1354; BGU 597), heavenly or divine.¹⁶ Its benefits are evoked by figurative meanings. Light is a symbol of strength, protection, happiness, glory, salvation in the common sense of that term: Ajax bests a Trojan battalion and "made salvation shine on his friends" (phoos etheken, Il. 6.6); "continue to strike so, and you shall become a light (of salvation) for the Danaans and for your father."¹⁷ The victors' procession at the Olympic games is "the most enduring light of honor that the exploits of the mighty receive" (Pindar, Ol. 4.10); "victory, light of life and reward for exploits" (10.23); "the light of glory has shined for you."¹⁸

Given that light shines and makes perceptible what was unknown or indiscernible in the darkness, it is understood metaphorically for knowledge. "He must explain in plain light what he means" (Sophocles, Phil. 581); "to bring to light" (Plato, Phdr. 261 e; Leg. 4.724 a; 7.788 c; phos opposed to skotos). Aristotle: "What sight is to the body, mind is to the soul" (hos gar en somati opsis, en psyche nous, Eth. Nic. 1.4.1096b28ff.). Knowledge is an illumination of the mind, a progression from darkness to light (Plutarch, De audiendo 17; Cons. ux. 8); hence the introduction of phos into the philosophical vocabulary.¹⁹

But since in Homer light characterizes the world of the gods,²⁰ phos comes to mean a divine manifestation²¹ and to take a dominant place in worship. Thus the sun is adored, notably at dawn;²² Isis, for example, is associated with the rising sun, which spreads light.²³ Because light chases demons away, it plays a role in the cult of the dead²⁴ and also in the mysteries, like those of Eleusis,²⁵ because healing is attributed to a flood of light, a divine epiphany.²⁶ Here again, phos and zoe (life) are inseparable.

In the OT, phos (Hebrew ’ôr) is used with the same subjects and meanings,²⁷ but this is no longer poetry. Light becomes a fundamental religious reality; by virtue of its symbolism, it will direct human moral life; with the prophets and psalmists, it plays a dominant role in the religion of Israel. It would be difficult to exaggerate the importance of the first page of revelation, which opens with the creation of light: “There was darkness upon the face of the Abyss. . . . Elohim said, ‘Let there be light,’ and there was light. Elohim saw that the light was good, and Elohim separated the light from the darkness. Elohim called the light day and he called the darkness night.”²⁸ Thus, from the beginning, the true God presents himself as creator of the light that dominates (Hebrew memshelet) and pierces the darkness (2Cor 4:6), so that one speaks not only of the “light of heaven” but of the “light of God.”²⁹ With the plagues of Egypt, we know that God retains his mastery and disposes light and darkness as he sees fit.³⁰

Furthermore, the light belongs to God: “light dwells with him” (Dan 2:22), and the expression “the light of his face” occurs (Ps 4:6; 89:15), probably to express his helpful kindness. But if God is “clothed with honor and majesty, cloaked with light as with a garment” (Ps 104:2; Hab 3:4), his transcendency and holiness are in view; light evokes the impalpable and the spiritual. This is suggested by the immaterial wisdom that is “a reflection of the eternal light (photos aidiou), spotless mirror of God’s activity” (Wis 7:26ff.). God who is light is still asked to send and give his light.³¹ It is through light that humans and God communicate and are united; they become like him to the extent that they are luminous.³² Jesus will use the expression “son of light” (Luke 16:8; John 12:36; cf. 4:23-24).

In addition, Isaiah multiplies promises of light, exhorts Israel to “walk in the light of Yahweh” (2:5; cf. Bar 4:2), and prophesies that the Messiah will be the light that will save the world: “I have destined you to be the covenant of the people, to be the light of the nations, to open the blind eyes. . . .”³³ In the view of the faithful person, security is walking to God’s light, that is, in conformity with his will: “Your word is a lamp to my feet, a light upon my path” (Ps 119:105); “the light of the Lord is the path that the wise person follows.”³⁴ So this light is a religious and moral knowledge (Hos 10:12—phos gnoseos; Hebrew nîr). “Wisdom makes instruction shine forth like light” (Sir 24:27). These meanings are expressed also by the relatively rare verb photizo,³⁵ which is sometimes transitive, indicating that a source of light illuminates an object,³⁶ sometimes intransitive, “to shine,” that is, to emit light.³⁷ Thus, in the LXX, “a person’s wisdom makes his face shine”;³⁸ but in Judg 13:8, 23, this verb means to illuminate intellectually, to instruct, that is, to make to know the truth, to bring to light what is hidden.³⁹ It is repeated that “God lightens our eyes” (2Esdr 9:8; Ps 13:3; 19:9; Sir 34:17; Bar 1:12); “the Lord is a light to me” (Mic 7:8); “you light my lamp, O Yahweh; my God illumines my darkness” (Ps 18:28); “the unfolding of your words gives light, giving understanding to the simple.”⁴⁰

Philo, fed on Scripture, is a lover of the light.⁴¹ He is the one who created the definition, “God is light” (ho theos phos esti).⁴² He understands the creation of light—on “day one” (Gen 1:3-5), before the sun—to mean incorporeal and intelligible light, the model of all the luminous stars, surpassing visible light in luminosity and brilliance (Creation 29–31). Since God is the spiritual sun who lightens the soul (Virtues 164), the Therapeutai ask at daybreak “that the heavenly light fill their souls” (Contemp. Life 27). No one insisted more than Philo on this “incorporeal light” (Conf. Tongues 61; Dreams 1.113), “sacred light” (Spec. Laws 1.288), “divine light” (Migr. Abr. 39; Heir 264; Dreams 2.74), designated also as “light of the soul” (Alleg. Interp. 3.167; Worse Attacks Better 117) or “light of thought” (Unchang. God 3), “light of the spirit” (Spec. Laws 1.288), which is nothing other than “the light of truth” (Unchang. God 96; Alleg. Interp. 3.45; Decalogue 138; Joseph 68: phos he aletheia) or wisdom.⁴³ As much as ignorance destroys the faculties of seeing and hearing, keeping the light from penetrating it to show it what is (Drunkenness 157), so much does “the heavy reason of the divine lights” (ton metarsion kai enkymona theion photon logon, Alleg. Interp. 3.104; Abraham 119) send its own light and perceive everything (Post. Cain 57; Worse Attacks Better 128). St. Paul specifies, “the spiritual person judges all things.”⁴⁴

In the Gospels, the word “light,” used almost always in a religious sense,⁴⁵ cannot be understood except in terms of the OT; but it is applied to Christ and his disciples in such a way that Christianity may be defined as a religion of the light. In the first place, Jesus realizes the promises of light. When Simeon identifies Jesus with the “light to lighten the nations” (phos eis apokalypsin ethnon, Luke 2:32), he is referring to Isa 49:6; it is his understanding that the son of Mary brings truth, goodness, happiness. Since he comes as illuminator, he will publish, manifest, make known God and God’s will. This publishing and this brightness were perceived by the Galileans: “The people who were sitting in darkness have seen a great light (phos mega), and upon those who were sitting in the region of the shadow of death a light has arisen” (Matt 4:16)—a quotation of the messianic prophecy of Isa 9:1, which identifies the light with the person of Jesus: phos aneteilen autois.⁴⁶ Still more decisive is the transfiguration, when the face of Jesus shone like the sun and his garments “became white (resplendent, brilliant) like the light” (leuka hos to phos, Matt 17:2). It is the divinity of Jesus, his glory, that reflects on his body and attests his divine sonship (2Pet 1:17).

St. John is even more insistent, especially in the prologue to his Gospel, and will have it understood that phos applied to Christ is to be taken in its literal sense, not with a metaphorical meaning: “the life was the light of men” (John 1:4). Ps 35:10 and Bar 3:14 had already linked life and light. In effect, with regard to spiritual beings, life is light.⁴⁷ This has to do with the pre-incarnate Logos, but at a stage later than the creation, since there are human beings. Divine help is indispensable for knowledge. John 1:5 specifies, “The light (of the Logos) shone in the darkness, and the darkness did not comprehend it.” Shining in obscurity, the light illuminates the path and guides humans, who may advance; but the darkness did not “seize” it, did not appropriate it and did not understand it intellectually. There is an allusion to the creation of the light, which dissipated the darkness of the primeval chaos, but this illumination is continuously renewed in the spiritual world. This can mean—but does not necessarily mean—the illumination by the gospel (the verb phainei is a durative present, cf. 1John 2:8). In opposition is evoked the historic attitude of humans when the light of Christ shone among the Jews: darkness, an abstract term, almost synonymous with hostility (John 12:35, 46), as pejorative as at Qumran, posing a radical antithesis to the divine world. John 1:9 resumes more clearly: “The true light, which lightens every human being, was coming into the world.”⁴⁸ The present participle erchomenon,⁴⁹ predicate to the verb en, is determinative with regard to time: the incarnate Logos was arriving, coming, advancing, on his way. This is an absolute and perfect spiritual light (as opposed to sensible light), intended for every human (Isa 42:6), and thus destined to light the whole universe. To put it clearly, this is the Revealer of God par excellence,⁵⁰ as the conclusion of the prologue (John 1:18) expressly says. These are not gratuitous words of the evangelist, but the ipsissima verba of the Lord.⁵¹ No human being could have claimed such a prerogative.

To be light is to illuminate, to radiate, and there are degrees of illumination. There are lights that are lighted before they in turn begin to give light. This is the case with Jesus’ disciples: “You are the light of the world (for the world, hymeis este to phos tou kosmou). Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works and glorify the Father who is in heaven.”⁵² As lamps, the disciples, following their master, must shed light, that is, they must reveal God to people; this is what they will do as disciples by manifesting through their lives and their works the will of God,⁵³ to whom they subject themselves, thus glorifying God.

All human attitudes toward Jesus are defined as an encounter between two lights. Christ and his revelation are like a brilliant sun that illuminates, but the eye of the soul—which emits rays (cf. above)—must be in good condition to receive the light. So the whole problem is to guarantee the quality of the organ of sight, to have good eyes for discerning God in Jesus: “The light of your body is the eye. When your eye is simple, your whole body is lighted; but if it is bad, your body also is dark. See then that the light that is in you (to phos to en soi) is not darkness. If then your whole body is lighted . . . how much will it be wholly lighted when the lamp, by its brightness, illuminates you.”⁵⁴ The precondition for receiving the divine light is thus a heart that is well disposed, purified, and rightly oriented; it is ready to meet what it is looking for and with which it will couple.⁵⁵ Is knowledge not an assimilation of something new from outside?

In addition, in his last appeal to the chosen people, the Lord exhorts them to flee their darkness: “The Light is with you a little longer. Walk while you have the light, lest the darkness overtake you; for the one who walks in darkness does not know where he is going. While you have the light, believe in the light, so as to be sons of light (huioi photos).”⁵⁶ The process of judgment for each one is this: “The light came into the world, and people preferred darkness to the light, because their works were evil. For whoever does evil hates the light and does not come to the light, lest his works be known for what they are. But the one who does the truth comes to the light, so that his works are manifested as done in God” (John 3:19-21). The root of clear unbelief in Jesus is a refusal of his light, a preference for darkness, by virtue of a moral inclination (wealth, luxury, ambition, vainglory). After the fashion of criminals, who choose the night for carrying out their misdeeds so as to remain unknown, those who do evil dread the light, which will unveil their guilt and condemn them. They deliberately choose darkness. On the other hand, the one who practices the truth, that is, who remains faithful (Gen 47:29; Neh 9:33; Isa 26:10) and does what is good, comes to the light that he loves, hence to Christ, who is light: “whoever proceeds from the truth hears my voice” (John 18:37). Thus the love of moral good predisposes one to faith, especially since good works cannot be accomplished without God’s help (Isa 26:12; Phil 2:13). We may conclude: salvation is realized through faithfulness to the light; perdition results from the refusal to love the truth (2Thess 2:10).

The other writings of the NT attest that the theme of light was not only commonly evoked in catechesis but was also a major chapter in the first Christian theology.⁵⁷ This theology is based especially on the OT and constantly contrasts light and darkness, after the fashion of the Qumran sect, but it also wishes to make clear over against paganism that God is pure spirit. Furthermore, St. John, who warns, “Keep yourselves from idols” (1John 5:21), is the same one who states, “This is the message that we have heard from him (Jesus Christ) and that we announce to you, namely, that God is light and in him there is no darkness at all.”⁵⁸ St. James had already designated God as “Father of lights,” knowing that the concept was current among his readers;⁵⁹ but it was St. Paul who in the twilight of his life would give the most fully worked out idea, for the benefit of the converted pagans of Ephesus: God, “the only possessor of immortality, dwelling in inaccessible light which no human has ever seen or can see. To him be honor and eternal power. Amen.”⁶⁰ It is a fundamental article of the faith of Israel that no mortal can see God,⁶¹ who is inaccessible because he belongs to another world (Ps 104:2; Job 37:21-24; Ezek 1:28; Dan 2:22). An eternal being whom death cannot touch, he is located in light in order to express first of all his spirituality (God is spirit, John 4:24); then his transcendence, or better, his divinity; and finally his glory, blessedness, power—and immortality.

Like Simeon (Luke 2:32), who cites Isa 49:6, St. Paul recalls that Christ was to “announce the light to the people” (Acts 26:23). But it is as “first in the resurrection of the dead” that he is the author of this illumination, which is not limited to Israel but extends to the Gentiles. In order to do this, he raises up his apostle, Paul,⁶² who conceives his ministry as the spreading of the light, as victory over darkness.⁶³ The salvation of each soul lies in accepting him by faith. In an admirable but difficult text, Paul refers this spiritual re-creation to the first creation of light.⁶⁴ The gospel is light to the highest degree, the lightning-flash of God’s glory: “The God who said, ‘Let light shine in the midst of darkness,’ is the one who has shined in our hearts to shed light by the knowledge of the glory of God [shining] on the face of Christ.”⁶⁵ It is not the preacher, his person or ideas, that sheds light, but God. The same God who at the beginning brought forth light out of darkness and whose reflection shone in an external way on the face of Moses is also the one who has shone in a spiritual way in the soul, or better, “in the heart” of Paul—that is, in the most intimate and invisible way (cf. Gal 1:16—he revealed his Son in me). Hence this illumination is for the purpose of shining out, so that the apostle may be able to radiate around himself: pros photismon. The interior light is so fulsome that it diffuses a knowledge, that of “the glory of God” which shines on the face of Christ. This is the gospel. The Pauline apostolate is the diffusion of this light.

In his first epistle, after the fashion of Jesus (Luke 16:8), St. Paul characterizes believers as “sons of the light and of the day.”⁶⁶ According to what precedes, we should read literally, “begotten by God, who is light,” but also thus: You are henceforth luminous, and this is the basis for a whole spirituality, because operatio sequitur esse, doing follows being; since the baptized participate in the nature of God and are illuminated by the gospel, they must conduct themselves as beings who are victorious over the darkness; that is, they must produce the fruits of all the virtues; their divine nature must be manifest in the eyes of all, so that all will be drawn in and pulled along by this dazzling wake; this is their constant theme of thankfulness to God: “Formerly you were darkness (ignorant and sinful), but now you are light in the Lord. Conduct yourselves, then, as children of light (as luminous creatures), because the fruit of this light consists in all goodness, righteousness, and truth.”⁶⁷ Given the realism and the holiness of this begetting by the light, we can see that it is forbidden for Christians to make compacts with paganism and its mores; on the religious level, no syncretism is possible. There is a radical incompatibility between phos and skotos (darkness): “Do not be unequally yoked with unbelievers! What participation (metoche) is there between righteousness and iniquity, or what is there in common (koinonia) between light and darkness? What accord (sumphonesis) is there between Christ and Belial?”⁶⁸ St. Peter and St. John remind the disciples that they were “called from darkness to the admirable (or marvelous, thaumastos) light of God” (1Pet 2:9), and that in living according to this light, according to revealed truth and holiness, they are in communion with one another (1John 1:7). To be baptized is to be in the light; to abide in the light is to be faithful to the precept of brotherly love, which sums up the whole of gospel ethics. Hence: “The true light is already shining. The one who says that he is in the light (en to photi einai) and hates his brother is still in darkness. The one who loves his brother abides in the light (en to photi menei) and there is no scandal in him”;⁶⁹ he shows himself to be an authentic child of God, who is light and love; nothing will make him stumble, because “whoever abides in him does not sin” (1John 3:6), does not make a compact with the darkness.

The last book of the Bible evokes the conquests of the gospel, the universality of the redeemed, who are illuminated by revelation and are on a pilgrimage to the celestial city.⁷⁰ Finally—this is the last prophecy—the servants of God will see his face: “There will be no more night, and they will not need the light of a torch or the light of the sun, because the Lord God will shed his light on them, and they will reign forever and ever.”⁷¹ No philosophy or theology of light has achieved such richness, such homogeneity, or such splendor.⁷² It is Christianity that has given phos its eternal title of nobility.

Photizein. — All the NT occurrences of this word are religious. The subject is always God,⁷³ Christ,⁷⁴ an angel (Rev 18:1), or St. Paul: “It has been given to me to bring to light the dispensation of the mystery” (Eph 3:9). Two texts have considerable importance. The first concerns the realization of salvation that “has been manifested (phanerotheisan) now by the appearing (dia tes epiphaneias) of our Savior Christ Jesus . . . bringing to light (photisantos) life and incorruptibility through the gospel” (2Tim 1:10). Resurrected and luminous, Christ rising from the tomb makes life and incorruptibility shine forth from his person before communicating them to others. This luminescence is precisely that of religious epiphanies; an epiphaneia is the glittering apparition of a divinity who showers favors.⁷⁵ The second text is Heb 6:4, “those who have once been illumined and tasted the heavenly gift”; the aorist passive participle (tous photisthentas) designates the baptized, as the Peshitta understood in substituting “those who have gone down for baptism.”⁷⁶ Faith and baptism are, in effect, an introduction of light into the world; believers are illumined by God and concerning God;⁷⁷ having received the knowledge of the truth, they were snatched from the satanic realm of darkness. In Rev 21:23, “the glory of God” illumines the heavenly Jerusalem and its inhabitants (22:5).

Phoster. — Literally, this noun designates “what gives light,” hence a light-bearer, a luminary, “what illumines.”⁷⁸ In the LXX (representing the Hebrew maôr) it applies exclusively to the sun and the moon, the luminaries of heaven (Gen 1:14, 16; Wis 13:2; Sir 43:7). So when St. Paul declares to the Philippians, “You appear as luminaries in the world” (phainesthe hos phosteres en kosmo, Phil 2:15), we may understand him to mean, “You shine like torches in the world,” after the fashion of the stars that light the night, or, without reference to the heavenly world, “You shine like hearths of light” as witnesses to the gospel, whose light shines in the darkness of an evil world. This meaning would be preferable, since the “children of God” named here are not themselves light but are bearers of the divine light. In any event, their calling is to illuminate the ignorant and the errant. But the apostle would seem to be inspired by Dan 12:3—“Those who are wise will shine like the splendor of the firmament (phanousin hos phosteres tou ouranou), and those who have turned many to righteousness, like the stars (hosei ta astra tou ouranou) forever and ever.” If this is the case, phoster (Hebrew zohar) means luminous brilliance.⁷⁹ This is the certain meaning in Rev 21:11, where the heavenly Jerusalem has in itself the glory of God: “Its brilliance (ho phoster autes) is like a very precious stone, like a stone of crystalline jasper.”⁸⁰ This luminosity, which is an effect of the divine presence, would be “his testimony, his teaching, his sacraments, the virtues of his saints” (E. B. Allo).

