ABSTRACT: The study of the paranormal is beneficial since it reveals aspects of human psychology and human information processing. However, study of the paranormal should be tempered with skepticism. Research on miracles and other psi phenomena suffer from witness credibility, human credulity, tribal origins of superstition and conflicts of testimony on miraculous events. Critical skepticism allows the researcher to keep an open mind by not rejecting disputed claims on the basis of prior conviction.

The psychologist David Marks argues that until parapsychology produces at least one repeatable demonstration it can be justifiably ignored (Marks 1986: 123).

Supernatural traffic: East Asian shamanism.

Kendall, Laurel.

University of Hawaii, Honolulu, HI 96822

Culture, Medicine and Psychiatry 5(2):171-191, 1981.

Languages: English

Six Korean Women: The Socialization of Shamans (Harvey, 1979) is reviewed and comments are made on the impact of these women and of other indigenous therapists on contemporary medical systems. The state of the art of shamanism in Korea is examined, along with that in Japan and China. Broad themes which are seen as emerging from the study of East Asian shamans are suggested. It is argued that: 1) ancestors, ghosts, and shamans have established working relationships in all three societies and writers acknowledge the cultural appropriateness of their ascriptions of supernatural malaise; 2) women are the most active agents in consultation with shamans despite efforts to undermine the woman's ritual authority in peasant households by urbanization and contradictory socialization experiences outside of the home; and 3) shamanism in the three societies reflect common therapies and operate under common social constraints. 89 references.

Parapsychology in communist countries.

Human Behavior 7(11):38-41, 1978.

Languages: English

The current state of parapsychology in communist countries, particularly in China and the Soviet Union, is reviewed. The official government position of both countries is that parapsychology is just another face of religion or mysticism and it is used as a propaganda issue. Such research in the U.S. or in the major communist countries is deplored as a sign of political and cultural disintegration. Nevertheless, parapsychological research is going on in China, in the Soviet Union, and in eastern Europe, although these scientists are often discouraged from contacts with Western colleagues. The current pattern of such research in communist countries is characterized as chaotic with a great deal of pulling and hauling at various political and scientific levels behind the scenes.

Traditional and modern health care: an appraisal of complementarity.

New, Peter Kong-ming.
Dept. of Behavioral Science, University of Toronto, 21 St. Joseph St.,

International Social Science Journal 29(3):483-495, 1977.

Languages: English

The complementarity of traditional and modern health care is discussed with attention to the reasons that persons seek health care in the first place and to national policies of integrating the fields of magic and medicine. Beliefs regarding magic and science often determine which path a person may take, but magic and science may also coexist within a single belief system. Patients often fluctuate between choosing medicine and choosing magic as a therapeutic approach to any ailment. Other ailments may be ignored completely due to societal acceptance of the notion that everyone suffers from some particular problem, and the corresponding denial of legitimacy for anyone to seek treatment for that ailment. Often the most logical approach to health delivery is to integrate Western and traditional medicinal approaches. Although Western medicine has resisted such approaches, communist China has for some time been committed to this practice, and it is hoped that future researchers will be permitted to assess its effectiveness in mainland China. 54 references.

A collection of papers is presented which details the lack of modern psychotherapeutic programs and the abundance of indigenous health methods on which the majority of the peoples of Southeast Asia and the Pacific rely for mental health service. Therapeutic factors inherent in indigenous programs are examined, and collaboration with native folk healers (who are in closer contact with the populations than the medical communities) is urged. A range of substantive and methodological themes in transcultural psychiatry is covered, including Latah, epidemic hysteria, possession, and malgri. Other chapters focus on indigenous healing practices in the Philippines, Polynesia, Malaysia, Taiwan, Korea, Japan, China, and among the Maori of New Zealand.

The personification of opposites. 5. Sal. b. The bitterness.

Associated with salt and sea is the quality of bitterness, an alchemical term connoting not only the sharp salt taste of the sea water, but also corruption and imperfection. This corruption is the quality of the prima materia, which is synonymous in alchemical and mythological tradition with chaos and the sea. It is noted that the sea was often characterized as something impure in ancient cultures, especially that of Egypt and Greece; in the same cultures and in ancient China as well, salt is often found characterized as a spirit and identified with a bird. This bird represents the spirit of corruption expelled from an impure substance which is made pure thereby; it is usually said to have many colors. This and other spirits of impurity constitute that part of the universe which is still chaos, and in the psychological sense, that part of the psyche which remains unconscious. As the spirit of chaos is indispensable to the alchemical world order, so the unconscious is essential to the balanced working of the mind. 1 reference.

Song of the siren: a parapsychological odyssey.

Krippner, Stanley.

no address

New York, Harper and Row, 1975. 311 p. $12.50

Languages: English

The experiences of Stanley Krippner with regard to parapsychology are described in a semiautobiographical treatise. The account begins with the author's first paranormal experience at the age of 14 when he had the sudden conviction that his uncle had just died, and continues with his youthful activity in the field of legerdemain and the exciting obtrusion into some of his mentalism tricks of genuinely paranormal intuition. As a student he was further stimulated by the active resistance of the academic establishment to parapsychology. With maturity the odyssey in parapsychological experiences became wider ranging, including visits to foreign countries and renowned psychokinetics and psychics. Experiences noted in Russia, Brazil, Czechoslovakia, China, Japan, and the Philippines are described, with detailed information on the parapsychological individuals involved in these travels. Those so described include Rolling Thunder, K. Ramakrishna Rao, Uri Geller, and Mme. Kulagina. In addition, results of experimentation carried out by Krippner and his associates at the Maimonides Dream Laboratory are described. From these studies 20 altered states of consciousness have been outlined, including some at variance with definitions used in modern psychiatry.
