Subject: Statement on Safeguarding P/W Information.

To: Personnel concerned.

1. The Germans have been assisted in this war by their knowledge of the sources of information of the methods of securing information used by the Allies during the 1914-1918 war. This knowledge was revealed to them by persons in the Intelligence or Secret Service who, after the war, wrote articles and books about their work, or in some other way, disclosed the facts.

2. The lesson from this experience is obvious. Nothing concerning methods or sources should be revealed during or after this war for the benefit of present or future enemies of the United States.

3. Future enemies of Great Britain must also be considered. Many of the methods of obtaining information developed by the British, and many of their sources of information have been freely shared with us to aid in the common cause. Consequently an obligation rests on all members of the United States Forces who have knowledge of these facts to maintain such secrecy that the British Government and people will never suffer because of disclosure by Americans.

4. During the war the basic principle is that the smallest number of officers and men, compatible with efficiency, are given knowledge of sources and methods. Each officer, enlisted man, and civil employee must realize his personal responsibility for preserving the most rigid secrecy and for avoiding any discussion or reference to the source of the information or the methods by which it was acquired. The much larger number of officers who utilize the information need only know the degree of its reliability.

5. The same rules and the same responsibility apply with equal force after the war.