Phosphoros. — 2Pet 1:19 commands Christians to cling to the “prophetic word,”⁸¹ which is “like a shining lamp (hos lychno phainonti) in a dark place until day breaks and dawn⁸² arises in your hearts.” The Messiah was expected as a light (Isa 60:1-3; cf. 1John 2:8); his first coming could then be considered like a dawn⁸³ whose brightness only increases until his glorious return. Already this parousia radiates in hearts and makes them live in hope, thanks to the prophets who provide certitude concerning it.

The use of the biblical hapax phosphoros can be justified in two ways. If the term usually designates the morning star,⁸⁴ here it is used metaphorically, a usage well attested in the papyri⁸⁵ and especially in Philo: “The intelligible rays come from God the light-bearer” (tou phosphorou theou, Drunkenness 44); “those who show themselves obedient to the oracles will live continuously in a light without shadow, bearing these laws in their souls, like so many stars that illumine it” (asteras phosphorountas).⁸⁶ Moreover, phosphoros was an epithet of numerous divinities. In a hymn from the first-second century, a greeting to all the gods: phosphore chaire megiste.⁸⁷ It is especially the goddesses Artemis and Hecate that are honored with this title;⁸⁸ so also the planet Venus, which precedes the sun: “the Torch of the day, the dawn . . . chasing the stars” (Euripides, Ion 1157; cf. IA 20; Hel. 569); “rise . . . the luminous star has come” (phosphoros aster).⁸⁹ 2Pet thus uses phosphoros to specify the heavenly and divine nature of the light that illuminates the whole Christian life.

Photismos. — This abstract noun, derived from photizo, means “lighting, illumination” and is an astronomical technical term for the radiance of the moon, the reflection of the sun’s light by the moon. Astronomy asks about the waxing and waning of the light of the moon (peri photismon selenes) and seeks its origin.⁹⁰ This privileged meaning appears in the LXX, where out of six occurrences of photismos three have to do with the night (Job 3:9; Ps 78:14; 139:11; cf. Aratus, Phaen. 470ff., 775ff., 791). The other three apply to God: “The Lord is my light and my Savior” (Kyrios photismos mou kai soter mou, Ps 27:1; 44:3; 90:8); but it is still a question of a luminosity that is received, refracted. Thus do we understand the splendor of the preaching of the gospel in 2Cor 4:4, 6: ton photismon tou euangeliou . . . pros photismon tes gnoseos.⁹¹ The apostle is a light-bearer, because the content of the gospel is Christ glorified, and the preacher causes this doxa (glory) to radiate, or propagates the “knowledge of the glory of God [which] shines out on the face of Christ.” Here again, this brightness is a reflection: just as the light of the sun is reflected by the moon, and the glory of God by the face of Moses, so also does the divine doxa shine out upon the glorified Christ, and the apostle makes it shine in the ears of his hearers (cf. 2Pet 1:16).

Since the baptized are photisthentes (Heb 6:4; 10:32; cf. the variant readings ebaptisen/ephotisen in the Acts Thom. 25), St. Justin calls baptism photismos (1 Apol. 61.12; 65.1; Dial. 122.5), and Clement of Alexandria calls it photisma.⁹²

¹ Homer, Il. 14.345; cf. 8.485: “The brilliant light of the sun set over the ocean, bringing dark night over the land”; 23.154; Homer, Od. 16.220; 21.226; 3.335: “the light of the sun had already passed under the West”; P.Oxy. 2554, frag. III, 14: ἡλιακὸν φω—ς. Cf. G. P. Wetter, Phos, Leipzig, 1915; R. Bultmann, “Zur Geschichte der Lichtsymbolik im Altertum,” in Exegetica, Tübingen, 1967, pp. 323–355; C. Mugler, “La Lumière et la vision dans la poésie grecque,” in REG, 1960, pp. 40–72; C. Mugler, Terminologie optique, pp. 432ff.

² Late writers (Philoponus, Pappus of Alexandria) call them τὰ φω—τα; a plural that applies to lamps in BGU 909, 16.

³ Plato, Resp. 6.508 a; cf. Theophrastus, Sens. 54: “perhaps the sun causes the formation of the image in the eye by carrying light in its rays to the organ of sight, as Democritus seems to say”; cf. Pindar, Ol. 10.74; Pyth. 3.75; Eusebius, Praep. Evang. 3.13.2.

⁴ Plato, Cra. 409 b; Ps.-Plutarch, De plac. philos. 2.27; cf. Plutarch, De fac. 5: “it is not possible for a shadow to remain on the surface of the lunar orb when the sun with its light illuminates absolutely all that our view cuts off of the moon”; 2.16: “There is a thickness to the moon that keeps the light of the sun from passing through it to us” (theory of Posidonius and Cleomedes, 2.105–106). The world of light is above (De gen. 22).

⁵ Aristotle, De An. 2.7.418b2; cf. 418b9: “light is the presence of fire in the transparent”; 419a8 and 23; Theophrastus, Sens. 27; Plutarch, De prim. frig. 952 f: air is the first element to share the light of the sky. Daybreak is distinguished from evening (ε—σπέρας), Plutarch, Arist. 15.2; cf. De gen. 22: light diversifies according to variations in color.

⁶ Homer, Il. 15.669; 17.647; Od. 21.428; 23.371: “day was already spread across the land, but Athena enveloped them in a veil of night” so that Ulysses and his companions could escape.

⁷ Thanks to a divinity; Homer, Il. 2.308; 16.187; 19.103, 118; Hesiod, Th. 669; Pindar, Ol. 6.44; Aeschylus, Pers. 222, 261. An institution that is in the process of being formed is said not yet to have seen the light of the sun (Plato, Resp. 5.473 e).

⁸ Homer, Il. 5.119; cf. 18.11: “the bravest of the Myrmidons would leave the light of the sun”; 18.61; 18.442: “while he remains alive and sees the light of the sun”; Od. 4.883; 14.44; 20.207; Hesiod, Th. 157; Aristophanes, Ach. 1185; P.Lond. 1917, 7: “humble servant, unworthy to stand up to the light of the sun”; SB 8230, 26. In the magical tablets, it is requested that the victim be denied the light (μη φωτός); Dittenberger, Syl. 1240, 20.

⁹ Euripides, Alc. 18; cf. 122, 282, 1076: “the dead cannot return to the light”; Hel. 60: “For as long as Proteus saw the light of the sun (= while he lived) I was respected”; Euripides, Hipp. 56, 355, 905; Hec. 668, 703. So the light is not only the source of vision, but also its object; cf. the epitaph of Catilius: “Examine me well, who follow the lines of a skillful mortal” (τὸν εὐτέχνου φωτὸς στίχον, E. Bernand, Philae, vol. 2, n. 143, 1).

¹⁰ Homer, Od. 18.317: “I myself will take the duty of giving the light to all of them”; 19.24, 33: “from her golden lamp Pallas Athena made a great light before them”; Aeschylus, Ag. 292: the watch-lights alerted the guards;

Longus, Daph. 2.2: the dry willow is used at night for torches (ὕπὸ φωτί) for the transport of must. Cf. lights of windows, φω—τα θυρίδων (P.Lond. 1179, 62; P.Mil.Vogl. 99, 12); BGU 909, 15: ε—πελθόντες . . . τῆ ἡμετέρα οι—κία καὶ φω—τα ε—πενενκόντες ε—νέπρησαν αὐτὴν ε—κ θεματίου; 1201, 10: εὕρωμεν τὰς θύρας τοῦ ι—εροῦ Σαράπειδος θεοῦ μεγίστου ὑψημένας φωτί (synonym of πυρί or φλογί; AD 2; cf. Mark 14:54). Cf. φω—ς ε—ποίει, light the fires (Xenophon, Hell. 6.2.29); φω—ς ἔχων (Hell. 5.1.8; Cyr. 7.5.27); Plutarch, Ant. 26.6; Pel. 12.3: “lights shone in the houses.”

¹¹ Aeschylus, Cho. 863: “a fire and light for freedom” (ἦ πῦρ καὶ φω—ς ε—πε—λευθερία); Ag. 310: “light from the fire of Aetna”; Euripides, IA 733: the light of the fire; Plato, Resp. 7.514 b; Tim. 58 c. Cf. Mark 14:64.

¹² Ὀψις refers to the organ of sight as well as to the visual flow and ray; cf. C. Mugler, Archimède, vol. 4, Paris, 1972, p. 213 (citing p. 207, the commentary of Theon of Alexandria, In Alm. 1.3); C. Mugler, “Sur une polémique scientifique dans Aristophane,” in REG, 1959, pp. 58ff. A. Lejeune, Recherches sur la catoptrique grecque, Brussels, 1957; above all, H. D. Betz, “Matthew VI, 22 f and Ancient Greek Theories of Vision,” in Text and Interpretation: Studies in the N.T. Presented to M. Black, Cambridge, 1979, pp. 43–56. W. Deonna, Le Symbolisme de l’œil, Bern, 1965, pp. 144ff.

¹³ Euripides, Cyc. 633; cf. Ion 188: “the beautiful light of the eyes in the twin faces”; Pindar, Nem. 10.39: “I would esteem myself worthy to live in Argus without hiding the light of my eyes”; Theophrastus, Sens. 8, 25, 26; Plutarch, Quaest. conv. 1.7.2 f: “When the visual flow radiated by our eyes as cones reaches a greater distance, they fuse and reunite their light”; 5.7; cf. De gen. 10: the daemon of Socrates “gave him, it seems, to serve him as a guide in life, a kind of sight (ὄψις) that alone going out before him would illuminate him.”

¹⁴ Homer, Od. 16.23: “Telemachus, sweet light” (γλυκερὸν φ.); J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1960, p. 210, n. 445; μελίχιον φ. (IGLS 1599, 2; G. Kaibel, Epigrammata, 618, 35).

¹⁵ Ἰλαρον, Aristophanes, Ran. 455. Phos is synonymous with the shining out of joy, cf. Aeschylus, Pers. 300: “With what a shining light your words fill my house.” A woman is called τὸ φω—ς τῆς οι—κίας (Dittenberger, Syl. 1238, 2); cf. P.Ryl. 77, 34: μιμοῦ τὸν πατέρα τὸν φιλότιμον γέροντα φω—τα. F. J. Dölger, Lumen Christi, Paris, 1958, pp. 35ff.

¹⁶ Sophocles, Ant. 944: οὐράνιον φ.; Euripides, Bacch. 1083: φω—ς σεμνοῦ πυρός; Diogenes Laertius 8.68.

¹⁷ Homer, Il. 8.282; cf. 11.797; 16.39; 15.741: “the light of salvation is in our hands, not in a slackening of the war”; Od. 16.23; 17.41, 615; F. J. Dölger, Sol Salutis, Münster, 1920.

¹⁸ Pindar, Nem. 3.84; cf. 4.37; Aeschylus, Pers. 300; Sophocles, Ant. 599–600. At Baalbek, an acclamation links ζωή, ὑγία, φω—ς (IGLS 2837); at Rome, φω—ς, ζωή, βίος (IGUR, n. 411).

¹⁹ Cf. Conzelmann, “φω—ς,” in TDNT, vol. 9, pp. 314–315. In Parmenides, but especially in Plato, to be in the truth is to be in the light (Resp. 7.517 b–c; 518 c); “One must open the soul’s eye and look up toward being, which gives light to all things” (7.540 a; cf. SB 8003, 7: it is God who gives light = understanding); Aristotle, De An. 3.5.430a14ff.; “the intellect that is able to become all things is like a kind of state (ὡς ἕξις τις, οἶον τὸ φω—ς).” W. Beierwaltes, Lux intelligibilis: Untersuchungen zur Lichtmetaphysik der Griechen, Munich, 1957.

²⁰ Homer, Od. 6.45: the gods inhabit Olympus, whose summit shines white; commented on by Ps.-Aristotle, Mund. 6.400a6ff. (“Olympus [ὄλυμπον] is all light [ὀλολαμπῆ], apart from all darkness”) and by Plutarch, Per. 39.2.

²¹ Aelius Aristides 28.114; 38.23 (cf. Acts 9:3). It is the light of the gods of heaven that “makes our eyes see as perfectly as possible” (Plato, Resp. 6.508 a).

²² Cf. A. J. Festugière, Dieu inconnu, p. 245. In the East, the divinity Luna is venerated (labanah = the white; cf. M. J. Lagrange, Etudes sur les religions sémitiques, Paris, 1905, pp. 91, 96, 128, 450ff., 500). The historians of religion note the importance of the cult of the light in the Avesta, in Iran, among the Mandaeans, in Gnosticism, Manichaeism, in Mithraism, in the cult of Hermes Trismegistus, etc. Cf. Conzelmann, “φω—ς,” in TDNT, vol. 9, pp. 316–343. H. Bidez, F. Cumont, Les Mages hellénisés, Paris, 1938, vol. 2, pp. 72–79, and Greek index under φω—ς.

²³ Hymn to Isis, first century BC: ἥλιος ἀντέλλων ε—σθ, ὃς ἔδειξε τὸ φω—ς (SB 8139, 4; cf. V. F. Vanderlip, Four Greek Hymns, pp. 42–43); ε—γένετο φω—ς παρὰ τῆς Ἰσιδος (Aelius Aristides 49.46); I.Cumae XLI, 20, 49 (cf. A. J. Festugière, Etudes de religion, pp. 138–163). An oracle given to King Nicocreon of Cyprus by Sarapis: “My head is the heavenly world . . . my eye, which sees afar, is the brilliant light of the sun” (λαμπρὸν φάος ἡελίοιο, Macrobius, Sat. 1.20.17).

²⁴ Conzelmann, TDNT, vol. 9, pp. 315–316.

²⁵ Firmicus Maternus, Err. prof. rel. 22.1; Hippolytus, Haer. 5.8.40; F. Cumont, Lux Perpetua, pp. 49ff.

²⁶ SB 6216; Firmicus Maternus, Err. prof. rel. 19.1: χαί—ρε, νύμφε, χαί—ρε νέον φω—ς. In the magical papyri: φω—ς φέρε λαμπάς (BGU 597, 32; in AD 75); ὁ φω—ς ε—κ φωτός, θεὸς ἀληθινὸς χάσισον· ε—μὲ τὸν δοῦλόν σου τὸ φω—ς (BGU 954, 28); ε—ν φωτὶ κραταιω— (P.Lond. 121, 563; vol. 1, p. 102). Cf. the Christian epitaph invoking Christ: ὃς τυφλοί—σιν ἔδωκας ἰ—δει—ν φάος ἡελίοιο (P.Hamb. 22, 4; cf. Matt 9:27ff.).

²⁷ We may note “the break of day” (ἔως φωτός τοῦ πρωῖ, 1Sam 25:34, 36; 2Sam 12:22; 2Kgs 7:9), the “light of morning, when the sun rises” (2Sam 23:4; cf. Isa 58:8; Wis 16:28); the “flame of fire” (Job 18:5; cf. Isa 10:17; 50:11; 62:1; 1Macc 12:29); “the light of the lamp” (Jer 25:10); “the candelabrum of light” (1Macc 1:21); “the pure oil of crushed olives feeds the lights” (Exod 27:20; cf. 35:14; 39:37; Lev 24:2; Num 4:16; 2Chr 4:20). On Hanukkah and the eight-branched candelabrum, cf. F. M. Abel, “La Fête de la Hanoucca,” in RB, 1946, pp. 538–546; M.-M. Davy, A. Abécassis, Le Thème de la lumière dans le Judaïsme, le Christianisme et l’Islam, Paris, 1926, pp. 49ff.

²⁸ Gen 1:3-5 (Jer 4:23; Amos 4:13; Job 26:11; cf. H. G. May, “The Creation of Light in Gen. I, 3–5,” in JBL, 1939, pp. 203–211); Gen 1:14-19: “God created two lights, one great one, the sun to rule the day, and one small one, the moon to rule the night” (cf. Isa 40:19; Jer 31:35; Ps 136:7; 148:3); Sir 33:7—“All the light of the days of the years comes from the sun.” A. Abécassis (Le Thème de la lumière, pp. 106ff.) gives the rabbinic commentaries on this creation of the light and also on Gen 3:21, where Yahweh makes Adam and Eve tunics of skin (Hebrew ὄρ); Rabbi Meir reads “tunics of light” (ὄρ; Gen. Rab. 29.29), a tradition that must have influenced Rom 3:23. The rabbis understood that the first couple, shining with light, were given the Torah and the divine commandments; St. Paul understands that sin stripped them of the divine glory.

²⁹ At Tob 3:17, Sinaiticus adds, “so that he may see the light of God with his eyes” (ἵνα ἴδῃ τοί—ς ὀφθαλμοί—ς τὸ φω—ς τοῦ θεοῦ); and, at 3:9—“infirm in my eyes, I do not see the light of heaven, but I lie in darkness like the dead, who see the light no more.” Not only is the Greek relationship between the eye and the light similarly expressed, but the eyes are also the source of light: “The light of my eyes fails me” (Ps 38:10; Bar 3:14).

³⁰ Exod 10:23; cf. Amos 8:9; Isa 4:5; 13:10; 30:26; 45:7—“I form the light and I create the darkness”; Jer 10:13; 13:16; 51:16; Bar 3:33—“He who sends the light and it leaves, recalls it and it obeys”; Ezek 32:7-8; Zech 14:7; Ps 78:14; 139:12; Job 36:32; 37:3, 15.

³¹ Ps 36:9—“By your light we see see light”; 43:9—“Send your light and your truth; they will guide me and bring me to your holy hill” (Ps 43:3); “the light of the Lord is the breath of man” (Prov 20:27); “Yahweh will be for you a perpetual light” (Isa 60:19-20); “God will lead Israel with joy to the light of his glory” (Bar 5:9).

³² To be born is to come to light; to die is to go to darkness (Tob 14:10; Job 3:16; 12:22; 18:5, 6, 18; 23:28, 30; Ps 49:19; 56:13; Prov 16:15; Sir 22:11). Light is the symbol of happiness: “There was radiant joy, happiness, gladness, and glory” (Esth 8:16); “light rises for the just and joy for those who have an upright heart” (Ps 97:11); “the light of the just is joyous” (Prov 13:9); “sweet (γλυκύ) is the light, and it is good for man to see the sun” (Eccl 11:7); “he will see the light; he will be satisfied” (Isa 53:4); cf. Isa 58:10; 60:1; Job 11:16-17; 29:3-4; 38:15; Eccl 2:13; Wis 7:10, 29; 17:19; 18:4.

³³ Isa 42:6; cf. 9:1—“This people which walks in darkness has seen a great light”; 10:17—“the light of Israel will become a fire and his holy one a flame”; 49:6—“I destine you to be the light of the nations so that my salvation may appear to the end of the earth”; 60:3—“the nations will walk to your light.”

³⁴ Sir 50:29; 32:26—“Those who fear the Lord will find the decree; they will kindle their righteousness like a light” (cf. Isa 62:1); Prov 6:23—“The precept is like a lamp, the teaching a light and a path of life”; 4:18-19: “The ways of the just shine like a light; they proceed and increase in brightness until full daylight. But the path of the wicked is like darkness; they do not know what they stumble on”; Ps 37:6; Wis 5:6—“We wandered far from the truth; the light of wisdom did not shine upon us.” Cf. S. Aalen, Die Begriffe “Licht” und “Finsternis” im Alten Testament, im Spätjudentum und im Rabbinismus, Oslo, 1951.

³⁵ Cf. 2Tim 1:10. This verb, not used literally in Philo, is almost unknown in the papyri. Apparently there is no other reference to give than the one given by Moulton-Milligan and R. Wünsch (Kleine Texte für theologische Vorlesungen und Übungen, 20, Bonn, 1907, p. 16, 3): ὀρκίζω σε τὸν θεὸν τὸν φωτίζοντα καὶ σκοτίζοντα τὸν κόσμον (third century AD).

³⁶ Diodorus Siculus 3.48.4: the sun illuminates the world; Plutarch, De fac. 16: “the moon is lighted, but in a fashion other than glass or crystal”; Philoponus: “from the transparent in act, that is, from the place illuminated by a light” (321, 37; cf. C. Mugler, op. cit.).

³⁷ Plutarch, De fac. 18: “How can they think that only those parts of a body shine that are touched by the light on the surface?”; Cleomedes 2.102: “Bodies that shine only by reflection send their light only a short distance.”

³⁸ Eccl 8:1; but the column of fire lights the path (Neh 9:12, 19; Ps 105:39); the sun lights God’s works (Sir 42:16; cf. the moon, Ep Jer 67; the rainbow, Sir 50:7), the stars illumine the night (Wis 17:5), the candelabra give light (Exod 37:17; Num 4:9; 8:2; 1Sam 29:10).

³⁹ 2Kgs 12:3—the priest Jehoiada instructs King Josiah; 17:27-28, by order of the king of Assyria, a priest “will teach the deportees to worship the god of the land”; 2Esdr 2:63 = Neh 7:65. Cf. Epictetus 1.4.31. A. J. Festugière, Dieu inconnu, p. 100, n.1.

⁴⁰ Ps 119:130. Hence the function of the master: “I want to make instruction (paideia) shine like the dawn” (Sir 24:32; cf. 45:17). Note φωτίσθητε, “be radiant” (Ps 34:5). A. Segovia, La teología bíblica de la Luz, Granada, 1948.

⁴¹ Light is the most beautiful of created realities (Abraham 156, 157, 159); “those whose eyes are disabled can no longer see the day and the light, which alone, to speak truly, make life desirable” (Drunkenness 155); “death is a less serious evil than blindness” (Sobr. 4); “light is the best of beings” (Creation 53). To express the perfection and beauty of Joseph, Aseneth says, “What womb will birth such a light” (Jos. Asen. 6.7).

⁴² Dreams 1.75. Philo then cites Ps 26:1 (LXX: Κύριος φωτισμός μου) and continues, “not just light, but the archetype of all light.” God is his own source of light. Unlike us, he has no need of a secondary source of light (the sun) in order to see (Cherub. 96–97); being uncreated light (Drunkenness 208), he alone can reveal himself (Spec. Laws 1.42), “light supremely brilliant and radiant of the invisible and very great God” (Dreams 1.72); cf. Unchang. God 58; Migr. Abr. 40; Flight 136; Spec. Laws 1.279; Rewards 45. F. N. Klijn, Die Lichtterminologie bei Philon von Alexandrien und in den hermetischen Schriften, Leiden, 1962.

⁴³ Spec. Laws 1.288; 3.6; sometimes this light of the soul is paideia (Alleg. Interp. 3.167), a torch that guides the spirit (Drunkenness 168), or again “science” (episteme), as in Jacob, “the seeing one”; this “science, the work of the soul” for contemplation (Philo, Migr. Abr. 39); Prelim. Stud. 47; cf. Change of Names 3; cf. Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 12.1143b14.

⁴⁴ 1Cor 2:15. The Qumran theology exploits a radical dualism of good and evil (cf. the two spirits), notably in the form of a war between the sons of light, i.e., the sons of the God of Israel, who fight for his triumph over the sons of darkness, i.e., the impious and perverse, Belial’s henchmen. The novice professes to love the first and hate the second; cf. the Rule for the War of the Sons of Light against the Sons of Darkness (1QM); 1QS 1.9ff; 3.13ff.; 1QM 1.1; the Book of Mysteries, 1Q27 5–6 (Qumran Cave I, p. 103); R. E. Brown, “The Qumran Scrolls and the Johannine Gospel and Epistles,” in K. Stendahl, The Scrolls and the New Testament, New York, 1957, pp. 183–207; K. G. Kuhn, “Johannesevangelium und Qumrantexte,” in Neotestamentica et Patristica (Freundesgabe O. Cullmann), Leiden, 1962, pp. 111–122; H. Braun, Qumran und das Neue Testament, Tübingen, 1966.

⁴⁵ Secular sense: Peter, in the court of the high priest, warmed himself by the flame (πρὸς τὸ φῶς, Mark 14:54; cf. Luke 22:56), which allowed the servant-girl to spot him. A lit lamp is placed on a lampstand so that those who come in “may see the light” (βλέπωσιν τὸ φῶς), i.e., so that they will have light, will be illuminated and will see (Luke 8:16). Cf. the parable in John 2:9-10.

⁴⁶ V. Taylor, The Names of Jesus, pp. 131–133; L. Sabourin, Les Noms et les titres de Jésus, Bruges-Paris, 1963, pp. 82–92; B. Bussmann, Der Begriff des Lichtes beim heiligen Johannes, Münster, 1957; A. Feuillet, Le Prologue du quatrième évangile, Bruges-Paris, 1968.

⁴⁷ St. Augustine: “The animals do not receive this illumination, because they have no rational soul that would let them see wisdom. So this life, by which all things were made, this very life is light, and not that of animate beings, but only the light of humans” (Tract. in Ev. Joh., PL 35.1388). The Christian inscriptions constantly link phos and zoe; cf. E. Peterson, EΙΣ ΤΗΘΕΟΣ, p. 39; B. Lifshitz, “Notes d’épigraphie grecque,” in RB, 1970, pp. 78ff.; IGLS 671 D; 1682; 1701; 1751; 2176; 2479; etc.

⁴⁸ Αληθινόν (not ἀληθές, as if a contrast between “true” and “false” were envisioned) has the Johannine meaning “authentic, perfect” (cf. John 6:32; 15:1; 17:3; see under ἀλήθεια). The perfect light is that from the divine world, the source and model of all other lights (cf. St. Augustine, Tract. in Ev. Joh., PL 35.1391).

⁴⁹ Which indicates that the Messiah is being talked about: “Blessed is the one who comes in the name of Yahweh” (Ps 118:26; Dan 7:13 [Theodotion]); cf. Isa 66:18; Hab 2:3; Bar 4:36.

⁵⁰ Cf. 1John 2:8—“the darkness is passing, the true light (that of the gospel and of the love command) shines already”; cf. J. Chmiel, Lumière et charité d’après la première Epître de saint Jean, Rome 1971, pp. 133–136; C. Hérou, Symbole et langage dans les écrits johanniques: Lumière-ténèbres, Paris, 1980.

⁵¹ At the Feast of Tabernacles—where four golden lamps were lit which the rabbis say illuminated all of Jerusalem—Jesus proclaims, “I am the light of the world; the one who follows me does not walk in darkness but will have the light of life” (John 8:12). Τὸ φῶς τῆς ζωῆς is the light that gives or illuminates life (cf. the bread of life, 6:35). Christ, who is life and light, radiates and communicates both. Before healing the man born blind: “While I am in the world, I am the light of the world” (9:5). “I, the light (ε—γὼ φῶς), have come into the world so that whoever believes in me may not dwell in darkness” (12:46). This light is perceived by faith; Christ the illuminator is identical to Christ the Savior; cf. P. Borgen, “The Use of Tradition in John 12:44-50,” in NTS, vol. 26, 1979, pp. 18–35; F. M. Braun, “La Lumière du monde,” in RevThom, 1964, pp. 341–363; cf. Stählin, “Jesus Christus, das Licht der Welt,” in Universitas: Festschrift A. Stohr, vol. 1, Mainz, 1960, pp. 68–78.

⁵² Matt 5:14-16; cf. R. Schnackenburg, “‘Ihr seid das Salz der Erde, das Licht der Welt’: Zu Matthäus V, 13–16,” in Mélanges Tisserant, vol. 1, pp. 365–387; J. Jeremias, “Die Lampe unter dem Scheffel,” in Abba, pp. 99–102; G. Schneider, “Das Bildwort von der Lampe: Zur Traditionsgeschichte eines Jesus-Wortes,” in ZNW, 1970, pp. 183–209; J. Dupont, Béatitudes, vol. 3, pp. 320–329.

⁵³ Even if this provokes persecutions (Luke 12:3). The preacher does not pass on secret confidences but proclaims publicly, in broad daylight: “What you hear in darkness (in the shadows, in intimacy), say it in the light; and what you hear in your ear, proclaim it on the rooftops” (Matt 10:27). Already the mission of John the Baptist was to “bear witness to the light so that all might believe through him” (John 1:7-8); he affirmed what he had seen and heard so as to inspire conviction in others. The point is that the incarnate Word, in his historical mission, shone among men in such conditions (the veil of the flesh, the form of a slave . . .) that it was not superfluous to bear witness to him. Someone competent, well-informed (John 1:32-34) will say to his contemporaries: See who he is: the Son of God! All of humankind will be able to arrive at faith through the deposition of this witness, who is informed by heaven and who deserves complete confidence (a function taken up by the apostles). Obviously, this is only a little light (λύχνος) that is lit before day arrives (Ps 131:16 b –17): “John was a lamp that burned and shone (same association, Philo, Decalogue 49); you were willing to rejoice for a time in his light” (John 5:35), counting on him to realize your national ambitions. . . .

⁵⁴ Luke 11:33-36; cf. Matt 6:22-23. Cf. Jos. Asen. 6.3, where Aseneth says of Joseph, φω—ς τὸ μέγα τὸ ὄν ἐ—ν αὐτῷ—. C. Edlund, Das Auge der Einfalt, Copenhagen-Lund, 1952; E. Sjöberg, “Das Licht in dir: Zur Deutung von Matth. VI, 22 f par.,” in ST, 1952, pp. 89–105; J. Amstutz, ΑΙΛΙΟΘΗΣ, Bonn, 1968; J. D. M. Derrett, Law in the NT, pp. 189–207. The adjective φωτεινός, “luminous,” modifies the sun (Sir 17:31, whose light nevertheless declines), the eyes of the Lord (Sir 23:19, penetrating in the most hidden places), the cloud that covered Jesus, Moses, and Elijah (Matt 17:5), the sign of the divine presence (Dan 7:13) and symbol of God’s glory (2Macc 2:8). Only late does it appear in the papyri to designate the vigilant (PSI 65, 13; sixth century) and—in the superlative—a person of high rank (P.Lond. 1917: Apa Paieon). In the inscriptions of Nubia, from the seventh to the twelfth centuries, the one praying asks that his soul may repose ἐ—ν τόπῳ φωτινῷ— (SB 6035, 9; 7428, 10; 7429, 6; 7430, 7; 7432, 8; 8235, 8–9 = P.Ness. 96, 5).

⁵⁵ Cf. M. M. Davy, Le Thème de la Lumière dans le Judaïsme, le Christianisme et l’Islam, Paris, 1976, pp. 1ff.

⁵⁶ John 12:35-36. Through faith in Christ, one becomes a “son of light,” that is luminous, a participant in his light. The expression is a double Hebraism: first, in substituting a noun and the construct state for an adjective, and secondly, in expressing relations of dependency, belonging, and origin as relations of filiation. The expression υι—οὶ φωτός is not attested in Greek before being expressed by Jesus (Luke 16:8; cf. 1Thess 5:5; Eph 5:8—τέκνα φωτός), but it was used at Qumran with the same contrast in reference to the unbelievers and the wicked. G. Molin, Die Söhne des Lichtes, Vienna-Munich, 1952.

⁵⁷ There are obviously mentions of light in a purely secular meaning. The jailer in the prison at Philippi asks for light (Acts 16:29—φω—τα = torches); Rev 18:23—φω—ς λύχνου = the light from a lamp. But this light is of heavenly origins when it lights Peter’s dungeon at Jerusalem (Acts 12:7), and especially when—more brilliant than the sun—it illuminates Saul on the road to Damascus (Acts 9:3; 22:5, 9; 26:13); it is the doxa of Christ which shines out from his glorified body.

⁵⁸ 1John 1:5 (cf. Wis 7:26; Isa 10:17; Philo, Dreams 1.75). Cf. O. Schaefer, “‘Gott ist Licht’ (1 Joh. I, 5): Inhalt und Tragweite des Wortes,” in TSK, 1933, pp. 467–476; J. Chmiel, Lumière et charité d’après la première Epître de saint Jean, pp. 30ff., 86ff.

⁵⁹ “Every good gift, every perfect present is from above (ἄνωθεν, from heaven = ε—κ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ, John 3:13, 27, 31; cf. 8:23), coming down from the Father of lights, in whom there is no changing or shadow of movement” (Jas 1:17). “Father” is here to be understood in the sense of “creator, author,” with the nuance of superiority and mastery (cf. Heb 12:9; ὁ πατήρ τῶ—ν πνευμάτων). Being the fullness of everything good, God shares this goodness with people. The formula “Father of lights” evokes first of all his kindness, then his transcendent spirituality, and finally his radiant beauty, his splendor. Given that the stars are sources of light (Gen 1:14–15; Sir 43:1–9; Jer 4:23; 31:35; Ps 136:7), we are invited to think that their Creator, the sovereign of the heavenly world, radiates his goodness liberally, dispensing nothing but good things.

⁶⁰ 1Tim 6:5. This doxology is reproduced in a papyrus from the fifth-sixth century (APF, 1976, p. 127).

⁶¹ Exod 33:20; John 1:18; 6:46; Rom 1:20; 1John 1:20. If the astronaut does not see God, it is not just because he did not go up far enough . . . but since God is spirit, no fleshly eye can discern him.

⁶² At Pisidian Antioch: “Just as the Lord commanded us: I have established you as a light to the nations, so that may bring salvation to the ends of the earth” (Acts 13:47); at Caesarea, to King Agrippa: Christ sent him to the Gentiles “to open their eyes so that they might turn from darkness to light and from the power of Satan to God” (Acts 26:18).

⁶³ This was also the ambition of the Jews who wanted to make proselytes. Referring to Wis 18:4, seeing in the law a light (νόμον φω—ς), they wished to bring to the ignorant the treasure of the Mosaic revelation: “You who bear the name of Jew . . . who are informed in the law and are sure that you are a guide to the blind, a light to those who are in darkness, the teacher of the ignorant . . . you, then, who teach others, you do not teach yourself” (Rom 2:19); cf. Odes Sol. 11.10–16; Jos. Asen. 8.10; 15.13.

⁶⁴ Gen 1:3; cf. J. Jervell, Imago Dei, Göttingen, 1960, pp. 173ff., 214ff.; E. B. Allo, Seconde Epître aux Corinthiens, pp. 102ff.

⁶⁵ 2Cor 4:6. C. M. Martini, “Alcuni temi letterari di II Cor. IV, 6, e i racconti della conversione di San Paolo negli Atti,” in AnBib, 17, Rome, 1963, pp. 461–474; G. W. MacRae, “Anti-Dualist Polemic in II Cor. IV, 6?” in F. L. Cross, SE, vol. 4, Berlin, 1968, pp. 420–431.

⁶⁶ An exhortation to vigilance: “All of you are sons of the light and sons of the day (this second locution is original). We are not of the night or of the darkness. So then let us not slumber . . . but let us be awake and remain aware” (1Thess 5:5-6). Cf. L. R. Stachowiak, “Die Antithese Licht-Finsternis: Ein Thema der paulinischen Paränese,” in TQ, 1963, pp. 385–421.

⁶⁷ Eph 5:8-9. “Light has ontic status. . . . The terms light and darkness possess ethical meaning. . . . Light has existential meaning . . . fulfills a function in the cultus” (M. Barth, Ephesians, vol. 2, p. 599ff.). Eph 5:13—“All that appears is light. This is why it is said, ‘Wake, sleeper, rise from among the dead, and Christ will shine upon you’ (a Christian hymn, cf. N. Hugedé, Ephésiens, p. 205); Rom 13:12—“The night is far spent; day is approaching. Let us therefore put off works of darkness and clothe ourselves in the weapons of the light (the virtues)”; Col 1:12—“thanking the Father, who has made you sharers of the inheritance (κληρος, lot) of the saints in the light.” These saints can be the righteous of Israel (cf. Heb 11:39-40) or the angels who dwell in heaven (Matt 18:10; Luke 15:10; 1Cor 11:10; Rev 19:10), or better, blessed Christians: “the assembly of the first-born, enrolled in the heavens” (Heb 12:23).

⁶⁸ 2Cor 6:14 (cf. T. Levi 19.1). The authenticity of this Qumran-like text has been called into question (cf. A. Metzinger, “Die Handschriftenfunde am Toten Meer und das Neue Testament,” in Bib, 1955, p. 466; J. A. Fitzmyer, “Qumrân and the Interpolated Paragraph in II Cor. VI, 14–VII, 1,” in CBQ, 1961, pp. 271–280; Fitzmyer, Semitic Background, pp. 205–217; J. Gnilka, “II Kor. VI, 14–VII, 1 im Lichte der Qumranschriften und der Zwölf-Patriarchen-Testamente,” in Neutestamentliche Aufsätze: Festschrift J. Schmid, Regensburg, 1963, pp. 86–99; reprinted in J. Murphy O’Connor, Paul and Qumran, pp. 48–68). We must not forget that biblical light is a manifestation of God and that darkness belongs to the realm of Satan and darkness (cf. P. Benoit, “Qumrân et la Nouveau Testament,” in NTS, vol. 7, 1961, pp. 276–296). St. Paul denounces fraudulent workers who disguise themselves as apostles of Christ. This is not surprising, “seeing that Satan himself disguises himself as an angel of light” (2Cor 11:14). On T. Abr. A 16, where Death disguises himself as an angel of light in order to visit Abraham, M. Delcor (Le Testament d’Abraham, Leiden, 1973, p. 156) recalls the metamorphosis of Satan to Paradise; cf. Adam and Eve 9; Apoc. Mos. 17.

⁶⁹ 1John 2:8-10. Cf. C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 3, pp. 248–249; N. Lazure, Les Valeurs morales de la théologie johannique, Paris, 1965, pp. 246ff.

⁷⁰ Rev 21:24—“The nations will walk in its light, and the kings of the earth bring their glory to it”; cf. Heb 12:22.

⁷¹ Rev 22:5. This is the light of glory, which allows face-to-face contemplation of God; cf. 1Cor 13:12.

⁷² Cf. D. Mathieu, “Lumière,” in Dict.spir., vol. 9, col. 1142–1149.

⁷³ Eph 1:18—“Having the eyes of your heart illumined so that you may know...”; the perfect passive participle πεφωτισμένους says more than “eyes opened” (Acts 26:18) or undeceived (Ps 119:18); it expresses understanding, comprehension of the revelation whose inexhaustible riches are to be inventoried. Divine illumination in the Christian life is progressive.

⁷⁴ Luke 11:36; John 1:9—the Logos lightens every human; 1Cor 4:5—the Lord will bring to light, will illuminate the hiding-places of darkness; φωτίσει is parallel to φανερώσει: he will make manifest the thoughts of hearts; cf. Pap.Graec.Mag. 3, 142: God, ὁ τὴν ἡμέραν φωτίζων; 4.990: τὰ πάντα φωτίζοντα καὶ διαυγάζοντα τῇ ἰ—δία δυνάμει τὸν σύμπαντα κόσμον. — A source of light (φωτίζον) illuminates an object; very numerous references in C. Mugler, Terminologie optique, pp. 441ff.

⁷⁵ When the gods appear, they radiate light (Iamblichus, Myst. 2.4 = 77.10; 2.6 = 81.19; 2.8 = 86.6; 2.9 = 88.17). Cf. C. Spicq, Epîtres Pastorales, in this verse. J. M. Bover, “Illuminavit vitam,” in Bib, 1947, pp. 136–146.

⁷⁶ This identification—prefigured by the miracle of the man born blind, who receives light of body and of soul by bathing in the waters of Siloam (John 9:1-38; cf. O. Cullmann, Early Christian Worship, pp. 102–105)—was recognized by St. Justin: “This ablution is called ‘illumination’ (ὁ φωτισμός) because those who receive this teaching have their spirit illumined” (Justin, 1 Apol. 61.12; cf. 61.13). J. Gaillard, “Illumination baptismale,” in Catholicisme, vol. 5, col. 1215–1216.

⁷⁷ Heb 10:32—“Recall those days gone by when, having been illumined (φωτισθέντες) you bore such a great assault of sufferings.” Numerous and weighty trials (πολύς has the meanings of both intensity and frequency) assailed the believers after they had received baptism. Cf. C. Spicq, Hébreux; H. Kosmala, Hebräer—Essener—Christen, Leiden, 1959, pp. 117ff.; P. E. Hughes, Hebrews.

⁷⁸ T. Levi 14.3: καθαρός ὁ οὐρανὸς ὑπὲρ τὴν γῆν, καὶ ὑμεῖς οἱ—φωστῆρες τοῦ —Ἰσραήλ, ὅς ὁ ἥλιος καὶ ἡ σελήνη. The word does not appear except late in the papyri: for example, fire, a work of God, is δόξα τοῦ ε—ντίμου φωστῆρος (Pap.Graec.Mag. 13, 298; vol. 2, p. 102). It refers to the eyes in Vettius Valens 2.36: περὶ τοὺς φωστῆρας ἀδικούμενοι. Greek scientific texts use phoster with respect to heavenly bodies (cf. the references in C. Mugler, Terminologie optique, p. 440). Theodoret of Cyrus describes Severus, Cyril, Malchus, etc. as “luminaries of religion” (εὐσεβείας φωστῆρες) who shone near Antioch (Hist. Syr. Mon. 14.1).

⁷⁹ This is the sense in 1Esdr 8:76 (ἀνακαλύψαι φωστῆρα ἡμῶ—ν ε—ν τῶ— οἴκῳ τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶ—ν) and in an anonymous epigram: “Are you not the one who gives splendor (φωστῆρ γὰρ εἶ σύ) to the discourses and the laws?” (Anth. Pal. 11.359.7).

⁸⁰ In John’s vision, “The one who was seated on the throne was like a stone of jasper” (Rev 4:3). The materials for the wall and the foundations of the heavenly Jerusalem are of jasper (21:18-19). Jasper, a siliceous stone, can be red, yellow, sky blue, green. . . . If at best it expresses for the prophet the splendor of God, it is because it must signify his invisibility and his spirituality. According to Pliny (Pliny, HN 37.37–38, 56), green jasper is often transparent. The stone itself is not luminous; its “brilliance is radiated into it (extra fulgorem spargunt) rather than contained inside.”

⁸¹ Τὸν προφητικὸν λόγον, in Jewish terminology, designates the whole of the Scriptures, including the historical books (Philo, Plant. 117; Alleg. Interp. 3.143). The prophet is not only the seer who announces the future but also the hagiographer who reports on past or contemporary events (Josephus, Ag. Apion 1.37–41). A “prophetic word” is thus an inspired saying, particularly a messianic announcement, and finally the entire OT as oriented toward Christ (cf. Acts 17:11; 18:28; Rom 1:2).

⁸² Instead of φωσφόρος, a number of miniscules read ε—ωσφόρος. In harmony with Rev 2:28; 22:16, phosphoros is often translated “morning star” (son of dawn, i.e., appearing at dawn, Isa 14:12), a figure of the Messiah (Num 24:17; Matt 2:2; J. Daniélou, Les Symboles chrétiens primitifs, Paris, 1961, pp. 110–115; Cécile Blanc, Origène: Commentaire sur saint Jean, Paris, 1966, p. 98, n. 1). 2Pet 1:19 would be influenced by Cant 2:17; cf. J. Smit Sibinga, “Une citation du Cantique dans la secunda Petri,” in RB, 1966, pp. 107–118; M. Cambe, “L’Influence du Cantique des Cantiques sur le Nouveau Testament,” in RevThom, 1962, pp. 5–25.

⁸³ Ps 110:3; Luke 1:78—ἀνατολή ε—ξ ὕψους. P. Winter, “Two Notes on Luke I–II,” in ST, vol. 7, 1954, pp. 158–164. Cf. above, vol. 2, pp. 953–954.

⁸⁴ Ps.-Aristotle (Mund. 2.392a27) enumerates the circles of the planets, “the circle of the Luminous (Phainon), the Resplendent (Phaethon), the Fiery (Pyroeis), the Glittering (Stilbon), after that the Light-bearer (Phosphoros), which some call the circle of Venus, others the circle of Juno” (seems to be borrowed from Philo, Heir 224); cf. “phosphoros, star of Venus” (O. Neugebauer, H. B. van Hoesen, Greek Horoscopes, Philadelphia, 1959, n. 46, 13; 81, 138; 95, 48; 250, 2); Plutarch, De exil. 5: the exile, a citizen of the world, “finds everywhere the same prytaneis, I mean the sun, the moon, and the morning star” (ἥλιος, σελήνη, φωσφόρος); De fac. 4: the moon is “an ethereal and luminous (φωσφόρος) star”; cf. 9; Cleomedes: “When this planet sets after the sun, it is called the evening star; when it rises before the sun, it is called the morning star (Eosphoros); some are in the habit of calling this same planet Lucifer” (De Motu 32, 4; Ps.-Timaeus of Locri 96 e; 97 a; cf. C. Mugler, Terminologie optique, p. 251). Cf. φωτοφόρος, which also means “light-bearer” and refers to a lampstand in an inscription from Pergamum (B. Lifshitz, Synagogues juives, n. XII); φωσφορία is a window, a skylight (P.Mich. 554, 27; P.Wisc. 58, 8; 59, 9; SB 10571, 8; BGU 1643, 6; P.Hamb. 15, 7; P.Ryl. 162, 26; P.Thead. 1, 8; 2, 6; P.Vindob.Tandem, n. 26, 14, 29).

⁸⁵ Moulton-Milligan cites BGU 597, 32: Φωσφόρε φωσφοροεὔσα φίλων (read φίλον)φω—ς φω—ς φέρε λαμπάς; applied to a priestess of Queen Cleopatra: φωσφόρου βασιλίσσης Κλεοπάτρας: under the phosphoros of Queen Cleopatra (P.Rein. 10, 8 = SB 8035 a; second century BC); cf. P.Lond. 46, 175 and 300 (vol. 1, pp. 70, 74). Phosphoros is a proper name in a Roman inscription from the second century (P. Roussel, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1934, p. 259).

⁸⁶ Decalogue 49; the “rising” of the soul (anatole), or the brilliance of the virtues, is comparable to the rays of the sun (Conf. Tongues 60); the look, the eye of thought is “light-bearer” (Plant. 169). In the literal sense, the φωσφόρα ἄστρα are luminous stars (Creation 29, 53; Flight 184; Dreams 1.214; Moses 1.120; 2.102); they “give us light” (Creation 55, 168; Heir 222).

⁸⁷ L. Koenen, J. Kramer, “Ein Hymnus auf den Allgott,” in ZPE, vol. 4, 1969, p. 21; in Hauran, Zeus-phosphoros (P. Roussel, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1934, p.228). Phosphoroi goddesses (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1944, p. 201, n. 81; 1972, p. 444, n. 363). An epitaph of a two-year-old child states that he was carried off by the eagle of Zeus to heaven, where he sits with Phosphoros and Hesperos (“Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1943, p. 347, n. 83; 1954, p. 190, n. 256).

⁸⁸ Pausanias 4.31.10; Dittenberger, Or. 53; N. Firatli, L. Robert, Stèles funéraires, pp. 155ff.; C. Habicht, Die Inschriften des Asklepieions, Berlin, 1969, n. 119; H. Engelmann, R. Merkelbach, I.Erythr.Klaz., Bonn, 1973; at Beirut, cf. J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1956, p. 178, n. 332.

⁸⁹ Aristophanes, Ran. 342; cf. Lys. 442; Thesm. 858.

⁹⁰ Philo, Dreams 1.53; Change of Names 67. Plutarch (De fac. 16) cites Empedocles: “It is a sort of reflection of the sun on the moon that gives rise to our moonlight” (τὸν φωτισμὸν ἀπὸ αὐτῆς); 18: “an entirely exterior illumination”; Sextus Empiricus, Math. 10.224; P.Mich. 149, col. II, 33 (astrological fragment, second century). C. Mugler (Terminologie optique, pp. 443ff.) distinguishes two meanings: (1) the projection of a bundle of light onto a body, phenomena of lighting, and he cites Cleomedes 1.39; 2.103: “the light will be returned by the inclined rims of the moon at equal and right angles”; 104, 108: “what happens with the earth in its immobility happens also with the moon during its movement as far as its lighting by the sun is concerned” (τὸν ἀπὸ τοῦ ἡλίου φωτισμὸν); 118, 120; (2) the shapes of the different phases of the moon, its lighting with respect to us; Geminus, Intro. to Astronomy 104, 1: “from the shapes taken by the visible, lighted part of the moon (τω—ν τῆς σελήνης) have been derived the denominations of the days”; 126, 26; Cleomedes 2.89: “the phases of the moon that are very easy to observe”; 2.110.

⁹¹ Cf. T. Levi 14.4—τὸ φω—ς τοῦ νόμου . . . εἰ—ς φωτισμὸν παντὸς ἀνθρώπου.

⁹² Paed. 1.6.26.1: βαπτίζόμενοι φωτιζόμεθα, φωτιζόμενοι υἱ—οποιούμεθα; 2: “This operation receives various names: χάρισμα καὶ φώτισμα καὶ τέλειον καὶ λουτρόν”; 29.3: “knowledge is found in the illumination [of baptism]” (ἡ γνω—σις ε—ν τω— φωτίσματι); 30.1: μία χάρις αὕτη τοῦ φωτίσματος; Strom. 5.10.64. Cf. F. Cumont, Lux Perpetua, pp. 422–428; A. Benoit, Le Baptême chrétien au second siècle, Paris, 1953; A. Segovia, La iluminación bautismal en el antiguo Cristianismo, Granada, 1958; J. Ysebaert, Greek Baptismal Terminology, pp. 159–177.

φωσφόρος

phosphoros, giving light; morning star

see also φω—ς, φωστήρ, φωσφόρος, φωτεινός, φωτίζω, φωτισμός

phosphoros, S 5459; TDNT 9.310–358; EDNT 3.449; NIDNTT 2.490, 493, 495; MM 680; L&N 1.32; BAGD 872

2Pet 1:19 compares the prophetic word to a lamp shining in a dark place,¹ in the light of which Christians must walk “until the morning star rises in your hearts.”² The adjective, derived from phos-pherō, refers to sources of light, that which gives or brings light,³ especially the stars,⁴ but also torches and lamps.⁵ Hence its application to the “light-bringing priestess of Queen Cleopatra”⁶ and especially to light-bearing divinities, namely Hecate, the moon-goddess,⁷ and Artemis.⁸ Philo uses this epithet for the true God (“the intelligible rays emanate from God the light-bearer”)⁹ and for the shining constellations (Creation 29, 53; Flacc. 184; Dreams 1.214; Moses 1.120; 2.102).

The substantive phosphoros ordinarily refers to the morning star (cf. Rev 2:28; 22:16—aster proīnos), since this star brings or heralds the light of day and is synonymous with dawn, Eos.¹⁰ Some have seen in 2Pet 1:19 an allusion to Cant 2:17.¹¹ Origen finds there a figurative reference to the Messiah.¹² But given the eschatological connotations at 2Pet 1:19, we must take into account the symbolism of phosphoros in figurative representations, where sculptors represent it before the chariot of the sun. It shows the charioteer the way to go; it guides westward the funeral wagon or the eagle that bears away the soul. Phosphorus guides the deceased on the heavenward way.¹³ Thus the Messiah was awaited as a light (Isa 40:1-3; 1John 2:8), and his first coming could be considered a dawning;¹⁴ but his brightness can only grow until his glorious return.¹⁵ His Parousia—made certain by the prophecies—already shines out in hearts and makes them live in hope: “He has a great day for us. . . . Let our faces shine with his light” (Odes Sol. 41.4, 6).

¹ Philo had associated sunlight and prophecy (Philo, Spec. Laws 4.52); “Those who yield themselves to the oracles will live continuously in shadowless light, bearing these laws in their soul like stars that shine out” (ἀστέρας ἔχοντες ἐν ψυχῇ φωσφοροῦντας, Decalogue 49); cf. Conf. Tongues 60: “the brilliance of the virtues shines forth like rays of sunlight.”

² Ἐως οὐ—φωσφόρος ἀνατείλη ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις ὑμῶν; some manuscripts replace φωσφόρος with ἐωσφόρος (“star of dawn”).

³ Thus the eyes in Plato, Tim. 45 b; Euripides, Cyc. 462; Plutarch, De fort. 98 a. Φωσφόριον is a term for “window,” P.Ryl. 162, 26; P.Hamb. 15, 8; BGU 1643, 6; P.Mich. 554, 27.

⁴ Plutarch, De fac. 4.921 e: “Clearchus does not want to portray the moon as a hard, heavy body, but as a star made of ether and radiating light (ἄστρον αἰ—θέριον καὶ φωσφόρον), as you say”; 9.925 a: “Phosphorus, Mercury, and the other planets are positioned around the fixed stars”; 15.298 b: the stars, like the eyes, are bearers of light; Ps.-Timaeus of Locri 96 e: “two of the planets have the same period a revolution as the sun, the planets Hermes and Here; this latter is commonly called Venus and Lucifer” (δύο δ ἰ—σόδρομοι ἀελίῳ ε—ντί, Ἑρμα— τε καὶ Ἑρῆς, τὸν —Αφροδίτας καὶ φωσφόρον τοὶ πολλοὶ καλέοντι); Aristophanes, Ran. 342: “Iachos, shining star of the nocturnal festival”; Geminus, Intro. to Astronomy 1.28: “Lower yet is found Phosphorus, the star of Venus, which moves at approximately the same speed as the sun”; cf. J. Boehmer, “Tag und Morgenstern? Zu II Petr. I, 19,” in ZNW, 1923, pp. 228–233; F. Boll, Sternglaube und Sterndeutung, 4th ed., 1931, pp. 47ff.; F. J. Dölger, Antike und Christentum, 5, 1, Münster, 1935; C. Mugler, Terminologie optique, pp. 440–441.

⁵ BGU 597, 32, from AD 75: “light-bearer, bringer of dear light, lamp, bring us light” (φωσφόρε, φωσφορέουσα φίλον φω—ς, φω—ς φέρε λαμπάς); cf. F. J. Dölger, Lumen Christi, Paris, 1956, pp. 13ff.

⁶ Φωσφόρου βασιλίσσης Κλεοπάτρας, P.Ross.Georg. II, 6, 14 (113 BC); P.Rein. 10, 8; SB 8035, a 8.

⁷ Euripides, Hel. 569; Aristophanes, Thesm. 858: τὴν Ἑκάτην τὴν φωσφόρον. Likewise Phoebe in Aristophanes, Lys. 443.

⁸ Euripides, IT 21; Dittenberger, Or. 53: —Αρτέμιδι Φωσφόρῳ (= SB 8857); I.Sard.: L’Asklepieion, n. 119, 2; I.Erythr.Klaz. 201, 26; SEG IV, 446, 17; cf. L. Robert, in N. Firatli, Stèles funéraires, pp. 155ff.; L. Koenen, J. Kramer, “Ein Hymnus auf den Allgott,” in ZPE, vol. 4, 1969, pp. 20–21.

⁹ Philo, Drunkenness 44; cf. Rewards 25: “God makes a ray of truth to shine”; Plant. 169: the light-bearing eye.

¹⁰ Euripides, Ion 1157: “Dawn (Eos) brings the light of day and chases off the stars”; Ovid, Her. 18.112: “praeuius Aurorae Lucifer ortus erat”; cf. the Vulgate of 2Pet 1:19, which translates φωσφόρος “Lucifer,” following Isa 14:12.

¹¹ J. Smit Sibinga, “Une citation du Cantique dans la secunda Petri,” in RB, 1966, pp. 117–118. Cf. Plutarch, Philo, Heir 224: the planet “that heralds the day.”

¹² Origen, In Joh. 1.78; cf. ed. C. Blanc, Paris, 1966, p. 98, n. 1

¹³ F. Cumont, Symbolisme funéraire, Paris, 1942, pp. 77–78, 211, 338, 458; cf. p. 73: Phosphorus and Hesperius, the morning and evening stars, alternately lighting up and going out. Idem, Lux Perpetua, pp. 291–297.

¹⁴ Num 24:17; Ps 110:3; Luke 1:78; cf. P. Winter, “Two Notes on Luke I–II,” in ST, vol. 7, 1953, pp. 158ff.

¹⁵ The morning star is a symbol of power and domination in the OT (Isa 14:12; cf. J. Behm, Die Offenbarung des Johannes, 6th ed., p. 113), and the Second Coming of Christ is described as Phosphorus to express his glory and universal royalty (cf. P.Lond. XLVI, 300, vol. 1, p. 74: δέσποτα ἰάω φωφόρε); cf. P. E. Langevin, Jésus Seigneur et l'eschatologie, Bruges-Paris, 1967, pp. 218–221.

χαλεπός

chalepos, dangerous, formidable, injurious, harsh, difficult, hard, regrettable

chalepos, S 5467; EDNT 3.452–453; NIDNTT 1.419–420; MM 682; L&N 20.2, 22.29; BAGD 874

The Gadarene demoniacs were “so dangerous (chalepoi lian) that no one could pass by on the road” (Matt 8:28). In classical Greek, this adjective is applied much more often to things than to persons, whereas in the Koine it is used indifferently of both. Here it has the same meaning as in Isa 18:2, “a formidable nation” (Hebrew niphal of yare'); Ep. Arist. 289: certain men who obtained authority “ended up becoming more injurious than the godless tyrants”; in 6 BC, Augustus writes to the Cnidians: “It seemed to me that you were very harsh toward the accused persons and that to the contrary you hated the crime” (autois edoxate chalepoi gegonenai kai pros ta enantia misoponeroi, Dittenberger, Syl. 780, 30); “you shall serve fearsome mistresses” (Philo, Cherub. 71); King Alcetas was too hard on the people (Diodorus Siculus 19.89.3); Ochos had a disagreeable character (17.5.3); Alexander showed irritation (17.40.3); the king was greatly troubled (17.101.6; 17.110.8); Cleopatra was dangerous for everyone (chalepen eis hapantas, Josephus, Ant. 15.98); “people of a very difficult and jealous disposition” (Plutarch, De laude 12); “Terentia, having a difficult disposition” (Cic. 29.4; cf. oude chalepainon = without rancor); the king is hard on his friends (Dem. 25.1); Demetrius “was rude and disagreeable to those who came to him” seeking an audience (Demetr. 42.1; cf. Ant. 89.[2] 1); “terrible enemies” (Ant. 40.4); “fierce dogs” (De tranq. anim. 1); the father and mother of the young wild boar were formidable (Xenophon, Cyn. 10.23). Cf. a litigant who becomes indignant (P.Phil. 2, 7, chalepenas).

When applied to things, chalepos can mean simply “difficult, hard,”¹ but sometimes it also takes on the nuance of “regrettable” (2Macc 4:4), “grievous” (Wis 3:19), “severe” (Plutarch, De sera 4), and “cruel” (Wis 19:13; 4Macc 7:24). It is used fairly often for dangerous circumstances,² which is precisely the case in 2Tim 3:1, which announces the onset of the last days: there will be kairoi chalepoi, dangerous or perilous times for the faith and the existence of the church, harmful for Christians, with a nuance of violence and aggressiveness³ that befits calamities.⁴

¹ Sir 3:21—“Do not seek what is too difficult for you”; 2Macc 6:3—“the onset of these evils was difficult to bear, almost intolerable”; 4Macc 16:8—“the difficult worries of education”; Xenophon, Cyr. 1.1.3: “commanding men is not a difficult or impossible task”; 1.3.3: the difficulty of raising horses; 2.3.3; 5.2.35; Cyn. 5.17: hares are hard to pursue; An. 2.6.11: “a cause of concern”; 5.1.17: he had attacked a difficult position; 5.2.3; Hier. 6.16: a difficult but useful task; Symp. 4.37: a serious illness; Josephus, Ant. 4.1: life in the desert, βίος ἀηδής καὶ χαλεπός; 13.422: Queen Alexandra fell dangerously ill; Diodorus Siculus 17.31.4: taken by a serious illness (χαλεπῶ—πάθει), he called for physicians; 17.101.5: it is tiresome to possess great physical might and little good sense; 17.114.5: a deathly premonition; Plutarch, Agis 7.5: a difficult and hard action; Ant. 48.3: “the most difficult and frightening night”; cf. 40.1; 47.2; Thucydides 2.50.1; SB 8511, 10: “That I may rejoin my family and my servants . . . without illness and tiresome fatigue” (Hymn to Mandoulis); “Forgetfulness delivered me from toilsome cares” (E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 75, 7; cf. 170. 10). In the sporting vocabulary, χαλεπός refers to tiring exercises, situations that are dangerous for the athlete, the most difficult contexts (Philostratus, Gym. 11, 41, 54, 55).

² 2Macc 4:6, χαλεπή περίστασις; SB 8334, 5 (honorific decree for Callimachus, in 42 BC; cf. R. Hutmacher, Ehrendekret); 7464, 3: ὕβρεως οὐδὲν οὔτε δεινότερον οὔτε χαλεπότερον; cf. PSI 1323, 9. Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.235; Philo, Migr. Abr. 26. Philo was very fond of this term and used it in the sense of (a) difficult (Spec. Laws 1.32: a difficult problem; Prelim. Stud. 164; Flight 156; Unchang. God 122; Giants 1; Post. Cain 8; healing, Sacr. Abel and Cain 48; Spec. Laws 2.136; to oppose nature, Sacr. Abel and Cain 114; the way of virtue, Post. Cain 154); (b) painful (illness, Alleg. Interp. 3.124; Decalogue 68; Spec. Laws 1.24; 1.3; infirmity, Cherub. 68; a life more painful than death, Creation 164); (c) hard and rude (curse, Sobr. 30; storm, Drunkennes 102; necessity of life, Heir 41; passion, Creation 167; Decalogue 142; adversary, Alleg. Interp. 1.86; master and mistress, 1.194; Cherub. 71; Unchang. God 48; Joseph 71; Moses 1.184, 191; Spec. Laws 2.16); (d) terrible and cruel (leprosy, Post. Cain 47; the suffering of childbirth, 74; threat, Joseph 222; punishment, Abraham 96; cf. 160; Dreams 2.149; Heir 284; discouragement, Spec. Laws 2.83; burden, Migr. Abr. 14; character, Moses 1.89; Joseph 20, 81; cf. 114, 177; anguish, 233; danger, Moses 1.171); etc.

³ Cf. Xenophon, An. 4.5.4: the violence of the wind; 5.8.24: “fierce dogs” are tied up at night; Heraclitus, All. 1.1: “Homer is attacked fiercely for his irreverence toward the divinity.”

⁴ Menander, Dysk. 325: “That tiresome person—I can imagine—He’s meaner than a man can be”; cf. P.Oxy. 1242, 48: οὐκοῦν χαλεπὸν ἐ—στι τὸ ὄνομα τῶ—ν —Ιουδαίων; “Is not the name of the Jews then odious?”

χαλκεύς

chalkeus, smith, artisan in copper, bronze, or iron; silversmith

chalkeus, S 5471; EDNT 3.453; NIDNTT 2.96; MM 683; L&N 2.55; BAGD 874

2Tim 4:14—Alexandros ho chalkeus.¹ This substantive, common in Mycenaean and attested in the oldest Greek texts, is used in all periods.² Originally, a chalkeus was one who worked copper, bronze, or iron, hence an artisan in metal, a metallurgist,³ like the smith at Istrus who offered this dedication to Athena: “I Tatarion the chalkeus offered this gift to Athena.”⁴ In the Hellenistic period, specific names were used: chalkeotechnes (Quintus of Smyrna, Posthomerica 2.440), siderochalkeus (P.Oxy. 84, 3), orichalkeus = a worker in brass (P.Paris 20, 33), etc. Since jewelry was made from copper, and chalkos (copper) is frequently associated with chrysos (silver), the chalkeus can also be a silversmith;⁵ but in the imperial period, a silversmith was called a *chrysochon*⁶ or argyropoios (Anth. Pal. 14.50), and the smith proper was a *chalkeus*⁷ or a *chalkotypo*s (Plutarch, Per. 12.6; PSI 871, 3; SB 8620 g 3; 8635, 2; I.Bulg. 1922, 1) or a chalkourgos.⁸

The smith’s trade was widespread in the countryside, judging from the attestations in the papyri,⁹ and we can imagine that the chalkeus was indispensable for shoeing horses and repairing harnesses, but little information is available on smiths and their lives.¹⁰ They worked in a tool room (P.Col.Zen. 90, 1), in a temple (P.Hib. 213, 6), in stables (P.Oxy. 2480, 28), on a boat (ibid., line 24), on irrigating machines (1913, 19: chalkei ergazomeno eis tas mechanas). They could own a house (P.Mich. 257, 4; AD 30), pay taxes (P.Tebt. 103, 33; first century BC), owe four thousand drachmas for a copper purchase (P.Tebt. 890, 27, 223; second century BC), build a proskynema (SB 4391, 8604, 2; cf. 8634, 1). In the third century, Aurelius Epimachus, a smith from the town of Caminói, aged and infirm, but still having apprentices, offers his services and asks to complete projects with the iron that has been supplied to him (P.Rein. 113, 4). But in AD 44, a complainant accuses Hippocraton, smith at a place called Pammenus, of not having paid back two doors and forty drachmas of silver (P.Fouad 27, 5).

¹ Literally, the bronze man; cf. J. L. Perpillou, Les substantifs grecs en -εύς, Paris, 1973, 6, 63, 241, 319, 334, 357, 397, 399. On the legendary origin of bronze (χαλκόν; cf. χάλκεα = objects of bronze, Anth. Pal. 13.8, 18; 14.7; cf. 14.10, 49, 59, 132; 15.41, 44, 46, 51), Plutarch, De Pyth. or. 2.

² Cf. L. Robert, Noms indigènes, p. 266, n. 3; G. Berthiaume, “Helléniques III, 4, 17 et le sens du terme chalkeus à l’époque classique,” in RevPhil, 1974, pp. 304–307; MAMA VIII, 140, 388; SEG VI, 402; P.Panop.Beatty 1, 214.

³ Philo, Post. Cain 116 cites Gen 4:22; cf. Dreams 1.31: “the red-hot iron, plunged by the smith into cold water”; Josephus, Ant. 1.64; A. Orlandos, Technique architecturale, p. 98ff. On this profession, cf. A. Burford, Craftsmen in Greek and Roman Society, London, 1972, p. 256; the metallurgical workshop is called a χαλκευτικὸν ἐργαστήριον (Byzantine inscription, in Aeg, 1968, p. 136).

⁴ J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, in REG 1969, p. 484, n. 393; cf. P.Stras. 377, 5: χαλκεὺς κωμης. At Baetocaece, an offering of a bronze altar, τὸν χάλκεον βωμόν (IGLS, n. 4034).

⁵ Cf. the epitaph of the silversmith Canopus at Alexandria: “I worked in gold and silver as well as in metals” (ἡ δὲ τέχνη χρυσοῖ—ο καὶ ἀργυροῦ ἠδὲ μετάλλων, E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 19, 3); F. Cumont, L’Egypte des astrologues, pp. 97ff.; E. Coche de la Ferté, Les Bijoux antiques, Paris, 1956, pp. 3ff.

⁶ CII 1006; E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, C, 4; cf. I.Sard.Rob., p. 55.

⁷ Epictetus 4.11.13; A. Bernand, Koptos, n. 113, 127, 131.

⁸ P.Oslo 144, 12; A. Swiderek, “Deux papyrus de la Sorbonne,” in JJP, vol. 11–12, 1958, p. 73. On the different spellings for the name of this trade, cf. L. Robert, Etudes épigraphiques, p. 195.

⁹ BGU 1620, col. IX, 4; P.Corn. 21, 159; 22, 14; P.Hib. 283, 9; O.Bodl. 1932, 5; 1933, 21; 2108, 2; PSI 1342, 16; P.Oxy. 1912, 42, 61, etc. Cf. Prosop.Ptol., vol. 5, n. 13304–13354.

¹⁰ Cf. bronze statues: εἰ—κόνι χαλκῆ (Fouilles de Delphes III, 4, 239); the statue of Telemnestus at Gortyn is forged from bronze, μορφα—ς μὲν χαλκὸς τετυπομένος (I.Cret. IV, p. 23); GVI, n. 1603, 4 and 14; SEG XIII, 341; XIX, 468, 36; XXIV, 1099, 13; Plutarch, Alex. 40. Bronze steles (ISE, n. 55, 7). A bronze tripod, SEG II, 355, 6, etc.

χαρά

chara, joy

chara, S 5479; TDNT 9.359–372; EDNT 3.454–455; NIDNTT 2.356–359; MM 683; L&N 25.123, 25.124; BAGD 875–876

The distinguishing characteristic of the Judeo-Christian religion is joy.¹ The proclamation of salvation is one of great joy (charan megalen, Luke 2:10-11), which contrasts with the pessimism and despair of first-century paganism.² This explains why a large proportion of the occurrences of chara in the papyri are of Christian origin,³ why pagan occurrences of the word are so rare, and especially why pagan joy is never that of the soul. Rather, it is the pleasure felt by a traveler returning to his homeland,⁴ fervor in spreading false news,⁵ rejoicing at a welcome (P.Iand. 13, 18), especially at the good Nile floods,⁶ or popular jubilation (P.Fay. 20, 1; BGU 1141, 3; 1768, 7; P.Ant. 202 a 14); hence there is no religious parallel to the NT.⁷

¹ Jesus' disciples are portrayed as joyful, Luke 15:7, 32; 19:6; Matt 13:20, 44; 28:8; John 15:11; 16:24; 17:23; Acts 2:46; 8:8, 39; 13:48-52; 1Thess 1:6; 5:16; 2Cor 13:11; Phil 4:4; 1Pet 1:8; 1John 1:4; 3John 12; etc. (E. G. Gulin, Die Freude im Neuen Testament, Helsinki, 1932; C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, pp. 155ff.; C. Lavergne, "La Joie de saint Paul, Col. I, 24," in RevThom, 1968, pp. 419–433). This joyfulness of heart, mentioned several times in Ep. Arist. (261, 274, 293), is highlighted by Philo (Drunkenness 145; Dreams 2.249; Abraham 151; Worse Attacks Better 123; Moses 1.177), emphasized by Josephus (Ant. 3.99; 7.252; 11.67; 15.421; War 3.28), and the novel Jos. Asen. attributes it to all of its characters: Pentephres (3.4; 4.2), Joseph (7.10), Aseneth (9.1; 15.12), Pharaoh's daughter (24.5). Cf. P. Humbert, "Laetari et exultare' dans le vocabulaire religieux de l'A.T.," in RHPR, 1942, pp. 184–214.

² “I was not, I became, I am no longer, it does not matter” (MAMA VIII, 353); Anth. Pal. 9.111. In the sculpture of the first century, the eyes often express sorrow, “a sort of hopeless stupor” (J. P. Milliet, “Les yeux hagards,” in Mélanges Nicole, Geneva, 1905, pp. 357–366); cf. A. J. Festugière, Idéal religieux, pp. 163ff.; C. Spicq, Vie morale, pp. 10ff. = ET Trinity, pp. 3ff.; F. Jesi, “Note sul pessimismo egizio,” in Aeg, 1968, pp. 19ff.

³ P.lond. 101, 8; 102, 4; P.Lond. 1917, 3; P.Berl.Zill. 14, 2; P.Oxy. 1162, 5; 1874, 21; PSI 1429, 2; SB 9286, 3, 5; 10464, 1; 10466, 3; SEG VI, 210, 20; J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1946–47, p. 353, n. 194. As a greeting: χαρά! (ibid. 1956, p. 178, n. 38; IGLS 770, 2: “Joy and blessing to those who sojourn here”; 1529, 2490).

⁴ C.P.Herm. 6, 24: μεθ ἡδονῆς καὶ χαρα—ς γὰρ ἡμω—ν ε—πὶ τὴν πατρίδα ἡμι—ν καταβήσει.

⁵ P.Oxy. 2190, 45: μετὰ χαρα—ς τὰ περὶ τοῦ θεάτρου ε—ν τῇ πόλει φημίζων (first century).

⁶ SB 991, 5; 6597–6607; cf. D. Bonneau, Le Fisc et le Nil, Paris, 1971, pp. 51ff.

⁷ Cf. on a slab of basalt: “Enemies’ joy, children’s mourning” (IGLS 343, 2; cf. 446).

χάρις

charis, grace, beauty, charm, favor, goodwill, free benevolence, gift, benefit, gratitude

charis, S 5485; TDNT 9.372–402; EDNT 3.457–460; NIDNTT 2.115–124; MM 684–685; L&N 25.89, 33.350, 57.103, 88.66; BDF §§47(3), 128(5), 128(6), 160, 216(1), 258(2), 456(4), 473(1); BAGD 877–878

The religious meaning of NT “grace” is original,¹ but the secular word charis was suited for taking on a theological meaning, and its nuances made sense to new converts.

I. — Grace in the sense of beauty. Charis is the quality of that which is attractive and gives joy. It is the charm of language (Plutarch, Aem. 2.2), of a masterpiece (Tim. 35.4), of a conversation,² of a garden (Anth. Pal. 9.666), of a bath (ibid. 9.609 bis, 621, 623, 624, 814); and especially personal charm, beauty and friendliness; the charm of a child (Luke 2:52; Josephus, Ant. 2.231); and the charm of an attractive woman.³ Gracious

(Plutarch, Cim. 2.3) is the opposite of ugly (aischran, 2.4); meta charitos means “of good grace.”⁴

II. — Grace in the sense of favor or love. In classical Greek, grace usually refers to a subjective disposition: goodwill or good grace,⁵ benevolence that finds expression in generosity, love that commands action,⁶ but which is absolutely free.⁷ In the inscriptions and papyri of the Hellenistic period, grace is still synonymous with favor and friendship,⁸ but it means especially the “favor” of a friend, a prince, or the gods.⁹ Those who are under obligation strive to find favor with the powerful, who in turn give notice that they have granted the favor that was asked.¹⁰ It is in this sense that God shows mercy and benevolence toward his favored ones;¹¹ his “grace,” then, is suggestive of loving care and condescension (Josephus, Ant. 5.107; cf. 2.153), a nuance retained in the gratuitousness and generosity of the salvation granted in the NT.¹²

III. — Grace in the sense of benefit. It is often impossible to distinguish between benevolent feelings and a favor granted. Any gift, present, pardon, or concession that is granted freely, out of one’s goodness, is called a charis.¹³ Thus it is that the collection for the saints at Jerusalem is a very effective act of generosity (1Cor 16:3; 2Cor 8:6, 19), and a benefit, like the visit that St. Paul offers to make to the Corinthians (2Cor 1:15). How much more does the extreme generosity of God’s love result in gifts that become the indwelling possession of believers (cf. the link between dorea and charis, Rom 5:15, 17; Eph 4:7); they receive grace upon grace (John 1:16; cf. Rom 12:6; 15:15; 1Cor 1:4; 2Cor 8:1).

IV. — Grace in the sense of gratitude. A benefit arising purely from the goodness of the benefactor necessarily inspires gratitude on the part of the one who receives it.¹⁴ Hence the final meaning of charis, apparently predominant in the documents of the Hellenistic period: thanksgiving, gratitude felt or expressed.¹⁵ A person does not stop at merely feeling gratitude toward a benefactor¹⁶ but makes an effort to pay him back,¹⁷ as if paying off a debt by returning benefit for benefit.¹⁸ This principle is seen in a decree by the Athenian cleruchs in honor of Euboulos of Marathon, “so that the people may demonstrate that they give worthy citizens the recognition that is their due.”¹⁹

Since God is the universal and constant benefactor,²⁰ and all that humans have depends on his grace, thanksgiving to God is the homage due from all his creatures: “I thank you first, my friends, and even more those who sent you, and most of all God, whose oracles these are” (Ep. Arist. 177); “I thank God for placing in my mind . . . the knowledge of the good” (Corp. Herm. 6.4). Pagans observe this just obligation,²¹ but Christians are the most thankful people in the world (Col 3:15) because the Holy Spirit is given them precisely “so that we may know well what God has freely given us”;²² their worship, centered on the “Eucharist,” is grateful praise to God for all that he has given them.²³ Of all the biblical authors, St.

Paul is the one whose thanksgivings are the most frequent and the most fervent.²⁴

¹ Cf. P. Bonnetain, “Grâce,” in DBSup, vol. 3, 748ff.; J. Moffatt, Grace in the New Testament, London, 1931, p. 99; C. Ryder Smith, The Bible Doctrine of Grace, London, 1956; J. Roussillon, “Les Termes hébreux en théologie chrétienne,” in RevThom, 1960, pp. 86–89; C. Spicq, Théologie morale, vol. 1, pp. 451–461; O. A. Piper, “New Testament Lexicography,” in Festschrift F. W. Gingrich, Leiden, 1972, pp. 200ff.; D. J. Doughty, “The Priority of χάρις,” in NTS, vol. 19, 1973, pp. 153–180; Conzelmann, “χάρις,” in TDNT, vol. 9, pp. 372–376, 387–415; I. de la Potterie, “Χάρις paulinienne et χάρις johannique,” in E. E. Ellis, E. Grässer, Jesus und Paulus (Festschrift W. G. Kümmel), Göttingen, 1975, pp. 256–282.

² Plutarch, Eum. 11.2; Alc. 10.3; Praec. ger. rei publ. 5, 801 c: περὶ τὸν λόγον χάριτος καὶ δυνάμεως; Cat. Min. 5.3: He had in his eloquence “a grace that attracted the ear” (χάρις ἀγωγὸς ἀκοῆς); “the actor’s art adds grace to the dialogue” (Dem. 7.5). At Athens, Cicero was charmed “by the grace of the speech of Antiochus of Ascalon” (Cic. 4.1); he himself shone in the attractiveness of his eloquence (13.2, τὸν λόγον χάριτος); “his speeches were attractive and full of charm” (τὸν λόγον ἥδιστον ὄντα καὶ χάριν ἔχοντα πλείστην, 24.3); feminine charm that emanates beauty (Demetr. 16.6; Ant. 83.3), the charm of a painting (Demetr. 22.6), etc. Cf. Sir 20:13; 21:16; Ps 45:3—“grace is poured out on your lips.” The people of Nazareth admired the “words of grace” that came from Jesus’ mouth (Luke 4:22). St. Paul tells Christians that their speech should always be full of grace (Col 4:6; cf. Eph 4:29). Cf. ἄχαρις = coarse (Plutarch, Cor. 1.45).

³ Sir 7:19; 26:15; Prov 1:9; 3:22; 11:16. “Divine grace blooms” on the cheeks of the young Penthesilea (Quintus of Smyrna 1.61; cf. 3.558). “For the Greek, charis shone not only from a woman or any human being whose youthful beauty caused the body (and especially the eyes) to ‘shine’ with a splendor that inspired love; it also shone from cut gemstones, worked jewelry, and certain precious materials: the glistening of metal, the glint of stones of different waters, the varied colors of woven fabric, gaily colored designs. Everything combines to make the silversmith’s work and the weaver’s product a concentrate of living light from which charis shines forth” (J. P. Vernant, Mythe et pensée chez les Grecs, Paris, 1966, p. 261, n. 31). The Graces, virgin daughters of Zeus, hand out feminine charm, “all that is delicious and sweet” (Pindar, Ol. 14.5; cf. Migr. Abr. 31; MAMA VIII, 416). Hence the use of charis to mean “magic charm” (cf. C. Bonner, Studies in Magical Amulets Chiefly Graeco-Egyptian, Ann Arbor, 1950, pp. 48ff., 178). P.Oslo I, 45, 202 invokes the divinities to obtain “victory, favor (charis), glory, and success with regard to all men and all women”; P.Lond. I, 69; P.Mert. II, 58.

⁴ Polybius 2.22; cf. οἱ—χαρίεντες = distinguished people (Strabo 4.1.5). On fatherly graciousness, P.Stras. 270, 21: ὡς φασὶ ὑπὸ πατρὸς χάριτι; P.Grenf. II, 71, 11; P.Lond. 1164, f 18; P.Oxy. 273, 14–15; PSI 1126, 23; cf. C. Moussy, Gratia et sa famille, Paris, 1966, pp. 393ff., 401, 407, 411, 417ff., 445.

⁵ Theocritus 28.24–28: “Great was the goodwill (ἡ μεγάλη χάρις), if the gift was small”; cf. P.Michael. 26.11: “Command me what you will; you know well that I am at your disposal” (χάριν λαμβάνω). The χάριτες of Hippocrates (Epid. 6.4.7) are the “graceful gestures” of the physician toward the patient, being watchful to give him agreeable things, making sure that the food is wholesome, that the clothing is convenient, that there are no offensive odors, words, etc.

⁶ Plato, Phd. 115 b: ποιει—ν ε—ν χάριτι, “act out of love”; Theocritus 5.37: “see what goodness leads to”; Acts 2:47—ἔχοντες χάριν πρὸς ὅλον τὸν λαόν; the disciples had a benevolent disposition toward all (Codex Bezae, κόσμον).

⁷ Cf. Philo, Change of Names 40, χάριτι ε—ξαιρέτω; Wis 3:16—χάρις ε—κλεκτή. Hence the pejorative meaning, “favoritism.” Cf. the oath formula, “I will vote from my heart and my conscience, yielding neither to favor nor to hatred “ (οὔτε χάριτος . . . οὔτε ἔχθρας, Demosthenes 57, 63); P.Hib. 204, 11: neither through fear nor through favor (οὐδὲ χάριτος ἔνεκεν οὐδ ἔχθρας); “the few are susceptible to corruption by money and by favor” (Aristotle, Ath. Pol. 41.2); “Aristides sought neither popularity nor glory” (οὐ πρὸς χάριν οὐδὲ πρὸς δόξαν, Plutarch, Them. 3.3). Moses did not elevate his brother Aaron to the priesthood out of favoritism (οὐ μὲν ε—ξ ε—μῆς χάριτος, Josephus, Ant. 4.29).

⁸ The senatus consultum of Sulla to the Thasian ambassadors wishes “to respond in a friendly way . . . renew the ties of sympathy, friendship, and alliance” (χάριτα, φιλίαν, συμμαχίαν, ἀνανεώσασθαι, I.Thas. 174 D 2; 175, 12); similarly, Mytilene, in AD 45, Dittenberger, Syl. 764, 3.

⁹ Plutarch, Cic. 12.4; Ant. 43.4. “In doing that, you do me a big favor” (P.Princ. 162, 12; AD 89/90); “I ask the favor” (P.Oxf. 19, 3), Letter of Messana 74.1. τῆς τω—ν θεω—ν χάριτος (I.Priene 109, 36); cf. I.Magn. 105, 12); ε—χ θείης χάριτος (I.Did. 118, 10; cf. 199, 14); C.P.Herm. 5, 13: Hermodorus wishes and hopes to obtain great joy through the grace of the all-powerful god (the editor observes that this is a Christian way of speaking being used by pagans). The imperial favor, which translates into gifts or benefits (P.Fouad 21, 15; from AD 63) for a city, is often described as “divine, immortal, eternal,” which prepares for the Pauline expression “the riches of grace” (Eph 1:7; 2:7). On the grace-favor of the gods in the mystery religions, cf. A. J. Festugière, Idéal religieux, p. 293.

¹⁰ Τὴν χάριν διδόναι (letter of Theodorus and Amynder, kings of Athamania, around 205–201 BC, in C. B. Welles, Royal Correspondence, n. 35, 13); διὰ ταῦτά σοι κείσεται μεγάλη χάρις ε—μ βασιλέως οἴκῳ (rescript of Darius to Gadatas, the governor of Asia Minor, in I.Magn. 115, 14); Ep. Arist. 230, 249. Granting freedom to the Greeks in AD 67, Nero describes this act as a favor and a grace (Dittenberger, Syl. 814, 9–20, 42; cf. 798, 5–10). In a legal context, χαρίζομαι = grant a favor (Acts 3:14; 25:11, 16; 27:24; Josephus, Life 53, 355; 4Macc 11:12; cf. “pardon, freely grant remission,” Luke 7:21; Acts 3:14; Col 3:13; Eph 4:32). An official, in granting a petition (Plutarch, C. Gracch. 4.2) wishes to show his accommodating attitude (Josephus, Ant. 11.214; P.Flor. 61, 61). Hence χάρις in the sense of privilegium, P.Lond. 1912, 52; P.Fouad 21, 15; SB 7601 c 5. Savigny Zeitschrift, vol. 70, 1953, pp. 277ff. P. Stein, “‘Gratia’ in the Digest,” in Mélanges V. Arangio-Ruiz, Naples, 1964, vol. 1, pp. 250–252. The Latin gratia also has the sense of “accommodating attitude, partiality,” especially in the legal sphere, cf. C. Moussy, Gratia et sa famille, pp. 300–301.

¹¹ Gen 18:3; 24:12, 14, 49; Exod 33:12, 13, 16, 17; 34:9; Num 11:1; Ps 63:4; 89:2-3; 106:7; 107:43; Wis 3:9; 4:15; Acts 7:46. The LXX uses χάρις to translate the Hebrew hen, sometimes hesed and raham; cf. W. R. Roehrs, “The Grace of God in the Old Testament,” in Concordia Theological Monthly, 1952, pp. 900–907; R. F. Surburg, “Pauline Charis,” ibid., 1958, pp. 721–741, 812–822; E. E. Flack, “The Concept of Grace in Biblical Thought,” in J. M. Myers, Biblical Studies in Memory of H. C. Alleman, New York, 1960, pp. 137–154. Johannine χάρις (John 1:14-17) is above all “gift”; cf. I. de la Potterie, “Χάρις paulinienne et χάρις johannique.”

¹² Rom 5:8; 1Cor 16:23-24; 2Cor 13:13; Eph 2:5, 8; 2Thess 2:16; 1Tim 1:18; Heb 4:16. Χάρις in the sense of “freely” (Matt 10:8; 2Cor 11:7; Rev 21:6; cf. 22:17 = δωρεάν, Rom 2:24; 3:24; 4:16; 8:32; Gal 1:15) is used notably in notarial deeds, P.Mich. 238, 32, 36, 112, 137, 197 (in AD 46); P.Fam.Tebt. XV, 62, 67.

¹³ Gen 33:5; Sir 7:33; Wis 14:20; Philo, Creation 23; Alleg. Interp. 3.78; Spec. Laws 1.285: “inexhaustible, permanent, and continuous are God’s favors (αι— τοῦ θεοῦ χάριτες), which are poured out on men day and night”; Epictetus 1.16.15: “What else should we do but sing the divinity, celebrate him, list all his benefits” (τὰς χάριτας); Plutarch, Sol. 2.1: “Solon’s inheritance . . . was diminished by his father’s beneficence and generosity” (ει—ς φιλανθρωπίας τινὰς καὶ χάριτας); Cat. Mai. 5: πρὸς εὐεργεσίας δὲ καὶ χάριτας; Alex. 30.12; 39.4; I.Priene 118, 29: χάριτος καὶ φιλανθρωπίας (cf. Dittenberger, Or. 193, 21ff.), 113, 14; P.Gron. X, 9, 20; P.Oxy. 3094, 10; hence “bonus” (Prov 17:8; Luke 6:32, 34); “the country can give rewards that will never be forgotten” (I.Lind. 197 f, 12; cf. χαριστήριον, 2Macc 12:45). On an intaglio from Emesa, the benefits of the divinity are proclaimed in the words Μεγάλαι χάριτες τοῦ θεοῦ, which the editor translates “Great are the wonders worked by the god” (F. Cumont, in Syria, 1926, pp. 351–352). The act of granting favors is also called eucharistia. — On κεχαριτωμένη (Luke 1:28), in addition to the commentaries, cf. G. M. Verd, “‘Gratia plena’: Sentido de una traducción,” in Estudios Eclesiasticos, 1975, pp. 357–389.

¹⁴ 2Cor 9:15; cf. Sophocles, Aj. 522: χάρις χάριν γάρ ε—στιν ἢ τίκτουδ ἄει; Philo, Heir 309; Dreams 2.213. Mucius Scaevola, having benefited from the kindness of Porsenna, whom he had wanted to kill, revealed other dangers to him: “I have been overcome by your generosity. In gratitude (χάριτι) I will point out to you what force could not have wrested from me” (Plutarch, Publ. 17.5; cf. 19.10; Alex. 59.3; Dem. 18.2).

¹⁵ Ἐχειν χάριν, 2Macc 3:33; UPZ 108, 30: “I am eternally grateful for that” (ε—φοῖς ἔχοντός μου αι—ώνιον χάριν); P.Warr. 13, 13; P.Brem. 8, 6; 49, 7; 52, 6: “I am grateful to you that . . .” (χάριν σοι ἔχω ὅτι); 54, 7, 63, 34; P.Mich. 483, 3: χάριν σοι ἔχω τῇ φιλανθρωπία; 498, 4; 499, 9; 501, 10; P.Lond. 1912, 11; Plutarch, Cim. 2.2–3; De sera 11.555 f; 13.558 b; De vit. pud. 18: Antisthenes’ Heracles advised his children “never to be grateful (χάριν ἔχειν) to those who praised them”; Anth. Pal. 9.584.15: “I am grateful to my companion” (ἔχω χάριν); 9.600.10: “a thousand thanks were offered him” (μεγάλα χάρις αὐτω—); cf. the periphrasis with the perfect participle: “I will be much obliged to you, very grateful” (ἔση μοι κεχαρισμένος, UPZ 64, 12–13; P.Mert. 62, 9; P.Tebt. 56, 16; 766, 16–17; P.Oxy. 1061, 20). In AD 31, Augustus judges that the faithful courage of the Mylasians is “worthy of all honor and gratitude” (πάσης τιμῆς καὶ χάριτος ἀξίους, Dittenberger, Syl. 768, 22; cf. SEG XVIII, 20, 4: τιμὴν καὶ χάριν ἀποδιδόντες; XI, 1107, 23–24; XV, 12, 21; 113, 18–19; XXI, 435, 39–40; XXIV, 1099, 26; C. Michel, Recueil 1519, 20: χάριτας ἀξίας ἀπολήψονται τω—ν εὐεργετημάτων; 1520, 14; 216, 5; ISE, n. 55, 23–24: ἀνταποδιδούσα χάριτας τοι—ς εὐεργέταις). The brothers of Eubolus offer a gift to show their gratitude for the goodness of their benefactor (ει—ς χάριν εὐνοίας, Inscriptions grecques de Deir el Bahari 182, 2); cf. M. P. Charlesworth, “Some Observations on Ruler-Cult Especially in Rome,” in HTR, 1935, pp. 8–16; P. Schubert, Form and Function of the Pauline Thanksgivings, Berlin, 1939; J. H. Quincy, “Greek Expressions of Thanks,” in JHS, 1966, pp. 133–158.

¹⁶ Cf. the tomb inscription: “Destiny cut my life short at eighteen years, Metro, a grief to Lysanias and Nicopolis, who raised me in vain; and among the dead I am desolated by the thought of all the good things for which I did not show them the least gratitude” (οὐδ ὀλίγην χάριτα, I.Thas. 336, 5); Dittenberger, Syl. IX, 313, 7: οὐδὲ γονεῦσιν ε—οι—ς ἀποδοῦς χάριν; I.Sard. 139, 6. Cf. μετὰ χάριτος, with gratitude (Polybius 5.71.1; 5.77.3; 5.104.1).

¹⁷ Hence the recurrent use of the formula χάριτας ὁμολογεῖ—ν. “If I obtain this favor, I will eternally confess my gratitude toward you” (P.Cair.Isid. 66, 24; cf. 76, 20; P.Michael. 30, 15; P.Thead. 19, 18; 22, 18; P.Gen. 47, 17; P.Oxy. 939, 6). In their petitions to the prefects, suppliants commit themselves: “thus helped by you, we shall give thanks eternally to Fortuna” (P.Thead. 18, 19; 17, 18; P.Mert. 91, 19; P.Cair.Isid. 74, 19; P.Ryl. 659, 15; P.Rein. 113, 27), Heliodorus, Aeth. 2.32.1: “I thanked the gods a thousand times” (πολλὴν τοι—ς θεοι—ς ὁμολογῶ—ν χάριν); Philo, Alleg. Interp. 1.80; 3.40; Josephus, Ant. 4.316; Plutarch, De Pyth. or. 16.

¹⁸ P.Cair.Zen. 59057, 4: ὀφειλήσω σοι χάριν ι—κανήν; P.Oxy. 1021, 14. Hence the expression ἀποδιδόναι χάριν (P.Col.Zen. 9, 10; I.Priene 53, 13; I.Magn. 53, 66; cf. 15 a 26), ἀνταπέχω χάριτας (I.Sard. 104, 2); cf. Ep. Arist. 218, 238; Plutarch, Publ. 23, 4.

¹⁹ F. Durrbach, Choix, n. 79, 23; cf. 82, 14; 112, 24. The corporation of the Heracleists of Tyre wish to offer their benefactors their due in gratitude: ἀξίας χάριτας ἀποδιδούσα τοι—ς εὐεργέταις (ibid. 85, 30); I.Sinur. 9, 44; 15, 18; SEG XVIII, 143, 21, 32, 61, 84 (at Corinth, in AD 43); ZPE, vol. 17, 1975, p. 109 (Ilium). In 188 BC, a decree of Apollonia honors a citizen, Pamphilos, “whereas he has rendered many important services to the country, and since it is just that deserving people should receive a recompense worthy of their benefits” (καταξίας χάριτας κομίζεσθαι τω—ν εὐεργετημάτων, I.Car., 167, 29). These feelings are often expressed in εὐχαριστία (Acts 24:3; P.Ross.Georg. V, 12, d 1: στέλλω ὑμι—ν μετὰ πάσης εὐχαριστίας; P.Lond. 1178, 25; vol. 3, p. 216; Dittenberger, Or. 227, 6; I.Sard.Rob., pp. 9–10; SB 624, 7: εὐχαριστίας χάριν; Diodorus Siculus 17.59.7), εὐχάριστος: “the grateful people endeavored to give me due honor” (J. Crampa, Labraunda III, 1: The Greek Inscriptions, Lund, 1969, n. 3, 1–2), τὸ εὐχάριστον: “so that the others, seeing the gratitude of the people, should strive always to be of service to the city” (L. Robert, Noms indigènes, p. 472), but τὸ εὐχάριστον is not always gratitude; it is also a positive frame of mind or the desire to be appreciated (ibid., p. 490, n. 2); likewise, εὐχαριστέω refers not only to thanksgiving and gratitude (a thanksgiving to the Dioscuri for a good voyage: εὐχαριστοῦμεν θεοῖ—σώζουσιν, I.Assos, n. XXVIII, a 3), but also to blessing (J. P. Audet, La Didachè, Paris, 1958, pp. 377ff.; P. Prigent, Apocalypse et liturgie, Neuchâtel, 1964, p. 50).

²⁰ Cf. Εὐχάριστος is royal titles, “doing good” (Pap.Lugd.Bat. XV, p. 42). The god-kings are εὐχαριστοί, cf. A. Bernand, Philae, I, pp. 101–102.

²¹ 2Macc 9:20; in 257 BC, Toubias writes to Apollonius: “If you yourself and all your business and everything else that you desire are flourishing, then I express much gratitude to the gods” (πολλή χάρις τοι—ς θεοῖ—ς, C.Pap.Jud. 4, 2). A letter from Aristotle to Zeno: “If you are well, I offer great thanksgiving to the gods” (P.Mich.Zen. 23, 2); cf. P.Cair.Zen. 59032, 2; 59073, 2; 59076, 2; 59426, 1; P.Oslo 155, 2; BGU 423, 6; 843, 6; P.Harr. 152, 4: προσκύνημά σου καὶ χάριτα ὁμολογῶ— παρὰ τῶ— κυρίῳ Σαράπιδι. S. Witkowski, Epistulae Privatae Graecae 18, 1–2: —Αλκαιο—ος Σωσιφάνει χαίρειν χάρις τοι—ς θεοῖ—ς πολλή, εἰ— ὑγιαίνεις; ὑψίστῳ θεῶ— χάριν (C.P.Herm. 6, 27); χάρις τῶ— θεῶ— (P.Fouad 80, 47); τοι—ς θεοῖ—ς πολλήν χάριν ἔχω (P.Tebt. 946, 2; third century BC); cf. P.Oslo 155, 2; Dittenberger, Syl. 717, 12.

²² 1Cor 2:12; cf. Philo, Alleg. Interp. 3.78: only the just person discovers that everything is a grace from God; cf. G. Madec, “Connaissance de Dieu et action de grâces: Essai sur les citations de l’Épître aux Romains I, 18–25 dans l’œuvre de saint Augustin,” in Recherches Augustiniennes, Paris, 1958, vol. 1, pp. 273–309; J. Laporte, La Doctrine eucharistique chez Philon d’Alexandrie, Paris, 1972.

²³ Heb 12:25 (P. Joüon, “Reconnaissance et action de grâces dans le Nouveau Testament,” in RSR, 1939, pp. 112–114; G. P. Wiles, Paul’s Intercessory Prayers, Cambridge, 1974, pp. 37, 109, 170ff.); cf. Philo, Drunkenness 94: “The brotherhood of the Levites: those who sing the hymn of thanksgiving (τὸν εὐχαριστητικὸν ὕμνον) not so much with their resounding voices as with their hearts”; cf. 121. On the occurrences of ε—υχαριστω—εὐχαριστία in the inscriptions and the papyri, cf. T. Schermann, “Εὐχαριστία und εὐχαριστη—ν in ihrem Bedeutungswandel bis 200 nach Chr.,” in Philologus, 1910, pp. 375–410; P. Schubert, Form and Function in the Pauline Thanksgivings, pp. 162–179; L. Robert (Hellenica, vol. 10, 1955, pp. 55ff.) distinguishes εὐχαριστέω in relations between cities, in honorific decrees, and in letters with the meaning “to thank, to be pleasant, to please” (F. Cumont, Studia Pontica, III, 25; TAM II, 126); and the formula εὐχαριστω— τῶ— θεῶ—, which appears in votive inscriptions only in the imperial period; it is the “transcription on stone of an acclamation, a thanksgiving that was uttered in the sanctuary by the believer whose prayer was heard”; the words reappear in the Christian formula (cf. MAMA IV, 287; SEG IV, 651; VI, 248; VIII, 277; I.Sard. VII, 94; Dittenberger, Syl. 995; 1173; Or. 717, 3). — χαριστήριον or εὐχαριστήριον is a testimony of gratitude, cf. SEG XXII, 268; 727, 730, 741, 819; XXV, 595, 596, 757; I.Bulg. 33; I.Olymp. 241, 283; I.Magn. 17, 12; B. Latyshev, Inscriptiones Antiquae 17, 133–135, 671, 687; C. Habicht, Die Inschriften des Asklepieions (Sardis), 96, 138; L. Vidmann, Sylloge Inscriptionum Religionis Isiacae et Sarapiacae, Berlin, 1969 (p. 365, index); Ep. Arist. 19; Josephus, Ant. 3.225, 228, 245 (W. C. van Unnik, “Eine merkwürdige liturgische Aussage bei Josephus, Jos. Ant. VIII, 111–113,” in Josephus-Studien, O. Michel gewidmet, Göttingen, 1974, pp. 362–369); Plutarch, Tim. 29.6; cf. L. Robert, Opera Minora Selecta, vol. 1, pp. 414–419.

²⁴ Cf. εὐχαριστέω (Rom 1:16; 1Cor 1:4; Eph 1:16; Phil 1:3; Phlm 4; 1Thess 1:2; 2:13; 3:9; 2Thess 1:3; 2:13). The apostle gives thanks at all times (Col 1:3, 9), or ceaselessly, always, night and day (1Thess 3:10), above all (Rom 1:8), concerning and in the name of Christians (Rom 1:8; Phil 1:4), mentioning what he knows of the gifts they have received from God (remembering, knowing, 1Thess 1:3-4, 9; 1Cor 1:4; Eph 1:15; Col 1:4, 9; Phil 1:3), the mode of his gratitude (“in my prayers”) and his goal (Rom 1:10; 1Thess 3:10); cf. M. Barth, Ephesians, vol. 1, p. 161.

χειραγωγέω, χειραγωγός

cheiragogeō, to lead, guide (by the hand); cheiragogos, one who leads another by the hand

cheiragogeō, S 5496; TDNT 9.435; EDNT 3.463; MM 687; L&N 15.184; BAGD 880 | cheiragogos, S 5497; TDNT 9.435; EDNT 3.463–464; MM 687; L&N 15.185; BAGD 880

These terms, which are not extant before the Hellenistic era, are often used in the Bible of a blind person who is led by the hand: Samson (Judg 16:26; Josephus, Ant. 5.315), Tobias (Tob 11:16, Sinaiticus), the magician Elymas (Acts 13:11), St. Paul arriving at Damascus (Acts 9:8; 22:11). The best parallel (others are in J. J. Wettstein) is in Artemidorus Daldianus: “He blinded them so that they would use guides” (typhlous epoiesen hina cheiragogois chresontai, Onir. 1.48).

The verb cheiragogeō is attested especially in the broad sense “to guide, to help.” In Gos. Pet. 40, two angels sustained (hyporthountas) and led the resurrected Christ (cheiragogoumenon hyp’ auton); UPZ 110, 55: inexperienced persons are guided by the facts themselves (hyp’ auton ton pragmaton cheiragogoumenos, second century BC); “help him with whatever need he has.”¹

The substantive cheiragogos means “guiding line” in the stele of Moschion: “in the middle of the checkerboard, take the main thread at its beginning and follow the track” (ten cheiragogon archen labon).² The comedian Philemon: “For the old man has wealth as his guide.”³

¹ C.Pap.Jud. 141, 5 (= SB 9564), χιλαγώγησον[. . . ον] ε—ν οἷς ε—άν χρήζη (the editors postulate χειραγώγησον αὐτόν, first century BC); cf. BGU 1843, 11 (50/49 BC), κεχειραγογηκότας (correction in Berichtigungsliste, vol. 4, p. 9).

² SEG VIII, 464, 28 = SB 8026, 27 = E. Bernand, Inscriptions métriques, n. 108, 17 (cf. line 48: “then run toward the guiding line that has been arranged for you”); and the substantive χειραγωγία, line 15; cf. μετὰ χιραγωγίας (PSI 767, 33; P.Oxy. 2612, frag. II, 3–4); Philo, Moses 1.299: a man led off by seductive language.

³ Ἐχει γὰρ χειραγωγὸν τὸν πλοῦτον ὁ γέρων, in J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 3 A, p. 512, n. 1390, 3.

χειρόγραφον

cheirographon, handwriting, written declaration, signature, acknowledgment of debt, IOU

cheirographon, S 5498; TDNT 9.435–436; EDNT 3.464; MM 687; L&N 33.40; BAGD 880

According to Col 2:14, Christ has erased the official record of our debt (exaleipsas to kath' hemon cheirographon).¹ Etymologically, cheirographon (“handwriting”), a word little used in classical Greek (cf. Exod 31:18—“stone tablets written on by the finger of God,” plakas lithinas gegrammenas to daktulo tou theou; Deut 9:10), means an autograph, or a written declaration, a signature, as in the world of business and commerce (P.NYU 5, 55, 63; 11, 201, 207; P.Corn. 8, 9; P.Ryl. 585, 45); for example, a letter of credit.² The writing and the signature validate the commitment and guarantee its authenticity.³

In the papyri, where it is much used,⁴ cheirographon is a technical term meaning “acknowledgment of debt,” i.e., the receipt signed by a debtor, who acknowledges that he owes a certain sum and undertakes to repay it: “the right of execution belonging to you and to anyone else who may validly present this note on your behalf or in your stead, against me and all my property and all that I may acquire.”⁵ In AD 1, a wine buyer signs the invoice and acknowledges the sum under this heading: “merchandise for which you have signed a receipt” (hyper hon kai ethou cheirographon, P.Oxy. 745, 2; cf. 269, col. II, 7; AD 57; PSI 1250 A 17). Not only were invoices established without deletion or addition (cheirographon choris aliphatos kai epigraphes, BGU 717, 24), but they were drawn up in duplicate (sometimes triplicate, SB 6822, 13), with both parties pledging, “This invoice, established by me in duplicate, shall be valid.”⁶ This draft is acknowledged to be valid in all its provisions;⁷ nevertheless disputes could arise in some cases (P.Mich. 480, 8; 621, 15–16). Normally, however, possession of the written acknowledgment of the debt gave the right to recover it: “the entire sum granted to you by me, according to the note” (P.Oxy. 1132, 6). Once the invoice was paid or the note was honored, it was canceled with two crosswise strokes: “he ordered a cross to be marked on the invoice” (ekeleuse to cheirographon chiasthenai, P.Flor. 61, 65; in AD 86–88; cf. P.Oxy. 266, 15).

According to St. Paul, humans are in debt to God because of their sins (ta paraptomata) and are insolvent. Christ came to lift this mortgage, and through his blood he paid for them, annulling their debt.⁸ A Christian of the fourth century took his inspiration from Col 2:14—“so that God [may invalidate?] the cheirographon of my sins through your steadfast and most holy prayers.”⁹

¹ Cf. N. Hugedé, Colossiens, pp. 133ff.

² Tobias hands over the note allowing him to receive money (ἔδωκεν αὐτῷ τὸ χειρόγραφον, Tob 5:3); “Raphael gave the note to Gabael, who brought the sealed purses and gave them to him” (Tob 9:5).

³ PSI 841, 9: τὰ τοῦ χειρογράφου ἃ ἐνεγύησας; 1322, 22; cf. Phlm 19: “I, Paul, sign with my own hand; I will pay” (ἐγὼ Παῦλος ἔγραψα τῇ ἐμῇ χειρὶ, ἐγὼ ἀποτίσω).

⁴ Cf. P.Ryl. 602 (25 BC), 662; P.Mich. 244 (AD 43), 266 (AD 38); P.Mert. 14 and 37; P.Gen. 63; P.Princ. 149; P.NYU 22 and 24; P.Cair.Isid. 90, 18; Pap.Lugd.Bat. VI, 16; O.Bodl. 1103; SB 7570, 9358.

⁵ P.Mur. 114, 19 (AD 117); P.Phil. 11, 8: “the declarer agrees not to contest property purchased . . . on two signatures”; line 14: “as the cheirographa stipulate”; line 27: “according to a cheirographon legally registered at the katalogeion” (cf. Pap.Lugd.Bat. XIV, p. 116ff.); P.Yale 63, 6 (AD 64); 65, 17; P.Mich. 573, 9. P.Mich., inv. 406, 26: “This cheirographon written in a single copy is valid” (κύριον τὸ χειρόγραφον ἀπλοῦν γραφέν, published by H. C. Youtie, “Loan of Money with Interest in Kind,” in ZPE, vol. 23, 1976, p. 140); a receipt for seed from the second century, ἔσχον προσφώνησις χειρογραφίας σπερμάτων τοῦ ε—νεστω—τος ἔτους (published by H. G. Gundel, “Vier Gießener Janda-Papyri,” ibid., p. 211); P.Mich., inv. 1384, 6: λημψόμενος παρ αὐτοῦ τὸ χειρόγραφόν σου μετὰ πάσης ἀσφαλείας (published by A. Szegedy-Maszak, “Demand for Repayment of a Loan,” in P.Coll.Youtie II, p. 567). Cf. the Ephesian law on debtors in 85 BC, which links chirographic debts (χειρόγραφα), personal property pledged as security (παραθήκαι), mortgages and second mortgages (ὑποθήκαι καὶ ε—πιθήκαι), debts on purchases (ὠναί), secured loans (ε—νέχυρα), Dittenberger, Syl. 742, 50ff., with the comments of R. Bogaert, Banques et banquiers, pp. 251ff.

⁶ Τὸ χειρόγραφον τοῦτο δισσὸν γραφὲν ὑπ ε—μοῦ κύριον ἔστω, BGU 300, 12; 1656, 4; P.Oslo 37, 16; 40, 25, 66, 71; PSI 1249, 35; 1250 a 23; P.Petaus 31, 10; Pap.Lugd.Bat. II, 12, 15; VI, 10, 21; 13, 50; 43, 32; XIII, 7 A 10, B 12; P.Yale 68, 33; P.Oxy. 3049 A 18, B, 24; P.Mich. 614, 13, 15, 34; 615, 9, 17; P.Stras. 303, 5; 370, 10; 374, 17; SB 7197, 12; 9618, 7; 9619, 10–12. A notarial deed, τὸ ἀϋθεντικὸν χειρόγραφον (P.Oxy. 719, 30).

⁷ —Ακολουθῶς ᾧ πρόεισαι χειρογράφω (BGU 1882, 8; cf. PSI 1118, 22; 1235, 25); ὀφείλεις μοι . . . κατὰ χειρόγραφον τελιωθέν (BGU 1657, 5); τὸ χειρόγραφον τοῦτω κύριον ἔστω (ibid. 1649, 21); κύριον τὸ χειρόγραφον ἀπλοῦν γραφὲν πανταχῇ ε—πιφερόμενον (P.Mert. 25, 19; cf. 36, 17; P.Bon. 21, 21; P.Mich. 603, 25–26; P.Stras. 256, 13; 290, 8; P.Oxy. 2134, 7; 2350, col. II, 26; III, 18; 2566, 8; Pap.Lugd.Bat. XVI, 16, 7; SB 7467, 17; 7634, 38. Cf. N. Hässler, Die Bedeutung der Kyria-Klausel in den Papyrusurkunden, Berlin, 1960).

⁸ —Εξαλείφω, use an eraser, scrape a text or a name to erase it from a list or a manuscript; cf. Xenophon, “Hell.,” 2.31.51: “I erase this Theamenes from the list” (ἠραμένην τουτονὶ ε—ξαλείφω ε—κ τοῦ καταλόγου); Aristophanes, Eq. 877: “erasing Gryttus from the list of citizens”; Josephus, Ant. 4.210; 6.133; Rev 3:5.

⁹ Ὅπως ὁ θεὸς [ἀκυρόση?] τὸ χειρόγραφον τω—ν ἁμαρτιω—ν μου διὰ τῶν βεβεωτάτων ὑμῶ—ν προσευχω—ν ἀγιωτάτων, P.Lond. 1917, 7. Cf. the cheirographon signed by the sinner with Satan, ed. G. Megas, “Das χειρόγραφον Adams,” in ZNW, 1928, pp. 305–320.

χρηστεύομαι, χρηστός, χρησιμότης

chresteuomai, to be good, kind, benevolent; chrestos, useful, serviceable, good, benevolent, favorable; chrestotes, usefulness, good quality, goodness

see also ε—πιείκεια, ε—πεικῆς

chresteuomai, S 5541; TDNT 9.491–492; EDNT 3.474; NIDNTT 2.105; MM 692; L&N 88.67; BAGD 886 | chrestos, S 5543; TDNT 9.483–489; EDNT 3.474–475; NIDNTT 2.105–106; MM 693; L&N 22.40, 65.25, 88.9, 88.68; BAGD 886 | chrestotes, S 5544; TDNT 9.489–491; EDNT 3.475; NIDNTT 2.105–107; MM 693; L&N 88.10, 88.67; BAGD 886

The meaning of these terms varied greatly between the classical and Hellenistic periods. The connection with oracles is unknown in the NT, as is the etymological meaning of chrestos, “useful, serviceable,”¹ referring to either persons or things.²

I. — “Good quality” of things: precious stones (Ezek 27:22; 28:3); fine gold (Dan 2:32); fine linen (P.Tebt. 703, 98); wood (P.Hib. 82, 28); a well-conditioned yoke, one that is not rough and does not hurt or chafe the neck (Matt 11:30); especially foods that are wholesome or taste good;³ oil (P.Oxy. 937, 28; 1455, 6, 10; 1753, 2; P.Ryl. 627, 186; 629, 116; 630, 155; P.Gen. 63, col. III, 5; P.Lund IV, 11, 7; Pap.Lugd.Bat. I, 21, 1 and 39; Stud.Pal. XXII,56, 15; P.Stras. 173, 5; 299 verso 10; PSI 890, 45, 47); brine (P.Oxy. 1759, 9); fine wheat flour (2148, 4); wheat (P.Cair.Zen. 59177, 3; BGU 1532,6); especially wine that is mild and sweet.⁴ Chresteria are “furnishings” in a court or a dwelling (P.Oxy. 496, 7; P.Yale 71, 10; 72, 3, 9; P.Mich. 612, 13).

II. — Chrestotes is a divine attribute. Theoi chrestoi are favorable divinities.⁵ The major acclamation of Israelite worship is of the Lord who is chrestos,⁶ benevolent, favorable, and merciful; Jewish writers draw on this inheritance,⁷ which is confirmed by new revelation (Rom 2:4; 9:22; Eph 2:7; Titus 3:4; 1Pet 2:3).

III. — Chrestotes is an attribute of princes and rulers, whose nobility and goodness find expression in generous acts; they have the opportunity and the means to be magnanimous;⁸ their chrestotes is often associated with their philanthropy,⁹ their justice (Josephus, Ant. 9.133), their megalopsychia (ibid. 12.21; Dittenberger, Syl. 761, 11; from the first century BC), their eumeneia.¹⁰

IV. — A virtue of honest folk. Anyone who shows goodness and concern toward others can be described as chrestos, especially when receiving guests (2Macc 9:21; 12:30–31). The term then takes on an ethical meaning: the person who is chrestos (man, woman, or child) behaves properly, conforms to the rule of honesty, what is called “good morals” (ethos chreston)¹¹ or simply “the good.”¹² Thus Phocion, a good and profoundly honest man (aner agathos; Plutarch, Phoc. 5.10), famous epi chrestoteti (19.1), was called ho chrestos (10.4; cf. Chabrias, ibid. 6.4; 10.8; 14.1).

St. Paul borrows from this vocabulary, making chrestotes a fruit of the Holy Spirit (Gal 5:22), a virtue of apostles (2Cor 6:6) and of all Christians (Eph 4:32; Col 3:12). Thus in a way he ennobles all disciples of Jesus Christ, for chrestos in that period is a title of honor conferred upon a mother,¹³ a grandmother (SB 9673 c 3), parents (Philo, Virtues 131: hoi chrestoi goneis), Moses (Virtues 160), Noah (Josephus, Ant. 1.96), Abraham (1.200), Jacob (1.149), Samuel (6.92), David (7.43, 184, 270), Rehoboam (8.213), Gedaliah (10.164), the high priest (9.166; 11.139), a revered friend (P.Oxy. 122, 1; cf. 1664, 15), an excellent husband (Plutarch, Cat. Mai. 20.1: peri gynaika chrestos aner), even a very good child (SB 9996 [862], 1; T. Benj. 3.7), and generous and devoted nurses.¹⁴ If Pauline chrestotes emphasizes goodness, mildness, and generosity above all else, it retains the nobility given the word by his contemporaries,¹⁵ which distinguishes it from praytes.¹⁶ This seems to be the quality that is most frequently mentioned in funerary inscriptions.¹⁷

V. — An expression of love. These occurrences are so common and so diverse that it is impossible to discern the specific nuance in each instance: goodness, kindness, willingness to be of service, honesty, nobility, loyalty, probity.¹⁸ In addition, the verb chresteuomai (unknown in secular Greek; cf. Pss. Sol. 9.11; 1Clem. 13.2) is translated differently in 1Cor 13:4, he agape chresteuetai, “love is good, kind, considerate, willing to help, benevolent.” The Vulgate is correct: “benigna est.” The point is brotherly love, a loving attitude that includes a willingness to serve one’s neighbor. This virtue is possessed only by magnanimous and unselfish souls who are characterized by kindness, friendliness, and liberality: the Christian is both delicate and generous in brotherly relations, seeking to be useful, considerate, helpful, beneficent, always in an agreeable way, even with a smile. Ambrosiaster translated “jucunda est,”¹⁹ for that is the expression of a “good heart,” of a person who is happy to meet his neighbor and to be able to offer him his help.²⁰

In the second century, the spectacle of Christian agape was so stunning for pagans—“Vides, inquit, ut invicem se diligant” (“Behold, how they love one another!”)—that according to Tertullian, they called Christians not christiani but chrestiani, “made up of mildness or kindness.”²¹

¹ C.P.Herm. 3, 6. Cf. G. Redard, Recherches sur XPH, XPHΣAI, Paris, 1953, pp. 98ff.; L. R. Stachowiak, Chrestotès: Ihre biblisch-theologische Entwicklung und Eigenart, Fribourg, 1957; C. Spicq, Agapè, vol. 2, pp. 79ff., 379ff.; K. Weiss, “χρηστός,” in TDNT, vol. 9, pp. 483–484.

² P.Oxy. 2148, 16: ε—άν τι ποιῆς χρηστόν, περιποιήσον ει—ς οἶκον ἀδελφω—ν (in AD 27). As an adjective for a slave, “for good slaves, a master’s misfortunes are calamities”; Xenophon, Oec. 9.5: “good slaves, if they have children, usually show more devotion.” An epitaph at Thasos, in the fourth century, describes the slave Manes as χρηστὸς τοι—ς δεσπόταις (L. Robert, Etudes anatoliennes, p. 369). ἄρχρηστος = out of service (Plutarch, Them. 2.8), unusable (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1946–47, p. 346, n. 175).

³ Plato, Prt. 313 d: merchants “bring their foodstuffs without knowing themselves whether they are good or bad for the health” (χρηστὸν ἢ πονηρὸν περὶ τὸ σω—μα); Resp. 4.428 a; Antiphanes: “Does good porridge not come from Thessaly?” (in Athenaeus 3.127 b; cf. J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 2, p. 176, n. 34); Theophrastus, Char. 2.10: “look! what a fine morsel” (at table).

⁴ Luke 5:39—ὁ παλαιὸς χρηστὸς ε—στιν (Plutarch, Aroph. lac. 240 b: τὸ οἶνον χρηστόν; Athenaeus 1.48 = 26 f; P.Cair.Zen. 59349, 7; P.Oxy. 2596, 8: οἴνου προπαλεοῦ χρηστοῦ; cf. Strabo 14.1.15: χρηστοινέω); the same distinction between good wine and inferior wine in Ugaritic, cf. B. Delavault, A. Lemaire, “La tablette ougaritique R.S. 16127,” in Sem, vol. 25, 1975, pp. 37ff. Cf. manna, which had a sweet flavor (Exod 16:31; Num 11:8), manifesting the Lord’s sweetness (Wis 16:21—γλυκύτης); cf. J. Ziegler, Dulcedo Dei: Ein Beitrag zur Theologie der griechischen und lateinischen Bibel, Münster, 1937, pp. 12ff. Cf. IG, XIV, 1488: χρηστοτάτη καὶ γλυκυτάτη μνίας χάριν. On χρηστὸς = sweet, cf. Philo, Spec. Laws 4.56; Plutarch, De sol. an. 33.3; P.Oxy. 249 and 302. A lover writes: ὦ μέλι, πολλὴν μνημοσύνην σου ἔχω χρηστοσύνης ἔνεκεν (L. Robert, Noms indigènes, p. 232).

⁵ Herodotus 8.111; the Pythagorean Diotogenes (in Stobaeus, Flor. 48.62; vol. 4, p. 270, 5); P.Oxy. 1381, 73ff. The god Imouthes-Asclepius “as toward all [suppliants], having shown himself favorable (χρηστός) through dreams, healed her with simple remedies”; an act of worship from Deir-el-Bahari: πρὸς —Αμενώθην χρηστὸν θεὸν μισθοῦ ε—ργαζόμενος καὶ ε—μαλικίσθη καὶ ὁ θεὸς αὐτω— ε—βοήθησε αὐθημερῇ (SB 158). Ἴσιδι χρηστῇ ε—πηκόω (C. Vatin, in BCH, vol. 92, 1968, pp. 223ff.). “Hail, helpful Pan” (A. Bernand, El-Kanaïs, n. 82, 1). Marcus Aurelius 9.11: “The gods wish those people well; many times they even help them obtain what they wish—health, wealth, glory—so chrestos they are.” The proper name θεόχρηστος (cf. J. Reynolds, O. Masson, “Une inscription éphébique de Ptolémaïs [Cyrénaïque],” in ZPE, vol. 20, 1976, p. 89, 27) occurs quite frequently in Cyrenaica (SEG IX, 133, 5; 246), especially in the form εὐχρηστος (cf. ibid., index, p. 127).

⁶ Ps 100:5; 106:1; 107:1; 136:1; cf. 25:8; 31:20; 34:9; 52:11; 69:17; 109:21; 119:39, 68; 145:9; Jer 33:11; Dan 3:89; Nah 1:7; Wis 15:1; 2Macc 1:24; etc.

⁷ Philo, Change of Names 15ff; Worse Attacks Better 46; Alleg. Interp. 3.73, 215; Josephus, Ant. 4.180, 237; 6.144; 20.90, 144; Pss. Sol. 9.11.

⁸ The Babylonian king Evil-Merodach treats King Jehoiachin with kindness (Jer 52:32), just as the high priest receives Heliodorus at Jerusalem (2Macc 3:9) and Publius receives the shipwreck victims at Malta (Acts 27:7); cf. 1Macc 6:11; 2Macc 9:21; Demosthenes, Prooem. 54.1: “The people pressed every man whom they saw to be wise and honest (σώφρονα καὶ χρηστὸν) to take on public responsibilities and serve as an official”; Euripides, Or. 773: “when the multitude finds good leaders (χρηστοὺς προστάτας), its decisions are always good (χρηστά)”; Plutarch, Sol. 14.3: Solon was chosen as archon because he was chrestos; Alex. 30.1, 6; 59.4. Diodorus Siculus 19.54.5: Ptolemy’s generosity was touted everywhere; 17.15.2: “Phocion, a good man (ὁ χρηστός) followed a politics opposed to that of Demosthenes”; 17.54.6: Darius held power thanks to the generosity (χρηστότητος) of Alexander; 17.79.1. Cf. Antony’s honesty (Plutarch, Ant. 25.1), “Caesar’s great goodness” (ibid. 79.4), that of Antonius of Crete, father of Mark Antony (1.1; cf. 9.5); Apion, gymnasiarchos and former strategos (P.Oxy. 1664, 15; cf. SB 11221, 9).

⁹ Titus 3:4; cf. Philo, To Gaius 67, 73; Spec. Laws 3.155; Virtues 182; Plutarch, Luc. 18.9: φύσει χρηστὸν ὄντα καὶ φιλόανθρωπον; Ages. 25.6; Quaest. conv. 1.1.4. Cf. R. Hutmacher, Ehrendekret, pp. 45ff.

¹⁰ BGU 372, col. I, 17–18; Onasander 2.2: the general must be χρηστός, εὐπροσήγορος. Cf. A. J. Festugière, “Les Inscription d’Asoka et l’idéal du roi hellénistique,” in RSR (Mélanges J. Lebreton), 1951–52, vol. 1, pp. 37–38.

¹¹ 1Cor 15:33—“Bad company corrupts good morals” (quoting Menander’s Thais); Aristotle, Rh. 2.9.1386b11; Ps.-Plato, Def. 412 e, χρηστότης ἤθους ἀπλαστία μετ’ εὐλογιστίας ἤθους σπουδαιότης; Musonius, “Should Daughters Receive the Same Education as Sons?” ἤθους χρηστότητα καὶ καλοκἀγαθίαν τρόπου κτητέον ται—ς γυναιξίν (frag. 4, ed. C. E. Lutz, p. 48, line 24); Ep. Arist. 290; Philo, Worse Attacks Better 38: “the tricks and schemes of their sophistry destroy good morals”; Virtues 196; Plutarch, Brut. 13; Diodorus Siculus 16.54.4; P.Oxy. 642: καὶ ἡμεῖς—ς νῦν ἀπολαύσωμεν τω— χρηστω— ὑμῶν—ν ἤθει; 1663, 11: διὰ τὸ ἦθος τὸ χρηστὸν ἄξιον τοῦ τυχει—ν; cf. the Stoic definitions: χρηστότητα δὲ ε—πιστήμην εὐποιοτικήν (Stobaeus, Ecl. 2.7.5 b 2; vol. 2, p. 62, 3); χρηστότητα δὲ ἕξιν ε—κουσίως εὐποιοτικήν ἀνθρώπων, αὐτῶν ε—κδίνων χάριν, μεταξὺ πονηρίας οὐσαν καὶ ἀνωνύμου (ibid. 25, p. 147); Musonius: ἀρετὴ δὲ φιλανθρωπία καὶ χρηστότης καὶ δικαιοσύνη ε—στὶ καὶ τὸ εὐεργετικὸν εἶναι (frag. 14, p. 92, line 31). C. Panagopoulos, Vocabulaire, pp. 220ff.

¹² Theophrastus, Char. 13.10: “they were all good people”; Euripides, Dict.: “A virtuous man would not be born to a bad father” (οὐκ ἂν γε—νοιτο χρηστὸς ε—κ κακοῦ πατρός, in Stobaeus, Flor. 110.30.5; vol. 4, p. 730); Menander, Sam. 580: “what an honest friend you have!”; Philo, Worse Attacks Better 38, 146; Virtues 84, 182, 196; Spec. Laws 2.104; 3.156; Dreams 2.94; Sacr. Abel and Cain 27; Joseph 82, 264; Josephus, Ant. 4.237; 6.294; Plutarch, De frat. amor. 1: ε—ν χρηστοί—ς καὶ φιλοκάλοις θεαται—ς; P.Oxy. 2148, 16: ε—άν τι ποιῆς χρηστόν. This adjective, which is particularly common in tomb inscriptions, can be translated “noble”; cf. the tomb inscription τῶ— χρηστῶ— καὶ ἀσυνκριτῶ— συμβίῳ (IGUR, vol. 2, n. 272, cf. 324, 365, 396 = χρηστότητα καὶ καλοκάγαθίαν), etc.

¹³ Μήτηρ χρηστή (E. Breccia, Iscrizioni, n. 258, 271; cf. 323, 10; 369ff., etc.).

¹⁴ J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1959, p. 247, n. 411.

¹⁵ P.Oxy. 1664, 15: Κύριέ μου χρηστὲ καὶ εὐγενέστατε. Hence “Your benignity” as an honorific form of address, ibid. 2600, 8; P.Lond. 411, 16 (vol. 2, p. 282), ἔγραψά σοι οὖν τῇ χρηστότητι; 273, 4 (p. 293); 232, 5; P.Heid. 6, 6, ε—πιστολὴν γραφῆναι πρὸς τὴν σὴν χρηστότητα κύριέ μου ἀγαπιτέ (= SB 2266); P.Ant. 93, 5; 192, 5; C.P.Herm. 17, 2; P.Ross.Georg. III, 9, 9.

¹⁶ C. Spicq, “Bénignité, mansuétude, douceur, clémence,” in RB, 1947, pp. 321–339. Hence the frequency of Χρῆστος as a proper name (IG XII, 8, 93; F. Cumont, Studia Pontica III, 11; I.Bulg. 997, 1011, 1026, 1521, etc.; CII 683, 5; P.Grenf. 49, 11; cf. K. Weiss, TDNT, vol. 9, pp. 484–485).

¹⁷ SEG III, 435; IX, 662; XXV, 1123–1132; GVI, n. 1490, 1653, 1678, 1688, etc.; CII, p. 591, n. 99; SB 10162 [523, 1; 524, 2; 527, 3; 529, 2; 530, 4; 534, 3; 536, 2; 546, 2]; 10718, 1; 10720, 2; 10721, 2; at Gonnoi (n. 278, 280, 283, 285, 287, 288), at Kourion (n. 150–158), in Egypt (E. Bernard, Inscriptions métriques, n. 5, 13, 14, 33, 35, etc.; I.Erythr.Klaz., II, passim); at Didyma (539, 541, 544, 547, etc.), at Lindos (632–634, 643, 656, 658, 664), at Laodicea (MAMA VI, 21; cf. L. Robert, in J. des Gagniers, Laodicée, pp. 352, 354), in Greece (G. Pfohl, Grabinschriften, pp. 32ff.; M.

O. Tod, "Laudatory Epithets in Greek Epitaphs," in Annual of the British School at Athens, 1951, pp. 186ff.), at Rome (I. Kajanto, A Study of the Greek Epitaphs of Rome, Helsinki, 1963, pp. 33, 37); R. Lattimore, Epitaphs, pp. 291–292; C. W. Clairmont, Gravestones and Epigrams, Mainz on Rhine, 1970, n. 39, 44, 49, 85; E. Bernand, Fayoum, I, n. 48, 51, 52, 59.

¹⁸ For example, the formula χρηστός καὶ ἄμεμπτος, common at Syracuse (J. and L. Robert, "Bulletin épigraphique," in REG, 1952, p. 202, n. 197; 1958, p. 362, n. 561; 1962, n. 391), in pagan and Christian inscriptions, cf. M. T. Manni Piraino, Iscrizioni greche lapidarie del Museo de Palermo, Palermo, 1973, n. 18, 32, 108, 110, 140, 142, 145, 147; the comic poet Philiscus: "now Chalcis is a city of good Greeks" (χρηστω—ν σφόδρ ε—σθ ἢ Χαλκίς ε—λλήνων πόλις, in J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 2, p. 10, n. 3); Thucydides 1.91.2: "Honorable men who could give a trustworthy report." Scipio drew goodness from everyone by the goodness of his own character (χρηστότητι τρόπων, Dio Cassius 1.203). Cataline defended himself as if he had a clear conscience (ὡς ἀπὸ χρηστοῦ τοῦ συνειδότος, Dio Cassius 37.32; cf. 47.8). The naukleros was an excellent man (χρηστός ἀνὴρ) and above all easy-going" (Lucian, Nav. 6; cf. Alex. 4; Lucian, Scyth. 6). Diodorus Siculus 18 (summary).

¹⁹ Cf. "good hopes" (Philo, Dreams 2.94) in SB 10199, 13 (third century) and in 9276, 10 (= C.P.Herm. 29; C.Pap.Jud. 513), the hopes of a Samaritan couple at their wedding; but they divorced ε—κ σκαίου τινὸς πονηροῦ.

²⁰ In his commentary on Gal 5:22, St. Jerome says, "Kindness or sweetness—the Greek χρηστότης means both—is a mild, tender, tranquil virtue, prepared to share its goods; it invites to friendship; it is sweet in its speech, moderate in its morals. The Stoics define it as a virtue spontaneously disposed to doing good. Goodness proper (ἀγαθωσύνη) is not far removed from kindness, for it is also disposed to doing good. But it differs in that goodness can be a bit somber, frowning in moral austerity, no doubt doing good and giving what is asked but without being sweet and without attracting people by its mildness" (PL, vol. 26, p. 420). At Rome, benignitas is, in the classical period, a method of judicial interpretation that tends to prefer more benevolent (benigniora) solutions, cf. P. Laborderie-Boulou, "Benignitas: Essai sur la pensée charitable aux temps classiques," in RHDFE, 1948, p. 138; F. B. J. Wubbe, "Benignus redivivus," in Symbolae M. David, Leiden, 1968, pp. 237–262.

²¹ "De suavitate vel benignitate compositus," Tertullian, Apol. 3, 39; cf. Justin, 1Apol. 1.4; Theophilus, Ad Autol. 1.1. The paronomasia based on the itacism χρηστός-χριστός was used by pagans (cf. F. Blass, in Hermes, vol. 30, 1893, pp. 465–470; E. Meyer, Ursprung und Anfänge des Christentums, vol. 3, 1923, p. 307, n. 1). A fortiori it was used by Christians. It is said concerning a deaconess: χρηστὸν βίον ἀπενενκαμένη ε—ν γυναιξείν (J. and L. Robert, “Bulletin épigraphique,” in REG, 1950, p. 199, n. 192). Cf. Sent. Sextus 52: “If you are kind to the poor, you will be great with God” (χρηστός ὢν εἰ—ς τοὺς δεομένους μέγας ἂν εἴης παρὰ θεω—). On the gematria of χρηστός (= 116; cf. ἡ εἰ—κὸν θεοῦ = θεραπευτής) and ἡ χρηστότης (= 149; cf. τὸ πνεῦνα θεοῦ), cf. P. Friesenhahn, Hellenistische Wortzahlenmystic im Neuen Testament, 2d ed., Amsterdam, 1970, p. 144.

ψευδολόγος

pseudologos, liar, impostor

pseudologos, S 5573; EDNT 3.496; MM 697; L&N 33.255; BAGD 8

1Tim 4:2 describes certain latter-day apostates as hypocritical liars or impostors.¹ The substantive pseudologos belongs to cultivated Greek and is not used in the papyri. Its pejorative meaning is clear in Aristophanes—“Remember to keep this schemer, this impostor, this buffoon (ho panourgos aner kai pseudologos kai bomolochos) from sitting on my throne” (Ran. 1521; cf. Polybius 31.22.9)—and in Strabo—“All the historians of India have been shown up as being for the most part bald-faced liars” (pseudologoi, 2.1.9). The verb pseudologeō was used especially by lawyers and rhetors: “to make false reports, speak falsehoods.” The substantive pseudologia has this meaning in P.Princ. 119, 1: “false accusation”; CPR I, 19, 15: “answers full of falsehoods” (antepistalmata . . . meta pseudologias).² These two papyri are from the fourth century.³

¹ —Εν ὑποκρίσει ψευδολόγων. Cf. the comedian Cratinos: γλω—σσαν ὀρθουμένην εἰ—ς ὑπόκρισιν λόγων, in J. M. Edmonds, Attic Comedy, vol. 1, p. 78.

² Republished in Stud.Pal. XX, 86, 15. Cf. Sedecias, seeking to avoid punishment for his lies (ζητοῦντα φυγεῖ—ν τῆς ψευδολογίας τὴν δίκην, Josephus, Ant. 8.410). Antipater denounces torture that produces only false confessions (τὰς βασάνους εἰ—ς ψευδολογίαν, ibid. 17.105).

³ Philo knew only ψευδολογία, a property of rebels against God's law (Virtues 182), which he associates with lying and false oaths (Sacr. Abel and Cain 22; Etern. World 69; Conf. Tongues 117).